As to the manner in which the New Moon was observed, there were other features besides the sacrifices. There was no 'solemn convocation' on the New Moon, but it is usually inferred from 2 K 4[23] that visits were paid to the prophets on that day. The servants and asses were available for longer journeys than on the days of labour. Some (e.g. Duhm) explain Is 66[23] as referring to general assemblages in Jerusalem for worship on the New Moon ('jeden Monat am Neumond'), and this passage of Isaiah was the text for a fine Rabbinical homily in the Pesikta Rabbathi for the New Moon. Ezra publicly read the law on the New Moon of the seventh month (Neh 8[2]). The New Moon was apparently the time for changing David's officials, according to 1 Ch 27[1]. It is not easy to gather the full significance of the incident related in 1 S 20[5ff.]. David evidently refers to a family feast on the New Moon, but it is not clear that the king had a special feast on that day. It is very probable that this was so, but Wellhausen's remark as cited by Driver (Notes on the Hebrew Text of Samuel, p. 127) is evidently weighty. 'David, as appears from v.[26ff.], was, together with Abner and Jonathan, Saul's daily and regular companion at table: thus the sentence ראובי ישב ת׳ cannot be so related to the preceding one, as though the new moon were the occasion of his being a guest at the king's table; on the contrary, the new moon is rather alleged as the excuse for his absence. Consequently, the rendering, "To-morrow is new moon, and I must sit with the king at meat," is excluded; and the only course remaining open is to read with LXX ישב לא אשב "To-morrow is new moon, and I will not sit with the king at meat; but thou shalt let me go,"' etc. No time of day is specified for the king's meal from which David absented himself; but, as Smith points out, from the fact that Jonathan waited till next morning after the second day to carry his news to David, the meal was probably late in the day.

Fasting was avoided on the New Moon (Jth 8[6]). The observance of the New Moon fell into disuse in the Christian communities (Col 2[16]). In the mediæval Jewish circles the New Moon, however, retained its importance. Women did not work, fasting was prohibited, and in the synagogue liturgy many special features were introduced. On the Sabbath before the New Moon the event was publicly announced, on the day itself a reading from the law (Nu 28[1-15]) was introduced, special Psalms (forming part of the Hallel, Pss 113–118) were chanted, and other liturgical passages were added. These are retained in the modern synagogue, and are fully described in the Shulchan Aruch, Orach Chayim, par. 417 ff. See also Maimonides, Hilchoth Kiddush Ha-Chodesh (of which there are several Latin translations). The Blessing of the Moon is also retained. This is a collection of passages of varying antiquity, and is recited at night while the moon is visible, a Saturday night in the first week of new month being preferred for the celebration. (The best commentary on these rites is to be found in Landshut's edition of the Hebrew Prayer-Book, Hegyon Leb, p. 390 f.). Some of the ceremonies are clearly very ancient, especially the dances, which until quite recently were performed in Jewish communities in the public streets. Others of the rites are at least as old as the Talmud. The modern Arabs of the desert still 'greet the New Moon with devout ejaculations, and the women chant their perpetual refrain of a single verse, and dance for an hour or two' (Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta, i. pp. 366, 455, cited in Smith's Samuel, p. 185).

We are without information as to the method by which the New Moon was fixed and announced in biblical times. But the Mishna (Rosh Hashana) describes the method then prevalent. There was no fixed calendar till the 4th cent. (see TIME), and the New Moon was declared from actual observation. The eye-witnesses were carefully examined on the 30th day of each month (especially of the months Nisan, Ab, Elul, Tishri, Chislev, and Adar), and, if the testimony of the witnesses was accepted, that day was declared 'sanctified' by fiat of the Sanhedrin. If no witnesses were available, then the following day was New Moon, as the Jewish month never contained more than 30 days. The New Moon was announced in Judæa till the year 225, when the declaration was made in Tiberias. The news was conveyed by means of signals, torches being lit on the hills. The Samaritans rendered a change necessary, as they ignited similar bonfires at wrong periods. Messengers were despatched to more distant parts, where it was not unusual for two days to be observed as New Moon, a custom which still prevails at certain months of the Jewish year. After the 4th cent. the New Moon was no longer fixed by observation, but the Karaites restored the older custom. Schwartz (Der jüdische Kalender) holds that the New Moons of the first and seventh months (Nisan and Tishri) were fixed by astronomical calculation and not empirically, as early as the time of Ezra. Certainly, the Jews must have had sufficient knowledge of astronomy to make such a calculation possible (but see TIME).

I. ABRAHAMS.

NEW TESTAMENT.—The name 'testament' is derived from the Latin testamentum, which was erroneously adopted in the Old Latin Version as the equivalent for the Gr. word διαθήκη employed in the LXX to represent the Heb. בְּרִית 'covenant.' It is in this sense that διαθήκη is used in the NT to designate the old or the new Dispensation, and has come to be applied, in accordance with Heb. usage (Ex 24^{7}, 2 K 23^{2}, 1 Mac 1^{57}, Sir 24^{23}), to the literature in which the respective history and principles of the two Dispensations are authoritatively set forth. (Cf. Mt 26^{28}, Lk 22^{20}, 1 Co 11^{25}, 2 Co 3$^{6. 14}$, and Gn 17^{4}, Ex 24^{8}, Jer 31^{31} et supra). In the OT Jerome usually took care to employ fœdus or pactum as the Latin equivalent for בְּרִית; but in his revision of the NT tr^{n} he unfortunately adhered to the old expression, the consequence being that the false meaning thus imported into the Latin passed into the EV, whose 'testament' is as misleading as testamentum, and has rightly been altered to 'covenant' in the RV, except in one doubtful passage, He 9$^{16. 17}$ (see Westcott, ad loc.).

i. RELATION OF THE NT TO THE OT AND TO THE APOCRYPHAL LITERATURE OF THE JEWS.—The NT forms the second and concluding portion of the sacred writings which embody the Divine revelation communicated in the line of Jewish history. Before any part of the NT had been written, the Heb. canon had been virtually closed; and the idea of a new collection of sacred writings which should be held in no less veneration than the old was slow to take possession of the Christian Church. Hence the OT Scriptures, to which the apostles constantly appealed for evidence that Jesus was the Messiah, continued to be for many years the only authoritative writings in the Church. But the way had been so far prepared for the association of Christian Scriptures with the OT by the recent inclusion in the LXX of certain apocryphal works which had no place in the Heb. canon. The language of the LXX was also that in which the new religion was to express itself; and the character of the Gr. tongue, so rich and flexible and many-sided, even in its degenerate Hellenistic form, and so world-wide in its use, was itself a token of the freedom from Judaic bonds which Christian thought was to work out for itself, and gave promise of a literature which should be more or less in touch with the intellectual life of the whole civilized world. With the exception of Luke, who seems to have been a Greek (an inference from Col 4$^{11-14}$, which is borne out by the tone and style of his Gospel and the Bk. of Acts), the writers of the NT were of Jewish extraction, and they were all filled with the deepest reverence for the OT. They quote from it nearly 300 times, their quotations being drawn from almost all parts of it; while the instances in which its influence can be traced without any direct quotations from it are still more numerous. The whole NT from first to last reflects the characteristics of the OT in thought as well as in expression; and in the Epistles and Acts and Apocalypse as well as in the Gospels we find constant illustration of Christ's words, 'Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil.' The NT fulfils the OT, not by supplementing it but by spiritualizing it, transforming rules into principles, and resolving the outward, temporary, and national into that which is inward, permanent, and universal. In other words, it brings to light and sets free of limitations the essential principles lying at the root of the OT, on which the latter depends for its spiritual life and meaning,—according to the well-known words of Augustine, 'Novum Testamentum in Vetere latet; Vetus Testamentum in Novo patet.' Even in their bodily structure a close analogy has been traced between them, the first portion of each being mainly characterized by the personal manifestation of God, the next by the revelation of His will through the acts and words of His chosen servants, the third and last by prophetic visions of the future.

Yet, notwithstanding this intimate relationship between the two, there is at the same time a strong and essential contrast between them—a contrast as great in their character and contents as in the process of their growth. To some extent the difference in their character may be accounted for by the new conditions of existence to which the Jewish nation was subjected under the Roman Empire, of which we have many tokens in our Lord's parables as well as in other parts of the NT. In some degree, also, it may be traced to the new elements of thought contained in the later Jewish writings already referred to. While the points of contact between the NT and heathen literature are extremely few,* the LXX, on the other hand, was familiar to most of the NT writers, their OT quotations being generally derived from it and not from the Heb.; and the influence of several apocr. books contained in it, notably the Bk. of Wisdom, can be discerned in a number of the Epistles, although there is not a single express quotation from any of these books in the NT. In a few instances, also, chiefly in St. Paul's Epistles,† a Rabbinical style of argument has been detected; and in the Ep. to the Heb. and the writings of St. John expressions are to be found (such as Λόγος, Παράκλητος, Ἀρχιερεύς, applied to Christ) showing an affinity with the views of Philo, the chief representative of the fresh impulse which Jewish thought received from contact with Greek philosophy at Alexandria and elsewhere. But the most striking signs of transition to a new age are to be found, not in the OT Apocr., properly so-called, or in Rabbinical scholasticism or Hellenistic philosophy, but in the pseudonymous apocalyptic literature (partly recovered within the last century), which was framed on the model of the well-known Book of Daniel, and prepared the way for its Christian counterpart, the Apocalypse of John. Whether this literature was a spirited offshoot from the main stem of Pharisaic thought, or formed part of the esoteric doctrine of the Essenes, whose strange tenets and literature are described by Philo and Josephus, although their name is never even mentioned in the NT, is a question which has not yet been determined. But in Jude we find a direct quotation from one of the most important of these apocalyptic works (Bk. of Enoch); and elsewhere there are a few stray quotations and allusions to circumstances not mentioned in the OT for which the writers were probably indebted to a similar source.‡

More important than such Haggadic details are certain ideas and expressions in the extant remains of this apocalyptic literature, which appear to be reflected in the thought and language not only of the NT writers but also of our Lord Himself. There are Christian interpolations in these books, and their date of composition is often very uncertain, but, even in those parts of them to which a pre-Christian date may be safely assigned, there are more distinct foreshadowings than any of the OT books contain of a number of truths relating to the spiritual world which hold a more or less prominent place in the NT. Among such elements of Christian thought are the unique personality of the Messiah (of which we have a token in the frequent occurrence in the Bk. of Enoch of the expression, 'the Son of man,' with a Messianic reference that goes far beyond the meaning of the words, 'one like unto a son of man,' in Dn 7^{13}), the doctrine of immortality, of the resurrection (cf. Dn 12^{2}), of a future judgment with eternal rewards and punishments, of a hierarchy of angels with manifold operations, of the agency of demons, and of predestination, together with enlarged conceptions of Divine providence as embracing universal history, and of the Messianic promise as securing the interests of the individual as well as of the nation: all these developments being due, partly to the foreign elements of thought which the Jews imported from Babylonia and Persia, and partly to the growing hopelessness of their national position (as regarded mere mundane possibilities), which naturally disposed them to the study of eschatology. It was, doubtless, these anticipations of Christianity that gave some of these books so high a place in the estimation of the Church Fathers, who sometimes treated them as if they had been canonical; the Bk. of Enoch, for example, being cited as γραφή in the Ep. of Barnabas. In other respects, however, both ethical and theological, this literature comes far short of 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ'; and we have still to fall back on the mystery of the Incarnation, with its attendant doctrines of Christ's atoning sacrifice (of which there is scarcely any trace in contemporary Jewish thought, so absorbed was the nation in the formal keeping of the Law as the only means of salvation), of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men revealed in Christ, of the life and immortality secured by His resurrection from the dead, and of the Holy Spirit imparted by Him to His Church, in order to find an adequate explanation of the majesty of Christ's person and the sublimity of His teaching as depicted in the Gospels, and at the same time to account for the sure and certain hope, the humble and self-renouncing faith, the loving and grateful devotion, the pure, tender, and world-wide morality which are characteristic of the whole NT.

ii. HISTORY OF THE NT, INCLUDING ITS RELATION TO THE CHURCH FATHERS AND THE CHRISTIAN APOCRYPHA.—As already indicated, a New Testament in our sense of the term was something which the apostles never dreamt of. The charge which they had received from their Master was to preach the gospel, and the promise of the Spirit was expressly connected with the bearing of oral testimony. As they had received nothing in writing from their Master's hands, they were not likely to see any necessity for a written word, so long as they were able to fulfil their commission to preach the gospel, especially as they were looking for a speedy return of their Lord, and had no idea that so many centuries were to elapse before the great event should take place. Probably the earliest nucleus of the NT consisted of notes of the apostles' preaching, either drawn up by their hearers for their own use, or intended as an aid to catechists and teachers. Some such notes (probably in Aramaic, of which we have many traces in the Greek text) seem to have formed the basis of our Synoptic Gospels. Although not published in their present form till long after Christ's death, the Gospels narrate events, not in the light shed upon them by subsequent experience, but as they were regarded by the disciples at the time of their occurrence. They also preserve expressions in our Lord's discourses which scarcely ever appear in the phraseology of the early Church, while they are at the same time free from forms of speech which betray the post-apostolic date of apocr. Gospels; and in other respects harmonize with the state of things prior to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Before the Gospels assumed their present form, many of the Epistles were already current in the Church. These letters were naturally prized by the Churches to which they were addressed, as well as by other Churches which received copies of them, and they were readily admitted to public reading in the congregation, first of all on special occasions (1 Th 5^{27}) and in course of time as a general practice, along with prescribed portions of the OT, after the manner of the Jewish synagogue. As the apostles one after another passed away, their testimony and that of those most closely associated with them was more and more treasured by the Church; and the writings in which that testimony was embodied were felt to be indispensable to the faith and life of the Church. In the Apostolic Fathers we can discern signs of the growing reverence for these writings, not only in their reproduction of the thought and language of a considerable number of the Epistles, representing the leading types of apostolic teaching found in the NT, but also in the terms in which St. Paul's writings are referred to by representative men so far distant from one another as Clement of Rome, Ignatius of Antioch, and Polycarp of Smyrna; while our Gospels are also accredited by the substantial harmony of their contents with the facts assumed by the sub-apostolic writers as the basis of their teaching, although the verbal coincidences are neither numerous nor exact, unless we except the Didaché in its quotations from the First and Third Gospels.

But the formal recognition of a new body of Scriptures worthy of being associated with the OT came much later. As the writings composing the NT came into existence only by degrees, in the course of about half a century, to meet the practical needs of the Church, so the collecting of these writings and their setting apart for public use was accomplished only gradually, as the leading representatives of the Church in different parts of the world came to realize the insufficiency and uncertainty of local tradition, and the need for securing the orthodox faith against invasion and corruption. It is not, indeed, till near the close of the 2nd cent. that we find a generally accepted collection of sacred books substantially identical with our NT and equally sacred with the OT. From the nature of its contents, as well as from the language of Patristic writers on the subject, it is evident that the general principle on which the Church proceeded in forming the NT was to admit to it only the writings of apostles, and of those who had written under the influence and direction of apostles. This naturally arose from the fact that the new life of the Church was centred in the person of Jesus Christ, and that the faith of its members depended on the testimony of those who had been brought into close personal contact with Him, or had received a special commission to preach the gospel. But the principle was not always easy of application, and it sometimes led to different conclusions in different parts of the Church, according to the views held as to the authorship of disputed books; while the association of canonical and uncanonical books in the LXX, to which the Fathers were accustomed, tended to make them less rigorous in their judgments than they might have otherwise been. Outside of our NT there were three books which were held in special reverence, being sometimes read in church and occasionally included in great Scripture MSS, viz. the Epistle of Clement, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas; the authors of these books being supposed by many to be identical with the persons of the same names mentioned in the NT in connexion with the Apostle Paul (Ph 4^3, Ac 12^{25}, Ro 16^{14}). On the other hand, as regards the disputed books contained in our NT (chiefly minor Epistles, with the Ep. to the Heb. and the Book of Rev), it was because their apostolic authorship was more or less distrusted in certain quarters of the Church, owing to the obscurity of their early history or to some dissatisfaction with their contents, that the right of these books to a place in the Canon was more or less called in question, until at length the public opinion of the Church found expression at the 3rd Council of Carthage in A.D. 397, when the very same books as are contained in our NT were acknowledged to be canonical, and declared to be the only books that should be read in church.

This decree (which seems to have reflected the general mind of the Church, and which has been practically acquiesced in ever since,* notwithstanding occasional controversies regarding individual books, and amid conflicting theories as to the authority of Scripture) had the effect of excluding from the Canon not only the three writings already referred to, and one or two other productions of the post-apostolic age which were highly esteemed in the Church although they made no claim to apostolic authority, but also another and less worthy class of writings, dating from the 2nd to the end of the 4th cent., which played an important part in the life of the Church, and throw a valuable light on the history of the NT. These are what are known as Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypses, apparently numerous, but of which only a small part have come down to us, a few in their entirety, some in a fragmentary form, and others only in name. They varied greatly in their form and contents, but, apart from the early compositions referred to in St. Luke's Gospel ($1^{1.2}$), which soon disappeared (unless our Second Gospel was one of them) in the survival of the fittest, they were either supplementary to the Canonical Scriptures, furnishing information or doctrine on subjects but little dealt with in the NT, or, more frequently, they were composed for the purpose of bolstering up heretical opinions or practices which were seen to have little or no canonical support. Many of the 'Gospels' were mainly derived from those in the NT (the recently recovered 'Gospel of Peter' borrows from all the four), with more or less modification of the original in the interest of some Gnostic or other heresy. The modification was liable to alteration from time to time (as may be seen from the wide variations in the different MSS of the same work) to meet the exigencies of successive teachers, who issued their several recensions under great names—generally those of apostles—after the manner of the pseudonymous Jewish writers already referred to. Very often the same work was known under a variety of names. For example, the 'Gospel of the Hebrews,' which may have been a Judaic recension of the Heb. original of our St. Matthew, has been identified with the 'Gospel of the Nazarenes' and the still more heretical 'Gospel of the Ebionites,' as well as with the Gospels of Bartholomew, Cerinthus, and the Twelve Apostles. In this 'Gosp. of the Hebrews' and some other primitive documents, such as the 'Gosp. of Peter' (c. A.D. 125, or, acc. to some, 165) and the 'Gosp. of the Egyptians' (also dating from the 2nd cent.), it may well be that a certain amount of oral tradition was incorporated, which had been preserved by the Jews who resided near the scene of the evangelic history. It in no degree weakens the authority of the NT to find a few grains of such extra-canonical matter appearing in the works of an early Patristic writer, such as Justin Martyr, or even to find an apocr. Gospel quoted by a writer of an eclective turn, like Clement of Alexandria. So far from impairing the credit of the NT writings, these apocr. productions of a later age bear witness to the authority which the written word had already acquired in the Church, and show the necessity under which heretical teachers lay either to manipulate the text of the received books or to adduce other and equally high testimony in favour of their peculiar views. In general, the literature in question is manifestly counterfeit. Much of it is of a character degrading to Christianity, the extravagance and absurdity of its miracles, especially in its pictures of the Saviour's childhood, presenting a sad contrast to the chaste dignity of the canonical records; and there is none of it which, either in respect of outward attestation or intrinsic excellence, can be held to have been unjustly dealt with in being denied admission to the NT. The writings of the Church Fathers show how little influence it exerted in the early Church compared with the NT writings, which formed the general standard of faith and practice, and sometimes even contributed the only element that redeemed Patristic literature from inanity and unprofitableness. The lapse of time, while it exalted the NT Scriptures to honour, brought the apocr. literature into general disrepute.* Within a century or two after it had reached the height of its popularity (4th cent.), it lost its place in public esteem and gradually passed out of the notice of the Church, leaving its traces indeed on the productions of Christian art, and influencing by its legends the festivals and preaching of the Church, but deemed of no account by thinkers and theologians, until the rise of modern criticism invested it with a new and scientific interest, when a fresh sense of its immeasurable inferiority to the Canonical Scriptures has impressed itself upon the mind of the Church.

The following are notable features in the history of the NT, from a literary point of view as well as in the interests of criticism. (1) The age and number of its MSS. Some of these date from the 4th or 5th cent.,† and the whole number of them exceeds 2000, forming an immense array of witnesses, compared with the few MSS of classical works, which can frequently be counted on the fingers, and in some cases do not reach back to within a thousand years of the age in which the work was produced. (2) The number of its VSS. It has been translated into almost all languages, beginning with the Old Lat. and Syr. VSS, which may have originated in the first half of the 2nd cent., followed a little later by the Egyptian (in three different forms)—the Gothic in the 4th cent., the Ethiopic in the 4th or 5th cent., and the Armenian in the middle of the 5th century. (3) The extent to which it has been reproduced in subsequent writings. It is quoted, echoed, or commented on by the great majority of early Christian writers. The sympathy of the Apostolic Fathers with its contents has been already mentioned. The extant writings of the next half century are mainly defences of Christianity addressed to unbelievers, admitting of

* The Vulgate had a good deal to do with this result in the West, just as earlier translations affected the form and extent of the Canon in their several spheres of influence.

* We have an early example of this in what Eusebius tells us (HE vi. 12) of the obscurity into which the once popular 'Gospel of Peter' (used apparently by Justin as one of his 'Memoirs') had fallen in the time of Serapion, bishop of Antioch (c. A.D. 200).

† The Oxyrhynchus fragment containing Mt 1^{1-9}. 12^{14-20} may date from the end of the 3rd cent. (see Grenfell and Hunt).

fewer quotations from the Scriptures than if they had been intended for members of the Church. But, speaking generally, it may be said that the language, and still more the substance, of the NT is woven into the earliest Christian writings that have come down to us, while the quotations by a single writer in the end of the 2nd and in the 3rd, 4th, and 5th cent. are sometimes so extensive as to amount to a considerable part of the whole NT—more than half of it, for example, being imbedded in the works of Origen.

These circumstances, while they give the NT a unique place in literature and afford valuable means for proving the antiquity and integrity of its contents, are attended with the disadvantage of causing uncertainty in innumerable passages as to the precise terms of the original. A careful examination of the existing authorities has led to the discovery of about 200,000 'Various Readings,' which are chiefly to be accounted for by the greater liability to error in copying with the hand than in the use of the printing-press. The difference between the various readings, however, is seldom of such a nature as to affect in the slightest degree the substance of the NT. If all the expressions whose accuracy is in question were brought together and printed in a consecutive form, they would not exceed the length of St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, while the disputed verses possessed of any doctrinal significance would not be equal collectively to the shortest Epistle of St. John.

In this connexion it may be well to point out that there is nothing to justify the assumption that we possess all the apostolic writings that were ever in the possession of the primitive Church. So far from this, there are expressions in some of St. Paul's Epistles which suggest that he wrote other letters besides those which have come down to us (1 Co 5^9, 2 Th 3^{17}, cf. 2 Co 11^{28}). We can understand how an apostle's letters might be less prized during his lifetime than after his death, when the loss of any of his writings would be seen to be irreparable; and it is no more astonishing that Providence should have suffered such writings to perish, than that so many of our Lord's spoken words, and those of His apostles, should have been allowed to pass away, or that so many of His great deeds should have been allowed to go unrecorded (Jn 21^{25}).

iii. CONTENTS OF THE NT (Its individual Books and their Writers).—The NT consists of 27 different books, by 9 different authors, each book having its special characteristics corresponding to the personality of its writer, and the circumstances in which it was written, but all contributing their part to one divine whole centred in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. As early as the 2nd cent. there was a recognized distinction between 'the Gospel' and 'the Apostle,' just as we find a threefold division of the OT in Lk 24^{44} and elsewhere. The former denoted the four Gospels; the latter, the Epistles of St. Paul, to which were added by degrees the Book of Acts, the Catholic Epistles, and the Apocalypse, under the general name of 'the Apostles.' All these were seldom comprised in one MS, and their arrangement varies in MSS containing more than one section and in canonical lists given by Church Fathers, as is also the case with the arrangement of the several books in each section, showing that the consolidation of the NT was a process still going on.

1. The Gospels.—In all cases the Gospels come first. This position has been fitly assigned to them, not only because they were perhaps the first NT Scriptures to be regularly associated with the OT in the public reading of the Church, but also because the history which they record forms the corner-stone of the Christian religion, which bases its doctrines not on speculation but on fact. Drawn up without concert and without the formal sanction of the Church, they contain, in a form suitable for all ages and for all classes, several independent records of Christ's life and teaching, of which it may be said with truth that they are better authenticated and more nearly contemporaneous with the events narrated than any other record we possess in connexion with any other period of ancient history. A comparison of the four Gospels, however, reveals a marked difference between the fourth and the first three. The latter give in one common view the same general outline of the ministry of Christ, but this outline is almost entirely confined to His ministry in Galilee, and includes only one visit to Jerusalem; whereas the Fourth Gospel gives an account of no fewer than five visits to Jerusalem, and lays the scene of the ministry chiefly in Judæa. A still more important distinction between them has been briefly expressed by designating the Synoptic Gospels as the bodily Gospels, and the Fourth as the spiritual Gospel—by which it is meant that the former relate chiefly the outward events connected with the Saviour's visible presence, reported for the most part without note or comment, while the latter is designed to represent the ideal and heavenly side of His personality and work. Akin to this distinction is the fact that the first three report Christ's addresses to the multitude, consisting largely of parables, while the Fourth contains discourses of a more sublime character, frequently expressed in the language of allegory and addressed to the inner circle of His followers. Furthermore, when we enter into a close examination of the Synoptic Gospels and compare them with one another, we find an amount of similarity in detail, extending even to minute expressions and the connexion of individual incidents, combined with a diversity of diction, arrangement, and contents, which it has hitherto baffled the ingenuity of critics fully to explain. While further investigation may shed more light on the historical and literary relations of the Gospels, there is a deep underlying unity amid their diversity which may be best discerned, not by attempting to piece them together so as to form a complete chronological history, but by studying each from its own point of view, and learning from it what it has to teach concerning the many-sided character and life of Jesus Christ. Speaking generally, we may say that, while the First Gospel sets forth Christ's life and teaching with reference to the past, as the fulfilment of the OT, the Gospel of St. Mark exhibits that life in the present, as a manifestation of the activity and power so congenial to the Roman mind; St. Luke, as a Greek, depicts it in its catholic and comprehensive character, as destined in the future to embrace within its saving influence all the kindreds of the Gentiles; while the Fourth Gospel represents it in its absolute perfection, as it is related to the Father in eternity.

With regard to the authorship of the Gospels, it is a remarkable fact that two of them do not bear the names of apostles but of companions of apostles (Mark and Luke), and that, of the other two, only one bears the name of an apostle of eminence (John)—which is so far a confirmation of their genuineness. With regard to the First Gospel, there is no reason to doubt the tradition of the ancient Church, beginning with Papias in the first half of the 2nd cent., which assigns it in its original form to St. Matthew. But whether it was originally written in Heb., as stated by Papias, and how far it has been altered by recension, are questions which have not yet been determined. See MATTHEW (GOSPEL OF). With equal unanimity the testimony of the Fathers, beginning with Papias, ascribe the Second Gospel to St. Mark, who is said to have embodied in it the preaching of St. Peter. This view is strongly confirmed by the tone and character of the book, which is generally regarded as containing, in a more or less modified form, the earliest cycle of apostolic teaching. See art. MARK. With regard to the authorship of the Third Gospel, there is substantial unanimity. Tradition has always ascribed it to St. Luke, the friend and companion of the Apostle Paul, at the same time assigning to the latter a part in its production somewhat similar to that which St. Peter is believed to have borne in relation to the Gospel of Mark—a view supported to a certain extent by the character of the Gospel itself, which forms an excellent historic groundwork for the doctrine of salvation by grace that was characteristic of St. Paul's preaching. See art. LUKE. Until the close of the 18th cent. the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel was never seriously challenged. In some respects it has stronger external testimony in its favour than any of the others; and the whole tone of the book gives the impression that it was written by one who was familiar with the inner life of Christ and His apostles, as well as with the topography of Jerusalem and the ideas and customs prevalent among the Jews before the destruction of their capital. Moreover, the spiritual elevation of the book is vastly superior to anything we find in the sub-apostolic age, and the Johannine authorship is attended with fewer difficulties than any other that has been suggested. If it was written in Ephesus about A.D. 85 (which is in accordance with the earliest tradition), an interval of more than half a century had elapsed since the death of Christ, during which Christianity had spread into many lands and furnished subjects for reflexion to many minds. In these circumstances it was inevitable that the truths of the Gospel should be viewed in new lights and assume more speculative forms; and in Ephesus, as the great meeting-place of Oriental mysticism and Greek philosophy, the deeper questions and more theological aspects of the new religion would naturally claim a large measure of attention. See, further, art. JOHN (GOSPEL OF).

2. The Book of Acts.—This invaluable document, which is our chief authority on the history of the Church for nearly a generation after Christ's death, is evidently from the same pen as the Gospel of Luke, to which it is intended to be a sequel. The writer conceives of Christ as still carrying on His work in virtue of His resurrection and ascension, and seeks to trace the gradual expansion of the Church from its first beginning, as a seeming phase of Judaism, to its full development as a Catholic communion, free alike to Jew and Gentile. Although the author does not speak in his own name till he reaches the point in his narrative at which he joined St. Paul's company at Troas, and was evidently dependent in the earlier part of his work on a variety of sources, oral and written, yet the book has a natural unity of diction and style, which forbids us to assign it to more than one author; and its several parts are so interlaced by corresponding observations and allusions as to lead to the same conclusion. Recent investigations have enhanced the reputation which the work had previously enjoyed for historical worth and accuracy; and the belief is becoming general that it must have been written by a historian of the first rank. Regarding its date of composition, no conclusion has been reached beyond what may be inferred from the fact that it was written by a contemporary and companion of the Apostle Paul, at some time subsequent to his first imprisonment at Rome (A.D. 63). See art. ACTS.

3. The Pauline Epistles and the Ep. to the Hebrews.—One of the characteristics of the NT, as compared with all other sacred books, is the epistolary character of a large part of its contents.* Although most of the Epistles were written at an earlier period than the Gospels in their present form, they represent in general a more advanced stage of Christian theology. They give us the fruits of from twenty to fifty years' reflexion on the cardinal facts and truths contained in the Synoptic Gospels, and are the chief source of Christian doctrine on such subjects as the Trinity, the relation of Christ to the human race and to the Church, the Atonement, Justification by faith, and Sanctification by the Holy Spirit. They contain more explicit claims, in varying modes and forms, to divine inspiration and authority, than the Gospels or the Bk. of Acts; but, while largely doctrinal in character, most of them were written for the purpose of dealing with questions of a practical nature, and are enlivened with many personal allusions.

What has just been said is especially true of the Epistles of St. Paul. While bearing evidence in many passages of being written more or less under the conscious influence of the Holy Spirit, they had their rise in the special needs and circumstances of the various Churches to which they were addressed. They are thirteen in number, and may be divided into four groups, extending over the last fifteen years or more of the apostle's life, and exhibiting, amid many similarities and correlations, a well-marked development of thought: viz. (a) 1 and 2 Th, which were written about A.D. 53 [Turner, 50–52], at least sixteen years after the apostle's conversion, and turn largely on questions relating to Christ's Second Coming. (b) 1 and 2 Co, Gal, and Ro, which were written during his third missionary journey (A.D. 57–58 [Turner, 55–56 for 1 and 2 Co and Ro, date of Gal he leaves undecided]), and were mainly designed to vindicate his apostolic authority and preserve the gospel from the inroads of Judaism. (c) The Epistles of the Imprisonment, viz., Ph, Col, Philem, and Eph (the last named being in all probability a circular-letter, identical with 'the epistle from Laodicea' referred to in Col 4^{16}), which were written from Rome about A.D. 62–63 [Turner, 59–61], and range from the humblest personal details to the loftiest speculations regarding the being and destiny of the Church. (d) The Pastoral Epistles to Timothy and Titus, which are distinguished from all the others by their want of historical agreement with any period in St. Paul's life as recorded in the Bk. of Acts, and also by their strongly-marked individuality alike in style and substance. These circumstances have given rise to serious doubt of their genuineness, which is largely obviated, however, by supposing them to have been written after the imprisonment recorded in the closing chapter of the Acts, and in the last year of the apostle's life—say A.D. 67–68. It is worthy of note that the Epistles in the second group are almost universally admitted to be genuine, which is a most important admission from an evidential point of view, as they contain many allusions to detailed matters of fact mentioned in the Gospels, and prove that the story of Christ's death and resurrection as told in the four Gospels was the chief theme of St. Paul's preaching. The evidence is all the more valuable because it is indirect, the letters having manifestly been written without any such object in view, and being addressed to several independent communities far removed from one another. Having regard to the tone of sincerity, tempered with sobriety of judgment, which characterizes these Epistles, as well as to the early association of the writer with the Jewish authorities at Jerusalem, and the opportunities he had for ascertaining the real facts of the evangelic history, we are led inevitably to the conclusion that St. Paul's Gospel had the same historic groundwork of essential and well-attested facts regarding Christ's life and teaching as we find recorded in the four Gospels. See separate arts. on these various Epistles.

* It contains twenty-one letters by six different authors. Nine of these are addressed to individual Churches, viz. 1 and 2 Th, 1 and 2 Co, Gal, Ro, Ph, Col, 2 Jn; five to individual persons, viz. Philem, 1 and 2 Ti, Tit, 3 Jn; two to Heb. Christians, viz He and Ja; the remaining five being of a more or less general nature, viz. Eph, 1 and 2 P, 1 Jn, and Jude. ‖

As regards the Ep. to the Hebrews, which has always been closely associated with the Pauline Epistles, there is evidence that from the latter half of the 2nd cent. it was assigned by the Eastern Church to the Apostle Paul, although some of the most competent judges were constrained by internal evidence to depart somewhat from the traditional view, their idea being that St. Paul might have written the original, and one of his disciples have translated it into Greek, or that the apostle might have supplied the thoughts, and one of his disciples have put them into words. In the Western Church, on the other hand, opinion was for a long time adverse to the Pauline authorship; and it was not till the close of the 4th cent. that the Ep. was acknowledged to be a writing of St. Paul's. This view has now been generally abandoned, as the result of a closer study of the style and structure of the book; and for the same reason, the idea that it may be a translation of a work by the apostle is also admitted to be untenable. At the same time there seems no reason to doubt that it was written by one of St. Paul's school. Luke, Clement, Apollos, Barnabas, have all been suggested, the latter two being those in whose favour most can be said. As to the destination of the Ep., various allusions show that it was not intended for Heb. Christians in general, but for some definite community. Alexandria, Antioch, Ephesus, Rome, have each had their advocates; but the position of Christians in Jerusalem or in some other part of Palestine seems to answer best to the situation which the writer has in view. Respecting the date of composition, the mention of Timothy's liberation (He 13^{23}), which took place presumably at Rome, whither he had been summoned by St. Paul in his last imprisonment, points to a time shortly anterior to the destruction of Jerusalem—an inference which is confirmed by other expressions in the Ep., referring to the decadence of the Jewish Dispensation. The great theme of the Ep. is the superiority of Christianity to Judaism, which it attempts to prove, not so much by minimizing the old covenant (as St. Paul had been obliged to do in vindicating the freedom of his Gentile converts) as by magnifying the new as a fulfilment of the old. See, further, HEBREWS (EPISTLE TO).

4. The Catholic Epistles.—There are 7 Epistles which from the 4th cent. have gone under this name, viz. Ja, 1 and 2 P, 1 2 3 Jn, and Jude. They were so called in contradistinction to St. Paul's Epistles, which, with the exception of the Pastoral Epp. and Philem, are addressed to individual Churches, also 7 in number.* In most of the Greek MSS the Cath. Epp. stand next to Acts, although they were much later than the Pauline Epp. in obtaining general recognition in the Church.

(a) The General Ep. of James.—This is now generally admitted to be a genuine work of 'James, the Lord's brother' (Gal 1^{19}), who for many years presided over the Church at Jerusalem. The internal evidence is strongly in its favour, and the rarity of allusions to it in the early Christian writers may be accounted for by its circulation being confined to Jewish Christians, as well as by the narrow sphere of labour in which the writer himself moved, his whole life apparently having been spent in Jerusalem. It is addressed 'To the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion,' and there is no reason to take the words in any other than a literal sense. The tone of the Ep. is eminently practical, the object of the writer being to inculcate Christian morality as essential to salvation. Hence it partakes largely of the ethical character of the Sermon on the Mount, which it resembles not only in its general tone and sentiment, but in many of its expressions. The marked absence of anything like developed Christian doctrine, as well as the expectation which it exhibits of Christ's speedy coming to judge the world (5^{8}), and the application of the term 'synagogue' (2^{2}) to an assembly of Christian worshippers, seem to require an early date for the Ep.; and as there is no sign of acquaintance with the sharp controversy regarding the obligations of the Jewish law, which came to a head in the Council of Jerusalem (A.D. 50), there seems good reason to regard this as the oldest book in the NT, dating between A.D. 44 and 49. See, further, JAMES (EPISTLE OF).

(b) The 1st Ep. of Peter.—There is no reason to doubt that this Ep. was written by the apostle whose name it bears. Hardly any book of the NT is better supported by external evidence, while internally it bears in many of its features the stamp of St. Peter's mind and the traces of his experience, as these are represented to us in the Gospels and the Bk. of Acts. It is addressed 'To the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia'; but there is a difference of opinion whether these words are to be taken in a literal sense, as denoting Jewish Christians merely, or as embracing 'the Israel of God' in the widest sense. As it appears, however, from a number of passages that the readers of the Ep. were largely Gentiles, the latter supposition seems to accord best with the facts. Similarly, 'Babylon' (5^{13}) should probably be understood in a figurative sense as meaning Rome, the writer's point of view being in full harmony with this supposition. There is also some controversy as to the date of the Epistle. Some would assign it to the period of the Flavian dynasty, but the probability seems to be that it was written shortly after the outbreak of the Neronian persecution, when the Christians in the provinces were beginning to experience the effects of the imperial example at Rome, about 64–65. The very name of Christian was becoming a term of reproach (4^{16}), and the chief object of the writer is to inculcate patience under trial and perseverance in well-doing in a spirit of hope.

(c) The 2nd Ep. of Peter.—The genuineness of this Ep. has been more questioned than that of any other book in the NT. The external evidence for it is comparatively meagre; but the chief objection to it both in ancient and in modern times has arisen from its differing so greatly in tone and substance from the 1st Epistle. This objection is so far obviated by the fact that while the 1st was designed to encourage and support Christians under persecution, this was evidently intended to warn against false teachers, who were spreading corruption in the Church. Moreover, amid the general difference of style, a close examination of the language and thought in this Epistle brings out many points of resemblance between it and St. Peter's expressions elsewhere; and in several respects it does not tally with the supposition of forgery. The mention of St. Paul's Epp., however (3[15-16]), as if they were already known to the Asiatic Churches, and in the same category as 'the other Scriptures' (τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς), as well as the marked resemblance of this Ep., in style, to the recently discovered 'Apocalypse of Peter,' seem to imply a post-apostolic date; and there is much to favour the view of Prof. W. M. Ramsay, who regards the Ep. as the work of 'a disciple who was full of the spirit and words of his teacher, and who believed so thoroughly that he was giving the words of his teacher that he attributed it to that teacher.' See, further, PETER (EPISTLES OF).

* The symbolism of numbers has an interesting bearing on the proportions of the NT, not only in the use of 7 in the cases above mentioned (cf. Rev 1^{4}) and in the case of the Pauline Epp., which (including He)=7×2, but also in the number of the Gospels, to which Irenæus and others, under the influence of a revived Neo-Pythagoreanism, ascribed a mystic virtue.

(d) The Ep. of Jude.—This Epistle is in the name of 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' The James whom the writer here claims as his brother was the well-known head of the Church at Jerusalem, one of our Lord's brethren, and the writer of the Ep. that bears his name; and therefore Jude is not to be identified with any of the apostles of the same name mentioned in the Gospels. There is such a striking resemblance between this Ep. (consisting of a single chapter) and the 2nd chapter of 2 P as to justify the belief that the one was borrowed from the other. But as this Ep. has some features of originality about it which the other lacks, we may infer that Peter and not Jude was the borrower—a supposition confirmed by the way in which certain quotations in Jude from non-canonical Jewish Scriptures almost disappear from 2 P, along with one or two references to Levitical uncleanness, as if the writer desired as far as possible to adapt his writing for general use. This Ep. is full of sharp and stern denunciation aimed at practical evils of a most heinous character, founded on a gross abuse of Christian liberty. It probably emanated from Palestine in the period immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. See, further, art. JUDE (EPISTLE OF).

(e) The 1st Ep. of John.—There is abundance of evidence, both external and internal, to prove that this Ep. was written by the author of the Fourth Gospel, and forms a sequel to it. The readers are not specified, but in all probability it was addressed in the first instance to the Churches of Asia, among whom St. John spent the latter part of his life. The writer speaks in a quiet tone of authority, as if he were well known to his readers and were well acquainted with their dangers and their needs. He insists on the translation into the Christian life of those great truths regarding the fellowship of God with man, which, in the Fourth Gospel, are exhibited in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ.

(f) The 2nd Ep. of John.—This Ep. has all the appearance of being genuine. It bears a strong resemblance to the 1st, no fewer than 7 of its 13 verses having something parallel in the other. It is addressed 'Unto the elect lady and her children,' by whom we are probably to understand a Church and its members; and the object of the Ep. is to warn them against the insidious and corrupting influence of certain heretical teachers who were going about denying the reality of Christ's humanity. The title of 'the elder,' which the writer assumes, implies that he was a well-known personage in the Church, and is one that could be fitly claimed by St. John as the last of the apostles.

(g) The 3rd Ep. of John.—This Ep., like the 2nd, is written in the name of 'the elder,' and it has so many expressions in common with the other that they have been fitly termed 'twins.' It gives us a momentary glimpse of Church life in Asia towards the close of the 1st cent., and illustrates the practical difficulties which had to be encountered in the government of the Church. It is addressed 'Unto Gaius the beloved,' a faithful and liberal member of the Church, whose influence and example the writer invokes, in opposition to the intolerant and factious conduct of an ambitious ecclesiastic named Diotrephes, who had gone so far as to close his doors on 'the brethren' who had come in the name of 'the elder,' apparently bearing a letter from him—perhaps our 2nd Epistle. See, further, JOHN (EPISTLES OF).

5. The Revelation of St. John.—The Apocalypse has experienced greater vicissitudes as regards its acceptance in the Church than any other book of the NT, owing partly to the Chiliastic views associated with it, and partly to the marked difference in its language and style as compared with the other works ascribed to St. John. It bears to be written by 'John to the seven Churches which are in Asia'; and it is a significant fact that its apostolic authorship was accepted by Justin Martyr (not to mention some earlier apparent witnesses) in the dialogue which he held with Trypho at Ephesus within half a century after St. John's death. Its wide divergence from the Fourth Gospel, both in ideas and in language, may be accounted for in some measure by the difference in the nature and contents of the two books, the one being mainly narrative or colloquial, the other formed on the model of Jewish apocalypse; and there are not wanting some important features of resemblance between them, betokening an identity of authorship. With regard to the date of this book, there is a growing conviction that the theory which connects it with the persecution in the reign of Nero, and puts its composition before the destruction of Jerusalem, must be abandoned, and that the 'tribulation' referred to (1[9]) was that which befell Christians in the provinces, especially in Asia Minor, at a later date, when they refused to pay divine honour to the emperor. The main theme of the book is the second coming of Christ, pictorially set forth as the glorious consummation of great struggles and marvellous events. Its unity has recently been assailed, but the attempts to disintegrate it have not met with general acceptance. See, further, art. REVELATION (BOOK OF).

INTRODUCTION.—The subject of this article is the formation of the NT, the gathering, into one, of the collection of books which we so name, to be the sacred books of the New Dispensation. These writings form the Canon of the NT (for the term Canon, its idea and history, see art. CANON). It is with the process which resulted in the recognition of a Canon that we are here concerned. The investigation and right conception of this history have proved, and are still, a very hard and complicated task. The evidence is to be gathered from early Christian literature; but the age and authenticity of many of its documents, especially for the two or three generations succeeding the apostles, which form the most important period of all, have been hotly contested; and, even apart from this, the evidence supplied by them is, from special causes (as we shall see), difficult to interpret. Nevertheless, some real progress has been made in the illumination of the subject. A common judgment has been attained, or there is an approximation to one, in regard to some of the most important of the documents concerned and as to the bearing of some portions of the evidence, on the part of many students whose doctrinal points of view are very diverse; and the important questions still at issue have been narrowed and cleared. It would hardly be possible now to maintain views of the formation of the Canon such as those of men so learned as Lardner (supplement to pt. ii. bk. i. of the Credibility, ch. iii. 2nd ed. p. 49) and Mosheim (Eccl. Hist. bk. i. pt. ii. ch. ii. § 16. i. p. 64 in Eng. tr. of 1863) in former times. It was a more gradual process than they imagined, and it had more than one stage. The student of the history of the Canon must endeavour to mark the stages and the epochs at which they were reached, to determine the greater or less rapidity of the movement towards the establishment of the Canon, to ascertain the causes which promoted or retarded it, and the considerations which were influential in bringing about the acceptance or rejection of different writings.

A certain development of thought and feeling in respect to the books of NT must be acknowledged. But to say this is by no means inconsistent with belief in their authenticity as genuine products of the apostolic age. It required time, and the experience of needs which were not fully felt at once, for the Christian Church to perceive clearly what a treasure she possessed in these writings. And the most important question which has to be decided in regard to the history of the Canon is, Whether the development which can be traced was one which involved a misrepresentation of facts, or only an awakening to the real significance of facts which had long been known.

In judging of the evidence, it will be right to remember the conditions implied in the very supposition of such a growth as has just been indicated. Convictions which are more or less latent, which have not been formulated, exercise far less authority than those which have been definitely put forth and for some time accepted without question. So long as the belief of Christians in regard to the new Scriptures was of the former kind the signs of its existence might be somewhat obscure, and there might be more or less serious departures from it here and there, in spite of its being in reality widely diffused and well founded.

The special circumstances must also be borne in mind, which were of a nature to retard for a time the formation of a Canon of NT, and also to make the recognition accorded to the apostolic writings appear to us less decided than it was in reality. (a) The fact that Christians already had a Bible—the OT—must first be noticed. In time, no doubt, this may have facilitated the reception of another body of Scriptures. For the idea of a Bible, a collection of inspired, authoritative writings, had been rendered familiar, and it was necessary only that it should be applied to the books which enshrined the New Revelation. But this could not be at once accomplished. Great as the veneration for the apostles was, there could not be the same feeling for new writings as for those which had long been hallowed. Moreover, in form the apostolic writings were different in many respects from those of the OT, and, in particular, they did not bear so plainly upon their very face a claim to inspiration as its prophetic and legislative books did. Besides all this, the OT itself largely supplied the place of Christian Scriptures in apostolic and sub-apostolic times. To an extent which we find hard to understand, it was used as a source of Christian instruction. The divine truths newly imparted and the actual facts of the life of Christ and founding of His kingdom were read between the lines of the ancient Scriptures (Lk $24^{27.\ 44.\ 45}$, Ac 8^{35}. 18^{28}, 2 Ti 3^{15}, and last fragment of Melito, ap. Eus. HE iv. 26). The need was thus partially met which the apostolic writings could alone adequately satisfy. (b) Again, the gospel message and the new law had first been delivered by word of mouth, and there is good reason to believe that even the memory of the oral teaching of the apostles was for a time, in some measure, a rival of their own written testimony in the regard and affections of Christians.

A just and vivid sense of these peculiar conditions, and some others which will come before us in the course of our survey, is necessary, if we are to understand the phenomena aright, and to refrain from giving undue weight to objections which are founded on paucity of evidence. Proof, however, of a positive kind that, from the confines of the lifetime of the apostles, the writings of NT were known among Christians, can be found only in a full estimate of the facts as a whole, supplied by the documents not only of the one or two earliest but of subsequent generations. When the alleged indications of the use of NT writings at the former time are taken by themselves, they may be far from convincing; they may show little more than that it is a tenable assumption, that our Christian Scriptures, or the chief of them, were already in circulation. But when we advance a few years, we find them clearly occupying a position which they could not have attained at a bound, and which no other writings shared with them. And we are justified in inferring that the earlier signs referred to are—not only possibly but—really traces of acquaintance with them. In this way we reach a highly probable conclusion, even when the facts directly connected with the reception of these writings are alone taken into account. It will be strongly confirmed if the belief (the grounds of which can barely be touched upon in this article) is well founded, that there was substantial continuity of life and organization in the Christian Church from the beginning till its history emerges into full light in the latter part of the 2nd cent., such as would afford a guarantee for the faithful preservation of traditions on important matters.

The history of the Canon of NT may be divided into the following periods:—A, the first, which is by far the most important, extends from the end of the apostolic age to the early years of the 3rd cent. (for convenience we may say to A.D. 220, which was about the time of the deaths of Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Hippolytus). At this latter epoch we see the greater part of the books of NT occupying the position in the Church which they have ever since held. B, the second, extends, roughly speaking, to the pacification of the empire under Constantine (A.D. 323). It was a time of comparison between the lists of NT Scriptures accepted in different Churches, and discussion of the claims of those not universally received; but there was much uncertainty still in regard to certain books. C. From A.D. 323 onwards, the final settlement, though it was attained at various times in different parts of the Church.

A. FROM THE END OF THE APOSTOLIC AGE TO THE EARLY YEARS OF THE THIRD CENTURY.—In reviewing this period, it will be convenient to subdivide. Further, under each subdivision the evidence as to the use of the Gospels and as to that of other writings of the NT should be separately examined. There is more than one reason for proceeding thus. It is probable that, even before a comprehensive collection of the sacred writings of the new dispensation was thought of, its formation was being advanced through the independent formation of groups of writings which afterwards became important constituent elements of the whole body, as well as by the recognition of the authority of individual writings which might or might not belong to these groups. Two of these minor collections, the making of which must readily have suggested itself, would seem to have been that of the Four Gospels and that of the Epistles of St. Paul. The rolls on which the writings of these two classes were written were commonly kept, we may imagine, each in its own roll-case.

The evidence as to the reception of the Gospels is affected by special circumstances. Owing to the nature of their subject-matter—the occurrence of the same sayings and incidents in different Gospels, the possibility that some of these may have been found also in other documents or orally reported—it may not be open to us to infer with certainty the use of any particular Gospel from parallelisms of statement and of language between them and early Christian writers. On the other hand, when a striking, unusual sentence or phrase found in one of the other writings of NT appears in a work of post-apostolic times, even though it may not be introduced as a quotation, there can generally be little doubt that there is a literary relationship between the two, and that it was not the NT writer who was the borrower.

But this is not all. The facts of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and His words made up the substance of the Gospel. Owing to the sublimity of the subject, men's eyes were turned at first solely to it, and away from the witnesses and the form of the records. The substance was felt to be everything. For some time little sense is shown of the importance of reproducing accurately the individual testimony of different writers. There was also a very natural disposition to combine various accounts with a view to greater fulness or succinctness. Not a few probable illustrations of this tendency might be given, and a very elaborate effort of the kind was made soon after the middle of the 2nd century.

The manner in which τὸ εὐαγγέλιον is used (sing. and with def. art.) is another illustration of the same or similar habits of thought. It occurs where the existence of the evangelic history in a written form is implied; and some have inferred that those who so expressed themselves knew only of one such document. But there seems to be no ground for this. The mode of speech in question shows only that the characteristics of the several written embodiments of the Gospel were but slightly regarded in comparison with its general contents and purport. Writers who unquestionably were acquainted with several works of the nature of Gospels continued so to express themselves. And there is a survival of it to this day in the titles of our Gospels—τὸ εὐαγγέλιον κατά, the Gospel according to, this or that evangelist.

i. THE SUB-APOSTOLIC AGE, i.e. the generation immediately following that of the apostles. As belonging to this time, we will take only the Ep. of Clement to the Corinthians, the Seven Epp. of Ignatius, in the short Greek or Vossian form, and the Ep. of Polycarp. Some critics of the highest repute would, besides, assign to it the recently recovered Didaché and the Ep. of Barnabas, and a few more would also include the Shepherd of Hermas. But in an inquiry of this kind it is better to understate than to overstate evidence. Moreover, the present writer is personally inclined to place the composition of these last three writings in the second quarter of the 2nd cent. And it will be very generally admitted now that the case for placing them earlier than this is far less strong than that for the others, and that they do not, by their authorship, create the same kind of link with the apostolic age. Those writings before mentioned may, indeed, with great confidence be declared to be the genuine works of the men with whose names they are connected. Two of the writers at least, and probably all three, had known apostles, and held positions of eminence in the Church at the close of the first and near the beginning of the 2nd cent. There are very strong reasons for believing that the Ep. written to the Church of Corinth in the name of that of Rome, which has from very early times been attributed to Clement, is really his work, and for referring it to the close of the reign of Domitian, c. A.D. 95 (see Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. i. p. 346 ff., and Harnack, Chronol. i. p. 251 ff.). Again, the genuineness of the Seven Epp. of Ignatius discovered by Voss in the Medicean MS has been firmly established by the labours of Zahn and Lightfoot. This is fully admitted by Harnack (Chronol. i. p. 281 ff.). Their exact date cannot be quite so clearly determined. Lightfoot supposes it to be c. A.D. 110. Harnack was a few years ago inclined to place them near to A.D. 140 (see Expos. for 1886, pp. 15–22); but he now speaks in a very hesitating manner (Chronol. i. p. 395 f.). The only reason for questioning the genuineness of the Ep. of Polycarp falls to the ground when that of Epp. of Ignatius is admitted, and its date is fixed by a reference in it as only later by a few weeks than theirs.

(1) Evidence as to the use of the Gospels.—Sayings of Christ are cited in the writings now before us, as spoken by Him, but not as from a written source or sources. From the first days of the Church the Lord's Words must have been treasured as Divine Oracles. And as a sense of their authority must have preceded their being committed to writing, so also after this it would naturally be independent of that of the record, and the habit of referring to them directly, without considering the intermediary through whom or which they were delivered, might continue. The facts just noticed in connexion with the writings of the Apostolic Fathers are an illustration of this. Their usage is still that of St. Paul in 1 Co 7^{10}, or in the Address to the Elders at Miletus (Ac 20^{35}). They may, in spite of this, have taken their quotations from documents, and those, too, our Gospels. It is a point not easy to decide. In the Ep. of Clem. sayings are quoted as the Lord's closely corresponding, indeed, in substance with such as are recorded in our Gospels, but which differ from them to a greater or less degree in form. It is to be observed, too, that Polycarp (c. ii.) quotes in part the same sayings as Clement in the former of these passages, with the same divergences from our

Gospels [μνημονεύοντες δὲ ὧν εἶπεν ὁ Κύριος διδάσκων· 'Μὴ κρίνετε, ἵνα μὴ κριθῆτε· ἀφίετε καὶ ἀφεθήσεται ὑμῖν· ἐλεᾶτε, ἵνα ἐλεηθῆτε· ᾧ μέτρῳ μετρεῖτε ἀντιμετρηθήσεται ὑμῖν·' καὶ ὅτι 'Μακάριοι οἱ πτωχοὶ καὶ οἱ διωκόμενοι ἕνεκεν δικαιοσύνης, ὅτι αὐτῶν ἐστιν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ']; while, to pass for a moment beyond our present period, the whole piece of Christ's teaching which occurs in Clem. Rom. c. xiii. is given in the same form by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 18). It has been argued that these peculiarities, recurring in more than one writer, point to a documentary source other than our Gospels. If, however, the passages in question are examined, it will be seen that they appear to have the character of summaries, and that their differences from the Gospels may well be accounted for as the effects of compression and of the combination of phrases derived from the parallel passages in our Gospels, or in documents which have been embodied in our Gospels. General considerations which have already occupied us have prepared us for this phenomenon. For such traits as cannot be explained in this way, and which ought not to be regarded as accidental variations, there would seem to be a sufficient explanation in the influence of Oral Tradition, which was doubtless still powerful in the Sub-apostolic Age. Further, the persistence of certain features, which has been noticed, in the quotations of sayings and collections of sayings, may reasonably be traced to catechetical instruction and the impressions left by it. Such compendia of precepts, from the Sermon on the Mount and other parts of our Lord's teaching, may well have been imprinted thus upon the memory of Christians generally, and consequently quoted by writers who were familiar with the Gospels, as Clem. Alex. was. In Polyc. vii. we have a clause of the Lord's Prayer, as given both in Mt and Lk, with the difference only that it is turned into the indirect form; also words spoken by our Lord in Gethsemane, exactly as in Mt and Mk. [δεήσεσιν αἰτούμενοι τὸν παντεπόπτην θεὸν 'μὴ εἰσενεγκεῖν ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμόν.' καθὼς εἶπεν ὁ Κύριος· 'τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα πρόθυμον, ἡ δὲ σὰρξ ἀσθενής' (cf. Mt 6^{13} or Lk 11^{4}; Mt 26^{41} or Mk 14^{38})].

For further parallelisms with the language of the Gospels and for allusions to incidents in the life of Christ in the two writings so far considered, see among other passages—Clem. Rom. xvi. end (Mt $11^{29.30}$), xxiv. (Mt 13^{3}, Mk 4^{3}, Lk 8^{5}); Polyc. v. (Mk 9^{35}, Mt 20^{28}), xii. (Mt 5^{44}).

Ignatius was led by his controversy with Docetism to dwell upon the facts of our Lord's human life and sufferings rather than upon His teaching; and the only saying of Christ which he expressly quotes is one asserting the verity of His corporeal nature after His resurrection [ὅτε πρὸς τοὺς περὶ Πέτρον ἦλθεν, ἔφη αὐτοῖς· 'Λάβετε, ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε ὅτι οὐκ εἰμὶ δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον' (Smyrn. iii.)]. The incident referred to seems to be that recorded in Lk 24^{36-39}, where the words of our Lord are similar in substance and partly in form. According to Origen, however (de Princ. præf. 8), they were contained in The Preaching of Peter in the same form as in Ignatius. Eusebius, on the other hand (HE iii. 36), who notes the fact that Ignatius has the saying, declares that he does not know whence it was taken; while Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 16) says that it occurred in the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews. It is possible that a writing which contained the saying may have existed in the time of Ignatius, and that he may have obtained it thence; but it is at least an equally probable supposition that he derived it from oral tradition; and that from the same source it passed into one or more Apocryphal Gospels. We shall have occasion to recur to the question of the use made of apocryphal writings in the 2nd century.

There are in the Epp. of Ignatius several allusions to incidents in the life of Christ which are recorded in our Gospels as well as parallelisms of expression with them, and among these, in two places, some remarkable coincidences with the thought and language of Jn. See Eph. xiv. (Mt 12^{33}, Lk 6^{44}); Trall. xi. (Mt 15^{13}); Rom. vii. (Jn 4^{10}); Philad. vii. (Jn 3^{8}); Smyrn. i. (Mt 3^{15} and other points); Smyrn. vi. (Mt 19^{12}); Polyc. ii. (Mt 10^{16}). See also Magn. xi. and Trall. ix. In Philad. v. his language suggests the idea that he was thinking of the Gospel as embodied in a written form; for he speaks of it as something to which Christians could as it were turn, and refers in the same context to the prophets. At the same time a passage in c. viii. of the same Ep. seems to show the difference between the position which any written Gospels had so far attained and that of the OT (comp. Lightfoot, Epp. of Ignat. ad loc. and also ib. vol. i. p. 388).

(2) The evidence as to the use of other writings of NT at this time may be treated much more briefly.—St. Paul's first Ep. to the Corinthians is expressly referred to in the Ep. of Clement to the same Church (xlvii.), and St. Paul's Ep. to the Philippians in that of Polycarp (xi.). Thus NT writings are actually mentioned in two of the cases in which it is most natural that they should be; these are exceptions which, if they do not explain, are consistent with, the habit of not quoting by name where there was not the same kind of reason for it. Coincidences of phrase with various NT Epp., so striking from their character or number as to leave no doubt whence they are derived, occur in the three writers under consideration: in Clem. Rom. with He (xxxvi. and xliii.); in Polyc. with 1 P (i. ii. v. vii. viii. x.) and 1 Jn (vii.); in Ignat. with 1 Co (Ephes. xvi. xviii.) and with Eph (Polyc. v.). Indications more or less clear of a knowledge of other NT writings might be named, e.g. of 2 Co, Gal, and 1 and 2 Ti in Polycarp. All these facts, while interesting and important as regards the books of NT immediately concerned, also have a bearing on the question of the use of the Gospels. They show that absence of direct citation in this age can have little weight for proving want of knowledge. Further, the sign of acquaintance with 1 Jn in Ep. of Polyc. has significance in regard to the Gospel acc. to Jn also. On internal grounds there is strong reason for attributing these to the same author, and the circulation of the one cannot have been separated by any great interval from that of the other.

The signs of knowledge of the apostolic writings in Polycarp are, it may be observed in conclusion, remarkable, and far greater than in Clement or Ignatius, in spite of his Epistle being far shorter. This may be reasonably accounted for by the consideration that he was in all probability a much younger man, and that he had acquired familiarity with those writings from his youth.

ii. THE SECOND QUARTER OF THE SECOND CENTURY.—(1) Use of the Gospels.—The so-called Ep. of Barnabas.—Critics have referred the composition of this work to various dates between A.D. 70 and 130. Though it contains references to contemporary events, they are obscure. To notice only some of the more recent views, Lightfoot (Clem. Rom. ii. p. 505 ff.) has explained the allusions in a way that would bring the time of composition within the reign of Vespasian, i.e. before A.D. 79. Ramsay (Church in the Roman Empire, p. 307) has adopted Lightfoot's theory with some modification, but not so as to affect the date. Harnack, however, in his recent work, has made a very ingenious suggestion for overcoming some of the chief difficulties; and his view seems, on the whole, the most tenable.

According to him, the little treatise in its present form was produced in A.D. 130 or 131 (Chronol. i. p. 427).

This writing affords what appears to be the earliest instance of the citation from a book of NT as Scripture. The words πολλοὶ κλητοὶ ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοί are introduced (iv. end) with the formula ὡς γέγραπται. These words are not known to occur except in Mt 22[14]. There are also several other indications in the Ep. of Barn. of acquaintance with that Gospel. The parallelisms with Mt's account of the Trial and Crucifixion of Our Lord are striking (vii.). Again, words found in Mt 9[13] (though also in Mk 2[17], Lk 5[32]) are used in v. A saying of Christ is also quoted as such, which bears a resemblance to that in Mt 20[16], though it is differently applied (vi. 13).

The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.—Dates ranging from A.D. 90–165 have been assigned for the composition of this work, the recovery of which in our generation has created so much interest. Unhappily, the indications available for forming an opinion as to the date are almost entirely such as are connected with the state of Church organization and life reflected in it, and on the history of these very diverse views prevail. It must further be observed that it may have emanated from some portion of the Church where movement had been slow, or whose customs had always been peculiar. There are expressions in it which betoken the habits of a rural district. On the whole, it may be most prudent to take it as belonging to the period which we are now considering, while at the same time we forbear to treat it as illustrative of the mind and practice of the Church generally within any narrow limits of time. In respect to the use of the Gospels, it seems to represent a slight advance upon the Apostolic Fathers. There is language, more distinct than that of the passage of Ignatius above referred to, which suggests the idea that the Gospel existed in a written form (Did. xv. 3, 4—ὡς ἔχετε ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, and comp. viii. 2 and xi. 3). The citations are only of words of Christ, and introduced as what the Lord said; but they are more abundant, and, although not given entirely as in our Gospels, they appear on examination to be still more plainly combinations of phrases from both Mt and Lk. Such compilations there are at Did. i. 2–5 [Mt 22[37-39] (or Mk 12[30-31], or Lk 20[27]); Lk 6[28. 32. 33. 35] (Mt 5[44-46]); Mt 5[39-42] and Lk 6[29. 30]; Mt 5[25]]; and at Did. xvi. [Mt 25[13], Lk 12[35-40], Mt 24[10-11] etc. etc.]. The former of these is a collection of precepts on our duty to God and our neighbour, the latter on the duty of watching for the Coming of Christ. There are, besides, other citations or parallels at Did. vii. (Mt 28[19]), viii. 2 (Mt 6[9-13]), ix. 5 (Mt 7[6]), xiii. (Mt 10[10]).

The Shepherd of Hermas.—The Muratorian fragment on the Canon (c. A.D. 200, see below) contains a statement that the Shepherd was written during the episcopate of Pius (bishop of Rome, A.D. 140–155), by a brother of his named Hermas. Recent investigations have added to the importance of this statement, which could not in any case have been lightly set aside, for they have shown that it may probably have been taken from a list of bishops drawn up c. A.D. 170 in the time of Soter (Harnack, Chronol. i. p. 192). On the other hand, in the work itself (Vis. ii. 4. 3) there is a reference to Clement, which, if understood literally, must imply that he was still alive; and he died long before the beginning of the episcopate of Pius (A.D. 140). Zahn (Der Hirt des Hermas, p. 70 ff.) and Salmon (art. 'Hermas' in Dict. of Christian Biography), on the ground of this passage as well as of features in the work which they think point to an early age, suppose it to have been composed c. A.D. 100. While Lightfoot and Westcott treat the allusion to Clement as part of the fictitious setting of the work, and rely on the testimony of the Muratorian fragment, Harnack endeavours to reconcile in a measure the two views. He supposes that the work, though all by one author, was not all composed at one time, and that it was finally put forth A.D. 140 (Chronol. i. p. 257 ff.).

As the Shepherd is a collection of revelations and instructions given by an angelic guide, it would not have been in character that it should contain express quotations, and there are not any in it from OT any more than from NT. But parallels showing acquaintance with NT writings are not wanting. Sim. v. 2 appears to be an adaptation of the parable of the Vineyard (Mk 12[1ff]). In Sim. ix. 12 we are rather forcibly reminded of Jn 10[1] and 14[6], in ix. 16 of Jn 3[5], and in ix. 24 of Jn 1[16].

The Fragments of Papias.—There cannot be any very serious differences of opinion as to the approximate time at which Papias put forth the work from which some few fragments have been preserved to us. He had conversed with men of an older generation than his own who could give first-hand information as to what the oral teaching of several of the apostles was (Euseb. HE iii. 39). Irenæus (adv. Hær. v. 33. 4) seems to have been mistaken in supposing that he had himself seen and heard John the Evangelist (Euseb. l.c.); but he may have been a contemporary, if not an actual hearer, of Aristion and 'the Elder John,' 'disciples of the Lord' (ib.). He must therefore have been born before, most likely some few years before, the end of the 1st cent. The time when he had opportunities of collecting the information referred to may probably have been several years before he wrote the work of which Eusebius has given us an account, largely in Papias' own words. But at latest the publication of this work cannot have fallen much after A.D. 150, and may more reasonably be supposed to have taken place somewhat earlier. When, further, we consider the character of his work, we can have no hesitation in saying that his testimony (so far as its general effect is concerned) is to be connected with the first half of the century.

The title itself of his work, Λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις, 'Expositions of Dominical Oracles,' is interesting and important. In view of those habits of thought of the time upon which we have already commented, we may best take 'Dominical Oracles' to mean passages of Our Lord's teaching. These, as is clear from his own language in the portion of his prologue preserved to us by Eusebius, Papias took from some documentary source or sources; but for the illustration of them he availed himself of all that he had been able to glean from independent tradition. As Harnack observes, 'he distinguishes the matter orally delivered, even so far as it contained portions of evangelical history, in a marked manner from the matter which he expounds' (Chronol. i. 690, n. 1). This fact, then, that written records supplied the basis for his comment, or the pegs on which he hung the more or less trustworthy additional narratives or statements that he had collected, lends special interest to the inquiry whether he knew and used our Gospels or any of them.

We need not hesitate to claim his account, which he gives on the authority of 'the Elder'—apparently, from the context in Eusebius, the Elder John—of the composition of a Gospel by Mark, as referring to a work at least substantially the same as our Second Gospel. It has been urged, indeed, that the observation contained in this fragment, whether it is the Elder's or Papias' own, that Mark did not arrange his matter 'in order,' is not appropriate to our Mark, which is not less orderly in point of arrangement than the other Gospels. But this objection seems clearly unsubstantial, and is now generally admitted to be so. The criticism implied in Papias' words may have been simply a fanciful and mistaken one. Or, again, Mark's arrangement may have been assumed to be wrong wherever it differed from that of either our First or (see below) our Fourth Gospel, which are connected with the names of those who were followers of the Lord during His earthly life, which Mark was not. Some comparison of this kind seems to be implied in the words of Papias' fragment itself. (See, further, art. MARK, p. 244). The questions as to the right interpretation of the fragment of Papias (ib.) on a writing by Matthew are more serious. Critics of more than one school have seen in the words, Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν τὰ λόγια συνεγράψατο, a description of a Collection of Discourses and Sayings which has (it may be) been embodied in our First Gospel, but which was in many respects a different work. Against this view it has been urged that λόγια does not mean 'discourses,' but 'oracles,' and that in the NT itself it is applied to the OT. These arguments, however, somewhat miss their mark. For it does not seem likely that the term should have been applied to a writing of the NT as such, so early as the time of Papias, and still less of his informant, if this, as is probable, was the same 'Elder' whom he reports in the case of Mark's work. Nor could τὰ λόγια in that sense have been suitably used of a single writing, though it would be natural as a description of the Lord's teaching. The statement, however, which we are considering consists only of one brief sentence; we do not know what the context may have been. And whatever inferences it may be fair to draw from Papias' expressions as to the history of the composition of our First Gospel, we may gather that, at least when he wrote, a work existed which was generally recognized as a Greek representative of a Hebrew writing by the Apostle Matthew. And it is hard to imagine that this could have been any other work than that which a generation later, or less, was certainly known in the Church, as it is still, as the Gospel acc. to Mt. A substitution of one book for another could not have been effected in so short a time. (Comp. Harnack, Chronol. i. p. 693). See, further, art. MATTHEW (GOSPEL OF).

Eusebius makes the following statement at the end of his section on Papias: 'The same (writer) has made use of testimonies from the former Ep. of Jn and from that of Peter likewise. He has, moreover, also set forth another narrative, concerning a woman charged before the Lord with many sins, which the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews contains.' Use of the First Ep. of Jn indirectly affords evidence, as we have already had occasion to remark, of the existence and circulation of the Gospel according to John. It must not be assumed, indeed, on the ground of this notice, that Papias attributed these works to the apostle; but we may at least feel sure that he said nothing plainly inconsistent with this view of their authorship: if he had done so, Eusebius could not have failed to mention it, more especially as he was not in sympathy with some of this writer's opinions.

Something more as to Papias' use of the Johannine writings may, it would seem, be learned from Irenæus. The latter, in language that recalls Papias' prologue preserved in Eusebius, repeatedly adduces the testimony of 'the elders' who had seen and heard John, the disciple of the Lord, or again, in another place, 'who were disciples of apostles'; and when we examine the passages in which he refers to them and quotes their sayings, we find that their character is just such as we might expect it to be if they were derived from Papias' Exegeses, in view, on the one hand, of its aim as described by the author himself, and of his chiliastic predilections [adv. Hær. v. 5. 1; 30. 1; 33. 4]. In one of these places (v. 33. 4) Irenæus, after alluding to the elders, proceeds to quote from Papias' book by name. Now, among the passages which may with probability be regarded as extracts, more or less exact, from Papias, there is one in which a saying of the Lord, recorded in Jn 14^2, and not in any other Gospel, is quoted and commented on (adv. Hær. v. 36. 1); there is another relating to the number of the Beast in the Apocalypse (ib. 30. 1).

To conclude: the evidence as to Papias, though it is much more scanty than we should like, and though it is in part obscure, tends to show that he derived the 'Oracles of the Lord,' which he made his starting-point, from our Gospels and not from any other source, and that he knew at least the Gospels acc. to Mt, Mk, and Jn.

The so-called Second Ep. of Clement.—This work is of considerable interest in connexion with the history of the Canon, more especially as to the use of Apocryphal Gospels and the position accorded to them in relation to our Gospels. Its date is consequently important. Hilgenfeld (Nov. Test. extr. Can. p. xxxviii f.) and Harnack (Patres Apostolici, pp. xci, xcii) took the view that it was the Epistle sent by Soter to Corinth, c. A.D. 170 (Euseb. HE iv. 23). But since the recovery of this work in an unmutilated form, through Bryennios' discovery in 1875, it has become evident that it is not a Letter at all but a Homily, and its identification with the communication of Soter ought no longer to be regarded as tenable (see Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. ii. p. 194 ff.; Harnack, however, still adheres to the identification, Chronol. i. pp. 440–450). The character of the work in general, it may be added, is favourable to an earlier date. It may most reasonably be taken as illustrating the state of things in respect to the recognition of the New Testament Scriptures, c. A.D. 140, or perhaps somewhat before this.

We will next briefly notice the recently recovered Apology of Aristides, an example of a class of Christian writings which has even given a name in Church history to an age—that occupying the middle portion of the 2nd cent. This one appears to have been addressed not as Eusebius says (HE iv. 3) to Hadrian, but to Antoninus Pius (Emp. 138–161); but it probably belongs to the earlier rather than the latter part of his reign (comp. J. R. Harris, Texts and Studies, i. p. 8, and Harnack, Chronol. i. pp. 271–273). The special character of compositions of this kind, like that of others, and even more than that of some others, must be remembered in order that the effect of the evidence supplied by them in regard to the Canon may be fairly judged of. The argument and purpose of the greater part of the Apology of Aristides did not afford opportunities for quoting from Christian documents. It contains, however, one passage which illustrates in an interesting manner a time of transition when memories of the oral delivery of the Gospel were linked with a growing dependence upon a written form of it. (See tr. of Syriac in Texts and Studies, I. i. p. 36).

We pass to the writings of a far greater 'apologist,' Justin Martyr, and we may confine our attention to the three extant works bearing his name, which are by common consent admitted to be genuine—his First and Second Apologies and Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. Recent investigations, beginning with those of Volkmar, Theol. Jahrb. von Baur u. Zeller, 1855, and of Hort, Journ. of Philol., 1857, have served to show that the First Apology should be placed a little later than it commonly used to be, and that the Second

Apology was written soon after the First. The Dialogue was written after the Apologies, but how long after cannot be determined. We shall not be far wrong if we say that all three writings were composed c. A.D. 150. The Apologies were written in Rome, as was also probably the Dialogue, though it may be inferred from the latter (c. i.) that Justin was teaching as a Christian philosopher in Ephesus soon after A.D. 135. He was the most eminent Christian of his generation, while he writes, not as one who is putting forward his own views, but who is representing and defending the faith and practice of the Church; and he well knew what they were in at least two of its chief centres.

Now, Justin twice in his First Apology and many times in the Dialogue describes the main authorities for the Life and Teaching of Christ as 'the Memoirs of the Apostles' or simply 'the Memoirs.' We have to ask whether by this name he intended at least principally our Gospels, whether he recognized all these, and whether they held a place in his estimation which no other accounts of the whole or a portion of the Lord's Life and Teaching shared. His use of the term itself just referred to affords no ground for doubting that he has the Gospels which we acknowledge in his mind. It is probable that the name 'Gospels' was only beginning in that generation to be applied to the writings which contained the Gospel even among Christians, and he was addressing those who were not Christians. It would be natural for him to employ some term which would be to them more easy of comprehension and more expressive. The course he adopts in this case has an exact parallel in his treatment of other Christian terms, e.g. Baptism and the Eucharist (First Apol. lxi. and lxvi.). In First Apol. lxvi., after using the word 'Memoirs,' he adds, 'which are called Gospels.' And this, it may be observed in passing, is the earliest instance of the application of the name 'Gospels' to the books. Justin himself commonly writes of 'the Gospel' in the manner which we have observed to be customary in the writings of his predecessors and elder contemporaries. To proceed: in one place he characterizes 'the Memoirs' with special fulness as 'composed by the Apostles and those who followed them.' The suitability of this twofold description to our Gospels will be noticed, and it gains in point from the circumstance that in the context he preserves one trait which is peculiar to St. Luke's account of the Agony in the Garden (Dial. ciii.). In another place he refers to a fact, mentioned only by St. Mark, as contained in Peter's Memoirs (see, further, below). Again, he speaks of the doctrine of the Person of Christ, which he defines in part in terms peculiar to Jn, as derived from 'the Memoirs.' Further, in five of the cases in which Justin distinctly quotes from evangelic writings, using the formula γέγραπται, he agrees almost verbally with Mt or Lk. (For these and for a discussion of the remaining two, comp. Westcott, Canon, p. 130 ff., and Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century, p. 88 ff.).

For the most part, however, Justin does not adhere closely to the words of any one evangelist in his accounts of and references to the facts of the Lord's Life and His Teaching. He gives the substance of their narratives, and to a certain extent combines what is found in different Gospels. In doing this he acted in accordance with the very natural tendency of which we have already seen examples in early Christian writings. Moreover, it is quite obviously his purpose in a considerable portion of his First Apology to give a summary of the evangelic history and of some chief points in Christ's teaching for the enlightenment of heathen readers. And not less obviously in a large part of the Dialogue he is rapidly reviewing the facts, which was all that was required, in connexion with an argument from the fulfilment of prophecy. This being so, it was to be expected that he should avail himself now of one, now of another Gospel, and should be satisfied with giving what he conceived to be their general meaning and purport. With the object he had in view, he would often find it sufficient to rely upon his memory of their narratives. And, indeed, even his quotations from the OT are marked to a considerable extent by the same characteristics of combination and compression, and want of minute accuracy. Nevertheless, the general character of the representation which Justin gives of the evangelic history, and which he derives, as he repeatedly indicates, from records which were acknowledged in the Church to have apostolic authority—its contents, with comparatively slight exceptions, its main outline, the style of the language, and many of the actual words—are those of our Gospels. The features of the Synoptics are, indeed, more fully and directly reproduced than those of the Fourth Gospel, though there are striking coincidences with special points in it also; while it is most natural to suppose that the conception of Christ as the Logos, which holds a prominent place in Justin's works, was derived by him from the same source, although he develops it in part in his own way, in accordance with philosophical ideas that were familiar to him.

In his summaries of or allusions to the Gospel history, Justin introduces a limited amount of matter—a certain number of touches and incidents—not found in our Gospels. From the presence of this element it has been argued that he did not use our Gospels. But to reason thus is to defy every principle of sound criticism. For there is no evidence that any other work or works existed which could have supplied him with the bulk of his facts about the life and teaching of Christ, together with the language in which he relates them, besides our Gospels. Moreover, that these were already in existence, and that he must have had opportunities of becoming acquainted with them, is certain, as will more clearly appear from facts to be considered presently. It is now, indeed, admitted by critics of more than one school that the first three Gospels ranked among Justin's principal authorities, and that the fourth was known to him. The chief questions still sub lite are (a) to what extent he used other records in addition to our canonical ones, and whether he regarded any of them as possessed of apostolic authority; and (b) whether there was a difference between his attitude to the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics.

(a) The question of the source or sources whence Justin drew what we may for convenience briefly call the 'apocryphal' matter in his accounts of the Gospel history has received new and special interest from the recovery, since 1892, of a fragment of the so-called 'Gospel of Peter' (see The Akhmîm Fragment, or the Apocryphal Gospel of St. Peter, by H. B. Swete). In some points in which Justin diverges from the canonical Gospels he is found to coincide with 'Peter.' The importance of the inquiry whether Justin used 'Peter' is greatly increased by the fact that, if he did, it must in all probability have been the work which he describes as 'Peter's Memoirs' (Dial. cvi.), and he must have given it an equal, if not a pre-eminent, place among the authorities for the Gospel history. The use of 'Peter' by Justin is maintained by Harnack (Bruchstück des Evangeliums und der Apokalypse des Petrus, 2nd ed. p. 37 ff.), and is accepted by Sanday (Inspiration, pp. 305, 310); but against it, see Swete, l.c. pp. xxxiii–xxxv. Swete's argument may also be greatly strengthened by observing the contrasts between Justin and 'Peter.' It is certain that the former has been but slightly influenced by the latter on the whole, and it is difficult to understand how, if he knew the book and regarded it as the work of the chief of the apostles, which it claims to be, his use of it should have been so limited.

In Justin's age information concerning the Gospel history was gleaned not only from tradition, but also from documents other than our Gospels, less unsuspectingly than came to be the case a generation or so later. We have seen an example of this in the so-called Second Ep. of Clement; we learn also from Eusebius (HE iv. 22) that Hegesippus, the contemporary of Justin, made some quotations from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Justin's practice illustrates the same attitude of mind. With the matter supplied by our Gospels, he weaves in traits which he has probably derived from such sources, though we are unable to say from which of them he obtained most, or whether indeed he made special use of any one. There is, however, no reason to think that any work of the nature of a Gospel, other than ours, held practically the same position as they did for Justin, or for the Church of his time.

(b) Some critics who admit the cogency of the evidence that Justin was acquainted with the Fourth Gospel, yet maintain that he clearly did not place it on the same level as the Synoptics (see Keim, Jesus of Naz. i. p. 186 ff.; Holtzmann, Einl. p. 479). The only ground for supposing this is that he makes more sparing use of it. But there was good reason for this difference. In view of the persons addressed both in the Apology and in the Dialogue, and also the tenor of the arguments in these works, it was natural that he should have fewer quotations from and parallels with it than the others.

Before leaving this quarter of the century we must touch upon the question of the use of the Gospels by Gnostic heretics. In discussing it we shall be taken back even to the earlier part of the time. It has, however, been reserved till this point, both on account of the different relation to the Christian faith of the persons to be considered, and because the evidence is of a more indirect kind.

Basileides had begun to teach at Alexandria in the reign of Hadrian. He was the author of a work in 24 books entitled Expositions of the Gospel, from which we have a few extracts in extant works of Clem. Alex. One of these seems like a portion of a comment on a passage of Mt. There are two others, which may be comments on sayings of our Lord taken from Lk and Jn respectively (Zahn, Kanon, i. pp. 766, 767). The possibility of coming to any fuller conclusion as to the use of the Gospels by Basileides must depend on the estimate formed of the account of Basileides and his school given by Hippolytus, and of the citations which it includes. Some have supposed Hippolytus to have been misled when he took the work from which he quotes as a product even of the school of Basileides (e.g. Zahn, ib. 765). But the result of a comparison with the extracts in Clem. Alex. is strongly in favour of the view that the treatise used by Hippolytus gave a genuine exposition of Basileidean doctrine (see Hort's art. 'Basileides' in Dict. of Christian Biog.). Whether it was the Exegetica or some other work is more questionable. That the quotations are from Basileides himself, at least in some cases, and those the most important for our present purpose, is the most natural view of Hippolytus' language (cf. Westcott, Canon, p. 297 n., and Hort, l.c.). The theories expounded bear the marks of great metaphysical power; and if the writer from whom they are taken, partly in his own words, was not Basileides himself, he may probably have been Isidore, Basileides' eminent son and disciple, whom Hippolytus names along with his father. Even in this case we should have to do here with a writing composed not much later than, if so late as, the middle of the 2nd cent. It undoubtedly appeals to the Fourth Gospel as to an authority (Hippol. Hær. vii. 22).

Valentinus, who was a younger contemporary of Basileides, need not now detain us. We know nothing of the employment he made of books of the NT, except as it may be inferred from the practice of his school in the next generation.

On the other hand, of the treatment of the NT Scriptures by Marcion, who flourished c. A.D 140, we know much from Tertullian's Contra Marcionem. Beyond all reasonable doubt, the Gospel which he made for himself and his sect was a mutilated form of Lk. And it may be observed that in selecting it, even though he found it necessary thus to adapt it to his own purpose, he did homage to the authority which it had acquired. An examination of the peculiarities of the text used by Marcion seems also to show that the text of the Gospel had already in his generation a history (see Sanday, Gospels in Second Cent. p. 231 ff.).

From a man and his writings we turn to a movement. Montanism arose in Phrygia not long after the middle, and it spread remarkably during the remainder, of the 2nd cent.; it found tendencies and needs favourable to it in various parts of the Church. In the present connexion it is important only from the fact that its insistence on the promise of the coming of the Spirit, designated as the Paraclete, is a sign of the influence of the Gospel according to John.

(2) Other writings of NT.—A few points only need be noticed. We learn from Tertullian's treatise against Marcion that this heretic acknowledged 10 Epp. of St. Paul. It was natural, and yet important as a step in the formation of the Canon, that the Epp. of this great apostle should be regarded collectively, and we have in Marcion's case the first clear sign of such a view of them. There is, it may be added, no reason to think that Marcion in rejecting, as he did, the 3 Pastoral Epp. was actuated by any other motive than a dogmatic one.

In a passage of Justin we have a noteworthy instance of another kind—the earliest reference by name to a NT writing. The work so cited is the Apocalypse, its authorship by John the Apostle being mentioned (Dial. lxxxi.).

For the rest, it will suffice under this head to notice parallelisms which are striking, and which prove the use of writings not otherwise abundantly attested. Those in Hermas with Ep. of James are specially remarkable (Hermas, Vis. II. ii. 7, IV. ii. 6; M. II. 3. 4, VI. 7, VIII. 10, IX. 4. 11, XII. 5. 2 vi. 3; Sim. VI. i. 1, VIII. vi. 4). Again, those with Acts in Justin seem clear (Apol. i. 40; Dial. xvi. and lii.). The statement, which we have already had occasion to refer to, may also here be recalled, that Papias 'made use of testimonies from the former Ep. of Jn, and likewise from that of Peter' (Eus. HE iii. 39).

iii. THIRD QUARTER OF SECOND CENTURY.—(1) Gospels.—Tatian.—Through a succession of remarkable literary discoveries in recent years controversy has practically been closed in respect to the general character of Tatian's Diatessaron. We may not fully have recovered its original form, but it can no longer be seriously doubted that substantially it was a harmony of our Four Gospels (see Zahn, Forsch. Pt. 1, Kan. i. pp. 387–422, ii. 530–556; Lightft., Essays on Sup. Rel., 1889, pp. 272–288;

S. Hemphill, The Diatessaron of Tatian; and Hill, The Earliest Gospel Harmony).

In more than one respect Tatian is a valuable link between the middle and the last quarter of the century, supplying evidence in regard to the history of the Canon for a period, the remains of which are specially scanty. His Diatessaron, while it is an example of the working of that tendency to dwell on the common result of the testimony of different witnesses, which we have seen to be characteristic of the first two or three generations, is also the first distinct indication of the fact, which is so emphatically asserted a little later, that there were four records whose authority was unique.

(2) His Apology shows traces of acquaintance with various writings of the NT, but for the most part there is in it the absence of express citation which is commonly to be observed in works of the same class. In one place, however, some words from the prologue to Jn are introduced as 'that which has been said' (xiii.).

iv. THE LAST QUARTER OF THE SECOND CENTURY AND BEGINNING OF THE THIRD.—The point of transition to the last quarter of the 2nd cent. will be the most convenient opportunity for considering the impugners of St. John's writings, commonly called the Alogi. The evidence which has so far come before us, if it is in any respects unfavourable to the authenticity of any NT writings, is so by way of defect. Even such a writer as Marcion appears mainly as a witness for the Canon. We have now, however, to notice a body of persons who are specially characterized by their refusal to acknowledge one group of writings —those attributed to St. John.

Much attention has of late been directed to this phenomenon. It has been discussed in particular from opposite points of view by Zahn (Kan. i. pp. 220–262) and Harnack (NT um d. J. 200, pp. 58–70, and Chronol. i. pp. 670, 671); see also Lightfoot (Clem. Rom. ii. p. 394) and Sanday (Inspiration, p. 14 f.). The chief documents are Iren. III. xi. 12 (which refers only to the rejection of the Gospel); Epiph. Hær. li.; and Philaster, lx. The value of the last two is that in all probability they derive their information from a lost work of Hippolytus. It is not, however, altogether easy to distinguish the conjectures of Epiphanius, and his disquisitions on points that interested him, from the matter which he took from his authority, while Philaster's notice is very brief.

The motive for these opinions was primarily dogmatic, not critical, though those who held them sought to strengthen their case by pointing out differences between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics, and by strictures upon the imagery of the Apocalypse (see Epiph. l.c.). It was 'in order to frustrate the gifts of the Spirit,' Irenæus tells us, that 'some do not admit that form of the Gospel which is according to John, in which the Lord promised that He would send the Paraclete.' One kind of extravagance begets another. Because the Montanists appealed to Jn 14–16 in urging their wild views and preposterous claims, these others were for denying the authority of that Gospel itself. Again, the Montanists and many other Christians in the 2nd cent. were millenarians, and supported their materialistic notions by a literal interpretation of the Apocalypse. Consequently, those who were repelled by millenarianism were tempted to call the authenticity of that work in question. The theory of the Alogi, that Cerinthus was the author of the Johannine writings, must have been suggested first in the case of the Apocalypse, and extended to the Gospel; for while, according to the best information which we possess, Cerinthus was a millenarian, his Christology had nothing in common with that of the Fourth Gospel. Thus the rejection of the one work was, in part at least, associated with that of the other; in part, however, the attack on the Apocalypse was more widely spread, and had more lasting effects (cf. Eus. HE iii. 28 and vii. 25).

The name Alogi seems to have been Epiphanius' invention. He gave it both as a jest and to betoken their refusal to accept the Gospel which contained the doctrine of the Logos. Whether they in reality objected to this doctrine, or this was simply Epiphanius' inference, is not clear. But if they did, they might here again find a common ground of opposition both to the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse.

It should be observed that the Alogi, by their association of the Gospel according to John and the Apocalypse in a common condemnation, and the attribution of them both to Cerinthus, are witnesses to the tradition, that both were by the same author, and that, in assigning them to a heretic who was contemporary with St. John, they are also witnesses to their antiquity.

Harnack lays special stress on the fact that the Alogi were not visibly separated from the Church, and apparently did not intend to depart from the Christian faith. Δοκοῦσι καὶ αὐτοί, says Epiphanius, τὰ ἴσα ἡμῖν πιστεύειν (l.c. § 4). Yet the agreement of which he speaks seems to be only relative. He is comparing their position with that of more pronounced heretics, such as the Gnostics. Further, it is to be remembered that the machinery did not exist in the 2nd cent., which there came to be in the Church of after-times, for passing judgment on erroneous opinions. And, moreover, there is no reason to suppose that the number of those who rejected the most important work at least, the Gospel, was considerable, and it is certain that they produced no lasting impression.

At the same time, the instance of the Alogi illustrates a stage in the reception of the NT Scriptures. It shows that beliefs which this party opposed had not yet obtained that firm hold upon the minds of all which only clear definition and a prescription of many generations can give. But that these beliefs were neither of recent growth nor limited to a narrow area, we plainly see from the works of the age we have now reached which have come down to us.

Among the earliest is the treatise of Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, which is in the form of a vindication of the Christian faith, addressed to a philosophic heathen friend. He dwells upon the inspiration of the apostles. With the Holy Scriptures, i.e. the OT, still best known by this title, he couples 'all the inspired men' (πνευματοφόροι), expressly mentioning John. He quotes Jn $1^{1,3}$ as from 'the apostle' (ad Autol. ii. 22, and cf. ib. ix. 10). In iii. 12 he speaks of 'the Gospels' in the plural, and asserts that the contents of the Prophets and the Gospels are in harmony with the law, 'because all the inspired men spoke by one Spirit of God.' Again (ib. 13), after citing a passage of OT he refers to 'the still more urgent injunction of the Evangelic Voice,' and quotes Mt $5^{28.32}$; and he compares the Gospel with Isaiah, quoting Mt 5^{44} (ib. 14).

We may here suitably refer to the Ep. ad Diognetum, a work of similar aim, the birthplace and date of which cannot be fixed with certainty, but which may with most probability be assigned to about the same time. In c. xi. the writer enumerates 'the fear of the law,' 'the grace of the prophets,' 'the faith of the Gospels,' 'the tradition of the Apostles.'

It is, however, when we pass to writings of a different class, designed for the refutation of heresy or the instruction of the faithful in the Christian life and creed, to Irenæus (adv. Hær., composed before A.D. 190), and the works of Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, and Hippolytus, composed near the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd cent., that for the first time, in place of the partial gleams afforded by the remains of former generations, we have a flood of light upon the thought and practice of the Church. We must review the evidence as to the position of the writings of the NT in the generation we have now reached, and consider what inferences may be drawn therefrom as to their reception.

(1) Writings whose place in the Canon was already at and from this time fully secured.—The express statements of the eminent writers just named, and their ordinary assumptions, leave no doubt as to the inspired authority attributed to by far the larger part of our NT in the important Churches of which they were members, or with which they were well acquainted and maintained active relations. In common they recognize (α) our four Gospels, and none besides; (β) 13 Epp. of Paul, i.e. all which bear his name in our NT, except that to Heb.; (γ) the Acts, 1 P, 1 Jn. These form also the class called afterwards by Eusebius 'acknowledged writings.'

(a) Remarks as to the area from which this evidence comes.—It may have been observed that hitherto we have been almost exclusively concerned with the faith and usage of Greek-speaking Christians, and that we are so mainly still. By the mention of Tertullian the fact is for the first time brought before us of the hold that Christianity had obtained, comparatively recently, at the epoch of which we are speaking, among a Latin-speaking people. In Rome itself, alike in the 1st cent. and throughout the 2nd, the Church was mainly Greek. It may be well here to point out the special advantages belonging to the Greek-speaking Christians of the first few generations, as witnesses in regard to the NT writings. Not only are we best acquainted with the expansion of the Church to the west, north, and north-west of Jerusalem, through Greek-speaking cities, but to all appearance that was by far the greatest expansion in apostolic times. Here lay the scenes of St. Paul's labours, with which his Epistles and the Acts have rendered us familiar. More dimly we see the figures of several of the Twelve, including St. Peter and St. John, moving and working in these same regions, when they voluntarily left or were driven from their home. It was in consequence of the spread of the gospel among populations whose ordinary language was Greek, to meet the needs of converts made from them, that all the writings of the NT came into existence. This is true even of the First Gospel in the form in which we have it.

Here and there some other Christian writing may in early days have won a position similar to that of the books received as canonical. We may have an example of this in the Gospel according to the Egyptians. But special circumstances of language and locality so well account for this in an outlying district, that such an instance does not detract from the force of the testimony of other parts of the Church.

It seems strange, however, at first sight that the Christians of Palestine and of the Aramaic-speaking East should have received the NT writings from the West, with one probable exception—the Ep. of James. Yet such was the fact. The Hebrew Christian community at Jerusalem was virtually broken up by the siege and capture of the city, A.D. 69–70. After the suppression of Barcochba's revolt (A.D. 135) a Greek Church arose there. In other parts of Palestine the Hebrew Christian Church had to contend, during the latter part of the 1st and earlier part of the 2nd cent., with a strong Jewish reaction. What progress the gospel made beyond Jordan to the east and north-east, through the labours of any of the Twelve, or the preaching and example of more ordinary Christians who fled from Palestine when Jerusalem fell, and to what extent the Christians of those districts in the 2nd cent. may thus have traced their lineage to the Church of apostolic days, and have cherished its traditions, it may be impossible to discover. But this at least may be said: we hear of no work written in Hebrew or Aramaic by an apostle, or immediate companion and follower of the apostles, except the one attributed to St. Matthew. The Gospel according to the Hebrews may have embodied this work, and doubtless contained traditions that had been current among Hebrew Christians; but it would seem not to have been preserved long in an uncorrupted form, and it is noteworthy that it obtained no enduring authority even in the East.

As regards the history of the Canon of the Syrian Church, it may suffice here to allude to the strange hold which Tatian's Diatessaron obtained there. It was popularly used as a substitute for the Gospels, to the neglect of the reading of them in public worship—an abuse which had to be dealt with by authority as late as the 5th cent. But such a fact is of importance as throwing light upon the history of that Church generally, not as bearing on the authenticity of the Gospels. [The subject of the history of the Canon in the Syrian Church is a very obscure one: for discussions of it see especially Zahn, Kan. i. c. 8, and Harnack's criticism thereupon in NT um 200, § 10.]

Primarily, then, in dealing with the history of the Canon of NT, we have to fix our thoughts upon Greek-speaking Christendom, though we may now join thereto the Christians of the Roman province of N. Africa, who were far more closely bound up with it than the Christians of the East were. Tertullian is fully aware that he and the other Christians of his portion of the Church, who were but 'of yesterday,' had simply received the faith and its documents from more ancient Churches. It was probably here that a translation of the NT into Latin was first made, and expressions used by Tertullian have been commonly thought to show that one already existed in his time. But if, as Zahn has argued (Kan. i. 48–60), the task was not accomplished till later, though before the middle of the 3rd cent., it was not for want of recognizing the value and authority of the writings held to be apostolic. Tertullian's works certainly prove this. It is not material, therefore, for our present purpose to decide exactly when a Latin version was first made.

Now, although there are some Churches of note as to which we have no direct information for the period in question, even within that portion of Christendom the bounds of which we have indicated, we are justified in assuming that throughout the whole of it there was substantial agreement as to the sacred writings of the New Dispensation, to the extent to which it is found in the writers whose works have come down to us from that time. In view both of the eminence of those men and their wide knowledge of the Church, and the intercourse which existed between different parts of it within the area described, there could hardly have been any considerable divergences on serious points which have remained concealed. It is to be added that, even for those regions within the limits defined—in particular the Greek Churches of Syria and of the central and eastern parts of Asia Minor—as to which evidence is lacking at this epoch, it is forthcoming shortly afterwards, and there is not a trace of any doubts in regard to the books above enumerated.

To the close of the 2nd cent. or first years of the 3rd belongs most likely the earliest actual list of the writings of NT which we possess. It is called after Muratori, its discoverer. It has now been rendered highly probable that it was the work of Hippolytus. [On the Muratorian fragment see esp. Zahn, Kan. ii. 1–143, and Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. ii. 405–413.] Though the earliest list of the kind that has come down to us, it may not have been the earliest made. Melito, bishop of Sardis (c. A.D. 170), in a fragment which Eusebius has preserved (HE iv. 26), gives a list of 'the books of the Old Covenant,' and the phrase seems naturally to suggest by contrast the existence of a list of the books of the New. Further, at the time we have reached, the name of 'Scriptures' is given to the new sacred books equally with the old (see Iren. adv. Hær. ii. 58. 2). And a conception has been formed of a NT, as a collection of books which made a companion to the OT, and the name even of 'Testament' is so applied in Clem. Alex. and Tertullian [Clem. Strom. v. 85; Tertull. de Pudic. 1]. Tertullian also employs the word 'instrumentum,' or in the pl. 'instrumenta' (i.e. 'the document' or 'the documents'), considering it more expressive. It should be observed that such a conception was found possible, although the contents of the collection of writings had not been in all respects certainly determined.

The usage of heretics confirms what is known as to that of the Church. The Valentinians were but the most numerous and widely spread Gnostic sect. Valentinus, according to Tertullian, used 'a complete Instrument,' which must be taken to mean all the books of Scripture which Tertullian himself acknowledged (Præscr. Hær. c. 38). Whether the remark was true or not of the founder of the school himself, it was so undoubtedly of the Valentinians in the last quarter of the 2nd cent., as may be gathered from Irenæus' treatise, as well as from Tertullian. It answered their purpose best to accept the NT Scriptures acknowledged in the Church, and to make them the vehicle of their own tenets by means of allegorical interpretation.

(b) The inferences that may be drawn as to the previous history of the reception of these writings in the Church.—In estimating the force of the evidence in this respect, it will be desirable to distinguish between the value of the personal reminiscences of individual writers in regard to traditions about the books of the NT, and the significance of the general belief of the Church. The testimony of individuals, founded on what they themselves remembered, might be of great weight. That of Irenæus is so in particular. Too much stress may sometimes have been laid upon it. Possibly his opportunities for knowing the mind and teaching of Polycarp may have been rather more restricted than they have been assumed to be by some; and he may have known no other man, besides, belonging to the generation which actually overlapped that of the apostles. But he certainly knew other Asiatic Christians older than himself, who must have been acquainted as he was, or better than he was, with the testimony both of Polycarp and of contemporaries of Polycarp, who had passed away before him. With such opportunities for correcting his own impressions, it is hardly possible that he should have been at fault as to simple facts which he believed that he remembered. It is therefore altogether unreasonable to suppose, as Harnack does, that, in spite of his very distinct statement as to Polycarp's reminiscences of John the Apostle, he is in his own memory making a confusion with another John. [Comp. Harn. Chronol. i. p. 333 ff., with Gwatkin's answer in Contemp. Review, Feb. 1897, and Lightfoot, Essays on Sup. Rel. pp. 96 f., 265.]

But the position which the greater part of the writings of the NT held in the last two or three decades of the 2nd cent. in the common view of the chief Churches of Christendom, and approximately, at least, of the Church throughout the Roman Empire, i.e. of by far the larger part of the Church, is a more remarkable fact than any recollections, however clear, of particular men could be. In certain respects there has come a change in the manner of regarding these writings since the middle, not to say the beginning, of the century. The line of distinction is more sharply drawn than before it was, between the writings which could be rightly reckoned apostolic and all others. Controversy with Gnosticism had had its effect. Writings of more or less decidedly heretical tendencies had been put forth under the names of apostles. The Church was compelled to be watchful. A certain vividness and emphasis may also be noticed in the manner in which Irenæus, for instance, asserts the fourfold completeness of the evangelic testimony. The perception of the uniqueness of the four records has been rendered more precise, and with this there has also come a fuller sense of the distinct value of the contribution made by each, and of the richness of their harmony when combined. And as the notion of a Canon of NT Scriptures is becoming more definite (the name is not used), the authority of those books, which were beyond question and on all hands allowed to have a right to a place in it, is enhanced. But the amount of the change that has taken place may easily be exaggerated. The appearance of abruptness which it has, when we compare earlier documents with the works of this time, is certainly due to our want of information. The voice of the Church at the end of the 2nd cent. in respect to the writings of the NT is simply the full utterance of a conviction which has long been virtually held. Irenæus so evidently believes himself to be defending the immemorial faith and tradition of the Church, that he could not have been conscious of any alteration, within his own experience, in such an important matter as the apostolic authority attributed to the chief NT writings. Moreover, such a hold as they had manifestly obtained could not, in the nature of things, have been acquired recently and at a bound in that generation.

We have seen how large a measure of agreement there was upon the subject on the part of a number of eminent Churches. Putting aside that of N. Africa, which was of later origin than the rest, these were all founded in the Apostolic Age itself, with the possible exception of Alexandria, which must have arisen at least in the generation immediately following. And though these Churches are all situated within the Græco-Roman world, they exhibit widely different characteristics and thorough independence. No one of them could dictate to the rest; no one of them exercised over the rest an influence so dominant that its example would be silently followed. Rome would not have readily yielded to Asia Minor, nor Asia Minor to Rome, on such a matter as the Scriptures which they had been accustomed to acknowledge; nor would either of these have yielded to Antioch or Alexandria. Nor was unanimity brought about through discussions and conferences. Differences on other subjects appear and are debated, but not on this. It should be observed, also, that the authority which the writings of the NT possessed was not based, as we in our day might be inclined to imagine, on a judgment of the Church, either formal or implied, as to their surpassing moral and spiritual power, their inspiration. It rested on the belief that the writings in question were authentic embodiments of the witness and teaching of the apostles. This was the point testified to by a number of independent and mutually confirmatory lines of tradition, maintained in communities which were bound by strong sanctions to be faithful to that which they had received from the past. These communities, too, had a continuous corporate life that reached back to the first age of the Church, or its confines; and at the time we are considering they were still separated from it only by two or three generations. It is difficult to imagine that a belief thus guaranteed could have been substantially erroneous, even though it does not become apparent to us in its full strength for a century after the death of most of the apostles. And the more indirect indications from the intervening generations, though they are, owing to various causes, less distinct than we could wish, make for the same conclusion.

(2) Writings whose position continued to be for a time doubtful.—Before this epoch is left, a few words must be said on the amount of recognition then in divers quarters accorded to other writings, besides those above mentioned, which (a) were eventually included in the NT, as well as to some which (b) did not obtain a place there.

(a) And first as to the Apocalypse. So far as the sources of evidence which come before us up to the beginning of the 3rd cent. are concerned, there would be no sufficient ground for placing it in a different category from those whose position was already fully assured. Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement, Hippolytus, all regarded it as a genuine work of the Apostle John, and Can. Mur. includes it as such. It continued, moreover, always to be recognized as Scripture in the Western Church, and on the whole this seems to have been the view throughout of the Church of Alexandria. We know, however, that at a later time it was not received as canonical in Syria and Asia Minor, and this so generally as to point to a long-standing difference of usage in those regions, though from what cause the difference arose we do not know. In this respect chiefly the testimony to it differs from that to the writings called 'acknowledged.'

Of two other of the writings which for a time were not reckoned in this class, it may likewise be said that they deserve to be so on the evidence afforded at the period now under review, considered by itself—2 Jn and Ep. of Jude.

Irenæus twice cites words from the former as John's (adv. Hær. i. 9. 3; iii. 17. 8), though in one case he seems to confuse the 2nd with the 1st Ep. The Mur. Can. recognizes 2 Epps. of John, and Clem. Al. (Strom. ii. 66) speaks of John's 'greater Ep.,' plainly implying that he knows of at least one other. It may seem strange to us that if the 2nd Ep. was acknowledged, the 3rd, which bears marks of the same authorship, should not have been so with equal distinctness. But the address of the former to 'the Elect Lady,' which may have been understood as a symbolical name for the Church, may account for this. We may gather from the language of Mur. Can. respecting the number of the Churches to which St. Paul's Epp. are written, etc., that 'catholicity' of address was a consideration in determining the authority to be attributed to writings by the Church, as well as apostolicity of origin.

The Ep. of Jude is not quoted by Irenæus, but this may be accidental. It is included in Can. Mur., and Clement commented on it. Tertullian also quotes it as apostolic.

We turn now to the interesting subject of the light in which the Ep. to the Hebrews was regarded. The signs of its use in Clem. Rom. have been referred to; but its position remained ambiguous owing to uncertainty as to its authorship. This is strikingly illustrated by Tertullian's language (de Pudicitia. 20). He attributes it to Barnabas, a companion of apostles, and one who had even borne in a certain sense the title of an apostle. Yet, evidently, even while Tertullian sets a high value upon the Epistle, he does not esteem it in the way that he would have done if he had believed it to be by St. Paul himself. Similar considerations, no doubt, influenced others. They read, and were willing to profit by, the Epistle, but shrank from claiming for it full apostolic authority. Irenæus nowhere appeals to it as Scripture in any writing of his which we possess, and it is not included in the Muratorian list. On the other hand, it would seem to have been very highly appreciated at Alexandria, and Clement of Alexandria asserted its Pauline authorship, while he explained the differences between its style and that of his other Epp., and its similarity to that of the Acts, by conjecturing that Luke translated it (ap. Euseb. HE vi. 14).

Of use of the Ep. of James—if we are to put aside, as it appears we should (see Westcott, Canon, pp. 362, 363), a statement of Cassiodorus in regard to Clem. Alex.'s lost Hypotyposes—there is no sign till the next period, beyond those parallelisms in Hermas which have been noticed. There are also no clear traces of 2 Peter or 3 John.

(b) We pass to writings which were for a time candidates, so to speak, for admission, but which were ultimately rejected. With the Apocalpyse of John the Mur. Can. couples that of Peter, though it adds in respect to the latter that some Christians were against having it 'read in church.' In other quarters it would seem the Ep. of Clem. Rom., the Pastor of Hermas, and the Ep. of Barnabas were read as works of special authority, on the ground, which was true in the case of the first-named only, that they were by companions or personal disciples of the apostles. At some time, also, the 2nd Ep. of Clem. (so called) was joined with the 1st in the same honour.

But it is difficult to determine exactly the relation of these writings to the Canon, from our want of knowledge as to the principles on which the practice of public reading in the assemblies was regulated. Undoubtedly, the selection of the books which might be read publicly played a part in the formation of the Canon, and in impressing the idea of the sacredness and authority of the books so used upon the minds of Christians. But it is not to be supposed that the significance of the public reading was the same, or that the rules for it were conceived in the same spirit, everywhere and always (see art. CANON in vol. i. p. 349[b]). From the mere fact, therefore, that a particular work appears to have been read in certain Churches, it is not safe to infer that even in these Churches it was regarded as possessing the fullest inspired authority.

B. SECOND PERIOD, c. A.D. 220–323.—The most important fact of this period is the work and the influence of Origen. Their results cannot be measured with precision; but the effect of his labours—alike as a thinker bent on the comprehensive ascertainment of Christian truth and as a textual critic of, and commentator and homilist upon, Holy Scripture, coupled as they were with a wide knowledge of the practice of different parts of the Church—must necessarily have been great in promoting the settlement of the Canon of NT. And his teaching was perpetuated and spread by many scholars, e.g. by his successors in the school of Alexandria, by Pamphilus, who preserved it at Cæsarea, and Gregory Thaumaturgus, who carried it into the heart of Asia Minor.

The testimony of Origen confirms the evidence of the preceding period—within which, indeed, half his life fell (A.D. 186–253)—as to the writings about which there was practically universal agreement in the Greek-speaking and Latin-speaking Church. He accepts all that have been enumerated under this head, on the authority of the Church's tradition, and also the Apocalypse (Eus. HE vi. 25).

Passing to the remaining writings of NT, we may first note as of special significance his position, which resembles that of Clement, in regard to the Ep. to the Hebrews. He points out the difference of style between it and the unquestioned writings of St. Paul, but adds that 'the thoughts are wonderful and not second to the acknowledged apostolic writings'; and he gives it as his own opinion that 'the thoughts are the apostle's, but the diction and composition that of some one who recorded from memory the apostle's teaching, and as it were illustrated with a brief commentary the sayings of his master' (ap. Eus. ib.). The history of the reception of this great Epistle shows strikingly what were the conditions which—it was held—must be satisfied in the case of a book included among the NT Scriptures. There must be apostolic authorship, or dependence upon apostolic teaching; and this was a point to be determined by tradition, which did not necessarily involve the employment of tests difficult to apply, such as that of inspiration. Nevertheless a test of authenticity was also found, consciously or unconsciously, in the harmony between the spirit of the books received as apostolic and that of the apostolic doctrine preserved in the Church. Doubts as to the authorship of Ep. to Heb. stood in the way for some time of the recognition of its inspiration. And it may be that if it had not come to be more closely associated with the name of St. Paul than facts warranted, it would never have fully ranked as Scripture. But, on the other hand, those who seem to have done most to secure this result, notably Clement and Origen, were profoundly impressed with its spiritual power and general agreement with St. Paul's teaching.

In Origen's writings we have the earliest references by name to Ep. of James (Comm. in Joan. t. xix. 6, etc.); he also quotes from Ep. of Jude (Comm. in Matt. x. 17, etc.) as if he himself received it, but alludes to the doubts existing in regard to both of them. It seems reasonable to suppose that the former of these Epp. was brought to the notice of Origen more particularly through his residence in Palestine. The conjecture that it had for long been treasured in Syria is confirmed by the fact that it was recognized as authentic and canonical at Antioch and in the Syriac-speaking Church, where 2 and 3 Jn and Jude, as well as the Apoc., were refused acknowledgment at the end of the 4th cent. Origen appears to have known the 2nd Ep. of Peter, but not to have regarded it or the two lesser Epp. of John as genuine.

The position of the Apocalypse in the 3rd cent. is illustrated by the attitude of one who belonged to the same school as Origen, and outlived him only by a few years, Dionysius, the eminent bishop of Alexandria (d. 265). He discussed the question of its authenticity, and declared himself unable to believe that it was by the Apostle John, the author of the Gospel, on account of its style; yet the cautiousness and reverence of his tone in speaking of the work is an indication of the high regard in which it was commonly held (ap. Eus. HE vii. 25).

Lastly, Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, when he has arrived nearly at the end of the Apostolic Age, makes important statements as to his own views and the views and practice of his contemporaries in respect to the apostolic writings (HE ii. 23. 25; iii. 3; 24. 17, 18; 25). These bring us to the close of our second period in the history of the Canon. For this work of Eusebius—which contains, indeed, most of the information that he supplies on this subject, though he lived to A D 340—terminates with, and seems to have been composed shortly after, the pacification of the empire under Constantine. In spite of some want of clearness in his language, he helps us greatly to realize the state of things prevailing. The uncertainty and disagreement which still continued concerning certain books perhaps impress us most. It is from Eusebius that we derive the familiar classification into 'acknowledged' (ὁμολογούμενα) and 'disputed' (ἀντιλεγόμενα) and 'spurious' (νόθα) books. Nevertheless it was a step towards the final decision of the questions at issue, that they should be thus definitely posed. And the notices bearing on the Canon of NT, gleaned from writers of generations earlier than his own, which according to promise he gives in the course of his history, are intended to contribute to the attainment of this object.

Eusebius nowhere includes works which have ultimately been accounted apocryphal or uninspired in his class of 'disputed' writings. These consist, according to his fullest passage on the subject (iii. 25), of the Epp. of James and Jude, 2 and 3 Jn, and 2 P, which, as we gather from ii. 23. 25, were already regarded in many Churches as forming together with 1 P and 1 Jn a collection of 7 Catholic Epistles. With the Apocalypse he deals somewhat curiously. He first enumerates it among the 'acknowledged' books, adding, 'if that should appear to be the right view' (εἰ φανείη—ambiguous like the Eng. trans. given), and then again refers to it among the 'spurious' with a similar saving clause. The mode of treatment adopted by him in this case is to be accounted for by the fact that those who did not admit the Johannine authorship for the most part desired its definite rejection on doctrinal grounds; whereas the claims of the Epp. above named to be regarded as apostolic were for the most part questioned simply on the ground of defect of evidence for their early and widespread use. On the other hand, Eusebius cannot bring himself to name the Ep. to Heb. anywhere except among the 'acknowledged' books, and as one of 14 Epp. of Paul. In so doing, he reflects, no doubt, the belief of the greater part of the Greek-speaking Church, in which he was most at home. At the same time, he allows that 'it is not fair to ignore the fact that some have rejected the Ep. to Heb., asserting that it is disputed by the Church of Rome as not being Paul's' (iii. 3).

With the exception of this statement, we know nothing of the Canon of the Church of Rome and the Churches dependent upon her, or of the Church of N. Africa, during the period under consideration.

C. CONCLUDING PERIOD.—In the age ushered in by the victory of Constantine, many causes were at work tending to fix the Canon. The Scriptures were endeared, and the difference between them and all other books was emphasized, by the recollection of the last persecution, in which their destruction had been made a principal aim; and zeal for them found exercise in the multiplication of fresh copies. Now, also, large volumes, comprising the entire Greek Bible, began probably to be made, such as those fifty magnificent ones which Constantine ordered Eusebius to have prepared at the expense of the royal treasury (Eus. Vit. Const. iv. 36). The Scriptures were thus vividly presented as a distinct whole, and the question of their limits was raised in a very practical manner. Further, the definition of the Church's creed led naturally to a fuller settlement of her Canon of Scripture. And thus, when the ties between the Latin-speaking Church and Athanasius had first been drawn closer through the conflict with Arianism, and when afterwards the conservatives of the East had embraced the Nicene faith, and East and West were united in common sympathies, the same Canon came in course of time to be received.

Lists of the NT Scriptures have come down to us from various parts of the 4th cent.; but, in spite of the many Councils that were held during this period, most of these lists rest on the authority of individual Fathers, though representing, no doubt, the faith and practice of the portions of the Church to which they belonged. The earliest Synodical decree on the subject which is of certain date and authenticity belongs to the close, almost, of the century. The Acts of the Synod of Laodicea, according to some MSS, contain a catalogue of the books of Scripture, but it is probably a later addition. The date of this Synod has also been matter of dispute, though it most likely took place A.D. 363 (see Westcott, Canon, p. 439 f.).

The Canon of Cyril of Jerusalem in his Catechetical lectures (c. A D. 340) corresponds with our own, with the single exception that he omits the Apocalypse (Catech. iv. 33). In the Canon given by Athanasius (Fest. Ep. 39, A.D. 367), we meet for the first time with one the same in every respect as our own. So, too, is that of Epiphanius (Hær. 76). Turning to the West, the list known as the Cheltenham Catalogue, which appears evidently to be of the 4th cent. and to belong to N. Africa, differs from Athanasius' in omitting the Ep. to Heb., but in that point only. In A.D. 397, however, the 3rd Council of Carthage, in its Canon on the subject of the Scriptures, includes this Ep., and thus gives the contents of NT as at present received; while Ambrose a little earlier is a witness for the Church of Milan, and Rufinus for that of Aquileia, to the same effect.

In Asia Minor, near the close of the 4th cent., the Apocalypse was not received. So we gather from the lists of the Council of Laodicea (Gregory Naz. Carm. i. § 1. 12, and Amphilochius, ad Seleucum [ap. Greg. Naz. ii. § 2. 8]). The latter appears, also, to allow the legitimacy of opposite views on the subject of 2 and 3 Jn, 2 P, and Jude.

The great Greek teachers of Antioch—Chrysostom, Theodore, and Theodoret—seem to have been of the number who did not receive, or who had doubts respecting, these Epp. as well as the Apocalypse, while they accepted Ep. to Heb. and Ep. of James. Their Canon would thus be the same as that of the Peshitta. In process of time, in spite of the influence which this version exercised, the Canon in use even in the more distant parts of the East appears to have become assimilated to a considerable degree to that of the rest of the Church (see, e.g., statements of Junilius in Westcott, p. 451).

The Canon was synodically determined for the Catholic Church of East and West by the Quinisext. Council, A.D. 691, which confirmed the decrees of 3rd Council of Carthage.

The Reformation of the 16th cent. made no change as to the books of NT received as Scripture, opinions of individuals, such as that of Luther in regard to Ep. of James, having met with no general assent. But it tended to throw more stress on the recognition of the inspiration of the sacred books, by comparison with the tradition of apostolic authority, which counted for most in their actual collection by the early Church.

LITERATURE.—J. S. Semler may be said to have given the first impulse to the free critical inquiries of modern times into the history of the Canon of NT, both by his writings in general and in particular by his Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Kanons, 1771. Among writers who in the early part of the present century sought to investigate the subject systematically in this spirit, C. A. Credner holds the foremost place; see his Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 1836, Beiträge zur Geschichte d. Kanons, 1847, and his Geschichte des NT Kanons, which was edited with notes by G. Volkmar, and published (1860) after Credner's death. Of the Tübingen school, the rise of which was contemporary with Credner's later life, it would not be too much to say that all their speculations and labours had a bearing on the subject of the Canon of NT. Aiming as they did at a complete reconstruction of Christian history, they subjected the books of NT and the remains generally of early Christian literature to a criticism which was comprehensive and penetrating, though seriously biassed. At the same time, their attack upon opinions commonly received stimulated fresh research on the part of those who were unable to accept their theories. It would be unsuitable to attempt here to enumerate even the principal writings in which during these controversies particular documents, portions of the evidence relating to the books of the NT, or the true conception of the early history of the Church, were discussed. As an important work, however, specifically on the Canon, we must not omit to mention Die Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften Neuen Testaments, by E. Reuss, a writer holding a middle position (1st ed. 1842, Eng. tr. from 5th revised and enlarged German edition, 1884, by E. L Houghton). The most eminent of the later members of the Tubingen school, A. Hilgenfeld, modified in some important respects the views before put forward; see esp his Historisch-kritische Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 1875. The views of this school have been represented in England in a comparatively moderate form by S. Davidson in his Introduction to the Study of the New Testament of 1868 (21882, 31894), and in their most extreme form in the work entitled Supernatural Religion (1st ed. 1874, complete ed. 1879). J. B. Lightfoot examined the latter work in a series of Essays (collected and repub. 1889).

The chief recent advances in the subject have been due to the colossal labours of J. B. Lightfoot in his works on Ignatius of Antioch (1885) and Clement of Rome (2nd ed., pub. 1890, shortly after his death), and of Th. Zahn in his Geschichte des Neutest. Kanons (1888), preceded by his Forschungen zur Geschichte des Neutest. Kanons, and the brilliant review of the actual state of knowledge in regard to early Christian documents by A. Harnack in his Chronologie der Altchristlichen Litteratur (vol. i. 1897), with which his brochure Das NT um das Jahr 200 (1889), a critique of the first part of Zahn's History of the Canon, may be compared. The last-named writer has made some important concessions to those who, like the two before mentioned, have defended the orthodox position, though he has approached the subject with different prepossessions from theirs. This approximation to a common judgment, at least on certain points, is a sign of solid progress. The weighing of the differences which still remain, with a view to taking account of whatever truth there is in the arguments urged on each side, may be suggested to the student as a path which promises further advance.

To turn to less voluminous works: Westcott's General Survey of the History of the Canon of the New Testament (1st ed. 1855, 7th ed. 1896) continues to be the most complete work on the subject, which is at the same time compendious. With it may be read Sanday on Inspiration (1893). The various Introductions to the NT deal with the subject: the treatment of it in B. Weiss' Manual of Introduction (1886, Eng. tr. 1887) may be specially recommended. V. H. STANTON.

NEZIAH (נְצִיחַ).—The name of a family of Nethinim, Ezr 2^{54} (B Νασούς, A Νεθιέ) = Neh 7^{56} (B'Ασειά, A Νεισειά); called in 1 Es 5^{32} Nasi (B Νασεί) or Nasith (so AV and RVm, following A Νασιθ).

NEZIB (נְצִיב; B Νασείβ, A Νεσίβ, Luc. Νεσείβ).—A town in the Shephēlah of Judah, noticed next to Keilah, Jos 15^{43}. It is the present Beît Nusîb, mentioned in the Onomasticon (Lagarde, 283. 142) as 7 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis on the road to Hebron. It lies to the south of Keilah.

LITERATURE.—SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.; Robinson, *BRP*² ii. 17, 54, 221; Buhl, GAP 198; Guérin, Judée, iii. 348 ff. All these accept of the above identification, against which, however, Dillm. (Jos. ad loc.) argues. C. R. CONDER.

NIBHAZ (נִבְחַז, also in some MSS נִבְחָז and נִבְחָז; B 'Εβλαζέρ, A 'Αβαζὲρ καὶ Ναιβάς [a doublet], Luc. 'Εβλαιέζερ).—An idol of the Avvites, which they worshipped with Tartak, and introduced into Samaria, whither they had been transported by the Assyrian king Sargon (2 K 17^{31}). To all appearance, the Hebrew text is corrupt, Nibhaz being for some such form as Abahaz or Abahazer, as the Greek variants Ἀβααζέρ, Ναιβάς, and Ἐβλαζέρ show (compare Nimrod for Amaruduk and Nisroch for Aśur or Aśuraku), and any identification of this deity under the circumstances is at present hopeless.

NIBSHAN (נִבְשָׁן; B Ναφλαζών, A Νεβσάν).—A city in the desert (קִדְמַר) of Judah, noticed next to the City of Salt, Jos 15[62]. The name has not been recovered. Wellhausen (Proleg. 344) proposes to emend to Kibshan (כִּבְשָׁן 'the kiln'; cf. Gn 19[28]).

C. R. CONDER.

NICANOR (Νικάνωρ), the son of Patroclus (2 Mac 8[9]), a general of Antiochus Epiphanes, and one of the king's 'friends' (1 Mac 3[38]). In B.C. 166 Nicanor, together with Gorgias and Ptolemy the son of Dorymenes, was sent by the chancellor Lysias at the head of a large army to crush the rebellion in Palestine. Nicanor, who occupies the chief place in the narrative of 2 Mac, was probably the commander-in-chief of the expedition, while Gorgias, who appears more prominently in 1 Mac, led the army in the field. The invading forces took up their position at Emmaus, where they were defeated by Judas Maccabæus in a night attack, during the absence of Gorgias, and the Syrian commanders fled into the Philistine territory (1 Mac 3[38-41] 4[1-25], 2 Mac 8). The statement that Nicanor escaped to Antioch in disguise is doubtless a rhetorical exaggeration (2 Mac 8[34-36]). After the death of Antiochus V. and Lysias, Nicanor, who stood in high favour with Demetrius, and whose hatred for the Jews was well known (1 Mac 7[26]), was appointed governor of Judæa (2 Mac 14[12]), and sent there with a large army. At first he attempted to parley with Judas, hoping to get possession of his person, but his treacherous design was discovered, and a battle took place at Capharsalama (site uncertain), in which Nicanor lost 500 men (1 Mac 7[31f.]). The result of the engagement was probably indecisive; Josephus, who usually follows 1 Mac, asserts that Judas was defeated (Ant. XII. x. 4). A less probable account of these events is given in 2 Mac 14[12-30]. There we are told that Simon, the brother of Judas, received a check at the hands of the invaders, but that afterwards Nicanor made friends with Judas; Alcimus complained to the king, who sent peremptory orders to his general to seize the Jewish leader; but Judas, perceiving the alteration in Nicanor's attitude towards him, withdrew to a place of safety. After the battle at Capharsalama, Nicanor fell back on Jerusalem, and greeted the Jewish priests (who came to meet him peaceably) with threats of vengeance unless they delivered Judas and his army into his hand (1 Mac 7[33-38], 2 Mac 14[31-36]). He then returned to Beth-horon, where he met with reinforcements, while Judas encamped opposite to him at Adasa. The battle took place on the 13th of Adar, B.C. 161, and ended in the complete rout of the Syrians. Nicanor himself was among the first to fall. His body was found on the battlefield, and his head and right arm were cut off and exposed on the citadel of Jerusalem, while the day of the victory was commemorated annually as a festival under the name of 'Nicanor's day' (1 Mac 7[39-50], 2 Mac 15, cf. Meg. Taan. xii. 30).

NICANOR (Νικάνωρ).—One of the 'seven' chosen to relieve the apostles of their more secular duties (Ac 6[5]). The name is Greek, and not uncommon. For later legends, which are valueless, see Baronius, Annales, i. 34. cccxix.

A. C. HEADLAM.

NICODEMUS (Νικόδημος). — The 'ruler of the Jews' who came to Jesus by night. The name Nicodemus is found in Josephus (Ant. XIV. iii. 2) as that of an ambassador from Aristobulus to Pompey, and is plainly a Greek name which was borrowed by the Jews. We have it in the form נקדימן in the Talmud (Taanith 20. 1), where the name is derived from an incident in the life of one Bunai, commonly called Nicodemus ben Gorion (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Jn 3[1]). This person has been identified with the Nicodemus of Jn 3. But Bunai lived until the destruction of Jerusalem, and it would seem from Jn 3[4] that the inquirer who came to Jesus was then an old man (γέρων), so that for this reason, as well as for others, it would be precarious to identify the two.

Nicodemus is not mentioned by any evangelist save St. John; and attempts have been made to represent him as a typical character invented to serve a literary purpose by the author of the Fourth Gospel. Again, it has been suggested (see Schenkel's Bib.-Lex. s.v. 'Nikodemus') that he is to be identified with Joseph of Arimathæa, and that John has drawn on Synoptic material for his description of Nicodemus; cf. Mt 27[57], Mk 15[43], Lk 23[50] with the notices of Nicodemus in Jn 3[1-21] 7[50] 19[39] (see JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA). It is not necessary to suppose any such literary artifices; there are, as might be expected, many points of likeness between Nicodemus and Joseph, as men occupying a somewhat similar position in society; but there is no good reason for refusing to take the episodes about Nicodemus recorded in Jn as historical.

Nicodemus is represented as a Pharisee (Jn 3[1]) and member of the Sanhedrin (ib. 7[50]), probably a rich man (19[39]), who came to Jesus at Jerusalem secretly and by night. The various notices of him suggest that although he became a faithful disciple he was a timid man, who dreaded hostile criticism. When the Pharisees would have arrested Jesus, Nicodemus puts in the cautious plea, 'Doth our law judge a man except it first hear from himself what he doeth?' (Jn 7[51]). He shelters his defence behind a recognized principle of law, and, like most half-hearted advocates, he is treated with scant respect. So again at Jn 19[38] it is Joseph of Arimathæa who ventures to ask Pilate for the body of Jesus, Nicodemus being ready to aid him in the work of entombment, although he does not take the initiative.

This timidity was characteristic, and seems to have been intellectual no less than physical. All through the conversation in Jn 3[1-21] (which we take to be historical, although probably rehandled and condensed by the evangelist) his questionings are cautious, and he does not commit himself far. He begins by a half-patronizing recognition of the claims of Jesus to a divine mission, as attested by the signs of which he had heard. This is cut short at once by the startling words, 'Except a man be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God' (cf. Mk 10[17] for the question which was in the mind of the inquirer). Nicodemus answers that such new birth is inconceivable, and is bidden to remember that although 'that which is born of the flesh is flesh,' yet also that 'that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.' A man is not the mere victim of his pedigree and circumstances; the grace of the Spirit is not distributed by the law of heredity; it is like the wind, though not in its caprice yet in its irreducibility to rules which can be foreseen (Jn 3[8]). Nicodemus is dismayed by so bold a figure, and asks 'How can these things be?' And then the tone of the Christ seems to change to stern rebuke: 'Art thou the teacher of Israel, and understandest not these things?' He who believes not the things of earth, the everyday facts which are patent to observation if he but chooses to open his eyes to them, is not likely to believe 'heavenly things.' The last words of Jesus to Nicodemus may possibly have a side reference to the secrecy of his visit

'He that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest that they have been wrought in God' (Jn 3^{21}). Nicodemus disappears from the NT at Jn 19^{40}; but in an apocryphal narrative of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ, which has come down to us from very early times in different forms (Greek, Latin, Coptic, not to speak of Irish and other secondary versions), and variously entitled the Gospel of Nicodemus or the Acts of Pilate, his history is carried further. See next article.

Other legends represent Nicodemus as having being baptized by Peter and John, and as being deprived of his office and banished from Jerusalem through the hostility of the Jews. Gamaliel is described as burying him near St. Stephen, and a later story tells of the finding of the bodies of Stephen, Gamaliel, and Nicodemus in a common tomb (3rd August 415, according to the Western Martyrologies). Further Christian legends regarding Nicodemus, particularly his alleged activity as a sculptor, are discussed by von Dobschütz in his Christusbilder ('Texte u. Untersuch.' 1899, pp. 280-292). NICODEMUS, GOSPEL OF.—i. NAME.—Evangelium Nicodemi is a title which meets us for the first time in the 13th cent. (Vincentius Bellovacensis, Spec. hist. viii. 40 ff. [c. 1264], Jacobus de Voragine, Legenda aurea, 54, ed. Graesse, p. 241 [c. 1275]), and is in general use in manuscripts of the 15th cent. It is there employed to designate an apocryphal writing which in the older manuscripts is entitled ὑπομνήματα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (πραχθέντα ἐπὶ Ποντίου Πιλάτου, or the like), Gesta Salvatoris (quæ invenit Theodosius Magnus imperator in Jerusalem in prætorio Pontii Pilati in codicibus publicis). From Epiphanius (Hær. l. 1) we obtain, as an older abbreviation of this title, the name Ἄκτα Πιλάτου, and from Greg. Turon. (Hist. Franc. i. 21, 24) the name Gesta Pilati, which, however, in the light of the texts that have come down to us, cannot be intended in the sense that Pilate was the author. All that is attributed to Pilate is the preservation of the work in the archives of the prætorium. On the contrary, the author of the alleged Hebrew original is named from the first as Nicodemus, the translator as Ananias (Aeneas) Protektor.

Besides the above, we find in the manuscripts numerous other titles, such as ὑπόμνημα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ εἰς τὴν ἀνάκρισιν αὐτοῦ συγγραφεῖσα παρὰ τοῦ ἁγίου Ἰωάννου τοῦ θεολόγου; Passio (et resurrectio) Jesu Christi; Acta passionis; Historia (relatio) de passione; as well as Evangelium Nazarænorum.

ii. CONTENTS.—The writing gives a detailed account of the trial of Jesus before Pilate (chs. 1–11, called below 1^a), and of the action of the Sanhedrin subsequent to His death, which leads to the certain proof of His Resurrection and Ascension (chs. 12–16, called below 1^b). To this is added by way of appendix an account by two men who had been raised from the dead, Charinus and Leucius, of the descensus ad inferos of Jesus (chs. 17–27, called below 2).

1^a. After an indication of the date, in the form of an expansion of Lk 3^1, the narrative opens with Christ being brought before Pilate on the charges of claiming the title of king, breaking the Sabbath, and abrogating the ancestral law of Israel. The reverence shown to the Lord by Pilate's footman, to which the Jews take exception, is supported by the miracle of the standard lowering itself before Jesus (ch. 1). The proceedings turn, in the first instance, upon the reproach of illegitimacy, which is refuted by twelve witnesses of the marriage of Mary with Joseph (ch. 2). After a paraphrase of Jn 18^{30-38} (chs. 3. 4), Nicodemus (ch. 5; cf Jn 7^{50}) and various persons healed by Jesus (ch. 6), among them Veronica, the woman with the issue of blood (ch. 7), come forward on behalf of Jesus. After all Pilate's endeavours to deliver Jesus and to change the sentiments of the Jews, including a fierce invective against their ingratitude, have proved in vain (chs. 8. 9), Pilate washes his hands in innocence and passes sentence of crucifixion between the two malefactors, Dysmas and Gestas (ch. 10). In the account of the crucifixion, which in the main follows Lk 23, the only noteworthy points are Pilate's contrition, when the centurion makes his report, and the incorrigibility of the Jews, who pronounce the darkening of the sun a natural phenomenon (ch. 11).

1^b. Joseph of Arimathæa's care for the burial of Jesus constitutes the transition to the second division: the Jews persecute him and Nicodemus and the others who had given evidence in favour of Jesus. Joseph is put in close custody, but after the Sabbath he is not to be found, in spite of the sealed door (ch. 12). At the same time Pilate's soldiers bring news of the empty tomb, without, indeed, finding their story credited by the Sanhedrin (ch. 13). Scarcely is this testimony silenced by bribery, when three men of Galilee appear, the priest Phinehas, the rabbi Addas, and the Levite Aggai, who had been witnesses of the ascension of Jesus on Mt. Maiech (Mamilch). With injunctions of silence they are sent back with all speed to Galilee (ch. 14). But upon the proposal of Nicodemus, and after the example of Elisha, who allowed Elijah to be sought for (2 K 2^{15-18}), a general search is instituted, which lasted for three days, and, although abortive as far as Jesus was concerned, led to the discovery of Joseph of Arimathæa, who, being then brought in state to Jerusalem, relates in what wondrous wise Jesus in person had freed him from prison (ch. 15). Rabbi Levi recalls the words of the aged Symeon about the child Jesus (Lk 2^{34}); the three men of Galilee, who are once more introduced, confirm on oath their former statements; Annas and Caiaphas seek in vain to set up a distinction between the translation of Enoch, Moses, and Elijah, and the disappearance of Jesus.

2. On Joseph's proposal there are now brought forward two men, Charinus and Leucius, sons of that aged Symeon, who had died but had been raised again, and have their dwelling-place at Arimathæa. Being adjured by the Sanhedrin to tell their story, they describe, each for himself, the occurrences in the underworld at the death of Jesus (ch. 17): how a light suddenly illuminating the darkness filled all the fathers with exultation, Isaiah repeated Is 9^1, Symeon Lk $2^{30ff.}$, John the Baptist Mt 2^1, Jn 1^{29} (ch. 18); Adam's son Seth told of the promise made to him at the gate of paradise (ch. 19); then appeared Satan to announce to Hades (personified) the arrival of a new august captive; but Hades grew pale at the thought that this is the same Jesus who had just wrested Lazarus from her grasp (ch. 20); she sought to bar her doors while the fathers recited Messianic passages (Ps 106^{16}, Is 26^{19}, Hos 13^{14}); then resounded twice over Ps 23^9, and, without Hades being able to prevent it, the Lord appeared in glory (ch. 21), and at her woeful cries laid hold upon Satan and gave him over to Hades, who then vented her fury upon this deviser of mischief (ch. 23); meanwhile the Lord, who had been joyfully greeted by the fathers, set up the cross as the symbol of triumph, and amid the songs of the redeemed ascended with them from the underworld (ch. 24); the archangel Michael then conducted them to paradise, where they met first Enoch and Elijah (ch. 25), and then the penitent robber (ch. 26). Thus far the narrative of the two risen ones, who make their deposition—one of them to Annas, Caiaphas, and Gamaliel, the other to Nicodemus and Joseph—and then suddenly vanish. The two statements as written down agree word for word, the Jews are shaken in their convictions, Joseph and Nicodemus report everything to Pilate, who causes the narrative to be incorporated in the Acts of his prætorium (ch. 27).

iii. VERSIONS AND MANUSCRIPTS.—The writing is extant (a) in a Greek text (only chs. 1–16), represented by some 12 MSS of 12th–15th cent., of which Par. gr. 770 (C) may be counted the best; some, like Par. gr. 929 (E) and still more Par. gr. 1021 (D), contain complete transformations and expansions, partly upon the lines of the canonical Gospels, and partly upon those of other apocrypha. Mon. gr. 192 (A), very much overrated by Tischendorf, is re-touched as to style. The so-called Anaphora (et Paradosis) Pilati as well as the so-called Narratio Josephi are frequently found appended to the Evang. Nicodemi.

(b) Nearest to the above text stands a Coptic version, edited by Fr. Rossi after a Turin papyrus manuscript, and made known by Tischendorf in a Latin translation by Peyron. This version is supposed to belong to the 5th cent.

(c, d) Then come two Armenian versions published by Conybeare after 3 MSS, in a Greek (Latin) rendering; d being a revision of c with the aid of Greek texts.

(e) Of far more importance is a Latin version diffused in numerous MSS (in Bernard's Bibl. Angliæ et Hiberniæ alone more than 50 may be counted), and belonging perhaps to the 5th or 6th cent. The oldest MS is a palimpsest, Vind. pal. lat. 565, from the 7th cent., completely deciphered and soon to be edited by Dr. Göldlin of Tiefenau; then come Mus. Brit. Royal 5 E xiii, belonging to the 8th cent., and a large number of MSS from the 9th, 10th, and 11th cents. Of those hitherto used, the purest text is exhibited by Einsiedl. 169 (called D^b by Tischendorf), of the 9th or 10th cent. Here, too, we find many different recensions, the most characteristic instance of which, extending back to the 11th cent. and represented, inter al., by the ed. Lips. of 1516, has, in addition, a chronology from Adam to Christ, based upon secret Jewish tradition (ch. 28). A very frequent appendage is the letter of Pilate to the emperor Claudius (ch. 29). In one class of MSS the work is continued by the so-called Cura sanitatis Tiberii, the oldest text of the Veronica legend (von Dobschütz, Christusbilder, 157–203), in another by the so-called Vindicta Salvatoris, a narrative of the destruction of Jerusalem (Tischendorf, Evang. apocr.[2] 471–486). This Latin text in course of time gained in the West almost canonical authority, was co-ordinated with the other Gospels as an equally valuable source for the history of the Passion, and was thus taken up, e.g., by Vincentius Bellovacensis almost entire into his Speculum historiale. On it are dependent all the numerous translations and recensions in prose and in verse which are met with in Western languages (cf. R. Wülcker, Das Evangel. Nicodemi in der abendländ. Litteratur, 1872). This is true also, as it appears, of the Slavonic texts (cf. M. Ssperanskij, 'The Slav. apocr. Gospels' in Proc. of the viii archæol. Congress at Moscow, 1890, ii, Moscow, 1895 [Russ.]). Nay, even a late Byzantine recension (cf. g) is probably influenced by the above-named Latin text.

(f) Beside this Latin 'Vulgate,' which, by the way, does not show in its Bible text any influence from the side of Jerome, stands a second Latin version, represented by Tischendorf's manuscripts ABC and some others, which Tischendorf in utterly uncritical fashion has mixed up with the former in chs. 1–16. It is distinguished from the first-named Latin version both by the style of its translation and by the underlying Greek text, to which it adheres closely (most nearly allied are codd. CGI). It sometimes utilizes the text of Jerome. The form of the Descensus (see 2, above) is here manifestly more recent than in e (above).

(g) The latest text, very improperly placed alongside of a (above), is a Byzantine recension, which, extant in numerous MSS of 15th–17th cent., still constitutes part of the religious literature of the Gr. Church, and as such has sometimes been printed, e.g., under the title: Ἱστορία ἀκριβὴς περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὴν σταύρωσιν καὶ ἀνάστασιν τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τελεσθέντων (μετὰ εἰκόνων) συγγραφεῖσα τὸ πρῶτον ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίου τινὸς Αἰνέα, συγχρόνου τοῦ Κυρίου, μεταφρασθεῖσα μὲν εἰς τὴν Λατινίδα γλῶσσαν ὑπὸ Νικοδήμου Τοπάρχου τοῦ ἐκ Ῥώμης, μετενεχθεῖσα δ' εἰς τὴν Ἑλληνικὴν ὑπὸ Ἀβερκίου ἱερομονάχου Ἁγιορείτου, Athens, 1889. The earlier editors, Thilo and Tischendorf, were led to their overestimate of this text by the circumstance that it is the only one that contains the Descensus (chs. 17–27) in Greek; but the latter is in a form decidedly later than either of the two Latin versions. The original Greek text, answering to the Latin e (above), emerges still from the Homilies of Eusebius of Alexandria (6th cent.). Cf. Augusti, Eusebii Emeseni quæ supersunt opusc. Græca, 1829; Thilo, Ueber die Schriften des Eusebius von Alexandrien, 1832; Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. 1.

The Latin text was the first to be printed, and that during the 15th and 16th cents. at various presses, which only to a partial extent stood in relation to one another (see Hain, Repert. bibl., Nos. 11749, 11750, 11751, Leipzig 1516, Venice 1522, Antwerp 1538; Herold's and Grynæus' Orthodoxographa, Basel 1555, 1569; J. A. Fabricius, Cod. apocr. NT[2], 1719, i. 238–300 and oft.). Frequently printed also is a German translation, agreeing with the Leipzig edition of 1516 (Hain, No. 11751 and oft., Marburg 1555, 1561, 1568), and another German translation of the 17th cent., e.g. Hamburg [c. 1720]. An Anglo-Saxon text was issued by Ed. Thwaites, Oxford, 1698.

The Greek text was first published by A. Birch, Auctarium codicis apocr. i., Havniæ 1804; better, J. C. Thilo, Codex apocr. NT, i., 1832 (Gr.-Lat., with an extremely valuable and learned commentary; reproduced, without the latter, by Giles, Codex apocr. NT, London 1852, i. 150–219). Fuller materials have been drawn from the MSS by Tischendorf (Evangelia apocr., [1] 1853, [2] 1876), but are so uncritically used that one does better to adhere to Thilo's text. A new critical edition is in course of preparation by the present writer.

iv. DATE.—Relation to the ancient 'Acta Pilati.'—All known texts of Evangel. Nicod., if one may trust the note as to its discovery, which is given in the form of a prologue, go back to a work dating from the time of Theodosius II. (425).

Where the prologue is wanting, this is due to subsequent rejection of it, as, for instance, in the majority of Latin MSS. which have still preserved in the title the reminiscence of Theodosius.

This work must, however, have been only a revision, for as early as 376 Epiphanius (Hær. l. 1, cf. Pseudo-Chrysos. in Pascha hom. vii. 2, ed. Montfaucon, viii. Spuria 277 d) presupposes the existence of a text similar to what we possess.

According to Lipsius, the older recension differed from the later in wanting not only the prologue but also chs. 17–27 (2 above), and perhaps also chs. 12–16 (1^b above), but this cannot be proved; the omission of 2 in a b c d indicates merely that their common archetype was shortened as compared with the text of 425. That some MSS of g mark a section at ch. 12, that from this point e and f more clearly part company, that 1^a attaches itself more closely to the canonical tradition, whereas 1^b like 2 gives a freer rein to fancy,—all this finds its explanation in the nature of the subject.

Eusebius, when in the year 325 he wrote his Hist. Ecclesiæ, was not yet acquainted with our writing. He mentions a report of Pilate to the emperor Tiberius (HE ii. 2, according to Tertull. Apol. 21), heathen Acts of Pilate, which, in derision of the Christians, were introduced by the emperor Maximin into the schools (ib. I. ix. 3, IX. v. 1, vii. 1: Πιλάτου καὶ τοῦ Σωτῆρος ἡμῶν ὑπομνήματα; the so-called Leo source [Leo Gramm., ed. Bonn. 83; Theod. Melit., ed. Tafel, 60; Ekloge Hist., ed. Cramer, Anecdot. Par. ii. 293; Georg. Mon., ed. Muralt 378] names as the forger a goëta, Theoteknos, in the time of Maximinian; cf. also Acta Probi, Tarachi et Andronici, 37, 'Acta Sanctorum' 11th Oct. v. 579). Eusebius knows nothing, however, of a Christian writing. In face of this, stringent proof is demanded for the existence of our writing prior to the time of Eusebius, more especially as much of it cannot have been composed in its present form before the 4th or 5th century.

This proof has been supposed to be found on one side in the mention of Ἄκτα Πιλάτου in Justin, Apol. i. 35, 48 (cf. 38), and of Acta Pilati in Tertull. Apol. 21. Upon this evidence, Tischendorf does not hesitate to attribute our texts to the first half of the 2nd cent., and thinks that valuable supplements to the canonical account of the trial of Jesus may be derived from them. In opposition to him, Scholten, Lipsius, Lightfoot (Apostolic Fathers, i. 55), and Harnack have argued that the existence attributed by Justin to such Acts of Pilate is only a hypothetical one. Tertullian either had before him a report of Pilate to the emperor similar to the letter preserved in the Acta Petri et Pauli, ed. Lipsius, i. 135 ff., 196 ff., and in Evang. Nicod. ch. 29 (so Lipsius), or, if one prefers to see in this letter an excerpt from Tertullian (so Harnack), Tertullian derived the notion of Acts of Pilate from the Apology of Justin, with which he was acquainted. As yet it has not been possible to prove the existence of any literary connexion whatever between what Justin and Tertullian, appealing to such Acts of Pilate, relate, and what is contained in the Gospel of Nicodemus.

The requisite proof appeared, on another side, to be supplied by the discovery of the Evangel. Petri, whose contents, in so far as they go beyond the canonical tradition, some, notably H. v. Schubert, would trace back to the ancient Acta Pilati, a merely hypothetical Grundschrift of our Evangel. Nicod.; whereas, on the other hand, Th. Zahn (Das Evangelium des Petrus, 1893) holds the later Pilate literature to be influenced by the Evangelium Petri. As a matter of fact, the parallels cited from the 'Pilate literature' by no means suffice to prove that the Evangel. Petri utilizes traditions that had been committed to writing, and that these coincided with the Grundschrift of our Evangel. Nicodemi. The points of contact find their complete explanation on the assumption that the fashion of embellishing and interpreting the history of the Passion, as this comes out clearly in Justin, was known both to the author of the Evangel. Petri in the 2nd, and of the Evangel. Nicod. in the 4th (5th) cent.

Finally, J. Rendel Harris has started the hypothesis that the Gospel of Nicodemus, as we possess it, is only the reproduction in prose of a version of the Gospel in Homeric centones, and that it was this last-named work, dating as early as the 2nd cent., that Justin and Tertullian had in view—an ingenious suggestion, which, however, is exposed to the serious objection that the existence of such Christian Homeric centones cannot be proved earlier than the 4th (5th) century.

v. SOURCES.—The author uses, first of all, our four canonical Gospels, for the history of whose text certain passages of the Evangel. Nicod. are not without importance. The question as to the source of the other matter has not yet been sufficiently investigated. In details concerning the trial of Jesus, such as the form of summons and that used in pronouncing sentence behind the velum, the usage of the 4th (5th) cent. is reflected; the scattered Hebrew words with their Greek rendering appended we should be disposed to trace back to Origen's Hexapla. In the miracle of the standard lowering itself before Jesus, Münter has seen a parallel to the mark of honour paid by Pompey to the philosopher Posidonius. The details invented in chs. 12–17 (1^b above) find their explanation for the most part in the motives of the Gospel narrative and the evidence of prophecy. Only for 2 does the external garb, to speak of nothing else, make it probable that we should have recourse to a written source, current presumably under the name of Leucius Charinus, the alleged author of various apocryphal Acts of the Apostles. The Gnostic character which has been claimed for the latter by Münter, Lipsius, v. Schubert, and others, is denied by Harnack. The point requires fresh examination in connexion with the whole history of the Descensus conceptions.

vi. PURPOSE.—The Gospel of Nicodemus in its present form is plainly meant only for religious edification. In this way wide currency was given to two apologetic ideas, which already in the canonical Gospels show themselves with increasing clearness: (1) that the heathen judge, being perfectly convinced, after examination, of the innocence of Jesus, was compelled only by the obstinate wickedness of the Jews to pass sentence of death; and (2) that the resurrection of Jesus was proved on undeniable evidence even to His enemies. If we may assume, with Lipsius, a polemical backward allusion to the heathen Acts of Pilate spoken of above, much is explained in the narrative of the trial, which otherwise appears unintelligible: e.g. how Pilate examines in full detail the reproach of illegitimacy brought against Jesus (in answer to which, not the miraculous birth but only the marriage of Mary with Joseph is established!), as well as the charge of Sabbath desecration, whereas the accusation of inciting to rebellion hardly obtains a hearing at all. Of Tendenz in the sense of any special ecclesiastical or theological shade of opinion one cannot speak; traces of Judaistic Christianity (Brunn, Münter, Hofmann) are wanting equally with echoes of Gnosticism. The writing is rather an interesting document of a general-Christian character, from which definite and sharply formulated theological notions are absent. From the point of view of the history of dogma it is an anomaly, whether one assigns it to the 2nd, the 4th, or the 5th cent. As an offset to this, however, it could be brought under the head of that species of narrative literature, composed for purposes of religious edification, which especially from the 4th cent. onwards obtained favour in Christian circles. The nearest parallel is supplied by the Acta Martyrum. As in these, so also in the Evangel. Nicod., a description of the judicial process occupies the foreground (1^a); the usual account of the tortures inflicted upon the martyrs is in this instance, owing to the peculiarity of the subject, replaced by the proofs of our Lord's resurrection (1^b); and, finally, the Descensus (2) corresponds to the miracles wrought by the martyrs after their death. An evangelical character in the sense of an equal authority with the canonical Gospels is certainly not claimed by the work itself; such a character was first imposed upon it by the uncritical search for legends in the 13th century.

vii. COMPOSITION AND INFLUENCE.—The composition of the first part (1^a and 1^b) is not particularly happy: the continual leading in and out of the accused, the accumulated testimonies by persons who had been healed, the twice-repeated entrance of the three men from Galilee, all go to show that the author lacked the art of moulding his material aright. On the other hand, the second part (2) is not only in itself well constructed, but it contains here and there—for instance, in the description of the conflict between Satan and Hades—passages of poetic value which have found their parallels in Milton and Klopstock. Here, too, the diction attains a higher level, whereas elsewhere the style is that of dry, at times almost wearisome, narrative, and the language, in imitation of the canonical Gospels, flows on in a series of short sentences without any attempt at a periodic structure. Yet, in spite of—or perhaps just because of—this readily intelligible kind of narration, our Gospel exercised from an early period onwards enormous influence. We have already spoken of its wide diffusion in manuscripts and the frequent use made of it in literature, especially subsequent to the 13th cent. The Passion plays of the 15th cent. show that the contents of the Gospel of Nicodemus had passed into the popular consciousness as an integral element of the Life of Jesus. Plastic art also has found its motives here: not only are we acquainted with two miniature series illustrating the Evangel. Nicod. in a Toledo and a Milan MS of the 13th cent., but already upon the sculptures (probably of the 6th cent.) of the Ciborium of St. Mark's at Venice, the so-called columnæ cochleatæ (Garrucci, Storia dell' arte crist. vi. tav. 497[2]), there is found a scene which formerly was wrongly taken to represent the scourging of Jesus, but is really nothing else than His being led before Pilate, as described in Evangel. Nicod., with the obeisance of the footman and the miracle of the standard. The influence which Ussoff alleges to have been exercised by our Gospel upon the miniatures of the Codex Rossannensis is certainly rightly questioned by Haseloff.

VON DOBSCHÜTZ.

NICOLAITANS (Νικολαΐται).—Twice mentioned in the NT (Rev 2[6. 15]) as a sect whose works were hated by the ascended Lord and by the Ephesian Church, but whose teaching was upheld by some professed Christians of Pergamum, and apparently tolerated by the Church there. Nicolaitan doctrine is associated with 'the teaching of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, (inducing them) to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication' (Rev 2[14]). As Nicolaitan teaching is said to be held 'similarly' (ὁμοίως), we may conclude that the Nicolaitans were a kindred antinomian sect, who abused the doctrine, emphasized by St. Paul, of Gentile liberty from the Mosaic Law. In defiance of that apostle's warnings (1 Co 6[12-20] 8[9. 10] 10[28]) * as well as of the decree of the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15[29]), they permitted participation in heathen feasts connected with idolatry and in the fornication which frequently accompanied such feasts. The Nicolaitans represent a more advanced and aggressive stage of antinomianism than that which was found in the Corinthian Church. They are organized into a sect, with a 'doctrine,' and stand in a nearer relationship to the 'false teachers' referred to in Jude [4. 11. 12], 2 P 2[1. 2. 14. 15], who 'turned the grace of God into lasciviousness,' 'denied even the Master' (probably through countenancing idolatry), and 'followed the way of Balaam,' 'running riotously in his error.'

It has been doubted by some writers whether any sect actually called Nicolaitans existed. The Bk. of Rev, it is argued, is allegorical, and Νικόλαος, 'conqueror of the people,' may be regarded as a symbolical name, the Greek equivalent of Balaam (בלעם), which is held to signify either 'destroyer of the people' (from עם and בלע) or 'lord of the people' (עם and בעל, contr. from בוּעל).* But, apart from the fact that the two names are not quite equivalent, and that the Balaamites and Nicolaitans, although associated, are not identified, the numerous early references to the sect and to its claim to have a real Nicolas as its founder (see next article), indicate that the writer of Rev describes heretics really so called. According to Irenæus, they lived 'lives of unrestrained indulgence,' teaching that 'adultery and eating things sacrificed to idols' are a matter of 'indifference' (adv. Hær. i. 26). Clement of Alex. speaks of their souls as 'buried in the mire of vice' (Strom. ii. 20). Tertullian stigmatizes them as destroying the happiness of sanctity in their maintenance of lust and luxury (adv. Marc. i. 29, cf. de Pudic. 19). In the Apost. Const. vi. 8, 'those falsely-called Nicolaitans' are characterized as 'impudent in uncleanness.' 'Ignatius' (longer recension) brands them as 'impure lovers of pleasure,' and as 'addicted to calumnious† speeches' (Trall. 11, Phil. 6). So far, we have merely an echo of what we read in Rev; but other early references indicate that, in addition to immorality, the Nicolaitans were tainted with incipient Gnosticism. Irenæus states (adv. Hær. iii. 11) that the Cerinthian doctrines of a Demiurge distinct from the Supreme God, and of a Doketic Incarnation, had already, before Cerinthus, been disseminated by the Nicolaitans, whom accordingly he describes as a 'fragment (ἀπόσπασμα) of the Gnosis falsely so-called.' Tertullian (de Præs. Hær. 33) writes of the Cainite Gnostics of his time as modern Nicolaitans.‡ Hippolytus also (Ref. Hær. vii. 24) and Philastrius (de Hær. 88) include the Nicolaitans among Gnostics.

For the relation between the Nicolaitans and Nicolas of Antioch, see art. NICOLAS. There appears to be no sufficient reason for rejecting the traditionary explanation of the connexion as supplied by Clem. of Alex. (without accepting all details). We know, from other instances, the anxiety of early heretics (e.g. the Basilidians and the Valentinians) to father their views upon some apostle or associate of the apostles. At the same time it is possible that a different Nicolas was the real founder of the sect, and was confused afterwards with the better-known 'deacon.' Cassian states (Collat. xviii. 16) that some in his time (A.D. 420) held that the founder was some other Nicolas; and in the Lives of the Prophets, Apostles, etc., ascribed (erroneously) to Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, in the end of the 3rd cent., Nicolas of Antioch is identified with a bishop Nicolas of Samaria who is said to have become a heretic in company with

* The supposition that the reference in Rev to the Nicolaitans embraces a covert attack on St. Paul or Paulinism (Baur, Renan, Volkmar, and others) is foreclosed by the apostle's own testimony, although it is possible that certain Nicolaitans professed to be his followers. St. Paul, while not condemning those who bought in the market, or partook of, at an ordinary friendly meal, food which might have been previously sacrificed to idols, is careful to disallow any such participation as would either involve the countenance of idolatry, or 'cast a stumbling-block' before any Christian brother (see Farrar, Early Days of Christianity, ii. 243 ff.).

* This view, originally hinted at by Cocceius (Cogit. in Ap.), was first enunciated by Heumann (Acta Erud. for 1712, p. 179), who adopts the interpretation 'destroyer,' and then by Vitringa (Anakr. Apoc.), who interprets Balaam as 'lord of the people.' So also Michaelis, Eichhorn, Ewald, Hengstenberg, Stier. Trench (Seven Churches, p. 78 f.), accepting the theory that the name Nicolaitans in Rev is symbolical, supposes that 'one of the innumerable branches of the Gnostic heresy, springing up at a later day, assumed this name which they found ready-made for them in the Apocalypse.' The Gnosticism of the Nicolaitans has been recently used by Voelter, who associates them with the Carpocratians, as an argument in favour of assigning the seven epistles in the Bk. of Rev to about A.D. 140 (Entst. d. Apok. pp. 44 f. 191); but the germs of Gnosticism existed admittedly in the Apostolic Age; and it is quite natural for writers of the 2nd and 3rd cents. to apply the name to heretics, who flourished before its adoption as a formal designation. The incipient Gnosticism of the Nicolaitans can be denied (as by McGiffert, Chr. in Ap. Age, p. 625) only on the assumption that Iren. Tert. and Hipp. simply inferred its existence from the immoral outcome of Nicolaitan doctrine.

† The Chronicon Paschale (Ol. 221) speaks of Simon, bishop of Jerus., as διαβληθείς by Nicolaitans, in A.D. 107.

‡ 'Sunt et nunc alii Nicolaitæ: Caiana hæresis dicitur.' This suggests that by A.D. 200 the N. had ceased to exist as a separate sect, and had been absorbed by other sects of Gnostics. The name was applied by the Synod of Piacenza (1095) to 'inconti nent' (including married) priests and deacons (Hefele, Conciliengesch. v. 194).

Simon Magus. Ps.-Doroth. (c. 6th cent.) is not a trustworthy authority; but the connexion with the 'father of Gnosticism' is suggestive; and since Nicolas of Antioch is nowhere else referred to as a bishop, or as associated with Samaria, the tradition may indicate the existence of another Nicolas, with whom the pseudo-Dorotheus confounded Nicolas of Antioch.*

NICOLAS (Νικόλαος, 'conqueror of the people').—A proselyte † (to Judaism) of Antioch; one of the seven men selected by the Christians of Jerusalem and appointed by the apostles to look after the 'daily ministration' to the poor (Ac 6[5]).‡ He is nowhere mentioned afterwards in the NT, and is first referred to elsewhere by Irenæus (adv. Hær. i. 26), who states that the Nicolaitans of Rev 2 were his followers. Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. vii. 24) declares more distinctly that Nicolas was a heretic, who 'departed from correct doctrine' and inculcated 'indifference of life.' Pseudo-Tertullian (adv. omn. Hær. 3, probably of 3rd cent.) charges him still more strongly with immoral teaching. On the other hand, in the longer Greek recension of the Ignatian Epistles, mention is twice made of those who are 'falsely called Nicolaitans' (Trall. 11, Phil. 6; cf. Ap. Const. vi. 8); suggesting that the Nicolaitans improperly claimed Nicolas as their founder. Eusebius (HE iii. 29) refers to this pretension in a connexion which implies that he regarded it as unfounded. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 4, quoted by Eus. l.c.) relates what would readily explain at once the claim of the Nicolaitans, the testimony of 'Ignatius' and Eusebius, and a probable misconception by Irenæus, Hippolytus, and other subsequent writers. Clement states that Nicolas had a beautiful wife, and that, on 'being reproached by the apostles for his jealousy, he conducted her into the midst of them, and gave her over (ἐπέτρεψεν)'—i.e. presumably, offered to do so—to any one who might wish to marry her.§ To this anecdote is appended a saying of Nicolas that 'one ought to abuse' or 'use hardly (παραχρᾶσθαι) the flesh.' Clement is careful, however, to state his own interpretation of that phrase as signifying not indulgence in but abstinence from fleshly lusts; and he adds that Nicolas himself lived a virtuous married life, and that his family also were chaste. The over-complacency of Nicolas regarding his wife is scarcely credible, and is perhaps a misrepresentation of some protest of N. against an imputation of self-indulgence; but the term παραχρᾶσθαι may well have been employed by him (although not very happily, owing to the ambiguity) in the sense of mortifying the flesh through rigid abstinence, and yet have been taken up by others (inclined towards Antinomianism) in the Gnostic sense of mortification through inordinate gratification. If, however, Nicolas became eventually a teacher of immoral heresy, the apostasy of the last-named among the Seven constitutes a striking parallel to that of the last-named among the Twelve. For the Literature see previous article. H. COWAN.

NICOPOLIS (Νικόπολις) is mentioned by St. Paul in writing to Titus as a place at which he intended to spend the winter, Tit 3[12]. Of the various cities named Nicopolis, it is nearly certain that Nicopolis in Epirus is meant. That was a city on the promontory which shuts in the gulf of Ambracia (now called Arta) on the north-west; facing the Nicopolitan promontory was that of Actium, shutting in the gulf on the south-west; about half a mile of sea separates the two. In September B.C. 31 Augustus lay encamped on the northern promontory, and Antony on the southern, and the decisive battle was fought in the adjacent waters. Augustus founded in honour of the victory a city on the spot where his land army had encamped on the night before the battle, and called his new foundation 'the city of victory.' The site is now deserted; and the mediæval city Prevesa has taken its place, about 5 miles south on the extreme southern point of the promontory, looking across to Actium. There was a temple of Apollo at Actium, overlooking the scene of the battle; and the sudden storm, which struck the faces of Antony's sailors and contributed not a little to his defeat, was attributed to the direct intervention of the god on the side of his favoured Augustus. Actium had been previously the more important site; but the victor now resolved to make a great city at Nicopolis. He concentrated there the population of many decaying Greek cities of Acarnania and Ætolia, gave the new city the rights and honours of a Roman colony, made it a leading member of the Amphictyonic Council, and instituted a quinquennial festival sacred to Apollo, with musical and athletic sports, and competition of ships and of chariots. This festival was placed on the same rank as the four great Greek games—the Olympian, Pythian, Isthmian, and Nemean; and must have attracted crowds to the city every fourth year. The circumstances connected with the foundation and peopling of Nicopolis are very fully discussed by Kuhn, Entstehung der Städte der Alten.

Nicopolis was thus the great centre for the west coast of Acarnania and Epirus, and was on that account selected by St. Paul for a residence of some duration, in the course of which he hoped to evangelize the entire province of Epirus and Acarnania: it is indeed not quite certain that that province, which existed in Trajan's reign, had been constituted in St. Paul's time; but the probability is that it had. The selection of Nicopolis as a mission centre proves that the apostle had arranged a methodical scheme of work in order to fill up the gap in his evangelization of the empire: he had founded churches on the eastern or Ægean side of the Epirote-Macedonian peninsula, but the western side was still a blank, and in this he now proposed to commence work.

The circumstances in which St. Paul formed that resolution and communicated it to Titus can only be guessed at. It is even uncertain whether he actually visited Nicopolis. According to the subscription added to the letter, he wrote from Nicopolis to Titus; but that is a late and untrustworthy

* In the Acta Apost. Apoc. of pseudo-Abdias (embodied in Fabric. Cod. Apoc. vol. i. p. 498 ff.), usually ascribed to the 6th cent., there is an account of another Nicolas, who after a life of profligacy is said to have been converted in old age by the Apostle Andrew; but, as he does not appear to have been a teacher, he could hardly have founded a sect.

† It does not follow (though it may be the case) that Nicolas was the only one of the seven who was not a Jew by birth. The designation, 'proselyte of Antioch,' may have been inserted owing to St. Luke's personal acquaintance with Nicolas, both being natives (if Eus., HE iii. 4, can be trusted) of that city.

‡ Epiph. (Hær. i. 20) and Ps.-Doroth. include N. among the 'Seventy' (Lk 10[1]); the latter adding that he became bishop of Samaria (see preceding article).

§ Epiph. (adv. Hær. i. 25), under the influence of monasticism, transfers to the Apostolic Age the later unscriptural disparagement of married life, and twists the record of Clement into a story of how Nicolas, 'following the counsels of perfection,' separated from his wife, but, 'being unable to persevere in his resolution, returned to her again, as a dog to his vomit, and then justified his conduct by licentious principles, which occasioned the foundation of the sect of the Nicolaitans.'

addition. The most natural (in fact, almost necessary) interpretation is that he wrote from some other place; he mentions his resolve to spend the winter 'there,' not 'here,' and the perfect tense κέκρικα shows that he is writing, not from the point of view of the recipient of the letter, but simply as he thinks and feels. A journey, therefore, lay before him to Nicopolis. Taking this in conjunction with the fact that some time later he, from Rome, wrote to Timothy and indicated that he had at no distant time passed through Miletus and Corinth (2 Ti 4^{20}), the conjecture is at least a tempting one that he had had in mind to go by Corinth to Nicopolis. Moreover, as the words of 2 Ti 4^{20} would hardly suggest that he had been arrested in Corinth, the probability is that he reached Nicopolis, and that he was arrested there while prosecuting his work, and sent to Rome to be tried there as a Roman citizen.

The reference to Nicopolis and to the supposed journey are necessarily connected with the disputed question of the authenticity and trustworthiness of the Pastoral Epistles. Those who deny that those Epistles can be accepted as a rational foundation on which to construct the history of St. Paul's life, will of course take no account of Nicopolis. But those who accept them as recording trustworthy historical statements must date them some years after the first Roman captivity, and conclude that St. Paul was acquitted on his first trial. Some of those even who deny the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles, admit, like Harnack, that they contain historical information. Then the earliest possible time when St. Paul could have been arrested for preaching Christianity would be after the outbreak of the Neronian persecution. The winter that he proposed to spend at Nicopolis, therefore, must be that of 64–65, or 65–66, or 66–67.

The later history of Nicopolis is short. After falling into decay, it was restored by Julian about 362; and afterwards it was captured by the Goths and destroyed, but again was restored by Justinian, as Procopius, de Aedif. iv. 2, describes. It is mentioned as the metropolis of Old Epirus by Hierocles about A.D. 530, and retained that position in the ecclesiastical organization; but a late mediæval list of cities that changed their names mentions Νικόπολις ἡ νῦν Πρέβεζα, implying that Prevesa had taken its place and dignity. There are many remains of the ancient city, on which the guide-books of Murray, Baedeker, etc., may be consulted.

NIGER (Νίγερ). — Among the prophets and teachers that were at Antioch when Barnabas and Paul were sent out on their first missionary journey, was 'Symeon, which is called Niger' (Ac 13^{1}). Niger was probably the Gentile name which he had assumed. The name is found as a Roman cognomen, and a certain Niger of Peræa is mentioned in Jos. BJ II. xix. 2. Nothing further is known about the Niger of Ac 13^{1}, and there do not appear to be even any legends.

NIGHT (לַיְלָה, לֵיל [the ending ה־ being prob. radical and not ה loc.—Oxf. Heb. Lex.], Aram. לֵילְיָא, νύξ). — Besides representing these properly equivalent Heb. and Gr. words, 'night' stands in AV once for חֶשְׁכָּה ('darkness'), Job 26^{10} (RV 'darkness'); thrice for נְשֶׁף ('twilight'), Is 5^{11} (RV 'night'), 21^{4} 59^{10} (RV 'twilight'); and four times for עֶרֶב ('evening'), Gn 49^{27} (RV 'even'), Lv 6^{20} (RV 'evening'), Job 7^{4} (RV 'night'), Ps 30^{5} (RV 'night,' RVm 'even'). לַיְלָה is tr^{d} 'night season,' Job 30^{17}, and לֵילוֹת 'night seasons,' Ps 16^{7}. The Aram. בּוּת ('to pass the night') occurs Dn 6^{18}, and in NT we have μεσονύκτιον ('midnight'), Mk 13^{35}, Lk 11^{5}, Ac 16^{25} 20^{7}; διανυκτερεύειν ('to continue all night'), Lk 6^{12}; νυχθήμερον ('a night and a day'), 2 Co 11^{25}. RV omits 'night' on textual grounds from four passages where the word appears in AV, viz. Mt 27^{64}, Mk 14^{27}, Jn 7^{50}, 2 P 3^{10}.

The simple conception of night as the period of darkness alternating with daylight is embodied in the first creation narrative (Gn $1^{4.5}$), which describes how the darkness (חֹשֶׁךְ) was divided by God from the light, and was called Night (לַיְלָה). Darkness and night are similarly identified in Ps 104^{20}, and night is a synonym for darkness in Am 5^{8}, Mic 3^{6}, Wis $17^{2.5.14.21}$. The regular succession of days and nights represents the permanent order of the universe (Gn 8^{22}, Jer $33^{20.25}$). As the daytime was assigned to the sun, so the night was assigned to the moon and the stars (Gn $1^{14.16.18}$, Ps 136^{9}, Jer 31^{35}). Night as a part of the creation is God's (Ps 74^{16}), and bears witness to His glory (Ps 19^{2}).

The following usages of 'night' in connexion with 'day' are noteworthy. (a) Time is measured in terms of both. Thus we find 'three days and three nights,' 1 S 30^{12}, Jon 1^{17}, Mt 12^{40}; 'seven days and seven nights,' Job 2^{13}; 'forty days and forty nights,' Gn $7^{4.12}$ (the flood), Ex 24^{18} etc. (Moses on Mt. Sinai), 1 K 19^{8} (Elijah at Horeb), Mt 4^{2} (Christ's temptation). (b) 'Day and night' or 'night and day' expresses the continuousness of an action or condition either during a definite time (Lv 8^{35}, Est 4^{16}, Ac 20^{31}) or indefinitely, as of work (1 Th 2^{9}, 2 Th 3^{8}); of grief and trouble (Ps 32^{4} 42^{3}, Jer 9^{1} 14^{17}, La 2^{18}); of prayer (Ps 88^{1}, 2 Mac 13^{10}, Lk 2^{37}, 1 Th 3^{10}, 1 Ti 5^{5}, 2 Ti 1^{3}); of meditation in the law (Jos 1^{8}, Ps 1^{2}); of God's service (Jth 11^{17}, Ac 26^{7}). In Rev 20^{10} 'day and night' is followed by 'for ever and ever.' In Mk 4^{27} 'night and day' has the special sense of 'day after day,' 'as time goes on.' (c) 'All day and all night' is used of circumstances that are exceptionally prolonged, as in Ex 10^{13} (an east wind), Nu 11^{32} (the gathering of quails), 1 S 19^{24} (Saul's ecstasy), 28^{20} (Saul's fast), 1 Mac 5^{50} (the assault on Ephron).

Night is the natural time for daily work to cease (Jn 9^{4}), and for rest and sleep (Sir 40^{5}, 1 Th 5^{7}). Wakefulness at night is abnormal (Est 6^{1}), and is usually due to sickness or to painful excitement (Job $7^{3.4}$ 30^{17}, Ec 2^{23} 8^{16}). It is at night that excessive grief finds vent (Ps 6^{6} 30^{5}, La 1^{2}, To 10^{7}). On the other hand, not only do wild beasts roam at night (Ps 104^{20}), but some men are called to night duties, as the priests in the temple (Ps 134^{1}), the city watchmen (Is 21^{8}), shepherds (Lk 2^{8}), fishermen (Lk 5^{5}, Jn 21^{3}). The diligence of the virtuous woman is shown by her working at night (Pr $31^{15.18}$).

Night is also the season of dreams and divine communications. Dreams are called 'visions of the night,' and appear in Scripture not only as significant of the future (Gn 40^{5} etc.), but also as direct means of divine revelation. God speaks in a dream by night to Abimelech (Gn 20^{3}), to Laban (Gn 31^{24}), to Solomon (1 K 3^{5}, 2 Ch 1^{7}); and in visions of the night to Jacob (Gn 46^{2}), and to Paul (Ac 18^{9}). Zechariah 'saw by night' the visions described in his prophecies (Zec 1^{8}), and 'night visions' are repeatedly mentioned as the means of divine revelation to Daniel (Dn 2^{19} $7^{2.7.13}$). Apart from any special mention of dreams, God speaks at night to Abraham (Gn 26^{24}), to Balaam (Nu 22^{20}), to Gideon (Jg 6^{25}), to Samuel (1 S $3^{4ff.}$ 15^{16}), to Solomon (2 Ch 7^{12}), to Paul (directly Ac 23^{11}, and by an angel Ac 27^{23}). The 'word of the Lord' came by night to Nathan (2 S 7^{4}, 1 Ch 17^{3}).

The darkness of night is a hindrance to active movement, causing men to stumble (Is 59^{10}, Jn 11^{10}) and grope (Job 5^{14}). On the other hand, it is favourable to secrecy. Hence night was chosen for secret visits (1 S 28[8], Jn 3[2] 19[39]) and treacheries (Jn 13[30]). Daring exploits were carried out by night, such as Gideon's destruction of the altar of Baal (Jg 6[27]), and his visit to the camp of Midian (Jg 7[9]); David's visit to the camp of Saul (1 S 26[7]); the rescue of Saul's remains (1 S 31[12]); Nehemiah's survey of Jerusalem (Neh 2[12ff.]); the murder of Holofernes (Jth 13[14]). For the same reason in war night was a favourite time for ambushes (Jos 8[3], Jg 9[32. 34] 16[2], 2 K 6[14]), and surprises (Gn 14[15], Jos 10[9], Jg 7[19ff.], 1 S 14[36], 2 S 2[29] 17[1], 2 K 8[21], 2 Ch 21[9], Jer 6[5], 1 Mac 4[1. 5] 5[29] 12[26. 27] 13[22], 2 Mac 8[7] 12[9]). It was in the night that Sennacherib's army was destroyed (2 K 19[35]), and that panic fell on the Syrians (2 K 7[12]). Night was consequently a time when danger was to be apprehended (Ps 91[5], Ca 3[8]), and when death and sudden destruction might come (Ex 12[12. 30], Job 34[25] 36[20], Hos 4[5], Lk 12[20] 17[34]). Night was the safest time for flight and escape, as in the cases of Zedekiah at the Captivity (2 K 25[4], Jer 39[4] 52[7]); Joseph and Mary (Mt 2[14]); Paul at Damascus (Ac 9[25]), at Thessalonica (Ac 17[10]), and at Jerusalem (Ac 23[23]). The great escape of Israel from Egypt was remembered as having taken place by night (Ex 12[31-42], Dt 16[1]), and it was at night that the apostles were repeatedly delivered from prison (Ac 5[19] 12[6]). Night was the opportunity of the thief (Gn 31[39], Job 24[14], Jer 49[9], Ob [5], 1 Th 5[2]. See also Mt 28[13]). The quietness of night made it a fitting time for prayer and communion with God (1 S 15[11], Ps 16[7] 17[3] 22[2] 119[55], Jth 6[21] 11[17], Lk 6[12]).

Night was the season of festive pleasure (Is 21[4]), which might be innocent and holy (Job 35[10], Ps 42[8] 77[6], Is 30[29]), or might degenerate into drunkenness and sensuality (Gn 19[33ff.], Jg 19[25], Pr 7[9], Is 5[11], 1 Th 5[7]).

Besides darkness, the physical features of night include dew (Ca 5[2]) and frost (Gn 31[40], Jer 36[30]). It was at night that the manna fell in the wilderness (Nu 11[9]).

The night was divided into watches (Ps 90[4]). Under the Jewish system followed in OT these were three in number. We have 'the beginning of the watches' (La 2[19]), 'the middle watch' (Jg 7[19]), and 'the morning watch' (Ex 14[24]). In NT four stages of the night are distinguished, viz. evening, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning (Mk 13[35]). These may be taken as corresponding to the four watches into which the night was divided by the Romans. Mention is made of the second and third watches (Lk 12[38]), and of the fourth watch (Mt 14[25]).

Midnight is specified as the hour when certain impressive incidents, historical or parabolic, took place, such as the death of the firstborn in Egypt (Ex 11[4] 12[29]); the earthquake at Philippi (Ac 16[25]); the summons to meet the bridegroom (Mt 25[6], cf. Mk 13[35]).

Night is used as a figure for death, which ends life's work (Jn 9[4]). The present age, to be closed by the coming of Christ, is described as the night which precedes the day (Ro 13[12]). By another metaphor night represents the sin and ignorance from which Christians have already escaped (1 Th 5[5]). One of the glories of the new Jerusalem will be the absence of night (Rev 21[25] 22[5]).

NIGHT HAWK (תַּחְמָס taḥmās, γλαύξ, noctua).—Taḥmās occurs twice (Lv 11[16], Dt 14[15]) in the list of unclean birds. Our view of its meaning will be influenced by that which we take of the signification of the preceding word בַּת־הַיַּעֲנָה bath-hayya'ănāh. AV translates this in all the eight passages where it occurs 'owl,' but in four (Job 30[29], Is 13[21] 34[13] 43[20]) the margin has 'ostrich.' In all of them RV gives 'ostrich.' The LXX generally renders it στρουθός, but sometimes σειρήν. As the latter is a fabulous bird, the weight of the LXX is with RV. Many have thought that taḥmās refers to the ostrich, the root ḥāmaṣ signifying 'to be violent or unjust,' and that it corresponds to the Arab ẓalîm, which also signifies 'the unjust bird'=the ostrich. But if 'ostrich' is the proper rendering for bath-hayya'ănāh, it is not likely that another word would be used for the bird in the same context, especially if the expression 'after his kind,' at the end of the passage, refers to all the four birds mentioned. But even admitting, as is most probable, that this expression is limited to the genus immediately after which it occurs, still, if we agree with RV in the rendering 'ostrich' for bath-hayya'ănāh, we must seek for another bird to correspond with taḥmās. Unfortunately, this is difficult to find. Γλαύξ, for which we have the authority of the LXX, and noctua that of the Vulg., signify some sort of owl. But two other words in this context are tr[1] respectively 'little owl' and 'great owl.' 'Night hawk' would seem to be a mere guess. Perhaps it would be better with RVm to transliterate taḥmās.

NIGHT MONSTER (לִילִית lîlîth, ὀνοκένταυρος, lamia, Is 34[14] AVm and RV 'night monster,' AV 'screech owl,' RVm 'Lilith' [wh. see]).—The reference is to a nocturnal spectre, similar to the ghûl of the Arabs. All nations have, in their legends, similar apparitions (cf. Wellh. Reste[2], 148 ff.; W. R. Smith, RS 113 f.). The Heb. has two other words of similar import, עֲלוּקָה (see HORSE-LEECH) and שְׂעִירִים (see AZAZEL, SATYR). The mention of such fabulous monsters does not commit Scripture to an endorsement of the fact of their existence. See OWL, 5.

NILE.—The word Νεῖλος is of unknown origin. It was the name by which the river was known to the Greeks, Hesiod being the earliest writer to use it; Homer has but one name, Αἴγυπτος, for river and land. It does not occur in MT or LXX. Besides the possible connexion with יְאֹר, it has been proposed to refer it to a Demotic form, ne-îl-u, meaning 'the rivers.'* The so-called canal, Shaṭṭ en-Nîl, in Babylonia, is thought by some to have an etymological connexion with the Egyptian river.† Of the many native names, one of the commonest and most ancient‡ was ḥ'p, a word in some way implying the idea of covering or hiding. This name, however, is always employed in a sense more or less mythological: that so frequent later on, itrw,—the origin of the above Demotic form,—which became the everyday designation of the river, did not grow into popularity until the Middle Kingdom.§

The Semitic languages record no name for the Nile till a comparatively late date; none, at any rate, appears to be met with before the 7th cent. (Assurbanipal), when the Assyrians were making use of the native itrw in the modified pronunciation already current in Egypt, iaru'ū, the last letter here representing the Egyptian 'o, 'great,' as it appears eventually in the Coptic iero, iaro.‖ This same word was as יְאוֹר, most usually employed also by the Hebrews (e.g. Gn 41[1], Ex 1[22]), who for other large rivers used יְקוֹר (e.g. Gn 15[18], 2 K 5[12], Jer 2[18]). The plur. of יְאוֹר generally indicates the canals or subsidiary branches of the Nile.

Another name used by Hebrew writers is שִׁחוֹר, שִׁיחוֹר, Σιών,¶ Shihor (only Jos 13[3]. 1 Ch 13[5], Is 23[3], Jer 2[18]), of which the etymology is obscure; the word is said to refer to the dark hue of the water; but, in fact, the Nile is anything but dark in colour. No Egyptian derivation for the name has been recognized. Though it may sometimes refer to the Nile (Is 23[3], Jer 2[18]), שִׁחוֹר elsewhere seems more appropriate to the Wady el-'Arîsh, 'the Brook of Egypt' (Jos 13[3], 1 Ch 13[5]). See EGYPT (RIVER OF).

Whether the Nile is to be recognized, as it was by Josephus,* in one of the four rivers of Paradise (Gn 2[10]) is still debated. Of the two not yet identified, Pishon and Gihon, the latter has, owing to its connexion with the land of Cush, been often held to represent the river which flows through Ethiopia as well as Egypt. The LXX in Jer 2[18] seem, at any rate, to understand it so (cf. Streane, Double Text of Jer. 38 f.). This Cush is, however, now less generally held to be Ethiopia than formerly. Delitzsch† regards it as a Babylonian province; Hommel‡ takes it for a district of central Arabia.

The Egyptians fully realized the debt they owed to the river by whose agency their country had been created and was maintained. The Nile was a deity honoured, from the earliest to the latest times, throughout the land,§ irrespective of local, often antagonistic cults; yet he appears to have had few temples of his own, and his priests are seldom mentioned.‖ Several deities besides Ḥ'pi, the personification of its name, were regarded as connected with the river in one or other of its aspects. For instance, Ḫnm-Chnubis, Inkt-Anukis, Stt-Satis were thought to rule the Cataracts, the point at which the Nile came within the knowledge of the Egyptians; Sbk-Souchos, again, was the tutelary god of the Fayyûm lake. It is possible that Osiris himself was originally a Nile deity.¶ The Nile god is represented as a man with woman's breasts, water-plants on his head, and, for dress, the girdle of a sailor or fisherman. Sometimes he carries an offering of fish and water-fowl. This representation appears to date from the 12th Dynasty. Long hymns are extant in his praise, enumerating his benefits to mankind; he is honoured, too, in many shorter inscriptions. The festivals held in mediæval and modern times to celebrate the Inundation are doubtless survivals of ancient heathen ceremonies, one of which classical authors call the Νειλῶα.†† The Copts have always used special prayers for the river's rise; so, too, have the Ethiopian Christians.‡‡ A curious liturgy is extant, containing a sort of harvest service in connexion with the Inundation, which was in use among the mediæval Syriac-speaking community in Egypt.§§

The Inundation (which is perhaps referred to in Am 8[8] 9[5]) was never understood by the Egyptians themselves, who attributed it to some mystic, divine agency, the tears of Isis' yearly sorrow for Osiris being in one view its origin.‖‖ Herodotus (ii. 22) rejects the one explanation, among those he had heard,—and that from a Greek source,—which approximated to the truth. Subsequently Ptolemy gave this same explanation—that the river rose owing to melted snow. The Christian Fathers¶¶ had learned the true one, viz. the annual rains in Ethiopia.

The source of the river was equally mysterious. One theory, with which the Odyssey seems acquainted (iv. 477), regarded it as a branch of a heavenly Nile, from which it separated to form the earthly stream somewhere in the Cataract district. Two deep springs (krtu) in that region, or two rocks (cf. Herod. ii. 28), were spoken of as the point whence the waters flowed.*

The height of the river's annual rise—a matter of vital importance to all dwellers on its banks—was officially registered from an early period (at Semneh, 12th Dyn.),† and recently similar inscriptions of a later age (22nd-26th Dyn.) have been found at Thebes.‡ The regulation of supplies of water for irrigation was one of the functions of the crown itself. Among the newly discovered remains of the earliest monarchy (1st–2nd Dyn.) at Hieraconpolis is a relief showing the king opening (?) an artificial canal.§ Of the numerous Nilometers of more recent times, the oldest extant—probably of Ptolemaic origin, and in its modernized form still in use—is at Elephantine, though tradition assigned to that which existed at Memphis a much higher antiquity.‖ Abu Ṣâliḥ (quoting Ibn 'Abd el-Hakam) attributes it to Joseph.¶

The story of the seven years' famine in Gn 41, due to an insufficient inundation, finds a parallel in a text discovered in 1891, which, though written at earliest under the Ptolemies, purports to give an account of a drought of like duration under the 3rd Dynasty.

A curious legend in the Targum describes the burial of Joseph's coffin in the Nile, and its rediscovery by Moses.†† The Egyptians, of course, never used the river in this way.

NIMRAH.—See BETH-NIMRAH and NIMRIM.

NIMRIM, THE WATERS OF (מֵי־נִמְרִים; τὸ ὕδωρ τῆς Νεμ(η)ρείμ (Is 15[6]), B Νεβρείν, A Ἐβρίμ (Jer 48 [Gr. 31][34]); Aquæ Nemrim).—Mentioned only in Isaiah (15[6]) and Jeremiah (48[34]). Gesenius (Lex.) gives the meaning (the same as of Nimrah or Beth-nimrah) 'limpid or wholesome water,' but the word is more probably held to indicate the place of the nimr or leopard (Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 107, ed. Rosenmüll.).

Nimrim need not, however, be confounded with Nimrah or Beth-nimrah (Nu 32[3. 36], Jos 13[27]), which seem to have been located on the northern shore of the Dead Sea. It is mentioned in connexion with Zoar, Luhith, and Horonaim in such a manner as to indicate its location south of the river Arnon at the south-eastern end of the Dead Sea. The Zoar denounced here by the prophets may be quite distinct from the refuge of Lot, which is by many located on the northern shore of the Dead Sea. Josephus, however, states that Zoar (to which Lot fled) existed in his day, and places it together with Sodom and Gomorrah south of the Dead Sea (Ant. I. xi. 4, XIV. i. 4; BJ IV. viii. 4). Eusebius also places Zoar at the southern end of the Dead Sea, and Jerome appears to endorse this. In the Middle Ages Zoar was identified under the name of Segor in the same locality, and it is now accepted by many as represented by Dra'a at the mouth of the Wâdy Kerak on the south-east shore of the Dead Sea. tion of Luhith can only be surmised. It appears to have been in the neighbourhood of one of the few passes leading down to the Dead Sea. In the days of Eusebius it was known as Luith, and lay between Areopolis (Rabbath Moab) and Zoar. It may therefore have been the name of the pass leading down the Wâdy Beni Hamîd from Areopolis to Zoar; while Horonaim, 'the two caverns,' may have been the name of the fort or forts commanding the pass leading down from Kir of Moab to Zoar (see KIR OF MOAB).

A name resembling Nimrim has been found by de Saulcy, Seetzen, and Tristram in Borj Nemeirah and Wâdy N'meirah about eight miles south of Dra'a (Zoar), in one of the richest and most luxuriant spots in the country. The 'Waters of Nimrim' were found by Klein at a spot higher up, where were the ruins of an old town and irrigated garden bearing the name 'the Springs of N'meirah'; in close proximity was also found the 'brook of the willows,' spoken of in connexion with Nimrim (Is 15^7).

These passages call attention to the abundance begotten by those waters, the grass and herbage and hay; and Tristram relates that the greenness, exuberant fertility, and plenteous fountains are still as marked as ever (Bible Places, p. 353).

NIMROD (נִמְרֹד, Νεβρώδ, Nemrod).—A son of Cush, who 'began to be a mighty one in the earth,' and a great hunter, and who is described as having had, as the beginning of his kingdom, the cities Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar or Babylonia (Gn $10^{8\text{-}10}$). There have been many speculations as to the identity of this ancient hero and the meaning of his name. To all appearance, his greatness rested as much upon his prowess as a hunter as upon his success as a ruler of men; but it is to be noted that the expression 'a mighty hunter before the Lord' is, to all appearance, merely another way of saying 'a very great hunter indeed,' and may perhaps be ironically intended. That violence and insolence are associated with the character of the hero (see Josephus, Ant. L iv. 2) on account of the expression גִּבֹּר gibbôr, in no way affects the question of his career and identity. With regard to this, it may be noted that the derivation of Nimrod from the root מָרַד mârad, 'to rebel,' rests on a false etymology; and there is also no real ground to connect him with the building of the tower of Babel, to which his name is attached by tradition (see Mirkhond*), though we shall see further on what connexion, if any, he may have had with that erection.

Among the later attempts at identification, the most important is that which made him to be one with Izdubar or Gištubar, as the name was then read, and it was confidently expected that the true reading of this name when found would turn out to be very similar to the Hebrew form Nimrod—an expectation which seemed to be confirmed by the reading of Namrasit as the Semitic form of Gišdubarra, pointed out by Hommel. There is hardly any Assyriologist who would not have liked to welcome this explanation, for it had in it much inherent probability. When, however, the Babylonian pronunciation of the name read as Izdubar or Gištubar appeared, it turned out to be Gilgameš, the Gilgamos of Aelian, as pointed out by Oppert. The supposition that Nimrod was the same as the hero Gilgameš therefore fell to the ground.

There was then no alternative but to fall back upon the suggestion, made by Josef Grivel (TSBA iii. 136 ff.) in 1874, that Nimrod is none other than the god Merodach. Little need exists to go through all Grivel's reasons for supposing that the two were identical, many of these being untenable; but it may be noted that his view was based primarily upon the likeness he had noticed between the shorter form of the name of Merodach in Accadian and the biblical Nimrod. Notwithstanding the difference that appears to exist between these two names, it is certain that they are very closely related. The name Merodach is, as is well known, of Accadian origin, the full form being Amar-utuk or Amar-uduk, and the meaning apparently 'the brightness of day.' From this it will be seen that he was a solar hero, and that his name is compounded with that of the Sungod, one of whose names, in Accadian, was Utuki—the same word as the final element, utuk or uduk. As the syllable -uk was, to all intents and purposes, a termination or lengthening, we have in Amaruduk a word containing all the consonants of Nimrod except the initial n. The addition of this consonant is apparently due to the same cause as the initial n in Nisroch and Nibhaz (see these articles), namely, the desire to disfigure the name of a heathen deity. The vowels of this newly formed word have also been brought more or less into conformity with that of Nisroch and of Nibhaz (cf. JRAS, 1899, p. 459).

In Gn 10^8 the expression 'Cush begat Nimrod' apparently means only that he was of Cushite nationality (he is not mentioned among the sons of Cush in v.[7]), and not a Semite. This would agree with the evidence furnished by the name, for Amaruduk is not Semitic, but Accadian, which is regarded by many as a Cushite language. Amaruduk or Merodach was son of Ea or Aa, whose name is also Accadian.

The question whether Merodach ever was really king of Babylon need not detain us here, as it is of no importance. Suffice it to say that 'the king' (Accad. lugala, Bab. šarru) par excellence was one of his titles. This he apparently bore as 'king of the gods'; but there is no reason to suppose, on that account, that he was not king of men during his life on earth. The second point in this parallel refers to the cities over which he had dominion, and in this connexion it is to be noted that, whilst Gilgameš (Gištubar) seems to have been king of Erech only, Merodach was, first of all, king of Babylon, and remained patron god of the city practically to the last. Besides this, he seems to be mentioned, in the bilingual story of the Creation, as the builder of Niffer (identified by the Rabbins with Calneh), together with its temple Ê-kura, and of Erech, with its temple Ê-ana (cf. ll. 39 and 40 with 6 and 7, JRAS, 1891, pp. 394, 395). The building of Babylon is referred to in l. 14 (l.c.), and it may be supposed that he was also regarded by the writer as its constructor. If the statement of the Rabbins be correct, which makes Niffer to be the same as Calneh, then we have here Merodach mentioned in close connexion with three of the four cities referred to in Gn 10^{10} as the beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod, and it is not by any means improbable that future discoveries may reveal to us in the same connexion Accad, which would make the fourth.

In addition to this, however, Merodach was regarded by the Babylonians (though they did not look, to all appearance, upon that side of his character as the most important) as a mighty hunter, for it was he who, when all the other gods held back, attacked, and caught with his net, the great dragon of Chaos, as detailed in the Babylonian story of the Creation :—

'The lord * spread wide his net to enclose her,
The evil wind following behind, he sent on before.
Tiamtu opened her mouth as wide as she could—
He caused the evil wind to enter before she closed her lips.
The evil winds filled out her body,
Her consciousness was taken away, wide opened she her mouth.
He seized the weapon, cut open her body,
Sundered her inner part, tore out her heart.
He enclosed her, put an end to her life,
Threw her body prone and stood thereon.'†

Merodach was indeed 'a hero in hunting' (gibbôr ṣayid), which, as we know from the Assyrian sculptures, was often accomplished with a net,‡ as in the legend here quoted; and this circumstance seems to complete the list of parallels needed. A large portion of the Semitic-Babylonian legend of the Creation is devoted to this exploit of the head of the Babylonian pantheon, testifying to the importance with which the early Babylonians regarded it, and it is mentioned in the eulogies pronounced upon him by his father Ea or Aa at the end of the story.

The legends that have been preserved concerning Nimrod would seem to show that his fame in the country of his exploits rests more upon what was known of him there than upon the somewhat meagre account in Genesis, and it is probably for the same reason that so many places there are named after him.§ Thus we have the Birs Nimroud, the ancient Borsippa, near the ruins of Babylon, Tel Nimroud, near Baghdad, the dam Suhr el-Nimroud, across the Tigris near Mosul, and the mound of Nimroud, the ancient Calah. To all appearance, he was regarded in later times in his native country as a great builder also. As has been pointed out above, he seems to have been looked upon by the Babylonians as the builder of Babylon, and the bilingual Creation story apparently attributes to him the completion of E-sagila, the great temple-tower in that city, which was certainly of the type of the Tower of Babel, even if it were not that erection itself. This may account for the connexion of Nimrod with the catastrophe of the confusion of tongues, ascribed to him in the East both in comparatively ancient and in more recent times. T. G. PINCHES.

NINEVEH (נִינְוֵה; LXX Νινευή, NT [Text. Rec.] Νινευΐτ, Gr. and Rom. writers Νῖνος, Ninus).—In Gn 10^{11} it is stated (according to the better translation) that Nimrod (wh. see) or some other Babylonian 'went forth' out of Chaldæa and founded Nineveh and Rehoboth-'Ir (Rêbit-uri in Assyrian, 'the streets or public places of the city'). A similar tradition is indicated in Mic 5^{6}. The native monuments show that the tradition is correct, and that Nineveh was once included within the boundaries of the Babylonian empire (cf. art. ASSYRIA in vol. i. p. 180^{a}, and Driver in Hogarth's Authority and Archæology, p. 29 f.). In fact it seems to have taken its name from the Babylonian city of Ninâ on the Euphrates, which is mentioned by Diodorus (ii. 3. 7), quoting probably from Ctesias.

The name of Nineveh is written Ninuâ and Ninâ in the cuneiform inscriptions. A popular etymology connected it with the Assyrian nunu, 'fish,' at a very early date, since the name is ideographically represented by the picture of a fish inside the enclosure of a city. But it seems really to have been derived from the title of the Babylonian goddess Ninâ, the daughter of Ea, who was identified with the Semitic Istar. Ninâ is the original of the Greek form Ninos.

The city lay on the eastern side of the Tigris, northward of the Greater Zab, and opposite the modern town of Mosul. As late as the 12th cent. Benjamin of Tudela still knew its ruins under the name of Niniveh, although its site had been so completely deserted before the 4th cent. B.C. that when Xenophon passed the spot all recollection of the place had disappeared. The ruins consist chiefly of two great mounds, Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus, and the remains of the ancient city walls. The latter are of a rectangular shape, running parallel to the river on the western side, and protected on the eastern side by a double earthwork, between which and the walls was a deep ditch. The walls themselves were protected by towers and pierced by gates, and rose to a vast height, and consisted of a basement of stone with a superstructure of crude bricks. They enclosed about 1800 acres, or about half the space enclosed within the Aurelian walls of Rome, and had a circumference of 7½ miles. The moat between them and the eastern outworks was 145 feet wide. It was filled with water from the river Khusur, now called Khoser, which flows in a southward direction from Khorsabad, and, after passing through the centre of the ancient Nineveh, falls into the Tigris on the south side of the mound of Kouyunjik. The Tigris must originally have washed the foot of the western city wall, though at present a bank of silt has been formed between it and the river.

The mound of Kouyunjik lies on the north side of the Khoser, and covers the site of two palaces, —that of Sennacherib to the south and of Assur-bani-pal to the north. Sennacherib levelled the remains of an older palace which stood on the bank of a stream called the Tebilti, and had been so injured by the floods that the sarcophagi of his royal predecessors who had been buried there were exposed to view. In its place he erected a splendid building, partly in the native Assyrian, partly in the Syrian, style of architecture, with a park and garden, stables and storehouses, and special fortifications of its own. Assur-bani-pal's palace was chiefly distinguished by the extent of the harim buildings and the establishment of a library.

The southern mound, which lies, like Kouyunjik, against the inner side of the western city wall, rises midway between the Khoser and the southern portion of the city rampart. It is now known as Nebi Yunus, from a supposed tomb of the prophet Jonah, and also represents the site of two palaces, one constructed by Sennacherib and the other by Esarhaddon. Compared, however, with the palaces at Kouyunjik, they were of inferior size and splendour.

Southward of Nineveh, at the corner of land formed by the junction of the Tigris and Greater Zab, was Kalkhu or Calah, whose site is now marked by the mound of Nimrûd. Between it and Nineveh stood the Resen of Gn 10^{12}, the Resen or 'Fountain-head' of the Bavian inscription of Sennacherib. It is doubtless the Larissa (Al-Resen or 'City of Resen') of Xenophon's Anabasis (iii. 4. 7), 6 parasangs from Mespila, the Assyrian Muspalu or 'low ground' near the mound of Nebi Yunus. To the north of Nineveh, close to the

§ It is noteworthy that Babylonia is called 'the land of Nimrod' in Mic 5^{6},—whether because he was an early king of the country, or because, as Merodach, he was the chief divinity, is uncertain. If the latter, it would be a parallel to the expression 'people of Chemosh' in Nu 21^{29} and Jer 48^{46}.

sources of the Khoser and on the hill-slopes of Magganubba, is Khorsabad, still called Sarghûn by the Mohammedan writer Yâḳût in the 14th cent. Khorsabad is the site of the palace and city founded by Sargon in B.C. 707, the remains of which were excavated by Botta.

The name of Nineveh is perhaps first met with in the inscriptions of Gudea, the high priest of Lagas or Tello in Babylonia (B.C. 2700), who tells us that he had built a temple of Istar at Ninâ, though it is possible that the Ninâ referred to may be the Ninâ of Babylonia. The Assyrian Nineveh, however, which seems to have been a colony from the Babylonian city of the same name, was specially dedicated to Istar, and up to the last 'Istar of Nineveh' continued to be invoked by the side of 'Istar of Arbela.' Gudea, it should be added, calls himself 'the powerful minister of the goddess Ninâ.' An inscription of Dungi of Ur, a contemporary of Gudea, which is now in the Louvre, is said to have been discovered on the site of Nineveh. If this were really the case, we should have direct monumental evidence of Babylonian work in the future Assyrian capital. A letter of the Babylonian king Khammurabi (B.C. 2300) speaks of Assyrian soldiers in the Babylonian army; and as late as B.C. 1400 Burna-buryas still regards the Assyrians as his vassals. Before this latter date, however, the high priests of Assur (the modern Kal'ah Sherghat) had become kings, and claimed to be independent of Babylonia. Dusratta of Mitanni, the contemporary of Burna-buryas, sent a golden image of 'Istar of Nineveh' to Egypt, and mentions another that had been already sent there in the reign of his father. Winckler infers from this that Nineveh was subject at the time to Mitanni; but the conclusion does not necessarily follow. At all events, the Assyrian king, Assur-yuballidh writes to the Egyptian Pharaoh as an independent sovereign; and an inscription tells us that he restored É-Masmas, the temple of Istar at Nineveh, which had been built by Samas-Hadad, the high priest of Assur, in B.C. 1820. Shalmaneser I. (B.C. 1300) again repaired the temple, by the side of which his father Hadad-nirari I. had erected a chapel to the Babylonian deities Merodach and Nebo. Shalmaneser I., however, was the builder of Calah, and does not seem to have lived in Nineveh itself. Indeed the first king whom we know to have made it his place of residence was Assur-bil-kala, the son of Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1100). From this time onward Nineveh was probably a royal residence until the reign of Assur-naẓir-pal (B.C. 880), when Calah was rebuilt and its palace restored. For nearly two centuries Calah now remained the capital, and it was only under Sennacherib that Nineveh resumed its place as the chief city of the empire. All the spoils of Asia were lavished on its adornment and fortification; pure drinking-water was introduced into it in place of the rain-water on which the inhabitants had hitherto depended; and stately palaces rose in the neighbourhood of the Tigris. It was to Nineveh that captive princes were brought and exposed in iron cages to the gaze of the multitude; here the head of Teumman, the conquered king of Elam, was hung up in the garden of Assur-bani-pal's palace; and out of its gates marched the armies that conquered the Oriental world. Its markets were thronged with merchants and traders, and its library was stored with thousands of clay books.

Nineveh fell in B.C. 607–6, and with it fell also the Assyrian kingdom and empire. According to an inscription of Nabonidos, it was destroyed by the king of the Manda or Scythians, who had settled in Ecbatana and gone to the assistance of Nabopolassar, the Babylonian king. War had broken out between the latter and his suzerain, the king of Assyria, who was supported by several of the Babylonian cities where the Assyrian rule was still obeyed. According to Abydenos, the last king of Assyria was Sarakos, who appears to be the Sin-sar-iskun of the monuments. A tablet dated in the seventh year of the latter king has been found at Erech. But there was another Assyrian king, Sin-sum-lisir, whose name is found on a tablet dated at Nippur in the year of his accession, and it is therefore possible that with him rather than with Sin-sar-iskun Nineveh and Assyria came to an end.

The fall of Nineveh is prophesied by Nahum and Zephaniah (2^{13-15}), and in Nahum more especially there are references to the topography of the Assyrian capital (see Billerbeck and Jeremias, 'Der Untergang Nineveh's und die Weissagungschrift des Nahum,' in the Beiträge zur Assyriologie, iii. 1). In 2 K 19^{36} = Is 37^{37}, it is described as the residence of Sennacherib, and the temple of 'Nisroch his god' is referred to. The name of Nisroch, however, is corrupt, and it is impossible to say what was the original reading.

For the story of Jonah's preaching at Nineveh, and our Lord's application of this, see art. JONAH in vol. ii., especially pp. 746–751.

In Jon 4^{11} it is stated that Nineveh contained 'more than sixscore thousand' infants, which would give a population of about 600,000. Captain Jones, who made a trigonometrical survey of the site in 1853, estimates that, allowing 50 square yards to each inhabitant, the population may have amounted to about 174,000 souls. The statement, however, in the Bk. of Jonah, that Nineveh was a city of 'three days' journey,' can be explained only on the supposition that both Calah and Khorsabad (Dur-Sargon) were included in its precincts; and even then König (see art. JONAH, vol. ii. p. 748[a]) thinks the dimensions impossible. Nineveh is again brought before us in the books of Tobit ($1^{10.\ 17}$ etc.) and Judith (1^{1}). Tobit is said to have lived there like certain Israelites mentioned in the cuneiform contract tablets, some of whom even held office under the government.

NINEVITES (Νινευ(ε)ῖται).—The inhabitants of Nineveh (which see), Lk 11^{30} (only). In the parallel passage, Mt 12^{41}, both AV and RV have 'men of Nineveh' (ἄνδρες Νινευ(ε)ῖται) as well as in Lk 11^{32} (TR ἄνδρες Νινευῖ, Lachm. Treg. WH ἄνδρες Νινευ(ε)ῖται).

NIPHIS (B Νειφείς, A Φινείς, AV Nephis), 1 Es 5^{21}. —'The sons of N., 156,' correspond to 'the children of Magbish, 156,' in Ezr 2^{30}. The corruption may be due to reading מנפישׁ as מגבישׁ (from Niphis).

NISAN (נִיסָן; Neh 2^{1}, Est 3^{7}, 1 Es 5^{6}, Ad. Est 11^{3}). —The first month in the later Jewish calendar. See TIME.

NISROCH (נִסְרֹךְ; in 2 K 19^{37} B has Ἐσδράχ, A Ἐσθράχ, in Is 37^{38} B Νασαράχ, A Ἀσαράχ, Vulg. Nesroch).—The Hebrew form of the name of a deity of the Assyrians, in whose temple Sennacherib was worshipping when slain by his sons (see the passages quoted). There has been much speculation as to the identity of this deity, and many wild theories have been put forward concerning him. Jarchi, for instance, explains the word as 'a beam, or plank, of Noah's ark,' from an analysis of the word given by Rabbinical expositors, by which נסר נוחא would be = נסר. A far more reasonable suggestion was that of Gesenius, who considered that Nisroch was a lengthened form of נֶשֶׁר, the Arab nisr, 'an eagle,' and this etymology was supported by the fact that eagle-headed divine figures actually occur in the Assyrian bas-reliefs. A comparison of the Greek forms, however, shows that the Hebrew writing of the name is corrupt, a ך having been added [as in the case of Nibhaz and Nimrod] and vocalic changes made so as to bring the word practically into the same form as the two words here cited. There is therefore no doubt that, as suggested by Schrader (COT ii. 13 f.), Nisroch is a corruption of Aśur, or of a possible by-form Aśuraku, to which the Greek variant Ἐσοράχ is the nearest approach.* This identification, it is to be noted, is not only the most probable, but also the most satisfactory, for it is in the temple of the national god of his country that we should expect to find the king of Assyria worshipping, especially if by any means he had received information of his sons' intention; for to his mind the national god of the land, who had, as he believed, so often helped him to victory, would naturally be the one most likely to save him from his rebellious offspring. With regard to the form, there are two possible explanations. Nisroch (=Esorach) may be for Aśuraku, a lengthened form of Aśur by the addition of aku [the same termination as appears in Amaruduk(u)], the Marduku (a personal name) of the later contract-tablets, in which case the presence of the ending would seem to imply Accadian influence. On the other hand, the name may be really a compound one, i.e. the well-known appellation of the god Aśur with the Accadian name of the moon-god Aku (compare Eri-Aku, 'servant of the moon-god' =Arioch) attached to it. In support of this second etymology may be cited the fact that Sennacherib's name contains the element Sin, the common name of the moon-god in Babylonia and Assyria, and the expression 'his god' may refer to some such compound deity as Aśur-Aku, whom Sennacherib specially worshipped. T. G. PINCHES.

NITRE (נֶתֶר, νίτρον) in its modern usage denotes saltpetre, nitrate of potash, but the νίτρον or nitrum of the ancients was a different substance, natron, carbonate of soda. It occurs as an incrustation on the ground in Egypt, Persia, and elsewhere, and is also a constituent in the water of certain saline lakes. The most famous of the latter are the 'natron lakes' in Egypt. They lie in the 'natron valley' about 60 miles W.N.W. of Cairo. The deposit of these lakes includes an upper layer of common salt and a lower one of natron (Wilkinson, Modern Egypt, i. 382 ff.). Strabo mentions these Egyptian lakes (Geog. XVII. i. 23), and also a similar lake in Armenia (ib. XI. xiv. 8). See also Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxi. 10.

'Nitre' occurs twice in AV. In Pr 25[20] † the effect of songs on a heavy heart is compared to the action of vinegar upon 'nitre' (RV 'nitre,' RVm 'soda'). Vinegar has no effect upon saltpetre, but with carbonate of soda it produces effervescence. In Jer 2[22] 'nitre' (RV 'lye') is referred to as a cleansing agent. Here, again, natron rather than modern nitre suits the connexion. Natron has detergent properties, and is in fact the same substance as 'washing-soda,' while saltpetre is useless for cleansing purposes. JAMES PATRICK.

NO (נֹא Jer 46[25], Ezk 30[14. 15. 16]), NO-AMON (נֹא אָמוֹן Nah 3[8]).—These two names, the former associated with Amon also in Jer (RV), represent Egyptian Thebes. This city was the centre of Amon-worship, and the capital of Egypt, not only throughout the New Kingdom (17th–20th Dynasty), but also again under the Ethiopian rulers of Egypt in the 25th Dynasty, against whom Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal brought their forces. Nahum refers to the capture and sack of Thebes, probably in Assurbanipal's last invasion, B.C. 663, which seems to have been the most destructive to the metropolis. The instances in Jer and Ezk show that to the outside world Thebes remained the great city of Egypt for many years after it had fallen to the second or third place in the country.

In the New Kingdom Thebes was commonly called N.t rs.t 'southern city,' N.t Ymn 'city of Amon,' or simply N.t 'city.' In the 21st Dynasty a single individual is named alternatively, N.t-nekht and N.t-Amon-nekht, each meaning 'Thebes is victorious' (Spiegelberg, Rec. de trav. xxi. 53). In Demotic Ne regularly stands for Thebes, and after the destruction of the city itself by Ptolemy X. the word still appears in the Egypt. name of the Thebaid. The fem. ending t was early lost, and the royal name Ψουσέννης gives approximately νη as the pronunciation of n.t. The Assyrian annals name the city Ni'. The punctuation No' of the Hebrew is evidently wrong, but the Septuagint (Ezk 30[14. 16] Διὸς πόλις, v.[15] Μέμφις [implying a reading נֹף], Jer 46 [Gr. 26][25] τὸν Ἀμμὼν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς, Nah 3[8] μερίδα [implying a reading מָנָה confused with מָנָת 'portion'] Ἀμμών) gives no help in correcting it. NOADIAH (נוֹעַדְיָה 'meeting with J"'; Νοαδεί).—1. The son of Binnui, a Levite, one of the four persons to whom were committed the silver and gold and sacred vessels brought by Ezra from Babylonia (Ezr 8[33]). In 1 Es 8[63] he is called 'Moeth the son of Sabannus' (Μωὲθ Σαβάννου, cf. N. ἀπὸ Ἐβανναιά, Ezr l.c.).

2. A prophetess, who assisted Tobiah and Sanballat at the time of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. Nehemiah denounces her for attempting to intimidate him, but no particulars regarding her are given in the narrative (Neh 6[14]). H. A. WHITE.

NOAH (נֹחַ 'rest,' from נוּחַ; LXX and NT Νῶε, whence AV Noe; Jos. Νῶχος [var. lec. Νώεος]. In Gn 5[29], probably a fragment of J, the name is derived from the root נחם 'comfort,' and is given to Noah by Lamech in the belief that he would comfort* men for the toil of their hands 'from the ground which J" hath cursed').—Gn 5[28. 29] 6–9. Up to 9[17] Noah appears as the hero of the Flood, in 9[20-29] as the first discoverer of the art of making wine. That these two stories come from different sources is probable, because in the earlier Accadian history of the Flood that event is immediately followed by the translation of Ṣîtnapišti (Noah), perhaps referred to in 6[9b], cf. 5[24], which appears to be a fragment of J misunderstood by P in 5[22].

Amongst the Talmudists (e.g. Aboda Zara 64*b*, Sanhedrin 56*b*) it was customary to speak of 'the seven precepts of the sons of Noah,' by which they meant those precepts that were supposed to be already binding upon mankind at large before Abraham and outside of his family. Other enumerations besides seven are also found. For details see Schürer, GJV[3] iii. 128 [HJP II. ii. 218], or Weber, Jüdische Theologie (Index, s. 'Gebote').

NOAH (נֹעָה, Νουά).—One of the daughters of Zelophehad the Manassite, about whose rights of inheritance a knotty point of law came up for settlement, Nu 26^{33} 27^{1} 36^{11}, Jos 17^{3}.

NOAH, BOOK OF.—In the use which was made of this book in the final redaction of the Ethiopic Book of Enoch we have an admirable example of the methods pursued by Jewish editors. Though the Book of Noah has not come down to us independently, it has in large measure been incorporated in the Ethiopic Book of Enoch, and can in part be reconstructed from that book. The Book of Noah is mentioned in Jubilees 10^{13} and 21^{10}. That 60. 65–69^{25} 106–107 belonged originally to it, is obvious even on a cursory examination. Thus in 60^{1}, which runs, 'In the year five hundred, in the seventh month, on the fourteenth day of the month in the life of Enoch,' it is clear that the final editor simply changed the name 'Noah' in the context before him into 'Enoch,' but very ignorantly; for Enoch lived only 365 years, and the statement in the context is based on Gn 5^{32}. Furthermore, the writer speaks of himself as the grandson of Enoch in 65^{9}. Again, 65–69^{25} is allowed to stand by the editor as a confessed constituent of the Book of Noah; for it contains Noah's interview with his grandfather Enoch, and Noah's version of the Deluge and of judgment. Finally, in 106–107 there is an account of the marvellous birth of Noah, in regard to whom Methuselah goes to the ends of the earth to consult Enoch. But besides these indisputable fragments of the book, it is most probable that 54^{7}–55^{2} is borrowed from the same source, and likewise Jubilees $7^{26\text{-}39}$ $10^{1\text{-}15}$. In the earlier passage in Jubilees it is not only the subject-matter, but also the carelessness of the editor or author of Jubilees, which leads to this identification; for, after an account of the wickedness preceding the Flood given by the angel of God ($7^{20\text{-}25}$), we come suddenly on a passage ($7^{26\text{-}39}$) in which Noah is represented as speaking in the first person, although throughout Jubilees it is the angel that speaks. Finally, it is not improbable that $41^{3\text{-}8}$ 43–44. 59 belonged originally to the Book of Noah.

We shall now attempt a short sketch of this book. According to 106–107, a son was born to Lamech. 'And his body was white as snow and red as a blooming rose, and the hair of his head and his long locks were white as wool, and his eyes beautiful' (106^{2}). And his eyes lighted up the house like a sun, and he opened his mouth and blessed the Lord of righteousness. And Lamech in his fear consulted Methuselah, and Methuselah went off to the ends of the earth to consult Enoch ($106^{4\text{-}12}$). Thereupon Enoch foretells the coming of the Flood in consequence of the wickedness wrought by the angels with the daughters of men, and the saving of this child Noah and his three sons, the fresh growth of sin after the Deluge, and the advent of the Messianic kingdom (106^{13}–107).

And later, when Noah became a man, he had a vision, and he saw the earth sinking down, and its destruction drawing nigh (65^{1}). And, as formerly his grandfather Methuselah, so he too went to consult Enoch at the ends of the earth, $65^{2.3}$. And Enoch tells him that all the dwellers on the earth are doomed because they had learnt the secrets and sorceries of the angels, and the violence and hidden power of the Satans, and the mysterious arts of manufacturing metals, $65^{6.7}$. Here and elsewhere, in the Ethiopic Enoch as in Gn 2–4, the knowledge of such arts is held to transcend the limits of human nature. Civilization in its various aspects is traced to the fallen angels. As man goes forward in knowledge and culture he goes backward in the fear of God, and becomes ever more and more alienated from the highest good. Thus it was one Satan that taught men to make the weapons of war, and another that instructed them to write with ink and paper ($69^{6\text{-}9}$), and a fallen angel that made known the arts of painting the face and beautifying the eyebrows, and working in metals and precious stones, 8^{1}. But to proceed: Enoch declares Noah to be guiltless of reproach concerning these secrets, and foretells his deliverance from the Flood, and the descent of a righteous race of men from him ($65^{10\text{-}12}$). After hearing some further disclosures, Noah leaves the presence of Enoch (66). 'And in those days the word of God came unto me, and He said unto me: "Noah, thy lot has come up before me, a lot without blame, a lot of love and uprightness."' Thereupon God informs Noah that the ark was being prepared by angels, that he and his seed might be saved and be established in the earth ($67^{1\text{-}3}$). But as for the fallen angels, they should be imprisoned in the burning valley amongst the metal mountains in the West. From this place where the angels were punished came the hot springs to which the kings and the mighty resorted for the healing of the body. But later these waters will become the means of their punishment, even as they now are used to torment the angels ($67^{4\text{-}13}$). The severity of this torment is set forth in a dialogue between Michael and Raphael (68). Next, the names of the twenty-one chiefs of the fallen angels are enumerated, followed by those of five Satans (?). The various evils wrought by the latter are then recounted. To Gâdreêl, the third, is attributed the fall of Eve, and to the fourth, Pênêmûe, the instruction of mankind in the art of writing ($69^{8.9}$). Knowledge is the source of perdition (69^{11}). After the mention of certain other Satans or angels, it is told how Michael is the guardian of the mysterious oath or formula whereby heaven and earth were founded and all creation upheld ($69^{14\text{-}25}$).

At a still later date apparently (60) Noah had a vision in the 500th year of his life, on the 14th day of the seventh month, and he beheld the heaven of heavens quake with a mighty quaking, and all the heavenly hosts greatly disquieted. And the Head of Days sat on His throne, and all the angels and the righteous stood round Him ($60^{1.2}$). And Noah was filled with fear. Then Michael sent an angel to raise him up, and told him of the judgment to come, and of the monsters Leviathan and Behemoth, which were placed respectively in the sea and in the wilderness of Dêndâin, on the east of Eden; but refused to answer Noah's further questions regarding them ($60^{3\text{-}10}$). Then the angel accompanying Noah informs him about the angels or spirits which control the thunder and lightning, and the sea, the hoar frost, hail, snow, mist, dew, and rain ($60^{11\text{-}25}$). We shall probably be right if we assign to the same source $41^{3\text{-}8}$, which treats of the secrets of the lightning and thunder, of the winds, the clouds, and dew, likewise of the chambers of the winds and hail and mist. This passage further mentions the chambers of the sun and moon, and recounts with what regularity they traverse their orbits, and give thanks to God, and rest not by day or night; 'for unto them thanksgiving is rest.' Of a kindred nature undoubtedly are 43–44, which have for their subject the lightning and the stars of heaven, and the mysterious relation of the latter to the righteous, and 59, which treats of the judgments executed by the lightnings, and the luminaries, and the secrets of the thunder.

Heretofore frequent references have been made to the Flood; but in 54^{7}–55^{2} there is a more exact account of this judgment. Thus we are told that the Flood came about through the joining of the waters above the heavens—the male element—with the waters which are below the heavens—the female element. Thereby all who dwelt on the earth were destroyed. Then after the Flood God promised not to destroy the earth again, and as a pledge thereof set a sign in the heavens.

For Noah's address to his sons after the Flood we must turn to Jubilees 7^{26-39}. This passage is either wholly or in part an excerpt from our book. Noah warns his sons against the seductions of the demons, against the shedding or eating of blood. In Jubilees 10^{1-15} the sons of Noah come to him complaining that the demons are leading their sons astray. Thereupon Noah prays to God for them, and God commands all the demons to be bound and imprisoned, but at the request of Mastêmâ, their chief, God permits one-tenth of the demons to remain at liberty for the trial and temptation of man (10^{1-11}).

The Book of Noah was, according to Jubilees 10^{14}, committed to the care of Shem. This book is described in Syncellus' Chron. p. 83 (ed. Bonn) as the Testament of Noah.

There is also a late Hebrew Book of Noah. This is given in Jellinek's Bet ha-Midrasch, iii. 155, 156. It is based in part on the Book of Noah discussed above. The portion of this Hebrew work which is derived from the older work is reprinted on p. 179 of Charles' Ethiopic Version of the Hebrew Book of Jubilees, where attention is drawn to the parallels and verbal coincidences. A German translation of the entire book will be found in Rönsch, Das Buch der Jubiläen, pp. 385–387.

It is impossible to assign any definite date to the various fragments of the older book. We can safely place them within the years B.C. 50 and A.D. 80.

NO-AMON.—See No.

NOB (נֹב; LXX B Νομβα, 1 S 22^{11} Νομμα. The etym. of נֹב is not clear; the idea that it signifies a 'high place' has no philological foundation).—1. A locality a little N. of Jerusalem, and apparently within sight of the Temple-hill, mentioned in Is 10^{32} as the spot from which the Assyr. king (Sennacherib), in his (ideal) march against the holy city, should audaciously 'swing his hand against the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem.' Nob, it is here implied, was nearer to Jerusalem than 'Anathoth, v.^{30}, now 'Anāta, 2½ miles N.E. of Jerusalem. The precise site has not been determined with certainty; but a spot on (or a little S. of) the Ras el-Meshārif, about 1½ mile S.W. of 'Anāta, the ridge from the brow of which the pilgrim along the N. road still catches his first view of the holy city (PEF Mem., Jerus., p. 411), would suit the conditions admirably. The road from the N. passes over this ridge: immediately on the E. of the road, just S. of the ridge, there is a plateau, some 300 yds. from N. to S., and 800 yds. from E. to W.; at the S. edge of this plateau there is a lower ridge, after which the ground descends rapidly into the Wâdy el-Jôz, some 300 ft. below. This plateau is identified plausibly by Conder (PEFSt, 1874, p. 111 ff.; cf. Robinson, BR i. 276) with the place called Scopus by Josephus (ἐπὶ τὸν Σκοπὸν καλούμενον), upon which Titus encamped, when approaching Jerusalem from the N.; Jos. adds that it was 7 stadia from Jerusalem, and that the city was visible from it (ἔνθεν ἥ τε πόλις ἤδη κατεφαίνετο καὶ τὸ τοῦ ναοῦ μέγεθος ἔκλαμπρον, BJ v. ii. 3, cf. II. xix. 4, and Ant. XI. viii. 5, where a place Σαφα [cf. נָצַף to look out], explained as meaning σκοπή, is evidently the same). The ancient Nob was in all probability on, or very near, the same plateau (cf. Thomson, Land and Book, S. Pal. 434 f.; Del. or Dillm. on Is 10^{32}; Buhl, Geogr. 96). According to the ZDMG xii. (1858) p. 169 f., on one of the ridges just mentioned, at a part now called el-ṣadr, the breast, there are remains of ancient cisterns and rock-tombs.

El-'Isawiye, a village 1 mile S.W. of 'Anāta, which has been proposed as the site of Nob, seems to be excluded by the fact that it lies in a valley, and that Jerusalem is not visible from it. Shaphat, 2 miles due N. of Jerusalem, which has also been suggested, is not probable, as it is in just the same latitude as 'Anata, and does not lie between 'Anāta and Jerusalem, as required by Is $10^{30.32}$. Nebi Shamwil 'and Bir Nebâla' (Conder), 4½ miles N.W. of Jerusalem, lie in a wrong direction altogether.

The same place is also pretty clearly meant in Neh 11^{32}; it is mentioned there, together with other towns in the same neighbourhood, in close proximity to 'Anathoth and Ramah (2½ miles N.E. and 5 miles N. of Jerus. respectively) just as in Is (see vv.$^{29.30}$). 2. An ancient 'city of the priests' (1 S 22^{19}), where David, fleeing from Saul, found refuge with Ahimelech (1 S 21^{1}): Doeg, the Edomite, was present at the time; and afterwards, when Saul's other servants dreaded to fall upon the priests of J", at the king's instigation attacked the city, and massacred the entire population (including 85 priests), Abiathar alone escaping, 1 S $22^{9.11.18-22}$. Unless a settlement of priests in immediate proximity to the Jebusite stronghold of Jerusalem should be deemed improbable, there is no valid reason why this Nob should not be identical with 1: the situation is suitable; to judge from the narrative of 1 S 21, Nob was not far from Gibeah (of Saul), v.^{4}, which was only a little N. of the Nob of Is 10^{32} (see v.^{29}); and (as H. P. Smith, on 1 S 21^{2}, points out) David, making his way from Gibeah (the probable scene of 1 S $20^{1ff.}$) to Bethlehem (1 S 20^{6}), would pass Nob, and might naturally stop there, if he knew he had friends in it. Jerome, however (Ep. ad Eustochium, No. 86 ed. Bened., No. 108 ed. Migne, § 8 [p. 696]), speaks of 'Nobe, urbem quondam sacerdotum,' as in the neighbourhood of Lydda (Diospolis): this is no doubt the modern Bēt Nūbā, about 10 m. S.E. of Lydda, and 13 m. W.N.W. from Jerusalem, very near to Aijalon (cf. Robinson, BR iii. 145, and ii. 254; Buhl, p. 198); but there does not seem to be any sufficient ground for going so far to the W. to find the Nob of 1 S 21. 22.

S. R. DRIVER.

NOBAH (נֹבַח, Νάβαν, Νάβεθ), as a personal name, occurs only once (Nu 32^{42}), in the older version which relates the settlement of the country on the E. of Jordan by the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh. According to this, the clan of that name belonged to the last-mentioned tribe, and formed a settlement in Kenath (wh. see), on which they succeeded in impressing for a time their own clan name (1 Ch 2^{23}). See next article.

A. C. WELCH.

NOBAH (נֹבַח) is mentioned along with Jogbehah (wh. see) as lying on the route which Gideon followed (Jg 8^{11}) in his pursuit of the routed Midianites. This would place the site about midway between Amman and es-Salt. It is again mentioned (Nu 32^{42}) as the name which a clan of Machir gave to Kenath after they had conquered it.

The connexion between these two passages depends entirely upon the place where we agree to look for Kenath (wh. see). If Kenath be identified (Merrill, E. of Jordan, p. 36 ff.; Euseb. OS 269. 15) with Kanawât on the W. edge of the Ḥauran range, then we shall consider (Dillm. Nu-Dt-Jos, p. 201 f.) that the Nobah of Judges was the original settlement of the clan, which, when it took possession of the new abode, for a time at least (1 Ch 2^{23}) succeeded in stamping its own name upon it. If, on the other hand (Bertheau and Moore on Judges), this identification be given up, we shall hold that Nu 32^{42} gives the account of how this clan came into possession of its first and only settlement, the town which lies near Jogbehah.

It is possible that the name can be found also in Nu 21[30] 'Nobah, which lies on the desert,' according to the Peshitta; but the text is too corrupt to offer any sure help. A. C. WELCH.

NOBAI (נוֹבַי Kethîbh, נֹבִי Kerê, and so AV and RVm Nebai, B Βωαί, A Νωβαί).—One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10[19] [Heb.[20]]. See, further, art. NEBO (Town).

NOBLEMAN.—This title (βασιλικός, 'royal' or 'pertaining to a king'; so Ac 12[20. 21], Ja 2[8]) is given (Jn 4[46. 49], AVm 'courtier' or 'ruler'; RVm 'king's officer,' cf. Vulg. regulus) to the man who besought Jesus in Cana to heal his son who was sick at Capernaum. Opinions have always differed as to the meaning of the title (see Chryst. Hom. 35 on Joh.). It has been taken to mean that he was of the royal (Herodian) family (L. Bos, Exercit. Philolog. p. 41, and others); or that he was of the Herodian party (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., Exercit. on St. J.); or that he was attached to the service of Antipas, who was popularly called king, either in a military or civil capacity (Meyer, Weiss, Godet, and most). The term was used both of royal persons themselves and of those attached to them as officers, courtiers, or soldiers (see exx. in Wetstein); but the usage of Josephus (see Krebs, Observat. in NT e Flav. Jos. p. 144) supports strongly the latter application of it here. Tatian also (Diatessaron) translates 'officer of the king.' This man therefore was probably an officer of rank and wealth connected with the court or service of Antipas. He has been identified with Chuza, Herod's steward (Lk 8[3]), and with Manaen, Herod's foster-brother (Ac 13[1]). These, of course, are mere conjectures. He was presumably a Jew, and is certainly not to be identified, as he has sometimes been, with the centurion whose servant Jesus healed (Mt 8[5], Lk 7[1]).
G. T. PURVES.

NOD (נוֹד; Samar. גד; LXX, Philo, Jos. Ναδδ).—The land to which the fratricide Cain emigrated after the Divine verdict was pronounced on him, Gn 4[16] (J). It is a play on נָד 'wanderer' of v.[12]. The subst. נֹד 'wandering' occurs Ps 56[8] (regardless of Duhm's unnecessary emendation). But it is a mistake to understand the word merely as an allusion to Cain's punishment. The writer seems to have had a real land of that name in view. Its situation, 'eastward of Eden,' is given, and there are not sufficient reasons to take this as a gloss of the author or redactor (Dillmann and Stade), since particular definitions of places are not unusual with Hebrew writers (Gn 10[10] 12[8] 25[18], Dt 11[30]). It is called a 'land'; and the passage is plain prose. To dwell and build a city in 'wanderland' is a contradiction in terms. Cain's settlement in Nod was not part of his punishment, but a voluntary emigration, as already Philo (de Poster. Cain. 3) remarks, ἑθελοντὴς ἐξέρχεται.

The 'orientation' of the land of Nod has been matter of conjecture. Many (see Dillm. ad loc.) suggest China, from the similarity of sound between Cain and Chin, Zin, Sin, Tien. Von Bohlen identifies it with India. Sayce sees in it the Manda of the cuneiform inscriptions (HCM 146). To the Rabbis it was sufficient that it lay somewhere in the east, and away from Eden, whither Adam had been banished. 'In all parts' (sc. of Scripture), says Rashi, 'the eastern quarter received the murderer, as it is said (Dt 4[41]), Then Moses severed three cities, etc., toward the rising of the sun' (see also Midrash Agada, p. 13, ed. Buber, 1894). It must, however, be remembered that the same author (J) knew of a universal cataclysm which obliterated every geographical boundary. The topography of Cain's history was to him as antediluvian as the history was prehistoric. A. E. SUFFRIN.

NODAB (נוֹדָב; LXX ναδαβαῖοι; Vulg. Nodab).—Mentioned only 1 Ch 5[19] in connexion with a war of the trans-Jordanic tribes against the Hagrites. Because it is grouped with Jetur and Naphish, it was supposed by C. J. Ball to be a corruption of Kedemah (Gn 25[15]), the last of the twelve tribes of Ishmael. But Kedemah is rightly given in 1 Ch 1[31], and it is hardly conceivable that the author, or even a copyist, should so shortly after misread it for a name which occurs nowhere else. Delitzsch (New Com. on Gn 25[15]) connects it with Nudêbe in the Wady el-buṭin of the Ḥauran. But it is more likely that we have here a transcription of Nabatean. It would be strange that a powerful kingdom like Nabatea should not have proved a formidable neighbour to the trans-Jordanic Israelites. And since Nebaioth, which has been by Jos. (Ant. I. xii. 4), Jerome, and others identified with Nabatea, has not played any important rôle in the pre-exilic history of the Jews, we are left to conjecture that נודב should be read נבדו. The Nabateans called themselves נבטו. In the Talmud and Midrash we have respectively נבטי, נוטי, נוחי, נוחאה, נפתי, נפתיי, and נפתייא for a Nabatean.

The Nabateans were the Nabaṭu of the Assyrian inscriptions, and Aramean in language, and distinct from the Nabaâti ('Nebaioth' of the Bible) of Central Arabia. Originally settled east of Assyria, they migrated westward, and founded a kingdom in Arabia Petræa, with Petra for their capital (Glaser, Skizze, ii. 418). For the history of the Nabateans see Schürer, HJP, Ap. ii., and Euting, Nab. Inschriften, Berl. 1885, with historical notes on p. 81 by Gutschmid. A. E. SUFFRIN.

NOE.—See NOAH.

NOEBA (Νοεβά), 1 Es 5[31] = Nekoda Ezr 2[48], Nekodan 1 Es 5[37].

NOGAH (נֹגַהּ 'splendour').—One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem, 1 Ch 3[7] (B Νάγαι, A Νάγε) 14[6] (BA Νάγεθ, ℵ Νάγετ). The name is wanting in the parallel list in 2 S 5, and is viewed with suspicion by Wellhausen (Bücher Sam. p. 165) and Kittel (on 1 Ch 3[7] in SBOT). The preceding name, Eliphelet, is certainly due to a scribal error, and Nogah may be a corruption from the following Nepheg. It is apparently the same name, although with a different application, that appears in the genealogy of Lk 3[25] as Naggai (Ναγγαί).

NOHAH (נֹחָה; B Ἰωά, A Νωά, Luc. Νοναά; Vulg. Nohaa).—Fourth 'son' or clan of Benjamin (1 Ch 8[2]). If we read 'from Nohah' in Jg 20[43], Nohah was also a town, the seat of the clan. Cf. MENUHAH.

NOISE.—This subst. is no longer used of music in a good or neutral sense, as we find it in Ps 33[3] 'Play skilfully with a loud noise.' Cf. Bunyan, PP, 206: 'MERCY. Hark, don't you hear a Noise? CHRIS. Yes, 'tis as I believe, a Noise of Musick, for joy that we are here'; Ps 47[5], Pr. Bk. 'God is gone up with a merry noise'; and Milton, At a Solemn Music, line 18—

> 'That we on earth with undiscording voice
> May rightly answer that melodious noise.'

The verb 'to noise' is no longer in use. It occurs five times in AV: Jos 6[27] 'His fame was noised throughout all the country' (RV 'his fame was in all the land'); Jth 10[18] 'Her coming was noised among the tents'; Mk 2[1] 'It was noised that he was in the house'; Lk 1[65] 'All these sayings were noised abroad'; Ac 2[6] 'When this was noised abroad' (RV 'when this sound was heard'). Cf. Mt 9[26] Tind. 'And this was noysed through out all that lande'; 28[15] Tind. 'And this sayinge is noysed amonge the Jewes unto this daye'; and Hacket in Life of Abp. Williams (referring to Dr. Collins), 'His works in print against Eudaemon and Fitzherbert, sons of Anak among the Jesuits, do noise him far and wide.' J. HASTINGS.

NOISOME is a shortened form of 'annoy-some.' And 'annoy' is regarded by Skeat and Murray (after Diez) as formed (through the Fr.) from the Lat. in odio. The phrase est mihi in odio, 'it is hateful to me,' became contracted to inodio, which was regarded as a subst., 'hate,' 'annoyance.' In AV the word is used of weeds (Job 31[40m]), pestilence (Ps 91[3]), beasts (Ezk 14[15. 21]), a smell (2 Mac 9[9]), and a sore (Rev 16[2]), and the meaning is always troublesome, not as now loathsome.* Trench (On AV of NT, p. 47) says that in the beginning of the 17th cent. the word was acquiring its mod. meaning, and on that account Tindale's rendering of 1 Ti 6[9] 'They that wilbe ryche, faule into temptacion and snares, and into many folysshe and noysome lustes,' which all the versions till 1611 (except the Rhemish) accepted, was changed in AV into 'hurtful lusts.' In the Act of Henry VIII. prohibiting the use of Tindale's version (1543) it is stated to be requisite that the land be purged 'of all such bookes, writinges, sermones, disputacions, argumentes, balades, plaies, rimes, songs, teachinges and instructions, as be pestiferous and noysome.' Tindale speaks of the flies in the Egyptian plague as 'noysom' (Ex 8[24]). Cranmer's meaning is the same when he writes to Henry VIII. (Works, i. 160), 'I was purposed this week according to my duties to have waited upon your Grace, but I am so vexed with a catarrh and a rheum in my head, that not only it should be dangerous unto me, but also noisome unto your Grace, by reason of extreme coughing and excreations which I cannot eschew.' But Fuller (Holy State, 305) is more modern: 'When the soul (the best perfume of the body) is departed from it, it becomes so noysome a carcasse, that should I make a description of the lothsomnesse thereof, some dainty dames would hold their noses in reading it.'

NON.—1 Ch 7[27] AV and RVm. See NUN.

NOOMA (A Νοομά, B Ὀομά, AV Ethma, probably due to confusion of OO and EΘ, 1 Es 9[35]).—The name is a corruption of Nebo (נְבוֹ, Ναβού) in the parallel list of Ezr 10[43].

NOPH (נֹף, Μέμφις, Memphis) is named in Is 19[13] with Zoan, in Jer 2[16] with Tahpanhes, 44[1] with Migdol and Tahpanhes, cf. 46[14. 19], and in Ezk 30[13. 16] with other cities as representative of Egypt. Hos 9[6] gives Moph (מֹף, Μέμφις, Memphis). It is clear that as early as the LXX it was regarded as the Hebrew name for Memphis. The early Egyptian name for this city was Mn-nfr, Stele of P'nhy, 87. This would be heard as Mĕn-nūfĕr, and later as Mĕn-nūfe, thence Mĕnfĕ. The Assyrians in the time of Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal already give Mimpi, the Babylonian chronicle Membi (time of Darius). The Coptic forms Memfi, Menfi, and the Arabic Menf show this pronunciation to have been native. The Hebrew transformation may have arisen from dropping the men, the nūfĕ is well preserved in Noph [for another explanation see art. MEMPHIS], and Moph only shows the same change as in Memfi. That Memphis took such a prominent position in Egypt is confirmed by Esarhaddon, who calls it the capital of Tirhakah, and later speaks of it as the residence of Necho along with Sais.

Plutarch's derivation of the name (de Isid. 20) seems to rest on a confusion of the Egyptian mn and mn'i. On the other hand, an attempt to identify Noph with Napata, Tirhakah's Ethiopian capital, is hopeless. For the history of Noph see MEMPHIS.

LITERATURE.—Meyer, Gesch. Ægyp. p. 336; Steindorff, Beitr. Assyr. i. p. 594. C. H. W. JOHNS.

NOPHAH (נֹפַח; Vulg. Nophe), mentioned only in Nu 21[30], by some identified with Nobah of Jg 8[11] [see NOBAH]. If this be allowed, the remainder of the verse must be translated as Syr. 'which is upon the desert' (midhbar), and the Medeba of the MT, AV, RV disappears. Another suggested translation is 'we have laid waste so that fire was kindled unto Medeba.' The LXX [καὶ αἱ γυναῖκες ἔτι προσεξέκαυσαν πῦρ ἐπὶ Μωάβ] translates neither Nophah nor Medeba. But the text of the verse is uncertain. See Dillmann on the passage, and G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 560 note. Cf. art. MEDEBA. A. T. CHAPMAN.

NORTH COUNTRY, THE (אֶרֶץ צָפוֹן).—An expression, occurring nine times in AV, and used vaguely to denote the distant regions N. and N.E. of Palestine, including at least the N. parts of Babylonia, and sometimes almost idealized as the home of Israel's foes. In Jer 6[22] it is the quarter from which Jer. expects the foe—whether Scythians or Babylonians (see LOT 237 f.)—to advance against Judah; 10[22], as also Zec 6[6. 8. 8], the reference is most probably to Babylonia; 23[8] 31[8] it is the quarter whence the exiled Israelites will be restored; 46[10] Carchemish (v.[2]), on the upper course of the Euphrates, nearly N.N.E. of Palestine, is alluded to as 'in the north country'; and 50[9] the foes of Babylon are to assemble from the 'north country.' In Jer 3[18] 16[15], Zec 2[6] the Heb. is also the same (AV, RV 'land of the north'). Naturally, the expression cannot be dissociated from 'the north' alone, which, esp. in Jeremiah, is constantly spoken of as the quarter whence evil or invasion arises (Jer 1[14. 15] 4[6] 6[1] 13[20] 15[12] [prob.], 25[9] 46[20. 24] 47[2]; and against Babylon, 50[3. 41] 51[48]: comp. Is 14[31], of the invading Assyrians; and Ezk 26[7], where Neb. is brought 'from the north'); Jer 3[18] (cf. 3[12]), 16[15] 23[8] 31[8], Zec 2[6], just quoted, show also that it was regarded as the region in which Israel was exiled, and from which it was to be restored. In Zeph 2[13] the 'north' includes Assyria and Nineveh (actually N.E. of Judah). In point of fact, Babylon is almost in the same latitude as Samaria; but Assyr. and Bab. invaders usually entered Palestine from the north; and hence even the latter were pictured as having their home in that direction. That the foes of Babylon should themselves also come from the N. (Jer 50[3. 9. 41] 51[48]) was naturally no difficulty; the expression was a wide and vague one. In Ezk 38[6. 15] 39[2] the hosts of 'Gog' (whom the prophet imagines as invading in vast numbers the restored Israel) are brought up from 'the recesses of the north' (יַרְכְּתֵי צָפוֹן; the same expression in Is 14[13], Ps 48[2]); the thought may have been suggested to Ezekiel by the irruptions of Scythian hordes into Asia, which had recently taken place (Herod. i. 103 ff.).

In Is 41[25] (spoken in Babylonia), Cyrus is spoken of as 'stirred up from the north'; in Dn 11[6. 7. 8. 11. 13. 15. 40. 44] the 'king of the north' denotes the king for the time being of Antioch (opp. to the 'king of the South,' i.e. of Egypt). S. R. DRIVER.

NOSE, NOSTRILS (אַף 'aph, Arab. anf; נְחִירַיִם Job 41[20] [Heb.[12]] only; נְשִׁיר, tr[d] in AV of Job 39[24] 'nostrils,' is given correctly in RV 'snorting').—The expansion of the nostrils and the forcible

* Trench (On AV of NT, p. 47) distinguishes the earlier and later meanings of the word by saying that a tiger would have been noisome in Old English, a skunk or a polecat would be noisome in modern.

ejection of the breath expressed energy and indignation, Job 39[20], Ps 18[15]. On the other hand, the residence of the breath in so small a space taught the insignificance of human life, Is 2[22].

In Ezk 8[17] allusion is made to the custom in sacrificial Baal-worship of putting the branch to the nose. A somewhat similar practice prevails at Jewish ceremonies of circumcision, where perhaps, on account of the natural repugnance to pain and the sight of blood, those present are supplied with small slips of aromatic myrtle. See, further, art. BRANCH.

In Lv 21[18] one of the deformities from which the priest must be free was the blemish translated 'flat-nosed' (שָׂרוּם). So EVV following LXX (κολοβόρ(ρε)ιν), Pesh., Vulg., and Jewish commentators. Driver-White ('Leviticus' in PB) tr. 'mutilated in the face,' and remark 'the word is more probably a general term, the cognate verb in Arabic meaning to pierce or perforate, especially to mutilate (by slitting) the nose, ear, or lip.'

G. M. MACKIE.

NOSE-JEWEL.—See AMULET, JEWEL.

NOTABLE. — This word occurs with various meanings in AV, some of which are out of use. 1. Conspicuous, prominent, Dn 8[5] 'the goat had a notable horn between his eyes' (קֶרֶן חָזוּת, lit., as AVm, 'a horn of sight' or 'of conspicuousness.' So 8[8], where, as well as in v.[21], it is called 'the great horn.'

2. Clearly seen, illustrious (ἐπιφανής), used of a temple in 2 Mac 14[33], and of the Day of the Lord in Ac 2[20] (following the reading of the Sept.).

3. Excelling (εὐπρεπής), 2 Mac 3[26] 'young men . . . notable in strength.'

4. Notorious (ἐπίσημος), Mt 27[16] 'And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas.' Cf. Shaks. All's Well, III. vi. 10, 'A most notable coward, an infinite and endless liar'; and South, Sermons, ii. Ser. 1, 'A notable leading sinner indeed, to wit, the rebel.' In Ro 16[7] the Gr. word is used in the sense of important, of mark, but is translated 'of note' in EV. The adj. 'notable' might have been used, as in Rom. of Partenay, line 2741—

> 'Unto this feste cam barons full many,
> Which notable were and ryght ful honeste.'

5. Unmistakable, well-known (γνωστός), Ac 4[16] 'a notable miracle.' Cf. Chaucer, Prioresses Tale, 233—

> 'O yonge Hugh of Lincoln, slayn also
> With cursed Jewes, as it is notable,
> For it nis but a litel whyle ago.'

6. Noble, highminded (γενναῖος), 2 Mac 6[28] 'a notable example to such as be young to die willingly.'

In its only occurrence notably has the same meaning as that last given for 'notable,' viz. nobly, 2 Mac 14[31] 'he was notably prevented by Judas' policy' (γενναίως, RV 'bravely,' RVm 'nobly'). Cf. Berners, Froissart, ch. clii. 'Wherefore they sayd, they wold send and defye the Frenche kyng notably: and so they did.' The meaning is nearly the same in Shaks. Mids. Night's Dream, v. i. 368 (his only example of the word)—'a fine tragedy . . . and very notably discharged.'

J. HASTINGS.

NOTHING is sometimes used adverbially in AV, like 'no-way,' 'naught,' and 'not' (='no whit'). We should now say 'as nothing' or 'in no respect,' for 'nothing' has completely lost its adverbial force. Thus 1 K 10[21] 'it [silver] was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon' (לֹא נֶחְשָׁב); Job 34[9] 'It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God' (לֹא יִסְכֹּן־גָּבֶר); 2 Mac 7[12] 'he nothing regarded the pains' (ἐν οὐδενί); 9[7] 'he nothing at all ceased from his bragging' (οὐδαμῶς, RV 'in no wise'); Jn 12[19] 'Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing?' (οὐκ ὠφελεῖτε οὐδέν); 1 Ti 4[4] 'For every creature of God is good and nothing to be refused' (οὐδὲν ἀπόβλητον, RV 'nothing is to be rejected'). Cf. Lk 4[35] Rhem. 'And when the Devil had throwen him into the middes, he went out of him, and hurted him nothing'; also the Annotation to Luke 19[8] in Rhem. NT, 'The poore widowes brasse peny was very grateful, because it was al or much of that she had: but the riche man's pound of his superfluitie, though it be good, yet is nothing so grateful.' In Crusoe, p. 60, Defoe uses the word almost as if it were 'not': 'I was nothing near so anxious about my own safety.' Abbott (Shaks. Gram. p. 46) quotes Henry VIII. v. i. 126, 'I fear nothing, what can be said against me,' and points out that 'what' is not put for 'which'; 'nothing' is equivalent to 'not at all.'

In the phrase 'nothing worth' it is probable that 'nothing' is again adverbial, though we have but to transpose the words to find it a substantive. It occurs in Job 24[25] 'who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing worth?' (לְאַל); Wis 2[11] 'That which is feeble is found to be nothing worth' (ἄχρηστον, RV 'of no service'); Bar 6[17. 26]. Cf. Jn 8[54] Tind. 'Jesus answered, Yf I honoure my selfe, myne honoure is nothinge worth' (οὐδέν ἐστιν, Wyc. 'is nought,' other VSS 'is nothing').

NOUGHT.—See NAUGHT.

NOYICE.—The word used in 1 Ti 3[6] to translate the Greek νεόφυτος (neophyte). A bishop is to be 'not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil.' The literal meaning of the word is 'newly planted.' The word neophyte became later a technical term, used to describe those who had been recently baptized, when they wore during the Liturgy their white baptismal robes, were placed near the altar, and received each day. NUMBER.—

1. Numbers and Textual Criticism (figures).
2. Numbers and Rhetoric (round numbers).
3. Numbers and Theology (holy numbers, symbolic numbers, Gematria).

The interpreter of Scripture has to look at the numbers which occur in the sacred texts from other points of view besides those that are usually taken account of in grammar (cf. König, Syntax, pp. 310–338). He has to ask whether such numbers do not fall within the sphere of Textual Criticism, of Rhetoric, or even of Philosophy and Theology.

1. NUMBERS AND TEXTUAL CRITICISM.—(a) In the only inscription which has been preserved to us from the earlier times of the Hebrews, the Siloam Inscription, which, notwithstanding the objections of Pilcher, is to be dated in all probability from the days of Hezekiah (cf. Expos. Times, 1898, p. 292 f.), the numbers are written in full in words: שלש and מאתים ואלפ (lines 2, 5). One sees that we have only a very slender basis for conclusions as to the way in which the ancient Hebrews indicated numbers in their writing. Certainly, the dogmatic judgment must not be passed that the above was the only mode. On the one hand, no doubt, this view is supported by the circumstance that upon the Moabite Stone also (cf. Socin, 'zur Mesa-Inschrift' in Verhandlungen der sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, 1897, ii.) the numbers are written in words: שלשׁ, etc. (lines 2, 8, 16, 20, 28 f.). But, on the other hand, it is to be noted that elsewhere, even at periods when figures were employed, numbers are notwithstanding indicated frequently by words. For instance, in the old Aramaic inscriptions of Zinjirli, we read the numbers שבע (Panammu, line 3) and שלשו (WZKM, 1893, p. 119. It may be noted that the inscription of Bar-Rekub, published by Sachau in Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad. 1896, p. 1051 f., contains no numbers). But in the same inscriptions we find also figures, and the same combination of both methods of indicating numbers recurs also 'on the Assyro-Aramaic lion-weights, where the numbers are expressed first in words and then in symbols' (W. R. Smith, Academy, 1893, No. 1124, p. 444[c]). Again, in the S. Arabian inscriptions the numbers are partly written in full and partly indicated by figures, e.g. שבע וארבעתי, etc., in Halévy, No. 199 (Pratorius, ZDMG xxvi. 748). The Phœnicians also employed both words fully written and figures, e.g. 𐤉 𐤉𐤉𐤉 𐤊 עסר וארבע in the Eshmunazar inscription (CIS i. 14); 𐤉𐤉 אשנם, in an inscription of Citium (i. 36), and the same dittography is found in an inscription of Idalium (i. 102, cf. 151), 𐤉𐤉 שנם (p. 183), 𐤉𐤉 𐤉𐤉𐤉 שמנ, etc. (pp. 109 f., 225). Nay, there are Phœnician inscriptions in which the numbers are written only in words: שלש (p. 203), חמש מאתם, etc. (in a Spanish inscription, No. 166, p. 245), מאת (twice in one inscription, p. 264). The Siloam Inscription may be an instance of an inscription of this kind. This possibility must be conceded all the more that S. Reinach also remarks, in his Traité d'épigraphie grecque (1885, p. 219), 'at all periods the inscriptions furnish also instances, rather rare no doubt, of figures [read 'numbers'] expressed at length in words; e.g. Ταμίαις ἔσοδος μία ἐνενήκοντα λίτραι, κ.τ.λ. (CIG, No. 5640).'

(b) If, then, it is possible that the pre-exilic Hebrews also employed signs for numbers, what kind of figures had they? Of such signs four leading species are known to the present writer:—

(a) In Assyrian 'one' is represented by a vertical wedge (𒁹), and the other units by combinations of such wedges, but 'ten' by a sign which is quite similar to the sign for u (𒌑, cf. in Delitzsch's Assyr. Gramm. p. 18 with p. 40). The other numbers are indicated by combinations of this sign for 'ten' with the vertical and the horizontal wedge. These Assyrian figures might be called purely linear, were it not that the number 'sixty' is expressed by '𒌑 šuši, or soss'; cf. further, C. Bezold, Oriental Diplomacy (London, 1893), p. 120 f., and, above all, Th. Dangin, Recherches sur l'Origine de l'écriture cunéiforme (Paris, 1898), pp. 82 ff., where the figures employed in the oldest cuneiform inscriptions are collected with great completeness.

(β) In the hieroglyphic texts of the Egyptians 'one' is indicated by a vertical line, and the numbers from 'two' to 'nine' by vertical strokes placed side by side (e.g. 𓏺𓏺𓏺). 'In dates the units are indicated also by horizontal strokes (𓍢, 𓍣, etc.).' But the sign for 'ten' is ∩, 'hundred' is represented by 𓆼, etc. (cf. Erman, Aegypt. Gramm. 1894, § 140). Essentially identical is the Phœnician system of figures: 𐤉 to 𐤉𐤉𐤉 𐤉𐤉𐤉 𐤉𐤉𐤉; 'ten' is indicated by 𐤊 or by a similar obliquely drawn and curved line which evidently arose from 𐤏, the earlier form of ע, with which the word עסר 'ten' begins. Then follows a special sign for 'twenty' and for 'hundred' (cf. Schröder, Die Phön. Sprache, p. 186 ff., and CIS i. 30, 40, 43, 50, 94, etc.). Only the sign 𐤏 for 'ten' has been found up till now in the Zinjirli inscriptions, namely 'o^{o}_{o} = 30,' and 'o^{ooo}_{ooo}=70' (Sachau, Ausgrabungen in Sendschirli, 1893, p. 71). Upon the same principle the signs for numbers are chosen in Minæo-Sabæan, where '"one" is expressed by a vertical stroke' (Prätorius, ZDMG xxvi. p. 750), but 'five' by 𐩢, the initial letter of חמש (i) 𐩤𐩢𐩣, if the Minæo-Sabæan letters are transcribed in Ethiopic. The number 'ten' is indicated by the sign 𐤏, an older form of 𐤒 (ṣ), with which the word for 'ten' begins which answers to the Ethiopic ፀዉርፍ. (For the other figures see Prätorius, l.c., and Hommel, Südarab. Chrestomathie, 1893, p. 8.). Only slightly modified is the system of figures which one finds employed in the Palmyrene inscriptions, namely 𐡠 to 𐡠𐡠𐡠𐡠; 'five' = a sign which appears to the present writer to be a simplification of the above S. Arabian 𐩢; 'ten'=a sign which may have arisen from 𐤏 (ʿ), etc. (cf. Merx, Gramm. Syr. p. 17). This second principle upon which numbers are indicated may be called the lineo-acrostic.

(γ) In India an older system of figures was displaced by that which is adopted in the Sanskrit texts: १, ३, ३. etc. (cf. e.g. Stenzler, Elementarbuch der Sanskrit-Sprache, § 7). This way of indicating numbers is the pure acrostic. For the sign १ represents the vowel ए, with which the word एक (eka, 'one') begins, etc. These figures are employed also by the Arabs (cf. ١, ٢, ٣, etc.), who themselves call this method of indicating numbers ar-rakmu-lhindijju (Caspari-Müller, Arab. Gramm.[5] § 33), while Europeans are accustomed to call it the Arabic method.

(δ) The fourth leading method of shortening the expression of numbers is the alphabetic. The following traces of it have been noted by the present writer: the Greek inscriptions of older date show the following figures, Ι, ΙΙ, ΙΙΙ, ΙΙΙΙ, Γ (S. Reinach, l.c. p. 217, recalls the Π of ΠΕΝΤΕ), Γ|, etc., Δ (cf. ΔΕΚΑ), etc. Similar signs are found in inscriptions from Epidauros belonging to the 4th cent. B.C. According to B. Keil (in Hermes, xxv. p. 319), as the present writer's colleague, G. Körte, has pointed out to him, the latest specimens of this system are found in CI Attic. ii. 2, No 985 (written c. 90 B.C.). But somewhat earlier than B.C. 50 the alphabetic system of figures appears to have been introduced, according to B. Keil (in above-cited art. p. 320), and it is found, e.g., in CI Attic. iii. 644 (the time of Augustus or Claudius), etc. 'In the oldest system of this class, the letters possess the following values: A=1, B=2, Γ=3, Δ=4, E=5, Ξ=6, H=7, Θ=8, I=9, K=10, etc.' (Reinach, l.c. p. 220). It is clear from all this that Gow ('The Greek Numeral Alphabet,' in Journal of Philology, 1884, p. 278) has rightly rejected the hypothesis of a Phœnician origin for this Greek method of indicating numbers. The alphabetic method adopted for Greek figures was copied in Coptic-Arabic and in Ethiopic writings (Prätorius, Aeth. Gramm. § 14). Further, in many Syriac manuscripts (cf. the Codices Musei Britannici enumerated by Land in his Anecdota Syriaca, p. 94) one finds signs for numbers which have a genetic connexion with the above-mentioned figures of the Palmyrene inscriptions (cf. further, on the notation of the Syrians, Gottheil, ZDMG, 1889, p. 121 ff.). But these figures, which occur pretty frequently in the Codices of 5th–7th cent., afterwards fell into disuse (Merx, Gramm. Syr. p. 16), and the alphabetic method of indicating numbers was adopted (e.g. ܐ Jûd=10; ܟ Kâph =20, etc.); cf. further, Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. p. 279. This alphabetic method was, and is still, largely employed by the Arabs (Caspari-Müller[5], § 33). It was also partially adopted by the Nabatæans, in whose inscriptions one finds 'a mixed system' of figures (Sachau, ZDMG, 1884, p. 541: 'ten=Jod, and hundred=Koph'), and the same method is not unexampled even in New Persian (cf. Salemann-Shukowski, Neupers. Gramm. p. 4 f.).

The alphabetic method of abbreviating the expression of numbers is what is employed in the later Hebrew inscriptions and books. On those coins which are with the greatest probability dated from the Maccabæan period we find fully written numbers (e.g. ארבע or אחת) and also figures (א, etc.) In the Mishna it is stated that three chests, used in connexion with the cultus of the second temple, were inscribed with אלף, בית, גימל (Shekalim, iii. 2). This usage grew as time went on, and instead of י״ה or ה״י one wrote ט״ו, to avoid suggesting the name יהוה. Traces of this practice are found in Origen (cf. Strack, ZATW, 1884, p. 249; Nestle, ZDMG, 1886, p. 429 f.), in the Cambridge MS of the Mishna (ed. Lowe), and in the Jerus. Talmud (Dalman, Jud-Pal. Aram. 1894, p. 99). Other instances are read in inscriptions from Aden, which are now in the British Museum (cf. Chwolson, CI Heb. col. 126: שנת כט; col. 129: אחרכת, i.e. 1628). But this alphabetic method of indicating numbers need not have been the only one employed by the Hebrews in the course of centuries. They may have in earlier days employed one of the lineo-acrostic systems which were in use among their eastern or western neighbours, and may have passed from this to the alphabetic method, just as the Greeks and the Syrians did. It is, indeed, almost more probable that the Hebrews copied than that they avoided the practice of their neighbours.

(c) From all this it results that the relation of numbers to Textual Criticism is as follows: the possibility is not excluded that the integrity of the numbers of the Old Testament has suffered, seeing that during an earlier or a later period a species of figures was used in the MSS of the biblical text. When, for instance, we read in 2 S 24^{13} 'seven years,' but in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 21^{12} 'three years,' it is natural to suppose that a confusion has taken place between ז and ג. Again, when '15,000 men' is the reading of MT in Jg 8^{10}, but '18,000' in Jos. Ant. v. vi. 5, there may be a confusion between יח and יה. Cf. שׁ(י)לה, Gn 49^{10b} (Samar. שלה), with the Vulg. rendering 'qui mittendus est,' as if Jerome had found in his exemplar a form of שׁלח.

2. Numbers and Rhetoric.—In the exegesis of the Bible, numbers come, further, under various view-points, which can be ranged under the wide category of the stylistic or rhetorical.

(a) A species of synecdoche consists in individualizing, putting forward an example in place of the whole class, e.g. לָשׁוֹן 'the tongue,' Ps 12^{4b} [Eng. ^{3b}], or רְשָׁעִים ‖ צַדִּיק Pr 12^{10ab}. A cognate phenomenon is specializing, i.e. the use of a definite number for a total which, in the mind of the writer, approximates to that number. It is not enough to say with Hirzel (l.c. p. 5) that 'the concrete expression is readily preferred to the abstract.'

(a) It may be said that this employment of a definite number is already present in the use of אחר or אחת 'one' for 'a' or 'some one'; e.g. in Gn 22^{13} אחר is read by some Heb. MSS, and is supported by Sam., LXX, Pesh. (ܚܕ); see other examples from OT and NT, and from Arabic, etc., in König's Syntax, § 73, 291*de*. The same tendency to specialize a total of objects led to the use of two definite numbers instead of one indefinite expression. Thus we find 'one (and, or) two' in Dt 32^{30}, Jer 3^{14}, Ps 62^{11}, Job 33^{14} 40^{5}; cf. the coupling of sing. with dual (Ec 21^{21}, Jg 5^{30} 15^{16}), or of sing. with plural (Ec $2^{8b.3}$); 'two (and, or) three' in 2 K 9^{32}, Is 17^{6a} ('two or three berries'), Am 4^{8} (cf. Hos 6^{2}), Job 33^{29}, Sir 23^{16} 26^{19} 50^{25}, Mt 18^{20}; Arab. jômên telâte, 'two, three days' (Spitta, Gramm. des Arab. Vulgärdialects in Ägypten, § 132^{b}); Syr. 'two, three believers' (Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. § 240 B); 'bis terque' in Cicero, et al.; cf. שְׁלֹשׁוֹם מִבְּמוֹל, ἐχθὲς καὶ τρίτην ἡμέραν, Gn $31^{2.5}$, Ex $5^{7f.14}$ $21^{29.36}$, Dt 4^{42} $19^{4.6}$, Jos 3^{4} 4^{18} 20^{5}, 1 S 4^{7} etc., Ru 2^{11}, 1 Ch 11^{2}; 'three (and, or) four' (cf. Ex 20^{5} ‖ Dt 5^{9}), Jer 36^{23}, Am 1^{3}–2^{6}, Pr $30^{15.18.21.29}$, Sir 26^{5}; Arab. telât arba'a ḥawâgât, 'three, four merchants' (Spitta, § 132*b*); τρισμάκαρες Δαναοὶ καὶ τετράκις (Odyss. v. 306); 'ter et quater' (Hor. Carm. I. xxxi. 13); 'O terque quaterque beati' (Verg. Aen. i. 94); 'four–five' Is 17^{6b}, Arab. telât arba' ḥamas ṭâḳât, 'three, four, five pieces' (Spitta, l.c.); 'five–six' 2 K 13^{19}, cf. 'he sent five and six times' in the Tel el-Amarna letters (Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, Bd. v.), $21^{17.20}$ [cf. 87^{44}]; 'six–seven' Pr 6^{16}, Job 5^{19}; 'seven–eight' Mic 5^{5}, Ec 11^{2}. In all these instances the addition of a second number calls attention to the fact that the first number is not meant to be an exact sum, but one that in the opinion of the writer is approximately correct. Note especially the replacement of δύο in Mt 18^{19} by δύο ἢ τρεῖς in v.^{20}. Hence such an arrangement of numbers was employed in the so-called middah, a kind of riddle: Pr 6^{16-19} $30^{15ff.}$, Sir 23^{16} (δύο εἴδη . . . καὶ τὸ τρίτον, κ.τ.λ.) 25 (cf. v.$^{16.}$) $^{7f.}$ (ἐννέα . . . καὶ τὸ δέκατον, κ.τ.λ.) $26^{5ff.19}$ $50^{25f.}$

This employment of a definite number as the approximate equivalent of an indefinite sum is found also in the following instances:—

(β) 'Two' replaces the indefinite expression 'a few' (Germ. 'ein paar' = 'einige'), Nu 9^{22}, Hos 6^{2a}, Dt 32^{30}, 1 S 11^{11b} (cf. the Arab. 'not two were of a different opinion'), 1 K 17^{12}, Mt 14^{17} 18^{19}; cf. the principle 'the smallest number that can indicate plurality is two' (A. Berliner, Beiträge zur Heb. Gramm. aus Talmud u. Midrasch, p. 42: מיעוט רבים (שנים); and it is not altogether without ground that Dathe says in Glassii Philologia Sacra, i. p. 1257, 'duplum stat (Is 40^{2b} 61^{7}, Jer 16^{18}, Zec 9^{12}, Rev 18^{6}) pro multo, vel eo quod plus satis est.'

(γ) 'Three' is a still more frequent expression for a small total, cf. Gn 30^{36} $40^{10.12}$ 42^{17}, Ex 2^{2} 3^{18} 5^{3} 8^{27} 10^{22} 15^{22} (cf. 'the third,' 19^{11}), Lv 19^{23}, Jos 1^{11} $2^{16.22}$, 2 S 24^{13}, 1 K 12^{5}, 2 K $11^{5f.}$ 13^{18b} (20^{5}), Is 16^{14} 20^{3}, Jon 1^{17}, Est 4^{16}, Dn 1^{5}, 1 Ch 21^{12}, Sir $25^{1f.}$. The origin of this use of 'three' is not far to seek. Observation of nature and history supplied not a few examples of objects and events made up of three main parts: e.g. root, trunk, and corona of a tree; head, trunk, and legs of a body; source, stream, and embouchure of a river; the right, the left, and the middle portion of an article; heaven, earth, and She'ôl (Ex 20^{4} ‖ Dt 5^{8}, Ps 139^{8} etc.); morning, noon, and evening; the beginning, the middle, and the end of a process.

(δ) The number 'seven' is not infrequently employed in an exact sense, as in the case of the seven days of the week (Gn 2^{2}, Ex $20^{9f.}$), or of a wedding-feast (Jg $14^{12.17}$; To 11^{19} ὁ γάμος . . . ἑπτὰ ἡμέρας), for such a feast is called 'the week' (Gn $29^{27a.28a}$) or 'the king's week' (Wetzstein, Zeitschr. f. Ethnologie, v. 287 ff.), and a γάμος ἡμερῶν δέκα τεσσάρων (To 8^{19}) is an exception. It is not to be doubted that the exact number 'seven' is meant also in the following passages: 'seven priests' Jos 6^{4}; 'seven locks' Jg $16^{13.19}$; 1 S 10^{8} 11^{3} 13^{8}, 2 S 21^{6}, 1 K 18^{43}, Ezk $3^{15f.}$, Zec 3^{9}, Pr 9^{1} (cf. 2 Ch $21^{1f.}$); the 'seven princes of Persia and Media' Est 1^{14} (confirmed by Justi, Gesch. des alten Persiens, p. 61). But elsewhere 'seven' is merely a round expression for a moderately large number: Gn 4^{15} 7^{4} 31^{23} 33^{3} (or are we to suppose that Jacob counted exactly the number of times he bowed?; cf. 'seven and seven times fell I at the feet of my lord the king' [Tel el-Amarna letters in KIB v. $38^{4f.}$ 39^{4-6} 40^{5} 42^{3} etc. 179^{3}]), Ex 7^{25}, Lv $26^{18.}$ (so taken by Dillmann-Ryssel, Ex–Lv, 1897, ad loc.) $^{24.28}$, Dt $28^{7.25}$, Jg 16^{7}, 1 S 2^{5}, 2 S 24^{13}, 2 K 4^{35} ('the child sneezed until seven times') 8^{1}, Is 4^{1} ('seven women shall take hold of one man') 11^{15} 30^{26}, Jer 15^{9}, Ezk $39^{9.12}$, Ps 12^{6} 79^{12} 119^{164}, Pr 6^{31a} (cf. v.^{31b}), Ex 21^{36} 22^{1-3}) 24^{16} $26^{16.25}$, Job 2^{13} 5^{19}, Ru 4^{15}, Dn 3^{19b},

1 Ch 21[12], Sir 7[3] 20[11] [Eng. [12]] 32[11] (=35[13]) 37[14] (=v.[18]) 40[8], To 3[8] 6[13] 7[11] 12[15], 2 Mac 7[1], 4 Mac 1[8], Mt 12[45] 18[21] 22[25], Mk 16[9], Lk 17[4], Ac 19[14]; 'the seventh heaven' in Ascension of Isaiah ix. 1; 'seven visions' 4 Ezr 3–14; 'seven days God spoke with Moses in the thorn-bush' (Seder 'olam rabba, ch. 5). This characteristic of the number 'seven' is shared by its half (Dn 9[27b] 12[7b], Lk 4[25], Ja 5[17], Rev 11[2] etc.) and its double (Gn 46[21] [?], Lv 12[5], Nu 29[13b], 1 K 8[65], To 8[19], Mt 1[17]), for, at least in this last passage, δεκατέσσαρες is not used in its exact sense. This employment of 'seven' is pretty accurately interpreted in the words of Adrianos (Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς [cf. König's Einleitung, i. 520], § 85): 'τὸν ἑπτὰ ἀριθμὸν ἐπὶ πλεονασμοῦ λέγει (ἡ γραφή) εἴτ' οὖν ἐπὶ τελείου ἀριθμοῦ.' Moreover, the origin of this usage is not difficult to discover. The regular recurrence of the seven days of the week, which again was a reflexion of the phases of the moon (cf. Philo, Leg. Allegor. i. 4: τροπαὶ σελήνης ἑβδομάσι γίνονται), impressed 'seven' so deeply on the human mind that one fixed upon this number almost involuntarily when one desired to indicate a sum of moderate size. The use of 'seven' lay all the readier to hand the more clearly this number shone forth from the 'seven' stars of Arcturus (Job 9[9] 38[32] 'with his sons'), which frequently supplied the place of the compass to the shepherd and the traveller. Further, an acquaintance with the Pleiades (כִּימָה Am 5[8], Job 9[9] 38[31]) and the planets (cf. Schrader, KAT[2] 18 ff.) may have favoured the use of the number 'seven.' But there is no ground for the words of Augustine (de Civitate Dei, xi. 31), 'totus impar primus numerus ternarius est, totus par quaternarius; ex quibus duobus septenarius constat. Ideo pro universo sæpe ponitur.'

(ε) The number 'seventy' also bears not infrequently an approximate sense. The following series of passages appear to the present writer to exhibit this characteristic of 'seventy' upon an ascending scale: Gn 46[27], Ex 1[5], Dt 10[22]; Ex 24[1. 9], Nu 11[16. 24f.], Ezk 8[11], Lk 10[1]; Ex 15[27], Nu 33[9], Jg 1[7] 8[30] 9[2. 4f. 18. 24. 56] 12[14], 2 S 24[15], 2 K 10[1]; Ps 90[10] (Solon, ap. Herod. i. 32, says: ἐς ἑβδομήκοντα ἔτεα οὖρον τῆς ζόης ἀνθρώπῳ προτίθημι), Is 23[15], Jer 25[11] 29[10], Zec 1[12] 7[5], Dn 9[2. 24ff.]; ἑβδομήκοντα (Jth 1[2]), and in the same way we must explain the reading '170 thousand' (7[2]) in opposition to '120 thousand' (2[5]); 'and he slew seventy relations' (Zinjirli, Pan. l. 3); cf. the seventy days of the Egyptian mourning (Gn 50[3b]) or their embalming (Herod. ii. 86, 88). The same round character belongs to the expressions 'seventy and sevenfold' (Gn 4[24]), and 'seventy times seven' (Mt 18[22]); cf. 'seven thousand' (1 K 19[18], Ro 11[4], Rev 11[13], Mêsha' inscr. l. 16).

(ζ) 'Twelve' is used in an approximate sense, when exactly 'twelve wells of water' are mentioned along with 'seventy palm trees' (Ex 15[27]). This employment of 'twelve' might be readily enough suggested by the number of the months (1 K 4[7], 1 Ch 27[1]) and the twelve stations (mazzalôth or mazzarôth) of the zodiac, 2 K 23[5], Job 38[32] (Arab. al-manâzilu, 'stationes lunæ'). Philo remarks on the 'twelve wells of Elim' (Ex 15[27]): τέλειος δ' ἀριθμὸς ὁ δώδεκα, μάρτυς δὲ ὁ ζωδιακὸς ἐν οὐρανῷ κύκλος, τοσούτοις κατηστερισμένος φωσφόροις ἄστροις. Μάρτυς καὶ ἡ ἡλίου περίοδος· μησὶ γὰρ δώδεκα τὸν ἑαυτοῦ περατοῖ κύκλον, ἰσαρίθμους τε τοῖς ἐνιαυτοῦ μησὶ τὰς ἡμέρας καὶ τὰς νυκτὸς ὥρας ἄγουσιν ἄνθρωποι (de Profugis, § 33). Compare the twelve discharges of water (Apoc. Bar chs. 53–68: 'aquæ duodecimæ lucidæ quas vidisti,' etc.); the twelve socles on the tombstone of Cyrus at Persepolis (Justi, Altpers. Gesch. p. 46); the 'duodecim tabulæ legum'; 'twelve men' (Tel el-Amarna letters, l.c. 81[8]); and the modern 'dozen.'

(η) That 'forty' serves as a round number may be gathered from such facts as the following: Isaac and Esau marry at the age of forty (Gn 25[20] 26[34]); according to Ex 2[11] 'Moses went out unto his brethren when he was grown,' but according to Ac 7[23] 'when he was full forty years old'; Caleb says (Jos 14[7]), 'forty years old was I when Moses sent me,' etc., and Ish-bosheth was forty years old when he began to reign (2 S 2[10]). Again, we meet with 3 times forty years in Gn 6[3], and in the life of Moses, Ex 7[7], Ac 7[23. 30], Dt 34[7]; cf. ἔτεα ἐς εἴκοσι καὶ ἑκατὸν τοὺς πολλοὺς τῶν Ἰχθυοφάγων ἀπικνέεσθαι (Herod. iii. 23). Further, reigns and other periods of forty years present themselves in Jg 3[11] 5[31] 8[28] 13[1], 1 S 4[18], 2 S 5[4], 1 K 2[11] 11[42] (‖ 1 Ch 29[27], 2 Ch 9[30]) 24[1], and a reign of forty years is attributed also to Saul in Ac 13[21] and Jos. Ant. VI. xiv. 9. Then we have the 'forty' years of the wilderness wanderings, Ex 16[35], Nu 14[33f.] 32[13], Dt 2[7] 8[2] 29[4], Jos 5[6], Am 2[10] 5[25], Ps 95[10], Neh 9[21]. But in other instances than these the number 'forty' is used with not less surprising frequency, see Ex 24[18] 26[19] 34[28] (cf. Lv 12[2-5]), Nu 13[25], Dt 9[9. 11. 18. 25] 10[10] 25[3], Jg 12[14], 1 S 17[16] (in 2 S 15[7] 'forty' as a familiar number has certainly been written in place of 'four'; cf. the ܐܪܒܥ of the Pesh. and the τέσσαρες of Jos. Ant. VII. ix. 1), 1 K 5[6] 7[38] 19[8], 2 K 8[9], Ezk 4[6] 29[11-13] 41[2] 46[22], Jon 3[4], Neh 5[15], 1 Ch 12[36]; τεσσεράκοντα Mt 4[2], Ac 1[3] 23[13. 21], Jth 1[4], Bel (LXX)[2], Apoc. Bar 76[4], 2 Es 14[23]; ארבעין 'forty years,' Mêsha' inscrip. l. 8; cf. the 'forty' days of the Egyptian embalming (Gn 50[3a]; Diod. Sic. [ed. Bekker], i. 91: πλείους τῶν τριάκοντα); Herod. i. 202 (ὁ Ἀράξης στόμασι ἐξερεύγεται τεσσεράκοντα), ii. 29 (δοιπορίην ποιήσεται ἡμερῶν τεσσεράκοντα), iv. 73 (among the Scythians ἡμέρας τεσσεράκοντα οἱ ἰδιῶται περιάγονται, ἔπειτα θάπτονται). Many other instances from Greek and Roman writers have been collected by Hirzel (l.c. pp. 6 ff., 57 f.). Further, Brugsch (Steininschrift[2], etc. p. 313) remarks that 'forty years' means in the Persian language even at the present day nothing more than 'many years.' 'The well-known animal which we call centipede [Ger. Tausendfuss] bears amongst the Persians the name Tschihil-pâi, i.e. "forty foot," and the Turks call the same creature Kyrk ajakly, i.e. "forty-footed"' (Hirzel, l.c. p. 41). Note, also, the 'forty thousand' in Jos 4[13], Jg 5[8], 2 S 10[17f.], 1 K 4[25], 1 Ch 12[38], 1 Mac 12[41], 2 Mac 5[14], Jos. Ant. VII. xiii. 1.

The way to understand this use of the number 'forty' is indicated in the OT itself. A whole generation, with few exceptions, was doomed to die in the wilderness (Nu 14[22f.] 26[64]), and this sojourn in the wilderness of the Sinaitic Peninsula lasted for (about) 'forty' years (Nu 14[33] 20[22ff.] 32[13] 33[38f.], Dt 2[7] etc.). Consequently forty years is the approximate expression for the duration of a generation (called in Heb. דּוֹר; Arab. dârun, lit. περίοδος). Besides, from the frequent notices that such and such a one married at the age of forty or entered upon an office at that age (Gn 25[20] etc.) and that a somewhat prolonged life consisted of three times forty years, we gather that the notion prevailed that the full development of human life was reached about the fortieth year, the so-called ἀκμή. In any case, this thought is expressed in the words 'till he reached his full strength ('ašuddahu) and attained the age of forty years' (Ḳoran, xlvi. 14)—words which explain the tradition that Mohammed received his call to be a prophet at the age of forty, as well as account for the very frequent employment of 'forty' by the Arabs as a round number (Hirzel, l.c. p. 39). The idea of the ἀκμή of human life is the source from which Hirzel (l.c. p. 62) derives the explanation of the remarkable prevalence of 'forty.' Perhaps, however, it ought to be added that Lepsius (Chronol. der Ægypter, p. 15) assumes that the Heb. 'arba'îm may have found favour on account of its assonance with rabbîm, 'many.' But the view of Pott (Zählmethode, p. 99), that 'forty' as the product of 20×2 obtained preference because of the earlier predominance of 'twenty,' cannot be established at least for Semitic peoples. Too slender a basis belongs also to the theory of J. Grimm (Rechtsalterthümer, p. 219), that 'forty' arose from $3 \times 13 + 1$ (see, more fully, Hirzel, l.c. p. 61), and as little are there clear grounds for the supposition that 'four, as the number of the square, of the quarters of the globe, and of the four parts of the day (?), is the number of completeness' (Bähr, Symbolik des mos. Cultus, i. 155 f.).

The approximate sense we have claimed for 'forty' has recently been denied by J. C. A. Kessler (Chronol. iudicum et primorum regum, 1882, p. 12) in the words, 'fides historica numeri 40 annorum non dubia est; nam sæpius huius spatii partes commemorantur (Dt 2^{14}, 2 S 5^5, 1 K 2^{11}, 1 Ch 29^{27}) et in eo singuli anni vel menses numerantur (Ex 19^1, Nu 10^{11} 20^1, Dt 1^3).' But these data would invalidate the approximate value of the number 'forty' only if the portions of time enumerated made up exactly a duration of forty years; cf. the τεσσεράκοντα ἔτεα of the reign of Battos of Cyrene, which, according to Herod. iv. 157–159, were made up of $2+6+32$ years, and which are wrongly regarded by Hirzel (l.c. p. 50) as a fictitious number. Would the Hebrews and other peoples have used the number 'forty' so frequently if it had not been a round sum? Julius Oppert, again (Salomon et ses successeurs, 1877, p. 11), has adduced many historical parallels in defence of the exactness of the '480 years' of 1 K 6^1. He considers that the Roman Republic lasted from 510–30 B.C., and the Parthian Empire from 256 B.C.–225 A.D. Now, let us grant that both these calculations are absolutely certain, although one may cast doubt both on the year B.C. 30 as the last year of the Republic of Rome and on the date assigned for the beginning of the Parthian Empire; nevertheless, doubts are awakened when the statement is read in the Hebrew Scriptures that two events were separated by an exact space of 480 years, for, in view of the series of passages we have cited, it must be evident that 'forty' in Hebrew usage bore an approximate sense, and, besides, twelve generations are counted in 1 Ch 5^{29-34} [Eng. 6^{3-8}] from Moses to Solomon.

(θ) The number 'five' also has at times the character of a familiar (Gn 43^{34}, Jg 18^2, 1 S 17^{40} 21^3) and approximate number: Lv 22^{14} 26^8, 1 S 17^5, 2 K 7^{13}, Is 19^{18} (against Hitzig, ad loc.) 30^{17}, Mt $14^{17.\ 21}$ (‖ Mk $6^{38.\ 44}$, Lk 9^{13}, Jn 6^9), 1 Co 14^{19}, 2 Es 14^{24}. Could the number of the fingers fail to give rise to such a usage? (So, too, Hirzel, l.c. p. 2, derives this employment of 'five' from 'the constant beholding of the fingers'). Cf. 'five' in the Tel el-Amarna letters (l.c.), 9^{18} 10^{12} $16^{39f.}$ 26^9 85^{17}. It may be noted that analogies to the 'six' fingers of 2 S 21^{20} (‖ 1 Ch 20^6) and the 'sedigiti' of Pliny (Nat. Hist. xi. 43) have been collected, especially by Zöckler in Lange's Bibelwerk (on 1 Ch 20^6).

(ι) To the same source must be traced the frequent use and the round sense of 'ten,' which one may note in Gn 31^7, Lv 26^{26}, Nu 14^{22} (? Jg 6^{27}), 1 S 1^8 (17^{17}, 2 S 18^{11}, 1 K 14^3, 2 K 5^5), Is 6^{13}, Am 5^3, Zec 8^{23}, Job 19^3, Ec 7^{19} (Neh 5^{18}), Mt 25^1, Lk 15^8, Rev 2^{10}, To 4^{20}, Enoch 93; and the 'ten temptations of Abraham' (Book of Jubilees, ch. xix.) set in their proper light the 'ten' temptations of Nu 14^{22} (J. H. Kurtz, Gesch. d. Alten Bundes, ii. 398, has rightly said, 'the attempts to reckon exactly ten historical temptations cannot be carried through without violence'). Cf. the 'ten persecutions' in Augustine, de Civitate Dei, xviii. 52. It is interesting to note that even in the book Jeṣirah the 'ten' spheres are deduced from the number of the fingers (ch. i. § 3, ed. Rittangel, p. 195: עשר ספירות מספר עשר אצבעות); cf. for 'ten times' the Tel el-Amarna letters, $17^{33.\ 63}$ 20^{22} 21 (obverse)^{11}-(reverse)^{34} $22^{32.\ 46.\ 56}$ $23^{12.\ 18}$ etc.

(κ) It was no less natural to employ 'fifty' (5×10) as a round number. Examples of its use in this way are found in Gn 6^{15} 7^{24} 8^3 18^{24}, Ex 18^{21} etc. 26^5 etc., Lv 23^{16} 25^{10} etc. 27^3, Nu $4^{3ff.}$ 16^2, Dt 22^{29}, Jos 7^{21}, 1 S 6^{19}, 2 S 24^{24}, 1 K 18^4, 2 K 1^9, Is 3^3 etc., Ezr 8^6 etc.; πεντήκοντα in Jth 1^2; חמשׁ in Mêsha' inscrip. l. 28.

(λ) Such approximate quantities were naturally also the numbers 'hundred' (e.g. in Lv 26^8, 1 S 24^3, Pr 17^{10}, Ec 6^3 8^{12}, 1 Ch 21^3, Mt 19^{29} (TR), Mk 10^{30}, Lk 8^8; ἑκατόν To 14^{11} (cf. v.^{2}), Jth 10^{17}; מאת Mêsha' inscr. l. 29) and 'thousand' (Ex 20^6 34^7, Dt 1^{11} 7^9 32^{30}, 1 S 18^7 21^{11} 29^5, 2 S 18^{12}, Is 30^{17} 60^{22}, Jer 32^{18}, Am 5^3, Mic 6^7, Ps 50^{10} 84^{10} 90^4 91^7 105^8 119^{72}, Job 9^3 33^{23}, Ec 6^6 7^{28}, 1 Ch 12^{14} 16^{15}), and אֶלֶף has also, according to its etymology, the general sense of 'union, association.' The remark of Hirzel (l.c. p. 2) may, further, be noted: 'the numbers "ten," "hundred," "thousand," each commence a series which in a certain sense is dominated by them.'

(b) At least the number 'thousand' has a rhetorical use of a second kind. Numbers of this kind are not infrequently due to the tendency to hyperbole, traces of which may be observed in the comparison of Abraham's seed to 'the dust of the earth,' etc. (Gn 13^{16} etc.), as is admitted even by Flacius (Clavis script. sacræ, ii. 152, 383 ff.). To the same department of rhetoric belong many larger numbers, e.g. 'seven thousand' (1 K 19^{18} etc.), 'ten thousand' (Lv 26^8, Dt 32^{30}, 1 S 18^7 21^{11} 29^5, Ezk 16^7, Hos 8^{12}, Mic 6^7, Ps 3^6 68^{17} 91^7, Ca 5^{10}, μυριότης Wis 12^{22}), 'seventy thousand' (2 S 24^{15}), 'thousand thousand' (Dn 7^{10}, 1 Ch 21^5 22^{14}, 2 Ch 14^9), 'thousand myriads' (Gn 24^{60}), 'myriads of thousands' (Nu 10^{36}), 'a myriad of myriads' (Dn 7^{10}), and 'myriads of myriads' (Enoch xxxix.). Cf. πῶς οὐ δεκάκις, μᾶλλον δὲ μυριάκις δίκαιός ἐστ' ἀπολωλέναι (quoted from Demosthenes by R. Volkmann, Rhetorik der Griechen u. Römer, 1874, p. 374). Other analogies are presented by the Latin phrases 'sexcenti, sexcenties,' etc., collected especially by Hunziker, Die Figur der Hyperbel in den Gedichten Vergils (1896), p. 37 ff. A measure of truth lies also in the remark of Hirzel (l.c. p. 3), that the general numbers give requisite scope to the human imagination.

3. NUMBERS AND THEOLOGY. — A special relation of biblical numbers to theology has yet to be considered, in connexion with the question whether many numbers do not possess either a certain sacredness or a symbolical meaning.

(a) The reverence for, or sacredness attached to, certain numbers. — The latter quality has its natural sources and degrees. For instance, the connexion of a number with an important element either in the national fortunes or in the religious conceptions, might procure for that number a lower or a higher respect. Traces of this so-called sacredness of numbers are not wholly wanting in the Bible. Let us follow these traces, in order that we may use the possible sources and degrees of this phenomenon as normative.

(α) An extremely important feature in the national recollections of Israel was the number of the tribes, which may have originated substantially as is indicated in the Book of Genesis, in spite of the opinion to the contrary held by many recent commentators (cf. art. by the present writer on 'Israel's Historical Recollections' in Expos. Times, 1898, p. 349). Hence we might explain a certain loftiness of character attaching to 'twelve' as well as the frequent use of this number. The instances we have in view are not those where 'twelve' manifestly stands in direct or indirect relation to the tribes of Israel, as in Ex 24^4 28^{21} ('twelve stones in the breastplate of the high priest'), Lv 24^5, Nu 7[3ff.], Jos 4[2f.], 1 K 18[31], Ezk 48[31], Ezr 6[17b] 8[35], Mt 19[28], cf. the 24 classes of the priests (1 Ch 24[4]) and Levites (25[31]) and the 24 elders (Rev 4[4]); the 48 Levitical cities (Nu 35[7]); the 72 men (Nu 11[24. 26]); the 144,000 sealed ones (Rev 7[4]); the twelve baskets (Mt 14[20]); the twelve legions of angels (26[53]); the twelve gates of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21[12ff.]). Rather have we in view especially the twelve generations that are enumerated from Aaron to Ahimaaz in 1 Ch 5[29-34] and 6[35-38] [Eng. 6[3-8] and [50-53]]. Another important element in the national consciousness of the Israelites was the recollection of the [about] forty years of the wilderness wanderings, as is proved by the frequent allusions to these (see the passages cited above in 2, α, η); and this recollection was of a very serious and mournful character. Hence it is intelligible that the round number 40 should be chosen just in those passages where the duration of a serious situation was to be indicated, as, for example, in the 40 days of punishment, of fasting, and of repentance, Gn 7[4. 12. 17] 8[6], Ex 24[18] 34[28], Dt 9[9. 11. 18] 10[10], 1 S 17[16], 1 K 19[8], Jon 3[4], Mt 4[2].

(β) A fundamental element in the religious experience of Israel was the receiving of the 'ten' commandments (Ex 20[2-17] ‖ Dt 5[6-18]), which three times are expressly called 'the ten words' (Ex 34[28], Dt 4[13] 10[4]); cf. also the ten candlesticks in the sanctuary (1 K 7[49]). It would be no wonder, then, if the sanctity of those fundamental commandments passed over to their number, a process which may have been favoured by the circumstance of the ten times repeated 'and God said,' by which the world was made (Gn 1[3-29]), unless, indeed, the ten repetitions of this formula were themselves due to the significance of the number 'ten.' The present writer feels disposed to adopt this last suggestion, because the combination of those ten וַיַּרְא with the seven 'and God saw that (it was) good' (Gn 1[4. 10. 12. 18. 21. 25. 31]), and with the three 'and God blessed' (1[22. 28] 2[3]), appears too striking to allow the concurrence of those three numbers, 'ten,' 'seven,' and 'three,' to be set down as fortuitous. The same conclusion is specially favoured by the fact that the formula of approval, καὶ ἴδεν ὁ θεὸς ὅτι καλόν, is repeated in the LXX eight times, the additional instance being 1[3b]. It is more likely that the number was reduced to seven from an original eight than, conversely, that seven occurrences of the formula were expanded to eight.

(γ) If we are right in the above supposition, the position is all the more established that 'seven' had, in the estimation of the Hebrews, a certain measure of sanctity attached to it. This position is, however, very probable upon other grounds as well. For instance, next to the ark with the ten commandments, which of the fittings of the sanctuary was counted more sacred than the seven-branched candlestick (Ex 25[32], 1 K 7[49], Zec 4[11])? Was it not this which symbolized the illumination bestowed by the Spirit of God (cf. Is 11[2])? And how the reverence for the number 'seven' must have been augmented by the circumstance that this number, derived from the revolution of the moon, etc. (see above, 2, α, δ), was connected with the Sabbath and many of the festal seasons! Finally, what a powerful contribution to the sacredness of 'seven' was supplied by the act of swearing, which, through the ceremonies practised (Gn 21[28ff.]) and the name (nishba') applied to it, connected itself with the number 'seven' (sheba'), a number which could be read off from the stars! Even if this connexion of 'seven' with holy utensils, seasons, and transactions was itself a secondary one, yet, once it was established, it must have tended greatly to promote the frequent use of the number 'seven,' and it is perhaps to the sacredness of 'seven' that we must attribute its selection in the following instances: the fitting up of the place of worship (1 K 7[17], Ezk 40[22. 26] 41[3], cf. Pr 9[1]); the detailing of acts of ritual ('the priest shall sprinkle of the blood seven times,' etc., Lv 4[6. 17] 8[11] 14[7ff.] 16[14], Nu 19[4], 2 K 5[10]), or the specification of the objects required in the cultus ('seven' lambs, etc. Nu 28[11ff.], Ezk 45[23], 2 Ch 29[21]); cf. the seven sons of Saul who were 'hanged before the LORD' (2 S 21[9]); and the seven locks of the Nazirite Samson (Jg 16[13. 19]) appear to the present writer to have a necessary connexion with the act of swearing.

Besides, this connexion of 'seven' with religious conceptions was common to the Israelites and those peoples in whose neighbourhood they lived at different times. Note, in the Bab.-Assyrian poem 'Die Höllenfahrt der Ištar' (ed. A. Jeremias, 1887), the seven gates through which Ishtar descended to the 'land without return' (Obverse l. 63, Reverse ll. 14, 45). Further, note the seven altars which Balaam, who was sent for from Mesopotamia (Pitru on the Euphrates), caused to be erected in Moab (Nu 23[1. 4. 14. 29]); the seven sacrificial victims directed to be offered by the three friends of Job 'in the land of Uz' (Job 42[8]); and the circumstance that 'with the Egyptians also "seven" was a holy number' (Ebers, Ægypten und die Bücher Mose's, p. 339). The combination of this number with the cultus was, therefore, probably an inheritance which the Hebrews brought with them when they migrated from their home in the East. Now, we observe that this combining of 'seven' with religious conceptions shows itself in an augmented measure in the post-exilic period. For instance, 'ox and fatling' of 2 S 6[13] is replaced in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 15[26], by 'seven bullocks and seven rams,' and 'the seven holy angels' are mentioned in To 12[15]. This may, of course, be the product of a process of development within Judaism itself. It is the Esoteric-Priestly source (P) of the Pentateuch that has first to tell us that 70 descendants of Jacob went down to Egypt (Gn 46[27]; cf. on the 70 or 72 names in Gn 10 König's Einleitung, p. 231), and the Chronicler means to enumerate 70 descendants of Noah (1 Ch 1[5-23]) and of Abraham (vv.[29-42]); cf. the 70 disciples (Lk 10[1f.]), the seven spirits of God (Rev 1[4] etc.), the 'seven prophetesses' (Seder 'olam rabba, ch. 21). But if a foreign source is to be sought for the growing disposition to connect 'seven' with religious notions, the influence of Babylonia suggests itself most readily, for we read 'the names of the angels came in their hand from Babylon' (Jerus. Rosh hashshanah, i. 4: שמות המלאכים עלו בידן מבבל). Hence, if the notion of 'seven' angels is to be attributed to foreign influence at all, the present writer prefers to trace this influence to Babylonia rather than to Persia, whose claims Riehm (HWB[1] p. 1779*b*) sought to establish. Riehm's view is all the less certain because elsewhere only 'four' supreme angels are mentioned (Enoch ix. 39, Apoc. Bar 6[4]), and in considering the Persian origin of the 'seven eyes' of Zec 3[9] 4[10] one must not leave out of account the language of Is 45[7] ('I form the light and create darkness,' etc.) and of Zec 8[23].

(δ) Finally, the thrice repeated 'and God blessed' (Gn 1[22. 28] 2[3]) raises the question how far the number 'three' comes into connexion with the religious contents of the Bible. The answer can only be that there are very few traces of 'three' in the cultus and the religious conceptions of the Israelites. All that the OT offers on this point is the following: The sanctuary of Jahweh is composed of three main divisions, the Court, the Holy Place, and the Holy of Holies (Ex 26[33] 27[9], 1 K 6[16f.] etc.). In the blessing formula of Nu 6[22-24] the name Jahweh is thrice repeated, and three pairs of actions are predicated of Him. The threefold mention of the Divine name occurs also in Jos 22[22], Jer 7[4], and Nah 1[2]. Further, Jahweh Zebaoth is thrice called holy in Is 6[3]. This threefold use of a word is a species of Epizeuxis which is found in other instances as well (Gn 9[25b. 26a. 27b], Jer 22[29], Ezk 21[32]), and is a circumlocution for the superlative. (So also in Egyptian, according to Brugsch, Steininschrift, etc. p. 310, the use of 'good, good, good' serves as a substitute for the superlative, 'the best'). This relative rarity of a connexion between 'three' and religious notions, which prevails in the OT, should not be made good from other sources. The thunder call, 'Hear, O Israel, Jahweh is our God, Jahweh (the?) one' (Dt 6[4], cf. Is 41[4] 44[6] 48[12]), drowns the voice of those who refer us to the triads of gods that were adored by the Babylonians, Assyrians (Anu, Bel, and Ea, etc. [Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. pp. 517, 523]), and other nations of antiquity. It was only in the course of the later development of Israel's religion that the Old Test. 'I am that I am' (Ex 3[14]) was parted into ὁ ὤν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος (Rev 1[4] 4[8]); cf. the evolution of the קדוש קדוש קדוש of Is 6[3] which meets us in the mysterious sentence קדוש שמו בשלשה כפרים בסגר וסתר וטיפור (Jeṣîrah, ch. i. § 1). But the original meaning of the OT text must not be modified to suit either heathen parallels or later stages in its own development.

The question has still to be put why in one series of passages it is 'three' and in another 'seven' or some other of the round (holy) numbers that is chosen. The proper answer appears to be that seven was preferred to three (e.g. 2 K 13[18b], Sir 25[12], Rev 9[12] the 'three woes') when it was desired to indicate a larger quantity. This seems to be the principle at work, e.g., in the first seven of the seventy 'weeks' (Dn 9[24]), or the 'seven churches of Asia Minor' (Rev 1[4]), or the 'seven golden vials, full of the wrath of God' (15[7]).

(b) The question of the symbolical character of many numbers.—The biblical numbers would be of immense importance for the material side of exegesis if it could be established that many of those numbers are used to indicate certain ideas.

Now, to cast a glance first of all over the history of this question, the Old Testament itself has no positive note as to a secret meaning of the numbers it employs. Such an indication cannot be discovered in the statement that the Tabernacle was constructed after a heavenly pattern (Ex 25[9]). Nothing more than an inquiry into the meaning of numbers is ascribed to Daniel (9[2]; cf. 'the prophets have inquired,' etc., 1 P 1[10f.]). Josephus, too, was content to write in the Προοίμιον to his Ἀρχαιολογία (§ 4) that Moses says some things in an enigmatic way (alvittesθai). Yet he did not interpret the numbers of Gn 1 in Ant. I. i. The same is the case in Midrash Bereshith rabba, and a simple counting of the number of occurrences of ויאמר in Gn 1[3-29] without an explanation of the significance of the number is all that we find in Mishna Aboth v. 1. But, among the Hellenistic Jews, Aristobulus had already, according to Eusebius (Præp. Evang. xiii. 12, 13 ff.), interpreted the number 'seven,' and Philo followed zealously in his footprints in his work Περὶ τῆς Μωυσέως κοσμοποιίας. Further, the interpretation of numbers was cultivated in the Haggadic portions of the Talmud and other Jewish writings (cf. e.g. Schegg, Bibl. Archäol. 1888, p. 419), and in Jeṣîrah and Zohar. Such a reference of biblical numbers to the sphere of ideas might have its basis in the primary or in the secondary origin of many numbers. But—

(a) The view that certain numbers, on account of their factors or coefficients, came to be used to express ideas, is not a plausible one. Yet Philo (de Plantatione, § 29) says, ἑβδομὰς ἐκ τριῶν καὶ τετράρων, while he derived ἐννέα from 'eight' and 'one,' finding the 'eight' ἐν οὐρανῷ and the 'one' ἐν ὕδατι καὶ ἀέρι, τούτων γὰρ μία συγγένεια, τροπὰς καὶ μεταβολὰς παντοίας δεχομένων (de Congressu, § 19); cf. ἓν καὶ δύο καὶ τρία καὶ τέτταρα δέκα γεννᾷ (de Plant. § 29). Let the reader recall the sentences from Augustine and Bahr quoted above (2, a, δ, η). But Philo (de Profugis, § 33) did not attempt to derive a symbolical sense of 'twelve' from the possible components of this number, and it is incomprehensible how a reference to the factors of twelve could be found in the distribution of the precious stones on the breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28[21ff.] 39[10ff.]), or in the arrangement of the twelve tribes of Israel, etc. (Nu 2[3ff], 1 K 7[25], Ezk 48[31-34], Rev 21[13]). In any case, an analysis of numbers has nothing to do with their original sense, and such analyses reveal nothing regarding their connexion with the ideas entertained by God and embodied in the universe. Hence it is not clear that certain numbers owe their connexion with the sphere of ideas to the factors of which they are composed. But it may be said more readily that the number 80 which occurs in Jg 3[30] and in Jos. Ant. VIII. vii. 8 (Σολομὼν . . . βασιλεύσας ὀγδοήκοντα ἔτη) was chosen on account of its coefficient '40.' In the same way we may explain the number '35' (5 × 7) which in the traditions about the life of Pythagoras alternates with '40' (Hirzel, l.c. p. 47).

(β) Still less is it to be supposed that such a simple number as 'three' was constructed upon the basis of an idea, for 'three' and 'seven' are both members of the continuous series of numbers which arose by the constant addition of 'one.' But Philo (de Mundi Opificio, § 3, 17f., 31, Leg. Allegor. i. 4, ii. 1: τέτακται ὁ θεὸς κατὰ τὸ ἓν καὶ τὴν μονάδα) describes the numbers 1–7 in such a way as to give rise to the thought that the relevant ideas were disclosed to man through the numbers, and that the numbers are the archetypes, the first and purest representations of the Divine ideas, nay, the moving principles of the universe, as Aristobulus said, δι' ἑβδομάδων πᾶς ὁ κόσμος κυκλεῖται (Euseb. Præp. Evang. XIII. xii. 16). On this path the friends of Haggada and Ḳabbala advanced further. 'The Ḳabbala attaches itself to the symbolical seven years of Gn 41[48].' Many Ḳabbalists found a connexion between the Heb. word ṣaphar 'count' (Gn 41[49b]) and the term ṣephira. 'Seven' of the Ṣephiroth were, in their view, analogous to the seven years of plenty, so that Enṣoph (אין סוף), 'the unending,' ceased to produce more Ṣephiroth. But there were also ten ספירות, corresponding to the ten words by which God created the world (Gn 1[3-29]), and 'these ten words are ten principles or attributes of God' (Kolb, Die Offenbarung, etc., 13, 16 ff.). The right conclusion to draw appears to be, that while it cannot be said with certainty that the number 'ten' in Gn 1[3-29] is accidental, it may be denied with certainty that this number is meant to express ideas.

(c) There is yet another trace from which one can clearly see the value attached to numbers during the later stages of Biblical Theology. We refer to the so-called Gematria (גימטריא, a Hebraized form of γεωμετρία used in the sense of ἀριθμητική), i.e. the art of indicating, by means of numbers, words whose letters by their numerical value (see above, 1, b, δ ex.) give the sum named in any passage.

(α) This can be best explained by examples; and we may begin with an instance which in all probability occurs in the OT itself, namely Gn 14[14], where the number 318 is the equivalent of אליעזר, if the numerical values of the different letters of this name are added together: 1 + 30 + 10 + 70 + 7 + 200 = 318. It would be a strange coincidence if the number of Abraham's 'trained servants' stood in such a relation to 'Eliezer,' the only name known to us of a trained servant of Abraham. Hence Rashi (ad loc.) said long ago, רבותינו אמרו אליעזר לבדו היה והוא מנין נימטריא של שמו, i.e. 'Our fathers said, Eliezer it was, alone, and this (318) is the Gematrical number of his name.' Again, the author of the so-called Epistle of Barnabas (ix. 8) saw in the 318 of Gn 14[14] an allusion to τ+ιη, i.e. the crucified Jesus; cf. Clem. Alex., Strom. vi. 11, § 84: φασὶν τοῦτον τὸν ἀριθμὸν εἶναι τοῦ μὲν κυριακοῦ σημείου τύπον. This way of explaining a word was already recognized in the 29th of the 32 hermeneutical rules of R. Eliezer ben Jose (see König, Einleitung, p. 516). Further, on 'Athbash, etc., cf. especially A. Berliner, Beiträge zur Heb. Gram. aus Talmud und Midrasch, pp. 12–14.

(β) A slight variation from this method consists in the employment, not of a number but of a word in order to indicate another word whose letters have the same numerical value. This method is several times attributed to the OT writers by later exegetes. For instance, the numerical value of the letters of יבא שילה (Gn 49[10b]) is 358, and the same numerical value belongs to the letters of משיח 'Messiah' (Buxtorf, Lex. Heb. s.v. שילה). What follows from this? That the whole passage was devised in order to furnish a test of Gematrical skill? No; but it is possible that the above-named equivalence was the source of the usual spelling of the word 'Shiloh' in the OT (contrast שלה of the Samaritan Pentateuch). Further, the surprising circumstance that Moses married an Ethiopian woman (Nu 12[1]) engaged the ingenuity of exegetes till they discovered that the numerical value of כושית ('Ethiopian' f.) is the same as that of יפת מראה 'a fair woman to look upon' (Gn 12[11] etc.), namely 736, and hence כושית ('Ethiopian') was replaced by Onkelos by שַׁפִּירָתָא ('the beautiful'). Then, again, עָכָּה (Zec 3[8]), in respect of the numerical value of its letters, is = נֶחָם 'comforter' (La 1[16], Sanhedrin 98*b*). Other examples will be found in Weber, System der altsynagog. Theol. p. 118 [Jüd. Theol. auf. Grund des Talmud, etc. p. 121 f.], and Döpke, Hermeneutik der neutest. Schriftsteller, pp. 135, 179 f.

(γ) But the NT also shows a clear trace of this use of the numerical value of letters. We refer to the number of the Beast in Rev 13[18], where we read τὸν ἀριθμὸν τοῦ θηρίου —— ἀριθμὸς γὰρ ἀνθρώπου ἐστίν —— καὶ ὁ ἀριθμὸς αὐτοῦ χξ′, i.e. 666. Long ago Irenæus (adv. Hær. v. 30) mentions the explanation of this number as = ΛΑΤΕΙΝΟΣ, a word the numerical value of whose letters is 30 + 1 + 300 + 5 + 10 + 50 + 70 + 200 = 666. But the view is to be preferred that the latter number is a veiled designation of NERΩN KAIΣAR, the numerical value of the letters of נרון קסר being = 50 + 200 + 6 + 50 + 100 + 60 + 200 = 666. For fuller details regarding this and other interpretations see art. REVELATION.

(δ) It is only an *in*direct analogy to this mysterious use of numbers that is presented to us in Egyptian texts. According to Brugsch (Steininschrift, etc. p. 314 f.), upon the wall of a temple at Edfu, a notification that the length of the holy place (the middle space in the temple) is 113 yards, is given in the words, 'Why? Because a child has gone through the midst of the sanctuary.' That is to say, the three words we have italicized contain the same letters as are required for writing the number 113. Again, a length of 90 yards in this temple of the sun-god is indicated by the words, 'because he, like a sun, beaming shines.'

NUMBERING.—See DAVID, in vol. i. p. 568[b].

NUMBERS (so called from the title in the LXX, Ἀριθμοί, cf. Vulg. Numeri, given to the book because of the repeated numberings in chapters 1. 3 f. 26; Heb. בְּמִדְבַּר 'in the wilderness,' from the fifth word of 1[1])* is the 'fourth Book of Moses,' and forms one division of the composite work now known as the Hexateuch (which see for justification of this statement and for general description of the constituent elements J, E, and P). It falls readily into three main sections: § 1. The Camp at Sinai, 1–10[10]; § 2. The Wanderings, 10[11]–19; § 3. The Plains of Moab, 20–36. But the material included in these sections is often very loosely strung on the main thread of narrative, and several chapters are a mosaic made up out of fragments from different sources. The analytical problems are closely analogous to those encountered in Exodus and Leviticus, and will be treated here on the same lines as in those articles. Some remarks will be added on the authorship and date (§ 4), the historical significance (§ 5), and the religious value (§ 6) of the book. (The abbreviations and signs employed are mostly familiar. They will be found explained under EXODUS and LEVITICUS).

a unity. The view here adopted is that two laws, A providing for a solemn curse on a defiled wife, and B furnishing a test for a wife suspected of defilement, have been woven together. In 27f. a real alternative of guilt or innocence is contemplated. With this 29f., now a colophon, but, by analogy with other cases, probably originally a title, agrees, and the discriminating use of the water in 19f. 22 corresponds. On the other hand, in the introduction (12f.), to which answers a conclusion in 31 (observe absence of connexion with 30), the guilt is assumed, and the water is only the means of inflicting the curse. Similarly, A's jealousy-offering is B's memorial-offering. The analysis which follows rests on the above main grounds, and is effected by aid of the parallels and contrasts tabulated below.

6$^{1-21}$: The Law of the Nazirite.—As a whole this ordinance conforms to the type of Lv 1–7, such allusions as to the door of the tent of meeting readily dropping out here as there. 2b-8 may be even earlier than P^{t}, as separation unto his God 7 and other phrases recall P^{h}, cf. especially Lv 21$^{2.\ 7.\ 11}$.—22-27 The formula of benediction is no doubt much older than the setting in which P^{g} presents it.

7$^{1-88}$: The dedication of the altar.—It is agreed that this is a late section. The date given by comparing 1 with Ex 40$^{2.\ 17}$ makes the transaction prior to Nu 1, yet the order and position of tribes in 1–4 is presupposed, and the language is more overladen with repetitions than anywhere else, the same formula being 12 times repeated, with only the necessary change of 6 out of 118 English words in the translation.—89 Apparently an isolated fragment of P^{g}.—8$^{1-4}$, like Lv 24$^{1-4}$ and Ex 27$^{20f.}$, relates to the candlestick, and seems to regulate the position and lighting of the lamps. It is probably the latest of the three passages.—5-22, providing for a consecration rite in the case of the Levites, can hardly be other than secondary, as this service if original would surely have been ordered in ch. 3, when the selection of the tribe was commanded, just as the consecration in Lv 8 was commanded in Ex 29. Much of the earlier matter is repeated here, and traces may be discerned of a double representation, according as Moses or Aaron is the chief actor, the former being the earlier view.—23-26 Alters 4^{3} by making the Levites begin work at the age of 25 instead of 30.—9$^{1-5}$, on the passover of the second year, is followed by an ordinance in 9-14 introduced by a narrative of an illustrative case 6-8, a type elsewhere found in P^{s}, to which 1-14 may perhaps all belong.—15-23 is identified as P^{s} by its relation to Ex 40.—10$^{1-8}$ may well be P^{g}, and this ascription suits the view that P^{g} had a briefer account of the camp, now replaced by 2.—9f., with its scene in your land (ten parallels in P^{h}) instead of on the march, is held to be an inserted fragment of P^{h}, cf. Lv 17^{5} 23^{40} etc.

* 14 includes only and she be not defiled. 14a is given to R, who has inserted many harmonizing touches elsewhere. Obs. its cumbrous Heb., and that spirit is masc. here, but fem. in 30.

B. Analysis.

C. Critical Notes.

$10^{11ff.}$ contains the first stage of P^g's itinerary after leaving Sinai. It is followed by an account of the mode of marching, which can only be P^s from its relation to 2, ^{34} being probably its close. With $^{29-32}$ the JE thread is resumed from Ex with a fragment of J, whose opening may partly survive in Ex 18 J, its close being omitted in favour of the view of guidance given in $9^{17ff.}$ Both this paragraph and $^{33.\ 35f.}$ are linguistically connected with J. The poetical refrains in $^{35f.}$ may well have come from the Book of the Wars of J". Contrast the advance of the ark in J with its central place in P. 11^{1-3} is hard to place, and is given to E, because it does not fit the J context, and follows E in speaking of Moses praying. Dillmann regards the incident as part of E's manna story, now displaced by J and P; Bacon views it as a sequel to the perilous contest with Amalek Ex 17^{8-16}, which really comes in after the departure from Horeb. In $^{4-35}$ is found a story of the people's discontent with the manna, their demand for flesh, the sending of the quails, and the resulting plague. The language (see below) connects this with J, and the description of the manna as a natural thing, though divinely provided, is agreeable to his general treatment of such incidents. But the story is dislocated by a double set of insertions. (1) There is a series which tells of Moses' burden of responsibility being relieved by the inspiration of seventy prophet-elders. (2) In $^{10b-12.\ 15}$ we find the language of J, but matter incongruous with this context, fitting in well, however, as Bacon suggests, between Ex 33^3 and ^{12}, a point in JE which must have been quite close to this before P was inserted. Accordingly (1) is ascribed to E, as the emphasis on prophecy and the phraseological features require, but not to its earliest stage. Rather it is a secondary (E^s) parallel to the Jethro incident of Ex 18. (2) is regarded as a misplaced portion of J. See EXODUS, ad loc. (1) and (2) were probably already united in JE, and transferred hither together. Ch. 12 is given as a whole to E^s. Bacon suggests that the Cushite woman is Jethro's daughter, who is nameless in Ex 18 E.

Minor clues.—J—mixed multitude ^{4} cf. Ex 12^{38}; Jthy servant Jfound favour $^{11.\ 15}$; Jconceived ^{12}; sanctify yourselves ^{18} Ex 19^{22}; against to-morrow ^{18} Ex $8^{10.\ 23}$; Jamong you ^{20} (Heb.); Jflocks and herds ^{22}; went forth a wind from J" ^{31} cf. E—Eprayed ^{2}; bear . . . alone $^{14.\ 17}$; Eelders $^{16.\ 24f.\ 30}$; the tent of meeting ^{16} 12^4 Ex 33^7, which was outside the camp ^{26} $12^{4f.}$ Ex 33^{7-11} ct. its central position in P; the cloud in connexion with the tent ^{25} 12^5 Ex 33^9 ct. Ex 13^{21} 14^{19}; Eprophet, prophesy $^{25-29}$ $12^{6f.}$; Joshua as the minister of Moses ^{28} Ex 24^{13} 33^{11}; Miriam 12^1 Ex 15^{20}; the man Moses 12^3 Ex 11^3; meek 12^3 cf. 11^{29}; speak against $12^{1.\ 8}$ $21^{5.\ 7}$*; vision 12^6 Gn 15^1 46^2, Edream 12^6; heal 12^{13} Gn 20^{17} Ex 15^{26}.

13–14: The sending of the spies.—The numerous duplicates and divergences in this section require explanation, and find it adequately in the hypothesis that J E and P are all represented in combination, while the very phenomena which disprove unity furnish clues to the tracing of the separate threads. The analysis given above is for the most part covered by the evidence collected below.

Parallels and Contrasts.—J—(a) Caleb 14^{24} and others sent by Moses 13^{27} into the South $17b.\ 22$ (ct. land of the South 29) to see the land ^{18}; (b) they come unto Hebron ^{22} cf. Ex 4^{30}; Jthe Lord 14^{17}; $14^{18ff.}$ J^s cf. Ex 34^{6-9}.

E—(a) [In Dt $1^{22ff.}$, perh. founded on E, 12 unnamed men are sent at the request of the people] into the mountains $17c$ cf. 29 $14^{40.\ 44}$; (b) they come unto the valley of Eshcol ^{23} and return to Kadesh ^{26b}; (c) they bring back word to them (the people) ^{26b}; (d) that 5 peoples occupy all the land ^{29} (ct. geography of $14^{43ff.}$) cf. few or many ^{18c}, including the (gigantic) Nephilim ^{33}; (e) and showed them the fruit of the land $^{26b.\ 27b}$ cf. $^{20.\ 23}$; (f) the people cry out 14^{1b}; (g) plotting return to Egypt 14^4—E because of (Heb.) ^{24}; E one to another 14^4; mourned 14^{39} Gn 37^{34} Ex 33^4.

P—(a) Moses, by J"'s command, sends Hoshea (Joshua) and Caleb with ten others to spy out the land of Canaan $^{1-16}$ (P spy out $1.\ 16.\ 17a.\ 21.\ 25$ $32ab$ $14b.\ 7.\ 34.\ 36.\ 38$); (b) they spy out the land from Zin unto Rehob, i.e. from end to end ^{21}, and return . . . at the end of 40 days (cf. 14^{34}) . . . unto the wilderness of Paran ^{26a}; (c) they report (an evil report ^{32} 14^{37}) to Moses and to Aaron, and to all the P*congregation* ^{26a} cf. 14^5 $^{26f.}$; (d) that all the people they saw in it are men of great stature ^{32b}; (e) and that the land . . . eateth up the inhabitants thereof ^{32}; (f) the P*congregation . . .* P*murmur* (14^{27-29}) against Moses and against Aaron $14^{1a.\ 2.\ 5}$; (g) Joshua (not named in JE) and Caleb expostulate $14^{6f.\ 9a.\ 10}$.—Would God (oh that) 14^2 20^3 Gn 17^{18}; P*stone with stones* (Heb.) and P*the glory of J"* 14^{10}; P*bear iniquities* 14^{34}; P*I the Lord* 14^{35}; P*plague* 14^{37}.

15: Sundry laws.—$^{1-16}$ has received the customary setting from R^P, but, at least so far as ^{4}, seems to rest on a basis older than P^g. With ^{2b} cf. P^h in Lv 19^{22} 23^{10} 25^2, and observe a burnt-offering or a sacrifice ^{3}, cf. Lv 17^8 P^h. Lv 2 regulates the independent meal-offering; this prescribes it as an adjunct to animal offerings.—$^{5-12}$, in which the person changes from 3rd to 2nd, supplements the preceding by prescribing and regulating the drink-offering; it may be P^s, as may $^{13-16}$, which provides for the case of strangers, as in Lv 17, where also this element may not be primary.—$^{17-21}$, whose opening words in Heb. differ from ^{2b}, may also rest on an early basis. For the usage cf. Ezk 44^{30}.—$^{22-31}$ in its present form must rank as P^t, and its place in the chronological series would seem to be between Lv 5^{1-13} and Lv 4; but in places it recalls P^h, e.g. in $^{29-31}$, cf. Lv 20 (the penalties) and 24^{22}.—$^{32-36}$ is like the secondary element in Lv $24^{12ff.}$, which see. The closing formula, as J" commanded Moses, is common only in P^s.

16: Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.—Here we find not only a double JE thread, whose strands are separable on grounds mainly phraseological, but a twofold priestly representation. In JE we have to do with a civil disturbance, JOn and perhaps Korah, or EDathan and Abiram, being the ring-leaders, but in P with an assertion of ecclesiastical rights. By giving in the same order the connected points in the four variations of the narrative as much will be done as space allows to justify the analysis, and at the same time the characteristics of each will emerge.

Parallels and Contrasts.—J—(a) The leaders, Bacon suggests, were Korah the son of Kenaz, a kinsman of Caleb, cf. 1 Ch 2^{43}, and On the son of Peleth $1d$; (b) they charge Moses with tyranny and failure as leader $13f.$; (c) Moses protests indignantly ^{15}; (d) isolates the offenders ^{26b}; (e) and prophesies an earthquake $^{27c-30}$ which forthwith takes place ^{31}, and the GROUND cleaves asunder, and they and all that appertain to them go down alive into Sheol $^{30f.\ 33a}$.—Jflowing . . . honey $13f.$; to kill us ^{13} cf. Ex 14^{11} 17^3; Jtents ^{26b}; consumed ^{26b} Gn $18^{23f.}$ $19^{15.\ 17}$; Jlittle ones ^{27c}; vindication of Moses' commission ^{28} cf. Ex 3^{10} $4^{13.\ 18}$ 5^{22}—despised ^{30} 11^{20} $14^{11.\ 23}$.

E—(a) The leaders are Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab, sons of Reuben 16^{1ce}; (b) they rise up before Moses $2a$, refuse to come when summoned $^{12.\ 14b}$, complaining of harshness and failure to enrich them ^{14b}; (c) Moses and the Eelders of Israel (his judicial colleagues Ex 18) visit the offenders; (d) who stand at the door of their tents ^{27b}, all Israel being round about them ^{34}; (e) the EARTH opens her mouth and swallows up them and their HOUSEHOLDS (ct. $27c$ $33a$) and closes upon them $^{32a.\ 33b}$; (f) all Israel flee at the cry of them ^{34}—fields and vineyards ^{14b} 20^{17} 21^{22} Ex 22^5.

P^g—(a) The leader is Korah ^{1a}, perhaps borrowed from J, and his associates, who are not Levites, are the 250 princes of the P*congregation* (cf. 27^3, where it is implied that a Manassite might have been among them $^{2b.\ 6f.\ 18.\ 35}$); (b) they complain of the sacerdotal pretensions of Moses and Aaron, as against the whole congregation ^{3}, ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi ^{7b} (transposed now from end of ^{3}); (c) Moses P*falls on his face*, and then announces an ordeal for the morrow by offering incense $^{4-7}$; (d) all the congregation are assembled by Korah at the door of the tent of meeting, Moses and Aaron are bidden to escape the coming general ruin, their intercession procures permission to the congregation to depart from the tabernacle, i.e. of J", the words 'of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram' being a gloss, מֵעַל not being used of a human dwelling $^{18.\ 24.\ 26a.\ 27}$; (e) fire then comes forth from J" (i.e. presumably from the tabernacle) and consumes the 250 [35]; (f) on the outbreak of murmuring at this a plague immediately visits the congregation, until Aaron by atonement averts its spread [41-50].—The language of the priestly writer is unmistakable.

P[s]—(a) The leader is Korah, the son . . . of Levi [1a], who is supported by his company (Heb. congregation, used by P[s] only of the entire assembly, the true reading in [5f.] probably being the congregation for his company) [11. 16. 40], i.e. all his brethren the sons of Levi with him [10]; (b) they are gathered together against J'', and murmur against Aaron [11], for they seek the priesthood [10]; (c) the test is to be the burning of incense [17]; (d) all that appertained unto Korah [32b] perished from among the assembly [32c] (observe that P[s]'s fire has still to come [35], so that this is distinct); (e) the censers of these sinners are beaten out for a covering of the altar, and as a memorial of the rights of the priesthood [36-40].

17–18: These chapters are by general agreement assigned to P[s]. But Carpenter (Oxf. Hex. ad loc.) gives reasons for considering this one of the earliest portions of that work, with which it is not quite uniform either in form (e.g. the address to Aaron instead of Moses [18[1. 8. 20]]) or in substance (e.g. the ignorance of [3[6-10]] in [18[2-7]]).—[18[25-32]] on the tithe of the tithe (observe the address to Moses [25]) appears to include fresh material.

19, on uncleanness by the dead, fills a serious gap noticeable in Lv 11–15. [1-13] prob. rests on old usage, but bears marks of late codification (e.g. Eleazar the priest[3], statute of the law[2] [31[21]]). The opening of [14-22] This is the law of at once suggests P[t] (cf. on Leviticus 1–7), and nothing seems to be inconsistent with this. Can this section have belonged once to Lv 11–15 and been transferred here where the water of separation [21], whose preparation and use are described in [17f.], is more elaborately regulated?

C. Critical Notes.

20–21: [1b] on Miriam's death is given to E, cf. 12[1] Ex 15[20] and Gn 35[8]. In [3a] (the people strove—ct. the congregation, the assembly, the children of Israel—with Moses—ct. with J'' [13], Moses and Aaron [2. 6. 10]) [5] (cf. 16[14] Ex 17[1-3]) [8b] (speak unto the rock, ct. take the rod, presumably to smite the rock [8a], unless Cornill's reconstruction be adopted, by which [b] is transposed to form the first command in P, disobedience to which constitutes the offence) there are separated elements assigned to J's Meribah story, E's having come in Ex 17. The rest of [1-13] (with its sequel in [22b-29]) is left for P[s], though it looks as if the editor had out of tenderness obscured the account of the sin of Moses and Aaron (cf. the stronger expression in [24] rebelled).—[14-18. 21a] and [21[21-24]] are obviously from one hand, while [19f. 21b] show marks of difference pointing to J, as the other passages are reminiscent of E. Thus with highway ct. king's way [17] 21[22], and note that in J a formidable military advance [20] causes a retreat [21b], whereas E relates a mere refusal [21a], which leaves the people still at Kadesh to move at leisure [22a].

(Marks of J are:—Jcattle, Jmuch people, strong hand Ex 3[19] 13[9] 32[11], turned away, ct. turned aside [17] 21[22]; and of E:—messengers [14] 21[21], Kadesh [1b. 14. 16. 22] 13[26], travail that hath befallen us [14] Ex 18[8], went down into Eg. [15] Jos 24[5], a long time (Heb. many days) [15] Gn 21[34] Jos 24[7], evil entreated [15] Jos 24[20], an angel [16] Ex 14[19], border [16f. 21] 21[13. 22], field . . . vineyard [17] 21[22] 16[14], by the way to 21[4b] 14[25], spake against 21[5-7] 12[1], sinned 21[7] 14[10], take away 21[7] Ex 25[25], Eprayed, standard (or banner) 21[8] Ex 17[15]mg.).

21[1-3] The fighting between the Canaanite (the king of Arad being prob. a gloss) and Israel is generally supposed to be told by J, but the phenomena are conflicting, and the ascription to J must be left as doubtful.

21[4a] follows on 20[29], the death of Aaron, but [4b-9] continues 20[22a], the march from Kadesh, and the story of the serpents is also given to E on the ground of verbal parallels, see above.—[10-11a. 11b-15] and [16-20] consist of extracts from itineraries assigned to P, E, and J. Each opens with a different formula, [P10. 11a] 22[1], 33, [E20[2a]] 21[11b. 12. 13], cf. Dt 10[6ff.], a fragment prob. from E, [J16. 18b-20].—[11b] agrees with Jg 11[18] (prob. based on E) but not with Nu 33[44]. Observe that in [20] the people are not so far on as in [13], and that in [24b] another J fragment begins which has its sequel in [32] (Ammon is left out in Jg 11[19-22] and [25 ‖ 31]). J tells of conquest and occupation of cities and towns [25. 32], E of the land [24. 31].

Some J phrases may be added:—whereof J'' said [16 10[29]], gather . . . together ct. P20[7] E11[16] Heb. form, cf. Ex 3[16] 4[29], sang Isr. this song Ex 15[1], field of Moab [20] Gn 36[35] cf. Gn 32[3], looketh down upon [20] 23[28]. [33-35] from its similarity of matter to Dt 3[1ff.] is regarded as a gloss, no mention of Og being now found in JE.

22–24: In the art BALAAM will be found a comparison of the accounts in P and JE, and also of the main reasons for the analysis of JE. It will be enough here to subjoin some of the more striking details on which the partition rests.

J—(a) Moab is distressed [3b] Ex 1[12], (b) the elders of Moab [7] (and of Midian [4. 7]) are sent as messengers [5a] 24[12] (servants of Balak [18]) unto Balaam, (c) to the land of the children of his people ('ammô, perh. read with good auth. of Ammon) [5c], (d) with rewards [7] cf. [18] 24[13] and promise of promotion to honour [17. 37b] 24[11]; (e) Balaam sets out innocently [34] accompanied only by his [2] servants [22] and is stopped and warned through the ass [22-35a (35br)], (f) the Jangel of J'' appearing [31] by day [22-35]; (g) in spite of his fame for magic [7] 24[1] Balaam responds solely to the Spirit of God 24[2], having promised not to go beyond the word of J'' [13] 24[13]—Jbless . . . Jcurse [6] 24[9], silver and gold [18] 24[13] Gn 13[2] 24[35. 53]; ride [22. 30] Gn 24[61], sword drawn in . . . [23. 31] Jos 5[13], turn aside [23. 26] 20[21], these three times [28. 32] 24[10r] cf. 14[22], all thy life long [30] Gn 48[15f.]; Jthy (his) place 24[11. 25].

E—(a) Moab is sore afraid [3a]; (b) the princes of Moab are sent for B. [8-13. 19-21. 40] 23[6. 17]; (c) to Pethor, which is by the River (i.e. Euphrates, in the far East, cf. Aram 23[7]) [5b] cf. Gn 31[21] Ex 23[31] Jos 24[2f. 14f.]; (d) urgency being shown by a second more distinguished embassy [15] while B. is welcomed with a feast [40]; (e)

Balaam is first forbidden to go 12, then let go with a caution 20, (f) God speaking to him at night 8-12. 19f.; (g) Balaam twice with lavish sacrifices tries to win an acceptable message 23 1f. 14, yet will only speak what God speaks to him 20 or puts in his mouth 38 23 5 12 16—bring . . . word 8 13 26, God came unto B. 9. 20 Gn 20 3 31 24, saddled his ass 21 Gn 22 3, utmost part 36b 20 16, send 37 cf. Jos 24 9, offered 23 4 Gn 22 13.

25 1-5 is almost the last piece of JE in Nu, and contains both elements. J—(a) the people 1b, (b) began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab 1b, (c) who seduced them to worship their gods 2 Ex 34 14f.; (d) J" is angry, and bids Moses take all the chiefs and hang them up before the sun 4.

E—(a) Isr. 1a, (b) abode in Shittim 1a Jos 2 1, (c) and Isr. joined himself to the Baal of Peor 3; (d) Moses bids the judges (cf. Ex 18) slay every one his men who had sinned 5.

25 6-15 has lost its beginning, but it is clearly P^s, and may have ascribed the temptation by Midianitish women to Balaam (cf. 31 16 P^s). R^p seems to have preferred 1-5 as a commencement, but the plague raging in 8b does not answer either to 4 or 5. 16-18 interrupts the connexion with 26 1 and is assigned to P^s, preparing the way for 31.

26 relates the second census of the people after the forty years. It is encumbered with interpolations in 9-10. 11. 58a. 58b-61. 64f., and can hardly be P^g. The order of tribes follows 1 20-43 P^s (except Manasseh before Ephraim, see table above), and the clans are dependent on Gn 46 8ff. P^s. Moreover, the order for the division of the land is given to Moses, who was not to enter it, 27 12ff., Dt 32 49ff., and without even naming the land or announcing its conquest (contrast 33 51ff. 34 2ff.). The phrase as J" commanded Moses is also late. Thus 26 may be based on P^g but belongs now to P^s.

27 1-11, on the case of Zelophehad's daughters, follows on 26 52-56, and the phraseology is of like character with 26.—12-14 and Dt 32 48-52 can hardly both be original. The suggestion of Dillmann is a happy one, that the insertion of Dt in P required the announcement of the death of Moses to be placed later, and that this passage, which does not open like P^g, has been inserted by an editor to fill the gap.—15-23 is then supposed to have been orig. preceded by Dt 32 48-52; probably an account of Moses' death followed (cf. Nu 20 23-29).

28 f., a detailed list of the offerings prescribed for the full round of sacred seasons, is given to P^s. Its position among other supplements and away from the calendar in Lv 23 dated forty years back, its uniform inclusion of the later elements of Lv 23 and addition of the New Moon festival, the elaboration of 29 12-38 on the Feast of Booths or Ingathering (observe that both names are dropped), and the phraseological indications, all converge towards the same conclusion.

30, on Vows, may rest on an older, simpler basis, but it is shown by its style to be itself late. It does not attach itself to Lv 27 or Nu 6.

31, on the war with Midian, comes awkwardly after the message about Moses' death. Some phrases (go to meet 13, thy servants 49) suggest a dependence on J, or a borrowing of his language which is foreign to P^g. The ignoring of Joshua in favour of Phinehas 6, and Eleazar's unique exercise of authority 21ff., point to P^s, and the peculiar phraseology confirms this.

32 1-38, on the settlement of the 2½ tribes, has still stronger indications of an underlying J element; but here, too, the whole must be given to P^s. For the complication of evidence see Oxf. Hex.—39-42, in which the conquest of Gilead, assumed in 1-4, is assigned to a Manassite clan, from its resemblance to Jg 1, is given to J, cf. 21 25. 32, but 40 is a harmonizing interruption. Cf. also Jg 10 4.

33 1-49 gives an itinerary, largely based on JE (esp. J), with 40 stations in 40 years. Its position in the book and its mixed contents lead to its being ascribed like 31 f. to P^s.—50-56 seems derived by P^s from 2 sources, (1) a command, belonging to the school of P^h (cf. Lv 26 1. 30 20 24), to drive out the Canaanites, destroy images, and possess the land 51b-53. 55f.; (2) an order to divide the land by lot 54, based (in part verbally) on 26 52-56.—34 1-15 describes minutely the future boundaries of the land W. of Jordan which Moses had never seen, but only alludes vaguely to the eastern regions he had seen.—16-29 names the tribal agents for the delimitation. Comparison with analogous passages in P^g and with the account in Jos of the actual division, make it most unlikely that this can be P^g, though it may be an expansion of a briefer section, cf. Jos 14 2.

35 combines two orders, about 48 Levitical cities 1-8 (contrast 18 20. 24, where priests and Levites have no property, only income), and about blood-revenge 9-34. The latter has terms foreign to P^g (e.g. high priest, holy oil 25. 28), and, after a full close 29, resumes the subject and closes with a verse 34 borrowed from an earlier source like P^h, cf. 19 13, Lv 15 31 18 24f.. 6 refers to the cities of refuge, and both sections are best understood as not having formed part of P^g.—36 supplements 27 1-11 on the rights of heiresses.

§ 4. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—Only in a broad sense do these questions arise. We can speak of schools of writing and periods of composition, but we cannot name an individual or dogmatize about a year. In the wider sense the results of criticism as sketched above lead to some definite conclusions. All the strata of literary deposit in the Hex. seem to be laid bare in a section taken through the Book of Numbers. (1) If the earliest and latest elements in J were put in writing between B.C. 850 and 650, as the indications suggest, then the bits of folk-song and the traditions of national life and movement which are associated with them in 20–21 must be dated amongst the oldest. The stories of Hobab (ch. 10), of the manna and quails (ch. 11), of Caleb and the spies (ch. 13 22-24), of the revolt of (Korah and) On (ch. 16), and the episode of Balaam, take a middle place, while the advanced conceptions and lofty tone of parts of chs. 11 and 14 represent the last contributions of this school. (2) Similarly, E has its archaic fragments of verse, from the Book of the Wars of J" or elsewhere, with brief notes of international relations in chs. 20–21, its middle period producing the narratives of Caleb and the spies (ch. 13), of Dathan and Abiram (ch. 16) and of Balaam (ch. 22 f.), and its latest stage illustrated by the account of the seventy elders (ch. 11), and the complaint of Aaron and Miriam (ch. 12). (3) Even D has its echo in one paragraph, 21 33ff.. (4) The four stages of priestly legislation and historiography are met in turn. The peculiar notes of the Law of Holiness P^h are detected twice, namely, in 10 9ff. and 15 37-41, and suspected elsewhere. The careful codifying of priestly teaching (P^t) is preserved in 5 f. 15. 19. The priestly groundwork of law and history (P^g), though probably at many points displaced in favour of an expanded version, is kept in parts of 1. 3. 9. 10, which are occupied with the census of laity and clergy in the holy congregation, the second Passover, and the first moving of the Camp from Sinai; it recounts the story of the spies (ch. 13), the sacrilege of Korah and the congregation (ch. 16), and the budding of Aaron's rod (ch. 17), provides for priests and Levites (ch. 18), and tells of the death of Aaron (ch. 20), the heroism of his grandson Phinehas (ch. 25), and the choice of Joshua (ch. 27).

The remainder, occupying more than half of the whole book, though as far as possible from being homogeneous, must come under the one heading of priestly supplements P^s, some of them little later in time than P^S, others among the latest additions to the Hex. Enough has been said above to enable the student to form his own conclusions about these.

§ 5. HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE.—Again, the distinction must be drawn between the direct witness to the past and the indirect evidence as to the times of the writers. The whole book is abundantly significant in the latter sense, JE illustrating for us how antiquity looked in the palmy days of Israel's national greatness, and P revealing the effect of circumstances in changing the point of view, and so transforming almost beyond recognition the picture of the past. But, except in places where there is independent reason to suppose that P rests on some part of JE which it has displaced, it is impossible here, any more than elsewhere, to accept its testimony as in the modern sense historical. Even the earlier sources can be used only with discrimination as supplying data for historical conclusions. But the general facts of the delay in entering Canaan, the roundabout route, and the conquest of the Amorites, being witnessed by both lines of tradition, and agreeable to the rest of our knowledge, emerge as well established. See, further, separate arts. on MOSES, etc.

§ 6. RELIGIOUS VALUE. — What has been said under this head in the arts. on EXODUS and LEVITICUS is largely applicable to the continuation of those books in Numbers. But a word may be added on that which is distinctive. (1) The fact is well brought out that a nation as well as an individual may have a moral and religious character, and be bound by its acts. Proved to be unprepared for conquest and colonization, Israel is subjected to the discipline of delay. (2) The need of divine guidance is symbolized by the advance of the ark (JE) or the cloud (P). (3) Types of character are presented whose lessons teach us still: Moses with the meekness of a strong nature under restraint, Miriam with the petty jealousy which often disfigures even good women, Caleb honest and whole-hearted, Balaam weak but not worthless; popular movements are described which have their modern parallels—the fickleness of the mob,—'little Israelites' to-day, Chauvinists to-morrow,—their disposition to blame anybody but themselves, the readiness of the laity to assert their rights rather than fulfil their duties,—all these are before us especially in JE. (4) Taking the description of the camp and congregation given in P^S and P^S as an ideal picture of the past whose value is in its symbolism, even as the picture of the future in the Apocalypse is in the same way precious, there is much to be gleaned: —the order and particularity, the distribution of duties, the equalization of burdens, the provisions for unity by co-operation, the elaboration of a stately ceremonial, nothing being left to the spur of the moment, but confusion avoided by fulness of rubrical direction,—in all this there is latent a wealth of suggestion as to the nature, the worship, and the organization, not to say the financial management, of the Church of to-day. (5) Perhaps the highest point is reached in the lofty and yet broad view of prophetic inspiration found in E^{11} f.: Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets! Accordingly, it only needs that the Lord should put His Spirit upon the modern readers of Numbers, and they will not fail to find fresh truth breaking forth out of this portion of His word.

LITERATURE.—Apart from the works cited under HEXATEUCH and the general commentaries, there is little to refer to. B. W. Bacon, Exodus, 1894, is valuable for JE; the Oxf. Hex. 1900 (ed. by J. E. Carpenter and the present writer) has been used largely, and may be consulted for fuller information; the vol. in the Expos. Bible is by R. A. Watson; preachers may also refer to Bp. Hall's Contemplations; the forthcoming vol. by G. B. Gray in the Intern. Crit. Com. has a large gap to fill.

G. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

NUMENIUS (Νουμήνιος), the son of Antiochus was one of the ambassadors sent by Jonathan, about B.C. 144, to renew the treaty between the Jews and Romans. He was also charged with letters from the high priest and the Jewish people to the Spartans and others, in order to establish friendly relations with them (1 Mac $12^{1\text{-}18}$). The ambassadors were well received at Sparta (ib. $14^{20\text{-}23}$) and at Rome (ib. $12^{3f.}$), and sent back to Judæa with a safe-conduct. Subsequently, about the time of the popular decree in favour of Simon (B.C 141), Numenius was sent with another embassy to Rome, taking as a present a golden shield weighing a thousand minas. The Senate passed a decree in favour of the Jews, guaranteeing them the undisturbed possession of their country, and gave to the ambassadors letters to the neighbouring kings and independent States, informing them of the terms of this decree. The embassy returned to Jerusalem in B.C. 139 (1 Mac $15^{15\text{-}24}$). See art. LUCIUS, and cf. Schürer, HJP I. i. 266–268.

H. A. WHITE.

NUN (נ).—The fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 14th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by n.

NUN נוּן 'fish,' in 1 Ch 7^{27} נוּן Non, LXX Ναυή [possibly a primitive error in transcription, NATH for NATN], hence Nave of Sir 46^{1} AV).—The father of Joshua, the successor of Moses, Ex 33^{11}, Nu 11^{28}, Jos 1^{1} etc. On the probability that Nun is a clan rather than a personal name, and on its bearing on totemism, see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, pp. 96, 102; cf. also W. R. Smith, Kinship, p. 221 f.

NURSE (מֵינֶקֶת mêneḳeth, אֹמֶנֶת 'ōmeneth, τροφός).—1. The term mêneḳeth (root [ינק] 'suck') designated a foster-mother. Deborah had been such to Rebekah, and the maternal devotion was maintained throughout her life, Gn 24^{59} 35^{8}. By Miriam's readiness of resource the mother of Moses became his appointed nurse, Ex 2^{7}. The same meaning of 'nurse' occurs in 2 K 11^{2}, Is 49^{23}; cf. the use of τροφός in 1 Th 2^{7}, and τροφοφορεῖν in Dt 1^{31}. In the East a child is usually nursed till over two years of age. 2. 'Ōmeneth (root [אמן] 'confirm,' 'support') is a more general term applying to any female attendant in charge of children. Thus Naomi became nurse to Obed (Ru 4^{16}), and Mephibosheth was five years old when he fell from the arms of his nurse ('ōmeneth) 2 S 4^{4}.

3. The 'nursing-father' (אֹמֵן Nu 11^{12}, Is 49^{23}) would be found only in families of rank and wealth. Among the Emîrs or leading families of the Lebanon, one of the dependants, usually a poor relative, is appointed to this office. He becomes the constant companion, playmate, and guardian of the heir, carrying him when tired, and giving him later his first lessons in horsemanship and manly sports. In old age his relationship to the family is not forgotten, and care is taken that he shall not suffer want. In Pref. to AV the translators (apparently regardless of the difference between the nursing-father and the nursing-mother) say: 'And lastly, that the Church be sufficiently provided for, is so agreeable to good reason and conscience, that those mothers are holder to be lesse cruell, that kill their children as soone as they are borne, then those noursing fathers and mothers (wheresoever they be) that withdraw from them who hang upon their breasts (and upon whose breasts againe themselves doe hange to receive the spirituall and sincere milke of the word) livelyhood and support fit for their estates.' And Thomas Fuller is yet bolder when he says: 'He set before the King the hainousnesse of sacrilədge; how great a sinne it was when Princes, who should be nursing-fathers and suckle the Church, shall suck from it' (Holy Warre, ii. 5, p. 49).

For the 'ōmĕnîm who acted as tutors (2 K $10^{1.5}$, cf. Est 2^{7}), see EDUCATION, 1. G. M. MACKIE.

NURTURE.—The verb to nurture occurs occasionally in Sirach as the translation of παιδεύω (Sir 18^{13} 21^{23} 22^{3} 31^{19} 40^{29}). It is also found in 2 Es 8^{12} 'Thou . . . nurturedst it in thy law' (erudisti eum in lege tua). The subst. is found in Wis 3^{11} and Eph 6^{4} as the tr. of παιδεία, as well as in Sir 22^{10} 'want of nurture,' Gr. ἀπαιδευσία. Now both in LXX and NT παιδεία and παιδεύω describe, not 'nurture' in the modern use of that word, but training, especially such training or discipline as involves restraint and even chastisement. Chastise and chastening or chastisement are often the best translation, as in He $12^{5.7.10}$. In Lk $23^{16.22}$ the verb is used of the scourging of a malefactor: it is rendered 'chastise' in EV. In the 16th cent. 'nurture' was an excellent equivalent for παιδεύω and παιδεία, as it contained the idea of training by means of chastisement or tribulation. Thus Dt 8^{5} Tind. 'As a man nurtereth his sonne, even so the Lorde thy God nurtereth the' (AV and RV 'chasteneth'); Dt 21^{18} Tind. 'Yf any man have a sonne that is stuburne and disobedient that he will not herken unto the voyce of his father and voyce of his mother, and they have taught him nurture'; He 12^{10} Tind. 'And they verely for a feaue dayes nurtred us after their awne pleasure'; 1 K 12^{11} Cov. 'My father correcte you with scourges, but I wyl nourtoure you with scorpions'; Ps 94^{10} Cov. 'He that nurtureth the Heithen, and teacheth a man knowledge, shal not he punysh?' (see Driver's note on this passage in Paral. Psalter, p. 477). Rutherford is fond of the word and illustrates its meaning in his day admirably: thus, Letters, No. xcviii. 'I get my meat from Christ with nurture, for seven times a-day I am lifted up and casten down'; No. lxx. 'You have had your own large share of troubles, and a double portion; but it saith your Father counteth you not a bastard; full-begotten bairns are nurtured.'

Shaks. uses the word twice, and in both places in the sense of the result of training: Tempest, IV. i. 189—

> 'A born devil, on whose nature
> Nurture can never stick';

As You Like It, II. vii. 97—

> 'Yet am I inland bred
> And know some nurture.'

This is the meaning in Sir 31^{19} and 40^{29}, where AV has 'well-nurtured,' RV 'well-mannered' and 'well-instructed': the Gr. is πεπαιδευμένος.

J. HASTINGS.

NUTS.—The equivalent of two Heb. words—1. בָּטְנִים boṭnîm, τερέβινθοι, terebinthi. The (unused) sing., בֹּטֶן bōṭen, of this is perhaps the cognate of the Arab. buṭm, the n being substituted for the m. This word in Arab. is generic for terebinth. Its generic character seems to have been lost in Heb., in which are several words the signification of which is uncertain as between the terebinth and the oak. (See OAK). Doubtless the form boṭnîm, the plural of the assumed בֹּטֶן, refers, in the only passage in which it occurs (Gn 43^{11}), to pistachio nuts. They are the fruit of Pistacia vera, L., a tree of the Order Anacardiaceæ, 10–20 ft. high, with 1-2 pair of odd pinnate leaflets 3–5 in. long, or simple ovate leaves. The nut is oblong, apiculate, ¾ in. long, ½ in. broad, with green oily cotyledons. It is doubtfully indigenous, but everywhere cultivated in the orchards near cities. The tree and its fruit are known as fistŭḳ. The nuts are a favourite luxury of the Orientals. While the Heb. on the one hand thus appropriated the term בטן to one species of the modern genus Pistacia, the Arabs, on the other, have appropriated it to three other species of the same genus, allied to each other, but differing from the pistachio. They are P. Terebinthus, L., P. Palestina, Ehr. (which should be regarded simply as a variety of the foregoing), and P. mutica, F. and M. These are the true terebinths, and probably the trees intended by אֵלָה, and perhaps other Heb. words. (See OAK). They attain a height of 20–25 ft. and a diameter of 30–40. They have pinnate leaves, and small lenticular inedible fruits, from which an oil, used in tanning and other arts, is expressed. Probably both the Hebrews and the Arabs originally recognized the generic connexion between the pistachio and the terebinth. It is clear, from the LXX and Vulg., that those VSS recognized the analogy. RVm gives the gloss, 'that is, pistachio nuts.' It is interesting to note that in Mardîn a terebinth is cultivated, under the name of fistŭḳ, which bears fruit of the lenticular shape of the terebinth nutlets, but as large as a cherry stone, and with an edible kernel, resembling in taste pistachio nuts. Some such terebinthine tree must have been the wild stock of the pistachio. The city Betonîm in Gad, east of the Jordan (Jos 13^{26}), was doubtless named from trees, either of pistachio or terebinth. It is now called Boṭneh, a survival of its Heb. form, but carrying to Arab minds the meaning of the Arab. boṭn='belly.'

2. אֱגוֹז ĕgôz. This word also occurs but once (Ca 6^{11}). The exact similarity to the Arab. jauz='walnut,' and the universal cultivation of this tree in the East, make it practically certain that the walnut is intended. The LXX κάρυον and the Vulg. nux are generic, but also are often used specifically for the walnut. They are the seeds of the fruit of Juglans regia, L., a noble tree, growing in moist situations. It attains a height of 20–30 ft. and a diameter of 50–60. It is particularly common around the village fountains, and along the mountain torrents. Its foliage is fragrant. The nuts are of excellent quality, and very cheap. One variety measures 2 inches in its long diameter. G. E. POST.

NYMPHA or NYMPHAS.—A prominent member of the Church at Laodicea, at whose house a congregation was accustomed to meet, Col 4^{15}. The question of reading is a difficult one, chiefly because of the ambiguity of the evidence from the Latin and Syriac versions. But the reading 'her house' in B 67 seems best to explain the origin of the others. Lightfoot's objection, that 'a Doric form of the Greek name here seems in the highest degree improbable,' though endorsed by T. K. Abbott (Int. Crit. Com. in loc.), can hardly stand in face of the evidence for similar forms in Jn 11^{5}, Ac 9^{38} (see Hort, App. p. 163*a*; Jannaris, Historical Greek Grammar, § 270). If this reading be adopted, her name must have been Nympha, and she must have occupied in the Church a position similar to that of Prisca at Rome (Ro 16^{3}), and perhaps of Phœbe at Cenchreæ (Ro 16^{1}), and Lydia at Philippi (Ac 16^{15}). If the reading 'his house' be adopted from DFGKL, etc., the name must be read Nymphas, and is probably to be regarded as a contraction for Nymphodorus. The reading 'their house' (ℵACP, etc.) would leave the form of the name uncertain. Nymphas and Eubulus are commemorated together as 'Holy Apostles' on Feb. 28, in the Greek Calendar. There is nothing in NT to account either for the combination of the names or for the title. See Acta Sanct. Bolland. Feb. 28, p. 719. J. O. F. MURRAY.

OAK.—Three of the words tr[d] 'oak' in EV are perhaps derived from the root אול or איל 'to be prominent.' They are (1) אַיִל, pl. אֵילִים 'êlîm; (2) אֵלָה 'êlāh; (3) אֵלוֹן 'êlôn. The following analysis will show the renderings of LXX, Vulg., EV.

1. אַיִל only in const. אֵיל 'êl. EV transliterate (Gn 14[6]) as part of the proper name El-paran, LXX τερέβινθος, Vulg. Campestria. EV render (Is 1[29]) 'oaks,' RVm 'terebinths,' LXX εἴδωλα, Vulg. idoli. AV tr. (Is 57[5]) 'idols,' AVm 'oaks,' RV 'oaks,' RVm 'idols,' LXX εἴδωλα, Vulg. dii. EV tr. (Is 61[3]) 'trees,' LXX γενεαί, Vulg. fortes. EV tr. (Ezk 31[14]) 'height,' AVm 'upon themselves,' LXX ὕψος, Vulg. sublimitas.

2. אֵלָה 'êlāh, EV tr. (Gn 35[4] LXX τερέβινθος, Vulg. terebinthus; Jg 6[11. 19] LXX τερέμινθος, Vulg. quercus; 2 S 18[9. 10. 14] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. quercus; 1 K 13[14] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. terebinthus; Is 1[30] LXX τερέβινθος, Vulg. quercus; Ezk 6[13] LXX omitted, Vulg. quercus) 'oak,' RVm 'terebinth.' EV transliterate (1 S 17[2] LXX om.; v.[19] δρῦς, Vulg. terebinthus; 21[9] LXX Ηλὰ, Vulg. terebinthus) 'Elah,' RVm in both 'the terebinth.' AV tr. (Is 6[13]) 'teil tree,' RV 'terebinth,' LXX τερέβινθος, Vulg. terebinthus. AV tr. (Hos 4[13]) 'elms' (see ELM), RV 'terebinths,' LXX δένδρον συσκιάζον, Vulg. terebinthus.

3. אֵלוֹן 'êlôn, AV tr. (Gn 12[6] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. convallis; 13[18] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. vallis; Dt 11[30] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. vallis; Jg 4[11] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. vallis; 9[6] LXX βάλανος, Vulg. quercus; 1 S 10[3] LXX δρῦς, Vulg. quercus) 'plain' or 'plains,' RV 'oak' or 'oaks,' m. 'terebinth' or 'terebinths.' AV (Jos 19[33]) transliterates Allon (many edd. read אֵלוֹן), RV 'oak,' m. 'terebinth,' B Μωλά, A Μηλών, Vulg. Elon.

Thus it will be seen that the weight of the two Eng. versions for the first two words is 'oak,' and AV for the last 'plain,' RV (certainly correctly) 'oak,' m. 'terebinth.' The great diversity in the LXX and Vulg. in 1 is partly due to the resemblance between the word for 'oak' and that for 'god.'

The other two words tr[d] 'oak' are in appearance derived from an unknown root אָלַל, though they differ from 2 and 3 only in punctuation. They are 4. אַלָּה 'allāh (Jos 24[26]), EV 'oak,' LXX τερέμινθος, Vulg. quercus. 5. אַלּוֹן 'allôn. This is always tr[d] 'oak' in both Eng. versions. LXX give βάλανος, δρῦς, Vulg. quercus. The Arab. affords no clue to the meaning of any of the above terms, as there is no derivative from the cognate roots which refers to a tree. It is thought by many (e.g. Dillm., Del., cf. RVm) that 1, 2, and 3 denote the terebinth and 4 and 5 the oak (Hos 4[13], Is 6[13] show that אֵלָה and אַלּוֹן are distinct). See, further, articles TEREBINTH, TURPENTINE, and Dillmann's note on Gn 12[6].

There are nine species of oak in Pal. and Syria. (1) Q. Sessiliflora, Sm., a tall tree of subalpine Lebanon, with deciduous, sinuate-pinnate-lobed leaves. (2) Q. Lusitanica, Lam. (Arab. mellûl and ballût), a large tree, with deciduous, elliptical to oblong and sublanceolate, dentate or crenate leaves. It grows abundantly from the coast to the middle mountain regions. It bears numerous sorts of galls. (3) Q. Ilex, L., a low tree of the Syrian coast. (4) Q. Coccifera, L., the holm oak, Arab. sindîân, the largest of the oaks of Palestine. It has a flattened globular, very dense comus, often 40–50 ft. in diameter, and 25–35 ft. high. It has ever green, ovate to oblong, spiny toothed or entire, glossy leaves, usually not over 1–2 in. long. It is generally planted near Moslem, Druze, and Mutawâly welys. A specimen of this tree, with very straggling branches, is the famous Abraham's Oak, a tree, however, which is not more than 300–400 years old. (See HOLM TREE). (5) Q. Cerris, L. (Arab. ballût or likk). This has an oblong comus, often 50–60 ft. high, with deciduous, oblong, more or less pinnate-lobed leaves. It grows very luxuriantly in the mountainous to subalpine regions, esp. in Cassius and Amanus. (6) Q. Ehrenbergii, Ky., is a medium-sized tree, with deciduous, ovate, pinnatisect or parted leaves. It is found only in the middle zone of Lebanon and Antilebanon. (7) Q. Ægilops, L., the Valonia oak (Arab. mellûl), has a rounded comus, and deciduous, ovate to oblong, unequally coarse serrate leaves, often 2–3 in. long. The acorn is the largest belonging to any Syrian species, being often 1–2 in. in diameter. The cupule contains much tannin, hence it is extensively used in tanning, and is a standard article of commerce. This tree flourishes in the lower and middle mountain zones. (8) Q. Look, Ky. (Arab. likk), is a medium-sized tree or shrub, with deciduous, oblong, wavy, crenate-dentate leaves. It grows in forests in Lebanon and Antilebanon and Ḥaurân. (9) Q. Libani, Oliv., is a low tree or shrub, with lanceolate, glossy, coarsely dentate leaves. It grows in the middle zones of Lebanon, Cassius, Amanus, and northward.

It will thus be seen that the several species of oak are among the most widely disseminated trees of Syria and Palestine. The mountains of Ḥaurân (Bashan, Is 2[13], Ezk 27[6], Zec 11[2]) have many oak trees still, mostly Q. Coccifera, Q. Ægilops, and Q. Lusitanica. Oak trees were planted by tombs (Gn 35[8]). Few objects in Pal. or Syria are more striking than the immense oak trees, solitary or grouped near the welys. Oak trees were places of sacrifice (Hos 4[13]). From oak timber idols were made (Is 44[14]). The wood of the oak has always been used for fuel, for roofing of houses, and for shipbuilding (Ezk 27[6]).

OAR.—See SHIPS AND BOATS.

OATH.—The leading terms for 'oath,' 'swear,' etc., are 1. אָלָה noun and verb; Ḳal='swear,' Hiphil 'put under oath.' This word has more especially the sense of 'curse,' LXX ἀρά, Vulg. maledictio; cf. the phrase לאלה היה 'become an execration,' Nu 5[27] (P), Jer 29[18] 42[18] 44[12] (see below). Cf. Ac 23[12. 14. 21], where ἀναθεματίζειν is used of the Jews who bound themselves under an oath (curse) to kill St. Paul. 2. שְׁבוּעָה 'oath,' נִשְׁבַּע (Niph.) 'swear,' הִשְׁבִּיעַ (Hiph.) 'cause to swear,' 'take an oath of one,' 'adjure,' answering respectively to the LXX ὅρκος, ὄμνυμι or ὀμνύω, ὁρκίζω or ἐξορκίζω, and the Vulg. juramentum or jusjurandum, jurare, adjurare. The verb שבע is derived from שֶׁבַע 'seven.' Seven was regarded as a sacred number by the Semites, and so the verb would mean literally 'to come under the influence of seven things' (W. R. Smith, RS, p. 166; cf. above, p. 565). For example, seven animals would be killed or seven witnesses called.

That we may understand the purpose and importance of oaths among the Hebrews in primitive times, the historical situation requires to be borne in mind. Before there was a collective national life, with an accepted code of laws and a strong executive, any convention formed among men had to be of the nature of a mutual understanding; and when the agreement was one of much moment, it was made as binding as the circumstances of the time allowed, by the parties to it subjecting themselves with all due solemnity to an oath. Examples of oaths between men we have in Gn 26[28ff.] 50[25], Jos 2[12ff.] 9[15. 18]. In conformity with the entire usage, and with the externalism which was its principal feature, strict attention was given to the forms and technicalities employed; a kind of ritual was established in oath-taking. In particular, the custom prevailed of killing an animal in the ceremonial, the symbolism in this case having been both elaborate and impressive. The practice is described in Gn 15 and Jer 34[18f.]. The victim was divided into two pieces, and the persons concerned walked between the pieces, in testimony of their invocation of the like doom of destruction upon themselves if they proved unfaithful to their oath. The form of walking between the pieces after eating of the sacrifice is held by Robertson Smith to have been further indicative of the belief that the parties were taken within the mystical life of the victim. Among the simpler forms used there is the act of 'putting the hand under the thigh' (Gn 24[2ff.] 47[29]): the underlying idea is discussed by Dillmann, in loc. (See also art. THIGH). Or the hand is stretched out to heaven (Gn 14[22]; cf. Dn 12[7], Rev 10[5f.]), this gesture by its naturalness explaining itself.

The language of adjuration varies greatly. Among the commonest expressions are the phrases, 'The LORD do so to me, and more also,' and 'As the LORD liveth,' or there is the extended form, 'As the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth.' Jacob swears by the fear (פַּחַד, i.e. 'the object of his fear'=God; cf. v.[42]) of his father Isaac (Gn 31[53]), and Joseph swears by the life of Pharaoh (Gn 42[15]). In early times the tribal god and an earthly ruler had not been sharply distinguished from each other in men's thoughts: thus the practice of swearing by the prince or by the life of the prince would be accounted for. On the other hand, even when better things were to be expected after the establishment of ethical monotheism, abuses were common among the scribes; there was a declension by easy transitions from the invocation of the Deity to forms of adjuration by some of the familiar objects of earth. Thus one would swear by Heaven, by Jerusalem as the Holy City, by the earth, by his own head (Mt 5[34ff.]), or again by the temple as the House of God, by the gold of the temple, by the altar, or by the gift on the altar (Mt 23[16ff.]).

As the Author of the world was invoked in adjuration, the idea prevailed that the oath, once uttered, had objective significance in the sense that it affected the course of nature; a conviction that may be taken to indicate in one aspect of it how even primeval man was feeling after the truth which was afterwards to be revealed, that 'out of the heart are the issues of life.' To take an oath was to come under a specified penalty in case of violation of the oath, to expose one's self to a curse. Accordingly אָלָה='oath or curse.' Thus the princes of the congregation of Israel, having sworn to the Gibeonites to be at peace with them and to let them live, find that they must carry out their undertaking, at least in form, even when it was discovered that the Gibeonites had been deceivers, 'lest,' they said, 'wrath be upon us because of the oath which we sware unto them' (Jos 9). And Saul resolved, in fulfilment of an oath he had uttered, to kill his son Jonathan, who was innocent (1 S 14[24ff.]; cf. Mt 14[9]). In Nu 5 the oath of cursing, administered with the ritual of the water of bitterness, entails the most terrible consequences on the guilty; and in Zec 5[1ff.] the flying roll of the prophetic vision represents a curse 'like a bird of prey' pursuing the wicked person over the face of the whole earth. In view of the far-reaching consequences involved in oath-taking, the law placed careful restrictions on the practice in the case of members of a family other than the head (Nu 30).

Perjury on the part of a witness was punished with the same penalty which his testimony, if true, would have involved for the accused person (Dt 19[16ff.]).

Oaths as between God and men. At a period when every important compact among men was confirmed by an oath, and when there was no other guarantee for the discharge of their liabilities by each of the parties concerned, the conception formed of God's relation to His people was, and could only be, the conception of His making a promise to them under the sanction of an oath. When God is represented as taking an oath to the fathers, it is meant that those with whom He entered into relation gained the assurance that His fidelity to them and to His promise was unalterable (cf. He 6[13]). His nature was partly understood through the thoughts and practices of the best men of the time; whereas a presentation of His ways and character by means of ideas which were entirely unconnected with the current life of the age would have been meaningless and void of effect. The oath which God took to Abraham, and which is so often referred to, is given in Gn 22[15ff.]: 'By myself have I sworn, saith the LORD . . . that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars,' etc.

When God is regarded as binding Himself by an oath, a period has been reached in the history of Revelation which is comparatively well defined both in respect to the initial and the closing stage of it. There has been an advance when the truth is communicated to man, in such a way as to be believed, that God makes and will without fail keep a promise, that He is spiritual and moral, and has an interest in man. On the other hand, the peculiar externalism of such religious faith is obvious; and it is apparent that only a very limited knowledge of the divine nature is attainable, in the absence of practical proof of God's intervention for good in the exigencies of earthly life. The experience and thought of the period in question are accordingly transcended; trust in God comes to be based on other ground. When the chosen people were formed into a nation, the warrant and motive for obedience, enforced again and again to the better mind of the Israelites, was the deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and the known goodness of Jehovah. Not merely because a promise had once been made and confirmed by an oath, but because God had saved the people, loved them, and brought His goodness in the law near to their heart, were they under obligation to serve Him. The old oath is frequently adduced indeed, but the spiritual and moral facts of the nation's history are mainly rehearsed in attestation of the truth that God was faithful to His oath. In the New Covenant (Jer 31[33f.]), and above all in its completion in Christ, men's knowledge of the Lord, their trust in Him, rests on His forgiveness of their sin, and on His creation of a new and better righteousness.

On the human side in OT religion man took oath to God. An oath was 'a peculiarly solemn confession of faith' (Driver, Deut. p. 95). Far from being reprehensible from the religious or moral point of view, the practice was incumbent on the pious, and had the promise of blessing. ('Every one that sweareth by him shall glory,' Ps 63[11]).

But it is requisite that one shall swear by Jehovah the true God, shall do so in truth and righteousness of spirit, and shall faithfully perform the oath (Jer 4^2 12^{16}). It is sinful to swear by them that are no gods, as Baal, and so to acknowledge them, or by images or forms usurping the place of God, as the 'sin of Samaria' or the 'way' (understood to be the 'manner' or 'ritual')* of Beersheba (Jer 12^{16}, Am 8^{14}). Also the double-dealing of those who swear to the Lord and swear by Malcam is severely condemned (Zeph 1^5).

In the time of Christ, minute arbitrary distinctions had been set up by the scribes and Pharisees in adjuration, such as were plainly destructive of the moral sense and amounted to a profanation of the name of God; and the abuse called forth from Christ the severest denunciation (Mt $23^{16ff.}$). An oath which was to all appearance most solemn and binding was evaded after all by the methods of casuistry, by the tacit reservation that it had no force, that 'it was nothing.' The name of God was invoked to cover deliberate deceit. But our Lord goes further when He lays down the principle in the Sermon on the Mount, 'Swear not at all' (Mt $5^{34.\ 37}$; so Ja 5^{12}). Men's speech is to be 'Yea, yea; nay, nay.' All communication between them is to be taken up to the sphere of perfect truthfulness. The introduction of oaths in particular cases implies a claim to some licence in departing from the truth in other cases. The practice which ostensibly promotes morality is thus, in fact, injurious to it.

As the prohibition in Mt 5^{34} seems absolute, the question arises whether Christ would have sanctioned the judicial use of oaths. In this connexion His own example may be pointed to when Caiaphas the high priest adjured Him by the living God that He should tell whether He was the Christ (Mt $26^{63f.}$). Jesus answered affirmatively without taking exception to the condition imposed. And St. Paul sometimes calls God to witness for the truth of his assertions (2 Co 1^{23}, Gal 1^{20}). The will of Christ is the supreme and absolute standard of conduct, but the will can be ascertained only when regard is had to the conditions of time, place, and circumstance. The new law in Mt 5^{34} is understood in its context. As compared with the old law which is mentioned in the previous verse, it is a concise, pointed expression of a necessary and enduring principle. But error is readily incurred by generalizing or by exalting the letter above the spirit, as in the case of the other injunction, 'give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away' (Mt 5^{42}). In determining whether and in what cases the use of oaths is in accordance with the mind of Christ, people have to ask what conduces to the advancement of Christian righteousness in the particular situations that are contemplated.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF.—

i. Name, and Place in the Canon.
ii. Contents.
iii. Unity and Date.
iv. Condition of Text, Literary Characteristics, etc. Literature.

This, the shortest of all the prophetical writings, consisting of only twenty-one verses, has an importance out of all proportion to its length, because of the literary and exegetical questions it raises, and the diversity of opinion which still prevails as to the unity and the date of the book, and the historical allusions it contains.

i. NAME, AND PLACE IN THE CANON.—The name Obadiah is not uncommon in the OT (see preceding article), and has been read on an ancient seal, inscribed 'Obadyahu 'ebhed hammelekh (see figure in Benzinger, Heb. Arch. p. 258). It occurs, like similar names, in the two forms עֹבַדְיָהוּ and עֹבַדְיָה, of which the latter is used in the case of the prophetical book which forms our subject. The Massoretic pointing עֹבַדְיָה, which is supported by LXX B 'Οβδειού, implies, as is pointed out by G. A. Smith (Twelve Prophets, ii. 164 n.), the meaning 'worshipper of J"' (?cf. Obed-edom; see the cautious note of Driver, Text of Sam. p. 206), but the word might be vocalized עַבְדִּיָה=עַבְדִּיָהּ 'servant of J"' (cf. ΑΝ 'Αβδ(ε)ιού; עַבְדָּא of Neh 11^{17}‖1 Ch 9^{16}; and the name Abdiel in 1 Ch 5^{15}). Of the particular Obadiah whose name the prophecy bears we know nothing, although Delitzsch conjectures that he may have been the prince of that name who, according to 2 Ch 17^7, was sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah. It must, indeed, remain uncertain whether the name is that of the author of the early prophecy contained in vv.[1-10] (see below), or of the writer who supplemented this and gave the book its present form, or whether (which König suggests as a possibility) both these authors bore the name Obadiah.*

In the Hebrew Bible the Bk. of Ob stands fourth amongst the Twelve Minor Prophets, between Amos and Jonah. It has been suggested by König (Einleit. 302) that this position may have been given to it by the collectors of the Canon in view of Am 9^{12} ('that they may possess the remnant of Edom'), which finds its echo and its supplement in Ob [19] ('they . . . shall possess the mount of Esau'), and of Ob [1] ('a messenger is sent among the nations'), which might be supposed to find an illustration in the story of Jonah (cf. art. JONAH, in vol. ii. p. 748[b]). In the LXX Obadiah alone comes between Jl and Jon, the order being Hos, Am, Mic, Jl, Ob, Jon, instead of the MT order Hos, Jl, Am, Ob, Jon, Mic.

* We assume that עבדיה is a proper name and not merely an appellative, as is probably the case with מַלְאָכִי 'my messenger,' which usage has converted into the familiar name Malachi.

Obadiah is one of the OT books that are not quoted in the New Testament.

ii. CONTENTS.—The prophecy is announced as 'concerning Edom.' Jahweh has sent a messenger (צִיר) among the nations to stir up a general rising against her (v.[1]).

The words כֹּה אָמַר אֲדֹנָי יהוה לֶאֱדוֹם must have been penned by the later writer (see below under 'Unity') to introduce the quotation of the earlier oracle, beginning 'We have heard,' etc.; for it is plain that the latter is a form of expression which could hardly be put directly into the mouth of Jahweh.

Edom is to be brought low in spite of her trust in her rocky fastnesses (vv.[2-4]). The ruin is to be complete, the spoiling beyond that of ordinary thieves (vv.[5-6]). This destruction of Edom is to be wrought by the treachery of her former friends and allies (v.[7]). The wonted wisdom of Edom shall fail her in this extremity (vv.[8-9]). The reason for this chastisement is the unbrotherly conduct of which Edom was guilty towards Judah in the day of its calamity when Jerusalem was sacked by foreigners, and lots cast over it (vv.[10-11]). Edom is emphatically charged to desist from such conduct (vv.[12-14]).

The imperatives in vv.[12-14] appear to be due to the vivid picture which the writer calls up to himself of the conduct of Edom. He is really describing the past, but he speaks of what the Edomites had actually done as of what they ought not to do.

The day of the Lord (on this conception see Driver, Joel and Amos [Index]; A. B. Davidson on Zeph 1[7] and in art. ESCHATOLOGY OF OT in vol. i. of this Dictionary, p. 735 ff.) is near upon all the nations, in whose destruction Edom shall share, being exterminated by the united 'house of Jacob' (including both Judah and Ephraim (vv.[15-18])).

The idea of a reunion of Judah and Ephraim in the last days appears elsewhere, e.g. in Jer 31[5. 27], Zec 10[6].—The 'ye' of v.[16] cannot be the Edomites, who are addressed throughout in the genuine passages by 'thou.' Moreover, Edom must be included in 'all the nations.' The 'ye' can only be the Jerusalemites. As Judah had once drunk the cup of Jahweh's fury (for the expression cf. Ezk 23[32], La 4[21], 'Jer' 51[17ff.], Hab 2[15], Ps 75[9] [Eng. 8]; cf. also Jer 13[12-14] [? Jehoiachin's time] for a closely allied conception), so must the heathen now drink it.

The house of Jacob shall reinherit their ancient possessions, Judah and Benjamin overflowing into Ephraim and Gilead, which are compensated by receiving the borderland of Phœnicia as far as Zarephath, while the Negeb dispossesses Esau of Mt. Seir, and the captives from Sepharad occupy the cities of the Negeb. 'Saviours' (cf. Jg 2[16] 3[9. 15]) shall defend Zion and 'judge' the mount of Esau, and the rule of Jahweh shall be established (vv.[15-21]).

The summary given of this last section is what upon the whole appears to us to be the most probable meaning, but much uncertainty attaches to it. Wellhausen, followed by Nowack, understands vv.[19. 20] quite differently. He pronounces them to be an expansion of v.[17], and declares that הַגָּנֶב and הַשִּׁפְלָה cannot possibly be subjects of יָרְשׁוּ (as AV and RV take them). They must be in apposition with אֶחָיו עָשָׂו and אֶת־ פְּלִשְׁתִּים respectively (both of which Wellh. pronounces interpolated, because they have אֶת prefixed, while הַגָּנֶב and הַשִּׁפְלָה want it). He remarks, further, that 'Benjamin,' if genuine, would reflect the late conception that Jerus. was situated in this tribe. But possibly it is a textual error, we expect rather a verb. שֹׁמְרוֹן, too, he suspects, for the 'fields of Samaria' would surely be included in the 'fields of Ephraim.' See, further, below under 'Date.'

iii. UNITY AND DATE.—Three leading forms of opinion have prevailed regarding these: (1) that the Bk. of Ob is a unity and pre-exilic; (2) that it consists of two portions both post-exilic; (3) that it is made up of an early pre-exilic and a late post-exilic passage. We shall presently examine each of these positions, but in the first place it will be well to consider a question whose answer will affect our final conclusion, namely—

What is the relation between Ob [1-9] and Jer 49[7-22]? The resemblance between these two passages is so close as to demand explanation. The facts are as follows:—

Ob [1]=Jer 49[14], except that in Jer the sing. שָׁמַעְתִּי is read instead of the plur. שָׁמַעְנוּ, the pass. ptcp. Qal שְׁלוּחַ replaces the perf. Pu'al שֻׁלַּח for 'is sent,' and the expressions used in summoning the nations have been modified and slightly expanded (Ob having וְקוּמוּ וְנָקוּמָה עָלֶיהָ לַמִּלְחָמָה, Jer הִתְקַבְּצוּ וּבֹאוּ עָלֶיהָ וְקוּמוּ לַמִּלְחָמָה: וּבֹאוּ עָלֶיהָ).

Ob [2]=Jer 49[15], except that in Jer an introductory כִּי is prefixed, that אַתָּה after בָּזוּי is wanting, and that for מְאֹד 'greatly' of Ob we have in Jer בָּאָדָם 'among men' parallel to בַּגּוֹיִם of the preceding clause.

Ob [3a]=Jer 49[16a], except that Ob wants the תִּפְלַצְתְּךָ 'thy terribleness' of Jer, that for הַשִּׁיאֲךָ of Ob we have in Jer הִשִּׁיא אֹתָךְ, that סֶלַע is anarthrous in Ob, but has the article in Jer, that Jer inserts תָּפְשִׂי ('holding') before מְרוֹם ('height'), and replaces שִׁבְתּוֹ ('his dwelling') by גִּבְעָה 'hill.' Ob [3b] 'that saith in his heart' is wanting in Jer.

Ob [4]=Jer 49[16b], except that Jer substitutes כִּי for אִם, and omits 'and though thou set [thy nest] among the stars.'

Ob [5] closely resembles Jer 49[9], but the order is reversed, Jer commencing with 'if grape-gatherers came,' etc., and the interrogative ה is omitted before לֹא, making of the words an assertion instead of a question. The words 'if spoilers' and the exclamation 'How art thou destroyed!' are wanting in Jer, and for יִגְנְבוּ 'steal' we have הִשְׁחִיתוּ 'destroy.'

Ob [6] resembles in thought, but only slightly in expression, Jer 49[10]. Note how חָפַשׂ 'search out' of Ob is replaced by חָשַׂף in Jer.

Ob [8] slightly resembles Jer 49[7].

Ob [9a] resembles Jer 49[22b].

It is evident that either Jeremiah borrowed from Obadiah or Obadiah from Jeremiah, or that both borrowed from a common source. The first and the third of these have been the favourite positions maintained, although Hitzig and Vatke have maintained that Jeremiah formed the model for Obadiah. But an examination of the differences between the texts of Obadiah and Jeremiah in the passages common to both has satisfied the great majority of scholars that the more original form of the prophecy is in Obadiah. [Only in vv.[9. 15. 16], the omission of אִם שׁוֹדְדִי, the reading בָּאָדָם for בָּאוֹר, and the retaining of תִּפְלַצְתְּךָ, can the superiority be awarded to Jeremiah]. The logical connexion, too, is better in Obadiah. On the other hand, if Jeremiah is held to have borrowed from Obadiah, the following difficulties have to be faced. Not only has Jeremiah occasionally the better text, but Jer 49[7-22], if it be from the pen of Jeremiah, dates from the fourth year (B.C. 604) of Jehoiakim's reign, whereas Ob [11-14], as we shall presently find reason to conclude, presupposes the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldæans and the destruction of the Jewish State. Hence the Bk. of Obadiah could not have lain before Jeremiah in its present form—a conclusion which is strengthened when we note that it is only from the first nine verses of Obadiah that Jeremiah would thus have borrowed, although much of what follows these would have suited his purpose admirably. Wellh. and Nowack make Obadiah the direct model for Jer 49[7-22], but do not admit the genuineness of this passage, the former holding (with Stade, Smend, Schwally) that the whole of Jer 46–51 is non-genuine and late, the latter (with Giesebrecht, etc.) that many passages in these chapters, including 49[7-22], must be denied to Jeremiah. Nowack would account for the superiority of Jer 49[9. 15] to Ob [5. 2] by supposing that in Ob [2] we have probably a textual corruption and in v.[5] an interpolation both introduced subsequent to the use of Obadiah by 'Jeremiah.'

The safest conclusion appears to be that Jeremiah and Obadiah borrowed from a common source, and that Obadiah incorporated this with less alteration than Jeremiah.

To return now to the three views noted above as to the date of the book in its present form. What we have said in comparing Jeremiah and Obadiah would suffice to show the improbability, not to say the impossibility, of (1) the view that the whole of Obadiah is pre-exilic and that the book is a unity (Caspari, v. Hofmann, Delitzsch, Nägelsbach, Keil, v. Orelli, Kirkpatrick, Peters). The objections to the unity and an early date for the whole book are mainly three: (a) the nations are in vv.1-7 God's instruments of vengeance against Edom, whereas in v.15f. they are all alike (Edom included) the object of Divine chastisement; (b) vv.11-14 cannot have a satisfactory sense assigned to them except on the view that they refer to the capture of Jerus. and the deportation of the Jews by Nebuchadrezzar (cf. v.20 'the captivity of Jerusalem'); (c) there is a difference in style between the two halves of the book, the first being terse, animated, and full of striking figures, while the second is diffuse and marked by poverty of ideas and trite figures. The occasion to which those who make the book a unity generally ascribe it is the capture of Jerusalem by the Philistines and Arabians in the time of Jehoram (c. 850 B.C.). But while this occurrence, regarding which, unfortunately, we have no information apart from 2 Ch 21[16f.], might account for vv.1-10, it is quite inadequate to explain vv.11-14.

(2) Wellhausen holds that vv.10-14 allude to the attitude displayed by Edom at the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldæans, but he sees no reason for making vv.1-7 [he considers vv.8. 9 interpolations] earlier. The attack upon Edom by treacherous friends and allies he cannot refer to any action on the part of Assyria, Babylon, or Persia, or of Moab or Ammon, not to speak of Judah or Israel, but must have in view, he thinks, the small nomadic neighbouring peoples.* The Edomites were, as a matter of fact, expelled from their original settlements by Arab tribes. This took place subsequent to the capture of Jerusalem, so that the main ground for separating vv.10-14 from vv.1-7 seems to Wellh. to fall away.† The Arabs had begun to press northwards in the beginning of the 6th cent. (perh. Zeph 2[14], cf. v.7; Ezk 25[4. 5. 10]), and at length we find them in B.C. 312 settled in Petra (Diodor. xix. 94); cf. the Arabic name Gebal for Seir in Ps 83[8], dating perhaps from about the same time. During the intermediate period we hear of Geshem or Gashmu the Arabian in Neh 2[19] 6[1. 2. 6], and Wellh. thinks that Mal 1[1-5] (first half of 5th cent.) may refer to the same phase of the expulsion of the Edomites by the Arabians as is represented in Ob 1-14. Of course he does not contend that all the Edomites were driven into the Negeb (which, he thinks, Ob19 designates as the then dwelling-place of Esau). Many may have remained in their original homes, where under Arab rule they would be the special representatives of Nabatæan culture, and this would account for the numerous Hebrew proper names that occur among the Nabatæans. Wellh. does not attempt to fix the date of vv.15-21, but simply remarks that v.21 might refer to the conquest of Idumæa by John Hyrcanus.

Wellh. is closely followed in the above conclusions by Nowack, who fixes as the terminus a quo for vv.1-14 the date of the capture of Jerusalem (B.C. 586), but thinks it should probably be brought down to a date shortly after that of Malachi. Vv.15-21 are much later, belonging to a time when eschatological hopes filled men's minds, but we are not in a position to fix the date more precisely. Both Wellh. and Nowack insist strongly that vv.1-14 describe what has actually happened, not what is going to happen, to Edom. It is different with vv.15-21, where, however, the punishment of Edom is to be simply an episode in the larger scheme of judgment upon all nations.*

Hitzig, who makes the whole book post-exilic, seeks to fix the date of Obadiah from the words in v.20 הַגָּלָה הַחֵל הַזֶּה, which he renders 'the captivity of this fortress,' alluding to the fortress of Egypt to which many Jews were carried captive by Ptolemy Lagi (cf. Jos. Ant. XII. i. 1, c. Ap. ii. 4). In B.C. 312 Antigonus ordered an expedition against Petra, to which Hitzig would refer the words of Ob 1 'We have heard a report,' etc. The chief objection to this is that before 312 (see above) Petra had ceased to belong to Edom and had passed under the rule of the Arabians.

(3) As we have seen above, the view strongly commends itself that vv.1-9 (or 10) are pre-exilic and borrowed pretty faithfully from an older source, whereas vv.11-21 presuppose the capture of Jerusalem and the Exile.

This was the view of Ewald, and is adopted substantially by Kuenen, Cornill, Wildeboer, Driver, etc. According to Ewald (so also G. A. Smith), the later prophet lived in the Captivity (v.20, which Ewald renders 'of this coast'). The occasion of the earlier prophecy Ewald (improbably) supposed to have been when Elath was restored by Rezin to the Edomites (2 K 16[6] Kerê and RVm), and its author to have been a contemporary of Isaiah. Konig, who accepts the view that Obadiah consists of a pre-exilic and an exilic or post-exilic portion, analyzes thus: (a) vv.1-10 [but v.7, whose concluding words are pleonastic alongside of v.8, is probably an expansion; perhaps also v.9 on account of the late קְטֹן] 16a. 18. 19a 20b; (b) vv.11-15. 16b. 17. 19b. 20a. 21.

It appears, upon the whole, most probable that not only the Exile but the Return belong to the past. Note that there is no prediction of the rebuilding and re-populating of the capital, Jerusalem. The expressions in the closing verses are best satisfied by a date such as Nowack postulates for vv.1-14 (c. 432 B.C.), or, perhaps preferably, later still. It is unfortunate that the text and the meaning of these verses are so doubtful.

A good deal has been built on the mention in v.21 (20) of Sepharad or (see Driver, LOT[6] p. 320) Sĕphārēd, for which the LXX has, AB Ἐφραθά, Q[a] Σαφαράδ, Q* Σφραθά. Targ. Onk. gives אספמיא, i.e. Hispania, Spain; hence the origin of the name Sephardim for Spanish as distinguished from German (Ashkenazim) Jews. If the MT is correct, the reference will be either to Çparda of the Persian inscriptions, which lay in Bithynia or Galatia—a district conquered by Cyrus and organized into a satrapy by Darius Hystaspis—or Shaparda in S.W. Media, mentioned in inscriptions of Sargon (B.C. 721–705). The latter reference is adopted by Schrader (Keilinschrift u. Geschichtsforschung, 116 ff., KAT[2], 446 f. [COT ii. 145 f.]), and is pronounced 'exceedingly probable' by Frd. Delitzsch (Paradies, 249). Sayce (HCM 482 ff.) and Cheyne (Founders of OT Criticism, 311 f.) contend for Çparda [G. A. Smith, who believes the later part of Obadiah to have been written during the Exile, would hold, if Çparda is meant, that the reference to it is a late insertion]. While Sayce is content to postulate a 'comparatively late date' for the prophecy, Cheyne would definitely assign it to the period (c. 350 B.C.) when Artaxerxes Ochus deported many Jews who had taken part in the great revolt against the Persian supremacy. Jl 3[6] ('the children also of Judah and the children of Jerusalem have ye sold unto the Grecians [Jĕvānîm], that ye might remove them far from their border') may refer to this. It is noteworthy that in the inscriptions Çparda is always mentioned in immediate connexion with Jaunâ,

* It may perhaps be not without interest, in view of the use of the term 'thieves' in v.5, to compare the application to the same (?) tribes of the word daikanu (in the Tel el-Amarna tablets) which Winckler interprets 'robbers' or 'murderers.'

† G. A. Smith agrees with Wellh. that v.7 (which is not found in the parallel passage in Jer) probably refers to the expulsion of the Edomites by the Arabs, but assigns vv.1-6 to an earlier date.

* For this conception, cf. Zeph 1[2f.] 3[8], Jer 25[32f.], Ezk 36–38 Is 45[20] 63[6] 66[16. 18f.], 'Is' 34[1-8], Zec 12[3. 4] 14[2. 3. 12-15].

i.e. 'Ionians' or 'Greeks.' See, further, art. SEPHARAD.

Cornill considers that the late prophecies 'Is' 34. 35, in which, as in Obadiah, eschatological hopes are connected with the downfall of Edom, were certainly known to the author of Obadiah.

The following parallels between Obadiah and Joel may be noted: Ob [10] and Jl 4 [Eng. 3] [19] have מחמס in common; Ob [11] and Jl 4 [Eng. 3] [3a] both contain the expression יַדּוּ גוֹרָל 'they cast lots,' which is found elsewhere only in Nah 3[10]; Ob [15] and Jl 4 [Eng. 3] [4. 14]; Ob [17] and Jl 3[5] [Eng. 2[32]] 4 [Eng. 3] [17b]. In all these instances the probability appears to be that it is Joel who quotes from Obadiah and not vice versa (see G. Buchanan Gray in Expositor, Sept. 1893, p. 208 ff., and cf. Cheyne, Founders of OT Criticism, 312, and Driver, Joel and Amos, 19 ff.).

iv. CONDITION OF TEXT, LITERARY CHARACTERISTICS, ETC.—The text of Obadiah is in several instances corrupt, and in not a few cases suspected of being so. It may, indeed, be suggested that Wellhausen and Nowack are unduly suspicious of the MT, and that the former is rather fond of dropping sarcastic remarks such as that on v.[7]: 'von אֵין תְּבוּנָה בּוֹ selber gilt—es ist kein Sinn darin.' Still the number of blanks which both these scholars leave in their translation of Obadiah and the frequent emendations they propose give a fairly correct impression of the condition of the text. The following may be noted as points connected with the vocabulary and the text that merit attention—v.2. הָאָדָם, the original reading, was probably corrupted into מֹאד first by the loss of its final ם and then by the change of the initial ב into ם.

v.3. תִּגְּשִׁי must be supplied from Jer 49[16] before יְרוֹם.

v.4. שִׂים must be changed into תָּשִׂים (LXX θῇς).

vv.5-7. The exclamation אֵיךְ נִבְעְתָה and the whole of v.6 (in which Edom is spoken of in the 3rd person instead of being directly addressed, as formerly, by 'thou') are regarded by Wellh. and Nowack as interpolated. There can be little doubt that אִם שׁוֹדְדִים should be deleted.—Note in v.6 the ἅπ. λεγ. מַצְפְּנָיו his treasures.'—v.7b is hopelessly corrupt. קְשׁוֹר, which in Hos 5[13], Is 16 means 'running sore,' cannot have the sense of 'snare' established for it. The LXX ἐνέδρα may rest upon a reading מָצוֹר or מָצוֹדָה; Chald. has תקלא, Syr. ܡܨܝܕܢ. Aquila's rendering ἐπιβουλῆς (cf. his tr[n] of קְשׁוֹר in Hos 5[13] by συνδέσμας) implies same text as MT. לַחְמְךָ, which is wanting in LXX, and to which it is very hard in the context to give a tolerable sense, has probably arisen by dittography from the preceding שְׁלֻכְךָ. Hitzig and Graetz propose to supply אַנְשֵׁי before it ('the men who ate thy bread'). It may be noted that v.7a is in the kînāh measure (see LAMENTATIONS [BOOK OF], p. 20[b]); cf. Jer 38[22b], whose relation to Obadiah is doubtful, but it is clear that one of the two passages must have served as the model for the other (Driver, LOT [6] 320).

v.10. מֵחָמָס, if genuine, should be attached to the beginning of v.[10] (so LXX, Syr. Vulg.), but it may have been originally a marginal gloss to מֵחֲמָסְךָ. Ewald, who gives it the same position as MT, takes it as='without battle.'

vv.12-14. [נִבְּרוֹ] נָכְרוֹ in v.[12] is a ἅπ. λεγ.; cf. נָכָר (also ἅπ. λεγ.) in Job 31[3]. All these three verses are in the kînāh measure. It is possible that v.[12], if it is genuine, should follow instead of preceding v.[13] (so Wellh., Nowack). For the thrice repeated אֲרָם (אֲדוֹם) in v.[13] the LXX has πάντων αὐτῶν, ἀλλότριοι αὐτῶν, ἀσωλίας αὐτῶν (this last also in v.[12] for אֲרָם), which makes the correctness of the monotonous MT all the more suspected. For תִּשְׁלַחְנָה in v.[13] we ought certainly to read תִּשְׁלַח יָד (so Ewald, followed by Nowack, König and others).—פָּרָק in v.[14] is very doubtful (LXX διεχωλαί, Symm. φυγαδείας). The only other occurrence of the word is in Nah 3[1], where it means 'violence' (LXX ἀδικία; cf. the use of the verb פרק in Ps 7[3] [Eng.2] as applied to a lion tearing his prey in pieces). Graetz conjectures for Ob [14] מִפָּרֶץ 'the breach,' but, as Nowack points out, the fugitives are thought of as already beyond the breach.

v.15b. Wellh. and Nowack transpose the order of the clauses of v.[15] and make 15b the appropriate conclusion of v.[14] and of the original prophecy, while 15a introduces the later supplement to this.

v.16. לָעַג, if genuine, would describe the incoherent or meaningless utterances (cf. Job 6[3], Pr 20[25]) of an intoxicated man, but we should probably emend (with Wellh. and Nowack) to נָעַע 'reel or stagger.'

v.20f have suffered a good deal of corruption. A verb to גָּלָה may have dropped out, and הַחֵל is doubtful. LXX ἡ ἀρχή must have connected the word in some way with הָחֵל 'begin. Neither 'host' nor 'fortress' seems to give an appropriate sense, and Ewald's 'coast' is purely conjectural. Possibly for אֲשֶׁר כִּנְעָנִים we should read אֶרֶץ כְּ 'land of the Canaanites,' i.e. Phœnicia. In v.[21] מוֹשִׁעִים 'saviours' is suspected by Wellhausen and Nowack. Graetz (with LXX, Syr., Aq., Theod.) reads נוֹשָׁעִים 'those who have been saved by Jahweh.' Perhaps he is right in reading מֵהָר for בְּהַר (LXX ἐξ ὄρους).

Like Joel, which is probably later still, Obadiah is written in good Hebrew, and it cannot be said that the diction of the post-exilic portion shows any marked signs of lateness as compared with vv.[1-10]. The only Aramaism in the book is קטל of v.[9b], and, as we have seen above, this may have been originally a marginal gloss.

The closest parallels to the spirit of Obadiah, with its fierce hatred of Edom and its threatenings against the goyim, are to be found in Ezk 25[12ff.] 35, Ps 137, La 4[21f.], Is 34 f. (cf. especially Ob [15] and Is 34[2]) 63[1-6].

OBDIA (A 'Οβδία, B 'Οββειά), 1 Es 5[38], the same as Habaiah ('Οβαιά), Ezr 2[61], or Hobaiah, Neh 7[63]. —The Vat. MS here preserves the more correct form of the name.

OBDURACY.—See HARDENING.

OBED (עֹבֵד).—1. The son of Boaz and Ruth (Ru 4[17] Ὼβήδ) of whom the women said to Naomi at his birth: 'He shall be unto thee a restorer of life and a nourisher of thine old age' (Ru 4[15]). He was nursed in his infancy by Naomi, and grew up to become the father of Jesse the father of David, and an ancestor of our Lord (cf. Mt 1[5], Lk 3[32]). There seems no reason to doubt that David was really the grandson of Obed. 2. A descendant of a daughter of Sheshan who was married to an Egyptian servant (1 Ch 2[37f.], B Ὼβήδ, A Ἰωβήδ). Obed's father's name was Ephlal. His son's name was Jehu. 3. One of 'the mighty men of the armies' of David (1 Ch 11[47], B א Ἰωβήθ, A Ἰωβήδ). 4. A son of Shemaiah and grandson of Obed-edom, who belonged apparently to 'the courses of the doorkeepers' (1 Ch 26[1-7], B Ὼβήδ, A Ἰωβήδ). 5. The father of Azariah, who was one of 'the captains of hundreds' who combined with Jehoiada for the deposition of Athaliah and the setting up of Joash as king (2 Ch 23[1], B Ὼβήδ, A Ἰωβήδ).

OBED-EDOM (עֹבֵד אֱדֹם). The second part of the name is probably but not certainly that of a god. Cf. the similar names 'Abd-'Ashtart, 'Abd-Melkart, etc., and see Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. p. 206 f.; LXX B 'Αβεδδαρά, 'Αβεδδαράμ, 'Αζαεδόμ, 'Αβδεδόμ, 'Αβδοδόμ, 'Ιαβδεδόμ; A shows the additional forms 'Αβεδδαδόμ, 'Αβεδδαράν, 'Ιαζδοδόμ). — 1. A Philistine, a native of Gath, who lived in or near Jerusalem. It was in his house that David deposited the ark after the death of Uzzah, and here it remained three months, bringing a blessing by its presence (2 S $6^{10ff.}$). In the parallel narrative, 1 Ch 13^{14}, the Chronicler characteristically writes, 'the ark of God remained with the family of Obed-edom in his house.' The last three words here refer not to O. but to the ark. This would have been rendered evident if RV had changed 'his' into 'its.' The Chronicler was unable to conceive of the ark remaining in the house of an uncircumcised Philistine, so he constructs a house for it within the house, or on the property, of Obed-edom. (See Kittel's note, ad loc., in Haupt's OT, and Bertholet, Stellung d. Isr. z. d. Fremden, p. 182 f.). It is in all probability the same O. that appears as 2. The eponym of a family of door-keepers in the temple, 1 Ch $15^{18.\ 24}$ 16^{38} $26^{4.\ 8.\ 15}$, 2 Ch 25^{24}. It is easy to understand how the story of O.'s connexion with the ark might transform a Gittite into a Levite (cf. the analogous cases of Samuel, who in 1 S 1^{1} is an Ephraimite, but in 1 Ch 6^{28} a Levite; and the temple-guard, which in 2 K 11 consists of the king's foreign mercenaries, but is converted in 2 Ch 23 into Levitical watchmen). 3. The eponym of a post-exilic family of singers, 1 Ch 15^{21} 16^{5}. J. A. SELBIE.

OBEDIENCE, OBEY.—These terms are, with two exceptions (RV Gn 49^{10}, Pr 30^{17}, where they render the rare word יְקְהַת), the translation in OT of the Hebrew word שָׁמַע shāmaʿ, to 'hear' (so RV Jer 11^{3}, where AV has 'obey'), to 'hearken,' by which term it is rendered AV Gn 3^{17}, Lv 26^{14}, Dt 18^{19} etc., and often in RV, where AV translates 'obey' (e.g. Ex 5^{2}, Dt 4^{30}, Jos 5^{6} etc.). In NT it has several Greek equivalents. The most frequent is ὑπακούω, lit. to 'hearken,' the LXX tr. of the Heb. שָׁמַע. Other NT words for 'obey' are πείθομαι, lit. to 'be persuaded' (so Ac $5^{36.\ 37}$, Ro 2^{8}, Gal 5^{7} etc. The use of the negative forms ἀπειθέω, ἀπειθής, ἀπείθεια is frequent, to denote disobedience), and πειθαρχέω, a word expressing obedience to rulers (so Ac $5^{29.\ 32}$ 'We ought to obey God rather than men,' Tit 3^{1}). ὑποτάσσομαι, which AV twice renders 'obey,' means properly to 'be subject,' a tr^{n} which RV rightly substitutes in 1 Co 14^{34}, Tit $2^{5.\ 9}$.

While occasionally used to express a relation between man and man (e.g. the relation between parents and children, Dt $21^{18.\ 19}$; the case of the children of Jonathan the son of Rechab, Jer $35^{14.\ 18}$; cf. Pr 30^{17}), or between subjects and rulers (2 S 22^{45}, 1 Ch 29^{23}, Is 11^{14}, cf. Gn 49^{10}), the characteristic use of obedience in the Bible is to denote the right relation between man and God. It may be called the fundamental OT virtue. As such it is distinctly contrasted by Samuel with sacrifice in the classical passage, 1 S 15^{22}, 'Hath J" as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of J"? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.' It is the one thing which God requires (Jer 11^{7}), and which from the first determines His attitude to His creatures. It was the cause of the blessing of Abraham (Gn 22^{18} 26^{5}). It is the condition of Israel's receiving the covenant blessing (Ex 19^{5} 'Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me among all peoples.' Cf. Ex 24^{7}, Dt $11^{27.\ 28}$ 30^{1-10}, Jer 11^{1-8}). As such it is made prominent in all later renewals of the covenant (Jos 24^{24}, 1 S $12^{14.\ 15}$; cf. Neh $9^{16.\ 17.\ 26}$), and is insisted upon by the prophets as the condition of those future blessings to which they look forward (Is 1^{19}, Zec 6^{15}). Disobedience, on the other hand, is threatened with the severest penalties (Dt 11^{28} 28^{62}, Lv $26^{14ff.}$, Jer 9^{13} 18^{10}, Is 65^{12}), even to utter destruction (Dt 8^{20} 'As the nations which J" maketh to perish before you, so shall ye perish; because ye would not obey the voice of J" your God'; cf. Jer 12^{17}). It is the explanation of all Israel's misfortunes, whether in the past or the present (Jos 5^{6}, the wanderings in the wilderness; Jg $2^{2.\ 3}$, the failure to conquer the inhabitants of Canaan; 2 K 18^{12}, the Captivity; cf. Neh 9^{17}, Zeph 3^{2}, Is 42^{24}, Dn $9^{10.\ 11}$, and esp. Jer, who continually emphasizes the disobedience of Israel, $7^{23.\ 24}$ 11^{3} 17^{23} 22^{21} 32^{23} 40^{3} 44^{23}). No matter how plausible the prophet, if he urge to disobedience, his message is to be disregarded (Dt 13^{1-5}). No matter how earnest the prayer, if contradicted by a disobedient life, it can hope for no acceptance (Dt $26^{14.\ 15}$, Jer $3^{12.\ 14}$). Yet, on the other hand, no sin is so great but it shall receive forgiveness, if penitence manifest itself in the fruit of obedience (Dt 4^{30} $30^{2.\ 8}$, Jer 26^{13}).

While the duty of obedience is specially associated in OT with the precepts of the Law (so Dt 30^{10}, Ex 24^{7}, Jer 44^{23}), it is not restricted thereto. No commandment of J", however delivered, can safely be disregarded (cf. Ex 5^{2}, the case of Pharaoh; 1 S $15^{19.\ 20}$ 28^{18}, Saul, in the case of Amalek; 1 K 20^{36}, the prophet who disobeyed J"; Jer 38^{20} $42^{13.\ 21}$ $44^{4.\ 7}$, the matter of the Egyptian alliance). Hence it is required, not merely in the case of J" Himself (Job $36^{11.\ 12}$, cf. Ex 23^{20-22}, the Malʾak J"; Pr $5^{7.\ 13}$, the divine Wisdom), but of His human representatives (Joshua, Nu 27^{20}, Jos 1^{17}; the judges, Jg 2^{17}; Samuel, 1 S 8^{19}; the future prophet, Dt 18^{19}; the servant of J", Is 50^{10}).

In many points the NT usage follows the OT (cf. the references to Israel in Ro 10^{16}, Ac 7^{39}, He 2^{2} 11^{8}). In a few cases obedience is predicated of inanimate objects (the wind and the sea, Mt 8^{27}, Mk 4^{41}, Lk 8^{25}; the mountains, Lk 17^{6}), or of the evil spirits in the presence of Christ (Mk 1^{27}). With these exceptions, it is used of men, either in their human relations (children to parents, Eph 6^{1}, Col 3^{20}; wives to husbands, 1 P 3^{6}; servants to masters, Eph 6^{5}, Col 3^{22}), or more frequently in their relations to God (Ac 5^{29}), to Christ (2 Co 10^{5}), or to their human representatives, as the apostles (Paul, 2 Th 3^{14}, Ph 2^{12}, 2 Co 2^{9}, Philem ^{21}; Titus, 2 Co 7^{15}). Characteristic of the Greek usage is the impersonal use of the object. Men are said to be servants of sin (Ro 6^{12}), unrighteousness (Ro 2^{8}), obedience (Ro 6^{16}), the truth (Ro 2^{8}, Gal 5^{7}), the teaching (Ro 6^{17}), the word (1 P 3^{1}), the gospel (2 Th 1^{8}, 1 P 4^{17}), the heavenly vision (Ac 26^{19}).

The importance of obedience is no less emphasized in NT than in OT. It is at once the cause and the condition of salvation. Through one act of obedience (Ro 5^{19}) Christ became to all His followers the author of an eternal salvation (He 5^{9}). But this salvation is only to be obtained on condition that they also obey (He 5^{9}). In His farewell address to His disciples Christ makes obedience the supreme test of love (Jn $14^{15.\ 23}$, cf. Dt 5^{10}). Paul declares that the obedience of the Christian should extend even to the very thoughts (2 Co 10^{5}). On the other hand, disobedience is the supreme evil. By Adam's act of disobedience sin entered the world (Ro 5^{19}). Israel's troubles in the days of the old covenant were due to the same cause. Still worse is the case of those who disobey under the new covenant (He 2^{2}). Such shall receive dreadful punishment, even eternal destruction at the Parousia of Christ (2 Th $1^{8.9}$).

Since the great duty which God requires under the new covenant is faith in Christ, obedience for the Christian takes the form of faith, as Ro 1^5 16^{26}, where the two words are combined in the expression 'the obedience of faith' (cf. Ac 6^7, He 11^8, the case of Abraham). Hence obedience receives in the Epistles the technical meaning of acceptance of the Christian religion. So without qualifying words Ro 15^{18} 16^{19}, 1 P 1^2 (cf. Ro 6^{17} 'Ye became obedient from the heart to that form of teaching whereunto ye were delivered'); Gal 5^7, Ro 2^8, obedient to the truth; 1 P 3^1, the word; 2 Th 1^8, 1 P 4^{17}, the gospel. The phrase 'children of obedience' is used in 1 P 1^{14} as equivalent to Christians. On the other hand, the expression 'sons of disobedience' is used by St. Paul to denote those who belong to this world (Eph 2^2 5^6, Col 3^6).

The great example of obedience is Christ, who 'humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross' (Ph 2^8); who, 'though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered; and having been made perfect, he became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation' (He 5^9, cf. Ro 5^{19}). Hence it should be the effort of every Christian to bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ (2 Co 10^5).

LITERATURE.—Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. sub ὑπακούω, πείθομαι, and cognates; Harless, Christian Ethics (Eng. tr.), 115-125; Weiss, Bibl. Theol. of NT, Index; Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, 363-380. The subject is treated homiletically by H. P. Liddon, Some Words of Christ, 63; P. Brooks, Light of the World, 340; F. W. Robertson, Sermons, ii. 94; H. E. Manning, Sermons, i. 117, 129, 242, 287. W. ADAMS BROWN.

OBEISANCE.—'Obeisant' and 'obeisance,' coming through the French, have been superseded by 'obedient' and 'obedience' which came directly from the Lat. obediens. Maundeville, Travels, 155, says, 'In that Lond thei have a Queen, that governethe alle that Lond; and alle thei ben obeyssant to hire.' And Berners, Froissart, p. 85 (Globe ed.), has, 'And when the month was expired that they of Segur should give up their town, the earl sent thither, and they of the town gave up and became under the obeisance of the King of England.' The form is already rare in the sixteenth century. When found it is almost always in the phrase 'make obeisance' or 'do obeisance.' Shakespeare has the subst. once (the adj. not at all) in the phrase 'Call him "madam," do him obeisance'—Tam. Shrew, Ind. i. 108. But AV has retained from Tindale, as the tr. of שָׁחָה shāḥāh (in its Hithpael conj.), 'make obeisance' in Gn $37^{7.9}$ 43^{28}, 2 Ch 24^{17}, and 'do obeisance' in Ex 18^7, 2 S 1^2 14^4 15^5, 1 K 1^{16}. To the examples of 'do obeisance' RV makes some additions, viz., for AV 'do reverence' in 2 S 9^6, 1 K 1^{31}; for AV 'bow oneself' in 1 S 24^8 28^{14}, 2 S 9^8 14^{22}, 1 K 1^{53}; and for AV 'humbly beseech' in 2 S 16^4. The Heb. verb in the form so tr^d means to prostrate oneself in reverence or worship, and is variously rendered both in AV and RV, though its usual tr. is 'worship.' See WORSHIP. J. HASTINGS.

OBELISK.—Hos 3^4 RVm. See PILLAR.

OBETH (B Οὐβήν, A Ὠβήθ), 1 Es 8^{32}=Ebed, Ezr 8^6.

OBIL (אוֹבִיל; B Ἀβίας, A Οὐβίας; Luc. Ὠβήλ).—The overseer of David's camels, 1 Ch 27^{30}. The name is probably Arabic (cf. أبل 'able to manage camels'; see Oxy. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

OBLATION.—See OFFERING and SACRIFICE.

OBJECT.—This verb occurs twice in AV: Wis 2^{12} 'He upbraideth us with our offending the law, and objecteth to our infamy the transgressings of our education' (ἐπιφημίζει ἡμῖν ἁμαρτήματα παιδείας ἡμῶν, Vulg. 'diffamat in nos peccata disciplinæ nostræ,' Gen. 'blameth us as transgressors of discipline'; RV 'layeth to our charge sins against our discipline'); and Ac 24^{19} 'Who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me,' where the verb so translated is κατηγορέω (κατά and ἀγορεύω, to speak against one in open court), which is rendered 'accuse' in Ac 24^2. The verb was also used transitively in the same sense of public accusation, as Mk 14^{60} Rhem., 'Answerest thou nothing to these things that are objected to thee of these?' and Adams on 2 P 1^4, 'The masters of the pythoness objected this against Paul and Silas.' J. HASTINGS.

OBOTH (אֹבֹת; Ὠβώθ, B has Σωβώθ in Nu $33^{43.44}$).—A station in the journeyings of the children of Israel, mentioned both in the itinerary of Nu 33 and in Nu $21^{10.11}$ as preceding Iye-abarim, and therefore in the neighbourhood of Moab. Nothing definite is known as to its position.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

OBSCURITY.—After the Lat. obscuritas and the Fr. obscurité, 'obscurity' is used literally in AV for darkness, gloom. There is no difference recognized between the two words 'darkness' and 'obscurity.' Obscurity is the tr. of אֹפֶל 'ōphel, in Is 29^{18}, and of חֹשֶׁךְ ḥōshek, in Is 58^{10} 59^9. When both words occur, RV translates 'ōphel by 'obscurity' and ḥōshek by 'darkness.' The use of 'gloom' (instead of AV 'dimness') for mû'āph or mā'ûph (Is 8^{22} 9^1) probably prevented the employment of that word. Obscurity also occurs in Ad. Est 11^8 (Gr. γνόφος, RV 'gloominess'). This literal use of the word is rare in English. The adj. occurs only in Pr 20^{20} 'his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness,' Heb. בְּאִשׁוֹן חֹשֶׁךְ (Kĕrê בְּאִישׁוֹן, which means 'in the pupil [of the eye] of darkness': cf. 7^9 'in the black and dark night,' lit. 'in the pupil of the night and of darkness,' the pupil being the darkest part of the eye), RV 'in the blackest darkness.' See APPLE OF THE EYE. J. HASTINGS.

OBSERVE, OBSERVATION.—The verb to observe is used throughout the AV in the sense of 'give heed to.' Thus Pr 23^{26} 'My son, give me thine heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways' (RV 'delight in,' the translation of the Kethibh); Gn 37^{11} 'his father observed the saying' (RV 'kept the saying in mind'); Hos 14^8 'I have heard him, and observed him' (אֲנִי עָנִיתִי וַאֲשֻׁרֶנּוּ; RV 'I have answered and will regard him'; cf. Shaks. Hamlet, III. i. 162, 'the observed of all observers'); Jon 2^8 'They that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy' (RV 'regard,' as in Ps 31^6 AV and RV); Sir 4^{20} 'Observe the opportunity and beware of evil' (συντήρησον καιρόν); Mk 6^{20} 'For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him' (συνετήρει, AVm 'kept him,' or 'saved him'; RV 'kept him safe'). In the last passage 'observed him' means 'gave him reverence,' which is the tr. of Tind. followed by Cran., Gen., and the Bishops; cf. Shaks. II Henry IV. IV. iv. 30, 'He is gracious, if he be observed.' But the Greek verb means either to keep (laws, etc.) or else to preserve, and the latter is plainly the meaning here. See Swete in loc. Wyclif and the Rhem. Version have 'kept him after Vulg. custodiebat eum.

'Observation' in Lk 17^{20}, 'the kingdom of God cometh not with observation,' means attentive watching (Gr. παρατήρησις), as in Walton, Compleat Angler, 99, 'I told you Angling is an art, either by practice or a long observation or both.' The word also occurs in Neh 13[14] AVm (text 'office,' RV 'observance'), where it means 'ceremony,' 'rite,' or to use the modern word in RV 'observance.' In this sense 'observation' was once common. Thus, Rhem. NT on Ac 17[22], 'Paul calleth not them superstitious for adoring the true and only God with much devotion . . . or any other Christian observation.'

Observer of Times—See DIVINATION, SOOTHSAYING. J. HASTINGS.

OBSTINACY.—See HARDENING.

OCCUPY.—The verb to occupy has become much restricted in meaning since 1611. Following the Lat. occupare (ob-capere?) it expresses in AV usually the idea of being 'taken up with' anything. (1) A good example, and not far removed from mod. use, is He 13[9] 'meats which have not profited them that have been occupied therein' (TR οἱ περιπατήσαντες, edd. οἱ περιπατοῦντες, RV 'they that occupied themselves,' RVm 'walked'). Cf. Erasmus, Commune Crede, fol. 14, 'The science of physike . . . treateth and is occupied about thynges which do helpe or hurte the helthe of the body'; Rhem. NT on Mk 3, 'He so occupieth him selfe for soules, that his kinne thinke him madde.' (2) Still nearer the mod. use is 1 Co 14[16] 'how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks?' (ὁ ἀναπληρῶν τὸν τόπον τοῦ ἰδιώτου, RV 'filleth the place'). Cf. again Erasmus, Com. Crede, fol. 17, 'The mystycall body therefore of Christe, occupieth the iiii. parte of the symbole or crede.' (3) But the word sometimes means 'use' or 'employ,' as Ex 38[24] 'All the gold that was occupied for the work in all the work of the holy place, even the gold of the offering, was twenty and nine talents' (כָּל־הַזָּהָב הֶעָשׂוּי, RV 'that was used'); Jg 16[11] 'If they bind me fast with new ropes that never were occupied' (אֲשֶׁר לֹא־נַעֲשָׂה בָהֶם מְלָאכָה, lit. as AVm and RV 'wherewith no work hath been done'). Cf. Gosson, Schoole of Abuse, p. 72, 'Iron with muche occupiying is worne too naught, with little handeling gathereth rust'; Hamilton, Catechism, fol. xvi. 'Thai lufe nocht God with al thair strenth, quhasævir occupyis yair strenth in doing evil deids'; Lv 7[24] Tind. 'Neverthelater the fatt of the beest that dyeth alone and the fatt of that which is torne with wilde beestes, maye be occupide in all maner uses'; and Skelton in Skeat's Specimens, p. 146—

> 'And of this poore vassall
> He made a kynge royall,
> And gave him a realme to rule,
> That occupyed a showell,
> A mattoke and a spade.'

(4) And, lastly, trade with, as Ezk 27[9] 'all the ships of the sea with their mariners were in thee to occupy thy merchandise'; so 27[27], where the Heb. verb is the same (עָרַב); RV retains 'occupy,' but with 'exchange' in margin. In 27[16. 19. 22] another verb (נָתַן) is translated 'occupy' ('they occupied in thy fairs'); RV has 'traded.' In 27[21] 'they occupied with thee in lambs,' the Heb. expression (הֵמָּה סֹחֲרֵי יָדְךָ) is lit. as AVm and RV 'they were the merchants of thy hand.' Another example of the same meaning is Lk 19[13] 'And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come' (πραγματεύσασθε; RV 'Trade ye herewith'). The tr. 'occupy' here is from Cranmer, the Bishops, and the Rheims; Wyc. has 1382 'marchaundise ye,' 1388 'chaffare ye'; Tind. 'by and sell,' followed by Geneva. This meaning of 'occupy' may be illustrated from Coverdale, as Is 23[17. 18] 'The Lorde shall viset the citie of Tirus, and it shal come agayne to hyr Marchaundyse, and shal occupie with al the Kingdomes that be in the worlde. But all his occupienge and wynnynge shalbe halowed unto the Lorde'; or from the Rhemish Version, as Mt 25[16] 'And he that had received the five talents, went his way, and occupied with the same, and gained other five.'

J. HASTINGS.

OCCURRENT.—In 1 K 5[4 (Heb. 18)] the Heb. word פֶּגַע pega' (which is elsewhere found only in Ec 9[11] and is rendered in EV 'chance') is translated in AV 'occurrent'; 'there is neither adversary nor evil occurrent' (אֵין פֶּגַע רָע). RV retains 'occurrent,' but Amer. RV prefers 'occurrence,' which is the modern form. The LXX tr. is ἁμάρτημα πονηρόν, the Vulg. (supposed to have suggested the Eng.) occursus malus; Wyclif (1382) has 'yvel agencomynge,' 1388 'yvel asailyng'; Cov. 'evell hynderaunce'; Gen. 'evil to resiste,' followed by the Bishops; Dou. 'il rencounter. The form 'occurrent' was used both as an adj. and as a subst. As an adj. we find it in Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. 78, 'After gifts of education there follow general abilities to work things above nature, grace to cure men of bodily diseases, supplies against occurrent defects and impediments.' As a subst. it is found in Shaks. (Hamlet, v. ii. 341), who also twice uses 'occurrence' (T. Night, v. i. 264, Henry V. v. Prol. 40). Cf. also Chapman, Widow's Tears, iii. 1, 'These are strange occurrents, brother, but pretty and pathetical'; Bacon, Henry VII. (Pitt Press ed. p. 68), 'He paid the king large tribute of his gratitude in diligent advertisement of the occurrents of Italy.' Beaumont and Fletcher, Beggar's Bush, i. 1—

> 'My five years' absence hath kept me stranger
> So much to all the occurrents of country.'

OCHIELUS (B Ὀχιήλος, A Ὀζιήλος, AV Ochiel), 1 Es 1[9] = Jeiel, 2 Ch 35[9].

OCHRAN (עָכְרָן, Ἐχράν).—Father of Pagiel, an Asherite prince, Nu 1[13] 2[27] 7[72. 77] 10[26].

OCIDELUS (A Ὠκείδηλος, B Ὠκαλήδος), 1 Es 9[22], a corruption of Jozabad in Ezr 10[22].

OCINA (Ὀκεινά) occurs only in Jth 2[28], where it is grouped with Sidon, Tyre, etc., as terror-stricken at the approach of Holofernes. The names of the cities are given in order, proceeding southward along the sea-coast. First come Sidon and Tyre, then follow Sur,* Ocina, and Jemnaan. Sur has been taken for Tyre (Smith's DB, art. 'Ocina'), and this (Ṣûr) is the modern name of that town. But the name of Tyre is already given in its usual form, and it is more natural to suppose that Sur refers to another place. Tremelius and Junius speak of it as locus maritimus inter Tyrum et Ptolemaida, and identify it with Sandalium (Scandalium), the modern Iskanderûna. A short distance south of Iskanderûna lie the very ancient ruins of Umm el-'Amûd, the older name of which seems to have been Turân (Baedeker, Pal.[3] 272). This is a more probable identification, and, if accepted, we pass naturally to Acre as the next important city to the south. The mediæval name Acon (see art. ACCO) may very well represent the older Ocina, which Ptolemais had failed altogether to supplant. If Jemnaan is found at Jabneel (which see) the distance from Acco is very great; this, however, does not tell against the identification suggested.

ODED.—1. (עוֹדֵד) The father of the prophet Azariah who lived in the reign of Asa, 2 Ch 15[1] (B Ὠδήδ, A Ἀδάδ). In v.[8] 'Oded' of MT and B (Ἀδάδ) is a mistake (through wrong marginal gloss or otherwise) for 'Azariah' (so A and Pesh.). See AZARIAH, No. 3. 2. (עֹדֵד, Ὠδήδ) A prophet who protested against the proposal to enslave the Judahites who were taken prisoners upon the occasion of Pekah's invasion of the Southern kingdom. Being supported by certain of the heads of Ephraim, Oded succeeded in obtaining for the captives kindly treatment and release, 2 Ch 28[9ff.] J. A. SELBIE.

ODOLLAM.—2 Mac 12[38] AV and RVm. See ADULLAM.

ODOMERA ('Οδομηρά ℵA, 'Οδοαρρής B, Odares). —A nomad chief, or possibly a Syrian officer, slain by Jonathan during the war with Bacchides, about B.C. 158 (1 Mac 9[66]). The form of the name in the AV, Odonarkes, seems to have no authority to support it.

OF.—This is the most frequent preposition in the Eng. language. Probably (says Earle) it occurs as often as all the other prepositions put together. But frequent as it is, its occurrence now is moderate when compared with the usage of the 15th and 16th centuries. By the beginning of the 17th cent. it was getting displaced by other prepositions in some of its most common meanings, as by 'by' when expressing the agent. But the language of AV, being so much older than the current speech of 1611, is full of the word in meanings which were archaic even then, and are now quite obsolete.

The reason of its frequent use is that 'of' represented not only the original Anglo-Saxon of but also the French de. The Anglo-Sax. of had the meaning of 'from' or 'away from' (Goth. af, Lat. ab, Gr. ἀπό, Sansk. apa), as 'Alys us of yfle'= 'Deliver us from evil.' And this must be regarded as the starting-point in any history of the word. But it is impossible to work out the meanings derivatively from this primitive idea, because of the entrance of the French de and the demand for 'of' to render its various uses. This first got mixed up with and then drove out the earlier word, so that as now used 'of' is the translation of a French word; its form alone is English.

The following are its chief archaic or obsolete meanings in AV:—

1. From or away from, especially in the phrase 'forth of,' as Jth 2[21] 'They went forth of Nineve' (ἀπῆλθον ἐκ, RV 'departed out of'); 2 Mac 4[34] 'yet persuaded he him to come forth of the sanctuary' (ἐκ τοῦ ἀσύλου προελθεῖν); Mk 11[8] 'Others cut down branches of the trees' (so 1611, mod. edd. 'off'; Gr. ἐκ, RV 'from'). Cf. Dt 4[37] Tind. 'And because he loved thy fathers, therfore he chose their seed after them and broughte the out with his presence and with his mightye power of Egipte'; Ac 21[30] Rhem. 'And apprehending Paul, they drewe him forth of the temple.' See FORTH. This and similar meanings are now generally expressed by 'off,' which is merely another (perhaps a stronger) spelling of 'of' (as 'after' is its comparative). 'Off' now represents the original Anglo-Sax. 'of' better than 'of' itself does. Coverdale scarcely distinguishes 'of' and 'off,' as Job 41[19. 20] 'Out of his mouth go torches and fyre brandes, out of his nostrels there goeth a smoke, like as out off an hote seetinge pott'; Zec 13[1. 2] 'In that tyme shall the house off David, and the citesyns off Jerusalem have an open well, to wash of synne and unclennesse. And then (sayeth the Lorde of hoostes) I will destroye the names of Idols out off the londe.'

2. The same meaning is found metaphorically after verbs of delivering. Thus Jer 30[17] 'I will heal thee of thy wounds.' So Shaks. K. John III. iv. 56, 'I may be delivered of these woes.'

3. Then 'of' expresses generally the source or origin, as Gn 2[7] 'God formed man of the dust of the ground' (עָפָר מִן־הָאֲדָמָה, lit. 'formed man dust from the ground'); Ex 36[3] 'They received of Moses all the offering' (מִלְּפָנֵי מֹשֶׁה, lit. 'from before Moses'); La 3[22] '(It is of) the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed' (חַסְדֵי יהוה). So in NT often, as Mk 1[30] 'sick of a fever' (πυρέσσουσα); Jn 6[46] 'save he which is of God' (παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, RV 'from God'); Jn 15[15] 'all things that I have heard of my Father' (παρὰ τοῦ πατρός μου, RV 'from my Father'); 17[7] 'All things, whatsoever thou hast given me, are of thee' (παρὰ σοῦ, RV 'from thee'); Ac 17[9] 'When they had taken security of Jason' (παρὰ τοῦ Ἰάσονος, RV 'from Jason'); Ph 1[15] 'Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good-will' (διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν, τινὲς δὲ καὶ δι' εὐδοκίαν); 1 P 5[2] 'of a ready mind' (ἑκουσίως); especially as tr. of ἀπό, as Mt 7[16] 'Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' 16[21] 'suffer many things of the elders'; 17[25. 26] 'Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? Of their own children or of strangers? Peter saith unto him, Of strangers' (RV always 'from'); 16[13] 'He shall not speak of himself' (ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, RV 'from himself'); or as tr. of ἐκ or ἐξ, as Mt 21[25] 'The baptism of John whence was it, from heaven or of men?' (ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, ἢ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, RV 'from heaven or from men'); 1 Co 1[30] 'But of him are ye in Christ Jesus'; 2 Co 5[1] 'We have a building of God'; Ja 4[1] 'come they not hence, even of your lusts?' There are many clear examples in the older versions and early writers, as Jn 15[26] Wyc. 'A spirit of truthe, whiche cometh of the fadir'; 1 P 4[19] Wyc. 'the feithful maker of nought'; Gn 2[23] Tind. 'This shall be called woman, because she was take of the man'; Gn 44[5] Tind. 'Is that not the cuppe of which my lorde drynketh?'; He 10[38] Rhem. 'my just liveth of faith' (ἐκ πίστεως); Erasmus, Crede, fol. 59, 'All thynges are, ex ipso et per ipsum (id est) of hym, and by hym'; More, Utopia, i. 40 (Lumby's ed.), 'But if the thing be loste or made away, then the value of it is paide of the gooddes of such offenders.'

4. From the last would easily arise the sense of portion, something taken from among the whole, as Lv 4[16] 'And the priest that is anointed shall bring of the bullock's blood'; Dn 2[25] 'I have found a man of the captives of Judah'; 2[41] 'There shall be in it of the strength of the iron'; Mt 25[8] 'Give us of your oil'; 26[27] 'Drink ye all of it'; To 11[11] 'He strake of the gall on his father's eyes.' Cf. Mt 23[34] Tind. 'I sende unto you prophetes, wyse men, and scribes; and of them ye shall kyll and crucifie; and of them ye shall scourge in youre synagoges.'

5. From a point of time, as Mk 9[21] 'Of a child' (παιδιόθεν). Then throughout a certain time, as Lk 23[8] 'He was desirous to see him of a long season' (ἐξ ἱκανοῦ; edd. ἐξ ἱκανῶν χρόνων, RV 'of a long time'); Ac 8[11] 'of long time he had bewitched them' (ἱκανῷ χρόνῳ). Cf. Berners, Froissart, i. 10, 'a tempest took them in the sea, that put them so far out of their course that they wist not of two days where they were'; Knox, Works, iii. 241, 'They are not permitted of any continuance to blaspheme.'

6. As the link between an act or state and its origin, 'of' was used with great freedom. Thus it is equivalent to: (1) At in 2 S 19[42] 'Have we eaten at all of the king's cost?' (מִן־הַמֶּלֶךְ, lit. 'from the king'; LXX ἐκ τοῦ βασιλέως, Vulg. a rege). (2) Concerning, Dn 7[19] 'Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast' (RV 'concerning'); 1 Es 3[9] 'Of whose side the king . . . shall judge that his sentence is the wisest, to him shall the victory be given' (ὃν ἂν κρίνῃ); Jn 12[16] 'Then remembered ouey that these things were written of him' (ἐπ' αὐτῷ); Ac 4[9] 'If we this day be examined of the good deed' (ἐπὶ εὐεργεσίᾳ, RV 'concerning'); 5[24] 'they doubted of them, whereunto this would grow' (διηπόρουν περὶ αὐτῶν, RV 'were much perplexed concerning them'); 15[6] 'came together for to consider of this matter' (περὶ τοῦ λόγου τούτου); 1 Co 1[11] 'It hath been declared unto me of you' (περὶ ὑμῶν, RV 'concerning you'). Cf. Gn 42[29] Tind. 'Joseph remembered his dreams which he dreamed of them'; Mt 2[8] Rhem. 'Goe, and inquire diligently of the childe'; 11[7] Rhem. 'Jesus began to say to the multitudes of John'; Knox, Works, iii. 301, 'That God was eyther impotente, . . . or else, that he was mutable and unjust of his promyses.' (3) For, or on account of, as Job 13[heading] 'Job reproveth his friends of partiality'; Sir 4[25] 'Be abashed of the error of thine ignorance' (περὶ τῆς ἀπαιδευσίας σου, RV 'for thine ignorance'); 43[22] 'A present remedy of all is a mist coming speedily' (ἴασις πάντων, RV 'A mist coming speedily is the healing of all things'); Mt 18[13] 'he rejoiceth more of that sheep than of the ninety and nine' (ἐπί, RV 'over'); Jn 2[17] 'The zeal of thine house' (ὁ ζῆλος τοῦ οἴκου σου); 16[8] 'He will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment' (περί); Ac 21[20] 'They are all zealous of the law' (ζηλωταὶ τοῦ νόμου, RV 'for'); Ro 10[2] 'They have a zeal of God' (ζῆλον θεοῦ, RV 'for'); 2 Co 7[4] 'Great is my glorying of you' (πρὸς ὑμᾶς, RV 'on your behalf'). Cf. Ex 3[7] Tind. 'I have surely sene the trouble of my people which are in Egipte, and have herde their crye which they have of their taskmasters'; Jn 3[29] Tind. 'But the frende of the brydegrome which stondeth by and heareth him, rejoyseth greately of the brydgrome's voyce.' So Berners, Froissart, p. 8, 'Then the queen of England took leave of the earl of Hainault and of the countess, and thanked them greatly of their honour, feast, and good cheer, that they had made her'; and Milton, Areopag. (Hales' ed. p. 46), 'What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at.' (4) On or upon, as Ps 99[8] 'Thou tookest vengeance of their inventions'; Lk 18[3] 'Avenge me of mine adversary' (ἀπό); Wis 17[10] 'which could of no side be avoided' (μηδαμόθεν, RV 'on no side'); He 10[34] 'ye had compassion of me in my bonds' (τοῖς δεσμοῖς [edd. δεσμίοις] μου συνεπαθήσατε, RV 'ye had compassion on them that were in bonds'). Cf. Is 14[1] Geneva, 'For the Lord wil have compassion of Iaakob.' In the Pr. Bk. of 1559 occurs the phrase 'if ye stand by as gazers and lookers of them that do communicate'; in 1552 it was 'lookers on,' to which the ed. of 1604 returned. Hall has the same use of the word in Works, iii. 440, 'The wise and Almighty maker of these earthen mines, esteems the best metals but as thick clay; and why should we set any other price of them than their Creator?' (5) Over, 1 Co 7[4] 'The wife hath not power of her own body' (τοῦ ἰδίου σώματος οὐκ ἐξουσιάζει, RV 'hath not power over'). Cf. Job 42[2] Cov. 'I knowe that thou hast power of all things.' (6) With, as 2 S 19[22] 'He had provided the king of sustenance' (RV 'with'); Ca 2[5] and 5[8] 'I am sick of love.'* Wyclif (Select Works, iii. 84) says, 'Thou schuldist love thi God of al thin herte, of al thi soule, and of al thi mynde.' Cf. Tindale, Expos. p. 109, 'Though they persecute thee from house to house a thousand times, yet shall God provide thee of another'; Rutherford, Letters, No. xlv. 'I can be content of shame in that work, if my Lord and Master be honoured'; and Shaks. Macbeth, I. ii. 13—

> 'The merciless Macdonwald
> . . . from the western isles
> Of kerns and gallowglasses is supplied.'

* Moon (Eccles. English, p. 212) urges with some reason that the Revisers should have adopted the modern idiom in Ca 2[5] and 5[8], since to be sick of a thing means now to be heartily tired of it.

7. But the most important of all the obsolete uses of 'of' is its employment to introduce the agent, especially after a passive verb. This function was performed both by the Anglo-Sax. 'of' and by the Fr. de; it is therefore very common in the English of the 14th to 16th cent. By the beginning of the 17th cent. it was dying out, 'of' being replaced by 'by,' so that (as has been pointed out under BY) we have to do, not only with an idiom that is archaic to us, but also with one that is inconsistently applied. It further increases the difficulty that 'by' was used for the instrument or intermediate agency. Thus Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 77), says, 'We had never feast gyven of hym by his apostles'; and in AV we find, Mt 1[22] 'which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet' (τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου), RV 'by the Lord through the prophet').

The agent is usually expressed in Greek by ὑπό with the gen., and so ὑπο with the gen. is in AV usually translated by 'of.' In the following places, however, we find 'by': Mt 2[21], Mk 5[4], Lk 2[18 26] 3[19] 13[17] 16[22] 21[16] 23[8], Ac 10[22] 13[4. 45] 15[3. 40] 17[14] 27[11], Ro 3[21] 15[24], 1 Co 1[11], 2 Co 3[3] 8[19. 20], Eph 2[11] 5[13], Ph 1[28], Col 2[18], 2 Ti 2[26], He 2[3] 3[4], 2 P 1[21] 3[2]. Of these the foll. are due to Tindale: Lk 13[17] 16[22] 23[5], Ac 10[22] 15[3], Ro 15[24], 1 Co 1[11], 2 Co 3[3] 8[19. 20], Eph 2[11], 2 P 1[21]; in the other cases AV has changed Tindale's 'of' into 'by.' RV has always retained 'by' where it is found in AV, and has changed AV 'of' into 'by' in Mt 1[22] 2[15] 14[3] 19[12] 27[12], Mk 3[21], Lk 2[21] 9[7. 8] 17[20], Ac 16[14] 22[12] 23[10] 27 26[2. 7], 1 Co 2[12] 10[9. 10. 29] 14[24 bis], 2 Co 2[6] 8[19], Gal 1[11] 3[17], Eph 5[12], Ph 3[12], He 11[23], Ja 1[14] 2[9] 3[4. 6], Jude 12. 17.

The following passages deserve attention: 2 Es 16[16] 'Like as an arrow which is shot of a mighty archer' (a sagittario valido); 16[30] 'There are left some clusters of them that diligently seek through the vineyard' (ab his, RV 'by them'); Wis 18[7] 'So of thy people was accepted both the salvation of the righteous and destruction of the enemies' (ὑπὸ λαοῦ σου, RV 'by thy people'); 1 Mac 5[16] 'their brethren that were in trouble, and assaulted of them' (ὑπ' αὐτῶν); Mt 2[16] 'He was mocked of the wise men' (ὑπὸ τῶν μάγων); 11[27] 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father' (ὑπὸ τοῦ πατρός μου); Lk 9[7] 'Now Herod the tetrarch heard of all that was done by him (ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, edd. and RV om.): and he was perplexed, because that it was said of some (ὑπό τινων, RV 'by some') that John was risen from the dead'; Ac 15[4] 'they were received of the church and of the apostles and elders' (ὑπὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας); 1 Co 14[24] 'he is convinced of all, he is judged of all' (ὑπὸ πάντων, RV 'by all'); 2 Co 8[19] 'who was also chosen of the churches' (χειροτονηθεὶς ὑπὸ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, RV 'appointed by the churches'); Ph 3[12] 'I am apprehended of Christ Jesus' (ὑπὸ [τοῦ] Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ, RV 'by Christ Jesus'). Examples in early writers are easily found: take Ex 22[31] Tind. 'therfore shall ye eate no flesh that is torne of beestes in the feld'; and Booke of Precedence (E.E.T.S.) i. 76, 'Stody alwaies to be loved of good men, and seeke nat to be hated of the Evell.' The process of change may be illustrated from the history of the Pr. Bk. Thus in 1552 and 1559 we read ('Communion,' Keeling, p. 191), 'being so lovingly called and bidden of God himself'; but in 1604 and 1662 this is changed into 'by God himself.' Cf. Lever, Sermons, p. 26, 'For as there is no power of authorithy but of God, so is there none put in subjeccion under theym but by God. Those powers whiche be are ordeyned of God.'

8. Occasionally 'of' is redundant, as Dn 2[49] 'Then Daniel requested of the king'; Sir 31[24] 'The testimonies of his niggardness shall not be doubted of'; Ac 15[6] 'The apostles and elders came together for to consider of this matter' (ἰδεῖν περί). Especially after gerunds, as 2 S 2[21] 'Asahel would not turn aside from following of him'; 8[13] 'He returned from smiting of the Syrians'; Sir 20[22] 'There is that . . . by accepting of persons overthroweth himself'; Jn 11[13] 'They thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep'; Ac 21[32] 'They left beating of Paul.' It is also sometimes omitted where we should use it, as Rev 18[12] 'all manner vessels of ivory.'

9. Notice finally the phrases: Of certainty, Dn 2[8] (RV 'of a certainty'); of force, He 9[17] (βέβαιος); of purpose, Ru 2[16]: cf. Bacon, Essays, p. 33, 'Wise men will rather doe sacrifice to Envy; in suffering themselves sometimes of purpose to be crost'; in comparison of, Jg 8[2], Hag 2[3]; and of a truth, Dn 2[47], Lk 4[25] 22[59], Ac 4[27] 10[34]. J. HASTINGS.

OFFENCE.—The verb to 'offend' (Lat. offendere, 'to strike against') means in AV either intransitively 'to go astray,' or transitively 'to lead one astray.' So 'offence' is either a 'trespass,' or the cause of trespass, a 'stumbling-block.'

Offend. The Heb. words are: (1) 'āsham or 'āshēm, to 'trespass' or 'be guilty,' Jer 2[3] 50[7], Ezk 25[12], Hos 4[15] 13[1], Hab 1[11]. Thus Hos 13[1] 'When he offended in Baal, he died' (RVm 'When he became guilty in Baal'; Cheyne 'But he became guilty through the Baal'). In 2 Ch 28[13] the Heb. subst. 'āshāmāh, which is twice tr. 'trespass' in the same verse, is once rendered 'offend': 'we have offended against the Lord,' RV 'that which will bring upon us a trespass (RVm 'guilt') against the Lord.' RV changes Jer 2[3] into 'be held guilty,' and Hab 1[11] into 'be guilty,' leaving the rest unchanged. (2) hāṭā' 'to miss' (the way), 'err,' 'sin.' Gn 20[9] ('What have I offended thee?'; RV 'sinned against thee'), 40[1], 2 K 18[14], Jer 37[18] ('What have I offended against thee?'; RV 'sinned against thee'). (3) bāgad to 'act treacherously,' only Ps 73[15] 'I should offend against the generation of thy children' (RV 'I had dealt treacherously with'). (4) hābhal to 'act foolishly,' 'become vain,' only Job 34[31] 'I will not offend any more.' (5) pāsha' to 'rebel,' 'take offence,' Pr 18[19] 'A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city,' RVm 'injured.' In NT the two intrans. verbs are (1) ἁμαρτάνω, Ac 25[8] 'Neither against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended anything at all' (τι ἥμαρτον, RV 'have I sinned at all'); and (2) πταίω to stumble, Ja 2[10] 3[2] (RV both 'stumble'). The transit. verb is σκανδαλίζω, occurring chiefly in Mt (5[29. 30] 11[6] 13[21. 57] 15[12] 17[27] 18[6. 8. 9] 24[10] 26[31. 33]) and Mk (4[17] 6[3] 9[42. 43. 45-47] 14[27. 29]); also in Lk 7[23] 17[2] and Jn 6[61] 16[1]; and elsewhere only Ro 14[21], 1 Co 8[13] bis, 2 Co 11[29]. AV always translates 'offend'; RV always 'cause to stumble,' except Mk 14[29] where 'All ye shall be offended because of me' is retained in text, with 'caused to stumble' in margin. RV omits the word in Ro 14[21] with edd.

Offence rarely occurs in OT. The only Heb. words are: (1) mikhshōl, 1 S 25[31] 'That this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart unto my lord' (AVm 'stumbling'), and Is 8[14] 'a rock of offence'; also in Ps 119[165] the same subst. is tr[d] 'offend,' 'nothing shall offend them,' AVm 'they shall have no stumbling-block,' RV 'they have none occasion of stumbling.' (2) hēṭ' 'error,' 'sin,' so tr. only Ec 10[4]. The NT words are: (1) ἁμαρτία 'error,' 'sin,' only 2 Co 11[7] (RV 'sin'). (2) παράπτωμα a 'transgression,' Ro 4[25] 5[15 bis. 16. 17. 18. 20] (RV always 'trespass,' the usual tr. of the word elsewhere in AV). (3) προσκοπή, lit. 'a striking-against' (προσ-κοπτω), in its only occurrence, 2 Co 6[3], RV 'occasion of stumbling.' Notice also the adj. ἀπρόσκοπος in Ac 24[16] 'to have always a conscience void of offence' (ἀπρόσκοπον συνείδησιν); 1 Co 10[32] 'give none offence' (ἀπρόσκοποι γίνεσθε, RV 'give no occasion of stumbling'); and Ph 1[10] 'That ye may be sincere and without offence' (ἀπρόσκοποι, RV 'void of offence'). (4) πρόσκομμα, lit. 'a thing to strike against' (προσκόπτω), is tr[d] 'offence' only in Ro 14[20] 'It is evil for that man who eateth with offence' (διὰ προσκόμματος). (5) σκάνδαλον, the biblical form of the late word σκανδάληθρον which signifies 'the bait-stick in a trap.' In LXX σκάνδαλον occurs as the tr. of dōphî in Ps 50[20]; of keṣel in Ps 49[13]; of mōkēsh in Jos 23[13], Jg 2[3] 8[27], 1 S 18[20], Ps 69[22] 106[36] 140[5] 141[9]; and of mikhshōl in Lv 19[14], 1 S 25[31], Ps 119[165]. In NT it is found in Mt 13[41] (πάντα τὰ σκάνδαλα, AV 'all things that offend,' RV 'all things that cause stumbling'), 16[23] 18[7 ter] (AV always 'offence,' RV 'stumbling-block' in 16[23], 'occasion of stumbling' in 18[7]), Lk 17[1] (AV 'offences,' RV 'occasions of stumbling'), Ro 9[33] (both 'offence'), 11[9] (both 'stumbling-block'), 14[13] (AV 'occasion to fall,' RV 'occ. of falling'), 16[17] (AV 'offences,' RV 'occasions of stumbling'), 1 Co 1[23] (both 'stumbling-block'), Gal 5[11] (AV 'offence,' RV 'stumbling-block'), 1 P 2[8] (both 'offence'), 1 Jn 2[10] (both 'occasion of stumbling'), Rev 2[14] (both 'stumbling-block').

It is unfortunate that 'offend' and 'offence' have lost their early meanings. As the note above shows, we have no good word to take their place.*

The following quotations from early writers illustrate the use of both words in AV. Barrow, Sermons, vol. i. Serm. 1, 'To offend originally signifies to infringe, that is, to stumble or hit dangerously upon somewhat lying across our way'; Rutherford, Letters, No. lix. 'He presumed that much on your love that ye would not offend' (='stumble'); Shaks. Meas. for Meas. III. ii. 16, 'He hath offended the law'; Milton, PL iii. 410—

> 'Regardless of the bliss wherein he sat
> Second to thee, offered himself to die
> For man's offence.'

And in Areopag. (Hales' ed. p. 15) the meaning is to lay a stumbling-block in the way, 'A certain Presbyter laid it scrupulously to his conscience, how he durst venture himselfe among those defiling volumes. The worthy man loath to give offence fell into a new debate with himselfe what was to be thought.'

J. HASTINGS.

OFFENCE.—This term is the translation in AV of several Heb. and Gr. words. These may be classified in two categories: 1. Sin (חֵטְא Ec 10[4]; ἁμαρτία, 2 Co 11[7], RV 'sin'); also the kindred idea of a moral fall (παράπτωμα, e.g. Ro 4[25] 5[16], RV 'trespass'). 2. Stumbling (מִכְשׁוֹל 1 S 25[31], Is 8[14]), considered as an act, the word being used in a metaphorical sense. Also a stumbling-block. In this last sense the term is used as tr[n] of Gr. words with two different primary meanings: (1) πρόσκομμα (Ro 14[20]), and προσκοπή (2 Co 6[3], RV 'occasion of stumbling'), literally 'a stumbling-block,' i.e. some impediment lying on the path, over which one stumbles, and so morally anything that hinders and tends to trip one up in the path of life, or with regard to some particular course of action. (2) σκάνδαλον, a purely biblical word, with its corresponding causative verb σκανδαλίζω, of frequent occurrence both in LXX and in NT. The classic form is σκανδάληθρον. In LXX it stands chiefly for Heb. מוֹקֵשׁ 'bait' (fig. 'snare') and מִכְשׁוֹל 'stumbling-block.' The Gr. word means primarily the trigger of a trap; then the trap itself. In a secondary sense it stands for anything that ensnares or hinders morally. The idea of stumbling appears in the phrase 'rock of offence' (πέτραν σκανδάλου, Ro 9[33], a free quotation from Is 8[14], where LXX has πέτρας πτώματι), i.e. a rock over which people stumble. The word is used of persons; as in our Lord's rebuke of St. Peter, 'Thou art an offence (σκάνδαλον) unto me' (Mt 16[23] AV). RV has 'stumbling-block' here, a needful correction, the idea being, not that St. Peter was 'offensive' to Jesus, nor that Jesus was 'offended' with him, but that the disciple was a snare to his Master, an adversary (Σατανᾶς), one who provoked to stumbling. The word is also used of things, as when we read of casting a stumbling-block before anybody (e.g. Ro 14[13]). Again, in the expression 'Whoso shall offend one of these little ones,' etc. (Mt 18[6] AV), the reference is not to insulting and hurting the feelings, but to tempting and hindering in the way of Christ. Similarly, the directions about an offending member of the body—the eye to be plucked out or the hand to be cut off—refer to causes of stumbling, of moral hindrance. Accordingly, RV substitutes 'cause to stumble' for the misleading word 'offend' in AV. The sin of leading one of Christ's little ones to stumble is set forth as

* If we could have used 'scandal' and 'scandalize' as the Vulg. and the Rhem. Version do, much of the force which we lose would have been retained. Thus in Rhem. NT, Mt 11[6] 'Blessed is he that shall not be scandalized in me'; 13[41] 'The Sonne of man shal send his Angels, and they shal gather out of his kingdom al scandals'; 18[7-8] 'Wo be to the world for scandals. For it is necessary that scandals do come: but neverthelesse wo to that man by whom the scandall cometh. And if thy hand or thy foote scandalize thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee.' We find also the adj. 'scandalous' in the heading to Lk 9 'He forewarneth againe of his scandalous Passion.' In the notes to Mk 6[1] 'offence' is given as an alternative to 'scandal,'—'His countrie folkes . . . did take offence or scandal of him.'

peculiarly heinous. St. Paul's argument on the question of casuistry concerning eating food that has been offered to idols turns on this idea. The apostle's contention is not that the strong are to surrender their liberty in deference to the superstitions of the weak, for fear of offending the latter in the sense of giving them offence, i.e. angering and alienating them. The duty we owe to Christian liberty may sometimes involve this painful consequence. St. Paul's position is that liberty must not be so used as to hinder the spiritual life of others, by confounding their consciences and tempting them to imitate conduct the innocence of which they are not sufficiently enlightened to perceive, and which must therefore appear wrong to them. Where the Jews are said to be 'offended at' Jesus (Mt 13[57]), and where 'the offence of the cross' is referred to (Gal 5[11]), the stumbling and hindrance are in the way of accepting the claims of Christ. Thus the prophetic description of the stumbling-block is ascribed to Him because His obscure origin and humble appearance, and the method of His ministry, were regarded as reasons for not accepting Him. When He spoke in the synagogue at Nazareth, His trade as a carpenter and His family relations were the stumbling-block (Mk 6[3]). Here, however, the idea seems to be passing over to that of displeasure—we are instinctively angry at whatever causes us to stumble. This thought appears to be present in Mt 15[12], where the disciples say to Jesus, 'Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended when they heard?' etc. The more serious idea of being hindered morally—as in the case of 'offending' one of Christ's little ones—is evidently out of place here. All that is meant is that the Pharisees were turned against Jesus and His claims, with the implied notion that this was coupled with some irritation. It is the same with St. Paul's reference to 'the offence of the cross' (Gal 5[11]). The fact that Jesus had suffered the indignity of crucifixion hindered the Jews, with their secular ideas of the Messiahship, from accepting Christianity, and at the same time roused their indignation against the preachers of the gospel.

OFFER, OFFERING, OBLATION.—These words are used in the English Versions for very different terms in the Hebrew and Greek; and it will be the aim of the present article to distinguish them, and enable the student to understand the meaning and application of the terms used in the original. For the sake of clearness and simplicity, the usage of RV only (which is at least in some respects more consistent than that of AV) will be taken as the basis of the article.

Offering and oblation, it need hardly be remarked, are words substantially identical in origin, the only difference between them being that one is formed (through 'offer') from the present tense of the Latin offero, and the other from the supine oblatum.

1. In burnt-offering (עֹלָה), peace-offering (שֶׁלֶם, שְׁלָמִים), thank-offering (תּוֹדָה), freewill-offering (נְדָבָה*), meal-offering (מִנְחָה), sin-offering (חַטָּאת), guilt-offering (אָשָׁם),† drink-offering (נֶסֶךְ), 'offering' corresponds to no distinctive element of the Hebrew expression; and the explanation of these terms will therefore be reserved more properly for the art. SACRIFICE.

2. 'Offering (here and there in AV 'sacrifice') made by fire' represents a single word in the Heb., אִשֶּׁה ('firing,' or 'fire-offering'). It occurs very frequently in P (as Lv 1[9. 13. 17] 2[2. 3. 9. 10. 16]; elsewhere only Dt 18[1], Jos 13[14], 1 S 2[28]); and is a term used generally of any sacrifice, or other offering (Lv 24[7. 9]), consumed upon the altar.

3. קָרְבָּן ḳorbân (AV usually 'offering,' sometimes (cf. oblatio, often in the Vulg. for קָרְבָּן) 'oblation,' once 'sacrifice'; RV uniformly 'oblation,' except Ezk 20[28] 'offering'). This (from קרב 'to come near') means properly something brought near (viz. to the altar, or to God); it is the most general term for offering or oblation, being used mostly, it is true, of sacrifices of different kinds, but also sometimes of other sacred gifts (Lv 2[12], Nu 7 passim, 31[50]). It is found exclusively in P, and Ezk 20[28] 40[43]. The occurrences in P are: Lv 1[2. 2. 3. 10. 14. 14] 2[1. 4. 5. 7. 12. 13. 13] 3[1. 2. 6. 7. 8. 12. 14] 4[23. 28. 32] 5[11] 6[20 (13)] 7[13. 14. 15. 16. 29. 38] 9[7. 15] 17[4] 22[18. 27] 23[14] 27[9. 11], Nu 5[15] 6[14. 21] 7 (28 times) 9[7. 13] 15[4. 25] 18[9] 28[2] 31[50]. In a slightly different form (ḳurbān) it occurs in Neh 10[34 (35)] 13[31], of the wood-offering (not mentioned elsewhere). It is, of course, the familiar 'corban' of Mk 7[11].

(a) The cognate verb hiḳrîb, 'to bring near' (of a secular gift Jg 3[17. 18], Ps 72[10b], Mal 1[8] ['present']), is used in a corresponding sense (RV 'present,' 'offer,' 'bring near,' 'bring'); whether of the worshipper bringing up the sacrifice, or of the priest presenting it on the altar. The occurrences are too numerous to quote in extenso; for examples, see (1) of the worshipper Lv 1[2. 2. 3. 3. 10. 14] 2[1. 4. 8] ('presented') [11. 12. 13. 14. 14] 3[1. 2. 8. 7. 7. 9. 12. 14] 4[3. 14] 7[11. 12. 12. 13. 14. 16. 18. 25. 29. 38]; (2) of the priest Lv 1[5. 13. 15] ('bring'*), 5[8] 6[14 (7). 20 (13). 21 (14)] 7[3. 8. 8. 9. 33]; and outside P (all), Ezk 43[22. 23. 24] 44[7. 15. 27] 46[4], Hag 2[14], Ezr 6[10. 17] 7[17] 8[35], 1 Ch 16[1], 2 Ch 35[12]. Like ḳorbân, hiḳrîb, it will be noticed, is essentially a priestly word; it denotes a formal ceremonial act, and is almost entirely confined to P and Ezk. עָלָה, another verb also commonly rendered 'to offer' (see below), is a word much more in ordinary use; it is as exceptional in P and Ezk as hiḳrîb is constant.

(b) The synon. הִגִּישׁ also occurs in the same two applications, but it is less technical, and also much less frequent (RV 'bring,' 'bring hither,' 'present,' 'bring, near'): Ex 32[6], Jg 6[19] 'presented' (if RVm of v.[18] is right:† see 4), 1 S 13[9] 14[34. 34], Am 5[25], Lv 2[8] ('bring'), 8[14], Mal 1[7. 8. 8] ('offer'), v.[11] 2[12] 3[3], 2 Ch 29[23]; cf. of secular gifts, 1 K 4[21] (5[1]), also Jg 6[19] (if RV text of v.[18] is right).

In LXX הִקְרִיב is generally represented by προσφέρω, and קרבן (not by προσφορά, but) by δῶρον (cf. Mk 7[11], Mt 15[5]); Mt 5[23], therefore, if translated consistently with RV of the OT, would read, 'If thou art offering thine oblation at the altar' (in Delitzsch's Heb. NT, אִם תַּקְרִיב קָרְבָּנְךָ); cf. Lv 2[1. 4] 17[4] 22[18] RV and LXX; and observe the same combination of προσφέρω and δῶρον in Mt 5[24] 8[4], He 8[4].

4. מִנְחָה minḥāh. This does not express the neutral idea of 'gift' (מַתָּן), but denotes a complimentary present, or a present made to secure or retain good-will, as Gn 32[13. 18. 20. 21] (to Esau), 43[11. 15. 25. 26] (to Joseph), Jg 3[15. 17. 18] (to Eglon), 2 K 8[8. 9], Ps 45[12], offered, as something expected, by a political subject, 2 S 8[2. 6], 1 K 4[21], 2 K 17[3. 4] al.; then of a tribute offered to God, both generally (including animals) Gn 4[3. 4. 5], 1 S 26[19], and specifically (as always in P) of the meal- (or cereal) offering (Lv 2: see SACRIFICE). Where minḥāh appears to be used in the more general sense of a tribute offered to God, it is represented in RV by 'offering' or 'oblation.' The passages are Gn 4[3. 4. 5], Nu 16[15], Jg 6[18] (marg.), 1 S 2[17. 29. 29] 3[14] 26[19], 1 K 18[29. 36], 2 K 3[20], Ezr 9[4. 5], Ps 20[3 (4)]* 40[6 (7)]* 96[8] 141[2] (marg.), Is 1[13] 19[21] 43[23]* 57[6]* 66[3]. [20. 20], Jer 14[12] 17[26]* 33[18]* 41[5], Dn 2[46] (to Daniel), 9[21. 27], Am 5[25], Zeph 3[10], Mal 1[10. 11. 11] 2[12. 13] 3[3. 4] ( with marg. 'Or, meal-offering'). However, in several of these passages, esp. in 1 K 18[29. 36], 2 K 3[20], Ps 141[2], Ezr 9[4. 5], Dn 9[21] [in all, 'the evening

* In AV occasionally, 'willing, free, or voluntary offering' (as Ex 35[29] 36[3], Lv 7[16], Ezk 46[12]); in RV 'freewill offering,' uniformly.

† In Is 53[10] rendered, unhappily, 'offering for sin,' suggesting confusion with the very different 'sin-offering'; see, however, RVm.

* But 'bring' elsewhere in these chapters represents הֵבִיא.

† For הגישׁ is used also of 'bringing near' or 'presenting ordinary food, Gn 27[25], 1 S 28[25], 2 S 13[11].

minḥāh'; see 2 K 16[15]], perhaps also in many of those with the alternative marginal rendering, and in Is 1[13] 19[21], it is not improbable that 'meal-offering' would be the better rendering.

5. תְּרוּמָה tĕrūmāh (AV and RV 'heave-offering,' 'offering,' and 'oblation'). This word (from רוּם 'to lift or take off') denotes properly what is lifted off a larger mass, or separated from it for sacred purposes (LXX in Pent. uses ἀφαίρεμα, in Ezk mostly ἀπαρχή; Targ. in both אפרשותא 'something separated'); and is used in particular (cf. Driver on Dt 12[6]): (1) of gifts taken from the produce of the soil (as tithe, firstfruits, and firstlings); (2) of contributions of money, spoil, etc., offered for sacred purposes, and in Ezk of land reserved for the priests and Levites; (3) in connexion with sacrifices, only of portions 'taken off' the rest, and forming the priest's due, esp. of the 'heave-thigh,' which, with the 'wave-breast,' is (in P) the priest's share of the peace-offering, but also (as Nu 5[9] 18[8]) of other priestly dues. The rendering 'heave-offering' implies a rite of 'elevation,' which, however, is very doubtful, and is rejected by modern scholars (e.g. Ges., Keil on Lv 2[9], Dillm. on Lv 7[33] etc.). Omitting the passages (as Ex 29[27. 28], Lv 7[32. 34]) where tĕrūmāh is used of the 'heave-thigh,' it occurs, in the other applications just noted, Ex 25[2. 2. 3] 30[13. 14. 15] 35[5. 5. 21. 24. 24] 36[3. 6], Lv 7[14] 22[12], Nu 5[9] 15[19. 20. 21] 18[8. 11. 19. 24. 26. 27. 28. 28. 29] 31[29. 41. 52], Dt 12[6. 11. 17], Ezk 20[40] ('offerings' *) 44[30. 30] 45[1. 6. 7. 7. 13. 16] 48[8. 9. 10. 12. 12. 18. 18. 20. 20. 21. 21. 21], Mal 3[8], 2 Ch 31[10. 12. 14], Ezr 8[25], Neh 10[37 (38). 39 (40)] 12[44] 13[5]; also 2 S 1[21] (if the reading be correct), Is 40[20], and (in a secular sense) Pr 29[4] (see RVm). (RV in Pent. 2 S, Ezr, Neh, Ezk 20[40], Mal, 'heave-offering' or 'offering,' in 2 Ch, Is, and other passages in Ezk, 'oblation'). 'Contribution' is perhaps the English word which, though not entirely satisfactory, nevertheless best suggests the ideas expressed by the Heb. tĕrūmāh.

(a) The use of the corresponding verb רוּם 'to lift or take off' (often by the side of the subst. tĕrūmāh) should be noted (LXX usually in Pent. ἀφαιρέω, in Ezk ἀφορίζω, in 2 Ch ἀπάρχομαι; Targ. אפרש 'to separate': RV 'heave up,' 'offer,' 'take up,' 'take off,' 'offer up,' 'heave,' 'levy' Nu 31[28], 'give . . . for offerings' 2 Ch 30[24], 'give'). This occurs, not only of the 'heave-thigh' Ex 29[27], but also in connexion with various other sacred gifts or sacrifices: Ex 35[24], Lv 2[9] (of the 'memorial' taken off the meal-offering in order to be burnt on the altar), 4[8. 10. 19] (of the fat lifted or taken off a sacrifice for consumption on the altar), 6[15 (8)] (as 2[9]), 22[15], Nu 15[19. 20. 20] 18[19. 24. 26. 28. 29. 30. 32] 31[28. 52], Ezk 45[1. 13] 48[8. 9. 20], 2 Ch 30[24. 24] 35[8. 9], Ezr 8[25]. The remarkable inconsistency in the rendering of this word, even in RV, and the confusion with other words occasioned thereby, are much to be regretted; if the instances are examined in detail, the idea in each will be seen to be, as explained above, that of lifting or taking off from a larger mass for sacred purposes (note esp. the use of both the verb and the subst. in Ezk in connexion with land).

6. תְּנוּפָה tĕnūphāh, a 'wave-offering' (implying a rite of 'waving'; see SACRIFICE), and usually so rendered in AV, RV; but represented by 'offering' alone in Ex 35[22] 38[24. 29] (where the term is used peculiarly of materials offered for the construction of the sanctuary), and in Nu 8[11. 13. 15. 21] (changed here in RV to 'wave-offering'), where it is used of the Levites.

(a) The cognate verb נוּף 'to wave,' and usually so rendered, is similarly represented by 'offer' in Ex 35[22], Nu 8[11. 13. 15. 21] (in Nu with the marg. 'Heb. wave').

7. 'Whole burnt-offering' (really a double, and tautologous, rendering of the Heb., adopted from AV of Ps 51[19]) stands for the Heb. כָּלִיל (lit. something whole) in RV Dt 13[16 (17)] marg., 33[10], 1 S 7[9] (Heb. עולה כליל), Ps 51[19 (21)]. The Heb. word is a rare syn. of עֹלָה (see SACRIFICE, under 'burnt-offering'); it occurs besides, in a sacrif. sense, of the priest's minḥāh, which was to be 'wholly burnt (lit. 'burnt (as) something whole'), Lv 6[22. 23 (15. 16)].

8. 'Passover offerings' stands for פְּסָחִים, only 2 Ch 35[7. 8. 9]; see PASSOVER.

9. 'Oblation' for מַשָּׂאת (not a technical word: lit. something borne along or brought; cf. the verb in v.[31], and No. (11), below) in Ezk 20[40].

10. 'Offerings' for the obscure and uncertain תַּבְהֲלִים Hos 8[13], generally taken to mean properly 'gifts' (from יָהַב).

'Offering (up)' stands also, in RV of NT, for—

11. προσφορά (LXX for מִנְחָה Ps 40[6]; otherwise very rare, except in Sir, viz. 14[11] 31 (34)[18. 19] 32 (35)[1. 6] 38[11] 46[16] 50[13. 14]): Ac 21[26] 24[17], Ro 15[16], Eph 5[2], He 10[5. 8. (from Ps 40[6]: Heb. minḥāh) 10. 14. 18 (in all, except He 10[5. 8], in the sense of the Heb. קרבן).

12. ἀνάθημα (a votive offering set up in a temple, Herod. ii. 182, etc.): Lk 21[5]; so Jth 16[19] ('gift'), 2 Mac 9[16] (RV).

'Oblation' does not occur in NT (either AV or RV). In Pr. Bk. version of the Psalms it occurs in 27[7] for וְנִכְחֵי, and in 51[19] for כָּלִיל. In the Apocr. it represents προσφορά, 1 Es 5[52 (51)], Sir 50[13] (AV), Thr 1[5], δῶρον Sir 7[9] (AV), δόμα 1 Mac 15[5] (in a secular sense), μαννα (i.e. מִנְחָה) Bar 1[10] RV.

The verb 'to offer,' besides the four usages noted under 3 a b, 5 a, 6 a, stands also in RV for—

(5) זָבַח 'to slaughter' (in sacrifice): Gn 31[54] 46[1], Ex 23[18], Lv 19[5. 5], Dt 18[3] 33[19] (elsewhere in the Pent. זָבַח is rendered by 'to sacrifice' *), 1 S 1[21] 2[13] etc., Ps 4[5] 27[6] 50[14] (Heb. 'slaughter thanksgiving'; so v.[23]), 116[17] (Heb. 'slaughter the slaughtering (sacrifice) of thanksgiving'; so 107[22], Lv 22[29]); and elsewhere, esp. when the obj. is the cognate subst. 'sacrifice.'

(6) הֶעֱלָה 'to cause to go up' (viz. on the altar),—very often, esp. with 'burnt-offering' (the Heb. word for which, עֹלָה, is cognate with this verb, and means properly that which goes up, viz. on the altar): in P and Ezk, only Ex 30[9] 40[29], Lv 14[20] 17[8], Ezk 43[18. 24]; elsewhere, Gn 8[20] 22[2. 13] (here, and sometimes besides, 'to offer up'), Ex 24[5] 32[6], Nu 23[2. 4. 14. 30], Dt 12[13. 14] 27[6], Jos 22[23] (first time), 1 K 3[4. 15] (first time), Am 5[22], Is 57[6] 66[3], Ps 51[19 (21)] 66[15a], and often besides, both in S, K, etc., and also in Ch, Ezr (in the Pent. all the occurrences are cited). So 'the offering of' in 1 K 18[29. 36] and 'offering' in 2 K 3[20] are both lit. 'the going up of.'

(7) עָשָׂה 'to do or make' (an idiom. use—cf. ῥέζειν and facere—prob. allied to, or developed from, that of the same word in the sense of to make ready, prepare, or dress as food, Gn 18[7. 8], Lv 6[21 (14)] 7[9], Jg 6[19], 1 S 25[18], 2 S 12[4. 4] 13[5. 7], 1 K 17[12] (of meal) 18[23. 25. 26]); in RV usually 'offer,' sometimes 'sacrifice,' and (esp. in Nu 15 and Ezk) 'prepare': Ex 10[25] 29[36. 38. 39. 39. 41], Lv 5[10] 6[22 (15)] 9[7. 7. 16. 22] 14[19. 20] 15[15. 30] 16[9. 24] 17[9] 22[23. 24] (RVm) 23[12. 19], Nu 6[11. 16. 17. 17] 8[12] 15[3. 3] (prob.: RV 'make'), vv.[5. 6. 8. 12. 14. 24] 28[4. 4. 8. 8. 15. 20. 21. 23. 24. 31] 29[2. 39], Dt 12[27], Jos 22[23] (second time), Jg 13[15] (?; notice לִפְנֵיךָ), v.[16] ('make ready,' not 'offer' [הַעֲלֵה]), 1 K 3[15] (second time), 8[64] (2 Ch 7[7]), 12[27], 2 K 5[17] 10[24. 25] 17[32], Jer 33[18] ('to do'), Ezk 43[25. 25. 27] ('make'), 45[17. 22. 23. 24] 46[2. 7. 12. 12. 13. 13. 14. 15], Ps 66[15b]. The word is meant as a summary description of the process of sacrifice: it is never used where there is a detailed description of the ritual, with reference to a particular act.

(8) שָׁחַט 'to slay,' Ex 34[25].

(9) קָטַר 'to make into sweet smoke,' Am 4[5], and הִקְטִיר (id.) 1 Ch 6[49 (34)]. See INCENSE, SACRIFICE.

(10) נָסַךְ 'to pour (out),' and usually so rendered (as Hos 9[4], 2 K 16[13]): Ps 16[4], Dn 2[46] (Aram.).

(11) נָשָׂא 'to bear along,' 'bring' (not a special sacrif. term): Ezk 20[31] [cf. 2 S 8[2. 6], Ps 96[8], Heb.].

* For 'oblations' in this verse see below, No. 9.

* Or, naturally, in Dt 12[15. 21] (cf. 1 S 28[24]) by 'to kill.'

(12) נָתַן 'to give': Ezk 6[13] (exceptional; cf. 20[28] Heb. [AV and RV 'presented]).

'To offer for sin' stands for one word in the Heb., חִטֵּא, Lv 6[26] 9[15].

'To offer willingly' stands for הִתְנַדֵּב, prop. to show oneself liberal or forward: Jg 5[2 9] (in battle), elsewhere only in Ch, Ezr, Neh, in giving gifts, etc., to the sanctuary, 1 Ch 29[5 6 9. 9 14. 17. 17], 2 Ch 17[16], Ezr 1[6] 2[68] 3[5] 7[13 15 16 16], Neh 11[2]. (In Ps 110[3] RV the Heb. is 'are willingnesses').

'To offer incense' stands for קִטֵּר Jer 11[17] 32[29].

In the RV of NT 'to offer (up)' stands for—

(13) προσφέρω (in LXX usu. for הקריב): Mt 2[11] 5[23 24] 8[4] (=Mk 1[44], Lk 5[14]), Jn 9[2] (λατρείαν), Ac 7[42] (from Am 5[25], LXX [הנישׁ]), 21[26], He 5[1. 3. 7] 8[3. 3. 4] 9[7. 9. 14. 25. 28] 10[1. 2. 8. 11. 12] 11[4. 17. 17].

In Mt 2[11] προσήνεγκαν αὐτῷ δῶρα would be in Heb. ויקריבו לו מנחה (so Delitzsch): see Jg 3[17. 18] Heb. and LXX. On Mt 5[23] 8[4] see above, under 3 b.

(14) ἀναφέρω (LXX mostly for הֶעֱלָה, also for הקטיר, once or twice for עשׂה): He 7[27. 27] (cf. Westcott), 13[15], Ja 2[21], 1 P 2[5].*

(15) σπένδω ('to pour out'; in LXX for הסיך): Ph 2[17], 2 Ti 4[6] (σπένδομαι, fig. of St. Paul himself).

(16) δίδωμι: Lk 2[24].

'Things offered to idols' (εἰδωλόθυτα) has been in RV changed uniformly to 'things sacrificed (un)to idols' (as in AV of Rev 2[14 20]), Ac 15[29] 21[25], 1 Co 8[1. 4. 7. 10] 10[19]: 'offered in sacrifice' in 1 Co 10[28] represents ἱερόθυτον.

From the preceding synopsis of passages, it will be apparent what extremely different terms in the original, esp. in OT, are represented by each of the three English words, 'offer,' 'offering,' and 'oblation'; and that though the Heb. (and Greek) terms might, in particular cases, be interchangeable, in others they are not. In Lv 2[1], for example, 'offer' could not be זֶבַח or קָרְבָּן, nor 'oblation' מִנְחָה or תְּרוּמָה: 'offer' in Dt 12[27], though it is עשׂה, might also be העלה, but hardly (the writer not being priestly) הקריב, and 'oblation' in Is 19[21] could not (for the same reason) be קרבן. Conversely, 'offer an oblation' in Ezk 45[1] represents two Heb. words entirely different from those which it represents in Lv 1[2]; and 'offer' in Lv 7 is always הקריב, in Nu 18 it is always † הרים, while in Nu 28 it is עשׂה and הקריב. The words in the original are in most cases technical; and the distinctions between them are of importance for those who would properly understand the sacrificial system of the Hebrews. The reader who desires to obtain a practical view of Hebrew or Greek usage is recommended to mark on the margin of his RV the Hebrew or Greek word corresponding in each case to the English. Unless any passages have been accidentally overlooked, the preceding article should enable him to do this for the words here concerned in all their occurrences, except those of הקריב in the Pent., and of זֶבַח and העלה out of it.

S. R. DRIVER.

OFFICER.—A word used both in AV and in RV to translate some eight Heb. words in OT and two Gr. words in NT. The Heb. words, according to their derivation, represent five families—(1) nizzâb, nēṣîb, 'one set up'; the former in 1 K 4[7ff.] of Solomon's commissariat officers, the latter in the same sense in 4[19] (as to its meaning in 1 S 10[5] see Driver, ad loc.). (2) pāḳēd, pĕḳuddāh, pāḳîd, 'inspector.' (3) rab, 'great one.' (4) shōṭēr=(a) 'arranger,' (b) 'scribe' (see Dillmann on Ex 5[6]). (5) ṣārîṣ, 'eunuch.' (The 'ōsê hammĕlā'kāh of Est 9[3], AV, 'officers,' is in RV now rendered 'they that did the business'). 'Officer' most frequently stands for shōṭēr and ṣārîṣ (LXX εὐνοῦχος, EV in Est always 'chamberlain,' but only once besides, 2 K 23[11]), and it seems very doubtful whether the meaning of the latter was ever widened into officer generally, Potiphar's case being by most critics regarded as no exact exception.

It is noticeable that the idea of subordination which lies in the NT ὑπηρέτης (the original for 'officer' in all NT passages except Lk 12[58] πράκτωρ) does not show itself in the Heb. originals. It is noticeable also that ὑπηρέτης, the almost sole NT original, is never in the LXX employed to render any of the Heb. words given above, and, though occurring twenty times in NT, occurs but twice in the Gr. canonical OT (Pr 14[35], Is 32[5]), and but twice in the uncanonical (Wis 6[4], Three [23]). It would seem that, apart from ṣārîṣ and perhaps occasionally shōṭēr (comp. Dt 16[18] with Mt 5[25] 'judge . . . officer'), the Heb. words rendered 'officer' suggest no distinctive function, whereas the NT ὑπηρέτης (which has lost all reminiscence of its original meaning of 'under-oarsman'—perhaps one of the lower two out of the three assigned to an oar) in some dozen passages out of the twenty means distinctly bailiffs or police officers of the Sanhedrin or other court of justice, in accordance with one use of the same word at Athens, where ὑπηρέται were the subordinates of those important police magistrates called the Eleven (Plato, Phædo, 116 B), and one use by Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 14), when, in his account of Moses' judicial arrangements, he gives the same title to the two Levites who were attached as clerks to each Jewish court constituted out of the seven chief men of each city. An apparently synonymous term for these clerks, confined, as a translation of shōṭēr, to Dt, is the curious and uncertain γραμματοεισαγωγεύς, perhaps (as Driver suggests) the title of some law officer at Alexandria.

The duties of 'officers' (shōṭĕrîm) as described in OT were various: they made proclamations (Dt 20[5. 8. 9]), they conveyed orders (Jos 1[10] 3[2]) to the people in time of war; in 1 and 2 Ch we find them as subordinate officials, sometimes in a military (1 Ch 27[1]), sometimes in a judicial capacity (1 Ch 23[4]), and on one occasion superintending the repairs of the temple (2 Ch 34[13]), much as shōṭĕrîm were also Pharaoh's 'taskmasters,' superintending the labour of the Israelites (Ex 5[6] etc.). See Driver on Dt 1[15].

In NT, ὑπηρέτης, where it does not mean a servant generally ('of Christ,' 1 Co 4[1], Ac 26[16]; 'of the word,' Lk 1[2]), or an assistant for a special purpose (Ac 13[5], John Mark, possibly in the main for baptizing), or an attendant (Lk 4[20], the attendant at the synagogue service; see MINISTER),* is most naturally explained in a sense similar to that of shōṭēr in Dt 16[18] (cf. Mt 5[25]), though perhaps in a sense somewhat more confined, as a subordinate official in connexion with a court of justice, whose duty it was, as warder or sergeant, to carry into effect the decisions or maintain the dignity and authority of the judges. Thus the ὑπηρέται of the Sanhedrin were sent to arrest Jesus (Jn 7[32]), did finally seize Him in Gethsemane (Jn 18[3]), 'received him with blows of their hands' (Mk 14[65]), one ὑπηρέτης striking Him for His answer to the high priest (Jn 18[22]); and similar ὑπηρέται under command of a captain of the temple police (στρατηγός, cf. Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 2; Schürer, HJP II. i. 258) were commissioned to arrest Peter and John (Ac 4[1] 5[24. 26]). Probably, when Jesus said, 'If my kingdom were of this world, my ὑπηρέται would now be striving' (Jn 18[36]), He drew His analogy from this temple usage. Luke's πράκτωρ (12[58]), the avenger of the Tragedians (Æsch. Eum. 319), the tax-gatherer of Demosthenes (778. 18), the exactor of

* In He 9[28], 1 P 2[24] rendered 'bear'; see in LXX Is 53[11] (for סבל), v.[12] (for נשׂא).

† Except v.[15] (הקריב; cf. Lv 27[9]): הרים would not here be suitable.

* Cf. art. MARK (JOHN), p. 245[b], where it is suggested that even the ὑπηρέτης of Ac 13[5] is used in this sense—that is to say John Mark may have been a ḥazzan, or 'synagogue minister.'

Isaiah (3[12] LXX), the public accountant of the papyri (3 cent. B.C., see Deissmann, Beitrage, p. 152), has now become with him a synonym for the ὑπηρέτης of a court of justice. (See MINISTER, ad fin.). J. MASSIE.

OG (עוֹג, Ὤγ).—The king of Bashan at the time of the end of the wanderings of the Israelites in the wilderness. He and his people were conquered at Edrei. That city and Ashtaroth were his capitals (Jos 13[12]). He was 'of the remnant of the Rephaim' (loc. cit.) or giants, and had in all 'threescore cities, all the region of Argob'* (Dt 3[4]). These were 'cities fenced with high walls, gates, and bars' (Dt 3[5]), so that his kingdom was a powerful one. His territory became the possession of the half-tribe of Manasseh (under Jair the son (i.e. descendant) of Manasseh), which remained in the trans-Jordanic territory. The bedstead (? sarcophagus) of the king was a famous one; it seems to have been made of black basalt; and it had found its way, when the Book of Deuteronomy was written, to Rabbah of the children of Ammon (Dt 3[11]).† Many ancient sarcophagi of black basalt have been found in the districts east of the Jordan. The conquest of Og by Moses was looked upon as one of the great events of Jewish history; we find it referred to by the Gibeonite ambassadors to Joshua (Jos 9[10]), as also in the making of the covenant in Neh 9[22] and in Ps 135[11] 136[20]. Many legends have gathered about his name. Pope Gelasius, in the 5th cent., issued a decree condemning a book which at that time was current under the name of Og.

LITERATURE.—The latest authority on Og is Driver's Deuteronomy, see esp. pp. 7f., 53f.; cf. also Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan, 12f., 94; Conder, Heth and Moab, 160f.; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 575f.; Wright, Palmyra and Zenobia, 284ff.

OHAD (אֹחַד).—A son of Simeon, Gn 46[10] (Ἀωδ), Ex 6[15] (B Ἰώαδ, A Ἰαωαδί, F Ἀωδ). The name is wanting in the parallel passage 1 Ch 4[24], as well as in Nu 26[14].

OHEL (אֹהֶל 'tent'; B Ὀσά, A Ὀοά; Luc. Ἀθά).—One of Zerubbabel's sons, 1 Ch 3[20]. The correctness of the MT is open to suspicion.

OHOLAH (אָהֳלָה, B Ὀο(λ)λα, A Ὄολλα) and OHOLIBAH (אָהֳלִיבָה, B Ὀολιβα, A and once [Ezk 23[36]] B Ὄολιβα) are symbolical names given in Ezk 23[4f. 11. 22. 36. 44] to Samaria and Jerusalem respectively. In this passage the latter are represented as two sisters, both wives of Jahweh (cf. the marriage of Jacob to the sisters Leah and Rachel, a practice afterwards forbidden, Lv 18[18] [H]), and as having been guilty of adultery, Samaria with Egypt and Assyria, Jerusalem with Egypt, Assyria, and Babylonia (cf. ch. 16). The reference is to those intrigues and alliances with foreign peoples (Hos 7[11], 2 K 16[7], Is 7[17-25]), which had the natural effect of introducing foreign manners and worship (cf. 2 K 23[11f.], Am 5[26f.], Is 2[14], Jer 19[13]), and which, since the days of Hosea, had been represented and censured by the prophets as infidelity to Jahweh.‡

The name אָהֳלָה may be = אָהֳלָה 'she who has a tent,' 'tent-woman,' and אָהֳלִיבָה = אָהֳלִיבָה (cf. חֲצִיצִרָה, 2 K 21[1], Is 62[4]) 'tent in her' (so Smend [whose words 'soll heissen' show, however, that the sense put upon אָהֳלָה is unusual, not to say forced], followed by Oxf. Heb. Lex., Bertholet, etc.), the reference being to the tent-shrines which were found at the bāmôth (Ezk 16[16], Hos 9[6], 2 K 23[7] [?]; cf. the name Oholibamah 'tent [? of the] high place,' Gn 36[2]), just as the ark of Jahweh had from the first its tent (2 S 7[6]), and as David pitched for it a tent (2 S 6[17]) at Jerusalem (cf. Smend, Alttest. Religionsgesch.[2], 137). The two names have sometimes been taken as = 'her tent,' and 'My (sc. Jahweh's) tent in her,' and it has been supposed that in the first name there is a covert reproach of Samaria's illicit worship at shrines of her own selection, and in the other an implication that Jerusalem is Jahweh's own sanctuary. But, apart from the improbability of Ezekiel's paying what might be taken as a compliment to Jerusalem, the probability is that the ־ — in אָהֳלִיבָה is simply a 'binding vowel' without either suffixal or construct force (cf. Gray's contention to the same effect in a numerous class of compound personal names—Heb. Proper Names, pp. 75ff.). In this way the first part of the name means simply 'tent,' not 'my tent,' and Oholah and Oholibah are practically identical in sense. The most suitable explanation of this similarity of name and meaning appears to be that it was intended to imply that Samaria and Jerusalem had sinned in the same way and incurred the same condemnation. The prophet's purpose was facilitated by the circumstance that it was common in the East to give almost identical names to brothers or sisters (Ewald compares Hasan and Husein, the names of the two sons of Ali the son-in-law of Mohammed). There may be something, too, in the fact noted by Skinner (Ezekiel, p. 191n.) that אָהֳלָה contains the same number of consonants as שֹׁמְרוֹן (which, however, as Bertholet points out, is always written in OT שֹׁמְרוֹן), and אָהֳלִיבָה the same number as יְרוּשָׁלַם. Though the names in Ezk are purely figurative, they have a resemblance to a formation found in Phœnician (אהלמלך, אהלבעל), Himyaritic (אהלאל, אהלעתתר), the above Edomite (?) name אהליבמה, and the Hebrew (?) name אהליאב (cf. Gray, op. cit., p. 246n.). J. A. SELBIE.

OHOLIAB (אָהֳלִיאָב 'father's tent'; Ἐλιάβ; AV Aholiab).—The chief assistant of Bezalel in the construction of the tabernacle, Ex 31[6] 35[34] 36[1. 2] 38[23] (all P). It is possible (cf., for the name, Phœn. אהלבעל, אהלמלך, Himyaritic אהלעתתר, אהלאל, Edomite (?) אהליבמה Gn 36[2. 41]) that he was of non-Israelitish origin (see Gray, HPN 246 n.).

OHOLIBAH.—See OHOLAH.

OHOLIBAMAH (אָהֳלִיבָמָה 'tent of the high place').—1. One of Esau's wives, Gn 36[2. 5. 14. 18. 25] (Ὀλιβεμά, Ἐλιβέμα, Ὀλιβέμα). All the passages where she bears this name belong to R or to a late stratum of P. Elsewhere (Gn 26[34] P) Esau's wives have quite different names, and the whole subject of his marriages is wrapped in obscurity (see the Comm. of Dillm. and Holzinger, ll.citt.). 2. An Edomite 'duke,' Gn 36[41] (Ἐλιβεμᾶς).

OIL (usually שֶׁמֶן shemen; 23 t., when coupled with other products of the field in their unmanufactured state [see Driver on Dt 7[13]], יִצְהָר; in the Aramaic part of Ezr מְשַׁח; LXX and NT ἔλαιον).—One of the most important products of Palestine, mentioned more than 200 times in the Bible. Sometimes it is specifically called 'olive oil,' lit. 'oil of olive,' shemen zayith, to indicate its source, as Ex 27[20] 30[24], Lv 24[2], or 'oil olive,' lit. 'olive of oil,' Dt 8[8] (zêth shemen), 2 K 18[32] (zêth yiẓhār); but, even when not so expressed, the material referred to is the product of the olive in all cases but one, viz. Est 2[12], where oil of myrrh is specially mentioned. The olive tree and its fruit are elsewhere

* This district was afterwards known as Trachonitis (Lk 3[1]), and is now called el-Leja (but see art. ARGOB); though this would not include all that is meant by Argob. There is a curious notice of this district in 1 K 4[13. 19].

† It is quite possible, however, that Dt 3[11] is a later insertion.

‡ Similarly, the alliances of the Hasmonæan princes with Rome were condemned from the Pharisaic standpoint as 'a going a whoring after strange gods' (Assump. Mos. v. 3, ed. Fritzsche, otherwise Charles, ad loc.).

described (see art. OLIVE, and cf. ii. p. 31), and the methods employed in extracting the oil from its fleshy drupes are there given.

Several kinds of olives were cultivated in Palestine. According to Menaḥôth, viii. 3, those of Tekoa were the best, those of Ragab the second best. Three other varieties—that of Netophath, that called Saphconi, and that named Bisani—are mentioned in Peah, vii. 1. The last is said to be so called because it is so prolific that it makes all others to be ashamed. Columella, who calls the olive the first of all trees, mentions 10 varieties whose culture he describes at length (de Re Rustica, v. 8, xii. 49–54, and de Arboribus, xvii.); and Pliny names 15 kinds, of which the Licinian was the best (xv. 4). Cato (de Re Rustica, 64–69) gives the modes in use for purifying the oil, and Palladius (de Re Rustica, i. 20; Mar. viii, Oct. viii, Nov. v) describes the oil cellars and many particulars in olive culture. For descriptions of the olive varieties now in cultivation see Barbe, Études sur les oliviers; and details of ancient methods of expressing the oil are given in Blumner's Technologie, i. 318. St. Paul uses the figure of olive-grafting in Ro 11^{17} in the opposite sense to that referred to by Palladius (de Insitione, xiv., 'fecundat sterilis pingues, oleaster olivas'). In Geoponica, ix., there is also an account of the culture of the olive, and of the experiments made of grafting olives on vines; this ἐλαιοστάφυλος and the effect produced on the fruit of the graft is mentioned in an epigram (Brunck, iii. 231).

Different kinds of oil were known in Palestine. Pure (RV) or beaten (AV) oil is specified in Ex 27^{20} 29^{40}, Lv 24^{2}, Nu 28^{5} (LXX ἔλαιον ἐξ ἐλαίων ἄτρυγον καθαρόν; Vulg. oleum purissimum piloque contusum). This is the oil now known in commerce as virgin oil, extracted by simple pressure without heat. In Zec 4^{12} it is called zāhāb or golden. The inferior kinds are extracted by more powerful pressure, and the coarse or gorgon oils by the aid of boiling water. These contain fermentible materials, the lees or Amurca, a watery bitter liquid, whose use, when separated from the oil, as a sheep-dip is mentioned by Virgil (Georg. iii. 448); said by Varro to be valuable for killing weeds, and by Cato to be destructive to ants. The coarsest oil is known now in the market as huile d'enfer; it is bitter, and soon becomes rancid. In the present day the cheaper oils are largely adulterated with or replaced by cotton-seed oil, which is, for most purposes, illuminant or dietetic, inferior to pure olive oil; for the latter surpasses all others in consisting, to a much larger extent, of the glycerides of unsaturated acids, and it can be recognized and distinguished from its adulterations by the rapidity with which it consolidates in the presence of nitrous acid (Brannt, On Oils, i. 318). For the different kinds of oils in Talmudic times see Menaḥôth, viii. 4, 5.

Oil is coupled with corn and must as an element of national wealth in Dt 7^{13} 11^{14} 12^{17} 14^{23} 18^{4} 28^{51}, 2 Ch 32^{28}, Neh 5^{11}, Hos $2^{8.\ 22}$, Jl 2^{19}. With corn, must, and honey in 2 Ch 31^{5} it formed part of the tribute brought to Hezekiah on the restoration of the priesthood. Raisins, figs, wine, and oil were brought by the northern tribes for the feast of rejoicing when David was made king (1 Ch 12^{40}). Must and oil as the typical produce of the land are mentioned in Neh 10^{37} $13^{5\text{-}12}$, Jer 31^{12}, Jl 2^{24}; must and oil in Neh 10^{39}, Hag 1^{11}; wine, summer fruits, and oil were gathered by the remnant left in the land after the Captivity (Jer 40^{10}). Sennacherib promised Israel that, if they would submit, he would bring them to a land of oil-olive and honey (2 K 18^{32}), meaning probably some region about Gordyæa or S. Kurdistan; it cannot have been Babylonia, as the oil used there, according to Strabo (xvi. 1. 14), is that of sesamum, the gingili oil of commerce, extracted from Sesamum orientale, a Bignoniaceous plant. Fine flour, oil, and honey were the gifts wherewith God fed His unfaithful people (Ezk 16^{19}); and wine, oil, and fine flour were the types of the luxuries imported by the mystic Babylon (Rev 18^{13}). The priestly stores of these commodities are mentioned in 1 Ch 9^{29} and Ezr 6^{9}; and a similar phrase, victuals, oil, and wine, is used in 2 Ch 11^{11} for the stores accumulated by Rehoboam in his fortified cities. Probably the great system of underground storehouses, such as those found at Tell Zakariyeh and elsewhere (PEFSt, 1899), were for this purpose. The royal cellars of oil in David's day were in charge of Joash (1 Ch 27^{28}). There is a reference to these secret stores of agricultural produce in the petition of the suppliants to Ishmael (Jer 41^{8}).

Oil, wine, and barley were supplied as food by Solomon to Hiram's workpeople (2 Ch 2^{15}). The quantity allowed is given in v.^{10} as 20,000 baths = about 165,000 gallons (see also Jos. Ant. VIII. ii. 9); but according to 1 K 5^{11} the annual gift was 20 cors = about 1640 gallons.

Oil was an important Palestinian export. It was sent to Tyre, as stated not only in the passages cited above, but in Ezk 27^{17}. In Ezr 3^{7}, meat, drink, and oil are said to have been given to the Tyrian workers occupied in building the second temple. There are allusions to this commerce in Shebiith, vi. 5. The trickery of John of Gischala in manipulating this trade is recited by Josephus (BJ II. xxi. 2). Much of this oil sent to Tyre was for the Egyptian market, but Israel sometimes sent the oil directly to Egypt (Hos 12^{1}). Though oil was much used in Egypt, very little was produced there. In Strabo's time the olive tree was grown only in the Heracleote nome, but even there the oil produced had a disagreeable smell. Elsewhere in Egypt, he says, there are no olive trees except near Alexandria, but these furnished no oil (XVII. i. 35). In the Anastasi Papyrus (4. xv. 4) 'oil from the harbour' is mentioned. The Egyptians called the olive trees dgam (Copt. ⲁⲅⲟⲉⲓⲧ) and olive oil bḳ or det, different varieties of which, called pure oil, white, dry, and red, are mentioned in Papyrus Ebers and the Medical Papyrus of Berlin. In the earlier days of Ramses III. there was a vigorous attempt to introduce olive culture into Egypt. In the great Harris Papyrus (pl. xxvii.) he says, 'I made to thee (Tmu) fields of olives in thy town An; I provided many cultivators to make pure, excellent oil of Egypt to illuminate thy great house'; and in his inventory (pl. xvii.) there are enumerated 2743 jars of Egyptian oil and 1810 of Syrian oil.

The uses of oil were numerous. The most ancient and widespread was that of external application (see ANOINTING, in vol. i. p. 101). All the Homeric references to oil are of this nature, and there are none to the use of oil as food. The same is noticeable in the earlier Egyptian literature, from which we learn that the 'oiling of the limbs and hair was as important to them as their clothes' (Erman, Life in Anc. Egypt, 229). Most of the references to the secular use of oil in the Bible are also in the same sense of an external application. Such applications were of two kinds: (a) as a cosmetic or part of the toilet, it imparts warmth to the body and protects it against the action of cold (Pliny, xv. 4). And, as the inferior oils used for this purpose are apt to become rancid, there was a special advantage in fresh oil (Ps 92^{10}). (b) As a medicinal agent. Oil is an ingredient in a very large number of the remedies prescribed in the Papyrus Ebers for the most diverse diseases. Pliny also speaks of its medicinal use (xv. 4. 7, xxiii. 3. 4). Dion Cassius relates that oil and wine were employed both externally and internally for the unknown disease which attacked the army of Aelius Gallus in Arabia (liii. 29), as we read of their being used in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10^{34}); see also Vegetius, Ars Veterinaria, v. 14, 23, and Columella, de Re Rustica, vi. 30. 4. Herod the Great was bathed in oil when suffering from the violent abdominal dropsical disease in which he was eaten of worms (Jos. Ant. XVII. vi. 5, and BJ I. xxxiii. 5). Cf. Ja 5^{14}, and art. ANOINTING, 4.

2. As part of a ceremony of consecration of kings, high priests (Ex $29^{7\text{-}21}$, Lv 21^{10}, Nu 35^{25}), or sacred things (see vol. i. p. 101). The effect of this anointing was the complete setting apart for the Divine service Lv 10^{7}, called in Lv 21^{12} the 'crown of the anointing oil.' Talmudic writers say that Saul, Jehu, and Joash were anointed with common oil; but for this there is no authority. For the sacred oil see OINTMENT.

3. As part of the ritual of the burial of the dead oil was used. This is referred to by our Lord (Mt 26^{12}, Mk $14^{3\text{-}8}$, Lk 23^{56}, Jn 19^{40}). In the Rhind Papyrus the use of 206 ḥn of oil is prescribed for this purpose, and in the funeral Papyrus of Ḥ'tr the anointing is said to renew the members and to enlarge the heart. The olive tree is described as springing from the eye of Horus, and the oil is said to be 'holy and separated for divine things.'

4. Oil was also used as an illuminating agent in lamps. Pure olive oil burns without soot, but has the disadvantage of being rapidly consumed. In the usual Jewish lamps half a log=a little less than half a pint, was used in a night (Menaḥóth, ix. 3). For tabernacle and temple lamps pure oil was used (Ex 27^{20}, Lv 24^{2}), and the charge of the oil in the tabernacle was given to Eleazar (Nu 4^{16}). This lamp oil is also mentioned in Ex 25^{6} $35^{8.\ 14.\ 28}$ 39^{37}. The wicks were of flax, as alluded to in Is 42^{3}. Flaxen wicks were also used in Egypt, but in recent times cotton twisted round straws is often employed (Lane, Mod. Egyp. i. 201). For the use of oil in NT for this purpose see Mt $25^{3.\ 4.\ 8}$. For the Sabbath lamps, R. Zarphon says that none but olive oil should be used; but others allow oil of sesame, of 'anuzim (nuts), of radishes, fish oil, etc. (Sabbath, ii. 2).

5. As food, the use of oil is common in the East, and is referred to by almost all travellers from Ibn Batuta to Robinson and Burckhardt; but references to its dietetic employment are not numerous in the Bible. Cakes made with oil supported the widow of Zarephath's household during the famine (1 K 17^{12}). Oil formed part of the food of the unfaithful wife typical of Israel (Ezk 16^{13}). The tithe of oil was to be eaten before the Lord (Dt 12^{17}). The taste of manna is compared to that of oil (Nu 11^{8}).

6. The employment of oil in the meal-offering was a derivative of its use as food. It formed part of the offering—(1) in the daily sacrifice, Ex 29^{40}; (2) the meal-offering, Lv 7^{10}; (3) the consecration-offering for the priests, Ex $29^{2\text{-}23}$, Lv $6^{15.\ 21}$; (4) the consecration-offering of the Levites, Nu 8^{8}; (5) the offering at the expiry of the vow of the Nazirite, Nu 6^{15}; (6) the offering for the purification of the leper, Lv 14; and (7) the special offering at the erection of the tabernacle, Nu 7. No oil was to be used in the sin-offering (Lv 5^{11}), or the jealousy-offering (Nu 5^{15}).

For these ceremonial purposes large quantities of oil were required. The allowance given to Ezra was 100 baths of oil (about 820 gallons), Ezr 7^{22}; the best of the oil was to be given to the priests, Nu 18^{12}. The amount thus offered is called חֹק הַשֶּׁמֶן, the ordinance (AV) or set portion (RV) of oil, Ezk 45^{14}.

The vessels used for oil in Bible times were various. Samuel and Zadok used a horn (קֶרֶן keren), 1 S $16^{1\text{-}10}$, 1 K 1^{39}; Samuel also used a vial (צַפַּחַת pak) of oil for anointing Saul, 1 S 10^{1}, as did the prophet who anointed Jehu, 2 K 9^{1} (AV box). The widow's oil was in a cruse (צַפַּחַת ẓappaḥath), 1 K 17^{12}. The widow of the prophet, whose oil Elisha multiplied, held it in a pot (אָסוּךְ 'āsûk), 2 K 4^{2}. The virgins in the parable carried their oil in a ἀγγεῖον or vessel.

The word 'oil' is used metaphorically in many passages. The pouring of oil out of the rock of flint in Dt 32^{13} and Job 29^{6} is a figure of abundance, the rock being either the stone press by which the olives are squeezed, or more probably the rocky slopes upon which the olives were cultivated. Part of the blessing of Asher (Dt 33^{24}) was that he should dip his foot in oil—a sign of favour and prosperity, a token that oil should be abundant in his territory. Josephus says of Galilee, in which was the lot of Asher, οὕτως ἐλαιοφόρου μάλιστα (BJ II. xxi. 2). The foolish use of oil is a token of extravagance and cause of poverty (Pr 21^{17}), while the husbanding of it is a proof of wisdom (Pr 21^{20}). In Job 24^{11}, where the distressful case of the slaves of the oppressor is depicted, one of the labours to which they are condemned is the making of oil within the walls of the enclosed garden of their masters. The word used here (יְצָהִירוּ), Hiph. of a denominative verb from יִצְהָר 'oil') does not occur elsewhere, and was understood by LXX in a different sense, ἐν στενοῖς ἀδίκως ἐνήδρευσαν ὁδὸν δὲ δικαίων οὐκ ᾔδεισαν, and the Vulg. renders it Inter acervos eorum meridiati sunt qui calcatis torcularibus sitiunt.

The 'oil of gladness' of Ps 45^{7} = He 1^{9}, and the oil of joy of Is 61^{3}, are marks of joy and festivity. The reproof of the righteous is compared to oil on the head (Ps 141^{5}). AV calls it 'an excellent oil which shall not break my head,' but it is better given in RV, 'oil upon the head, let not my head refuse it.' Words of deceit are said to be softer than oil (Ps 55^{21}, Pr 5^{3}). Cursing permeates the life of the wicked even as oil soaks into bone (Ps 109^{18}). The destruction of the olive-yards in drought is called a languishing of the oil (Jl 1^{10}).

OIL TREE (עֵץ שֶׁמֶן 'ēṣ-shemen, κυπάρισσος, lignum olivæ or olivarum, lignum pulcherrimum).—This Heb. expression is tr^{d} (Is 41^{19}) AV, RV text 'oil tree,' RVm 'oleaster'; (1 K $6^{23.\ 31\text{-}33}$) AV 'olive trees,' m. 'trees of oil' or 'oily trees,' RV 'olive wood'; (Neh 8^{15}) AV 'pine branches,' RV 'branches of wild olive.' It is clear from Neh that the plant in question is not the olive, as that is mentioned in the same sentence by its own name. The difference between the latter and the wild olive is so small that it is quite unlikely that it would have been mentioned by a separate name in so brief a list of trees used for the same purpose. A candidate for 'ēṣ-shemen must fulfil the following conditions, suggested by the passages cited above. (1) It must be an oily or fat tree (shemen signifies 'fat' as well as 'oil'; its Arab. equivalent semen is the word for 'clarified butter'). This would apply to a tree producing a terebinthine oil or resin, such as constitutes what is known in Eng. as fat wood, found in pitch pine and other similar trees. The Arab. has the expression luksh for such fat wood. Faggots of it are sold in the market for torches, and much used at weddings and other festivities. (2) It must be an emblem of fertility and prosperity, fitted to be associated with the myrtle, the acacia, the fir (בְּרוֹשׁ, see FIR), the pine (תִּדְהָר, see PINE), and the box (תְּאַשּׁוּר, see BOX). (3) It must be a tree capable of furnishing a block of wood of the size, beauty, and hardness required for carving an image 10 cubits high, to be placed in the Holy of Holies, and for making doors and doorposts. (4) Its foliage must be sufficiently dense to be suitable for booths. (5) It must grow in the mountains, and be easily accessible from Jerusalem and the other cities of Palestine. The wild olive has already been excluded. The oleaster, Elæagnus hortensis, M.B., never grows large enough to furnish such a block of wood as was required for the image. It is also never used for house carpentry. Its foliage is not dense, and its branches are usually thorny, and would be unlikely to be selected for a covering for booths. The zaḳḳûm, Balanites Ægyptiaca, Del., grows only in the torrid valley of the Lower Jordan, has a small trunk, and very thorny branches, and a sparse foliage. Its fruit yields a sort of balsam, which is its only claim to be called a tree of oil or fatness. The only trees which fulfil all these conditions are the fatwood trees. The genus Pinus furnishes three species, P. Pinea, L., the stone or maritime pine, P. Halepensis, Mill., the Aleppo pine, and P. Bruttia, Ten., which is perhaps only a variety of the last. Any of these would furnish foliage suitable for booths, and all are constantly used for this purpose in the East. Their massive trunks could easily furnish the log required for the carved image, and the doors and doorposts. They are constantly used in house carpentry. Their heartwood is fat enough to entitle them to be called 'trees of fatness.' They are spontaneous, growing in the wilderness (i.e. uncultivated places, and so fit to be associated with the other trees mentioned with them, Is l.c.). We are inclined with Celsius (Hierob. i. 309) to tr. 'ēẓ-shemen, 'fatwood trees,' and to suppose that the reference is to the pines.

In the article ASH we have argued that 'ōren probably stands for Pinus Pinea, L. This in no way invalidates the inclusion of the same tree under the general head of fatwood or resinous trees.

In one of the passages (Is 41[19]) AV and RV tr. תִּדְהָר tidhār, 'pine,' RVm 'plane.' The same word (Is 60[13]) is tr[d] AV and RV 'pine,' RVm referring to former passage. It is very doubtful whether tidhār refers to the pine (see PINE). G. E. POST.

OINTMENT (מִרְקַחַת mirḳaḥath, 1 Ch 9[30]; in general שֶׁמֶן shemen, sometimes coupled with מִשְׁחָה mishhāh, as in Ex 30[25]; LXX μύρον Ex 30[25], Ps 133[2], Ca 1[3.5], Pr 27[9], Am 6[6]; elsewhere ἔλαιον; Vulg. unguentum).—Oily, fragrant materials smeared on the surface of the body to allay the irritation caused by the heat in Eastern lands, and to conceal the odour of perspiration. The use of materials of this kind is common in almost every country, and is of ancient date. In Egypt unguents are mentioned even in texts of the Ancient Empire, and in those of the Middle and New Empire they are frequently referred to. There were nine sacred oils used for the purposes of ceremonial anointing: mt (probably cedar oil), htt or hti (a Libyan product), hknnu (an oil containing 'many spices from Arabia'), nešnem, sfti, sgnn (rose oil), mrh (oil of myrrh), s-ti hb, and ṯuau. Besides these there were other sweet-scented salves and ointments in ordinary use, aber, tpt, th-hennu, etc.

The holy anointing oil made by Bezalel for Moses (Ex 30[23ff.]) consisted of 1 hin of olive oil (about 10 lb.), 500 shekels of flowing myrrh (about 15 lb.), 250 shekels of sweet cinnamon (about 7½ lb.), 250 shekels of sweet calamus, and 500 shekels of cassia (or costus). The Jewish authors who regard the 'shekel of the sanctuary' as twice the ordinary shekel, double these weights. This was to be compounded after the art of the perfumer (see art. CONFECTION). Probably these scented substances, or some of them, were brought into the market in powder, as in Ca 3[6] these spices are called 'the powders of the merchant.' There are different descriptions given by Rabbinical writers of the process whereby the anointing oil was compounded, but most probably it was simple pulverization of the ingredients, and boiling them in the oil; for, as Pliny has remarked, the strength of the ointment is greater when the ingredients are boiled together (xiii. 2); but see Otho's Lexicon, s.v. 'Oleum.' The making of ointment in this way was recognized by Hebrew writers (see Job 41[31]).

As the passage in Ex 30 is assigned to P, the date of the prescription cannot be determined, but it may be late. Pliny says that unguents were not known among the Greeks at the time of the Trojan war; but he has overlooked the ῥοδόεντι δὲ χρῖεν ἐλαίῳ ἀμβροσίῳ of Il. xxiii. 186 and the λιπαροὶ κεφαλὰς καὶ καλὰ πρόσωπα of Od. xv. 332, and the several references to λίπ' ἔλαιον, Il. x. 577, xiv. 171; Od. iii. 966, vi. 96, etc. He assigns the invention to the Persians, because a chest of perfumes was among the spoils taken by Alexander; but the Egyptians had unguents much earlier, and probably also the Indians preceded the Persians in this respect. There are references to anointings in the ancient Indian poetry (see, for example, Hitopadesa, i. 98. For Egyp. origin see P. Aegineta, vii. 18).

Pliny gives a large number of formulæ for sweet-smelling unguents, including one which resembles the holy anointing oil, containing myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, nard, costus, laurel, lily, and fenugreek. The myrrh, he says, gives consistency and sweetness, the cinnamon strengthens the odour, and the costus (or cassia) makes it more pungent. See CASSIA, CINNAMON, MYRRH. RVm substitutes 'costus' for 'cassia' in Ex 30[24], and it is probable that this is the material indicated by the word ḳiddah. Costus is the dried root of a composite plant Aplotaxis auriculata, imported like frankincense through Arabia from India, and is a much esteemed ingredient in hair-unguents. It was formerly supposed to be the root of Costus Arabicus, but this is erroneous.

For the uses of these ointments see ANOINTING in vol. i. p. 100, and OIL, above, p. 591 f. For further references to the classical use of toilet oils, see Athenæus, xii. 78. Unguents are said by Pliny to keep best in boxes of alabaster (xiii. 3), and to improve with age, becoming very precious when old; hence Patroclus's body was anointed with ointment nine years old (Il. xviii. 350). The very precious alabaster box of ointment mentioned in Mt 26[7], Mk 14[3], Lk 7[37] was thus the best of its kind; and the odorous ingredient in this unguent, spikenard, the root of Nardostachys Jatamansi, imported from India, was one of the costliest of perfumes. This perfume is called in Mk 14[3] and Jn 12[3] νάρδος πιστική, the latter word meaning either 'genuine' or 'liquid,' or else it may be from an Indian name of the plant pisitâ (Houghton in PSBA x. 144).

The making of the holy oil by unauthorized persons was forbidden, and it has been supposed that it was compounded once for all, on account of the large quantity of ingredients specified, whose weight amounted to about half a hundredweight (see More Nebhochim, iii. 45). It was used to anoint the tabernacle, the table, the vessels, the candlestick, the altars, the laver and its base, and Aaron and his sons (but the anointing of the priests was not observed in the second temple; Saubert, de Sacerd. Ebr. v.), also David and Solomon, possibly Joash; but the Talmudists say that he, Saul, and Jehu were anointed with common oil.

The consistence of the oil may be inferred from Ps 133[2], which says that it trickled down on Aaron's beard, where it lay on the collar (not skirt) of his outer garment. It was therefore of a very thick treacly consistence, becoming probably more fluid when warmed. The act of anointing is figured in Lepsius, Denkmäler, iii. 76*b*, 230, and is described in Wilkinson, i. 426. In the Gizeh Museum is the stele of a 'keeper of the ointments of the king,' cf. the royal store of Hezekiah, Is 39[2].

The passage in Pr 27[16] where of the person who tries to hide the contentious woman it is said, 'Whoso hideth her hideth the wind, and the ointment of his right hand, which bewrayeth itself,' is very obscure. LXX, regarding it as connected rather with the succeeding than with the preceding verse, renders it, 'The north wind is a harsh wind, but in name it is called "auspicious."' In the RV it is translated, 'his right hand encountereth oil,' which seems to be the literal rendering; but it is not much more intelligible. The Vulgate gives oleum dexteræ suæ vocabit. It seems to refer to the difficulty of retaining a slippery, oily material in one's hand. For more fanciful interpretations see Rosenmüller's Scholia, ix. 653; Maurer's Comment. iii. 505, and esp. Toy, Proverbs, p. 488 f.

OLD PROPHET, THE (הַנָּבִיא אֶחָד זָקֵן; B πρεσβύτης εἷς προφήτης, A προφ. εἷς πρεσβ., Luc. προφ. ἄλλος πρεσβ.).—This prophet lived in Bethel at the commencement of the reign of Jeroboam I. A single incident in his life is narrated (1 K 13[11-32]; cf. 13[1-10] and 2 K 23[16-18]). He desired to entertain as his guest a certain 'man of God' from Judah, who had appeared in Bethel to denounce the royal sanctuary (? on the day of its inauguration). The stranger was already departing when the prophet overtook him and offered his hospitality. It was refused on the ground that J" had forbidden him to take food in the city. The prophet then falsely declared that he gave his invitation in accordance with a message from J", and the stranger returned and partook of a meal. He never reached his home again. News came to Bethel that a lion had slain him a short distance from the city. The old prophet recognized this as J"'s punishment, saddled his ass, brought in the body, held lamentation over it, and buried it in his own grave. By this he showed his sympathy and respect.

The old prophet is really a secondary figure in this narrative, a factor in the fate of the man of God. His character and motives are not the centre of interest and lack clearness. They appear more vividly after the death of the man of God. What is then prominent is the prophet's sympathy for the stranger, not a sense of guilt or of responsibility for his death (vv.[26-32]; the LXX addition to v.[32] is taken from 2 K 23[18]). This is consistent with what seems to be the writer's view, that the man of God was himself to blame for his death (see below). It might be accounted for by a lack of interest in the situation of the prophet as compared with the sad end of the stranger.

The old prophet of Bethel in this narrative is no doubt represented as one of the true prophets of J". Without taking account of vv.[20-22], we may infer this from the use of the name 'prophet,' which is applied to him without qualification. What then does the narrative contribute to a conception of the prophetical character? We may infer from v.[18] that it was not felt to be impossible that one who had received the Divine call to be a prophet should utter a pretended revelation. It is not supposed that a man once a prophet is always a prophet. Vv.[20-22] go further. The prophet's misuse of his position does not prevent his receiving an actual revelation immediately after. Disobedience is to be rebuked. The prophet had shared in it. He had even prostituted his office to bring it about. He had uttered a lie in the name of J",* and now without rebuke for himself he is divinely commissioned to rebuke the man he deceived. The absence of rebuke for himself does not indeed imply that he is considered blameless. It may be accounted for by the lack of interest in the prophet displayed by the narrator. It is only what concerns the man of God that is related. Still the prophet is not for a moment disqualified for his office by his pretended revelation. Or, more accurately, J" uses him again as the medium for conveying His message. The inference from vv.[20-22] seems then to be that prophets, truly inspired, may sometimes be guilty of fabricating Divine messages. But the verses contain elements of suspicion. Why should J" not have spoken to the heart of the stranger himself? An utterance in the mouth of the old prophet loses strength, for his own previous statement contradicts it. The last words of v.[26] almost imply a direct utterance to the stranger. This may, originally, have been the purport of vv.[20-22]. The pronoun of the 3rd person in v.[23] certainly refers to the man of God (see below), whereas in the present text of the preceding verses it does not. The verses as they stand are very abrupt. Some further explanation from the prophet to the man of God is required. It may be noted, also, that the words 'who came from Judah' (v.[21]) are superfluous, and that after the first clause of v.[20] MT has an unusual blank.

The conception of Divine retribution in the narrative offers nothing that is really peculiar to it. The man of God is punished because of his failure to pay strict obedience to J"'s command. It was the same with Lot's wife. The actual significance of the command has no importance attached to it. We are not justified in supposing that he was unavoidably deceived, and sinned in ignorance. The false statement of the old prophet is probably regarded as a temptation which he ought to have cast aside (comp. above). He had been a direct recipient of revelation, and the assertions of another were not on the same plane of certainty. Presumably, also, he is regarded as one who might, if he pleased, have ascertained for himself the Divine will, and so was responsible for his ignorance. Jeremiah in similar circumstances (Jer 28) recognized, indeed, the possibility that another prophet had received a message reversing his own (v.[6]), but reserved his judgment (v.[9]) until the word of J" came to him (v.[12]). Retribution, therefore, in his case is not inoperative (against Benzinger on 1 K 13); there was no disobedience, and consequently no ground for retribution. The treatment of the false prophet in Jer 28 is more properly a contrast to the treatment of the prophet of Bethel in 1 K. Hananiah dies within a year because of his false prophecy in the name of J"; the prophet of Bethel continues to be a medium of Divine revelation (1 K 13[20-22]). But vv.[20-22] may not be in their original form, and it is not certain that the narrative in Kings really condones the offence of the prophet of Bethel (see above). Besides, there is this difference between the cases: the prophet of Bethel is not regarded as a false prophet, Hananiah is represented as a simple impostor. If the difference be not pressed, it remains true that the immunity of a false prophet is not something peculiar to this narrative. The fate of Hananiah was an exceptional one.

* The last words of v.[18] are so abrupt as to suggest interpolation. But there is nothing to support a conjecture that the prophet was simply mistaken, and the tenor of the narrative is against the view that he was inspired by J" to tempt the man of God.

In estimating the historical value of this narrative the whole chapter must be taken into account. The real theme of the chapter is the message and the death of the man of God from Judah. The message announced the future desecration of the royal altar by a ruler of the house of David, Josiah. It was proclaimed in the king's presence, and only a miracle saved the man of God from the consequences of his act. J" had commanded him not to linger in the city, and he refused to be the king's guest. It was because he yielded to the invitation of the old prophet that a lion met and killed him on the way home.

The whole fabric of this narrative has been challenged on the ground that it implies such hostility to the worship at Bethel as is inconceivable in the age of Jeroboam. It is supposed to be a product of Deuteronomic opposition to the local worship of J" (Stade, Benzinger). Such criticism overlooks two further influences capable of explaining contemporary hostility to the sanctuary at Bethel. (1) The worship at this sanctuary was image worship. Whatever the attitude of the majority to such worship, there was doubtless a party of purity strenuously opposed to it (article BETHEL; Kittel, Hist. Heb. ii. 253 f.). (2) The sanctuary at Bethel was being made a royal sanctuary. It was the emblem of a new nation, and as such calculated to stir feeling in Judah. It is by no means improbable, in such circumstances, that a prophet, particularly one from Judah, should denounce Jeroboam's double schism on the day he inaugurated his royal sanctuary. The grave of one who did so was shown, it seems, in Bethel (2 K 23^{17}). The cause of his burial there and the manner of his death cannot seriously be pronounced unlikely. The report of his words (1 K 13^{2}) contains no description of Jeroboam's sin, Deuteronomic or otherwise. The purport of his message simply is that a king of the house of David will undo Jeroboam's work of that day. It admirably fits the situation. The suggestion that the story is pervaded by a confused memory of the appearance of Amos in Bethel ignores too much the fertility of history, and is a treatment of scanty records as if they were complete. The anonymity of the prophet and of the man of God is not evidence of their unhistorical origin. It points rather to a channel of oral transmission, in which the names were lost. Josephus calls the Judæan man of God Ἰάδων (Ant. VIII. viii. 5). The name may come from 2 Ch 9^{29}. The writer in the Bk. of Kings avoids confusion by the use of the titles 'prophet' and 'man of God.'* There is no distinction of office in these titles (v.[18]).

The miraculous features of the story will be estimated, of course, according as we judge all miracle in these histories. The withering of Jeroboam's hand and its restoration (vv.[4. 6]), and the lion's quietly remaining beside the ass and the dead body (vv.[24. 28]), are not essentials in the narrative. A prophet did not require miraculous protection (comp. Am 7^{10-13}). The sign of the altar (vv.[3. 5]) gives the impression of being a later addition. It is not capable of historical proof that the Judæan king Josiah was named in the original prophecy. 1 K 13^{2} and 2 K 23^{16} are not independent of each other.

Regarding the date of the narrative in its present form, see article on KINGS. Ewald considers it to have been written down for the first time after the desecration of the altar by Josiah. If it were clear that $13^{33b. 34}$ is the original continuation of 12^{31-32}, it might be concluded that ch. 13 was not part of the original Bk. of Kings compiled by R^{D}, but an addition by R^{D2}. There seems to be no other argument against its inclusion by R^{D}. The possible difference of date scarcely affects the question of the general historicity of the narrative.

LITERATURE.—Ewald, History, iv. 30 ff.; Wellhausen, Composition[3], 277 f. = Bleek[4], 244; Stade, Geschichte, i. 349 f.; Benzinger, ad loc. ('Konige' in Marti's Kurzer Hdcom.). The possible motives of the old prophet receive special consideration in The Speaker's Commentary, and the nature of the guilt of the man of God in The Expositor's Bible (Farrar). See also Bähr in Lange's Commentary Josephus (Ant. viii. and ix.) expands and adds extensively to the history of the prophet. He represents him as 'a certain wicked old false prophet,' who sought to undo the effect of the miracles and message of the man of God, and pretended friendship and Divine inspiration in order to ruin and discredit him. The revelation of vv.[21-22] is addressed to the man of God in this account (ὁ θεὸς ἐπιφαίνεται τῷ Ἰάδωνι) But Josephus may be judged capable of ignoring the present text because of prejudice against the 'wicked old prophet.'

Literature.

The OT is that portion of the Canon of the Reformed Church which was received as sacred literature from the Jews. (On the name see art. BIBLE in vol. i. p. 286[b]). While the Gr. Version of these Scriptures included additional writings, now known as the Apocrypha, and reckoned a part of the OT by the Rom. Cath. Church (see art. APOCRYPHA in vol. i. p. 121[b]), the only books recognized by the Pal. Jews as holy, and admitted into their Canon, were those of our present OT. They were arranged as in the present Hebrew Bibles in three groups: the Law (תּוֹרָה Tôrāh), Gn, Ex, Lv, Nu, Dt; the Prophets (נְבִיאִים Nĕbî'îm), Jos, Jg, 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, Is, Jer, Ezk, and the 12 minor prophets; and the Writings, Hagiographa (כְּתוּבִים Kĕthûbîm), Ps, Pr, Job, Ca, Ru, La, Ec, Est, Dn, Ezr, Neh, 1 and 2 Ch.*

The purpose of this article is to describe the origin and growth of these groups as sacred literature, and to give an account of their use and method of interpretation when united into the OT in the Jewish and Christian Churches.

i. ORIGIN AND GROWTH.—1. The Law or Torah. A tôrāh in ancient Israel was any decision or instruction on matters of law or conduct given by a sacred authority (OTJC[2], p. 299; cf. art. LAW IN OT, p. 64[b]). A body of such instruction went by the same name, which was readily transferred to

* In v.[23], AV and RV, the word 'prophet' denotes the man of God. But this is due to mistranslation. 'He saddled for himself the ass [which belonged] to the prophet who brought him back' is the correct rendering. Besides, the text is faulty. Read as LXX B: 'he saddled for himself his ass and departed back again.' The words omitted, [לָקַח אֶת הַחֲשִׁיב], are a gloss by a reader who observed that the ass of the man of God is mentioned now for the first time, and from this concluded that it had been lent or given him by the prophet of Bethel.

* The order of the books in the first group was always the same, and also of the Former Prophets, Jos, Jg, 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, but for the Latter Prophets the Babylonian Talmud (Baba Bathra 14*b*) and some ancient MSS give Jer, Ezk, Is, and minor prophets, and in the Writings place Ru before the Ps (Ginsburg, Introd. to the Bible, pp. 1–8).

the Scriptures containing this material as its leading element.* Thus arose the name of the first five books of the OT.

The work of providing regulations for worship naturally belonged to the priests, but in addition in early Israel the administration of justice fell partially, at least, likewise to them. They communicated the Divine will by means of the lot, the ephod, and the Urim and Thummim (1 S 14^{18} [LXX] 23^9, Dt 33^8).

People repaired to the sanctuaries to have judgments rendered (Ex 21^6 $22^{7f.}$ $^{(8f.)}$, 1 S 2^{25}). Such action was called 'inquiring of God,' and the decisions were, 'the statutes and laws of God' (Ex $18^{15f.\ 19-22}$; cf. Driver on Dt. 16^{18-20}). Thus the priests became the natural guardians and teachers of Divine instruction or law (Dt 33^{10}, Jer 18^{18}, Hos $4^{6f.}$). They were members of the supreme tribunal of the land (mentioned in 2 Ch 19^{5-11} as established by Jehoshaphat), Dt $17^{8ff.}$ $19^{15ff.}$. Tracing evidently their instruction or law to Moses, to preserve its continuity they issued legislation in his name, acting upon the principle that all law emanated from Jehovah, and that Moses was the medium of its communication. At first their work as lawgivers was probably simply carried on by oral decision and transmission. As Israel advanced in culture, however, laws were naturally reduced to writing. When this began, we have no clear means of determining. Some meagre written legislation may have existed as early as the time of Moses. (See the small type on p. 597[b]). No great stress was laid upon the original legal form or words. They were modified through change in time and circumstance. † Codes remained open. The earliest written laws which have been preserved are those in Ex 20–23 (the Bk. of the Covenant) 34^{14-26}. They probably owe their preservation to their incorporation into historical writings (E or J) of the 8th cent., but the laws themselves may be much earlier. (The lex talionis reveals a primitive state of society, yet an agricultural people is presupposed, and hence a later date than the settlement of Canaan). Other codes more ancient may have existed in Israel in a written form. The earliest written law or book of Divine instruction of whose introduction or enactment an authentic account is given, was Deuteronomy or its main portion, represented as found in the temple in the 18th year of king Josiah (B.C. 621), and proclaimed by the king as the law of the land (2 K 23) (see article DEUTERONOMY in vol. i. p. 602 f.). From that time forward Israel had a written law which the pious believer was commanded to ponder day and night (Jos 1^8 Ps 1^2); and thus the Torah, as sacred literature, formally commenced in Israel. This law aimed at a right application of original Mosaic principles.

The Mosaic period represented that of Israel's faithful relationship to Jehovah (Hos 2^{16} 11^1, Jer 2^2). As the cry at present is 'Back to Christ,' so the cry then was 'Back to Moses.' At present in going back to Christ to apply His teaching to immediate needs, we re-formulate them indirectly, giving thus laws of Christian conduct. But indirect re-formulation of ancient principles is contrary to the genius of the Hebrew mind and language. Intensity is characteristic of Hebrew utterance, as is well illustrated in Christ's use of the words 'hate' (Lk 14^{26}) and 'thank' and 'hide' (Mt 11^{25}). The Hebrew language refuses also to lend itself readily to indirect speech. It shows reluctance to give an address in substance, except in an apparent reproduction of the ipsissima verba. Thus in the OT historical books, whenever a writer wishes to report that one person made a verbal communication to another, he almost invariably says: 'So and so spoke to so and so, saying.' The direct form is used. Hence if in the reign of Josiah the Mosaic law and teaching were to be re-formulated to meet the exigencies of the time, they were naturally placed directly in the mouth of Moses. Indeed, practically no other method was possible to produce the required effect.

Dt is also far more than a code of laws. It is a hortatory exposition of law, appealing on the ground of Divine love and revelation for obedience in Israel. A religious experience formed its real basis, and gave it a position of Divine authority.

The reformation under Josiah was a failure. The good king fell at the battle of Megiddo. The people lapsed into idolatry, and Judah soon went into exile. Something more than Dt seemed necessary for a religious constitution for Israel. With this thought another re-formulation of the laws began. The Bk. of Ezekiel exhibits this movement. Under the form of a vision he drew up a programme for the future (see art. EZEKIEL). He heightened the sanctity of the central sanctuary by placing it within the domain of priests, that it might not, like the old temple, be liable to defilement through proximity to royal residences ($43^{7f.}$). He heightened the sanctity of the priesthood by restricting it to the sons of Zadok, the Levites being degraded from office on account of their ministration at the high places (44^{10-14}). He gave also an elaborate ritual for worship, and described, with the measurements and detail of an architect's plan, a new temple, and apportioned the land among the tribes of Israel with the regularity of a military camp. In accordance with this spirit, which saw no hope for Israel without transforming the State into a church and regulating the whole life of the people through elaborate law and ordinance, supposed Mosaic principles were again restated, and an ideal constitution of Israel in the wilderness was given as a new law for the Jewish people. This was issued in the Priests' Code (see art. HEXATEUCH), and solemnly presented by Ezra to the people, who received it as the law of God (Neh 8–10, B.C. 444 or 443). The reception of the Priests' Code under Ezra marks practically the appearance of the Law, since shortly afterwards Dt, which had previously been united with the historical work JE (see art. HEXATEUCH), and had never been abrogated as a law of Divine authority, was joined with the Priests' Code.

In all this legal literature the historical narrative occupied a prominent place. Laws were thought of not only as expressing abstract principles of justice and worship, but also as having originated in connexion with Divine manifestations. Hence narratives of a progressive revelation of God in the early ages of mankind and Israel formed an integral part of the Priests' Code. An example had already been set in Dt 1–4 and later by combining Dt with the historical work JE.

The enlargement and combination of sacred writings was performed by the ṣôphĕrîm or scribes. This class of scholars, of whom Ezra 'the ready scribe in the Law of Moses' (Ezr 7^6) was the prototype, grew up during the Exile, or shortly after, probably within priestly circles. The membership was not confined, however, to priests. They became the guardians and students of the Law, which they felt free to annotate and enlarge with some additions. They separated from the Hexateuch the Bk. of Joshua (see below). Thus the Law did not reach its final form until the 3rd cent. B.C. (For revision and gradual compilation of P, see art. HEXATEUCH in vol. ii. p. 374[a] f.).

2. The Prophets.—This division of OT falling into two parts, the Former Prophets Jos, Jg, 1 and 2 S, and 1 and 2 K, and the Latter Prophets Is, Jer, Ezk, and the Twelve, receives its name from the prophetic authorship of these books. The prophets represent the mystical teachers of religion who gain truth through the emotions or intuitions (see art. PROPHET). Equally with the priests, the prophets unfolded the ancient instruction or law, not, however, in the form of statutes or codes, but as direct revelations of Jehovah expressed in warnings and exhortations. The prophets became thus the conscience of the State and interpreters of history. Handing down their instruction as a living word, they seem not to have taken pains at first to preserve it in writing. Not until the 8th cent. have we indications of a systematic effort in that direction, illustrated in the discourses given in Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah. How far these came directly from the prophets themselves, or represent abstracts or reports furnished by scholars or hearers, we have no means of determining. Isaiah twice commanded that some of his instruction should be preserved as a future testimony to the truth of his doctrine (8^{16} 30^{8}). A century later Jeremiah took pains, according to a command from Jehovah, to have his discourses, covering a period of some twenty-two years, carefully written out (Jer $36^{1ff.\ 32}$). At the time of the Exile, when Ezekiel flourished, a written roll had become the symbol of the prophetic word (Ezk 2^{9}–3^{3}). He probably himself carefully wrote and arranged his prophecies, and from thence onward prophecy often assumed doubtless in the first instance a written as well as a spoken form. The anonymity of the author (or authors) of Is 40–66 suggests that those prophecies may have been circulated in MS without having been first orally delivered. The last of the prophets, whose writings have been preserved, according to Jewish tradition was Malachi (about B.C. 450), and this tradition is probably true as concerning the writings of those who delivered in the first instances oral messages.* Ob, Jl, Jon, Zec 9–14 and Is 24–27 are assigned by many scholars (see separate articles and Driver's LOT) to the Greek period, representing an imitation of the earlier prophetic word, and if we accept this assignment they probably represent a literary rather than an oratorical activity.

No record has been left of the manner or special cause of the collection of the 'Latter Prophets.' The sacred authority of most of them clearly dated from the day of their utterance or composition, and they gained nothing in this respect by collection and union with other writings, and yet their value naturally became greater when living prophets no longer appeared, and then an impulse must have arisen for their union and preservation in a sacred canon. This work was probably formally accomplished by the scribes already mentioned in connexion with the Law; and here, again, as in the case of the Law, liberty was doubtless taken in editing old material to introduce new reflections. (We may account in this way partially for the imitations of ancient prophecy already mentioned).

The historical books Jos, Jg, 1 and 2 S, and 1 and 2 K may have been originally classified as 'Prophets' because they contained narratives concerning inspired or prophetic men, or because they were assigned for authorship to such men as Joshua, Samuel, and Jeremiah, a view of Talmudic Judaism; yet the result was in a degree correct, since these books in the main came from authors imbued with the prophetic spirit. They reveal the will and character of Jehovah by relating His dealings with ancient Israel. Narratives of this sort began to be composed quite early. The lost Book of the Wars of Jehovah (Nu 21^{14}) was probably one, and the documents J and E of the Hexateuch and the similar sources (perhaps a continuation of J and E) appearing in Jg, 1 and 2 S, 1 K 1-3, and the prophetic stories of 1 and 2 K were others (see articles JUDGES in vol. ii. p. 807 ff., SAMUEL (BOOKS OF), and KINGS (BOOKS OF)). Next to lyric songs, these narratives containing ancient myths and legends illustrate the earliest literature of Israel. They began, as we have them, to be written not far from the reign of Solomon, and passed probably through many hands, or were preserved in circles of scholars, who copied, edited, and made such combinations of them as are seen in JE.

The subject of the development of literature in Israel is very obscure. It is uncertain whether the art of reading and writing was in vogue among the people before they entered the land of Canaan. After they came in contact with Canaanitish civilization it was clearly known among them. In Jg 8^{14} writing by a boy is mentioned. This, it is true, might be an anachronism only revealing a widespread use of the art in the days of the author of Jg. At the court of David a scribe is mentioned (2 S 8^{17}), and the knowledge of reading and writing from that time onward is assumed (2 S 11^{14}, 1 K 21^{8}, 2 K 5^{5} 10^{1}, Jer 29^{1}). Hence schools for the cultivation of this art necessarily then existed, and a literature of some sort must then have been current. This in its earliest form probably consisted of songs and stories, and possibly some laws. The Song of Deborah is usually regarded as the earliest piece of literature preserved in the Bible. (For a chronological list of the writings of the OT, see article BIBLE in vol. i. p. 290; compare the dates there given with those adopted in the articles on each OT book).

From these prophetic sources and from ancient annals, such as were naturally kept in connexion with the court and the temple (or from works based upon these annals), were composed or compiled in the spirit of Dt, and hence later than B.C. 621, the Deuteronomic parts of Joshua, the middle sections of Jg, 1 and 2 S, and 1 and 2 K. Later, these books suffered revision from priests and scribes, who gave them their present form (separating Jos from the Hexateuch). The time of the union of the Former Prophets with the Latter, or whether the books in either division were separately collected before their final union together, cannot be determined. The historical books from the first clearly held a high and revered place in Israel, as distinctly appears from the union of JE with D. They were regarded as records of Divine revelations given to the patriarchs and prophets and illustrating the principles of Jehovah's rule in the world and care for His people. The earliest testimony to their existence is their use in 1 and 2 Ch, written about B.C. 300. In 2 Mac 2^{13-15} is preserved a tradition that Nehemiah, founding a library, gathered together the things concerning the kings and prophets, and the writings of David, and the letters of the kings about sacred gifts. Although the list of writings enumerated goes beyond the 'Prophets,' yet a true reminiscence of their collection may be here given. The prophets formed a distinct division of Sacred Scriptures at B.C. 130, when the prologue to Sirach was written, and if the mention of twelve prophets in Sir 49^{12} is genuine, then as early as B.C. 180 (see art. OT CANON).

3. The Writings or Hagiographa.—This third division of the OT is composed of literature generally later than the Law and the Prophets, and this fact alone is sufficient to account for its separate existence. Dn in character belongs to the Latter Prophets, but was not written until the Maccabæan period (see art. DANIEL). Through the inspiring character of its teachings and revelation it was clearly received on its first appearance as of Divine authority. 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr, Neh, and Est resemble the Former Prophets, and appeared too late to be joined with them. Ezr and Neh bring the history of Israel from a point near that at which the narrative ceases in 1 and 2 K down to the canonization of the Law or the founding of Judaism, and probably

* No accredited prophets of Israel are mentioned in OT or elsewhere later than the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, and Josephus held that their line of succession had then ceased (c. Apion. i. 8). In Zec 13^{2-5} the prophet is mentioned as though the office had fallen into disrepute (this passage is, however, obscure), and in Ps 74^{9} and 1 Mac 4^{46} 9^{27} 14^{41} prophets are mentioned as having ceased.

thus gained a recognition as Holy Scripture. The same probably is true of Ruth. It was felt to be an integral part of OT history, and through this influence it was sometimes reckoned as a part of Jg (see below). 1 and 2 Ch were originally joined with Ezr and Neh, the four books being the work of one author (see articles); but since 1 and 2 Ch were principally a midrash on 1 and 2 S and 1 and 2 K, they were separated from Ezr and Neh, and not so early recognized as sacred. This supposition seems necessary to explain their position after Ezr and Neh, and last in the OT Canon. Esther was written to explain the feast of Purim, and received at once, doubtless, a sacred character from this fact and from its inspiring patriotism. Wherever the feast was regarded as a sacred festival, the story of its origin acquired a similar character, and since it commanded the feast, spoke with Divine authority. From this point of view Esther resembles the narratives of the Torah, which explain the origins of religious laws and customs.

Ps, Job, Pr, Ec, Ca, and La represent a different class of literature from the Law and the Prophets, since their contents appear almost entirely as the result of human observation, thought, and aspiration rather than as the product or record of Divine revelation. Hence, although partially of as early a date as some of the prophets, they did not command such immediate attention or force so readily the thought of Divine origin. The main cause leading to their acceptance, clearly seen in Ps, La, Pr, and Job, was their inspiring religious contents. These books are directly akin in their teachings to the Law and the Prophets. To the conscience they spoke with similar authority; they breathed likewise the very spirit of faith and penitence which the Law and the Prophets commanded, and thus they obtained recognition as a Divine word. With Canticles and Ecclesiastes such inspiration is less apparent. The former was probably originally a collection of songs sung at wedding festivities (see, however, article SONG OF SONGS). Highly valued, nevertheless, as a beautiful specimen of Hebrew poetry, and regarded also as a continuous composition, this collection was interpreted as setting forth the love of Jehovah for His people, and thus gained a sacred character, and then probably was assigned to Solomon as its author. Ec was probably received principally on the ground of its supposed Solomonic authorship. As in the case of the prophets, no record has been left of the collection and formal canonization of the Hagiographa. The earliest mention of them is in the Prologue to Sirach (written B.C. 132), where reference is made to 'the law, the prophets, and the other books.' Owing to the indefiniteness of the expression 'the other books,' it is uncertain whether this division was then complete, or whether some books or portions of books were added later. A decision in this regard must be determined by the date of the separate writings.* In 1 Mac 7^{16} (written about B.C. 100) Ps $79^{2f.}$ is formally cited as Scripture. In the NT the three divisions of the OT are recognized, closing with 1 and 2 Ch (Mt 23^{34}, Lk 24^{44}). The second (fourth) Bk. of Esdras as well as Josephus, probably near the close of the 1st cent. A.D., recognize our present OT Canon.

In 2 Es ninety-four divinely-revealed books are mentioned (14^{44}), of which seventy are esoteric (14^{46}). This leaves twenty-four representing the present OT according to a usual Jewish method of reckoning: the law, five; the prophets, eight; the Hagiographa, eleven. All double books, Ezr and Neh, and the minor prophets, are reckoned as one each. This standard way of reckoning the OT books gave rise to the name The Twenty-four (see article BIBLE). Josephus (c. Apion. i. 8) mentions twenty-two: five belonging to Moses, thirteen covering the interval from Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, and four containing hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life. This number is obtained by uniting Ru with Jg, and La with Jer, a method of reckoning also adopted by the Jews. Jerome mentions it (Prologus Galeatus, passage quoted in Wildeboer's Origin of the Canon of the OT, p. 80 f.). It has been questioned whether Josephus did not omit from his Canon the Bks. of Ca and Ec (Briggs' Introd. to the Study of Holy Scripture, vi. 4, 1899, p. 127 f.). The canonicity of these two books was under discussion at the Assemblies of Jamnia (OT JABNEH, a Jewish seat of learning after the fall of Jerusalem) about A.D. 90 and A.D. 118, and a decision was rendered in their favour, and this period is frequently given as marking the final close of the OT Canon. This discussion concerning Ca and Ec was probably in regard to their having been rightly received into the Canon, and not their first reception (Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT, § 8; Ryle, Canon of the OT, p. 187). It is a noteworthy fact, however, that these two books are nowhere quoted or directly referred to in the NT.

The impulse which led to the special setting apart of the writings as Scripture was probably the enhancing of sacred writings through the command of Antiochus Epiphanes for their destruction (1 Mac $1^{56f.}$), and the revival of Jewish patriotism in the Maccabæan period.*

ii. THE OT IN THE JEWISH CHURCH.—1. Preservation and Transmission.—(a) Pre-Massoretic period. The OT Scriptures were originally written upon rolls (cf. Ps $40^{8(7)}$, Jer $36^{14ff.}$ Ezk 2^{9}, Zec 5^{1}) of skin, or possibly in some instances of papyrus paper, and were thus handed down with probably much the same general care or lack of care with which they were preserved before canonization; for the variations of the Sam. and Greek Pentateuchs from the later uniform Heb. consonantal text show that the words and letters of the Scriptures were not at first regarded as especially sacred. Later, however, this idea was developed, and by the 1st cent. A.D. had so far progressed that Philo said that the Jews had never altered a word of what Moses wrote (quoted in Eusebius, Præp. ad Ev. viii. 6 fin.), and Josephus, that no one had been so bold as to add anything to them [the Scriptures], to take anything from them, or to make any change in them (c. Apion. i. 8); and in the Talmud, in the words of a Rabbi held to have lived in the 1st cent., the work of a copyist is called Divine, and a warning is given against dropping or adding a letter (Erubin 13*a*, Sota [cf. Jewish Quarterly Review, vol. i. p. 128]). Synchronous with this growth of reverence for the letter was necessarily an endeavour to have a uniform text for use in the synagogues and schools. Efforts in this direction culminated not long after the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), when in the refounding of Judaism a single consonantal text of the OT under the influence of Rabbi Akiba and his associates at Jamnia was adopted as authoritative, and all others disappeared. The principle of its adoption is unknown. A tradition relates that the text of the Law witnessed by the largest number of MSS was chosen (Jerus. Taanith, iv. 2). Probably the choice was determined by the traditional age or genealogy of a certain MS or school of MSS believed to represent best the original archetype. This finally adopted text cannot be regarded as entirely free from corruptions (slight in the Law but conspicuous, for example, in 1 and 2 S and Ezk). These corruptions arose from the inevitable mistakes of copyists, especially before the words and letters were severely reverenced; from the gradual change of the old Hebrew alphabet to the present square character —a change brought about between the period of Ezra and the 1st cent. B.C., and also from emendations made on dogmatic grounds.

* Dn is probably the latest of the Hagiographa. Some, however, place Est and Ec later (see articles), and also certain psalms (see art. PSALMS, and cf. Duhm, 'Die Psalmen,' in Kurzer Hdcomm. z. AT, p. xxi ff., and Cheyne, OP, 24 ff., 50, etc.).

* Budde holds that into the third Canon, that of the Hagiographa, were received all books of a religious character, of which the date was believed to go back as far as the prophetic period, that is, to the time of Ezra (art. 'OT Canon,' Encycl. Bib.). Josephus and Talmudic Judaism did believe that all the books received were of such an early date, but possibly the canonicity gave the date.

The substitution of bosheth (בשת) for bd'al (בעל) in proper names (see article ISHBOSHETH), and of bless (ברך) for curse (קלל) in 1 K $21^{10.13}$, illustrate these dogmatic changes (few in number) introduced to express an abhorrence of idolatry, or to avoid impious expressions toward God. (Cf. Geiger's Urschrift der Bibel, p. 257 ff.; Ginsburg, op. cit. p. 363 ff.; Siegfried (SBOT), Budde (Hdkomm.), Duhm (Kurzer Hdcomm.), contra, on Job 1^5). In line with these changes introduced into the text are probably the nekudim (נקודים) or fifteen extraordinary points indicating that some change should be made in the text (Ginsburg, op. cit. p. 318 ff.).

Within this period the Scriptures were divided into sections for synagogue usage (the Law and the Prophets, see, further, below), into paragraphs (פרשות) and verses (?).*

(b) Massoretic period, A.D. 600–800. After the canonization of the official consonantal text the greatest care was taken that it should be transmitted with complete accuracy; hence it was studied in respect to all its peculiarities, and these were noted down in a series of marginal notes called Massorah (מסורה). These notes embraced such particulars as calling attention to peculiar letters, giving the number of words or letters in each book, and the middle word or letter, and especially in noting variant readings (the Kerē), the latter being based upon the testimony of MSS, or required for religious reasons, or demanded by the connexion of the passage. All these features were a continuation and preservation of the work of the scribes. In addition to these notes, with the same end in view, and especially to render the OT readable to the people, vowel points fixing the traditional pronunciation were added to the consonantal text, and a system of punctuation (accents) extending to each word, marking off the verses. Thus finally appeared the present Massoretic text, of which the oldest MSS are of the 9th and 10th cents.† (For a description of the most ancient MSS, cf. Ginsburg, op. cit. pp. 469–778). All Hebrew MSS represent essentially this Massoretic text, which was first printed, the Psalms 1477, the Pentateuch 1482, both at Bologna, and the entire Heb. Bible at Soncino 1488. The most important subsequent printed Hebrew Bible is the edition of Jacob ben Chayim, with the Massorah, at the Bomberg Press, Venice, 1524–25. All subsequent editions, so far as they are Massoretic, follow this standard edition (Ginsburg, op. cit. p. 976) until we come to two recent attempts to furnish an exact Massoretic text, that of Baer and Delitzsch, Leipzig (not yet complete), and that of Christian D. Ginsburg, London, 1894. (For ancient versions of the OT see articles SEPTUAGINT, SYRIAC VERSIONS, TARGUM, and VULGATE; for modern textual criticism see below). [On printed editions of Hebrew text, cf. Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT, § 25; Ginsburg, op. cit. pp. 779–976; Weir, Short Hist. of the Heb. Text, p. 129 ff.].

2. Use or Regard and Interpretation.—(a) Early Rabbinic and Talmudic period, B.C. 400–A.D. 700. —The Law was always regarded in the Jewish Church as of a higher inspiration than the rest of the OT. It was believed to contain the original revelation of the Divine will, while the Prophets and the Writings only contained the same will further delivered; yet these latter were equally Holy Scriptures with the former, and were cited with the same formula (in the NT they are quoted as the Law, Ro 3^{19}, 1 Co 14^{21}, Jn 10^{34} 12^{34} 15^{25}). The early reverence for the Law is illustrated in Ps 1. 19^{7-14} 119 (Ps 1 may have been written in reference to the Deuteronomic law). Both the Law and the Prophets at the time of Christ, and probably from near the time of their canonization, were read each Sabbath day in the synagogue; the former in lessons arranged to complete the Law once in three years.* The lesson from the Prophets was not prescribed. The Hagiographa were not read regularly, except the five Megilloth† on the appropriate feast days. Schools were established (as early as the century before Christ) for the instruction of children in the Scriptures, especially the Law; and such study was finally held to precede every other duty (Weber, Die Jüdische Theologie, p. 30). The punctilious observance of the Law became the evidence both of patriotism and piety, and the constant endeavour was to apply the Law to every exigency of life, and to justify every cherished institution or notion by some word of the OT.

Such applications or interpretations or inquiries into the meaning of the Scriptures were called midrāshim (sing. midrāsh, מדרש from דרש 'to seek'). In them was sought not what a passage might declare according to the natural tenor of its words (although this method of interpretation was recognized, called peshaṭ (פשט), but the inferences that might be drawn by combination with other passages, by suggestion, or by allegory. Thus arose a great body of midrāshîm of two sorts, legal and homiletical; the former called Halākhôth (sing. halākhā, הלכה from הלך 'to go'), the latter Haggādôth (sing. haggādā, הגדה or אגדה from נגד Hiph. 'to tell'). These midrāshîm were handed down orally and not compiled in writing until the 2nd cent. A.D., when they appeared, especially the Halakhoth, in the Mishna (Talmud).‡ This oral tradition or interpretation was held to be necessary for an understanding and keeping of the Law, and was assumed to have been given in great part by Moses, and thus gradually, beginning as early as the time of Christ, if not a century or two before, it usurped the place of the Scriptures, becoming of equal, and, according to some, of superior authority (Weber, op. cit. § 22, p. 88 ff.).§ It is frequently referred to in the NT (Mt $15^{2.3.6}$, Mk $7^{3.5.8.9.13}$. Cf. Mt $23^{16ff.}$), and its character is well illustrated in the prohibited labours on the Sabbath. These, which are particularized only in a few instances in the OT, are amplified in the Mishna into thirty-nine prohibited labours, each of which is still further analyzed and discussed.

The prohibited labours were: (1) sowing, (2) ploughing, (3) reaping, (4) binding into sheaves, (5) threshing, (6) winnowing, (7) fruit cleaning, (8) grinding, (9) sifting, (10) kneading, (11) baking, (12) wool shearing, (13) bleaching, (14) combing, (15) dyeing, (16) spinning, (17) warping, (18) making two spindle-trees, (19) weaving two threads, (20) separating two threads (in the warp), (21) tying a knot, (22) untying a knot, (23) sewing on with two stitches, (24) tearing to sew together with two stitches, (25) hunting a deer, (26) killing, (27) skinning, (28) and salting it, (29) preparing its skin, (30) scraping off the hair, (31) cutting up the flesh, (32) writing two letters (characters), (33) erasing to write two letters, (34) building, (35) demolishing, (36) extinguishing (fire), (37) kindling (fire), (38) hammering, (39) carrying from one place to another (Tract Shabbath vii. 2). Each of these prohibitions was still further explained. On (21), (22), knots of camel-drivers and sailors are forbidden both to be tied and untied; but knots which may be untied with one hand were lawful. A woman might tie up a slit in her chemise, the bands of her hood, her girdle, her shoes and sandals; also the bands of leather bottles of wine or oil, or of a pot with meat. A rope might be tied in front of cattle that they might not escape; a bucket over a well with a girdle but not a rope. Rabbi Judah permits a rope also (Tract Shabbath xv. 2; cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. p. 96 ff.). In the Gemara or Rabbinical comments on the Mishna these refinements are still further refined.

* On the point of verses authorities differ. They are mentioned in the Talmud, but may be those of oral tradition (cf. JQR, vol. i. p. 224 f.; Briggs, op. cit. p. 174; W. H. Green, Gen. Introd. to the OT Text, N.Y., 1899, p. 148 f.).

† When a MS became old it was religiously destroyed, lest through its mutilation the sacred word might be violated. This explains the lack of earlier MSS.

* The Babylonian arrangement was for completion in one year, and this, later, came into general use.

† Ca, Ru, La, Ec, Est read respectively at the seasons of the Passover, Pentecost, Destruction of Jerusalem, Tabernacles, and Purim.

‡ Another view is that the Talmud, though compiled in the 2nd cent., continued to be orally transmitted until the 6th cent. (see art. TALMUD).

§ Its development and place is well compared with that of tradition in the Roman Catholic Church.

In the derivation of the Halakhoth were employed seven rules of interpretation laid down by Rabbi Hillel (contemporary of Herod the Great), and afterwards increased to thirteen by Rabbi Ishmael (2nd cent. A.D.).

These rules are: (1) That which is true of the easier or less is true of the greater or more difficult. An example, Nu 12^{14}. If from the sign of a human father's displeasure Miriam should be ashamed (shut up) seven days, then from leprosy, the sign of the Lord's displeasure, she should be shut out of the camp seven days. (2) A parallel passage or word supplements another: Lv 16^{29} enjoins on the Day of Atonement affliction of souls (תענו נפשתיכם 'ye shall afflict your souls'). In Dt 8^{3} ענה ('afflict') is used in reference to suffering from hunger, hence the affliction of the Day of Atonement is fasting. (3) A special provision of Scripture is to be generalized or applied in other analogous passages or cases. Dt 24^{6} forbids the mill or upper millstone to be taken as a pledge. This law is generalized by the Rabbis so that everything which is used for preparing food is forbidden to be taken as a pledge. (4–11) 'Eight rules with reference to the relation of genus to species by inclusion, exclusion, contrast, and their relation to a third term in the forms of Rabbinical logic.' (12) A word or passage is to be explained by the context. (13) Conflicting passages are to be reconciled by a third. Gn 1^{1} 'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth,' and 2^{4} 'In the day that the LORD made the earth and the heavens.' The question now arises, which did He make first? The answer, 'Both at once,' is found in Is 48^{13} 'Mine hand hath laid the foundations of the earth, and my right hand hath spread out the heavens.' For a full discussion and illustrations of these rules, see Mielziner's Introd. to the Talmud (1897), pp. 117–187. They are also given in Barclay's Talmud, 1878, pp. 40–44; Weber, Jüdische Theologie, 1897, pp. 108–118; cf. also Briggs, Study of Holy Scripture, 1899, p. 430 f.

The fault of Rabbinical exegesis arose not so much from these rules, many of which represent valid forms of reasoning, as from their application, and, indeed, they were not always supposed to be applied: the mere mention or suggestion of anything under discussion was sufficient to constitute a proof text. That a piece of earthenware large enough to stir a fire might be carried on the Sabbath day, was inferred from Is 30^{14b} 'So that there shall not be found among the pieces thereof a sherd to take fire from the hearth.' And that to anoint oneself on the Day of Atonement was equal to drinking, was inferred from Ps 109^{18} 'And it cometh like water on his body and oil into his bones' (Tract Shabbath c. viii. and c. ix., Bab. Talmud, Rodkinson, vol. i. pp. 157, 163).

The very language of Scripture was held to be different from ordinary human language, and hence particles of speech, such as adverbs and conjunctions, special constructions of syntax, the position of words, syllables, letters, and even forms of letters, were regarded as capable of a hidden meaning and of giving proof in support of tradition. This method was advocated by the celebrated Rabbi Akiba of the 2nd cent., and, although opposed by some of his contemporaries, yet won a place for itself in the Talmud.

Under this method such particles as אף, את, גם were held to extend a law, and אך and רק, מן to restrict it. את before יהוה in Dt 10^{20} extended the command to fear God, so that it included also wise men (Pesachim 22b). אך in Ex 31^{13} showed that the rigorous precepts of the Sabbath did not apply to cases where life was in danger (Yoma 85b—Mielziner, op. cit. p. 124 f.). Words were even interpreted according to the numerical value of the letters (Gematriä). The ways of dying are inferred to be 903 from 'issues of death' (תוצאות) mentioned in Ps 68^{21} (Berachoth 8a). Letters might also stand for words (Notarikon). From 'father of a multitude' (אב המון Gn 17^{5}) was drawn: 'Father, chosen, lovely, king, distinguished, faithful (אב בחור חביב מלך נותיק נאמן). The words with which Shimei cursed David are drawn from 'grievous' (נבזרצת 1 K 2^{8}), 'adulterer, Moabite, murderer, oppressor, abomination' (בואף מואבי רוצח צורר תועבה) (Shabbath xii. 5). Another device was change in the order of letters (Temoorah). Thus in Ps 21^{2} 'The king shall rejoice,' refers to the Messiah, by transposing ישמח ('he shall rejoice') into משיח ('Messiah'—Farrar, History of Interpretation, p. 102). A species of Temoorah called Atbash, the substitution of the last letter of the alphabet for the first, and so on, appears in Jer 25^{26} 51^{41}, where 'Sheshach' (ששך) is written for 'Babel' (בבל); cf. Jer 51^{1}. These and other similar methods of interpretation were carried to a great excess during the Middle Ages in the Kabbala, a Jewish system of Theosophy or sacred mysteries.

The homiletical midrāshîm or haggādôth differed from the Halākhôth in not being so much inferences from the text of Scripture as additions to the text. Many of the additions in 1 and 2 Ch, compared with the parallel narratives in 1 and 2 S and 1 and 2 K, illustrate their character, which is still further seen in the Targums (see art. TARGUM), and abundantly exemplified in the Jewish legends concerning the patriarchs and other OT worthies in the Talmud and also in later Jewish treatises.* Examples of Haggādôth appear in the NT in the names JANNES and JAMBRES (2 Ti 3^{8}), in the rock that followed them (1 Co 10^{4}), in the law given through angels (Ac 7^{53}, Gal 3^{19}, He 2^{2}), in the three and a half years of famine in the days of Elijah (Lk 4^{25}, Ja 5^{17}). These are all additions to the OT narratives. The apocryphal books of Enoch, Judith, and Tobit are all examples of Haggādôth. For Haggadic interpretation were given 32 rules, and it shared in all the fancifulness of Halakhic interpretation.

A species of Haggadic interpretation is the allegorical, frequently called the Hellenistic from its use among Greek-speaking Jews. Philo, the Alexandrian philosopher, an early contemporary of Christ, used this method. The OT Scriptures were to him as a believing Jew not simply an authoritative revelation of religious truth, but of all truth, and hence by means of allegory he deduced from them the doctrines of Greek philosophy, which he also ardently held. He excluded the literal sense, and developed his allegorical interpretation on definite principles, regarding the former as the body and the latter as the soul of Scripture.† (For his principles, cf. Siegfried, Philo von Alexandria, 1875, pp. 160–197; Briggs, op. cit. pp. 434–436). Allegory appears essentially in many Rabbinical interpretations. A New Test. example is Gal 4^{22-26}.

Jewish interpretation during the early Rabbinic and Talmudic period, while not devoid of a certain ethical and spiritual value, is thus seen to have contributed really nothing to an understanding of the historical meaning of the OT. That idea appears almost, if not exclusively, foreign to its purpose. Talmudic tradition claimed the interest of scholars, and had taken in popular estimate the place of the Scriptures.

(b) Later Rabbinical period.—In the 8th cent. arose a sect of Jews who rejected Talmudic tradition as a sacred authority, and held to the letter of the OT. Hence their views were called Karaism, or religion of the text. This movement, however, did not supplant orthodox or Talmudic Judaism, and yet it gave a great impulse to the study of the OT, which resulted eventually in real grammatical and exegetical works, and the period from 900–1500 has been called the golden age of Jewish interpretation. Commentaries were written upon the books of the OT. The pioneer in this movement was Saadia († 942), the Gaon or head of the Jewish school in Babylonia, who, to render the Scriptures accessible to the people, translated them with notes into Arabic, then widely spoken. He aimed to interpret the OT agreeably both to reason and Talmudic tradition, which latter he held to be equally of Divine origin with the Scriptures. In carrying out this aim his interpretations became arbitrary and forced. Followers of Saadia in the Babylonian schools pursued his idea of applying reason to OT interpretation, and one Samuel ben Chofni († 1034) went so far as to endeavour to explain miraculous events of OT as if they were natural (Grätz, Hist. Jews, iii. p. 259). Jewish learning, however, fell into decay in the East and became centred in Western Europe, especially in Spain. Here the Hebrew language was cultivated, and OT exegesis along with that of the Talmud. Ibn Janach († 1050) has been called the first rational Biblical critic. Although convinced of the divinity of Holy Writ, he held that it must be interpreted according to the rules of human usage (Grätz, iii. p. 269). Rashi († 1105), whose commentaries, held to be almost as sacred as the text, are printed in Rabbinical Bibles, explained the Scriptures according to the natural meaning of the words, but combined therewith Halakhic and Haggadic fancies. Ibn Ezra († 1167), while paying attention to tradition for the exposition of OT laws, cut loose both from Kabbalistic and Haggadic interpretations and followed the natural sense, and thereby raised OT exegesis to the dignity of a science. (Maimonides († 1204), the Jewish Aristotle and codifier of Biblical and Talmudic law, shows also the activity of the Jewish mind of this period). David Kimchi († 1255) and others followed in the same directions, and Jewish interpretation (save in representing the bias of a Jew compared with a Christian) merges into that of the common stream of Biblical scholarship, represented now in the modern critical movement.*

† Philo comments thus on Gn 2^{8}: 'Virtue is called a Paradise metaphorically, and the appropriate place for Paradise is Eden; and this means luxury: and the most appropriate field for virtue is peace, and ease, and joy, in which real luxury especially consists. Moreover, the plantation of this Paradise is represented as in the east; for right reason never sets, and is never extinguished, but it is its nature to be always rising. And as I imagine the rising sun fills the darkness of the air with light, so also does virtue when it has arisen in the soul irradiate its mist and dissipate its dense darkness. "And there," says Moses, "he placed the man whom He had formed"; for God being good, and having formed our race for virtue, as His work which was most akin to Himself, places the mind in virtue evidently in order, that it, like a good husband, may cultivate and attend to nothing else except virtue' (Allegories of the Sacred Laws, i. 4, C. D. Yonge's transl.).

iii. THE OT IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Textual Criticism.—Corresponding to the transmission and preservation of the OT in the Jewish Church, is textual criticism in the Christian Church. For early efforts in this direction, see articles SEPTUAGINT and VULGATE. Beyond the interest taken in such criticism by Origen and Jerome and by the Antiochene school, in their indirect manner, none appears until after the Reformation. The Reformers accepted the Massoretic Text of the Jews as infallibly inspired, and the Jewish tradition of its having been kept singularly pure since its origin. This notion in the post-Reformation period was intensified by some on dogmatic grounds into the theory of the Mosaic or Ezraic inspired origin of even the Hebrew vowel points (a view maintained by the elder Buxtorf († 1629) and the younger († 1669), and appearing in the Helvetic Confession (1675). This view was refuted by Cappellus († 1658), who, with Morinus (first a Protestant and then a Roman Catholic, † 1659), showed not only that the Hebrew vowel points were of a relatively late origin, but also that the present Massoretic text is open to emendation by the use of the ancient versions. This laid the foundation of modern textual criticism. Helpful apparatus for such work also then appeared in the polyglott Bibles of the 17th cent., especially Walton's London Polyglott. In the next century Hebrew MSS were collated by Kennicott († 1783), and de Rossi († 1831), whose labours showed that all Heb. MSS represent essentially the same text. Textual criticism is now carried forward by a comparison of the Heb. text with the ancient Versions, principally the LXX, and by subjective emendation. In the latter the parallelism of Heb. poetry discovered and thus applied by Lowth († 1787) and the rhythm or tones are of the greatest service. Along these lines scholars have worked slowly and cautiously, assisted by discoveries of the recensions of the LXX text and the work in its revision by Lagarde († 1891) and others (see art. SEPTUAGINT), and in some degree by further collation of Hebrew MSS by Strack (see art. TEXT OF OT).

Among the important contributions to OT textual criticism may be mentioned Olshausen's Emendationen z. AT, 1826, Beiträge zur Kritik Gn. 1870; Wellhausen, Text der Bücher Samuel., 1871; Cornill, Das Buch. Ezk. 1886 (almost an epoch-making work); Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of Samuel. Cf. also writings of Baethgen (on Ps), Bickell (on Job, Pr), Beer (on Job), Klostermann (on 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K), Wellh. (Kl. Proph.), Cheyne (Psalms, crit. notes), Ryssel (on Mic), and especially the SBOT, Heb. Text, the most elaborate and far-reaching attempt hitherto made in OT textual criticism. 2. USE AND INTERPRETATION.—(a) In the NT.—Both Christ and the apostles or writers of the NT held the current Jewish notions respecting the Divine authority and revelation of the OT. They refer to it in the words used by the Jews, 'the Scriptures' (Mt 22^{29}, Jn 5^{39}), 'the Holy Scriptures' (Ro 1^{2}), and speak of its authors being moved by the Holy Ghost (2 P 1^{21}), and appeal constantly to its statements as unquestioned authoritative truth. But at the same time they regarded the OT revelation as partial and incomplete. Christ not only placed His own authority above that of Rabbinic tradition (Mt $5^{21.\ 33.\ 43}$), but likewise speaks of the teaching of the Mosaic law as permitted owing to the hardness of men's hearts (Mt 19^{8}); and St. Paul regards the dispensation of the Law as decidedly inferior to that of the gospel: the Law was 'rudiments' (Gal 4^{3}), serving to establish a knowledge of sin. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews found the OT dispensation faulty and defective. But in all these views the disparagement of the OT is only relative. Christ never repudiates its revelation and authority. He puts His emphatic seal upon the OT, saying (according to Jn 10^{35}, unless our Lord is here arguing ad hominem) that its word cannot be broken, and that not one jot or tittle of the law shall pass away until all shall be fulfilled (Mt 5^{18}). St. Paul held likewise most strongly to its Divine origin and its nature, holy, just, and good (Ro $7^{12.\ 14}$), worthy of all honour, serving to usher in the gospel, a tutor to bring men to Christ (Gal 3^{24}). Likewise also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews recognized the full validity of the OT covenant, but in Christ and in His gospel the OT had a full and perfect realization. Thus the OT had its chief value, since the Ceremonial Law ceased to be binding, in foreshadowing Christ and the gospel. This led to the conception of the OT as a book of prophecy throughout. Wherever words and incidents suggested events in the life of Christ, or of the early Church, or where they seemed to confirm Christian doctrine, they were so applied. This application of the OT in the NT, although it is in the line of Jewish methods of interpretation, finds its justification in the prophetic elements of the OT. These look forward to a special manifestation of Jehovah, to a new relationship established between Jehovah and Israel and mankind, to a series of blessings—all of which may be summed up in the word redemption, and which likewise were coupled with the appearance of a royal person, an offspring of David. These OT outlooks, according to apostolic experience and observation, were realized in and through Christ; hence the NT view of the OT is fully justified; in details (according to historic exegesis) the applications of the OT in the NT may sometimes be unsound, but taken as a whole the NT method is right. The redemption experienced in Christ is a fulfilment of OT promises.

(b) In the Early Church, to A.D. 600.—The OT of the early Church was the LXX, used also, though not exclusively, by the NT writers. Hence some of the Church Fathers refer to the apocryphal books as though forming a part of the OT Scriptures, and certain of them came to be canonized by the Council of Trent (see art. APOCRYPHA in vol. i. p. 120 ff.). The NT view and treatment of the OT (see above) passed into the Christian Church.

An excess of disparagement of the OT appears in the Epistle of Barnabas (who regarded certain Jewish institutions as of evil origin) and in Gnostic heretical sects and that of Marcion (who entirely rejected the OT): a failure to recognize sufficiently the transient elements of the OT appeared in the views of the Ebionite and other Judaizing Christians.

The restraint exhibited in the NT interpretation of the OT was no longer continued. Jewish methods, especially the allegorical, prevailed to extravagance (although a literal interpretation along with an emphasis upon the authority of tradition, according to the Jewish notion, was advocated by Irenæus [† 202] and Tertullian [† c. 220] against allegorizing Gnostics). The OT was regarded not only as a book of prophecy foreshadowing Christ and the gospel, but even as a compendium of Christian doctrine, to be perceived through its spiritual or allegorical meaning. This view and method of interpretation, appearing in the earliest Christian writers (Justin Mart., † 148–165, and the Apost. Fathers generally), prevailed especially through the influence of Origen († c. 254), who disparaged the literal sense and held to a threefold meaning of Scripture, corresponding to the body, soul, and spirit (de Prin. IV. i. 11): the literal or grammatical meaning, the practical meaning or application, the mystical or spiritual, i.e. allegorical (cf. S. Davidson's Hermeneutics, p. 98 ff.). By the last he resolved all OT difficulties. Any statements, whether of history or law, appearing absurd, were rejected in their literal meaning, and received only in their spiritual or allegorical interpretation (de Prin. IV. i. 15, 16). Even so gifted a scholar as Jerome († 420), while he said in one instance that the allegorical interpreter is insane (Comm. Jer. 27, from Davidson), yet used this method, although not to the extent of rejecting the OT history as literally true. Augustine († 430), in spite of the sound rules of exegesis which he laid down in de Doc. Christ., expounded the OT allegorically, although not without reference to the historical meaning, which he defended, and whose difficulties he sought to remove (as, for example, the six days of Creation, which he resolved into æons, de Civ. Dei. xi. 6 f.). He also, however, divided interpretation into four kinds, historical, ætiological, analogical, and allegorical. Scriptural interpretation became after him entirely dominated (as it had been in a large degree before) by ecclesiastical tradition or doctrine. An exception to this allegorical treatment of the OT appeared in the school of Antioch, where, especially by Theodore of Mopsuestia († 429), the allegorizing of the OT was rejected, a difference in degree of revelation between the OT and the NT was recognized, and historical interpretations were given. (He exhibited the tendencies of modern Biblical criticism. All the Messianic psalms except three he interpreted as referring to Hezekiah and Zerubbabel. Canticles he rejected from the Canon. He found no Trinity in the OT). Owing to the Nestorian heresy this school of interpreters died out (Basil, † 379, also rejected the allegorical method).

(c) Middle Ages, 600–1500.—In this dark period the allegorical interpretation continued, assuming a mystical exposition for inner spiritual growth rather than instruction (cf. Bernhard of Clairvaux's [† 1153] sermons on Canticles). Ecclesiastical usages were found typified in the OT. But little original work on the OT appeared. Scholars contented themselves with copying the opinions of Church Fathers ('Catenæ'). Yet the true character of the OT began to be appreciated. Nicolaus de Lyra († 1340) in his Commentaries, from his regard to the literal meaning, although he insisted upon the fourfold meaning, made the beginning in the Christian Church of a new epoch in Bible study and of a school of natural exegesis. He was influenced by the Jewish interpreters of this period, especially Rashi.

(d) Period of the Reformation, 1500–1600.—The Reformers made an advance (1) in recognizing the Heb. OT as furnishing alone the authoritative inspired text, (2) in insisting upon the natural meaning and discarding the allegorical method of interpretation, and (3) in interpreting Scripture by Scripture instead of by tradition or ecclesiastical authority. They followed the NT writers in recognizing the unity of the OT and the NT, and also the difference between them. Here, however, they failed (Calvin, † 1564, less than others) to do justice to the OT stages of Divine revelation, and the stage separating the OT from the NT. NT beliefs were ascribed to OT persons. Calvin held that the Israelites 'in the land of Canaan beheld as in a mirror the future inheritance reserved for them in heaven' (Inst. II. ii. 1). The notion was common (expressed by Melanchthon, † 1560) that the doctrines of the Church began in Paradise, and continued through all time.

(e) Post-Reformation Period, 1600–1750.—This was the age of scholastic theology and of the rigid doctrine of verbal inspiration, making the OT infallible, not only in religious truth but in all allusions to other matters, such as those of natural science and history. In the Lutheran and Reformed Churches, also, the failure of the previous period to grasp fully the progress of Divine revelation was generally heightened. Proof texts of Christian doctrine were drawn almost as readily from the OT as the NT. The federal theology of Cocceius († 1669), in which were distinguished two covenants, one before the Fall and one after, and three dispensations, one before the Law, one under the Law, and one under the Gospel, marks an advance, furnishing the germ of a Biblical theology; yet the apprehension of the historic process of Divine revelation was so slight that Witsius († 1677), a follower of Cocceius, held in effect that the traditional exposition of the OT was revealed to our first parents and transmitted by them to their posterity (Œconomia Fœderum, iv. 1. 26). Such views extensively prevailed, and led to typical interpretations, differing little from the allegorical. An exception to this tendency, however, appeared in a few Arminian scholars, especially Grotius († 1645), who laid stress upon historical exegesis. English Puritan divines excelled also in the practical exposition of the OT during this period, and gave principles leading to a historic understanding of the OT, which unhappily were repressed (see Briggs, op. cit. pp. 459–469).

(f) Period of Modern Criticism, 1750–1900.—The Reformers receiving the Hebrew Scriptures from the Jews, accepted also their tradition concerning their character and authorship. The Pentateuch was written by Moses, the other books by the persons whose names they bear, or when this was excluded by their contents, as in 1 and 2 S, or the terminus ad quem, then by other OT persons contemporary with the events described (Jeremiah, for example, was regarded as the author of 1 and 2 K, and Ezra of 1 and 2 Ch). OT narratives were also regarded as entirely historical and without error. Only a slight questioning was heard at this time. Carlstadt († 1541) held that Moses did not write the Pentateuch; and Luther, perhaps in reference to the opinion of Carlstadt, said, 'What difference did it make if Moses had not written the Pentateuch?'. Calvin in his refusal to accept Joshua as the author of the Bk. of Joshua, and in his assignment of Ps 44 and 74 to the Maccabæan period, and the Bk. of Malachi to Ezra, showed the same spirit. But the interest of the Reformers was in other directions, in defending the authority of the Bible against that of ecclesiastical tradition, in framing Christian doctrine, and in developing Christian life. The post-Reformation period, with its high doctrine of inspiration, repressed critical study and freedom of thought within the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. The critical movement commenced among non-Protestant and unbelieving scholars. Peyrere († 1676) a French Catholic, Spinoza († 1677) the Jewish philosopher, and Hobbes († 1679) the English deist, all denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch on the ground of passages showing a later date (see art. HEXATEUCH). Masius († 1573), a Roman Catholic, had also recognized these passages as non-Mosaic. Simon († 1712), a Roman Catholic, sometimes called the father of OT Introduction, held to a diversity of authorship within the Pentateuch. The influence of English deists, who rejected the received Christian views respecting the inspiration of the OT and its history, morality, and prophecy, was also felt in Germany. But modern OT study or criticism is really a phase of the intellectual movement of the 18th cent., which has created modern science in all departments of learning. Under this movement the OT began to be studied as literature. Herder († 1803) was a pioneer in this direction, to which also the discoveries of Bishop Lowth in regard to the structure of Hebrew poetry contributed (see above). Semler († 1791) introduced historical interpretation, and Astruc († 1766) in distinguishing the documents in Genesis by their use of the Divine names made a beginning of the scientific investigation of the Pentateuch. But more than all others, Eichhorn († 1827), who, independently of Astruc, discovered the documents in Gn, exerted a wide influence in favour of the literary study of the OT. His results in analysis are remarkably near those received at the present time. He introduced the term 'Higher Criticism,' saying—

'I am obliged to give the most pains to a hitherto entirely unworked field, the investigation of the internal condition of the particular writings of the OT by the help of the Higher Criticism (a new name to no humanist).'—*Eml.*², 1757, Preface.

Geddes († 1802), a Scotchman and Rom. Catholic, held that the Pentateuch was a compilation of documents, pre-Mosaic, Mosaic, and post-Mosaic—the fragmentary hypothesis, yet a real advance; so also Vater († 1826) and Hartmann († 1838). The Bk. of Joshua was recognized as a part of the Pentateuch, hence the notion of the Hexateuch. The fragmentary hypothesis contradicting the evident unity of the Hexateuch was shown by Ewald († 1875) to be untenable, and the supplementary took its place, presented in various forms by de Wette († 1849), Bleek († 1859), Stähelin († 1875), Knobel († 1863), and others. The general agreement was that the Hexateuch was composed of the Elohistic, the oldest document, written by a priest of the 11th or 10th cent. B.C., containing also genuine Mosaic legislation, supplemented by the Jehovistic writer and then again by the author of Dt (of the 7th cent. B.C.), who possibly was the compiler of the Hexateuch. Hupfeld († 1866) showed that the Elohistic source was not a unity, but made up of a priestly legal part P and a narrative prophetic part E (Ilgen, † 1834, had pointed this out, but his discovery had been disregarded). Nöldeke then showed that J and E had existed independently, and had been united later into JE, before their union with P and D. Graf († 1869), Kuenen († 1891), and Wellhausen have especially contributed to the final solution of this problem, showing that the earliest documents of the Hexateuch are the prophetic ones J and E, resembling in certain features the early prophets Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, and that D comes next, belonging to the reign of Josiah, and P, the great priestly document containing most of the Mosaic legislation (Lv and related parts of Ex and Nu), comes last in the exilic or post-exilic period (for details see above, and art. HEXATEUCH). Thus the conception of the order of the development of Israel's religion has been revolutionized: the completed Levitical code coming at the end instead of the beginning of the period extending from Moses to Ezra.

Conclusions, departing almost as widely from previous Jewish and Christian views, have been reached within this same period concerning other books of the OT. The Bk. of Isaiah has been resolved into an anthology of prophecies of various dates (for history of this criticism see article ISAIAH, IV.), that of Daniel placed in the Maccabæan period, Jg and 1 and 2 S shown to be compilations of narratives not always harmonious with each other (see articles on all these books). The conception of the Canon also has very much changed. The post-Reformation view was essentially that of Josephus: each book written by a recognized inspired man, and all collected by Ezra or at his time (c. Apion. i. 8). For modern view see above, and article OT CANON.

The conception of the OT history has also been revolutionized. Until the period of modern criticism, the narratives of the OT had generally been received as records of real history. But according to the new view they contain myths and legends, and give a partially erroneous conception of the growth of Israel's religion, whose beginnings are not found in direct Divine communications to primitive mankind and the patriarchs, but in the common primitive religion of the Semitic peoples, whence by revelation through Moses and the prophets, the legal or ecclesiastical stage, represented in the middle books of the Pentateuch, was reached about the time of Ezra. The OT thus can no longer be regarded as an infallible or, indeed, entirely trustworthy guide in science and history. In these particulars it reflects the limitations of its times. (Historical criticism showing the errors of the OT narratives has kept pace with the higher criticism and formed a part of it. Among noteworthy contributors to this were de Wette and Colenso († 1883), and in constructive work Kittel, Stade, and Wellhausen).

A similar limitation appears also in the moral and religious teachings of the OT. (A certain limitation is recognized in the NT, and has always been more or less clearly discerned in the Christian Church. Criticism emphasizes a Pauline conception also in making prophetic religion antecedent to the Law). The new science of OT theology, giving a historical exhibition of the development of the religion contained in the OT, has also arisen, being first clearly presented in 1789 by Gabler († 1826), and carried forward by G. L. Bauer († 1806); de Wette († 1849); von Cölln († 1833); Vatke († 1882), who in a neglected work (1835) put the Prophets and the Law in their true relation, thus anticipating more recent results; Ewald († 1875), Schultz, Smend, and others.

These critical conclusions were controverted from the first by Carpzov († 1767), Michaelis († 1791), Hävernick († 1845), Hengstenberg († 1869), Keil († 1888), and others in Germany, and they received little favour in Great Britain and America until within recent years (especially through the influence of A. B. Davidson, W. R. Smith († 1894), S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs).

iv. THE PERMANENT RELIGIOUS VALUE OF THE OT resides in the simplicity of its revelation and the freshness of its expression of primary and universal religious truths and experiences. (1) God is revealed not as a philosophical abstraction but as a concrete Personality, transcendent and yet thoroughly approachable and ready to enter into the closest fellowship and communion with men, and in loving care, compassion, and forgiveness meeting their deepest religious wants and needs. The OT introduces God 'the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth,' directly into human life. (2) Man in his true experiential relation to God is likewise described in the careers of the patriarchs and other heroes and worthies of Israel, and in the history of Israel itself. Sin is portrayed, and also return and obedience. Moral precepts and laws of conduct are abundantly given, especially in reference to national and social life. (3) The OT is also a book of hope, containing the triumphant note of redemption which is truly fulfilled in and through Christ, and the NT believer always finds Christ and His gospel organically and potentially enshrined in the OT. Modern criticism has not impaired these permanent elements. Their authority, which is that of truth, still remains, and the OT has been transmuted from a mechanical record of doctrines and of forced Divine manifestations into a book of genuine historic life, an epic of salvation, showing the living process of God's revelation through Israel.

Literature.

i. DEFINITION OF THE TERM 'CANON.'—The word 'Canon' may be roughly defined as the list of books authoritatively declared to be Holy Scripture. Speaking a priori, the authority by which they are so declared may differ in degree and even in kind. It may be, for example, that of a Church Council having power to lay down the law for the whole Church, or it may be the expression of an enlightened public opinion, or, again, the opinion of a few leading scholars, whose views have gradually found general acceptance. For authoritatively declared it might therefore be deemed sufficient to substitute universally received; but it is preferable to start with a wider definition, leaving the nature of the authority to be decided in each case by the evidence. The term Holy Scripture suggests—(1) in some peculiar sense a Divine origin, (2) in connexion with this a special sanctity distinguishing Scripture from all other books, (3) reading for devotion or edification in public worship, (4) quotations for the purpose of establishing doctrine or argument. But only the first, or perhaps we should say the first two, and even these with some necessary modification, can be considered as belonging to the necessary connotation of the idea; the second, third, and fourth are obviously the result of the first, and all are to some extent questions of degree. In the Jewish Church several of the books which are unquestionably canonical are not read even now, and have never been read, in public worship, namely Chronicles, Job, Proverbs, Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. On the other hand, in the English Church, not to mention the Protestant communities, parts of several books are read in public worship, such as Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch, which are not received as canonical; whereas the canonical Song of Songs is altogether omitted. Again, a difference of degree, and even to some extent of kind, in the inspiration of the various books has been generally admitted; while, on the other hand, many writers have recognized that we have no right to deny inspiration altogether to books outside the Canon. This was admitted even by Jewish writers, as we may see from the following quotation from the Talmud: 'According to R. Judah, Samuel said, "Esther does not defile the hands" [i.e. is not canonical; see below]. Could Samuel have meant by this that the Bk. of Esther was not the work of the Holy Spirit? No, he meant that it was produced by the Holy Spirit, but only for reading, not as Holy Scripture' (Bab. Meg. 7*a*, quoted by Buhl, Eng. tr. p. 31). Here we see that it might be supposed that a Jewish Rabbi regarded a book as inspired in the highest sense, and yet as not a part of Holy Scripture. The subject of Inspiration goes far beyond our present inquiry; it will be enough here to state that from the earliest times, among both Jews and Christians, it entered quite as largely as it does now into the idea of Holy Scripture; whereas the holiness of Scripture was felt even more keenly by the Jews of the early Christian era than among the Christians of the present day.

With the Jews, as we might have expected, the thought of the holiness of Scripture took a very material form. We see this in the jealousy with which they regarded the slightest alteration in the text, and in the highly fanciful symbolical meanings that came to be attached to what were originally (many of them) the purely accidental idiosyncrasies of a single Hebrew MS. The formal establishment of this as the authorized text is probably the work of the school of Jamnia in the early part of the 2nd cent. A.D. But the spirit which gave rise to it was certainly much older, and is probably referred to by our Lord in Mt 5^{18}. The words 'one jot or one tittle' have much more point if they express the spiritual counterpart to the exact literalism of the Rabbis of His day, which made the alteration of the smallest letter or particle of a letter a sin. This materialistic view of the sanctity of Scripture appears even more curiously in the definition of what we should call canonical books as those which 'defile the hands,' the idea being that the desecration of a holy thing, as by touch, required expiation much in the same manner as material defilement. To avoid this 'defilement' the books which were read in the synagogue were covered. Thus we hear that at a certain period, before the canonicity of Esther was fairly established, wrappings of the rolls of that book were declared by certain teachers to be unnecessary (Bab. Sanh. 100*a*, referred to by Buhl, p. 31).

ii. SCOPE OF THE SUBJECT.—We have, then, to consider what books belong or should belong to the Canon of the OT in the sense already explained, and if possible when and how they received ecclesiastical sanction. The plan proposed is first to trace the evidence backwards, and afterwards to reconstruct, as far as the evidence allows, a connected history of the Canon.

iii. CANON OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES AND THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH COMPARED.—There is at the outset this difficulty, that Christians are not at the present day agreed, at least technically, as to the extent of the Canon. In the Western Church we meet with this broad distinction, that, while all Reformed Churches accept as strictly canonical only the books found in our ordinary English Bibles, the Roman Catholic Church includes in its Canon those also which are commonly known as the Apocryphal Books. Not only so, but at the Council of Trent she laid special stress on the fact that all the canonical books, as she considered them, were equally inspired: 'Sacrosancta Oecumenica et Generalis Tridentina Synodus . . . orthodoxorum Patrum exempla secuta, omnes libros tam veteris quam novi Testamenti, cum utriusque unus Deus sit auctor . . . pari pietatis affectu ac reverentiâ suscipit ac veneratur.' Then follows a list of books, including the Apocrypha of OT, and, finally, an anathema levelled against those who refuse to accept all those books in their integrity as they were contained in the Vulgate (Concil. Trident. Sess. iv. Decr. 8). The Roman Catholic writers of the day did, however, recognize some sort of difference in fact between Apocryphal and other books, and sometimes called the former deutero-canonical. But this term has been understood as intended to express the fact that the canonicity of these books was fully accepted at a later time than the proto-canonical in spite of some doubt and hesitation about them, not to imply a smaller degree of authority or inspiration (see authorities quoted in Sanday, Inspiration, v. note B). The English Church, in common with other of the Reformed Churches, gives a sort of formal but limited sanction to the Apocrypha, 'and the other bookes (as Hierome sayth) the Churche doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine' (Art. vi.). The Belgic Confession makes a somewhat similar statement: 'Differentiam porro constituimus inter libros istos sacros et eos quos Apocryphos vocant: utpote quod Apocryphi legi quidem in Ecclesiâ possint, et fas sit ex illis eatenus etiam sumere documenta, quatenus cum libris canonicis consonant; at nequaquam ea est ipsorum auctoritas et firmitas ut ex illorum testimonio aliquod dogma de fide et religione Christianâ certo constitui possit' [Art. vi., quoted in Harold Browne, Expos. Artt., Art. vi. sec. iii.; see also, on the relation of the Reformed Churches to the Apocrypha, Buhl, pp. 69, 70]. On the other hand, the Westminster Confession, (i. 3) would have none of the Apocrypha, but declared emphatically that they were 'of no authority to the Church of God, nor to be otherwise proved or made use of than any other human writings.'

The grounds upon which the Reformed Churches differed from the Roman Catholic Church in the value attached to the Apocrypha, were partly historical and literary and partly doctrinal. It seemed right to limit the books of the OT to those which had been accepted by the Jews and formed part of the Hebrew Bible, and had also been accepted by some of the greatest of the Fathers, notably Origen, Athanasius, and Jerome; whereas the Apocrypha had been clearly distinguished by them from the Canon, and placed upon a lower level. The Reformers were also influenced undoubtedly by the fact that quotations from the Apocrypha were frequently used by Roman Catholic writers in support of the peculiar doctrines of their Church, such as Purgatory (Wis $3^{5.6}$), and the meritorious value of good works (To 4^{10} 12^{9}, Sir 3^{30} $29^{11.12}$).

We have, then, to take account of what may be called a larger and a smaller Canon. The larger included most of those books which were comprised in the Greek LXX and afterwards the Latin Vulgate, and became the Bible of the Mediæval Church; the latter was confined to the Books of the Hebrew Bible, and was equivalent to our Old Testament. It is with the latter that we have directly most to do.

iv. JEWISH ORIGIN OF OT CANON.—The early Christians derived their OT from the Jewish Church. By this is not meant that when the first Christians broke off from Judaism they took with them a well-defined Bible, but that questions of canonicity were referred, as a matter of course, to Jewish opinion. So little idea had the early Christian Church of deciding for itself what books were or were not canonical, that we actually find a bishop (Melito of Sardis, c. 170 A.D.) unable to specify the contents of the OT until he had travelled to the country where the sacred books had originated, and there made special inquiries (see Euseb. HE iv. 26). Even so his list is not absolutely complete, as it omits Esther. Whether this is merely a slip on his own or his informer's part, or is intentional, it is difficult to say. It is not, of course, to be supposed that Melito was unacquainted with the OT books which he enumerates. They were all to be found in the LXX, and Melito gives them their familiar Greek names as found in that version. The important fact is, that among the Bible books, in this wider sense of the Bible, he considered those to be of special value, or as we should say canonical, which he ascertained to be received among the Jews. That the early Christian Church fully recognized that their OT Canon was thus derived, is shown even more explicitly by the language of Origen nearly a century later, c. 250, in which he speaks of 'the Books of the Covenant, as the Hebrews have handed them down' (τὰς ἐνδιαθήκους βίβλους ὡς Ἑβραῖοι παραδιδόασιν); and after giving the Canon, only accidentally incomplete,* speaks of 'the Maccabees' as outside of them (ἔξω δὲ τούτων ἐστὶ τὰ Μακκαβαϊκὰ ἅπερ ἐπιγέγραπται Σαρβηθ Σαβαναέλ, Euseb. HE vi. 25). That 'the Maccabees' are, like the other books, given their Hebrew title, meaning probably 'Prince of the House of the Sons of God,'* is important as showing that the first book at least was still extant in Hebrew, and that Origen did not accept as canonical all sacred books in that language. The word ἐνδιαθήκους suggests that διαθήκη, 'covenant' (our 'Testament'), was already beginning to be applied technically to the OT collection. This testimony is all the more remarkable because Origen not only made use of the 'external books' himself, but defended the Greek additions to Daniel against Julius Africanus. Similarly Jerome speaks of the books recognized among the Hebrews (apud Hebræos) and of those outside as having their proper place among the Apocrypha: 'Ut scire valeamus quicquid extra hos est, inter ἀπόκρυφα esse ponendum' (Præfat. in libr. Sam. et Mal., quoted by Ryle, Canon, Exc. D. xiii. etc.).

v. Divisions of Hebrew Bible—their Significance.—The inquiry therefore resolves itself into that concerning the reception of the sacred books by the Jewish Church. When and how were certain of the sacred books of the Jews received as canonical and the rest excluded? One fact is of great importance if we would understand aright the history of the Canon, that we have to deal not with one, but with three groups of books. These are not the result of a later subdivision of the larger 'Divine Library' for convenience' sake into three smaller parts, but, with the probable exception of one book (Joshua), they were with the Jews always distinct, and were regarded with some difference of feeling. In Talmudic Literature they are compared respectively, in point of sanctity, with the Holy of Holies, the Holy Place, and the Temple Court. The three divisions are—(1) The Law (תּוֹרָה Torah), comprising the Pentateuch or so called 'Five Books of Moses.' (2) The Prophets (נְבִיאִים), comprising both the historical books, Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings—called 'the Former Prophets'; and the prophetical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the book of the twelve Minor Prophets—called 'the Latter Prophets.† (3) The Writings (כְּתוּבִים Kĕthûbhîm = Gr. ἁγιόγραφα, Hagiographa = Holy Writings), by which is probably meant the rest of the Scriptures, those which do not come under either of the other heads. The Historical books were included under the Prophets, probably not under the belief that they were necessarily all written by well-known prophets, Samuel, Nathan, Isaiah, etc., but as written under prophetic inspiration. In this article the groups will be called the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa. It will be obvious at once that they are not the result of a division according to subject-matter. The Prophetico-historical books do not include Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The prophet Daniel (so expressly called in NT, Mt 24^{15}) is placed not in the second, but in the third group. This last contains, in fact, books of the most heterogeneous sorts, poetry, ethics, philosophy, prophecy, etc., and its name is of the most general character. It would, strictly speaking, apply to all the groups, and its application to this exclusively can be explained only by the history of its inclusion in the Canon.

vi. Evidence for the Jewish Canon.—At what period was the Canon of OT completed? or can we indeed settle upon any exact date by which we can say that it was absolutely fixed?

(a) The Baba Bathra.—The difficulty in answering this question is in part the difficulty of assigning an exact date to a literary document, and in part that of determining what degree of objection or hesitation about a book should prevent our considering it as at the time part of the Canon. The facts are these: In the Talmudic treatise called Baba Bathra there is an extract (baraitha) from the Mishna which gives a virtually complete list of the books of the OT as we now know it.* The Mishna was committed to writing, so it is believed, not long before A.D. 200. On the other hand, Buhl (p. 25) refers to a Talmudic passage to prove that even after this a scholar was found to deny the canonicity of the Bk. of Esther. Whether the omission of this book, or doubts expressed about it by certain Fathers, Melito, Athanasius, Gregory Nazianzen, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Amphilochius, were derived from Jewish objectors, or were the result of an independent judgment, cannot be positively determined. The omission by Melito may well be a slip (see Buhl, p. 58).

(b) Talmudic extracts concerning disputed books, mainly 2nd cent. The evidence so far shows that by the end of the 2nd cent. at latest the Canon was virtually settled, but that it was even then no unheard of thing to doubt the canonicity of a canonical book. As we go back through the 2nd cent., we find such doubts becoming more frequent. There are several references in the Talmud to rabbinical teachers who rejected or disputed certain books. With the exception of Ezekiel, and perhaps Jonah also (see Ryle, pp. 193, 194), what Ryle has happily called the ἀντιλεγόμενα of OT seem to have been confined to the Hagiographa, and included Proverbs, Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs, but especially the last two. The position taken up by these early Biblical critics is in many respects very interesting. They never appeal to an ancient tradition either for or against a book; nor do they, with probably a few exceptions, discuss the question of authorship. And yet it is almost certain that both these considerations must have influenced the formation of the Canon. The objections raised suggest rather that the canonicity of the books was generally admitted—but that in the opinion of the Rabbis quoted it was liable to objection. These objections were usually based on the ground of some supposed defects in the books themselves. They depended, in short, on internal, never on external, evidence. Thus Ec 8^{15} seemed to contradict 2^{2}, and 4^{2} seemed to contradict 9^{4}. Proverbs was by some withdrawn, in common with the Song of Songs, because they spoke in parables, —an interesting proof of the interpretation put upon the latter, and, in point of fact, probably the cause of its recognition as canonical. The far more serious objection was raised to Ecclesiastes, that it betrayed an Epicurean tinge, and tended to favour the Sadducean scepticism. Thus 1^{3} seemed to suggest a denial of the future state; 11^{7} encouraged worldly pleasure, and, moreover, it contradicted the stern precepts of Nu 15^{39}. On this book we learn that there was, or had been, a difference of opinion between the rival schools of Hillel and Shammai, the former accepting, the latter rejecting, the book. Even Ezekiel was at one time objected to on the ground that some of the provisions of the concluding chapters were contrary to those of the Levitical law. Some of these objections and discussions, interesting as showing the extreme views of inspiration then current, belong probably to an earlier date than the 2nd cent. A.D., but we must discount to some extent the common tendency of tradition to ascribe stories and sayings to well-known men, especially those of an earlier period. There is sufficient evidence to show that such discussions were by no means uncommon after the Council of Jamnia, to which we must next refer. They show that during the 2nd cent. A.D. several books, of the Hagiographa especially, were still the subject of free and frequent discussion. This was not inconsistent with their being in a general way recognized as canonical. But such a qualified canonicity, if we may call it so, is hardly the same conception as we find at a later date. It was at this time neither irreverent nor disloyal to dispute a canonical book (see Ryle, ch. x.).

* Seven other interpretations are given by Ryle, Canon of OT, p. 185.

† These phrases probably refer to their position in the Hebrew Bible, not to a supposed priority or posteriority of date.

* Baba Bathra, fol. 14*b*-15*a*, quoted in Ryle, Exc. B. The separate books of the Pentateuch are not mentioned, nor more than four of the Minor Prophets; but the former are, of course, implied by the 'Torah' and the latter by 'the Twelve.'

(c) Council of Jamnia.—It may be asked, When was this qualified canonicity conferred? Both the Midrash and the Talmud point very definitely to the close of the 1st cent. A.D. In the former a saying of R. Simeon ben-Azai is quoted: 'I have heard from the 72 elders, on the day when they gave R. Eleazar the presidency of the school (of Jamnia), that the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes defile the hands. R. Akiba [Grätz, R. Jacob] said, "God forbid that any one in Israel should doubt that the Song of Songs defiles the hands; the whole world does not outweigh the day in which Israel received the Song of Songs. All the Kethubhim are holy, but the Song of Songs is the holiest. If they have contested, it was with reference to Ecclesiastes." But R. Johanan ben-Jeshua, R. Akiba's brother-in-law, said, "As R. Simeon ben-Azai has laid it down, so they disputed, and so they decided"' (Meg. Jadaim iii. 5, quoted in Buhl, p. 29). The same tradition with some variety of detail is given also in Bab. Meg. 7*a*. These extracts refer to a council, or perhaps we should call it a debate, at Jamnia, held, it is said, about A.D. 90. As the discussion from which the above quotation is taken is prefaced by the statement, 'All holy scriptures defile the hands, even Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes defile them,' we may naturally infer that all the disputed books, either tacitly or expressly, received the imprimatur of the council. After the fall of Jerusalem, Jamnia became the centre of Palestinian Judaism. The zeal and enthusiasm which had been shown by the Jews in their sacrificial system now seems to have found a new focus in sacred literature (see Grätz, Hist. Jews, II. ch. xiii.). The decisions of this school, if not considered absolutely binding, must at least have had a very strong and far-reaching influence on Jewish opinion. If it is an exaggeration to say that the Canon of the OT was finally settled at the Council of Jamnia, it certainly goes a long way towards the truth.

(d) The Second Book of Esdras, c. 90 A.D.—This tradition, in itself so probable, is confirmed, as far as it goes, by a passage in the Apocalyptic Fourth Book of Esdras (2 Es 14^{44-46}), in which, according to the text of the Oriental versions,* of the 94 sacred books miraculously written out at Ezra's quotation, 70 were to be kept secret, the remaining 24 divulged. The number 24 corresponds to that of the canonical books as ordinarily reckoned by the Jews. The writer of this apocryphal work must be understood, therefore, as claiming that all the 24 canonical books were written out at Ezra's dictation. This book is, on internal evidence, ascribed to the age of Domitian, and would therefore be about contemporary with the Council of Jamnia. The writer's object in setting down what is probably a pure fiction of his own, is to give credit to his work, as one of the 70 secret books; as far as the canonical books are concerned, it may be regarded as merely the echo of received opinion.

(e) Josephus, c. 90 A.D.—Of still greater importance is the practically contemporary evidence of Josephus: 'For there are not with us myriads of books discordant and discrepant, but only two and twenty, comprising the history of all time, which are justly accredited (om. θεῖα, Heinichen in Euseb. III. x.). And of these, five are the books of Moses, which comprise the laws and the tradition of man's origin up to the time of Moses' death. This period is little less than 300 years. From the death of Moses until that of Artaxerxes, who was king of the Persians after Xerxes, the prophets who succeeded Moses wrote the events of their times in 13 books. The remaining 4 books contain hymns to God and counsels of life for men. From the time of Artaxerxes up to our own everything has been recorded, but the records have not been accounted equally worthy of credit with those written before them, because the exact succession of prophets ceased' (c. Ap. i. 8, quoted in Euseb. HE III. x.). Here we find not only a description of books, but a theory of canonicity. Those books could alone be accounted Scripture which preceded the death of Artaxerxes (i.e. Xerxes, see Ryle, pp. 161, 162 n.), at which time the prophetic gift ceased. Later books were, therefore, of less esteem, though they might, as, e.g., 1 Mac, have a historical value. The very existence of such a theory seems to imply that the fact of canonicity itself was regarded by Josephus as indisputable, and this is confirmed by his further statement: 'And we give plain proof of our attitude towards our own Scriptures: for though so long a time has passed, no one has dared either to add or change anything, but all Jews are naturally disposed from their very birth to consider them the decrees of God, to abide by them, and gladly to die, if need be, on their behalf' (ib.). This cannot, of course, in the face of the literary criticism of the Bible, be accepted as a historical statement of fact; but did it express the current opinion among the Jews of the time of Josephus, and, if so, how is it to be reconciled with the traditions of the Council of Jamnia, and still more with the disputations of certain Rabbis mentioned above?

But there are two other questions which it may be well to answer first. How comes Josephus to speak of 22 books instead of 24? and what are the books which he means? Three explanations of the number 22 have been given. (1) That of Grätz, that Josephus did not include Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs, the two books which, according to the account preserved in Jadaim, were the chief subject of dispute at the Council of Jamnia. Grätz maintains that both these books were accepted by the school of Hillel, and rejected by that of Shammai, and that the main object of the council was to reconcile the two schools, so that the question of the Canon was really a secondary consideration. But, had this been the case, Josephus as a Pharisee would almost certainly have followed the school of Hillel and accepted these books. In any case it is not easy to understand why he should so unhesitatingly have rejected books which were soon afterwards, if indeed it was afterwards, accepted by the majority. (2) A more common hypothesis is that Josephus included Ruth in the Bk. of Judges, and Lamentations in that of Jeremiah, with the express intention of making the number of the books agree for symbolical reasons with that of the Hebrew alphabet. The symbolical treatment of the number is in fact common enough, but Josephus himself makes no such use of it, and it seems, as far as we know, to be confined to Christian writers. Conspicuous instances are found in Origen (in Euseb. HE vi. 25) and Jerome (Præf. Sam. et Mal.). The latter, curiously enough, finds alternative symbolisms for the more ordinary number 24, and even for 27, the latter number being got by dividing the 5 double books—Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, Jeremiah-Lamentations—and comparing the whole with the numbers of the alphabet plus the 5 final consonants. In this arrangement it is to be noticed, as Ryle very justly points out (Canon, p. 220), that Jerome conveniently ignores the fact that Judges-Ruth was also a double book, and follows the Greek arrangement in dividing the first three books. Their division in the Hebrew Bible is of much later date. It is clear, therefore, that this, at any rate, was no traditional Jewish explanation, but merely the play of Jerome's own fancy. (3) A third explanation is that Josephus in including Ruth in Judges and Lamentations in Jeremiah was so far following the arrangement of the books in the LXX, as we know it. In any case his arrangement of books appears to be peculiar, and is based entirely upon the subject-matter. Apart from any question arising from the inclusion or exclusion of Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs, it is evident that Daniel must be included among the prophetico-historical books, an arrangement quite at variance with Hebrew custom. The descriptions, too, are somewhat vague. Even if Song of Songs is not to be included among 'hymns to God and counsels of life for men,' it is clear that the Bk. of Isaiah must be intended as among the prophets who wrote the history of their own times. What makes it impossible to decide this question absolutely is that we really do not know with any certainty what was the arrangement of the LXX at this date, nor do we even know whether the books were united as yet in one complete collection. It is at least as probable that it existed in the form of separate collections. Again there is some reason to suppose that the LXX did not stand alone in the combination of Ruth with Judges and Lamentations with Jeremiah. In this connexion hardly sufficient weight seems to have been generally given to the express statements of Origen. In his enumeration of Scripture, he describes Judges as Κριταί, Ρούθ, παρ' αὐτοῖς ἐν ἑνί, Σαφαρείμ, and Jeremiah as Ἱερεμίας σὺν Θρήνοις καὶ τῇ ἐπιστολῇ ἐν ἑνί, Ἱερεμία (in Euseb. vi. 25). This may possibly mean that in his Hebrew copy of the Bible the name 'Judges' included Ruth, and the name 'Jeremiah' both Lamentations and the Epistle (Bar 6).* Such a rearrangement of the Hebrew books is of importance as showing that in the view of Josephus, and those who followed the same arrangement, the Hagiographa were quite as definitely Scripture as the rest.

* The Latin MSS have 204, 84, 974. 904 being, according to Ryle, the best attested reading, but the Oriental VSS agree in 94 (see Ryle, p. 285). This latter reading has also intrinsic probability in its favour, yet not so obviously as to have been a cause of corruption.

When we compare the strong statements made by Josephus as to a Canon long and unalterably fixed with the doubts concerning certain books prevalent during the 1st and 2nd cents. A.D., it seems that we have before us utterly irreconcilable evidence, and that we have no choice but to accept one alternative and reject the other. And this is what writers upon the Canon seem very frequently to have done. But studying the question quite impartially, it is difficult to see what ground there should be for absolute falsification on either side. In fact the evidence of the Council of Jamnia, as far as it goes, is too circumstantial to admit of such a supposition. On the other hand, when we examine the language of Josephus critically, there are two facts that we feel compelled to bear in mind: (1) That he was fond of rhetorical statements, which have an evident flavour of Oriental hyperbole. He could not resist the temptation to make the most of what he thought would interest his readers. We should hardly think, for instance, of treating his account of the events connected with the last siege of Jerusalem as the language of a scientific historian. (2) His object in speaking of the Canon afforded in this particular instance a special temptation to make the most of it, his intention being to show the incomparable superiority of the select Jewish writings to the 'myriads' (the word is itself a gross exaggeration) of Greek books whose accounts of their mythology differed so widely from each other. In fact such an argument helps us to understand why it was that the Jewish doctors of that day were so sensitive about seeming discrepancies in Bible books. A clever heathen disputant might have turned the tables and said, 'Why, your own sacred books often contain like contradictions.' After all, the temptation to inaccuracy and exaggeration is one which some of our greatest historians, even in this scientific age, —Macaulay, for example,—have not been wholly free from. We may, however, reasonably enough accept the statement of Josephus as evidence of the books commonly accepted by the most orthodox of the Jews of his day, without binding ourselves to believe that he was unacquainted with the objections raised in certain quarters. But that statement can hardly be accepted as a positive proof that the Canon had been fixed long before his time. It has its value as making it probable that at that period the objections to certain books were confined to a few persons, whose opinions Josephus felt justified in ignoring.

(f) The New Testament.—So considered, the evidence of Josephus carries us a step further, showing us that the decision of the Council of Jamnia practically endorsed what may be regarded as the public opinion of the time on the subject of the Canon. Going farther back, we come to the evidence of the NT. From a Christian point of view this is of very special importance. There is a natural desire to prove that the OT Canon has the imprimatur of our Lord. For this very reason it is important to be on our guard against even the suspicion of prejudice.

(1) The way in which the OT was regarded by our Lord and His disciples.—This is perhaps the most important feature of NT evidence for the OT Canon. It shows unmistakably that the Christians inherited from the Jews the unquestioned belief in a body of literature of a specially sacred and Divine character. The expressions, 'the Scripture,' 'the Scriptures,' ἡ γραφή, αἱ γραφαί, are used, much as we use them now, as well-known terms which required no further explanation, as, for example, in Mt 21^{42}, Mk 14^{49}, Jn 7^{42} 20^{9}. The phrase 'it has been written,' γέγραπται, Mt $4^{4.6.10}$, Ro 1^{17}, Gal 3^{13} etc., is equivalent to saying 'it is found in Scripture.' It is true that words signifying 'holy' are only twice applied to Scripture (γραφαῖς ἁγίαις Ro 1^{2}, ἱερὰ γράμματα 2 Ti 3^{15}), but Divine influence is asserted even more emphatically in such phrases as πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος (2 Ti 3^{16}), Δαυεὶδ ἐν πνεύματι κύριον αὐτὸν καλεῖ (Mt 22^{43}; cf. Ac 4^{25}). Moreover, the authority of Scripture is appealed to very frequently as sufficient evidence of truth, as in Mt 21^{42}, Lk 24^{27}, Ro 11^{2} etc. etc., and esp. Jn 10^{35} (οὐ δύναται λυθῆναι ἡ γραφή, unless our Lord is here arguing ad hominem). That authority is equally implied in such expressions as λέγει, εἴρηκε, etc., used in introducing Scripture quotations. Sometimes, no doubt, the true subject is God, not so much as speaking through the writer, but as the actual speaker in the passage quoted, e.g. in Ac 13^{34}, He 13^{5}. It is also possible to explain the verb as strictly impersonal, and as practically equivalent to a passive. This view is supported by such a phrase as διεμαρτύρατο δέ πού τις λέγων (He 2^{6}); but the very indefiniteness is significant. It is as though the writer were so impressed with the Divine sanctity of the words that it was of little moment to him through whom or how they were first used. In fact, he conceived of them in certain cases as being continued to be spoken, as in He $3^{7\text{-}8}$. This use, though specially frequent in Hebrews, is by no means confined to that book. We have a remarkable example of it in Ac 2^{16} τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ εἰρημένον διὰ τ. προφήτου Ἰωήλ, where Joel is merely the channel of Divine communication. So, too, ὡς καὶ ἐν τῷ Ὡσηὲ λέγει (Ro 9^{25}). Indeed, phrases of this kind occur so frequently, and with so much variety, that it seems most probable that the writers really thought of God or the Holy Spirit as the true subject, even though grammatically, perhaps, τις should be supplied. In He 3^{7} $10^{15.\ 16}$ the subject τὸ Πνεῦμα is actually given. See, further, Expos. Times, Sept. 1899, p. 533 f.

* The inclusion of this Epistle is certainly a difficulty; but in the face of the definite reference throughout to the Hebrew titles of the several books, it seems hardly satisfactory to say, with Ryle (p. 107), that Origen is merely following the LXX version. It appears more probable that at this date some Hebrew MSS did actually contain this Epistle, which was regarded by some as a genuine part of Jeremiah.

(2) Books of Scripture quoted or referred to in NT.—When we come to inquire what books were comprised in the connotation of 'Scripture' as used in NT, we may feel sure from Mt 5^{17}, Lk $24^{27.\ 44}$, Jn 1^{45}, Ac 13^{15} 24^{14} 28^{23}, Ro 3^{21}, that it included, at least, the Pentateuch and the Prophetico-Historical Books, as well as the Psalms.* From Ac 13^{15} we learn that the first two groups were regularly read in the synagogue. This is confirmed by quotations in the NT from practically all these books.†

The evidence of Lk 24^{44} cannot be urged against the books of the Hagiographa other than the Psalms. Our Lord is referring to Scripture with special reference to the prophecies of the Messiah. A mention of books which contained no Messianic prophecies could not have been expected. In point of fact, some of the Hagiographa are introduced with what are most naturally understood as formulæ of Scripture quotation, e.g. Pr 3^{34} with διὸ λέγει in Ja 4^{6}; cf. also Ro $12^{19.\ 20}$, where a quotation from Pr $25^{21.\ 22}$ is connected with another from Dt 32^{35}, which is introduced with the words γέγραπται γάρ. The same formula is used in 1 Co 3^{19} to introduce a quotation from Job 5^{13}. More remarkable is the mixture of Ec 7^{20} with Ps 14^{1} in Ro 3^{10} prefaced by καθὼς γέγραπται (see QUOTATIONS, F). The reference in Mt 23^{35} to 2 Ch $24^{20.\ 21}$ at least proves that that book was a recognized source of Jewish history. It can hardly prove its canonicity, unless He $11^{34\text{-}38}$ proves the canonicity of 1 Mac.‡

But the absence of quotations in NT is not enough to prove that the rest of the Hagiographa were not at this time regarded as Scripture, when we take into account that of the first two groups there are no quotations from Judges, Obadiah, Nahum, and Zephaniah, and very few from some others (1 from Nu, 1 from Jos, 2 from 1 and 2 S, 2 from 1 and 2 K, 1 from Job), and, above all, that the contents of some of the books would not readily lend themselves to quotation.

(3) NT evidence to extra-canonical books.—On the other hand, it may be questioned whether the argument from the quotations in NT does not prove too much. Attention has already been called to the use made of 1 Mac in He $11^{34\text{-}38}$. The quotation from the Book of Enoch in Jude ^{14} is still more remarkable, showing that the writer of the Epistle accepted as a genuine prophecy of the patriarch an extract from a late book which never had a claim to be considered part of the Jewish Canon. To this we should add v.^{9}, evidently taken also from some such extra-canonical source. It is almost certain that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews adapted the phrase ἀπαύγασμα τ. δόξης . . . αὐτοῦ in 1^{3} from Wis 7^{26}; but such an adaptation, in view of the sacredness and importance of the subject—the Divine nature of the Son of God—would seem to imply a recognition of the authority of this book. Taken in connexion with the reference to 1 Mac in ch. 11, it suggests that this Alexandrian writer accepted the whole collection of the Alexandrian LXX as Scripture. To these should perhaps be added the quotations in Jn $7^{38.\ 42}$, Eph 5^{14}, which, though not found in their present form in any canonical books, are definitely quoted as Scripture (see QUOTATIONS, G).

(4) General estimate of NT evidence.—Speaking generally, it may be said that while there was in the early Church a very strong feeling of both the sanctity and authority of Holy Scripture, and Holy Scripture connoted at least the majority of the books of OT, there was, on the other hand, by no means a very definite universally accepted idea of the exact contents or limits of Holy Scripture, at any rate among the Christians of the 1st century. With the learned Jews of Palestine it may have been, and probably was, different. This attitude on the part of Christian writers towards so important a question may seem improbable and illogical. It would be so in modern times. But it is necessary to bear in mind the paucity of MSS in that age, the 'illiterateness' of 'the masses,' and, to some extent, of the writers themselves, and the difference of literary methods and standards then prevalent. Even the learned St Paul himself hardly ever quotes accurately except from the Law and the Psalms, and mixes up quotations from different books to a most extraordinary extent (see QUOTATIONS, F). It has already been noticed how at a later time a distinguished bishop of the Church actually found it necessary to go and inquire among the Jews what the books of the OT really were. Taking all this into account, it is satisfactory to know that the early Church from the very first accepted very nearly, if not quite, all of the OT books as Scripture. Moreover, there is no indication that the Hagiographa were looked upon as inferior to the rest of Scripture.

(g) Philo, c. 40 A.D.—Going back to the earlier part of the 1st cent. we find the evidence of Philo somewhat confusing. He appears to have been influenced by four more or less conflicting principles. (1) He recognized, above all, the supreme inspiration of Moses, beside which all other inspiration was comparatively insignificant. (2) He was influenced in his allegorical treatment of Scripture by the methods of the Palestinian Halakha, and quoted the canonical books* as if of greater authority than the rest. (3) He acknowledged the inspiration of the LXX translators, and says that the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures should be reverenced and admired 'as sisters, or rather as one and the same both in the facts and in the words' (Vita Mos. ii. 5–7). (4) He advanced the theory that inspiration had a still wider sphere, and embraced the great Greek philosophers, and it would seem even himself (see Drummond, Philo, vol. i. 15, 16; Buhl, § 6. 12). We might perhaps best represent and reconcile his different theories by supposing concentric circles corresponding to different degrees

* Curiously enough, the Psalms are quoted in St. John as the Law in 10^{34} and as the Prophets in 6^{45}.

† Judges, though not actually quoted, is referred to in He 11^{32}. As the 12 Minor Prophets had long before formed one book (Sir 49^{10}), it is sufficient to find quotations as we do from several of them.

‡ The same objection might be urged against the reference to Judges in He 11^{32}, were it not practically certain that it was included in 'the Prophets,' so often referred to in NT.

* Excepting Ezekiel, Daniel, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, and Esther.

of inspiration, the innermost containing the Law of Moses, the next the whole Palestinian Canon, the third the LXX books, the fourth including all inspired books in the very widest sense. But it seems hardly probable that Philo himself ever conceived so definite a system. All that his evidence really seems to prove is that on the whole he was inclined to regard the Palestinian Canon with greater favour than the wider collection of the LXX. In a general way it confirms what we know from other sources, but hardly adds anything definite.

(h) Prologue to Sirach, c. 130 B.C.—It is different when we get back to the evidence provided by the Prologue to the Bk. of Sirach: 'Whereas many and great things have been delivered unto us by the Law and the Prophets, and by others that have followed in their steps, for the which things Israel ought to be commended for learning and wisdom; . . . my grandfather, Jesus, when he had much given himself to the reading of the Law and the Prophets and other books of our Fathers, and had gotten therein good judgment, was drawn on also himself to write something pertaining to learning and wisdom.' Further on the translator takes occasion once more to speak of 'the Law itself and the Prophets, and the rest of the books,' as being superior in their original Hebrew to the translation of them (LXX). We gather from these statements that at this time the first two groups, the Law and the Prophets, were at least well-known collections of books of recognized authority; that there were, besides these, other books which were highly esteemed for their wisdom and moral worth. But no very definite distinction is drawn between the spirit of this third group and the work of his grandfather, except that one is the imitation of the other. Both were actuated by παιδεία and σοφία. Such language is clearly inconsistent with the notion of a closed Canon, as we find it in Josephus. The translator lived, it appears, in an age of transition, when the canonicity of the first two groups was practically established (whether a theory or a term expressive of canonicity had yet been formulated matters little), and that of the third was still in the making. It was natural to mention the third also in speaking of the sacred literature of the Jews, but not quite in the same spirit. Such language of commendation would have been quite out of place, almost impertinent, in speaking of the Law and the Prophets. A writer of his own day, Thomas Ellwood, could speak of Milton as 'a gentleman of great note for learning throughout the learned world for the accurate pieces he had written on various subjects and occasions.' Such language would be absurd now.

We may be practically certain from other considerations that this third group of books included Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles, and others, but we cannot use the passage quoted as an independent argument for the canonicity of any single disputed book, such as the Song of Songs or Ecclesiastes.

(i) Sirach, c. 180 B.C.; especially chs. 44–50 (Praise of Famous Men).—Of even greater importance is the praise of famous men in chs. 44–50 of the Bk. of Sirach itself. From these chapters we get a very fair idea of the view of sacred literature taken by a learned Jew of that time. His descriptions are evidently taken from the Law, the Prophets, and the historical books of the Hagiographa (Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah). There are specific references to every one of them. His conception of David is largely derived from the Chronicler, the appointment of singers, the use of psalms in the temple worship, and probably the Psalter itself being ascribed to him. 'In all his works he praised the Holy One most high with words of glory; with his whole heart he sang songs, and loved Him that made him. He set singers also before the altar, that by their voices they might make sweet melody, and daily sing praises in their songs' ($47^{8.\ 9}$, cf. 1 Ch 25 and Ps 149^{2}). A similar acquaintance with Ezra and Nehemiah seems implied by what is said of Zerubbabel, Joshua, and Nehemiah ($49^{11\text{-}13}$). What is said of the first of these might possibly, however, have been taken from Hag $1^{12\text{-}15}$ 2^{23}, and certainly bears reference to the latter; and the absence of all mention of Ezra is singular. This shows that the author had no knowledge of those legends which connected the Canon so closely with the great founder of later Judaism (2 Es 14; see also Ryle, Exc. D), and probably is to be explained on the supposition that in his eyes Ezra was overshadowed by Nehemiah. It is not improbable that at this time the Bks. of Ezra and Nehemiah were still parts of Chronicles. The separation of these books would have helped to bring out the personality of Ezra. Some of the other books of the Hagiographa seem also recognized. Sir 47^{8}, already quoted, implies the existence of a psalm-book ascribed to David; not necessarily the whole Psalter, but including apparently Ps 149 (see v.^{2}), or at least Ps 100 (see v.^{3}), and therefore probably the whole.* A similar passage, 47^{17}, speaks of the admiration which Solomon elicited by his 'songs, and proverbs, and parables, and interpretations [obviously a mistranslation of משׁל 'figures'; cf. Pr 1^{6}, where משׁל has the sense of 'figure']. This passage might be merely an adaptation of 1 K $4^{32.\ 33}$, but it would receive a special point if Proverbs, Song of Songs, and perhaps even Ecclesiastes, formed part of the writer's religious library. That Proverbs was well known to him is obvious from many passages in the book, which were evidently written in imitation of it; cf. Sir 24^{9} with Pr 8^{27}, Sir 1^{14} with Pr 1^{7} 9^{10} etc. etc. In $48^{24.\ 25}$ he makes reference to Is 40–66. 'He saw by an excellent spirit what should come to pass at the last, and he comforted them that mourned in Zion' (cf. esp. Is $40^{1.\ 2}$ 61^{3}). This shows that in his time these last chapters had long formed part of Isaiah, and implies that a thorough revision of the sacred books had taken place. He would seem to have lived at the end of a literary age, such as was hardly possible in the troublous times of the Maccabees. The absence of any reference in Sir 44–50 to the Bk. of Job is best explained on the supposition either that the latter was regarded as an allegory, or that Job did not belong to the type of those commemorated by Ben Sira, perhaps as not being of the Jewish community. Neither of these suppositions accounts for Daniel being ignored. Had the writer known the book, he could hardly have failed to include among his famous men one who combined the wisdom of Solomon with the courage of David.

Thus the evidence of the Bk. of Sirach points to the general conclusion that at the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. the whole of the Law and the Prophets, and a considerable number of the Hagiographa, were among the accepted components of sacred literature. But how far the idea of a definite list of sacred books, such as we find in later times, had been formulated, or whether the sacred character of such books was officially sanctioned by any public authority, are questions which the evidence at present available seems insufficient to determine; and it appears somewhat rash to assume, as many writers on the Canon have done, the existence of such an authority without more definite proof. It seems most likely that official sanction, when given, confirmed rather than created public opinion.

Between the date of Sirach and the promulgation of the Hexateuch in 444 there is a complete dearth of evidence, and yet there is reason to believe that this period was the most fruitful in the literary activity to which the Canon of OT is due.

(j) Ezra and Nehemiah.—(a) Promulgation of the Hexateuch, B.C. 444.—When we go back to the times of Ezra and Nehemiah we are upon firmer ground. That the later or Priestly Code was officially sanctioned is made evident by Neh 8. 9, where there are several references to what criticism has proved to be exilic or post-exilic laws [HEXATEUCH] as distinct from the ancient code of Ex 20–23 and that of Deuteronomy. These chapters of Nehemiah are also important as showing the origin of the conception of a Canon. A Divine law binding the people, and publicly read before them that they might understand its provisions, is a very intelligible idea. Had we only the account of Nehemiah to go by, we should have imagined that it was the Law proper that was so sanctioned and publicly enforced. But the construction of the Hexateuch, i.e. the Pentateuch and Joshua, points indisputably to the conclusion that the narratives are an integral part of the book. Even supposing that at this time the Priestly Code had not been actually joined to the earlier strata of the Hexateuch (in itself an improbable assumption), yet in all these strata we find law and history intimately associated. The people had long been familiarized with the thought of a Divine purpose in the lives of their ancient fathers. Thus the authority of Ezra and Nehemiah would have sanctioned the conception of a sacred book, giving the early history of man and especially the Jews, associated especially with the great names of Abraham and Moses, and containing in many different forms the rules of a religious life. It would be hardly too much to say that the Hexateuch was the Bible of the Jews of Ezra's time.

(β) Influence of the Hexateuch on the formation of the Canon.—That the same reverence should have come to be felt for the books of the later history and the works of the great teachers, as they were collected and compiled, is only the natural process of evolution. That in process of time a harvest of more miscellaneous, but all more or less religious, literature of different ages should have been gathered in and prized in its turn with at least something like the same degree of reverence, is equally natural. But, it may be asked, Why did this Canon-making process stop? The true answer seems to be that the literary tendencies of the period following the fall of Jerusalem, though vigorous after their kind, were intensely conservative. The learned of that day aimed at reproducing and fixing what they already had, whether written or oral, rather than at producing. The same influences which caused the publication, to use a modern phrase, of the Mishna, closed the OT Canon. The reverence which the Jews had felt for the sanctuary was now monopolized by the sacred writings. It was, even more than the preceding ages, an age of scribes, not of authors. If a few did write such original works as 4 Ezra (the 2 Es of the Eng. Apocrypha), no Jew, in spite of the writer's own transparent artifice, dreamed of placing such a work with books long sanctified by age. It is almost inconceivable that Ecclesiastes would have been so soon after accepted as canonical had it, as Grätz would have us believe, been written about this time.

For the part attributed by Elias Levita (d. 1549) to 'the Great Synagogue' in the process of Canon forming, see art. SYNAGOGUE (THE GREAT).

vii. CANONICITY OF THE DIFFERENT DIVISIONS OF THE OT.—From what has already been said, it will be seen that it is very nearly correct to say that the OT was the result of a gradual process which began with the sanction of the Hexateuch by Ezra and Nehemiah, and practically closed with the decisions of the Council of Jamnia. It is now proposed to trace out as far as possible, for the separate parts of the Bible, the history of this process, partly by the help of the evidence already given, and partly by the light of biblical criticism. It may be premised that without a full appreciation of the latter a clear view of the history of the Canon is unattainable. Though, properly speaking, the writing of a book or any part of a book is a distinct thing from its authoritative reception, it will be seen that there is often, in fact, a close connexion between the two.

And it should also be remarked that the scattered pieces of evidence, though serving as convenient landmarks, must not be regarded as necessarily marking distinct epochs in the history of the Canon.

(a) Preparatory Stages culminating in the Canonization of the Hexateuch by Ezra and Nehemiah.—Even before the authorization of the Hexateuch, the idea of a Canon was not entirely new. In the first place, the earlier strata of the Hexateuch, JE and D, were probably well known, and received with various degrees of reverence. This was true also of some other parts of the Bible, several of the psalms, most of the historical books and of the prophets. But more important than this, the various codes of the Law had been from time to time formally enforced. The Decalogue had, according to E, been sanctioned directly by God Himself (Ex 20^{1}). At any rate, nothing could exceed the awful reverence with which the Ark and its contents were regarded. The ancient codes preserved by JE, Ex 20–23 and 34^{10-26}, had certainly been sanctioned at a very early date. The former had, according to E, been inaugurated by a solemn act of sacrifice, Ex 24^{3-8},—a passage of great importance as showing how what was originally, as clearly seen from its contents, a sort of common law, came to be sanctioned and enforced by religious authority.* It is well known how, at obviously a much later date, the provisions of D were enforced by the authority of Josiah (2 K 23). What was really new in the promulgation of the Hexateuch in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah was that now we find, as it would appear, not merely a law, but a sacred book authoritatively put forward for the acceptance of the people.

(b) The Prophetico-Historical Canon.—It is obvious that the canonization of Scripture is not likely to have stopped with the Hexateuch. The increased or fresh awakened interest in their ancient history must have supplied the Jews with a fresh impulse to historical study. The feelings with which the earlier history was regarded would have insensibly extended to the later history, written in the same spirit and already bearing the impress of a bygone age. In these writings, as well as in those containing the teachings of the Prophets, men realized that they heard the inspired voice of the true successors of Moses, the first of prophets (Dt 18^{15-19}). It is easy to see that it would not have been long before the second group of writings came to be regarded with much the same reverence as the first. This feeling was certainly heightened by the cessation of the power of prophecy. Ever since the Captivity the prophetical office had been becoming more and more priestly in its character, as we see from the Bks. of Haggai, Zechariah, and especially Malachi, and was finally absorbed in the priesthood. It is to be noticed that the writer of Sirach speaks of Aaron as vested with authority to teach (Sir 45^{17}), and that according to the Chronicler it was the Levites especially who taught the people in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch $17^{8.9}$). But we have to mark not only the growth of a certain feeling towards Holy Scripture, but also a literary process, which is likely to have taken some time. This consisted of the collection of scattered books and leaflets, and the revision of books, and certainly began long before the time of Ezra. The editorial frame-work of the Bk. of Kings is the work of the Deuteronomic school, and probably belongs to the time of the Exile. But, on the other hand, there are marks of a later revision, and in certain passages, such as 1 K $8^{1\text{-}11}$, we are reminded of P, if not of the Chronicler. The last five chapters of Judges in their present form have close affinities with P. The collections of prophecies of different prophets and different dates under the names of Isaiah and Zechariah, whatever their original cause, would not have found acceptance while the memories of Deutero-Isaiah and Zechariah were still fresh. We may say then that the literary process was probably completed not many years after the time of Ezra, say about B.C. 400, and that this second group had canonical acceptance, at latest, before the time when Sirach was written, and certainly long before that work was translated. If we put the canonicity about B.C. 300–250, we shall probably be not far wrong, provided that we remember that there is no proof of official recognition by authority at such an early date. It should be borne in mind that the Chronicler (c. 300) treated the history in a way difficult to explain, had he been possessed with our ideas of canonicity. On the other hand, the separation of Joshua from the Law, and its combination with the other historical books of the second group, suggests that at the time when made—long before B.C. 130 (Prologue to Sirach)—there was no very marked difference of estimation between the first and second groups. But we must not, again, make the assumption that all books of this second group were necessarily regarded with the same degree of reverence and authority.

* It is quite impossible to fix with certainty the date of the ceremonies described in this passage, but the laws themselves reflect the state of society as we find it in 1 Samuel, which probably continued long after in the north. The code itself is, however, very complex.

(c) The canonicity of the Hagiographa.—This is more difficult to trace, and more complicated. The very name reminds us that we are dealing with a heterogeneous collection, which could not, like the two other groups, be classed under a really descriptive name. It would be a great mistake to take it for granted that their canonicity began to be deliberately considered after the canonicity of these other groups had been completely recognized. In the case of Psalms and Proverbs this was almost certainly not the case.

Psalms.—The composition of the Psalter shows it to be evidently a compilation from several earlier collections differing very much in character and age. The order suggests that the Psalms were generally placed in the same relative position in the complete Psalter which they had already occupied in these earlier collections. Thus we find together the Psalms of 'the sons of Korah' 42 (+43)–49. 84. 85. 87. 88, the Psalms of Asaph 73–83, 'songs of degrees (? steps)' 120–134, and other cases where similarity of titles or refrains connects consecutive Psalms, showing that such groups of Psalms were taken en bloc from collections entitled 'The Psalm-book of Korah,' 'The psalms, maschils, and songs of Asaph,' 'The songs of degrees, etc. So far from critical were the compilers of the Psalter that they did not venture in certain cases to decide whether a poem was more correctly described as a psalm or a song (see titles of 75. 76, etc.). Still more curious is the leaving of the note, 'The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended,' after the Doxology which closes Ps 72, although, as the Psalter now stands, the preceding Psalm is as a fact ascribed to Solomon, and several later Psalms are ascribed to David. The arrangement of Psalms 'to David' makes it likely that at least two independent earlier collections were originally so entitled. All this tends to show that there was a wide interval of time between the composition of the majority of the Psalms and their final compilation in one complete Psalter.

The character of the Psalms themselves is very various. Some are comparatively crude, both in conception and language, and with sometimes a corrupt text, and appear as though a wide interval lay between their composition and the literary tendencies of later Judaism, as, e.g., Ps $10^{2\text{-}11}$ 14. (cf. 53) 16, etc. There is a very fair probability that these at least are pre-exilic. Some bear a striking resemblance to Jeremiah, and have been frequently regarded as having been written either by him or writers of his school (esp. 31. 35. 69. 79). Many are of a personal character, as 4. 12. 13. 139, etc.; others were obviously composed for public worship, to which they have a distinct reference, as 95. 96. 98. 99. 100, etc. etc. Others, again, suggest that, originally personal, they have afterwards been adapted for liturgical use, as 69. 77. 102. This leads many to suspect that in some cases a national interpretation has been placed on Psalms originally designed to express the writer's own feelings and experience. In some Psalms, as in Ps 118, the national interpretation of the 1st person is obvious, and, of course, original.

Unfortunately it is impossible to fix a date for the use of Psalms in religious worship with absolute certainty. It appears almost certain that psalmody did not form a regular part of the temple worship before the Exile. The Bk. of Kings, at any rate, says nothing of it. In the face of this, the constant mention of psalm-singing by the Chronicler, as at the Dedication of the temple, 2 Ch $5^{12.13}$, is of no historical value for the time of which it treats. It is of a piece with the ascription to David of the founding of the singing guilds, 1 Ch 25. The value of the statements in Ezra and Nehemiah are more difficult to estimate. We certainly find singers mentioned, not only in the editorial introduction to the account of Ezra's work (Ezr 7^{7}), but, what is far more important, in the letter of Artaxerxes himself (7^{24}). They are spoken of in a way which implies that they are part of a definitely organized system. But the question arises whether that system was actually at work in Jerusalem, or had been organized by Ezra and his school in Babylon. What is known of the Priestly Code in relation to the Hexateuch makes it extremely probable that a new and highly developed ritual had been so formulated. It is also of some significance that in P only we find the ritual use of trumpets (Lv 23^{24}, Nu 10^{10}). On the other hand we do find, in the list preserved of those who came up from Babylon, the mention of 148 (128, Ezr) singers, 'sons of Asaph' (Neh 7^{44}, Ezr 2^{41}). It is not easy to reconcile this statement with Neh 7^{67}, Ezr 2^{65}, where singing men and singing women are mentioned apparently as among the slaves of the exiles. Is it that these were menials who had no connexion with the sacred guild, or that the guild itself was a creation out of what had been a menial office? Singers are also mentioned by Nehemiah as having been appointed by himself, Neh 7^{1}. In his account of the dedication of the wall, 12^{27-43}, the singers and players of instruments take a very prominent part. It is said that they had established themselves in villages, etc., round Jerusalem, whence they were gathered by Nehemiah, $12^{28.29}$. The statement in v.[46] that the singers had performed their office 'in the days of David and Asaph,' is made, not by Nehemiah, but by the editor. The account of the music and psalmody in the service connected with the foundation of the temple in Ezr $3^{10.11}$ is also editorial, and is too much like the accounts of similar services given by the Chronicler (1 Ch 16, 2 Ch 5. $20^{21.22}$ etc.) to be free from suspicion. It is sufficiently evident that on all such occasions he read into the narrative the religious customs of his own day, which were then believed to have originated with David. But, on the other hand, it must be borne in mind that in this case he was describing events much nearer to his own day, and some time must be allowed for such traditions to have grown up.

Putting all the facts together, it would probably be near the truth to say that music was first introduced into religious worship to some small extent with the second temple, but was first thoroughly organized and greatly developed under the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah. This use of Psalms, under the control of the Priestly guilds, would have given authority not only to those specially composed for the purpose, but to those adapted to liturgical use, and they would have required no further sanction. See, further, artt. PRAISE IN OT, and PSALMS.

Proverbs.—It was different with the Bk. of Proverbs. It belongs to a class of literature the sanction of which is by no means so obvious. If required to place in order of time the Prophetic, the Priestly, and the Ethical spirit among the Jews, we should certainly give them in this order. The last of the three is most closely connected with modern Judaism. The destruction of Jerusalem and the abolition of its sacrificial system must have gone far to give it strength and permanence, but in its inception the ethical spirit is of much earlier date, as we see from Sirach. But, as we see from the Prologue, Sirach itself was an imitation of earlier books, among which we must obviously reckon Proverbs; and these earlier books are spoken of as already ancient, 'the other books of our fathers,' and yet are not so ancient as the prophets, unless indeed the phrase 'others that have followed in their steps' points especially to Chronicles, which was in a sense an imitation of the prophetic Bk. of Kings. The fact, too, that Solomon came to be looked upon as the fountain of proverbial philosophy, is at once a proof of the relative antiquity of the germ and the sanction of what came to be ascribed to him. When once Solomon had gained this reputation, it became customary to ascribe proverbs to him. That many of these were originally popular sayings, handed down as ancient saws, hardly needs saying. That they were gathered together into small collections first, and that such collections were afterwards put together so as to form our present Bk. of Proverbs, is evident to any one who carefully studies the book. See PROVERBS.

With regard to the canonicity of this book, all that we can positively say is, that it is extremely unlikely that a specially sacred character should have begun to be attached to such proverbs only when the whole collection had been finally completed. The words at the beginning of Pr 25^{1} 'These also are Proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out,' make it probable that, when what is believed to be the earliest collection was made, the proverbs which composed it were already believed to be Solomon's. It proves at the least that, when the final compilation was complete, this earlier collection was headed by a title which the compilers did not venture to disturb. The case is parallel to that of Ps 72^{20}. We may, then, safely say that the canonicity of the whole Bk. of Proverbs was firmly established long before B.C. 180, and that of parts of it, certainly chs. 25–29 were recognized long before, possibly as early as the reign of Hezekiah.

Ecclesiastes.—In point of canonicity Ecclesiastes stands on quite a different footing from Proverbs. It was neither a collection of sayings traditionally ascribed to Solomon, nor was it a collection of booklets which bore his name. Ecclesiastes was apparently ascribed to Solomon neither by ancient tradition nor by literary criticism; but the person of Solomon is assumed by the writer. As the authorship of Solomon is precluded on literary grounds, there are no alternatives except either a deliberate fraud or a mere literary device designed to give force to his subject. The latter alternative seems by far the most probable. It was written in a literary age (see 12^{12}), when a modern book would not easily be mistaken for one of ancient date, by a writer, probably an old sage, who had observed much and studied much, and felt that he had a right to speak (12^{9-12}), and was giving such advice as Solomon himself might have given had he lived in his day. That in a less critical age this literary device should have been misunderstood, and that, if so, it should have done much for the reception of this book, is not surprising. How soon this was so, or the exact date of its composition, must be largely matter of conjecture. We cannot be certain that it was known to the writer of Sirach. On the other hand, it is said to have been quoted by one Simon, son of Shetach, in the first half of the century before Christ (see Buhl, pp. 15, 17). It probably belongs to the literary age which terminated in the disturbed period of the Maccabees, and was certainly authoritatively recognized by the Council of Jamnia at the end of the 1st cent. A.D. See, further, art. ECCLESIASTES.

Song of Songs.—The Song of Songs is so far like Ecclesiastes that the subject of the poem is connected with the person of Solomon, not obviously as the assumed writer, but as one of the principal characters. The poem, or group of poems, is, however, probably ancient, and originally, there can be no serious doubt, quite secular in character. According to 1 K 4^{32} Solomon was traditionally known as a writer of poetry, and it is quite possible that this work was ascribed to him at a comparatively early date, before the Exile. The allegorical interpretation of the book would have naturally followed. He who was believed to have drawn lessons of morality from plants and animals (cf. 1 K 4^{33} with Pr 6^{6-8} $26^{2.3}$ etc.), might easily be supposed to have intended some deep mystic meaning in this simple story of pure and natural love. In this case the reception of the book was probably slow and gradual, and naturally enough met with considerable opposition. Had it not been for its allegorical interpretation, it is unlikely that it would have gained a place in the Canon. The Christians accepted the book, but gave it a new allegorical interpretation of their own.

Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah.—The Bks. of 1 and 2 Chronicles, with Ezra and Nehemiah, the four originally one book, were probably received as a trustworthy record before the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. As already shown, at least Chronicles and Nehemiah are referred to in the praise of famous men in Sir 44–50. Probably they were not written much more than a century earlier, about B.C. 330 (see Kent, Hist. Heb. People, ii. 8), and their character suggests that they were compiled by authority. If so, the dates of authorship and canonicity are the same. In any case their composition and reception belong to a time not long after the final revision of the Bk. of Kings, though possibly a much longer time after the general recognition of an earlier edition, so to speak, of that book. The two books present an instructive contrast. The Chronicles are, unlike Kings, not so much a compilation as a composition. It is only exceptionally that fragments of ancient documents appear in their original shape. For the most part the whole has been recast in its relatively modern form, with its characteristically modern spirit. It shows the marks of a definitely literary effort in a literary age. Its treatment of ancient history may be compared in some respects with that of the later Targums and Midrashim. In fact, the word midrash already occurs in 2 Ch 13^{22} 24^{27} (AV 'story'), though hardly in its later technical sense. The book was probably intended to preserve in a permanent form the methods of teaching common in the Jewish schools. That such a literary school should spring into existence after the period of Ezra and Nehemiah is highly probable. It would have been the natural result of the impulse given by them to the study of Scripture.

Job.—Of Job it is difficult to speak very positively. The allusion in Ezk $14^{14.\ 20}$ may prove nothing more than that the story of Job, or something like it, was current in the prophet's day. The mention after Daniel (in this case certainly it is the person, not the book, we have to think of) may suggest that the story had only recently become known. In any case the point of the allusion does not make it necessary to suppose that Ezekiel necessarily regarded Job as a historical person. The book bears traces of the kind of religious feelings which were quickened by Deuteronomy, and betrays a still closer relationship to Deutero-Isaiah. Indeed the suffering Servant of J" forms a striking parallel to the leading thought of the book. Yet the relation between the two appears to be collateral rather than of direct ancestry. This resemblance, taken with the allusions to astronomy in Job 9^9 26^{13}, suggest that Job was written in Babylon about the same period. This would be all but a certainty if we could be sure that Job's sufferings are meant to be an allegory of those of the exiled Israel.

Ruth and Lamentations.—The Bks. of Ruth and Lamentations, especially if the latter was believed to be the work of Jeremiah, could hardly have received general recognition when the historico-prophetic group was completed, as they would certainly have found a place in it, the former as a historical, the latter as a prophetic work. Apart from a very possible reference in Sir 49^6 to La 1^{1-4} etc., we have no evidence to show whether they were known or not to the writer of Sirach, and the internal evidence is too uncertain in this case to give us any real help. All that we can positively say is that both were thoroughly recognized by the end of the 1st cent. A.D., as seen by the testimony of Josephus and the Council of Jamnia, and no doubt is expressed of their genuineness. They must have been received long before; but how long we can only guess. This is, however, just one of those cases in which the evidence of silence is of very little value against a book. The Bk. of Ruth would hardly have suited the purpose of the writer of Sirach, who includes no women among his worthies.

Daniel and Esther.—The Bks. of Daniel and Esther stand on a very different footing. Had they been known, Daniel and Mordecai would certainly have found a place in Sir 44–50 among the 'famous men.' It is true that Ezekiel ($14^{14.\ 20}$) knows of Daniel as one whose purity of life might be supposed to have secured the land from Divine wrath, but not necessarily as the great hero of the Babylonian and Persian courts. How could Sirach have failed to commemorate him who combined all the courage of a David with the wisdom of a Solomon? The book bears obvious internal evidence in chs. 7–9 of a date subsequent to the Maccabæan era. From the similarity of subject it seems not unlikely that both Daniel and Esther were derived from the same Eastern source. But it could hardly have been earlier than the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C. The history of the reception of the books forms a rather marked contrast. The Bk. of Daniel, as might have been expected from its contents, appears to have gained favour without opposition, and Daniel is spoken of in the NT as a prophet (Mt 24^{15}). Esther, on the other hand, was received with considerable hesitation, and whether on this ground or otherwise there is less evidence in its favour. It is not quoted in the NT, which may be only accidental; and it is at least possible that the feast of Jn 5^1 is that of Purim, which would prove the recognition of the book. Several Rabbis objected to the book about the 1st and 2nd cents. A.D., and one at least in the 3rd (see Buhl, p. 25); several Fathers, Melito (perhaps by error), Athanasius, Gregory Nazianzen, omit it from their lists; and it was not regarded as canonical by Theodore of Mopsuestia. Some objections or suspicions arose, among the Jews at any rate, from its secular character; others, in the opinion of some writers, merely from the fact that the fast of 13th Adar, in connexion with Haman's plot (ch. 9^1), conflicted with the feast of the same day commemorating the victory of Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor (1 Mac 7^{49}; see Ryle, p. 139).

viii. SUMMARY OF RESULTS OBTAINED.—In the foregoing inquiry the following facts seem clearly established:—

(1) Canonicity was, like the composition of the books itself, a gradual process. The Council of Jamnia, for example, gave a formal sanction to what had already become, more or less definitely, the public opinion of Jewish writers.

(2) Such sanction appears to have been, in fact, accidental, that is to say, not by any means essential to the idea of canonicity. All the OT books, with a few possible exceptions, would have won their way into the Canon had no such council decided the matter, just as the NT became canonical without the sanction of a general council.

(3) The history of canonicity cannot be completely separated from the history of the books themselves. The separate parts of a book may have been, and in some cases certainly were, accepted authoritatively before the whole was written. This was especially the case with the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Proverbs.

(4) This consideration, among others, points to the conclusion that canonicity was, in its earliest stages, a question of degree, and even, to some extent, of kind. One book, the Pentateuch, for example, was accepted because formally sanctioned by authority; another acquired its authority from its long acceptance by students and writers; a third, from its liturgical use. Again, various factors contributed to the idea of canonicity; among them, certainly, real or supposed antiquity, and also, to some extent, authorship by some famous person, such as David or Solomon.

(5) Lastly, while the beginnings of canonicity lie in the misty period of ancient Jewish history, it may be said to have reached its final stage at the Council of Jamnia, where all our OT books were sanctioned; though, on the one hand, the great bulk, at any rate, were practically recognized as canonical long before; and, on the other, some hesitation in isolated cases was not uncommon even after the council. Since then, time, habit, and experience have continued to give strength to its decisions.

ix. CLAIMS OF THE APOCRYPHA TO CANONICITY.—So far, the investigation has concerned itself almost exclusively with the Canon accepted by the Jews and by the Reformed Churches of modern times. A few words are necessary concerning the claims of the Apocrypha to canonicity. In the Roman Catholic Church it depends upon the supposed inspiration of the Vulgate. There is, however, some truth in the canonicity of the Apocrypha. The LXX contained these books very nearly as we have them now in our English Apocrypha. The earliest extant LXX texts are certainly Christian, but the references in Hebrews to Wisdom and Maccabees, to which attention has been already called, suggest the probability that the Greek Bible of NT times was the LXX as we know it. It would thus appear that the Alexandrian Jews were accustomed to group together in their sacred literature a larger collection of books than those contained in the Palestinian Canon and sanctioned at Jamnia. It is, then, a common practice to speak of the Alexandrian Canon as distinct from the Palestinian, and it is at least a significant fact that the only book of the NT (if we make the possible exception of the Fourth Gospel) which has distinct affinities with Alexandrian thought, contains the two striking references just mentioned to the Apocryphal books. The term is convenient, no doubt, but it is misleading if it is intended to imply that the Alexandrians placed all their sacred books, whether belonging to the Palestinian Canon or not, on the same footing. It is satisfactory enough if merely intended to mean that they made no definite distinction between the Canon and the Apocrypha. The statement (see above) that Philo, e.g., never quotes the Apocryphal books as canonical, is to some extent outweighed, as already suggested, by his peculiar views of inspiration. His theory of an extended, if graduated, inspiration tended to weaken the conception of a special Canon. The fact that rather a large number of OT books * are not quoted by Philo at all, perhaps points in the same direction. Dr. Sanday sees in the distinction between the so-called Palestinian and Alexandrian Canons the difference between the more strictly religious school and those who welcomed a wider, if more secular, culture (Inspiration, p. 93). With reference to the quotation of the Apocrypha by Christian Fathers, it may be enough to observe that even the ultra-Alexandrian Origen very definitely recognized that the books of the Palestinian Canon were in a special sense those of the Covenant (testament).

The sporadic inclusion, so to speak, of altogether uncanonical books as Scripture in the NT or elsewhere, such as the quotation from the Bk. of Enoch in Jude,† shows that, while a small body of learned Jewish experts in Palestine had formulated a fixed Canon, there were others whose critical knowledge was less exact, and who therefore included within their conception of Scripture a far wider circle of books.

x. SOME PECULIARITIES IN THE EVIDENCE OF THE NT AND FATHERS.—It is hardly necessary to do more than mention the curious omission by some Eastern Christian writers of well-established OT books, such as the omission of Chronicles (with Ezra and Nehemiah) and Job by Theodore of Mopsuestia and the Nestorian Canon (see Buhl, p. 53). Such omissions must be regarded as eccentricities outside the general current of canonical history. The omission of Esther stands on a different footing, and is, moreover, more common.

xi. THE INFLUENCE OF OUR PRESENT KNOWLEDGE OF OT CANON UPON RELIGION.—Hitherto the subject has been investigated on its purely historical side. The question has been—What books were in point of fact received as Scripture at different times? not—What is the intrinsic value of the books of Scripture, or of particular books of Scripture, as sanctions for religious belief and religious conduct? The latter question belongs rather to the subject of inspiration than to that of the Canon. But it comes within the limit of the present inquiry in so far as the spiritual authority and value of Bible books depend upon canonicity. Except for this, the history of the Canon has nothing more than a purely literary and archæological value. The question may be put thus—Does the scientific method as applied to the history of the Canon—and no other method is really permissible—increase or diminish the practical value of the Bible as a whole or in part? Theoretically, it would appear that it diminishes it. It is one thing to say that the OT was authoritatively fixed by Ezra or a religious school founded by him; another, that it was, as far as the evidence really proves, first officially sanctioned in its completeness by the Council of Jamnia. Christians would far rather believe that the Bks. of Esther and Canticles formed part of the Bible of Christ and His apostles, than that they were sanctioned by a Jewish council held some 70 years after Christ's ascension. A devout Protestant may be somewhat shocked to find that many of the earlier Christians practically included several Apocryphal books in their Bible. The modern study of the subject does certainly tend in some measure to obscure the lines drawn between canonical and Apocryphal books, and to depreciate relatively some of the former and appreciate some of the latter. It affects, in some degree, both the conditions of canonicity and the question to what extent certain books within or without the recognized Canon fulfil those conditions. But what practical bearing has all this as concerns the influence of the Bible upon faith and life? We feel that the books of whose claim to canonicity there is some degree of doubt are just those which, from a purely religious point of view, are the least important. There are those who feel that if Ecclesiastes, Esther, and Canticles had never been included in the Canon, and Sirach and Wisdom had been included, it would have made little real difference. We might still in Ecclesiastes have reverenced the outspoken honesty of a pious Israelite struggling according to his limited light with perhaps the greatest problems of life. We should have been thankful that in Esther we had illustrated for us a phase of character belonging to the most interesting, and once the most religious, nation of the world. We should have found in Canticles at least a pretty love-lyric, and possibly a good deal more. The old questionings and doubts about these books make it easier for us to have some such ideas about them now without shocking our religious sense. We feel that the standard by which all Bible or quasi-Bible books must eventually be appraised is not merely the ipse dixit of an infallible Church, Jewish or Christian, which rules all on one side of a line holy and all on the other secular, but an enlightened intelligence which sees in the sacred books, including even some not generally accounted canonical, various degrees of inspiration and spiritual power. By enlightened intelligence is here meant, not the mere private opinion of the individual, but the growing consent of spiritually-minded, right-thinking, honest, and devout Christians. In a word, the study of the formation of the Canon makes it possible to think that the same influences which resulted in the fixed Canon of OT in ancient times, may at a future time lead to some more defined modification in our conception of a sacred Canon.

* Ezekiel, Daniel, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther (Buhl, tr. p. 15; cf. Ryle, Philo and Holy Scripture).

† For quotations from or references to extra-canonical books in NT, see Buhl, p. 14.

OLIVE (זַיִת zayith, ἔλαία, oliva, Arab. zeitûn).—A well-known tree, one of the most characteristic of Syria and Palestine. It belongs to the order Oleaceæ, which also includes the ash. It is a tree with gnarled and, when large, usually hollow trunk, and straggling branches. It loves rich soil, but flourishes without irrigation. The small white flowers form axillary clusters. When their function is over, they fall in showers to the ground (Job 15^{33}), and their place is taken by small oblong fruits, at first green, but becoming almost black when ripe. From these comes the fatness of the olive, its rich nutritious oil. The leaves are oblong to lanceolate, of the characteristic dull olive-green at their upper surface, and a frosted silver colour below. This arrangement of colours makes an olive tree at a little distance appear as if covered by a filmy veil of silver gauze, which gives a soft dreamy sheen to the landscape. There are groves of olives near all the cities and villages of Pal. and Syria, and several of them are very extensive. That near Beirût is nearly 5 miles square. That near Tripoli is about as large. There are fine groves near Nablûs, and on the western slopes of Lebanon. The ground in which olive trees grow is ploughed twice or more a year, and enriched with inorganic and organic fertilizers. A favourite dressing is a marl, known as huwwârah, which is found everywhere in pockets of the cretaceous rocks of Syria. The first olives begin to fall in September. These are usually left until the time when the owner or his agent, and the lessee, can together pick them up and measure them. In November comes the harvest. The trees are beaten with a long pole (Dt 24^{20}). The 'shakings' (Is 24^{13}) of the olive tree refer to the few olives left after the first beating. These were to be left for the poor; see art. GLEANING. The olive harvest is usually carried home in baskets, on the backs of men or donkeys. 'Olive berries' (Ja 3^{12}), in reality a kind of drupe, are used for food in two stages. (1) When green they are pickled in brine, until the bitter taste is somewhat overcome, a result which is hastened by slightly bruising the drupe, so that the brine may more readily penetrate its pulp. They are eaten with bread, and, especially during the fasts, constitute a notable portion of the diet of the people. (2) When quite ripe they are sometimes packed down in salt, or immersed in brine, and at other times preserved in their own oil. The yield varies much in different years. If it is large one year it is usually small the next. The drupes are often beaten in a mortar, as in Bible times (Ex 27^{20} etc.). In this case the marc is placed in a vessel filled with hot water. The oil floats to the surface, and is skimmed off. The more usual way of obtaining the oil, however, is to bruise the ripe berries in a shallow circular basin, excavated in a stone shaped like the nether millstone, or in the solid rock. The bruising is sometimes done with the foot (Dt 33^{24}, Mic 6^{15}), but more commonly by an upright millstone, with a long pole passed through its centre. The short end of this pole is fastened to an upright fixed in the centre of the basin, and the other pushed or pulled round by a man or animal, so that the stone revolves just within the outer edge of the basin. This reduces the berries to a pulp. Part of the oil flows out through a spout in the rim of the basin into a vat (Jl 2^{24} 3^{13}, Hag 2^{16}). After the oil which flows of itself has been drawn away, the marc is packed in soft reed baskets. These are subjected to pressure by piling them one over the other between two stone pillars, with an upright groove at the inner face of each. In these grooves slides a horizontal bar, which is heavily weighted with stones or iron. Under this primitive but powerful press the oil flows down in streams, and is collected in a vat at the foot of the pile. At first it has much extraneous matter and water mixed with it. These gradually separate, leaving the pure sweet oil. This is kept in jars, or in large reservoirs hewn out of the rock or built with great exactness, and well pointed at the joints, or plastered within. The oil is used extensively as food, and large quantities of soap of most excellent quality are made by boiling it with crude soda.

The Scripture allusions to the olive are very numerous. It is the first tree, of those now known, mentioned in the Bible (Gn 8^{11}). Its wealth of nourishment made it a natural candidate for the position of king of trees (Jg $9^{8.9}$). It is an emblem of peace and prosperity (Ps 52^{8} 128^{3}) and beauty (Jer 11^{16}, Hos 14^{6}). The two olive trees in Zec $4^{3.11-14}$ were emblems of fruitfulness. RV well translates (v.[14]) 'two sons of oil,' instead of AV 'two anointed ones.' Standing by 'the Lord of the whole earth,' they denote His abundant, overflowing provision for the spiritual wants of mankind. Oil is frequently alluded to as food (2 Ch 2^{10}), medicine (Lk 10^{34}, Ja 5^{14}), unguent (Ps 23^{5}, Mt 6^{17}), illuminator (Mt 25^{3} etc.). The temple oil was beaten (Ex 27^{20}). The name 'Mount of Olives' indicates the importance attached to this tree, and associates it with many of the most interesting incidents in the life of our Lord.

G. E. POST.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF (הַר הַזֵּיתִים; LXX τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν; Vulg. Mons Olivarum).—In the OT the term 'Mount of Olives' occurs only in Zec 14^{4}. It is described as the 'ascent of the Olives' (מַעֲלֵה הַזַּ֫יִת) in 2 S 15^{30} (AV 'ascent of Mount Olivet,' RV 'ascent of the Mount of Olives'), as 'the mount' (Neh 8^{15}), 'the mount that is before Jerusalem' (1 K 11^{7}), 'the mountain which is on the east side of the city' (Ezk 11^{23}), and as 'the mount of corruption (or destruction)' (2 K 23^{13}). In the NT it is usually called 'the mount of Olives' (τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν), Mt 21^{1} 24^{3} 26^{30}, Mk 13^{3} 14^{26}, Lk 22^{39} 19^{37}, Jn 8^{1}, but St. Luke twice uses the term 'the mount that is called [the mount] of Olives' (τὸ ὄρος τὸ καλούμενον ἐλαιῶν), Lk 19^{29} 21^{37}; and once the term 'the mount called Olivet' (τοῦ ὄρους τοῦ καλ. Ἐλαιῶνος), Ac 1^{12}, cf. τὸ ὄρος τὸ Ἐλαιών Mk 11^{1} (B).

There is no doubt as to the identity of the Mount of Olives. The name is applied to the range of hills facing Jerusalem on the east and lying round about from north-east to south-east, and separated from the Holy City by the Valley of Jehoshaphat or Kidron. The only question that may arise in this respect is as to the precise extent of the range which may be included under the expression 'Mount of Olives.'

The range detaches itself from the backbone of the country about two miles north of Jerusalem, south of the village of Sha'fât (2824 ft.), and, trending in a south-easterly direction, extends as far as the 'prospect' (Scopus), where it runs nearly due south till opposite (or east of) the temple site; it then runs in a south-westerly direction until it is over against the Pool of Siloam. The ridge of the range is generally at a level of about 2600 ft. above the Mediterranean, but it culminates in four, or rather three (see below) somewhat pronounced summits, to which modern tradition has given the names of (1) Galilee, (2) the Ascension, (3) the Prophets, (4) the Mount of Offence.

(1) 'Galilee' (Scopus) is due north-east of the temple site, and about a mile distant.

(2) 'The Ascension' is the summit due east of the temple site, and distant about ¾ mile; on it stand the church of the Ascension and the village and mosque of Jebel et-Ṭur (the modern Arabic name for the Mount of Olives).

(3) 'The Prophets' is south of and, properly speaking, only a spur of No. 2, and derives its name from some catacombs ascribed to the prophets. It is not really a distinct summit.

(4) 'The Mount of Offence' is about ¾ mile south-east of Ophel, and is the terminating outlier of the range to the south.

To the east this range falls rapidly towards the Jordan Valley; to the west and south it is bounded by the valley called Kidron or Jehoshaphat, which, commencing north of Jerusalem on a level with the high ground of the Holy City, falls rapidly until it becomes a deep ravine dividing the temple site from Olivet, and near the Pool of Siloam is 400 ft. below the summit of Olivet. It is called by the Arabs the Wâdy en-Nâr (valley of fire).

The summit of the Mount of Offence is on the same level as the temple site (2440 ft.), but from the church of the Ascension northward the range is in few places less than 2600 ft. in height, and thus commanded a view down upon the temple courts, and stood round about the city to the eastward.

The ancient road leading up from Jericho by Wâdy Ḳelt bifurcates at about six miles from Jerusalem (at level 654 ft.); the northern branch running up Wâdy Rawâbeh and over Scopus into the city, the southern branch passing through Bethany and crossing the Olivet range between the church of the Ascension and the Mount of Offence; the southern branch appears to have been the main road to Jericho since the Roman occupation.

There are three roads or paths leading to the summit of Olivet, where the church of the Ascension stands; the central path leading straight up the ascent, those to the north and south making a detour to lessen the steepness. These roads all join together near the bridge over the Kidron close to the Garden of Gethsemane, and go to St. Stephen's gate, immediately north of the temple site. It is probable that over this bridge was the road into Jerusalem from the east from the earliest times, as the rocky sides of Olivet lower down the valley are too steep and precipitous to admit of anything more than a rugged footpath.

When Absalom's rebellion broke out, David fled from Jerusalem over the brook Kidron by way of the Mount of Olives to the wilderness (2 S $15^{14.\ 30}$). Probably he crossed the Kidron by the road where the bridge now spans the ravine, and went up the ascent by the north-easterly road already mentioned. There is no reason for supposing that he went up to the summit where now stands the church of the Ascension—this would not lie in his route. He probably went up nearly due north-east from the Kidron ravine, and ascended to the top of the mountain, and thence he went down the eastern slope till he arrived at the Wâdy Rawâbeh near Bahurim. If a line be drawn from the Kidron bridge north-east it will be found to go over Mount Scopus into Wâdy Rawâbeh.

Bahurim is rendered in the Targum of Jonathan (on 2 S 16^5) as Alimoth or Almon, a city of Benjamin given to the priests, and is identified by Schwarz, Furrer, and Robinson (BRP iii. 287) as 'Almit, north of 'Anâta (Anathoth), about three miles N.N.E. of Jerusalem. Barclay (p. 563) also conjectures that Bahurim lay on the north side of Wâdy Rawâbeh, not far from 'Anâta, but south of it, probably near el-'Isâwiyeh. Lightfoot considers Bahurim as close to Nob (Prospect, i. 42), and Josephus (Ant. VII. ix. 7) mentions that it was off the main road from Jericho to Jerusalem. It would appear, then, that king David took the northern of the two roads to Jericho, went over Scopus and down the Wâdy Rawâbeh, south of Bahurim, from whence Shimei issued, keeping along the hillside above the road, and casting down stones and dust at the king.

Modern tradition has fixed on the southern summit or Mount of Offence as the locality of the high places which Solomon dedicated to Chemosh and Molech, in the hill that is before (or east of) Jerusalem (1 K 11^7). There is no indication where these high places are to be found except in the account of their destruction by Joash (2 K 23^{13}), where they are described as before (or east of) Jerusalem, on the right hand of the הַר הַמַּשְׁחִית 'mount of corruption (or destruction)'; and if the latter may be accepted as the name of the summit due east of the temple site, then the high places on the right or south of the Mount of Corruption would be on the Mount of Offence where modern tradition locates them. The Arabic name of this mountain is Baten el-Howa, 'the bag of wind.'

There seems to have been considerable variety of opinion as to the position of these high places in early Christian times, but the majority of authorities, including the Jewish writers, do not mention the subject. Burckhardt places them over Siloam on the Mount of Offence, while Brocardus places the altar of Chemosh on the northern summit.

On the southern slope of the Mount of Offence is the village of Siloam (Silwân) clinging to the steep hillside, and down below are the fertile fields which are supposed to have formed the king's garden between the Pool of Siloam and the well of Joab (SILOAM). Somewhere here it was that, in the days of Uzziah, about the time that the leprosy fell upon him, an earthquake is said to have rent a part of the mountain on the west at a place called Eroge (En-rogel?), and rolled it four furlongs till it stood still at the east mountain (Olivet), blocking up the roads and the king's garden (Ant. IX. x. 4; cf. Am 1^1, Zec 14^5, 2 Ch 26^{16}).

Josephus does not add materially to our knowledge of the Mount of Olives. He relates that in the time of the procurator Felix, in the reign of Nero, the country was full of robbers and impostors who deluded the people, and that among them was one from Egypt who came to Jerusalem and called himself a prophet, and advised the multitude of the common people to go along with him to the Mount of Olives, which lay over against the city, and at the distance of 5 furlongs. He got together 30,000 men and led them round about by the wilderness to the Mount of Olives, and was ready to break into Jerusalem by force from that place

(Ant. XX. viii. 6, BJ II. xiii. 5; Ac 21[38]). Josephus also states that at the investment of Jerusalem by Titus two legions had orders to encamp at the distance of six furlongs from Jerusalem at the Mount of Olives, which lies over against the city on the east side, and is parted from it by a deep valley interposed between them, which is called Cedron. He further mentions that during the siege of Jerusalem the Jews made an attack on the Roman guard on the Mount of Olives, and that the wall of circumvallation, built round the city to keep the Jews in, began from the camp of the Assyrians, where Titus' camp was pitched, extended to the lower part of Cenopolis, thence along the valley of Cedron to the Mount of Olives, and then bent towards the south and encompassed the mountain as far as the rock called Peristerion (dovecote) and that other hill which lies next to it, and is over the valley which reaches to Siloam (BJ V. ii. 3, iii. 5, xii. 2; VI. ii. 8). It was at this period that the Mount of Olives became denuded of the olives, pines, myrtles, and palms which formerly covered its sides, as mentioned in Neh 8[15] 'Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths, as it is written.'

The Mount of Olives was particularly connected in the minds of the worshippers at the temple of Jerusalem with many of the most important ceremonies, such as the proclamation of the new moons, the waters of purification and burning of the red heifer, and the scapegoat. The Talmudical writings are full of references to the Mount of Olives in connexion with these matters.

The Mount of Olives was called the mountain of Three Lights, on account of—(1) the fire from the altar lighting it up at night; (2) from the first beams of the sun lighting up the summit; (3) from the olive oil which it produced for lighting the lamps of the temple.

The Mount of Olives was the starting-point for the signals by means of fire beacons sent throughout the land when the appearance of the new moon was considered satisfactorily proved. On the 30th day of certain months watchmen were stationed on the commanding heights around Jerusalem, and as soon as any one of them detected the new moon he hastened before the president of the Sanhedrin to apprise him of it. When its appearance was finally approved, a beacon fire was lighted on the Mount of Olives, and torches were moved to and fro in the night until answered from Kurn Surtabeh, a conical mountain projecting into the Jordan Valley; from here the signal was carried to Gryphena, thence to the Ḥaurân, Beth Balten (Biram), and thence to the far east, until the whole land of the Captivity was waving in flames. It is related (Rosh-hashshanah, ii. 2) that the Cuthæans of Samaria spoiled this system of signalling by putting up false lights, and that it was found necessary to send messengers instead. See, further, art. NEW MOON.

The Mount of Olives has also a rôle to play in the future (Targum upon Ca 8[1]). When the dead shall live again, Mount Olivet is to be rent in twain (Zec 14[4]), and all the dead of Israel shall come out thence; and those righteous persons who died in captivity shall be rolled under ground and shall come forth under the Mount of Olives. The Jews also believe (Midrash, Tehillim) that the Messiah will converse much on this mountain.

In connexion with the statement (Ezk 11[23]) that the glory of the Lord went up from the midst of the city, and stood upon the mountain, which is on the east side of the city, Rabbi Janna says the Divine majesty (shekinah) stood 3½ years on Olivet and preached, saying, 'Seek ye the Lord while He may be found; call upon Him while He is near' (Midrash, Tehillim), and then, when all was in vain, returned to its own place. Whether or not this story has a direct allusion to the ministrations of Christ, it is a true expression of His relation respectively to Jerusalem and to Olivet. It is useless to seek for traces of His presence in the streets of the ten times since captured city. It is impossible not to find them in the free space of the Mount of Olives (Stanley, SP 189).

Stanley (op. citat. p. 189) truly points out with regard to the Mount of Olives 'that its lasting glory belongs not to the Old Dispensation, but to the New. Its very barrenness of interest in earlier times sets forth the abundance of those associations which it derives from the closing scenes of the Sacred History. Nothing, perhaps, brings before us more strikingly the contrast of Jewish and Christian feeling, the abrupt and inharmonious termination of the Jewish dispensation,—if we exclude the culminating point of the Gospel History,—than to contrast the blank which Olivet presents to the Jewish pilgrims of the Middle Ages, only dignified by the sacrifice of "the red heifer"; and the vision, too great for words, which it offers to the Christian traveller of all times, as the most detailed and the most authentic abiding-place of Jesus Christ.'

'No name in Scripture calls up associations at once so sacred and so pleasing as that of Olivet. The "mount" is so intimately connected with the private life of our Lord, that we read of it and look at it with feelings of deepest interest and affection. Here He sat with His disciples, telling them of the wondrous events yet to come; of the destruction of the Holy City, of the sufferings, the persecutions, and the final triumph of His followers' (Porter's Handbook to Pal.). Here He was wont to retire for meditation and prayer. Here He was met by a concourse of people from Jerusalem when He made His triumphal entry into the Holy City. Here He came on the night of His betrayal, and past this mount He led His disciples on the day He ascended to heaven.

There are many traditional sites on the Mount of Olives, but there are some that more particularly claim our attention.

The Garden of Gethsemane is to be looked for beyond the Kidron and at the foot of Olivet (Jn 18[1], Lk 22[39]), and the modern traditional site seems to be a likely locality, though both Robinson (i. 347) and Thomson (Land and Book, p. 634) suggest it was higher up the hill. This site is probably the same as that alluded to by Eusebius, Jerome, and the Bordeaux Pilgrim, but there is no earlier tradition. The balance of opinion appears to be in favour of its being near the true site. It is situated on the Olivet bank of the Kidron, not far from the bridge, and immediately south of the road leading from the bridge to the summit of Olivet. On the other side of the road are the 'Grotto of the Agony' and the 'Tomb of the Virgin' (el-Jesmâniyeh of the Arabs, i.e. Gethsemane). There are continuous links of tradition uniting these chapels with the traditional spot early in the 4th cent., where the site may possibly have been fixed by the empress Helena, A.D. 326. See, further, art. GETHSEMANE.

Theodorus (A.D. 530) states, 'and there is the Basilica of St. Mary the Lord's Mother and her sepulchre'; and St. John of Damascus writing in the 8th cent. states that it existed then. A church was erected over it in the time of the empress Pulcheria (A.D. 390–450); since the 8th cent. there has been an unbroken chain of tradition concerning the tomb. Bernard (A.D. 867) found it in ruins; it had been a round church. It was rebuilt by Godfrey, and is described by Sæwulf and William of Tyre as it now exists. The Moslems handed it over to the Christians, A.D. 1363, but they still visit it on a certain day in the year. Eusebius (A.D. 833) states that Gethsemane was at the Mount of Olives, and was then a place of prayer for the faithful, and that the rock where Judas betrayed Christ was in the valley of Jehoshaphat (Itin. Hieros). The Bordeaux Pilgrim also places the same rock in the valley of Jehoshaphat. St. Silvia (A.D. 379–388) describes the service at Gethsemane. Jerome (A.D. 393) says that Gethsemane was at the foot of the mountain, and that a church had been built over it. Eucherius (A.D. 427–448) alludes to the two famous churches where our Lord is said to have had discourse with His disciples, and that of the Ascension. Theodorus (A.D. 530) speaks of a Basilica on the spot where Christ taught His disciples. The presumption is, then, that the Grotto of the Agony was the original site of Gethsemane. The olive trees of Gethsemane are not mentioned by any of the earlier pilgrims, and there is no tradition connecting the very old trees now in the garden with the past.

Modern tradition makes the triumphal entry of our Lord into Jerusalem over the summit of the Mount of Olives, and the scene of the lamentation over Jerusalem about half-way down the hill; but Stanley has shown conclusively that His journey lay by the southern road through Bethany—that by which mounted travellers at the present day approach Jerusalem, over the southern shoulder of Olivet, between the summit which contains the tombs of the Prophets and the Mount of Offence. 'There can be no doubt that this is the route of the triumphal entry, not only because, as just stated, it is and must always have been the usual approach for horsemen and for large caravans, such as then were concerned, but also because this is the only one of the three approaches which meets the requirements of the narrative' (Stanley, SP 191). The road on leaving Bethany passes over a spur of Olivet which runs out to the south-east; from here a view is obtained of the southern part of the Holy City, then the road descends into a hollow, and mounting again by a rugged ascent it reaches a ledge of smooth rock from which the whole city bursts into view. This point is opposite to the south-east angle of the temple enclosure and considerably above it. 'Nowhere else on the Mount of Olives is there a view like this. By the two other approaches, one being over the summit and one over the northern shoulder of the hill, the city reveals itself gradually; there is no partial glimpse, like that which has just been described as agreeing so well with the first outbreak of popular acclamation, still less is there any point where, as here, the city and temple would suddenly burst into view, producing the sudden and affecting impression described in the Gospel narrative' (SP 193).

The last interview of our Lord with His disciples before He ascended into heaven is stated to have taken place on the eastern slopes of Olivet, for 'He led them out as far as to Bethany' (Lk 24^{50}); and it is further stated that 'they returned to Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a Sabbath day's journey.' The traditional site, however, from very early times, has been the middle summit of Olivet, at the church of the Ascension; and there are those who consider that this is quite in keeping with the account in St. Luke's Gospel (see report of Schick, PEFSt, p. 317, 1896). The church of the Ascension is a small octagonal structure within an enclosure of irregular polygonal form, measuring about 40 ft. north and south, by 30 ft. east and west. It is in possession of the Moslems, and a minaret is close beside the west entrance, and is a very conspicuous feature in the landscape. Christian sects are permitted on certain days to perform mass in the chapel. The chapel was built in 1834 on the plan of one built by the Moslems in 1617 on the ruins of the Crusading Church built 1130 and destroyed 1187. The latter was built on the ruins of the Basilica of Constantine. Dr. Schick (PEFSt p. 319, 1896) has carefully traced the indications of the original building from the existing remains, and has proposed a restoration of the place, showing a round church open at the centre to the sky, with the entrance to west and altar to east. This church was built in the 4th cent., and a plan is given by Arculf, A.D. 680, of its restoration in the 7th cent. by the Patriarch Modestus.

The footprints of Christ have experienced various and strange vicissitudes. One is impressed on the pavement of the courtyard; the other has been transferred to the chapel at the south end of the main aisle of the Aksa Mosque in the temple enclosure (see Tobler, Siloahquelle u. Oelberg). Willibald (A.D. 922) and other writers speak of two columns within the church in memory of the two men who said, 'Men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?' This site has now been transferred to the northern hill of Olivet, near Scopus, and is called 'Galilee.'

The Pater Noster Chapel, south of the church of the Ascension, was erected in 1865 by the Princess de la Tour d'Auvergne, and is supposed to stand on an old traditional site of the Middle Ages. The intention of the Princess was to have within 24 small chambers, in which the 'Lord's Prayer' should be written up in 24 different languages, so that pilgrims of all nationalities and all creeds might unite there in repeating the Lord's Prayer.

Within recent years the Russians have erected a high tower and church on the commanding spur north-east of the church of the Ascension, overlooking the eastern slopes of Olivet.

'From the Temple Mount to the western base of Olivet it was not more than 100 or 200 yards straight across, though of course the distance to the summit was much greater, say about half a mile. By the nearest pathway it was only 918 yards from the city gate to the principal summit. Olivet was always fresh and green, even in earliest spring or during parched summer—the coolest, the pleasantest, the most sheltered walk about Jerusalem. Far across this road the temple and its mountain flung their broad shadows and luxuriant foliage, spreading a leafy canopy overhead. They were not gardens in the ordinary Western sense, through which one passed, far less orchards; but something peculiar to those climes, where Nature everywhere strews with lavish hand her flowers, and makes her gardens—where the garden bursts into orchard, and the orchard stretches into field, till, high up, olive and fig mingle with the darker cypress and pine. The stony road up Olivet wound along terraces covered with olives, whose silver and dark-green leaves rustled in the breeze. Here gigantic gnarled fig trees twisted themselves out of rocky soil; there clusters of palms raised their knotty stems high up into waving plumed tufts, or spread, bush like, from the ground, the rich coloured fruit bursting in clusters from the pod. Then there were groves of myrtles, pines, tall stately cypresses, and on the summit itself the gigantic cedars. To these shady retreats the inhabitants would often come from Jerusalem to take pleasure or to meditate, and there one of their most celebrated Rabbis (R. Jochanan ben Saccai) was at one time wont in preference to teach. Thither, also, Jesus with His disciples often resorted' (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 8).

OLIVET (from Lat. olivetum, an oliveyard).—This form has been given to the name of the Mount of Olives in AV at 2 S 15[30] and Ac 1[12]. It was taken from the Vulg. at the latter passage ('a Monte qui vocatur oliueti') by Wyclif, who has been followed by all the Eng. versions (including RV) except the Geneva ('the mount that is called the Olive hil'). In 2 S 15[30] the Vulg. has 'David ascendebat Cliuum oliuarum'; it is Cov. who introduces 'Olivet' here, and it is also the form in the Douay version. RV changes into Olives. Amer. RV prefers Olivet to AV and RV 'the Mount of Olives' in Lk 19[29] 21[37]. See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

OLYMPAS ('Ολυμπᾶς).—The name of a member of the Roman Church greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16[15]. It is an abbreviated form, like several others in the chapter, being apparently shortened for Olympiodorus. He was commemorated Nov. 10.

OLYMPIUS ('Ολύμπιος).—An epithet of Zeus, derived from Mt. Olympus in Thessaly, the abode of the gods. Antiochus Epiphanes, who was occupied in building the magnificent temple of Zeus Olympius (whom he specially honoured, see art. JUPITER) at Athens (Polyb. xxvi. 10, 12), caused the temple at Jerusalem to be dedicated to the same divinity in December, B.C. 168 (2 Mac 6[2], cf. 1 Mac 1[54-59]).

OMAR (עֹמָר, perhaps='eloquent').—A grandson of Esau, Gn 36[11] ('Ωμάν); one of the 'dukes' of Edom, v.[15] ('Ωμάρ). Cf. the parallel passage 1 Ch 1[36] ('Ωμάρ). The clan of which he is the eponym has not been identified.

OMRI (עָמְרִי).—1. A king of Israel. See following article. 2. A descendant of Benjamin, 1 Ch 7[8] (B 'Αμερειά, A 'Αμαριά). 3. One of the ancestors of a Judahite family living at Jerusalem, 1 Ch 9[4] (B 'Αμρεί, A 'Αμρί). 4. A prince of Issachar in the time of David, 1 Ch 27[18] (B 'Αμβρεί, A 'Αμαρί).

OMRI (עָמְרִי, LXX 'Αμβρ(ε)ί, Assyr. Ḫumri or Ḫumria *) was the first king of a dynasty which reigned nearly sixty years, and consisted of four successive rulers (B.C. 900–842). Omri first appears in biblical history as the general of Elah's army, at that time engaged in conducting siege operations against the Philistine town Gibbethon (1 K 16[16ff.]). On the other hand, at this very moment another military commander, Zimri, was carrying on a plot against the besotted and helpless Israelite king, Elah, who suffered assassination in his royal residence in Tirzah. This conspiracy, however, was only partially successful, as it never succeeded in gathering Israel under its standard. The nation preferred to rally round the more powerful as well as more loyal military rival, Omri, at Gibbethon, and made him king. Under that capable leader Tirzah was besieged and captured, Zimri was compelled to seek refuge in the fortress-citadel of the royal palace, and perished amid the flames kindled either by his own hands or by those of his foes Omri, however, was not even now left without a competitor for the vacant throne. Yet the opposition of Tibni was probably soon crushed, and Omri commenced a reign not only longer but certainly of far greater importance than the brief narrative 1 K 16[23-28] would lead us to suppose. Even in that short section the military character of the monarch is clearly revealed to us by the reference to his erection of the fortress-city Samaria as a royal residence and capital of the Northern kingdom, to take the place of the less defensible town of Tirzah. The superior strategic position of Samaria, a conical hill standing 400 ft. above the base of the broad valley, is evidenced by the long siege which it endured and the stout resistance which it offered to the armies of Sargon (B.C. 722), as well as to the Syrian hosts in the preceding century (1 K 20, 2 K 6[24ff.]). Its picturesque appearance is described by Isaiah (28[1]) as 'Ephraim's proud crown on the summit of a fertile valley.' This place is said to have been purchased by Omri from Shemer (so also LXX) for two silver talents (or about £800).

Respecting the wars waged by Omri scarcely anything is stated in the biblical narrative. From 1 K 20[34] we derive a valuable hint. Syria, the formidable foe of David, had remained quiescent since that monarch had inflicted upon it a series of overwhelming defeats. But in the days of the divided kingdom Syria became aggressive, and aggrandized itself at the expense of its weakened Southern neighbour. From 1 K 20[34] we learn that Omri must have sustained some reverses in his war with Syria, and was compelled to cede some streets or quarters in Samaria to the Aramæan residents. But these reverses may have been—probably were—only temporary. In any case, they are wholly insufficient to warrant us in following Wellhausen in supposing that Israel became thereby reduced to vassalage by Aram * (see art. AHAB). Kittel is probably right in considering it fairly certain that Omri made heroic efforts to rid himself of the pressure of his Northern foe which he had inherited from his predecessors, but without complete success.† It is quite evident, however, that the struggle did not leave him in the least degree crippled. Otherwise he would not have been in a position to conduct a war of conquest against his South-eastern neighbour Chemosh-Melech, king of Moab (see below).

Moab, which had been subjugated by David, began to throw off its allegiance to Israel in the troubled years which followed the disruption. But the energetic military rule of Omri put an end to this independence. These facts we learn from the Stone of Dibân, erected by Mesha', son of Chemosh-Melech. We quote (on next page) from the original, which may be found in Smend and Socin's copy, with notes (Inschrift des Königs Mesa), in Driver's Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel, Appendix to Introduction, p. lxxxvi ff., and in the art. MOAB, above, p. 404.

From this passage we can infer the importance of Omri's military operations in Moab. He acquired the district around Mehedeba; and so thoroughly was Moab subdued that it was compelled to pay an enormous tribute of wool (2 K 3[4]. See Driver, l.c. p. lxxxix).

* The equivalence of Hebrew-Canaanite ע with Assyr. ḫ is illustrated in Schrader, COT[2] i. p. 179. Thus עַזָּה is in Assyr. Ḫaziti, עֵיר צַחְרוּ, צָחְרוּ is Kinaḫḫi (Tel el-Amarna Inscr.), עִבְרִי probably=Ḫabiri, Ammi-rabi (Amraphel)=Ḫammu-rabi.

* Jahrb. für deutsche Theol. xx. p. 27, Skizzen u. Vorarb. i. p. 31. The view adopted above and also in the art. AHAB is also sustained by McCurdy, History, Prophecy, and the Monuments, i. p. 278.

'Omri was king of Israel and oppressed Moab a long time [lit. many days], for Chemosh was wroth with his land. And his son succeeded him [i.e. Omri], and he too said [=thought אָמַר בִּלְבָבוֹ] "I will oppress Moab." In my time [i.e. of Mesha] he said thu[s]. But I saw [my desire] on him and his house, and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction.* So Omri obtained possession of the land of Mehēdeba, and (one) dwelt therein during his days and half the days of his son, forty years' . . .

The inscription also sheds a valuable light on the chronology of Omri's reign, since it shows that the period of his occupation of Moabite territory and of the occupation by his son Ahab covered the remainder of his own reign and half of his son Ahab's reign, making 40 years in all. It is of course not necessary to take חצי in a strict mathematical sense. On the other hand it is quite clear that the biblical chronology is at fault, since it ascribes to Omri a reign of only 12 years, and to Ahab's entire reign 22 years, making the total length of both reigns only 34 years. From these data of the Moabite Stone it is evident that we must extend considerably the reign of Omri. In the scheme set forth in Schrader's COT[2] ii. p. 322 ff., Omri's reign is reckoned to be 25 years (B.C. 900–875), ten years being deducted from the reign of Baasha. These dates harmonize better with (a) the results of Assyriology, (b) with the deep impression which Omri had produced in Western Asia by his military prowess. This impression was no fleeting one, but extended over a very long period. We have clear indication of this in the fact that Palestine was called (mât) Bît Ḫumri, or 'land of the house of Omri,' from the time of Shalmaneser II. (860) to that of Sargon (722–705). The usurper Jehu is called on Shalmaneser's black obelisk Ja'ua abal Ḫumri, 'Jehu son of Omri.' And no less deep was the impression produced in Israel and Judah. The reference to the 'statutes of Omri' in Mic 6[16] is an indication of this, his name being coupled with that of his son Ahab. What is meant by this expression, and what forms of practice it is intended to cover, we do not know. Combining it with the phrase that 'he did evil more than all that were before him' (1 K 16[25]), we are led to infer not only that he is judged in an unfavourable light, like Jeroboam and his successors, in accordance with later and stricter canons of Deuteronomic legalism, but also that in all probability the beginnings of Phœnician influence in religion, for which Ahab's reign became notorious, were already infecting the cultus of Israel in Samaria. To this the passage in Micah seems to point.

ON (אוֹן; B Αὖν, A Αὐνάν; Luc. Ἀμνάν).—A Reubenite associated with Dathan and Abiram in a rebellion against Moses, Nu 16[1] (JE).† There is reason to believe that the mention of On is due to textual corruption, for no such personage appears in the subsequent narrative, and the name is found nowhere else in the Old Testament. For the probable restoration of the text see KORAH, p. 12[b].

ON (אוֹן, אֵן, Ὼν).—A city in Lower Egypt, Gn 41[45. 50] 46[20] (Potiphera, priest of On). In Ezk 30[17] it occurs again, but punctuated אָוֶן AVEN (which see). On is the hieroglyphic Anu, the name of Heliopolis. In Jer 43[13] the city is called Beth-shemesh, 'House of the Sun,' the hieroglyphic Per Ra, its sacred name. The name On seems gradually to have fallen into disuse; the Greeks called the place Ἡλιούπολις, from which the Coptic name is also derived. In the Bible, however, both Gr. and Copt. VSS retained the name On. LXX gives in Jer 43 [Gr. 50][13] τοὺς στύλους Ἡλίου πόλεως τοὺς ἐν Ὼν, and in Ex 1[11] curiously adds to Pithom and Raamses Ὼν ἡ ἐστιν Ἡλίου πόλις as another city built by the children of Israel. The ruins of Heliopolis lie on the E. edge of the Delta, but outside the Delta proper, touching the edge of the desert, not far below the forking of the Nile. The city was built partly on the desert, partly on alluvium. Its site is now marked by a considerable mound surrounded by a massive crude brick wall. In the area occupied anciently by the temple there still stands an obelisk, erected by Usertesen I. of the 12th Dynasty, the base hardly above the level of the water that percolates from the canals; and though blocks from the ancient temple are still lying in numbers under the soil, the rise of the water-level makes it extremely difficult to recover them. On the fall of paganism the site was plundered of its building materials for the adornment of Alexandria, Cairo, and other towns in Lower Egypt. Entire obelisks had previously been removed to Alexandria (by Augustus), to Rome, and to Constantinople, and, with the exception of some monuments in museums and of the obelisk mentioned above as being still in situ, the chief monuments of Heliopolis now existing are the obelisks of Rome, Constantinople, London, and New York.

Anu was the capital of the 13th nome of Lower Egypt (which nome was probably bounded by the desert on the E., the Pelusiac branch of the Nile on the N., the Memphitic nome on the S., and the nome of Phacusa [20th] on the N.E.), but its great importance was sacerdotal, and due to its chief temple of Ra, the centre of Sun worship in Egypt, and the most important seat of learning in the

* This implies that Ahab, son of Omri, was compelled to relinquish his hold of Moab. This probably took place during his wars with Syria. Nevertheless he did not lose all. To identify the 'son' (lines 6 and 8) with Jehoram, thus ignoring the two intervening reigns of Ahab and Ahaziah (cf. CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 402), is highly improbable. The campaign of 2 K 3 against Moab was an attempt to retain the slight remnant of power which Mesha now threw off. Comp. McCurdy, vol. i. p. 282.

† B. W. Bacon, who seeks here, as in many other instances, to break up JE into its constituents, suggests that, according to J, On the son of Peleth (v.[1d]) and Korah (not a descendant of Levi, as P makes him in v.[1a], but) a kinsman of Caleb (cf. 1 Ch 2[43]), were the leaders of the lay revolt against Moses, while the leaders in E are Dathan and Abiram (v.[1ee]). See, further NUMBERS, p. 570[b].

country. Like other sacred centres, this city is found mentioned in some of the earliest inscriptions, dating from the 4th Dynasty. It is recorded of Usertesen I. (about B.C. 2500) that he built, i.e. rebuilt, the temple. Perhaps the greatest event in its early history was the temporary suppression of Ra worship and the substitution for it of Set worship by the Hyksos, as recorded in a papyrus of the Ramesside period, now in the British Museum. A contemporary papyrus (also in the British Museum), known in science as the Mathematical papyrus, and written in the reign of Apepa I., indicates that the Hyksos court sojourned sometimes at Heliopolis, sometimes at Zaru (Avaris?). These two documents show the great importance of Heliopolis at the time of the Hyksos, when Lower Egypt was a separate kingdom. Memphis apparently was less favoured by the Hyksos, though probably it was completely in their power, while Upper Egypt seems only to have acknowledged their suzerainty. On the expulsion of the Hyksos by the first king of the 18th Dynasty, Ra worship was restored, and the temple of Ra at Heliopolis was rebuilt or re-adorned long before any other temple in or near the Delta. Monuments of Tahutmes III. have been found here, while elsewhere in Lower Egypt outside Memphis nothing is found of the New Kingdom earlier than Amenhotep III., whose cartouche occurs at Bubastis and Athribis. Like many of his predecessors, Ramses III. made great gifts to this temple, and the pious Ethiopian invader, Piankhi, in his great inscription from Gebel Barkal, dwells on the ceremonies that he performed here. In Roman times it fell rapidly from its high estate; even Strabo notes its partial desertion. It lay on the road from Syria to Memphis, and thus was peculiarly exposed to attack from the most formidable quarter: important battles have been fought on this site again and again, and even in modern times.

It is difficult to say to what period the priest Potiphera, the father-in-law of Joseph, belonged. His name being compounded with that of Ra, shows that it does not date from Hyksos times, 15–16th Dynasties, when Set overshadowed everything. But the form of the name was very common from the 23rd Dynasty onward (c. B.C. 800), though hardly known as early even as the 20th. Zaphenath-paneah (Gn 41[45]) is also a form of name belonging almost solely to the same late period (see PHARAOH).

The Sun-god was worshipped at Heliopolis first in the form of Ra; secondly, as Tum, the setting sun; thirdly, as Harakhti, the hawk of the horizon, called by the Greeks Harmakhis; fourthly, as Khepera, figured by a scarabæus, and symbolizing the vivifying and reproductive force of the sun. Of sacred animals here the bull Mnevis was the most important; and the heron, called bnw, was the original of the famous phœnix. From the earliest times obelisks were connected with the Sun worship (cf. Jer 43[13] [Beth-shemesh]). There was also a sacred pool or spring, mentioned especially by Piankhi, 'in which Ra was wont to wash his face'; hence the Arab. name for this locality is 'Ain esh-shems, 'spring of the sun.' In Christian story this is the spring in which the Virgin washed her son while resting in the shade of an acacia tree on her journey into Egypt. The latest successor to the tree is still shown in an enclosure at Matarîyeh. See AVEN, BETH-SHEMESH.

ONAM (עוֹנָם).—1. The eponym of a Horite clan, Gn 36[23] (Ὠμάν)=1 Ch 1[40] (B Ὠνάν, A Ὠνάμ). 2. A son of Jerahmeel, 1 Ch 2[26. 28] (B Ὠζόμ, A Οὐνομά). See ONAN, footnote.

ONAN (עוֹנָן, Αὐνάν).—A son of Judah. Gn 38[4] 46[12], Nu 26[19], 1 Ch 2[3]. After the decease of his elder brother, Er, he was instructed by his father to contract a levirate marriage with Tamar. The device by which he evaded the object of this marriage 'was evil in the sight of the LORD, and He slew him,' Gn 38[8-10] (J). It is impossible to disentangle from this narrative what was the action of certain individuals and what is tribal history. Probably Er and Onan both stand for Judahite clans which at an early period, from what cause we know not, became extinct.* The present form of the narrative discloses a desire to impress the duty of marriage with a deceased brother's wife (see Dillm. and Holzinger, ad loc.).

ONESIMUS ('Ονήσιμος) of Colossæ (Col 4[9]), a slave of Philemon (Philem[16]), probably a Phrygian by race, but bearing a Greek name which from its signification 'helpful' was often bestowed upon slaves (cf. Zahn, Einl. i. p. 324; Lightfoot, Philemon, p. 376 note). 'Helpful' had, however, proved unprofitable (ἄχρηστος, Philem[11]); he wronged his master, perhaps misusing money intrusted to him (cf. Lk 16[2]), perhaps stealing from him, and ran away from Colossæ either to Cæsarea or, more probably, to Rome. There he gained access to St. Paul in his imprisonment; who 'begat' him in Christ and made him profitable (εὔχρηστος, Philem[11]) once more. With such goodwill, indeed, did he do service that St. Paul would fain have kept him to minister to himself; but, feeling it a duty to return him to his master, he wrote the Epistle to Philemon, appealing to him to receive his slave, now become a brother worthy of love and trust, and himself undertaking to refund any money which Philemon had lost through the action of Onesimus (Philem [8-20]). This letter was probably intrusted to Tychicus, who was bearing the Colossian letter, and a special word of commendation of Onesimus was sent to the whole Church (Col 4[9]).

The result of St. Paul's appeal is unknown, but subsequent tradition treated Onesimus as a prominent and active member of the Church. These traditions are very various: he was identified with a bishop of Bercea (Apost. Constit. vii. 46), with the bishop of Ephesus in the time of Ignatius (Eph. i.); he was said to have preached in Spain, and the apocryphal Acts of the Spanish sisters Xanthippe and Polyxena are written in his name (c. 38; Texts and Studies, ii. 3, 'Apocrypha Anecdota'): he was said to have been martyred either at Puteoli (Euthalius) or at Rome ('Mart. Ign.' Roman Acts, c. 10). But the name was so common, not only in classical times for slaves, but also in later Christian use (Smith, Dictionary of Christian Biography, s.v.), that various Onesimi have probably been confused, and it is impossible to extricate any certain fact. His memory was observed by the Latin Church on Feb. 16, by the Greek Church on Feb. 15, and also in conjunction with Philemon, Appia, and Archippus, on Nov. 22: the various traditions will be found in the Acta Sanctorum (ii. 855–859) and the Greek Menœa (pp. 89–92) for those days. A most interesting modern romance of his life will be found in Onesimus, by the author of Philochristus (London, 1882).

ONESIPHORUS ('Ονησίφορος, 'profit-bringer').—A friend of St. Paul at Rome, mentioned twice only in the NT, 2 Ti 1[16-18] 4[19]. From the former of these passages it appears that Onesiphorus when he arrived in Rome and learnt that St. Paul was in captivity, sought him out diligently, and 'refreshed' him, not with bodily nourishment only, but with every token of friendship. Of this friendship St. Paul retained a very lively recollection, the more so that others, the Asiatics Phygelus and Hermogenes, had deserted him (2 Ti 1^{15}); and in writing to Timothy recalled further the many good offices which Onesiphorus had performed at Ephesus, of which Timothy from his residence there would know 'better' (βέλτιον) than St. Paul or any one else could tell him. It should be noted that these offices are not represented as extended specially to St. Paul himself, as the AV, by the insertion of 'unto me,' implies; nor is the use of the verb διακονέω sufficient warrant for the belief that Onesiphorus occupied the office of a deacon at Ephesus (see Wieseler, Chronol. p. 463).

It is not perfectly clear whether, at the time when St. Paul wrote, Onesiphorus was alive or dead; but the references to his 'house' rather than to himself in 2 Ti 1^{16} 4^{19}, and still more the words of the prayer in 2 Ti 1^{18} 'The Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day,' make it most probable that he was now dead (so de Wette, Huther, Alford, Ellicott, Fairbairn, v. Soden). If so, the passage gains an additional interest from the use that has been made of it in connexion with the argument for prayers for the dead. Thus it is appealed to in support of such a practice by Bishop Archibald Campbell in his anonymously published book on The Intermediate or Middle State of Departed Souls, 1713, p. 72; and amongst more recent writers by Plumptre (The Spirits in Prison, pp. 128, 266) and Luckock (After Death, p. 77, The Intermediate State, p. 211). Others, as Barrett (The Intermediate State, p. 113), find in the words no more than 'a pious wish.' On the whole question it may be sufficient to quote the carefully weighed words of Hammond (Paraphrase and Annot. on the NT, in loco): 'How far it may be fit to pray for them that are departed this life, needs not to be disputed here. 'Tis certain that some measure of bliss, which shall at the day of judgment be vouchsafed the Saints, when their bodies and souls shall be reunited, is not till then enjoyed by them, and therefore may safely and fitly be prayed for them (in the same manner as Christ prays to his Father, to glorifie him with that glory which he had before the world was). And this is a very distant thing from that prayer which is now used in the Romish Church for deliverance from temporal pains, founded in their doctrine of Purgatory, which would no way be conclusible from hence, though Onesiphorus, for whom Saint Paul here prays for mercy, had been now dead.'

Winer (RWB ii. 175) quotes a tradition from Fabricius (Lux. Evang. p. 117) that Onesiphorus became bishop of Corone in Messenia.

ONIARES.—1 Mac 12^{19} (AV). See ARIUS.

ONIAS ('Ονίας, of which Jastrow suggests a correspondence with אֹנִיָּא 'a man of Oni' [אוֹנִי = אוֹנוֹ Neh 7^{37}], though he appears to prefer the better derivation from חִנָּא or חוֹנִי, Menach. xiii. 10, an abbrev. of חֲנַנְיָא). 1. ONIAS I. was the son of Jaddua (Jos. Ant. XI. viii. 7), and father of Simon the Just (ib. XII. ii. 4; Sir 50^{1}; see, however, Herzfeld, Gesch. ii. 189 ff.; Zunz, Vorträge^{2}, 38). In 1 Mac 12^{7} he is said to have received a friendly letter from the Spartan king Arius ('Αρειος, more correctly 'Αρεύς; see Corp. Inscript. Attic. ii. 352). He must therefore have been a contemporary of Areus I., who reigned from B.C. 309 to 365 (Diod. XX. 29). Areus II. died at the age of eight in B.C. 255 (Pausanias, iii. 6. 6), and, as no other Areus is known, the evidence is strongly against Josephus, who represents the communication as having been made to Onias III. The alleged letter is given in two forms in Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 10 and in 1 Mac $12^{20\text{-}23}$.

2. ONIAS II. was the son of Simon the Just (Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 1). On the death of his father he was disqualified by youth for immediate succession to the high priesthood, which, however, he afterwards held during the greater part of the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes. He is not mentioned in the Apocr., but Josephus (Ant. XII. iv. 1–5) describes how advantage was taken of his imprudence by his nephew to found a family whose civil influence exceeded for a time that of the titular high priest.

3. ONIAS III. was the son of Simon II. (ib. XII. iv. 10), whom he succeeded in B.C. 198 or 195. His loyalty to the Syrian over-rule was such that Seleucus Philopator bore the cost of 'the services of the sacrifices' (2 Mac 3^{3}). But he was soon involved in a quarrel with Simon the Benjamite, who held in the temple a high office, similar in part to that of the ædileship. Simon became impatient of the priest's control, and in despite informed the Syrian military governor that the temple was full of treasures, which lay at the mercy of any despoiler. Seleucus quickly despatched Heliodorus to seize this money, but the latter is said (2 Mac 3^{24}) to have been deterred by an apparition, and to have returned to Antioch in dismay. Simon ascribed the failure to the high priest's trickery (2 Mac 4^{1}), and the quarrel became so bitter that the latter decided at length to proceed in person to the king. Scarcely had he reached Antioch when Seleucus was assassinated; and, in the confusion that followed, the high priesthood was secured by purchase by Jason, the brother of Onias, and Onias himself was detained at Antioch. Jason proceeded at once to redeem his promise to thoroughly Hellenize Judæa (2 Mac $4^{9\text{-}15}$); but in B.C. 171 he was deposed by Antiochus, whose favour had been won by the larger gifts of Menelaus (2 Mac 4^{24}), the brother of Jason (Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1), or more probably of Simon (2 Mac 4^{23}). Menelaus was rebuked by Onias for sacrilege in stealing some of the vessels of the temple (2 Mac $4^{32\text{f.}}$), and in revenge had him decoyed from his refuge in the sanctuary at Daphne and put to death (2 Mac 4^{34}). The account of Onias' murder is regarded by some as apocryphal; see Willrich, Juden u. Griechen vor d. makkab Erhebung, 1895, p. 71 ff., Wellh. GGA, 1895, p 950 f., IJG^{3}, 1897, p. 244 ff., cf. Baethgen, ZAW, 1886, p. 278 ff.; but see, on the other side, Büchler, Die Tobiaden u. Oniaden, 1899, pp. 106 ff., 240 f., 275 f., 353 ff. Josephus simply states (Ant. XII. v. 1) that Jason succeeded to the high priesthood on the death of Onias.

4. ONIAS, generally reckoned as IV. though it is not likely that he ever acted as high priest in Jerusalem. On the death of his father Onias III., he was too young for the succession; and, afterwards finding no means of securing the rights of his birth, he took refuge with Ptolemy Philometor in Egypt (Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 7). About B.C. 154 (Grätz, iii. 34) he obtained from the king, who wished to conciliate the Jews and use them in his wars with Syria, the gift of a disused temple of Bubastis Agria (the cat-headed goddess Bast or Bastet; see Herod. ii. 137, and Egypt. Exp. Fund, Eighth Memoir, 3 f.) in Leontopolis, and reconstructed it after the model of the temple in Jerus. (Jos. Ant. XIII. iii. 1–3). The foundation was defended as a fulfilment of the prophecy of Is $19^{18\text{f.}}$; and a complete temple service was instituted, which was continued until A.D. 73, when the temple was closed by the Romans (Jos. Wars, VII. x. 2–4). From Menachoth xiii. 10 it appears that only partial sanction was given to the services of this temple by the Jewish authorities at home, whilst in the opinion even of the Egyp. Jews it never entirely superseded the temple at Jerusalem

(Jos. c. Ap. i. 7; Phil. Opp. ed. Mang. ii. 646). Onias was afterwards appointed civil governor of the district in which his temple was situated, and two of his sons received high commands in the Egyp. army (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 4).

R. W. MOSS.

ONIAS, REGION OF (Jos. Ant. XIV. viii. 1; BJ I. ix. 4, VII. x. 2), used loosely of the part of Lower Egypt that contained Jewish settlements, but strictly of the district in which was the temple built by Onias IV. Its position is variously described by Josephus, as in the nome or province of Heliopolis (Ant. XII. ix. 7; Ptol. IV. 5. 3); as at Leontopolis in the said nome (Jos. Ant. XIII. iii. 2); and as 180 stadia from Memphis (BJ VII. x. 3). The reference consequently cannot be to the nome of Leontopolis, but to a district of the same name within that of Heliopolis. The name itself was not uncommon, though there is no evidence of its application to any site within the nome in question. From Memphis to the city of Heliopolis the distance approximates closely to that given by Josephus; but his language is vague, and allows the assumption that he was not calculating the distance to the temple of Onias, but to the chief town of the province within which the latter was situated. North-east of Heliopolis, at a distance of 24 miles, is the town of Belbeis, which has been suggested as the site of the temple, because it was a place of the worship of the goddess Sekhet, who has been identified with Bubastis Agria (Jos. Ant. XIII. iii. 2; Egypt. Exp. Fund, Seventh Memoir, p. 20); but Belbeis is both in another nome, and at too great a distance from Memphis. Less than 10 miles north of Heliopolis, and within that province, is a mound, Tell el-Yahudiyeh, in the neighbourhood of which the remains of a great Jewish cemetery have been found (Egypt. Exp. Fund, Seventh Memoir, 51–53, where, however, F. Ll. Griffith pronounces against the identification with the site of the city of Onias on the ground of the general character of the antiquities met with, though on p. 19 Naville strongly supports it). The district is full of traditions of a powerful Jewish settlement; and within its limits, if not on this particular mound, it is almost certain that Onias built his temple.

ONIONS (בְּצָלִים bĕṣālîm, κρόμμυον, cæpe, Arab. baṣal).—This word occurs only once in the Bible (Nu 11^5) in connexion with fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, and garlic. The latter two are species of the same genus, Allium. The onion is A. Cepa, L. It is universally cultivated in the East, and enters into many cooked dishes and salads. The onions of Syria and Palestine have a very sweet taste, and, when cooked, do not impart to the breath the strong odour which so often forbids the use of the onion as an article of diet elsewhere. Working men often make their midday meal from a loaf or two of bread and a couple of raw onions. It is customary to skewer bits of meat alternating with segments of onion and tomato, and broil them over glowing coals. With fresh native bread they make a most savoury and appetizing meal to persons accustomed to them.

ONO (אוֹנוֹ, once Neh 7^{37} אוֹנוֹ).—This city is said in 1 Ch 8^{12} (B Ὠνάν, A Ὠνώ) to have been built by the sons of Benjamin at an early period, and the Talmud (Mishna, Erakhin, ix. 6) states that it was fortified by Joshua. There is no mention of it, however, in the OT except in books written after the Captivity, when it was inhabited by Benjamites, Ezr 2^{33} (B Ὠνών, A Ὠνώ), Neh 6^2 ('the plain of Ono' גֵּי חֲרָשִׁים, B πεδίον Ἐνώ, A π. Ὠνά), 7^{37} (B Ὠνώ, A Ὠνών), 11^{35} (א$^{c.\ a.}$ Ὠνώ, BA א* om.). It is noticed with Lod (which see), and in the Talmud the two towns with their adjoining territory are included in the designation גֵּי חֲרָשִׁים 'valley of the craftsmen' (Jerus. Megillah, i. 1; cf. 1 Ch 4^{14}, Neh 11^{35}). Ono is the modern Kefr 'Ânâ, north of Ludd (the ancient Lod or Lydda). Its antiquity is shown by its being noticed, along with the last-named place, in the lists of Tahutmes III. c. B.C. 1600.

ONUS (Ὠνούς), the form in which the name Ono (wh. see), a town of Benjamin, appears in 1 Es 5^{22}.

ONYCHA (שְׁחֶלֶת shĕḥēleth, ὄνυξ, onyx). — The operculum of a shell-fish, called by the Gr. and Lat. writers ὄνυξ, onyx, from its resemblance to a nail. When burned it emits a pungent, aromatic odour, from the combustion of the animal matter which it contains. The name, doubtless, applied to the opercula of many species of the shells of the Strombus tribe in the Mediterranean and Red Seas. Onycha* is mentioned as one of the components of the sacred perfume (Ex 30^{34}).

G. E. POST.

ONYX.—This is the rendering of the Heb. שֹׁהַם shōham, in AV and RV text (see below), but it is impossible to be certain of its correctness. There are no cognate words in Heb. literature to throw light on the inquiry. The attempts to find an etymology in other languages of the same family fail absolutely or fall short at the critical point. The Arab. سهم is, indeed, used in the sense 'to be pale,' which would suit the onyx fairly well; but that meaning is only the secondary, not the radical one. The district سُحَيم, Socheim, in Yemen, produced a specially fine onyx; but there are two weighty objections against the derivation thus suggested, namely, the almost invariable use of the article with the Heb. word (הַשֹּׁהַם), and the impossibility of ה representing خ. Schrader's conjecture, so far as it goes, is decidedly the most helpful. He proposes (COT^{2} i. p. 30) to identify the shōham with the Assyro-Babylonian sâmtu, which means 'dark,' and is used as the name of a valuable stone from Melukhkha in Upper Babylonia. Sayce (Expos. Times, vii. [1896] p. 306) accepts the connexion of the two words, and boldly adds, 'a blue-green stone, probably the turquoise.' In this last particular he is too hasty. Fried. Delitzsch (Assyr. Handwb. p. 488*b*) holds that the adj. sâmtu means 'dark coloured': it is used of clouds, and of a fruit which is neither white nor black. If this is so,—and Pinches agrees with Schrader and Delitzsch,—sâmtu would not be the right word for the turquoise.

The Versions are distinctly unhelpful. The Pesh. and Targ. have 'beryl.' The LXX is altogether inconsistent with itself: Gn 2^{12} πράσινος; Ex 28^{20} βηρύλλιον; Ex 25^7 35^9 σάρδιος; 28^9 35^{27} 39^{13} σμάραγδος; Ezk 28^{13} σάπφειρος; Job 28^{16} ὄνυξ; 1 Ch 29^2 σόομ. Aq. uses σαρδόνυξ at Gn 2^{12} and ὄνυξ in Ex; Josephus (Ant. III. vii. 5, and BJ V. v. 7) has σαρδόνυξ and ὄνυξ. Vulg. usually employs onychinus, but at Ezk 28^{13} beryl, and at Job 28^{16} sardonyx. Our AV adheres to onyx; but, curiously enough, the RV, whilst retaining this in the text, has placed 'or beryl' in the marg. of some of the passages: cf. Ex 35^9 39^6, Ezk 28^{13} with Gn 2^{12}, Ex $28^{9.\ 20}$ $35^{13.\ 27}$, Job 28^{16}, 1 Ch 29^2. The uncertainty of the Versions reappears in the writings of the expositors. 'Beryl,' 'carbuncle,' 'chalcedony,' 'onyx,' and 'turquoise' have all had their adherents. So far as the Bible is concerned, two points are clear. (1) The shōham stone was esteemed of considerable value. Job 28[16] calls it 'the precious shōham.' Ezk 28[13] names it amongst the valuable stones which bedecked the king of Tyre. It is the one gem which finds mention when the offerings of the Israelites are enumerated (Ex 35[9. 27]), and when the Chronicler recounts the treasures prepared by David for the temple (1 Ch 29[2]). (2) It was well adapted for engraving. Two shōham stones were to be engraven with the names of the twelve tribes, six names on each, and were to be set on the shoulder-pieces of the high priest's ephod, Ex 28[9. 12] (see art. EPHOD). Again, the middle stone in the fourth row of jewels on the high priest's breastplate, bearing the name of one of the tribes, possibly Asher or Manasseh, was a shōham (see art. BREASTPLATE OF THE HIGH PRIEST).

Streeter appears to think (Prec. Stones, p. 214) that the claims of the onyx are negatived by the fact that the shōham 'is classed with the ruby, topaz, diamond, chrysolite, jasper, sapphire, and chrysoprase.' But the argument is inconclusive. And, seeing that the onyx satisfies the two conditions named above,* we must be content in this art. to describe it. Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 24) explains the name ὄνύχιον, from ὄνυξ, 'the fingernail,' by quoting Sudines, 'in gemma esse candorem, unguis humani similitudinem,' and Theoph. (de Lap. lvii.) describes its appearance accurately: τὸ δ' ὀνύχιον, μικτὴ λευκῷ καὶ φαιῷ παρ' ἄλληλα. It belongs to the stratified class of silicon stones. It lends itself with great readiness to the gem-cutter's and engraver's art, not only by reason of its toughness, moderate hardness, and absence of grain, but also because the design, cut in one stratum, is thrown into relief by the background of another colour. 'The best stones [for engraving] are those with a white layer on a dark ground. They are still better when there is a third layer above, as white with a reddish or brownish tinge.' In the Oriental onyx there are three layers: that at the top, red, blue, or brown; that in the middle, white; then a jet black or a deep brown. This stone was much used for signets during the Roman empire. But it must be admitted that an unstratified gem is really more suited for intaglio work. No precious stone varies more in value. King (Antique Gems, p. 11) speaks of one the size of a crown piece selling for £30. Every one is familiar with the specimens that are worth only a few pence.

Occult qualities were formerly ascribed to this, as to other gems. Marbodus, master of the Cathedral school of Anjou (1067–1081), and afterwards bishop of Rennes, writes of the onyx as follows:—

> 'Called by the onyx round the sleeper stand
> Black dreams, and phantoms rise, a grisly band:
> Whoso on neck or hand this stone displays
> Is plagued with lawsuits and with civil frays;
> Round infants' necks if tied, so nurses shew,
> Their tender mouths with slaver overflow.'

And the same good bishop's Cives Cœlestis Patriæ sets forth the symbolism of the sardonyx, which may properly be considered a mere variety of the onyx—

> 'SARDONYX, with its threefold hue,
> Sets forth the inner man to view;
> Where dark humility is seen,
> And chastity, with snow-white sheen,
> And scarlet marks his joy to bleed
> In Martyrdom, if faith shall need.'

OPEN.—This verb (like aperio and ἀνοίγνυμι) is occasionally used in AV (though the use was then archaic) in the sense of 'make known,' 'disclose.' Thus Jer 20[12] 'Unto thee have I opened my cause' (גלה, LXX ἀπεκάλυψα, Vulg. revelavi, Wyc. 'shewide,' Cov. [wrongly] 'committe,' Gen. 'opened,' Douay and RV 'revealed'*); 2 Es 10[49] 'Of these things which have chanced, these are to be opened unto thee' (hæc erant tibi aperienda); 13[21] 'The interpretation of the vision shall I shew thee, and I will open unto thee the thing that thou hast required' (adaperiam tibi); 2 Mac 12[41] 'who had opened the things that were hid' (φανερὰ ποιῶν; RV 'who maketh manifest'); Lk 24[32] 'while he opened to us the Scriptures' (διήνοιγεν); Ac 17[3] 'Paul . . . reasoned with them out of the scriptures, opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered' (διανοίγων); He 4[13] 'All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do' (τετραχηλισμένα,† RV 'laid open before'). Examples in contemporary and earlier writers are frequent: Dt 29[29] Tind. 'the secrettes perteyne unto the Lorde oure God and the thinges that are opened perteyne unto us'; Is 2[1] Cov. 'Morover this is the worde that was opened unto Esaye the sonne of Amos, upon Iuda and Ierusalem'; Mt 10[26] Tind. 'There is no thinge so close that shall not be openned' (Wyc. 'schewid,' Gen. 'disclosed,' Rhem. 'revealed'); 16[17] Tind. 'fleshe and bloud hath not opened unto the that' (Rhem. 'revealed it to thee'); so Lk 2[35] 10[21], Jn 12[38] ('To whom ys the arme of the Lorde opened?'), 1 P 5[1] [all 'open' in Tind., 'reveal' in Rhem. and AV]; Jn 15[15] 'all things that I have heard of my father I have opened to you' (Rhem. 'notified,' Wyc. and AV 'made knowen'). Cf. Lk 19[heading] in Rhem. NT, 'In Iericho he lodgeth in the house of Zachæus the Publicane, and against the murmuring Iewes openeth the reasons of his so doing'; Gosson, Schoole of Abuse (Arber's ed. p. 27), 'Chiron was . . . a Reader of Phisicke, by opening the natures of many simples'; Lever, Sermons (Arber, p. 140), 'By God's ordinaunce the scriptures and the preachers of God do open and declare that ye be all synners.'

We have the same use of the adj. in 1 Ti 5[24] 'Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment' (πρόδηλοί εἰσι, Vulg. manifesta sunt). The AV is from Tindale, the RV gives 'are evident.' Cf. Ac 2[20] Wyc. 'Befor that the greet and the opun day of the lord come' (ἐπιφανῆ, Rhem. 'manifest,' AV and RV 'notable'); He 7[14] Wyc. 'It is opene that oure lord is borun of iuda' (πρόδηλον; Tind. and others, including AV and RV, 'evident,' Rhem. 'manifest'). J. HASTINGS.

OPEN PLACE.—1. In AV of Gn 38[14] Tamar is said to have taken her seat 'in an open place,' but undoubtedly the correct rendering of בְּפֶתַח עֵינַיִם (LXX πρὸς ταῖς πύλαις Αἰνάν) is that of RV, 'in the gate of Enaim'; so also read in v.[21] with RV 'at

* In Job 38[17] the same Heb. verb is translated 'opened,' and RV gives 'revealed' as here; but it is probable, as the reference is to gates ('Have the gates of death been opened unto thee?'), that it is rather a mistrans. than an archaism. The LXX has ἀνοίγονται; Vulg. apertæ sunt; both Wyc. and Cov. have 'opened.'

† The meaning of this word is known, but it is not easy to see the exact metaphorical use here made of it. The verb τραχηλίζω comes from τράχηλος, the 'neck,' round which a millstone might be hung (Mt 18[6], Mk 9[42], Luke 17[2]), or a yoke placed (Ac 15[10]), or on which one may affectionately fall (Lk 15[20], Ac 20[37]), or which may be exposed to the executioner (Ro 16[4]). The verb (which is not found in LXX, and here only in NT) follows the last-named use of τράχηλος (possibly through τραχηλισμός, a technical term for the grip of a wrestler on his adversary's neck). It is used by Philo freely in the sense of 'bringing to one's feet,' 'having at one's mercy'; and so in this passage it is probably more than laid bare (as if the neck were twisted back and exposed to view), rather as Rendall (whose tr. is 'downcast') 'bowed down with remorse and shame,'

Enaim' for 'openly' of AV. See art. ENAIM. 2. In 1 K 22^{10}=2 Ch 18^{9} Ahab and Jehoshaphat have their thrones set up 'in an open (AV 'a void') place' (AVm 'a floor,' RVm 'a threshing-floor') at the entrance of the gate of Samaria. The Heb. בְּגֹרֶן is certainly peculiar, and attempts have been made to emend the text. Klostermann, followed by Kittel (in SBOT), instead of MT מְלֻבָּשִׁים בְּגָדִים בּוֹגְרִים would read מְלֻבָּשׁ בִּגְדֵי כְבוֹדָם ('clothed in their robes of state'); Wellhausen (in Bleek⁴, 249 Anm. 2) thinks בְּגֹרֶן is a dittography of בְּגָדִים, and would simply omit it. This is perhaps favoured by the LXX of 1 K 22^{10}, which reads merely ἔνοπλοι ἐν ταῖς πύλαις (A πύλεσιν) Σαμαρείας, although in 2 Ch 18^{9} it has ἐνδεδυμένοι στολάς, καθήμενοι ἐν τῷ εὐρυχώρῳ θύρας πύλης Σαμαρείας, which is a verbatim rendering of the present MT in the latter passage. The Syr. VS seems to point to בְּגָדִים בְּרֻדִּים ('variegated robes'), and this is adopted by Bertheau, but the word בְּרֻדִּים is used elsewhere (Gn $31^{10.\ 12}$, Zec $6^{3.\ 6}$) only of animals. Other conjectural emendations are בּוּגְדֵי אַרְגָּמָן 'purple robes' (Kamphausen), בְּגֵדֵי נֶשֶׁק 'military equipment' (Benzinger, founding upon LXX ἔνοπλοι). With or without בְּגֹרֶן, the scene of Micaiah's interview with Ahab and Jehoshaphat is clearly marked as the open space that would be found before the gate of Samaria (cf. Benzinger, Heb. Arch. p. 132). J. A. SELBIE.

OPHAI.—See EPHAI.

OPHEL (עֹפֶל, always, except in Is 32^{14} and Mic 4^{8}, with def. art.; LXX Ὤφαλ, Ὀφαλ, Ὀφελ, Ὀφλά, Ὀπλά, Jos. Ὀφλᾶς).—The name means 'swelling' or 'bulge.' It is used in Dt 28^{27} and 1 S 5^{6} for 'emerods,' and in 2 K 5^{24} of a hill probably in the neighbourhood of Samaria. In the other places where the article is used, it refers to a site south of the temple of Jerusalem; 2 Ch 27^{3} 'On the wall of Ophel he (Jotham) built much'; 2 Ch 33^{14} Manasseh 'compassed about Ophel and raised it up a very great height'; in Neh $3^{26.\ 27}$ 11^{21} it appears as the dwelling-place of the Nethinim.

Josephus in the parallel passages does not mention Ophel by name. He states that Jotham built very great towers, such as were almost impregnable (Ant. IX. xi. 2), and that Manasseh built very lofty towers and strengthened the outlying forts.

One may search in vain for any pronounced natural swelling of ground south of the temple area at the present day to account for the term Ophel; but if this word may be applied to an artificial mound, the spot where it should be found can be at once indicated by pointing to the source of the water supply at the Virgin's Fountain and the secret passage in the bowels of Ophel, through which it was obtainable within the city.

The site of Ophel south of the temple enclosure is indicated exactly by the accounts given in the Book of Nehemiah. The Nethinim who dwelt in Ophel repaired the city wall over against the water-gate towards the east and the tower that lieth out. 'After them the Tekoites repaired another piece over against the great tower that lieth out, even unto the wall of Ophel' (Neh $3^{26.\ 27}$). At the dedication of the walls the company that came along the southern walls to the temple, when at the fountain gate, 'went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall above the house of David, even unto the water-gate eastward' (Neh 12^{37}). This places the water-gate close to the southern end of the temple, and Ophel was close to the water-gate.

Josephus in speaking of the southern wall of Jerusalem, and moving from west to east, describes its bending above the fountain of Siloam, where it also bends again fronting the east at Solomon's pool, and reaches as far as a certain place called the Ophlas, where it was joined to the eastern cloister of the temple (BJ V. iv. 2). John held the temple and the parts thereto adjoining for a great way, as also the Ophlas (V. vi. 1). The next day they set fire to the repository of the archives, to Acra, to the council house, and to the place called the Ophlas (VI. vi. 3).

It can thus be ascertained for certain that Ophel was situated on the eastern hill on which Jerusalem is built, somewhere between the southern end of the temple and Siloam. This is a spur which becomes narrow to the south until above Siloam it ends abruptly and precipitously. On this spur also, according to the account in the Book of Nehemiah, are the sepulchres of David, the house of the mighty, the city of David, and the house of David, so that this must be identical with Zion; but there are other indications elsewhere in the OT and in Josephus that the ancient Jerusalem was identical with the Acra which is north-west of the temple on the same hill as the traditional Holy Sepulchre. The only solution appears to be in the dual notion of the ancient Jerusalem, one portion in Judah over the fountain of the Virgin, called Zion, and one portion near the Hammam esh-Shefa (a fountain) on the Acra, called Millo. Thus the ancient strongholds of Jerusalem were both swelling mounds, probably of stone and earth—Ophel and Millo.

Stanley in his note on Ophel (Sin. and Pal. 498) points out that the word in later times appears to have acquired the meaning of 'fort,' as in Ὠβλιάμ, 'bulwark of the people,' the name applied to St. James the Just by Hegesippus (Eus. HE ii. 23).

According to the narrative of Hegesippus, James the Just was cast down from the south-east angle of the temple enclosure and was killed below by the club of a fuller. He was thus killed close to Ophel, and nigh to the spot where a fuller's shop cut in the rock was found during the PEF excavations, 1867–9 (see Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 299).

OPHIR (אוֹפִיר, אוֹפִר only in Gn 10^{29}, אפיר only in 1 K 10^{11}).—A proper name that occurs twelve times in OT. 1. Gn 10^{29}=1 Ch 1^{23} (LXX Ὀυφείρ) represents Ophir as the eleventh of the thirteen sons of Joktan, and locates him in the list between Sheba and Havilah. Gn $10^{30.\ 31}$ testifies that the name designates a people (or land) 'from Mesha as thou goest towards Sephar, the mountain (m. 'hill country') of the east.'

2. 1 K $9^{26\text{-}28}$ (B Σωφηρά, A Σωφαρά), 10^{11} and 2 Ch 9^{10} (LXX Σουφείρ), 1 K 22^{48} (A Ὠφείρ, B om.), and 2 Ch 8^{18} (B Σωφειρά, A Σωφῆρα), with 1 K 10^{22}, designate a place to which the Tarshish ships of Hiram and Solomon sailed from Ezion-geber, at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, and after three years returned with gold, silver, precious stones, costly woods, ivory, apes, and peacocks. It is not specified that Ophir was the source of all these products, but simply that such articles were brought back by the merchantmen at the end of a three years' cruise. It is quite possible that some of these wares were purchased at regular ports to which they had been brought by other traders. So that Ophir needs not to be sought for at some point where all these products were native (cf. Cheyne in Expos. Times, July 1898, p. 472). Subsequent references in the OT, however, Is 13^{12}, 1 Ch 29^{4} (LXX Σουφείρ), Job 22^{24} (LXX Σωφείρ), 28^{16} (B Σωφείρ, A Ὠφείρ), confirm the idea that Ophir was at least a gold-producing region. Its product in these references is synonymous with the finest of that metal.

The definite location of Ophir is still in dispute. Search for it has been made from ancient times. Even the translations of the LXX and the remarks of Josephus (Ant. VIII. vi. 4) point to an opinion as to its location. Ancient and current opinions may be classified under three heads. Limits of space will allow the merest outline of the arguments urged for the acceptance of each place.

(1) On the East Coast of Africa.—For several centuries travellers, writers, and scholars of several nationalities have found the Solomonic Ophir at some point along the eastern coast of Africa. Most notable among these were Th. Lopez, J. Bruce, Robertson, Montesquieu, d'Anville, Schultess, and Quatremère. The location of Ophir in East Africa, in Mashonaland, opposite the island of Madagascar, has won new friends since the German Mauch (Reisende in Ost. Afrikas) made his now famous investigations of 1871. He found, about 200 miles inland from Sofâla, at Zimbabye, some remarkable ruins, already described in the works of de Barros, a Portuguese traveller of the 16th cent. The majestic remains of once stately buildings now cover one granite mound 400 ft., and another 300 ft. in height. The natives have preserved among themselves a tradition that white men once lived there and carried on extensive manufactures. Traces of Phœnician pottery, and even of mining operations, add to the evidence of its former importance. Merensky, a superintendent of the Berlin Mission (Beiträge zur Kenntniss Süd-Afrikas, 1875), reported that Arabian travellers regarded these ruins as the Ophir of Solomon, and that as far back as A.D. 1500 the Arabs took gold from those districts. Portuguese sailors found near Sofâla in 1506 two Arabian ships laden with gold. The Portuguese colonists in this country found many ore mines, and even down to the Transvaal may be found remains of old ore-smelting ovens. A corollary of this view is found in the position of those who find Ophir farther north on the coast of Africa—even as far as the Red Sea. The latest and most ardent advocate of this newer view is Carl Peters (Das goldene Ophir Salomos, 1895). Among his array of arguments is found this one on the linguistic evidence. 'Chinese astronomy designates the east by blue, the south by red, the north by black, and the west by yellow.' 'The Black Sea is in the north, the Red Sea in the south, the Turks call the Mediterranean Sea the white, probably a change from yellow.' 'In Arabic red is ahr, and Africa is Afir, or the land of the south.' 'In Latin Afer is used to designate an African, accordingly the terms Ophir and Africa are identical.' Peters agrees substantially with those Egyptologists who would practically identify Ophir with Punt, the great foreign mart of Egypt, especially during the reign of queen Hatshepsu of the 18th dynasty (see art. PUT). W. Max Müller (Asien u. Europa nach altägyptischen Denkmälern, 1893, p. 111 and n. 1) locates Punt on the Ethiopian coast of the Red Sea, possibly including both sides. The location of Ophir in the land of Punt, which is not as yet a fixed quantity, introduces many of the same questions as the location farther south on the east coast. Müller says that the products of Ophir are all African, and only at a later date were the Indian articles inserted in the list. In the chief passage (1 K 10^{22}) the LXX (B) does not mention 'peacocks' at all, and it 'must be held to be an interpolation.' But while it is not at all improbable that the ubiquitous Phœnician sailors may have touched ports on the east coast of Africa in Solomon's day, arguments based on the ethnographical representation of Gn 10 positively make against this view.

(2) In the far East.—Among the most notable advocates of Ophir's location at some point in the far East we may name the LXX, Josephus, Reland, Lassen, Ritter, Thenius, Murchison. There are three general locations which deserve mention: (a) Ophir is identified with Abhîra, a nomadic people settled on the east side of the delta of the Indus. While gold is not found on the coast-line, it could have come from N.W. India near Kashmir. Precious stones are found in great abundance in India. 'Sandal-wood' (Heb. אַלְגּוּמִּים, var. אַלְגּוּמִּים) corresponds to the Sanscrit valgu or valgum; 'peacocks' (Heb. תֻּכִּיִּים) is the equivalent of the Sanscrit çikhi; 'apes' (Heb. קֹפִים) is the Indian kapi. Largely, then, on the basis of philology and that of the products brought to Solomon, Ophir was located near the mouth of the Indus. (b) On the basis of the LXX (Σωφηρά) of 1 K $9^{26\text{-}28}$, which indicates India on Coptic authority, Ophir has been located (Karl E. v. Baer) on the coasts of Malabar, or at Ceylon, whence nearly all of the products brought by Solomon's seamen could be found. An old city, Supara or Uppara, in the region of Goa, has been identified with Ophir. (c) The Malay Peninsula has also had its advocates. While von Baer admits that this peninsula yields all the products required by the records, he sees an insuperable objection in the great distance from Ezion-geber. The U.S. Consul, General Wildman of Hong Kong (Tales of the Malayan Coast, 1899, p. 178 f.), spent about eight years in this region, and examined with great care the evidence at hand. There is a gold-producing Mt. Ophir near Johore, and good evidence of other kinds. After careful study of the subject, Wildman concludes that Ophir is a comprehensive term, embracing the entire East, the Malay Peninsula, Ceylon, India, and even China—the name Ophir being taken from this mountain because it marks a central point of the region to which Solomon's ships sailed. 'For all ages the gold of the Malay Peninsula has been known; from the earliest times there has been intercourse between the Arabians and the Malays, while the Malayan was the very first of the far eastern countries to adopt the Mohammedan religion and customs. All the articles mentioned in the biblical account of Ophir are found in and about Malacca in abundance. . . . Peacocks are found [native] only in India and Malaya.'

(3) In Arabia, Southern or South-Eastern.—Gn $10^{29.30}$ appears to imply that Ophir was either between Sheba and Havilah or in proximity to them. The fact that the Joktanites settled in Arabia would seem to require that search be made for Ophir within that territory. It is of course assumed, because it cannot be absolutely proved, that this Ophir is identical with the place from which the Phœnician sailors brought their remarkable wares to enrich the coffers of Solomon. This territory has been the favourite location for Ophir from a very ancient day. Among some of its chief advocates we may mention Michaelis, Bochart, Niebuhr, Gesenius, Vincent, Seetzen, and Rosenmüller. One of the most enthusiastic and experienced advocates of our day is Ed. Glaser (Skizze der Geschichte u. Geographie Arabiens, ii. 1890, pp. 353–387). He arrays evidence at great length, and with commendable skill, to show that all good evidence from ancient times points to south-eastern Arabia, in the region of the Persian Gulf, as the proper location for the Ophir of Solomon's day. Southern and south-eastern Arabia were famed in ancient times for their gold-producing qualities, according to the testimony of Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, and Pliny. The gold of this region was called apyron (ἄπυρον)-gold, because its purity was so marked that it needed no smelting. It is not improbable that the Greek name for the gold of that region (apyron) was applied to the product, since that name for the land had passed out of use.

The chief gold-producing lands of the OT were found in Arabia, and, for the most part, apparently, in the region of the Persian Gulf. We find besides Ophir: (a) Havilah, Gn $2^{11f.}$ (and 10^{29}); (b) Sheba, Ps 72^{15} (cf. 1 K 10^{10}), Ezk 27^{22}; (c) Parvaim (see art. PARVAIM), 2 Ch 3^6; and also (d) Uphaz, Jer 10^9, Dn 10^5. Of these, Sheba and Havilah at least (and possibly Parvaim) appear to be located, according to Gn 10^{29}, in proximity to Ophir. And again we should note that Ophir was not simply a gold-producing land, but it was so located that ships called at its port or ports (1 K $9^{27.\ 28}$). Glaser (p. 368) maintains that the biblical Ophir in the narrow sense is the Arabian coast of the Persian Gulf, extending from the north to Ras Musandum, and that in a wider sense it extends to both sides of the Gulf.

In the cuneiform records of Elam, dating from prior to B.C. 1000, we find that the territory between Susa and the Persian Gulf was called Apirra (Apir), and as late as the 8th cent. B.C. the Elamites make mention of it as Apir (cf. Hommel, Gesch. Bab.-Assyr. p. 720; also Del., Paradies, pp. 131, 231).

These regions of the Persian Gulf did not produce the full list of articles brought back by the Phœnician and Jewish sailors, but the importance of this location both for land and sea trade would account for the presence in the emporia of trade of articles brought from and native in many and far-distant lands.

The trip, too, from Ezion-geber to this region, either in the Persian Gulf or the Gulf of Oman, and return, in view of the periodical monsoons which prevail on the Red Sea, the Gulf of Aden, and the Indian Ocean, would occupy just about the required three years.

Taking into account, then, (1) the location of Ophir as related to the other names mentioned in Gn 10; (2) the gold-producing properties attributed to it in the OT; (3) the testimony of ancient authorities to its richness in the precious metal; (4) the time required to make the trip in view of the annual monsoons; (5) the testimony of the cuneiform inscriptions as to the name; (6) the cumulative strength of these points,—it seems most probable that Ophir was a territory situated in south-eastern Arabia, in the region of the Gulfs of Oman and Persia.

OPHNI (הָעַפְנִי, lit. 'the Ophnite'; BA om., Luc. Ἀφνή).—A town of Benjamin, Jos 18^{24}. The site is unknown. It may be (but see Dillm. ad loc., and Buhl, GAP 173) the later Gophnah of Josephus (BJ III. iii. 5), now Jufnah, 2½ miles N.W. of Bethel. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv.

OPHRAH (עָפְרָה possibly 'fawn,' feminine of עֹפֶר. —There are both place and personal names in the OT which are derived from names of animals [Journ. Philol. ix. 92 f.]. עָפָר 'dust,' 'soil,' suggests a derivation that agrees better with the transliterations of LXX).

1. One of the Benjamite towns enumerated in Jos 18 (A Ἰεφραθά, B Ἀφρά, Luc. Ἀφαρά). It is included (18^{23}) in what seems to be a north-eastern group. This agrees with Jerome's statement that it was vicus Ephrem (Ephraim) 5 Roman miles from Bethel, eastward (Lag. *Onom.*² p. 129; Eusebius' text is imperfect; in it the name is κώμη Ἀφρήλ—Lag. p. 241). The locality so determined is a few miles north of Michmash, and consequently suits also the Ophrah of 1 S 13^{17} (LXX Γοφερά, Euseb., Jer. Ὀφρά). The Philistines are said to have sent troops from their camp at Michmash in the direction of Ophrah. There is even an indication that this direction was northward. Two other bands went east and west respectively, it seems, and Saul's troops were on the south. The modern eṭ-Ṭaiyibe, about 5 miles north-east of Bethel, has been suggested as the site of the ancient Ophrah (Robinson¹, ii. 121 ff., more at length in Biblioth. Sac. 1845, ii. 398). The place is described as strikingly situated on a conical hill, and part of the argument is that such a site must certainly have been occupied in ancient times. The distance from Bethel corresponds with that given by Jerome. But nothing more decisive can be urged. The suggested correspondence of the modern name with the ancient is too hazardous to be assigned any weight (Winer³ sub voce). The assumption that the עפרון of Jos 15^9 is identical with Ophrah is not well founded, for Ephron is plainly on the north-western frontier of Judah. Eusebius' statement, therefore, that Ephron was 20 miles north of Jerusalem (Lag.² p. 260), does not help to determine the site of Ophrah. Negatively it may be argued that eṭ-Ṭaiyibe lies too far north to have been included in Benjamite territory (Dillm. on Jos 18^{23}).

Six place names, in addition to Ephron, have been identified with Ophrah. They are:—(1) עפרון 2 Ch 13^9 (Kethibh עפרון); (2) Ἐφράμ Jn 11^{54}; (3) Ἐφράιμ Jos. BJ IV. ix. 9; (4) אֶפְרַיִם 2 S 13^{23} (Luc. Γοφραμ= עפרים?); (5) Ἀφαιρεμα 1 Mac 11^{34}; (6) בֵּית לְעַפְרָה Mic 1^{10}. Regarding all of them it should be observed that the mere fact of their being situated on the borders of Judah and Ephraim (or Judæa and Samaria) leaves it open to identify them with Ephron. The names also are as much equivalent to עפרון as to עפרה, and the testimony of Eusebius is that, later, Ephron actually became Ἐφράμ (Lag.² p. 260; Jerome calls it Efraea). A brief statement may be made regarding each. (1) Presumably on the borders of Judah and Israel, and possibly not distant from Bethel, in which case it may be Ophrah. (2) See EPHRAIM. Eusebius identifies it with the Ephron of Jos 15^9 (Lag.² p. 262), and so is against an identification with Ophrah. (3) Occupied by Vespasian on his march from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, and named along with Bethel. But there is nothing to show that it was near Bethel. If it can be assumed that Bethel was in the toparchy of Gophna, which is mentioned on the same occasion, it might be argued that Ephraim was in the toparchy of Akrabatta, too far from Bethel to be Ophrah. (4) From Jerusalem this town lay in the direction of Ὡρωνήν (B, 2 S 13^{34}, Luc. Σωράμ). If that name represents Hebrew חורנים and stands for Beth-horon (Driver, Sam. ad loc.), this Ephraim lay north-west of Jerusalem and may be identical with Ephron. The direction is the same, and Ephron was known to Eusebius as Ἐφράμ. All that supports identification with Ophrah is an uncertain resemblance of name which might equally be claimed for Ephron. (5) On the borders of Judæa and Samaria (Ἀφερεμά in Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 9). But there is nothing to show at what point, whether to the east or west. (6) See BETH-LE-APHRAH. The direction of Ephron is more suitable than that of Ophrah.—For further references to literature see EPHRAIM.

2. A town in Manasseh (Jg $6^{11.\ 24}$ $8^{27.\ 32}$ 9^5) distinguished from the preceding as Ophrah (LXX Ἐφραθά; in 6^{11} 8^{27} Luc. Ἐφρά, in 8^{27} 9^5 A Ἐφράμ), of the Abiezrites (see ABIEZER). It was the home of Gideon, and is mentioned only in his history and in that of his son Abimelech. It was situated evidently on the western side of Jordan and within easy reach of the plain of Jezreel (Jg 6[33f.],* cf. also 8[18]). It is natural to suppose that the Abiezrites were apprehensive of Midianite attack when they took the offensive. Jg 9 does not imply the close proximity of Shechem. Abimelech's relations with that town are expressly accounted for by his kinship. The area within which the site may be looked for is accordingly sufficiently wide. No modern name closely resembling the ancient has been pointed out. (Suggestions in Schwarz, Geog. 1850, p. 158; van de Velde, Memoir, p. 337; PEFSt 1876, p. 197, by Conder, who quotes an Arabic translation of Samar. Chron. which gives Fer'ata, 6 miles west of Shechem, for Ophrah). Some of the places already named because of their identification with Ophrah of Benjamin have also been identified with this Ophrah. The third of them may have been as far north as to come within the boundaries of Manasseh.

3. A family or clan (B Γοφερά, A Γοφορά, Luc. Ἐφράθ) in the tribe of Judah, according to the list of the Chronicler (1 Ch 4[14]). There are certainly names of towns in this list, and this may be one, the Judæan Ephron or even the Benjamite Ophrah. Border towns may be counted at one time to Benjamin, at another to Judah.

OR.—There are obsolete uses of this word in AV. 1. For before, Ps 90[2] 'Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth'; Pr 8[23] 'or ever the earth was'; so Ec 12[6], Ca 6[12], Dn 6[24], Sir 18[19]. All the examples are of 'or ever,' and all are retained in RV. The RV has even introduced the phrase into Ec 12[1. 2]. The Amer. RV allows it in Ps 90[2] but substitutes 'while' in Ec 12[1. 2. 6]. In other writers we find 'or' alone, as Dn 8[26] Cov. 'It wylbe longe or it come to passe'; Hos 8[5] Cov. 'How longe wil it be, or they can be clensed?'; Ex 10[3] Tind. 'How longe shall it be, or thou wilt submyt thy selfe to me?' As an example of 'or ever' take Shaks. Hamlet, I. ii. 183—

> 'Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven,
> Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio.'

The word in this sense is probably a corruption of Anglo-Saxon aer, which is properly represented in modern English by 'ere,' but is found in early English under various forms, as er, ear, yer.† We find also 'or ere,' as Milton, Nativity, 85—

> 'The shepherds on the lawn,
> Or ere the point of dawn,
> Sate simply chatting in a rustick row.'

And 'ere ever' is found in Sir 23[20] 'He knew all things ere ever they were created,' RV 'or ever.'

2. For either.—1 S 26[10] 'Or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish.' Cf. Shaks. Henry V. I. ii. 12—

> 'We pray you to proceed,
> And justly and religiously unfold
> Why the law Salique, that they have in France,
> Or should, or should not, bar us in our claim.'

ORACLE.—A Divine utterance given for man's guidance (2 S 16[23] דָּבָר), or the place in which such utterances were usually given. In OT the word in EV is intended to have the latter meaning in 1 K 6[16], where Solomon, in building his temple, makes a Most Holy Place for an oracle, and in 7[49] 8[6. 8], 2 Ch 3[16] 4[20] 5[9] 8[8]; also Ps 28[2], where, however, the correct meaning of the Heb. is given in RVm 'the innermost place of thy sanctuary.'* In the Apocr. (Sir 33[3]) it is used in a wider sense of any supernatural utterance, and (Sir 36[14]) of the manifestation of the Divine Will in Sion. The Israelites used to ask for Divine guidance in any enterprise (1 S 28[6]) by means of Urim and Thummim (which see). In NT 'oracle' (λόγιον) stands for a Divine utterance, and generally refers to OT Scriptures, e.g. Ac 7[38] Moses is said to have received living oracles in the wilderness, i.e. commands from the living God. In Ro 3[2] the Jews are the favoured nation, because to them were entrusted the oracles of God. In He 5[12] the first principles of the oracles of God are mentioned as needing to be taught afresh to the Hebrews. St. Peter says (1 P 4[11]), 'If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God.'

Among the Greeks till the time of the Persian war, oracles were in high repute, that of Delphi enjoying the pre-eminence. Answers were given either orally, in which case they were usually in hexameter verse and of ambiguous interpretation, or by signs or dreams. They had a most important influence on Gr. colonization, since questions were generally addressed to them about the place to be colonized (Herod. v. 42). The Romans as a nation did not consult oracles for divine guidance Prophesying by means of lots (sortes) was practised at Praeneste and other places. In imperial times, however, the custom became prevalent, and foreign as well as native deities were consulted. Lucan (Phars. ix. 577) has expressed in noble words the contempt felt by the Romans for divination: 'Non vocibus ullis numen eget,' etc. The emperor Theodosius at the end of the 4th cent. forbade the publication of oracles. Sortes Vergilianæ had a wide influence in the Middle Ages, and recourse to them was forbidden by the Church.

C. H. PRICHARD.

ORATOR.—For AV Is 3[3] (RV 'enchanter') see DIVINATION. In Ac 24[1] we are told that 'the high priest Ananias came down with certain elders, and with an orator, one Tertullus'; and a short speech delivered by Tertullus is given. The orator (ῥήτωρ), who differed from the professional lawyer (iurisconsultus or νομικός), was the skilled speaker who was hired to present the case in court. His training was rhetorical not legal, so that he does not quite correspond to our barrister. The need of his employment arose partly, as was natural, from the necessity of having the case well stated, partly from the fact that the language of the courts was Latin. So Valerius Maximus (ii. 2. 2) quotes it as an instance of the manner in which the magistrates guarded the majesty of the Roman people, that even in Greece and Asia they refused to give responsa except in Latin. Many young Romans started their oratorical career by practising in the provinces. A good illustration of the duties of the ῥήτωρ will be found in the lengthy Petition of Dionysia to the Prefect (Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, pt. ii. pp. 160, 162).

ORCHARD (פַּרְדֵּס pardēs, παράδεισος).—Pardēs, a loan-word from the Zend, is used in three places: Ec 2[5] where it is tr[d] AV 'orchards,' RV 'parks,' Vulg. pomaria; Ca 4[13] AV and RV text 'orchard,' RVm 'paradise,' Vulg. paradisus; Neh 2[8] AV and RV text 'forest,' RVm 'park,' Vulg. saltus. Doubtless the term pardēs (probably 'enclosure') had the same generic meaning as gannāh, including gardens,

* It may be argued that it is not the writer that mentions Ophrah (Moore's J) who localizes the battle in the plain of Jezreel. That does not seem to matter, unless it be suggested that Ophrah was not Gideon's home in this other source. Besides, the grounds for refusing 6[33] to J may be challenged, if they are only that 8[4-21] is his and that 8[5] is inconsistent with 6[33].

† This form is found in the 1611 ed. of AV, Nu 11[33] 'While the flesh was yet betweene their teeth, yer it was chewed'; 14[11] 'How long will it bee yer they beleeve me?'

* The EV tr[n] 'oracle' follows Aq. and Symm. χρηματιστήριον (Vulg. oraculum) on the incorrect theory that the Heb. term דְּבִיר (which really means 'the part behind') was derived from דָּבַר 'speak' (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.). 'Oracle' is also uniform tr. in RVm of מַשָּׂא (AV BURDEN), e.g. 2 K 9[25], Is 13[1] 14[28] 15[1] etc., and in text of Pr 30[1] 31[1] (AV 'prophecy'), where the same Heb term occurs.

orchards, and parks. Hence it is legitimate to tr. it by different words according to the context. It is applied by Diodorus Siculus (ii. 10) to the hanging gardens of Babylon. Xenophon (Anab. i. 287) describes a park, belonging to Cyrus, like the game preserves of Europe, under this name.

ORDER (like 'ordain' from Lat. ordo, ordinis, and through the French ordre, a form which arose from the old Fr. ordene, ordine by changing n to r, as in diacre from diaconus, and Londres from Londinum—see Brachet, Fr. Etymol. Dict. § 163; cf. also 'coffer' and 'coffin,' the same in origin and formerly also in meaning).—The subst. 'order' has the following meanings in AV—

1. Position or proper place, Ezk 41[6] 'One over another, and thirty in order' (פְּעָמִים); 1 Co 15[23] 'Every man in his own order' (ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ τάγματι); Lk 1[8] 'He executed the priests' office before God in the order of his course' (ἐν τῇ τάξει); 1 Co 14[40] 'Let all things be done decently and in order' (κατὰ τάξιν). The phrase 'in order' has this meaning. It occurs frequently with the verbs 'lay,' place,' 'set,' always as the tr. of a simple verb, as 1 Co 11[34] 'The rest will I set in order when I come' (διατάξομαι). Once (Ps 40[5]) the Heb. verb עָרַךְ to arrange, is tr. 'reckon up in order.'

In Lk 1[3], Ac 11[4] 18[23]* καθεξῆς is translated 'in order.' The meaning is in proper sequence; but Blass, writing on Lk 1[3], disputes that meaning, and holds that the reference is not to arrangement, but to completeness. St. Luke promises not a chronological arrangement of events, but a complete record so far as he could gather it; St. Peter, in his narrative of the reception of the Gentiles, did not omit any important fact. See Philology of Gospels, p. 18f.

2. Position in office, rank.—This is the meaning of Ps 110[4] 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek' (Heb. [הַדִּבְרָה] dibhrāh, found also in Ec 3[18] 7[14] 8[2] in the phrase עַל־דִּבְרַת 'because of'), which is so often quoted in the Ep. to the Hebrews (5[6. 10] 6[20] 7[11 bis. 17. 21]), according to the LXX rendering κατὰ τὴν τάξιν. The Eng. phrase comes from the Vulg. secundum ordinem. The reference is to the position of Melchizedek as both priest and king. Cf. Wyclif, Select Eng. Works, iii. 121, 'Lucifer wiste that God moste be above hym, bot he coveyted an ordir in servise of God whiche that God wolde not.'

3. Arrangement or orderly array, Job 10[22] 'A land of darkness . . . without any order' (וְלֹא־סְדָרִים); Col 2[5] 'joying and beholding your order' (ὑμῶν τὴν τάξιν, Lightfoot, 'your orderly array': Ltft. thinks it is a military metaphor, suggested by St. Paul's enforced companionship with the soldiers of the Prætorian guard; but Abbott holds that the idea of a well-ordered State lies much nearer than that of an army—see Abbott in Intern. Crit. Com.); 1 Es 1[10] 'The priests and Levites . . . stood in very comely order' (εὐπρεπῶς); Wis 7[29] 'She [wisdom] is more beautiful than the sun, and above all the order of the stars' (ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν ἄστρων θέσιν; Vulg. super omnem dispositionem stellarum, RV 'above all the constellations of the stars,' RVm 'above every arrangement of stars'); 1 Mac 6[40] 'They marched on safely and in order' (τεταγμένως). In Jg 17[10] for 'a suit of apparel' (Heb. עֵרֶךְ בְּגָדִים) the margin has 'an order of garments,' which is an attempt to translate the Heb. literally. Here may be noticed the obsolete phrase 'take order for,' which occurs in 2 Mac 4[27] 'As for the money that he had promised unto the king, he took no good order for it' (οὐδὲν εὐτάκτει; Vulg. nihil agebat; Wyc. 1388 'he dide no thing'; Cov. 'he dyd nothinge therin'; Gen. 'he toke none order for it'; RV 'nothing was duly paid,' RVm 'was in due order'). The Eng. phrase means to make proper arrangements to secure a particular end. We find it in Rhem. NT, note to Jn 19[26] 'The marvelous respect that Christ had to his mother, vouchsaving to speak to her, and to take order for her even from the crosse in the middes of his infinite anguishes and mysteries aworking for mankind,' as well as in the note to Ac 19[19]. Cf. also Knox, Hist. 366, 'He had there also taken order for the home coming of the Earle of Lennox'; and Rutherford, Letters, No. xviii. 'I hope our Lord, who sent His angel with a measuring line in his hand to measure the length and breadth of Jerusalem, in token he would not want a foot length or inch of his own free heritage, shall take order with those who have taken away many acres of His own land from him.' A similar phrase is found in 1 Mac 16[14] 'Simon was visiting the cities that were in the country, and taking care for the good ordering of them' (φροντίζων τῆς ἐπιμελείας αὐτῶν). For the general use of the word in this sense of orderly arrangement, cf. Forty-Two Articles of 1553 (Gibson, i. 71), 'profitable for an ordre and comelinesse' (Lat. ad ordinem et decorum); Spenser, FQ II. ix. 15—

'But soone the knights with their bright-burning blades, Broke their rude troupes, and orders did confound.'

4. Prescribed custom, 1 Ch 6[32] 15[13] 'we sought him not after the due order,' 23[31], 2 Ch 8[14] 'He appointed, according to the order of David his father, the courses of the priests to their service' (Heb. always mishpāt); 1 Es 1[6] 'Offer the passover in order' (ἐν τάξει). Cf. Rogers' note on Lv 7[5] 'Trespace after the order of the scrypture signifyeth somtyme all the lyffe past which we have lyved in infidelyte.' The modern meaning of 'command' easily arose out of this. It is not found in AV, but the following passages approach it, 1 Es 8[10] 'I have given order, that such of the nation of the Jews . . . as are willing and desirous, should go with thee' (προσέταξα); 1 Mac 9[55] 'He could no more speak anything nor give order concerning his house' (ἐντείλασθαι); 1 Co 16[1] 'As I have given order to the churches of Galatia' (ὥσπερ διέταξα, RV 'as I gave order').

The verb 'to order' is always used in the obsolete sense of place properly, arrange, or direct. Thus Lv 24[4] 'He shall order the lamps upon the pure candlestick'; Jer 46[3] 'Order ye the buckler and shield, and draw near to battle'; Job 23[4] 'I would order my cause before him'; Ps 119[133] 'Order my steps in thy word'; Jg 6[26] 'Build an altar . . . in the ordered place'; 13[12] 'How shall we order the child?'; Jth 2[16] 'He ranged them, as a great army is ordered for the war'; Wis 8[1] 'Sweetly doth she [wisdom] order all things' (διοικεῖ, Vulg. disponit); 9[3] 'That he should . . . order the world according to equity' (διέπῃ, Vulg. disponat); 12[15] 15[1], Sir 2[6] 'Order thy way aright.' Cf. Ps 40[6] Pr. Bk., and other passages (given in Driver's Par. Psalter, p. 478); also Fuller, Holy Warre, 185, 'The Christians were ordering themselves in aray'; More, Utopia, ii. 7 (Robinson's tr.), 'They define virtue to be life ordered according to nature'; and Shaks. Rich. II. II. ii. 109—

'If I know how or which way to order these affairs,
Thus thrust disorderly into my hands,
Never believe me.'

Orderly, which is properly an adj., is used as an adv. in Ac 21[24] 'thou thyself also walkest orderly.' Cf. Jer 32[11] Cov. 'it was orderly sealed'; Golding, Calvin's Job, 571, 'We know that in God's Church all things ought to be handled orderly and comely, as Saint Paule sayth'; and Pr. Bk. 'The New Testament . . . shall be read over orderly every year thrice.' RV introduces the word as an adj. into Jg 6[26], 1 Ti 3[2].

J. Hastings.

* The only remaining occurrences of καθεξῆς are Lk 8[1] ἐν τῷ καθεξῆς, AV 'afterward,' RV 'soon afterwards'; and Ac 3[24] ἀπὸ . . . τῶν καθεξῆς, AV 'from . . . those that follow after,' RV 'from . . . them that followed after.'

ORDAIN, ORDINANCE.—There are eleven Heb. or Aram. words translated 'ordain' in the OT of AV, and in the Apocr. and NT no fewer than twenty-one Greek words* are so translated. When we add three Lat. words found in 2 Es we see that the Eng. verb had a wide range of meaning. Its meanings may, notwithstanding, be gathered under four heads. 1. To put in its proper place (the deriv. of the word is ordo, ordinis = 'order'), make ready for any purpose. Thus Lk 14[16] Tind. 'A certayne man ordened a greate supper, and bade many'; Ac 6[13] Wyc. 'Thei ordeyneden false witnessis'; He 10[5] Tind. 'A bodie hast thou ordeyned me'; Berners, Froissart, 18, 'There was ordained three great battles (=divisions) afoot'; and Shaks. Rom. and Jul. IV. v. 84—

'All things that we ordained festival,
Turn from their office to black funeral.'

In AV this meaning is found in Ps 7[13] 'He ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors,' 132[17], 1 Ch 17[9], Is 30[33], Hab 1[12], He 9[6]. 2. To bring into existence, establish, as Dt 32[6] Tind. 'Is not he thy father and thyne owner? hath he not made the and ordeyned the?'; Mk 7[13] Tind. 'Making the worde of God of none effecte, through youre awne tradicions which ye have ordeyned'; 12[1] Tind. 'A certayne man planted a vineyarde . . . and ordeyned a wyne presse'; He 3[4] Tind. 'He that ordeyned all thinges is god'; Shaks. I Henry VI. IV. i. 33—

'When first this order was ordained, my lords,
Knights of the garter were of noble birth.'

So in AV, Nu 28[6] 'It is a continual burnt offering, which was ordained in Mount Sinai for a sweet savour,' 1 K 12[32. 33], Ps 8[2. 3], Is 26[12], 2 Es 6[49], Sir 7[15]. 3. To decree or enact: thus Irish Articles of Religion (1615), art. 11, 'God from all eternity did by his unchangeable counsel ordain whatever in time should come to pass'; Milton, PL vii. 187—

'To Him
Glory and praise whose wisdom had ordained Good out of evil to create.'

In AV this meaning occurs in Est 9[27] 'The Jews ordained . . . that they would keep these two days,' 1 Es 6[34] 8[23], 2 Es 7[17] 8[14], To 1[6] 8[7], Ad. Est 14[9], 1 Mac 4[59] 7[49], 1 Co 2[7], Eph 2[10]. 4. To destine, set apart, appoint. This is the most frequent use of the word in AV, but it must not be confounded with the modern eccles. use, which does not occur. It is found in 2 K 23[5], 2 Ch 11[15] 'He ordained him priests for the high places,' Jer 1[5], Dn 2[24], 1 Es 8[49], Ad. Est 13[6], Wis 9[2], Sir 48[10], 1 Mac 3[55] 10[20], Mk 3[14], Jn 15[16], Ac 1[22] 10[42] 13[48] 14[23] 16[4] 17[31], Ro 7[10] 13[1], 1 Ti 2[7], Tit 1[5], He 5[1] 8[3], Jude[4]. Cf. Gn 24[14] Tind. 'The same is she that thou hast ordened for thy servaunte Isaac'; Shaks. I Henry VI. I. i. 171—

'To Eltham will I, where the young king is,
Being ordained his special governor,
And for his safety there I'll best devise.'

Ordinance.—The translators of the Rhemish version complain of the 'corrupt translation of Heretikes' in rendering δικαιώματα in Lk 1[6] by 'ordinances.' Their own word is 'justifications,' and they say, 'This word is so usual in the Scriptures (namely [=especially] in the Psal. 118) to signifie the commaundements of God, because the keeping of them is justification, and the Greeke is alwaies so fully correspondent to the same, that the Heretikes in this place (otherwise pretending to esteeme much of the Greeke) blush not to say, that they avoid this word of purpose, against the justification of the Papists. And therefore one [Beza] useth Tullies word forsooth, in Latin constituta, and his scholars in their English Bibles say Ordinances.' The word is, however, used by the 'Heretikes' for δικαίωμα only thrice, Lk 1[5], He 9[1. 10]. For other Heb. and Greek words it is frequently employed, but the meaning is always 'that which has been ordained or appointed.' 'Ordnance (the appointed size or bore of a cannon, thence transferred to the cannon itself) is the same word, and was not distinguished in spelling in Old English. Thus Erasmus, Commune Crede, fol. 31, 'This fayth doth arme us, and make us bolde without ony feare, and invincible againyst all the engynes and all the ordinaunce of the world and of the deville.'

J. HASTINGS.

ORDINATION.—It is not easy to trace in NT any precise form of ordination or consecration to ecclesiastical office. When our Lord sent forth the Ten (Jn 20[22. 23]) He breathed on them, and said, 'Receive (a gift of the) Holy Spirit,' etc. But this is a consecration rather of the whole body than of the individuals present; and at all events we do not find the symbolism repeated. The Seven (Ac 6[3-6]) were chosen by the people and set before the apostles, who prayed and laid their hands on them. The consecration of Barnabas and Saul (Ac 13[2. 3]) for their work was by direct command of the Holy Spirit—there is no election this time, but the prophets and teachers fast and pray, and lay their hands on them, and so dismiss them. In the course of their journey (Ac 14[23]) they appoint (χειροτονήσαντες as 2 Co 8[19]—mere appointment, not laying on of hands) elders in every church, and after prayer with fastings commend them to the Lord. This is all that we hear of the consecration of elders. Timothy held a higher position. He is told (1 Ti 3) what sort of men bishops ought to be, and (5) how to deal with them. But ἐπιτίθει (lay hands hastily on no man) cannot refer to ordination, for the whole current of thought [19-25] runs on offenders, not on officials (Ellicott, Hort, etc.). But what of Timothy's own consecration? In 1 Ti 1[18] the apostle commits this deposit to him 'according to the prophecies which led the way to thee' (κατὰ τὰς προαγούσας ἐπὶ σὲ προφητείας). He is also told (4[14]) not to neglect 'the gift that is in thee, which was given to thee through prophecy with the laying on of the hands of the body of elders' (διὰ προφητείας μετὰ ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν τοῦ πρεσβυτερίου). And he is further reminded (2 Ti 1[6]) to stir into flame 'the gift of God which is in thee through the laying on of my hands' (διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν μου).

These passages fall into two sharply contrasted groups. (a) The Seven are chosen by the people, the elders in Ac 14[23] seem nominated by the apostles. After that, they are commended to God with prayer, joined in one case to its customary accessory of fasting, in the other to its natural symbolism of the laying on of hands. (b) Saul and Barnabas are nominated by the Holy Spirit through prophecy, and also Timothy; for 'the prophecies which led the way to thee' must have been commands to separate Timothy as Saul and Barnabas were separated before. After that, hands are laid,—in the earlier case by the prophets and teachers with prayer and fasting; in the later by St. Paul and the body of elders, pretty certainly at Lystra. This close parallel seems to establish Hort's contention, that Timothy's consecration was not to a definite church office, but to the work of an evangelist (2 Ti 4^5), as St. Paul's companion in the place of Barnabas. See, further, Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 1897, and cf. art. LAYING ON OF HANDS.

OREB and ZEEB (עֹרֵב, זְאֵב 'raven,' 'wolf,' Ὼρήβ, Ζήβ).—Two Midianite princes captured and slain by the Ephraimites after Gideon's victory, Jg 7^{25} 8^3, Ps 83^{11}, Is 10^{26}, cf. 9^4. The places where they fell were remembered by the Rock of Oreb and the Wine-press of Zeeb, perhaps near the point where the Wady Fâr'ah in Ephraim falls into the Jordan (Moore); Osh el-Ghurab in Judah (Conder) seems too far south. It is noticeable that Oreb and Zeeb are animal names, such as occur in the totem stage of society. In times when totemism prevailed, clans were often named after animals; so it has been suggested that Oreb and Zeeb were names of Midianite clans (Stade, GVI i. 189): if they were individuals, the names would belong to the stage when the totem tribe was passing into a national organization of society (Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 114). According to Is 10^{26} the slaughter of Midian, not of the chiefs alone, took place at the rock of Oreb; but this divergence from the narrative in Jg is merely an inaccuracy of tradition, and need not imply a different account. The narrative, Jg 7^{24}–8^3, is assigned to E; parallel to this is another account, Jg 8^{4-21} J, in which the Midianite chiefs are kings, and their names Zebah and Zalmunna (wh. see). See art. GIDEON and note ††.

OREN (אֹרֶן 'fir-tree'; B Ἀραιὰ καὶ Ἀμβράν, A Ἀράν).—A son of Jerahmeel, 1 Ch 2^{25}. The correctness of the MT vocalization is doubtful; perhaps it should be אָרֶן='wild goat' (cf. Gn 36^{28}=1 Ch 1^{42}, and Stade, GVI i. 409).

ORION.—The common noun kĕsîl is of frequent occurrence in OT, especially in the Wisdom literature, and is regularly tr^{d} 'fool' or 'foolish.' At Am 5^8, Job 9^9 38^{31} our Versions have correctly treated it as a proper noun, and rendered it by 'Orion.' At Is 13^{10} the true tr^{n} of the same word is 'and the Orions thereof,' i.e. the great constellations such as Orion. It has also been suggested that at Job 15^{27} kĕsîl (Orion) should be substituted for kĕsel (flanks); but this is very doubtful. Sa'adya, Abulwalid, and others have thought that kĕsîl is Canopus in Argo, the second brightest star in our heavens [cf. Am 5^8]. The evidence of the ancient VSS is strongly in favour of the identification with Orion. The LXX has ὁ Ὠρίων at Is 13^{10}, Job 38^{31}; Jerome, 'Orion' at Am 5^8, Job 9^9; the Targ. גִּבּוֹרָא (giant) at Is 13^{10}, Job 9^9 38^{31}; the Pesh. gabara (giant) at Am 5^8, Job 9^9 38^{31}. The deviations, such as Ἔσπερος (LXX, Job 9^9) and 'Arcturus' (Jerome, Job 38^{31}), do but illustrate the admitted fact that absolute certainty on these points is unattainable. The literal meaning of the Heb. word falls in with the evidence just adduced, if kĕsîl='fleshy,' 'fat,' and, as overloaded with fat, 'foolish and arrogant.' It would therefore easily become the name of a giant who was supposed to have rebelled against God, and after his death was punished by being chained in the heavens. Job 38^{31} seems to sanction this; the word mōshĕkōth having, indeed, been rendered 'girdle' by Hitzig, but more probably meaning, like the cognate Arabic word, 'bands' or 'fetters.' On this interpretation the stars which we call the Belt are looked on as a chain which none but the Almighty can unloose, and the poet's thought was that God alone can 'release the earth from Winter's sterile bands.' It must, however, be admitted that there is no other proof of the Hebrews having conceived of this constellation as a chained figure. The attempt to show that Orion and Nimrod are identical must be pronounced a failure. The Chron. Pasch. says that in Orion the Persians saw Nimrod. Josephus (Ant. I. v. 2) makes the latter a rebel against God [cf. Dante, Inferno, xxxi. 41–81, Purg. xii. 33–35]; the later Arabic writers speak of him as chained in heaven for haughtiness. But these witnesses are too late to be of much value. The Bab. Talmud (Berachoth 58*b*) refers to the visibility of Orion during the hot season,—our dog-days,—saying that but for the heat of Orion the world could not stand the cold of the Scorpion, and but for the cold of the Scorpion could not stand the heat of Orion. In this connexion it should be remembered that in Syria this constellation is visible during a greater part of the year than with us, and rises 17° higher above the horizon.

The mythological fancy of many nations has played around these brilliant stars. New Zealanders called the Belt the Elbow of Maui or the Stern of Tamererete's canoe. Norsemen saw in it Frigga's Spindle. To the Esquimaux these stars were seal-hunters who lost their way home. In classic legend Orion is a handsome Bœotian giant and hunter. The Odyssey, xi. 309, 310, says of Otus and Ephialtes—

> οὓς δὴ μηκίστους θρέψε ζείδωρος ἄρουρα > καὶ πολὺ καλλίστους μετὰ γε κλυτὸν Ὠρίωνα.

Again, xi. 572-575—

> Τὸν δὲ μετ' Ὠρίωνα πελώριον εἰσενόησα > θῆρας ὁμοῦ εἰλεῦντα κατ' ἀσφοδελὸν λειμῶνα, > τοὺς αὐτὸς κατέπεφνεν ἐν οἰοπόλοισιν ὄρεσσιν > χερσὶν ἔχων ῥόπαλον παγχάλκειον, αἰὲν ἀαγές.

In the Iliad, xviii. 486, the σθένος Ὠρίωνος forms part of an enumeration of important star groups The Egyptians recognized in Orion (whom they called Sahu) the soul of Horus. The constellation is represented in the round zodiac which was discovered at Denderah and in the astronomical drawings in the Ramesseum at Thebes. The most interesting mythology, so far as Orion is concerned, is that of the Euphrates valley. In the ancient star-maps of that land Orion is known as Duwuzi (=Tammuz, Ezk 8^{14}), and appears as a hunter accompanied by his dogs. In the earliest ages the sun was the great heavenly hunter; afterwards Orion took his place. Hence the dogs of the latter hunt the hare (the moon). Aratus, in the Phænomena, writes—

> 'And ceaselessly beneath Orion's feet
> The hare is ever chased.'

With respect to the name, Brown remarks: 'His name Uriôn - Aoriôn - Oariôn - Oriôn would = an original Akkadian Uru-anna ("Light of Heaven," i.e. the sun), as the moon is Uru-ki ("Light of the earth").' Hommel says that the Sumerian name was shu-gi.

J. TAYLOR.

ORNAMENT is in RV the tr^{n} of עֲדִי in every instance except Pr 25^{12}, where the Heb. is חָלִי. In other instances RV gives a more specialized rendering for 'ornament' of AV: as 'chaplet' (livyah, Pr 1^9 4^9); 'garland' (pĕ'ĕr, Is 61^{10}); 'crescents' (sahărōnîm, Jg $8^{21.\ 26}$); 'anklets' ('ăkhāsîm, Is 3^{18}); 'ankle-chains' (ṣĕ'ādôth, Is 3^{20}); 'plating' ('ăphuddah, Is 30^{22}). This last probably refers to the richly embroidered cloth with which the image was partly covered. At the present day, in a shrine-chamber there is such a cloth spread over the ridge of the stone-tomb on which the devotee, usually a woman interceding with regard to childlessness, sits while making the petition and vow to the saint. The same belief in the immanence of power and personality in the clothing is seen in Elisha's taking of Elijah's mantle (2 K 2[13]), the obtaining of St. Paul's handkerchiefs (Ac 19[12]), and in the superstitious use of holy relics generally. RV has 'apparel' instead of 'ornament' in 1 P 3[4].

The Bible abounds in references to the appreciation of ornament, and at the present day in the East the love of decoration is deep-seated and universal. The laying aside of ornaments appears in Ex 33[4ff.] as a token of mourning. One of the eminent services rendered by Assyrian and Egyptian archæology has been the revelation of the wonderful proficiency to which these nations had attained in the cutting and setting of gems, and in the designing of gold and silver ornaments.

The investigation of the place and value of ornament in the Bible does not necessarily imply that the Oriental estimate is faultless because it is interwrought with Scripture metaphor and teaching. The Bible does not differ from other literature when referring to the customs and preferences of those addressed, the one requirement being that the statements should correspond with fact. The same simple recognition of things as they are that characterizes its references to natural and industrial surroundings and family relationships also marks its allusions to the Oriental love of ornament, and its illustrative use of articles of beauty and decoration.

Oriental life is pervaded by the charm of the picturesque and the attractiveness of whatever is unique or magnificent. The reality of the gratification afforded by it is evidenced by the presence of ornament in little things, and its preservation even when in conflict with comfort and activity. Male costume has many embellishments that we are accustomed to regard as feminine, and the last stage is often reached in which the man proclaims the apparel. The day-labourer feels himself to be on a higher level if he can wear a shirt with loose pendant sleeves and a skirt long enough to reach the ground. Until quite recent times the wearing of soft woollen cloth was jealously restricted to the patriarchal emîrs and ruling families (cf. Lk 7[25]). An Oriental cabman in arranging his coloured head-napkin for protection from the sun crosses it under the chin and throws the loose ends over his shoulders to hang down the back and wave in the wind. In the course of an hour he may have to rearrange it several times, but he never ties a knot or fastens it with a pin, as that would destroy the picturesqueness of the flowing form. A photograph always shows the cheek that has a mole or 'beauty-spot.' The common water-jar, in addition to its own beauty of form, has usually a waved line of etching or colour-stain around the neck. Camels and donkeys have the hair cropped so as to show ornamental patterns on the legs. The stonework of the village fountain generally has some ornamental treatment. Doors of peasants' houses have intricate geometrical patterns. Houses are built in alternate layers of dark and light coloured stone. The arch abounds in the humblest architecture. The lattice-screen covering the lower half of the window is ornamentally developed in lemon and walnut wood into the beautiful and intricate meshrabîyeh work. Infants in swaddling-clothes have the edges of the eyelids blackened with antimony from the paint-horn (cf. the name Keren-happuch, Job 42[14]), the finger-nails stained with the raw-sienna brown of henna-dye (Ca 1[14] 4[13]), and the little wrist is adorned with a few bangles of coloured glass. The appearance of unusual beauty in a child, as in the case of Moses, is such a source of gratification to the parents that the fact must not be referred to without reverent allusion to the Giver of all good. Such particulars from the common life of the people indicate the general attachment to ornament, and suggest that any symbolical use of things outwardly ornamental would receive easy and sympathetic recognition.

The chief materials of ornament are those which Achan coveted (Jos 7), namely, gold and richly-woven cloth. Ornaments of gold, silver, and copper are still worn by women in the nose and ears, on the neck, arms, and ankles, as alluded to in the Bible.

FEMALE ORNAMENTS: HORN, BELT-BUCKLES, BRACELETS, AMULETS.

The attachment to jewellery (Jer 2[32]) was recently illustrated in the Lebanon in the case of a young wife who, in a time of dangerous sickness, had the picture of the Virgin brought from the church, and tied to the frame her best pair of ear-rings as a votive-prayer for recovery. Shortly afterwards, her husband found her weeping, and, guessing the cause of her distress, assured her that he meant to buy back the ear-rings from the priest!

In the Arabian Nights there is constant allusion to the beautiful clothes worn by the heroes and heroines whose exploits are recorded. Lucian, in his Dialogues of the Dead ('The Pagan Olympus'), contrasts the gorgeous appearance of the Oriental divinities with the simple elegance of the Greek images. The tendency to excess in ornament led Milton to describe the East as the home of 'barbaric pearl and gold' (Par. Lost, ii. 4).

It is this devotion to outward ornament that the Bible transfers to the inner graces of character and the beauty of sainthood when it speaks of 'the garments of salvation,' 'the robe of righteousness' (Is 61[10]), 'the apparel of a meek and quiet spirit' (1 P 3[4]), and the obligation to 'put on Christ' (Ro 13[14], Gal 3[27]). The moral pronouncement on ornament, as in the case of wine, is one of use and abuse. Thus the eloquent description in Ezk 27 of ancient Tyre as Empress of the Seas, and adorned with the riches of many lands, may be compared with the indignant scorn expressed in Is 3 with regard to the excesses in dress then prevailing in Jerusalem.

ORNAN (אָרְנָן, Ὀρνά).—The form in 1 Ch 21[15-28] 2 Ch 3[1] of the name ARAUNAH (wh. see). The original form of the word cannot be recovered; see Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of Sam. p. 288 f., and H. P. Smith on 2 S 24[16].

ORPAH (עָרְפָּה; Ὀρφά), a Moabitess, sister of Ruth and daughter-in-law of Naomi. When the latter was returning to her own country, Orpah, following Naomi's advice, elected to go back to her own people and to her god (or gods), while her sister went with her mother-in-law (Ru 1^{14-14}).

ORPHAN.—The Heb. subst. יָתוֹם yāthôm, which occurs frequently throughout OT, is always rendered in LXX by ὀρφανός, which is properly an adj., 'fatherless,' 'orphaned.' The meaning is not bereft of both parents (of that there is not a single unmistakable example), but of the father only. The Heb. word is accordingly rendered 'fatherless' in the Eng. versions, as in Ex 22^{24} 'Your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless.' This was not, however, because the English word 'orphan' (formed from ὀρφανός through Old Fr. orphane) denoted, as it now does, one bereft of both parents. In the only case in OT in which yāthôm is translated 'orphan' (La 5^{3}) the meaning is evidently fatherless, 'We are orphans and fatherless, our mothers are as widows' (LXX ὀρφανοὶ ἐγενήθημεν, οὐχ ὑπάρχει πατήρ, μητέρες ἡμῶν ὡς αἱ χῆραι).

The adj. ὀρφανός occurs occasionally in Apocr., and is rendered 'orphan' in To 1^{8}, 2 Mac 8^{28} (also 2 Es 2^{20}, from Lat. orphanus). In NT there are only two occurrences (though Codex D adds another in Mk 12^{40}), viz. Jn 14^{18}, Ja 1^{27}. In both places the meaning is 'fatherless,' and that is the tr. of most of the Eng. versions in Ja 1^{27} (Tind., however, 'frendlesse,' Rhem. 'pupilles'). But in Jn 14^{18} only Wyc. has 'fatherless.' Tind. introduced 'comfortless,' an unfortunate rendering, as it gave support to the widespread mistake that the Paraclete was to be sent chiefly to comfort the disciples (see PARACLETE). Tind. was followed by Cranmer, the Geneva, the Bishops, AV, and even RV (though AV and RV give 'orphans' in the marg., which is the text of the Rhemish version).

ORTHOSIA ('Ορθωσίας), 1 Mac 15^{37}.—Acc. to Pliny this city was N. of Tripoli and S. of the Eleutherus (HN v. 17). The Peutinger Tables place it 12 Roman miles N. of Tripoli, and 30 S. of Antaradus. Coins of the city exist of the time of Antoninus Pius. The name has not been discovered.

OSAIAS (A 'Ωσαίας, B om.), 1 Es 8^{48} (LXX ^{47}) = Jeshaiah (B 'Ωσαίας, A 'Ισαιά), Ezr 8^{19}.

OSEA.—The form in which in 2 Es 13^{40} (both AV and RV) the name of Hoshea the last king of the Northern Kingdom occurs.

OSEAS.—The form in which the name of the prophet Hosea is given in 2 Es 1^{39} (both AV and RV).

OSNAPPAR (Aram. אָסְנַפַּר; B 'Ασενναφάρ, A Ναφάρ; Lagarde, Σαλμανασσάρης).—Only in Ezr 4^{10}. The word occurs in a letter written in Aramaic, and sent by the chancellor and the scribe of the Samaritans to Artaxerxes, king of Persia (B.C. 464-424), to urge him to stop the building of the walls of Jerusalem by the Jews. Among the Samaritans who inspired this letter were 'the Babylonians, the Shushanchites, the Dehaites, the Elamites, and the rest of the nations whom the great and noble Osnappar brought over, and set in the city of Samaria, and in the rest (of the country) beyond the river.' This name does not appear in the inscriptions as the name either of any Assyrian king or of any high official of any people. The connexion seems to require that Osnappar was invested with authority to transport peoples from their homes to Samaria. Among these peoples we see 'Shushanchites,' and we are well aware that the only Assyrian king of the last period of Assyrian history who conquered Susa was Assurbanipal (cf. WAI v. (Rassam Cyl.) col. v. 128–vi. 76). This last great king (B.C. 668–626) wrought frightful destruction upon this strong and rich capital city, and carried large numbers of its population captives to Assyria. Following in the wake of the policy already established by his predecessors, Tiglath-pileser, Sargon (2 K 17^{24}, and Sargon's Annals, 95–97) and Esarhaddon (Ezr 4^{2}), Assurbanipal doubtless distributed many of his captives in the provinces of the empire which were sparsely populated.

The unlikeness of 'Osnappar' to 'Assurbanipal' has left room for doubt as to their identification. Now, we must note that the letter in which this name occurs originated about 200 years after the occurrence mentioned; and also that the name now appears in a different language from that in which it was native. Gelzer ('Die Colonie Osnappars,' in Zeits. f. d. Ægypt. Sprache, 1875, 78–82) supposed that אסנפר is a degeneration from אסן[ר]ניפל. To represent this by a different division we have אסרבניפל. By a change of the ר of אסר into נ (cf. the scribal error Nebuchad*n*ezzar for Nebuchad*r*ezzar), an ellipsis of the middle element of the name, and the change of the final 'l' to 'r' (cf. 'Porus' in the canon of Ptolemy, Smith, Eponym Canon, p. 102f., where the Bab. Chron. reads 'Pulu'), we arrive at the name אסנפר. The identification of Osnappar with Assurbanipal is now conceded by most authorities (Schrader, COT ii. 65; Delitzsch, Paradies, p. 329; Hommel, Ges. Bab.-Assyr. p. 740; E. Meyer, Ges. d. Alterthums, p. 477, and Entst. d. Judenth. p. 29f.). Halévy (REJ ix. 12), however, does not agree with the above authorities. Taking into account (1) the period in which Osnappar is said to have lived, (2) the particular peoples he transported, (3) the probable identification of the name with that of the last great king of Assyria, we can scarcely escape the conclusion that Osnappar was the Assurbanipal of the last period of Assyrian history (so also Driver in Hogarth's Authority and Archæology, p. 112).

OSPRAY (עָזְנִיָּה 'oznîyyāh, ἁλιαίετος, haliæetus).—The name of an unclean bird (Lv 11^{13}, Dt 14^{12}). It is pretty certainly Pandion haliætus, L. It is somewhat rare, and found along the coast and in the Ḥûleh marshes. Its food is fish, which it catches by poising above the water until it fixes an exact perpendicular over its victim, and then dropping suddenly into the water, from which it generally rises with the fish in its claws. Like other fish-eating birds it is seldom used as food for man, and would naturally be counted unclean.

OSSIFRAGE (פֶּרֶס peres, γύψ, gyps), RV 'gier eagle.'—The etymology 'breaker' (פָּרַס), corresponding to ossifrage ('bone-breaker,' from the Lat.), strengthens the claim of the tr^{n} of AV. As the bird is mentioned only twice (Lv 11^{13}, Dt 14^{12}), we have no side-light from Scripture to help us. The ossifrage is the Lämmergeier, Gypætus barbatus, L. It is one of the largest of the vultures, being 4 ft. 6 in. long. It is known in Arab. as bidj or nisr. It is not numerous in Pal., but generally diffused. Tristram says that there is a pair in nearly every wady. Its name is derived from its habit of carrying tortoises and bones in its claws to a height, and dropping them on to a rock to break them, in order to get at their contents. It also preys on lambs, kids, hares, and serpents. It often catches its prey by pushing it off from a cliff. It has been known to attack men in this situation. The male has a black beard, pencilled upper and tawny lower plumage, and blood-red eyes. It is diffused throughout the mountains of northern Europe, Asia, and northern Africa. It breeds on inaccessible cliffs. The female lays one egg, which is hatched in February.

OSTRICH.—1. יַעֲנָה yā'ēn, בַּת־הַיַּעֲנָה bath-hayya'ănāh. The root יָעַן yā'an signifies in Syr. 'to be greedy or voracious.' From this is derived yā'ēn = 'the voracious one' = 'ostrich.' This word occurs in the masc. pl. יְעִים yĕ'ēnîm (La 4[3]), tr[d] AV and RV 'ostriches.' It occurs in the sing. in construction with בַּת and בְּנוֹת in eight passages. In all of these RV correctly gives 'ostrich.' In Lv 11[16], Dt 14[15] AV tr. it 'owl,' Jer 50[39] 'owls,' Mic 1[8] 'owls,' m. 'daughters of the owl,' Is 34[13] 43[20] 'owls,' m. 'daughters of the owl' or 'ostriches,' Job 30[29] 'owls,' m. 'ostriches.' Bochart, arguing from the prefix bath = 'daughter,' thought that the expression bath-hayya'ănāh refers to the female ostrich, while taḥmâṣ (Lv 11[16], Dt 14[15]) refers to the male. But bath, with the name of an animal in the construct state, does not necessarily refer to the female. In the Semitic languages the feminine termination to the specific name often refers to an individual, male or female. Benât-âwa in Arabic is literally 'the daughters of the jackal,' but means jackals. Numerous similar instances could be adduced. (For the discussion of taḥmâṣ see Night Hawk). The derivation of this name of the ostrich from the idea of greed corresponds with its traditional voracity, which leads it to swallow pebbles, bits of glass, metal, bone, etc. This, however, is the same instinct as that which leads fowls to swallow small angular pebbles, to assist in the trituration of their food. The large size of the substances swallowed by the ostrich has given him his special reputation. Some have attributed to the root the meaning 'to cry out,' and fortify their etymology by referring to the voice of the ostrich, which they say resembles that of the lion (cf. Mic 1[8]).

2. רְנָנִים rĕnānîm. AV (Job 39[13]) tr. this word peacocks,' RV 'ostrich.' It is derived from a root signifying 'to give forth a sound,' esp. a twanging or resonant sound (cf. Arab. ranna). While this derivation would suit the peacock, there is a special name for that bird, תֻּכִּיִּים tukkiyyîm (1 K 10[22]), or תוכיים (2 Ch 9[21]). It eminently suits the cry of the female ostrich. The description (vv.[14-18]) can apply to no other bird than the ostrich. AV recognizes this by wrongly translating nôẓāh = 'feathers' at the end of v.[13] by 'ostrich.'

The ostrich, Struthio camelus, L., is a bird of Arabia and Africa. It has been found on the S.E. confines of the Syrian desert. It is the largest of existing birds. The Bible alludes to a number of its characteristics. It is a desert bird. It is several times (Is 34[13] 43[20]) mentioned in connexion with tannîm, which we believe to be the wolf (see Dragon, 1). It is the swiftest of runners, surpassing in this respect even the warhorse when he is urged on by his gallant rider. It is said (Job 39[17]) that 'God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding.' This is said to explain her leaving her eggs in the dust. The facts are that the ostrich lays her eggs in a shallow excavation in the sand and then covers them to the depth of a foot. They are left by day, in tropical climates, to the heat of the sun, and incubated at night. A few eggs, supposed to be reserved for the nourishment of the chicks, are laid near the nest, and left exposed on the sand. This mode of nesting and incubation is probably the basis of the allusion in the above passage. In any case it must be regarded as the reflexion of a popular opinion, founded on the external aspects of the case. It is intended to heighten the contrast of the opening verse of the passage, which describes her beautiful plumage, and the closing which praises her speed. It is true, however, that when the ostrich is surprised with her brood she runs away from her chicks (v.[16]). She is unable to defend them, and cannot conceal them in the open desert. The charge of stupidity is, however, borne out in some other ways. For instance, the ostrich runs usually toward the wind, contrary to the practice of most wild animals. In this way it can sometimes be approached to within shooting distance. Again, it runs in large circles, and does not swerve from its course, which can thus be calculated, and the bird awaited where it is pretty sure to pass. The old allegation that it hides its head in the sand to escape danger is not true. Although forbidden in the law as food (Lv 11[16], Dt 14[15]), its flesh and eggs are much prized by the Arabs.

The feathers of the ostrich, so well known for their beauty, quite justify the eulogy of Job (39[13]) RV 'The wing of the ostrich rejoiceth; (but) are her pinions and feathers kindly?' The feathers of the male are white and black; of the female and young dusky grey.

OTHER.—1. Moon (Revisers' English, p. 120 ff.) contends that (following the AV) the RV has omitted 'other' where it should be, and inserted it where it should not be. As an example of the former he quotes Mk 4[31. 32], where the mustard seed is said to be 'less than all the seeds that are upon the earth,' a sentence which strictly means that it is less than itself. For the latter he quotes Mk 12[32] 'There is none other but he.'

2. In Old English the plural of 'other' was othre. When this inflexion was dropped there was for a time no distinction between the sing. and the plu. of the word. After a time, however, a new plural was formed by adding s. There are a few examples in AV of the old plu. 'other,' viz. Jos 8[22] 'The other issued out of the city against them'; 2 Ch 32[22] 'From the hand of all other'; Job 24[24], 1 Mac 9[48], 2 Mac 7[34], Lk 23[32], Jn 19[18], 1 Co 14[29], Ph 2[3] 4[3]. In OT the RV retains 'other'; in NT it is changed into 'others' except Ph 2[3] which is retained, and 4[3] which is changed into 'the rest.' In 1 Mac 9[48] RV gives 'they,' and omits the word in 2 Mac 7[34]. Examples are in Tindale, Mt 21[8] 'Other cut downe braunches from the trees'; 27[42] 'He saved other, him sylfe he can not save'; and from the Rhem. version He 7[23] 'And the other in deede were made priestes, being many, because that by death they were prohibited to continue'; cf. Ps 7[16] al. [Pr. Bk.].

3. The phrase 'other some,' formerly very common when 'some' preceded, is twice retained in AV, 2 Es 13[13] 'Some were glad, some were sorry, some of them were bound, and other some (so RV) brought of them that were offered' (quidam . . . quidam . . . aliqui . . . aliqui); Ac 17[18] (καὶ τινες ἔλεγον . . . οἱ δέ, so RV). The archaism is not in 'other' but in 'some,' which in the sing. was equivalent to 'one,' 'a certain,' and so in the plu. meant 'persons' or 'things'; hence 'other some' is 'other persons' or 'things.' Cf. Mt 13[5] Rhem. 'Othersome also fell upon rockie places, where they had not much earth'; and Eph 4[11] Rhem. 'And he gave, some Apostles, and some Prophets, and othersome Evangelists, and othersome pastors and doctors.' Also in Judgment of Dort, p. 35, 'The cause of which his divers dispensation is not to be imputed to the worthinesse of one nation above another, or to the better using of the light of nature by some then by other some.'

OTHNI (עָתְנִי; B Γοονεί, A Γοθνί).—A son of Shemaiah, 1 Ch 26[7].

OTHNIEL (עָתְנִיאֵל, Γοθονιήλ), described in Jg 1[13] 3[9] as בֶּדֶקְנוּ אֲחִי כָלֵב הַקָּטֹן.—It is not impossible from the point of view of strict grammar to construe this Heb. phrase so as to make Kenaz the brother and Othniel the nephew of Caleb (so B of LXX, υἱὸς Κενὲζ ἀδελφοῦ Χάλεβ; cf. art. JUDGES, 4 (b), vol. ii. p. 811[a]). It is more probable, however, that Caleb, who is elsewhere called the Kenizzite (Nu 32^{12}), was viewed as a son of Kenaz, and thus a brother of Othniel (so A . . . ἀδελφός, and Vulg. filius Cenez, frater Caleb). This conclusion is strengthened by the expression 'younger brother,' which would have no relevancy as applied to Kenaz, but is quite appropriate in reference to Othniel 'as indicating that the disparity in age between uncle and niece (Jg 1^{13}) was not so great as might be thought, or (in 3^{9}) as explaining how Othniel so long outlived Caleb' (Moore, Judges, 27). In pre-critical times there can be little doubt that apologetic reasons weighed heavily with many interpreters. The uncle, it was imagined, must be saved from the scandal of marrying his niece, although marriages within closer degrees than this were sanctioned by usage (e.g. Abraham and Sarah, Gn 20^{12}; cf. 2 S 13^{13} Amnon and Tamar).

In one of the narratives (Jos 15^{17}, Jg 1^{13}) of the conquest of Canaan it is related that Othniel smote Kiriath-sepher and obtained as a reward the hand of his niece Achsah the daughter of Caleb (see ACHSAH). The story of the springs which the bride obtained from her father (Jos 15^{18}, Jg 1^{14}) is introduced in all probability in order to account for the possession by Achsah, a branch of Othniel, of waters which would more naturally have belonged to the Kalibbites, an older constituent of the Kenizzite clan. In Jg 3^{7-11} Othniel is introduced by D[2] as the first of the 'Judges' and the deliverer of Israel from CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM (wh. see). His victory is said to have secured rest to the land for forty years. Very serious difficulties lie in the way of our accepting the historicity of this latter narrative. These difficulties are not in the least evaded by the purely hypothetical combinations of Sayce in HCM 297 ff. and EHH 286 f. See Moore, Judges, p. 85.

Ethnologically and as an eponym Othniel has much the same significance as CALEB (wh. see), being a younger branch of the important clan of the Kenizzites.

OTHONIAS ('Οθονίας), 1 Es 9^{28}, a corruption of the name Mattaniah, in Ezr 10^{27}.

OUCHES.—Ouche, like adder, apron, etc., belongs to a group of words that in modern English have lost an initial n through a mistaken division —'a nouche' (cf. Chaucer, House of Fame, 1350, 'They were set as thick as nouchis Fyne, of the fynest stones faire') having become 'an ouche.' The term was applied to gold ornaments, particularly those of the nature of a clasp or brooch, set with jewels.

1. The two large jewels of shôham-stone (EV 'onyx,' RVm 'beryl') on the shoulders of the high priest's ephod (see vol. i. p. 725[b]) were 'set in ouches of gold' (מִשְׁבְּצוֹת זָהָב Ex $28^{11f.}$ $39^{6f.}$). The word mishbĕẓôth seems to denote a setting of open work in contradistinction to the method of setting jewels in a solid capsule of gold, and since it is derived from a root signifying 'to weave or wreathe' (see Dillm. on Ex 28^{11}), it may safely be taken as the technical term for filigree work, which was known to the Egyptian goldsmiths from very early times. The gold, as we are expressly informed in Ex 39^{3}, was beaten out into thin sheets, which were cut up into narrow strips. These strips or wires, as we may call them, were formed into elaborate gold filigree by means of a most delicate process of soldering (see Blümner, Technologie, etc., der Gewerbe und Künste bei Griechern u. Romern, iv. 250 f., 316 f.), and used as a setting to the jewels, the open nature of the work facilitating the attachment of the whole, presumably by the use of gold thread, to the fabric of the ephod. The same method of attachment by means of a setting of gold filigree (Ex 39^{13}, RV 'enclosed in ouches of gold in their settings') was adopted for the twelve jewels of the breastplate.*

The statement of Josephus that the jewels on the shoulder-straps of the ephod (termed by him 'sardonyx stones') served as agraffes or clasps to fasten the two ends of the straps (πορποῦσι δὲ τὴν ἐπωμίδα σαρδόνυχες δύο . . . πρὸς τὸ ταῖς περονίσιν ἐπιτήδειον, κ.τ.λ., Ant. III. vii. 5 [Niese, § 165]), like several other statements of his in this paragraph, conflicts with P's description of the ephod, and of the purpose of these jewels 'as a memorial before J".'

2. In the description of the high priest's BREASTPLATE (vol. i. p. 319[b]) it was pointed out that the gold chains, by which the breastplate was held in position, 'were passed over, or through, or otherwise attached to a couple of gold ornaments (AV 'ouches,' Ex $28^{13.\ 14.\ 25}$ $39^{16.\ 18}$) which had previously been fixed to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod in front.' These 'ouches' (Heb. as before, mishbĕẓôth) were also of open filigree work, and, if we can trust the Greek translators, had the shape of rosettes (ἀσπίδισκαι), one of the commonest 'motives' in ancient art, including architecture and embroidery. For these rosettes or 'daisy† pattern' see Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldæa and Assyria, vol. i. 260 ff. [note jewelled bracelet, fig. 133, p. 305], and vol. ii. 332 ff., noting figs. 244, 250. It is not improbable that the same pattern was followed in the setting of the jewels above described (under 1).‡

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

OUGHT.—1. 'Aught' and 'ought' are different forms of the same word. Aught is from a (=ever) and wiht (=thing, whit) as ought is from o (=ever) and wiht. So the meaning is 'any thing whatever.' The early forms were numerous. AV has only the form 'ought,' which RV everywhere changes into 'aught,' the modern form. See NAUGHT.

2. In AV 1611 'ought' is found as the past tense of 'owe' in Mt $18^{24.\ 28}$, Lk 7^{41}. This was originally its use, but in time it was regarded as distinct from 'owe,' from which another past tense, 'owed,' was formed, and looked upon as a present with another meaning. Cf. Spenser, FQ III. i. 44—

> 'Now were they liegmen to this Ladie free,
> And her knight's service ought, to hold of her in fee.'

J. HASTINGS.

OUTLANDISH.—Neh 13^{26} 'Even him did outlandish women cause to sin' (נָשִׁים נָכְרִיּוֹת, LXX αἱ γυναῖκες αἱ ἀλλότριαι). The Heb. word is usually tr 'stranger' (i.e. 'foreigner') in AV, and RV gives 'strange women' here. 'Outlandish' (from Anglo-Sax. utlendisc, an adj. fr. utland, foreign countries) is Coverdale's word. Cf. Milton, Hist. Eng. v. 'He had taken with him Alfrid his youngest son to be there inaugurated King, and brought home with him an out landish Wife; for which they endeavoured to deprive him of his Kingdom'; and Bunyan, PP p. 84 (Clar. Press ed.), 'The Pilgrims were cloathed with such kind of raiment as was diverse from the raiment of any that traded in that fair. The people therefore of the fair made a great gazing upon them. Some said they were Fools, some they were Bedlams, and some they are Outlandish-men.' J. HASTINGS.

* Acc. to a very plausible, textual emendation, Ps 45^{13a} (Heb. $14b$) should read: פְּנִינִים מְשֻׁבְּצוֹת לְבוּשָׁהּ (so Krochmal, Graetz, Cheyne, Wellh.) 'of pearls (set) in gold filigree (Cheyne. 'in ouches of gold') is her raiment.'

† 'A silver shield with boss of gold' (Wordsworth).

‡ The ἀσπίδισκαι of 1 Mac 4^{57} are best taken in the same technical sense, as ornamental 'rosettes' or 'bosses,' rather than literally as 'small shields.'

OUTRAGE.—An outrage is that which goes beyond bounds (being formed by adding the common suffix age to outre, Old Fr. oltre, from Lat. ultra, beyond). It occurs in the heading to Ps 10, 'David complaineth to God of the outrage of the wicked.' The adj. outrageous is found in Pr 27[4] 'anger is outrageous' (lit. as RVm 'anger is a flood'; Amer. RV 'overwhelming'). For the prim. sense of the adj. cf. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 36, 'There be iiii. rowes or range of pylers thrughout ye church, of ye fynest marble yt may be, not onely mervaylous for ye nombre, but for ye outragyous gretnes, length, and fayrenes thereof.' J. HASTINGS.

OUTROAD is now lost to the Eng. language, though 'inroad' remains. It was never common, and occurs in AV only at 1 Mac 15[41] 'He set horsemen there, and an host of footmen, to the end that issuing out they might make outroads upon the ways of Judah' (ἐξοδεύωσι). RV retains the word here, and even introduces it into 1 Es 4[23] 'A man taketh his sword and goeth forth to make outroads' (ἐξοδεύειν; AV omits to translate). The same Gr. verb occurs in 2 Mac 12[19], but AV gives 'went forth,' RV 'sallied forth.' J. HASTINGS.

OVEN (תַּנּוּר tannûr, κλίβανος).—The Arab. name is the same as the Heb., and the use of the tannûr to-day indicates, no doubt, the kind of oven in use formerly. It is commonly made by sinking a hole in the ground, 3 or 3½ ft. deep, and 2½ to 3 ft. in diameter, somewhat in the form of a large jar; the walls are plastered with cement that will resist the action of fire, which is kindled in the oven when it is to be heated for use. The fuel is grass, thorns, or dry twigs (Mt 6[30]), which heat the oven rapidly, and of course blacken it with smoke and soot. This explains the allusion in La 5[10]. The inner surface is wiped when it becomes sufficiently heated, and the dough is moulded into broad thin loaves, hardly thicker than parchment, and placed, one at a time, on the wall of the oven by means of a large cushion, with a convex surface to fit the concave inner surface of the oven. The baking process is over in a few seconds. See BREAD, FURNACE. This form of oven is sometimes built above ground, and in Arabia sometimes on a movable base (Niebuhr, Descr. de l'Ar. pp. 45, 46). These ovens are usually outside the house, as the smoke would fill the dwelling if within. Often the same oven serves for several families (Lv 26[26]). This kind of oven is doubtless referred to in Ex 8[3], though the Egyptians had various kinds.

Large ovens, 6 to 8 ft. square, are used in bakeries at the present day, of brick or stone, raised 2 or 3 ft. from the ground, with an arched roof and chimney, to allow the escape of the smoke. The bottom is paved, and the fire burns at one side while the bread is being baked on the other. The loaves are introduced on a narrow wooden shovel, which will take several at a time, and by which they are turned and removed when baked. A kind of portable oven, called in Arabic sâj, is much used by the nomads of Syria. It consists merely of a circular piece of sheet-iron, hemispherical in form, and is used by raising it on stones, concave side down, the fire being kindled under it, and the thin loaf placed on the convex surface.

The oven is figuratively employed in Scripture to indicate fierce heat and quick destruction, the materials used in heating it being soon consumed (cf. Ps 21[9], Hos 7[7], Mal 4[1]). H. PORTER.

OVERSEER.—See MELZAR, STEWARD. Once in AV (Ac 20[28]) ἐπίσκοποι is translated 'overseers.' It is the tr. of Tindale, who was followed by Cranmer (Great Bible), Geneva, and even the Bishops. RV has returned to Wyclif's and the Rhemish 'bishops.' See BISHOP.

OWL.—Five Heb. words are translated 'owl' in AV. 1. בַּת הַיַּעֲנָה bath-hayya'ănāh, RV 'ostrich' (see NIGHT HAWK, OSTRICH).

2. יַנְשׁוּף yanshûph (Lv 11[17], Dt 14[16]), 'great owl'; יַנְשׁוֹף yanshôph (Is 34[11]), 'owl,' RVm 'bittern.' In all the LXX gives ἶβις and Vulg. ibis. The passage in Isaiah gives a considerable list of creatures, some fabulous, others uncertain, but all supposed to suggest desolation and ruin. Yanshôph is one of these. It is a strong objection to the ibis that it is a swamp bird, hardly to be thought of in connexion with an accursed and forsaken ruin. Yet the same is true of the bittern, the cormorant, and the pelican (RV text and AV margin) in the same passage. We may therefore accept ibis, in spite of this difficulty, or tr. the word 'twilight bird,' in allusion to its etymology,* leaving the question of species unsettled. This tr[n] would emphasize the desolation and evil omen, which it is the object of the writer to portray.

3. כּוֹס kôs. Here again we have a word occurring only in the lists of unclean birds (Lv 11[17], Dt 14[16], AV and RV 'little owl'), and in one other reference (Ps 102[6] AV and RV 'owl'), where the psalmist compares himself to 'an owl of the desert' (RV 'waste places'). The owl is called by the Arabs umm al-kharâb, i.e. 'mother of ruins,' from the fact that it frequents such places. The LXX νυκτικόραξ (Lv 11[17], Ps 102[6]) confirms the tr[n] 'owl,' which is to be taken generically. Among the owls of Pal. and Syria are Asio Otus, L., the long-eared owl; A. brachyotus, J. R. Forster, the short-eared owl; and Bubo ascalaphus, Sav., the Egyptian eagle owl. LXX tr. kôs in Dt 14[16] by ἐρωδιόν, Vulg. herodium.

4. קָפוֹז kippôz. This word occurs but once (Is 34[15]). The LXX ἐχῖνος implies the reading קִפּוֹד kippôdh, which AV tr. 'bittern,' RV 'porcupine' (see BITTERN). As the bittern or porcupine has already been mentioned in the list of creatures in the ruins of Edom (v.[11]) we must reject this. Nor can we accept the RV rendering arrowsnake (adopted by Ges., Dillm., Siegfried-Stade, Cheyne, etc., following Bochart, Hieroz. iii. 199), a kind of snake that leaps from trees on passers-by (Gr. ἀκοντίας), from Arab. kafazd, 'to leap.' The description is clearly that of a bird. No snake lays, incubates, 'hatches, and gathers its young under its shadow.' The fact that some owls specially frequent ruins makes it probable that, though there is no positive authority in its favour, some species of owl is intended. Scops giu, Scop., and Athene glaux, Sav., are dwellers in caves, ruins, and desolate places, and would suit the context.

5. לִילִית lîlîth, is also found in but one passage (Is 34[14]). AV tr. it 'screech owl,' m. 'night monster'; RV 'night monster,' m. 'Lilith.' The etymology points to a nocturnal creature. It is probably fabulous. The unearthly hootings and boomings of the nocturnal birds about ruins and in lonely wastes would easily suggest to the imaginative Oriental mind such spectres. The LXX ὀνοκένταυρος refers to some unknown ape, or an apparition. The lamia of the Vulg. is a hag or witch who does harm to children. See, further, art. LILITH. The ghûl of the Arabs is a fabulous spectre, which haunts graveyards, and lives on human flesh (see NIGHT MONSTER).

It will be seen from the above analysis that three out of the five words tr[d] 'owl' in AV probably do not refer to owls. The other two are generic. The Arab. bûm expresses, as a tone word, the cry of some of the owls. The Arabs are superstitious in regard to all the species, and look upon them as emblems of evil. G. E. POST.

* From נָשַׁף 'twilight' (so Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 281 ff.) Others derive from נָשַׁף 'wheeze.'

OX (Ὦξ).—An ancestor of Judith, Jth 8[1].

OX (שׁוֹר shôr).—The unit of the bovine species (בָּקָר bāḳār, as horse, ass, sheep) without reference to age or sex. It includes bull, bullock, cow, heifer, and calf. Nevertheless, each of these has a special name, as seen below. Shôr is sometimes tr[d] 'ox,' and sometimes 'bull' or 'bullock.' The Aramaic form תּוֹר tôr corresponds exactly with the Arab. thaur, Gr. ταῦρος, and Lat. taurus. In those languages, however, it refers esp. to the bull. Sometimes, for emphasis, shôr is coupled with אֶחָד 'eḥād, meaning then a single ox (Nu 15[11], Neh 5[18]). Rarely it is used collectively (Gn 32[5], 1 S 22[19] 'oxen,' Dt 15[19] 'bullock,' Jg 6[25] פַּר־הַשּׁוֹר par-hash-shôr, lit. 'bull of the ox,' AV 'young bullock,' RV 'bullock'). Shôr is also used metaphorically בְּכוֹר שׁוֹרוֹ 'the firstling of his bullock' (Dt 33[17]), to indicate the favoured position of Joseph. עִקְּרוּ שׁוֹר AV 'digged down a wall' (Gn 49[6]), is more correctly tr[d] RV 'houghed an ox.' Another Heb. term for 'oxen' is אֲלָפִים [only in plur.]. Its only occurrences are Pr 14[4], Is 30[24] (where oxen are spoken of as used in tillage), Ps 8[7] (oxen subject to man), Dt 7[13] 28[4. 18. 51] (their increase [שְׁגַר] a blessing).

Bull, bullock, cow, kine.—1. פַּר par (fem. פָּרָה pārāh, the female of the bovine species). When intended to refer to a young bull there is often added בֶּן־בָּקָר (Ex 29[1] etc.); once in construct state with shôr, פַּר־הַשּׁוֹר='bullock of the ox' (Jg 6[25]); once in apposition, שׁוֹר פָּר='ox-bullock,' i.e. 'bullock of the oxen' (Ps 69[31]). Par and pārāh are usually employed to designate bulls or heifers for sacrifice. They are, however, occasionally used otherwise (Ps 22[12] etc.).

2. אַבִּיר 'abbîr. A metaphorical term, derived from the idea of his strength and valour (Ps 22[12] 50[13], Is 34[7]). In the same metaphorical sense it is used to designate the horse (Jer 8[16] 47[3], AV 'strong horses,' RV 'strong ones' 50[11], AV 'bulls,' m. 'steeds,' RV 'strong horses').

3. תְּאוֹ tᵉ'ô (Dt 14[5]), AV 'wild ox,' RV 'antelope'; תֹּא tô (Is 51[20]), AV 'wild bull,' RV 'antelope.' In the absence of any certainty as to the species it is better to adopt oryx, after the LXX (Dt 14[5] ὄρυξ. In Is 51[20] LXX has ὡς σευτλιον ἡμιεφθον, 'like a half-cooked beetroot') and Vulg., and to suppose that the wild animal here intended is Oryx beatrix, formerly confounded with Antilope leucoryx, Pall. It is found on the borders of the Syrian desert. The horns are sold in Damascus and Jerusalem; they are over 3 ft. long. The creature is between 3½ and 4 ft. high. Its lower parts and a portion of the face are sandy white, and the rest of the face, back, and flanks tawny.

Calf, heifer.—עֵגֶל 'ēgel, is the young of the bovine species, irrespective of sex. With the feminine suffix, עֶגְלָה 'eglāh, either 'a single calf,' irrespective of sex (Dt 21[3]), or 'a young cow' (Is 7[21]). Heifer is the tr[n] once of פָּרָה pārāh (Nu 19[2]), usually of 'eglāh (Dt 21[3], Jg 14[18] etc.). See HEIFER.

There is no evidence that the buffalo, Bos bubalus, L., was known in Bible times. It is now common in the marshy districts, where it can wallow in the mud, but always as a domestic, not a wild animal. It is common in the Ḥûleh region, in the plain of Esdraelon, the Jordan Valley, and about Ḥems and Ḥama.

The Scripture allusions to oxen and their congeners are too numerous to be cited. They were used for ploughing (1 K 19[19]), for draught, yoked in one or more pairs (Nu 7[3]), as beasts of burden (1 Ch 12[40] etc.), for treading out the corn (Dt 25[4] etc.), for food (Dt 14[4]), sacrifices (Gn 15[9] etc.), dairy purposes (Dt 32[14], Is 7[22], 2 S 17[29]). Herds were investments of wealth (Job 1[3] 42[12]). The pasture grounds of Palestine and Syria were extensive. Oxen were also kept and fattened in stalls (1 K 4[23], Pr 15[17], Lk 13[15]). In the winter they were fed on stubble and straw, tibn (Is 11[7]) and 'clean (AVm 'leavened,' RV 'savoury') provender' (30[24]). The Mosaic law provided for their protection (Ex 22[12], Dt 25[4]). The ox is found only where water is abundant and there is green pasture in springtime. Most of the cattle of the Holy Land at present are of inferior breeds. Probably this is but a part of the degeneracy of the country. The best races of animals would thrive there, and even now one sometimes sees fine specimens of horned cattle. See CATTLE.

OX-GOAD.—See GOAD, and AGRICULTURE in vol. i. p. 49[b] where an ox-goad is figured.

OZEM (אָצֶם).—1. An elder brother of David, 1 Ch 2[15] (Ἀσομ). The vocalization of MT is of doubtful correctness. Kittel thinks אָצֹם (cf. LXX) more probable than אֹצֶם. Cf. the parallel case of Oren (wh. see) and Aran. 2. A son of Jerahmeel, 1 Ch 2[25] (B Ἀσάν, A Ἀσόμ).

OZIAS (Ὀζίας).—1. 1 Es 8[2] (B Ὀζίας, A Ἐζίας), 2 Es 1[2] (Ozias), one of the ancestors of Ezra (cf. Ezr 7[4]). 2. 1 Es 5[31], head of a family of temple servants which returned with Zerubbabel, called UZZA, Ezr 2[49], Neh 7[51]. 3. The son of Micah, of the tribe of Simeon, one of the rulers of Bethulia in the history of Judith (Jth 6[15] 7[23] 8[10. 28. 35] 10[6]).

OZIEL (Ὀζιήλ).—An ancestor of Judith, Jth 8[1]. The name occurs frequently in OT under the form Uzziel (עֻזִּיאֵל).

OZNI (אָזְנִי).—A son of Gad, Nu 26[16], called in Gn 46[16] Ezbon (אֶצְבֹּן). In the passage in Nu the same word אָזְנִי is used also as a patronymic=the Oznites.

P

PAARAI.—In MT of 2 S 23[35] פַּעֲרַי הָאַרְבִּי 'Paarai the Arbite' appears as one of David's thirty heroes. The parallel passage, 1 Ch 11[37], has נַעַרַי בֶּן־אֵזְבַּי 'Naarai the son of Ezbai' (B Ναορὰι υἱὸς Ἀζωβαί, A Νοορὰ υἱὸς Ἀζβί; cf. the reading of some twenty MSS of LXX in 2 S, τοῦ Οὐρὶ (Οὐρὲ) υἱὸς τοῦ Ἀσβί). It is impossible to decide with any confidence between the names Naarai and Paarai, or the readings 'son of Ezbai' and 'the Arbite' (cf. the name Arab in Jos 15[52]) or 'the Archite' (cf. Jos 16[2], 1 S 16[32] al.). This last reading is favoured by Klostermann, and seems to be pointed to by the corrupt reading of B, Οὐραιοεργεί, in 2 S 23[35] (cf. Driver, ad loc.), as well as by that of A, Φαραεὶ ὁ Ἀραχειεὶς. See, further, ARBITE, EZBAI, NAARAI, and cf. Kittel's note on 1 Ch 11[37] in SBOT.

J. A. SELBIE.

PADDAN, i.e. Paddan-aram, is found in Gn 48[7] only. Perhaps אֹרֶם has fallen out of the Heb. text; it is present in the Sam., as well as in the LXX (Μεσοποταμία τῆς Συρίας).

PADDAN-ARAM (פַּדָּן אֲרָם, Μεσοποταμία Συρίας).—See ARAM, in vol. i. p. 138[b]. Padanu is used in Bab. contracts of the age of Abraham as a measure of land. It is the modern Arabic feddân, 'acre.'

A. H. SAYCE.

PADDLE (יָתֵד; πάσσαλος; paxillus) occurs only in Dt 23[13] AV and RV, but RVm 'shovel' (which is Coverdale's word). The Heb. word is elsewhere used of a tent-pin (Ex 27[19], Jg 4[21] et al.), and of a peg for hanging on (Ezr 9[8], Is 22[23. 24], Ezk 15[3]), always of wood, so that the translation 'nail' should be avoided. Once also it signifies the batten or pin with which the woof is beaten up into the web (Jg 16[14]; see WEAVING). In Dt 23[13] it is used of a wooden tool for digging, a spade. In earlier English a small spade used for cleaning the plough-share was called a 'paddle,' which explains the choice of this word in the Geneva Bible, whence it reached AV and RV.

PADON (פָּדוֹן, Φαδών).—The name of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2[44] = Neh 7[47]; called in 1 Es 5[29] Phaleas (Φαλαίας).

PAGIEL (פַּגְעִיאֵל).—Son of Ochran, mentioned by P as chief of the tribe of Asher at the time of the Exodus, Nu 1[13] 2[27] (Φαγαιήλ), 7[72] (B Φαγεήλ, A Φαγαιήλ), [77] (B Φαγεήλ, A Φαγαήλ), 10[26] (Φαγαιήλ). The Heb. name is probably of late origin and of artificial character (see Gray, HPN 200 f., 210).

PAHATH-MOAB (פַּחַת מוֹאָב 'governor of Moab'; A Φααθμωάβ, B Φααθμ., Φααβμ., Φααδμ., Φαλαβμ., Φθαλειμ., Μααθμ.; Phahath-moab, and in 1 Es 8[34] ductoris Moab(ilionis) [the -ilionis represents the Greek word after Moab]).—In the list of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel there are included 'Bĕnê Pahath-moab of the Bĕnê Jeshua (and) Joab 2812,' Ezr 2[6], 1 Es 5[11], '2818' Neh 7[11]; in the list of those who returned with Ezra, 'Of the Bĕnê Pahath-moab, Eliehoenai ben Zerahiah and 200 males,' Ezr 8[4], 1 Es 8[31]; in the list of the husbands of foreign wives are named eight of the Bĕnê Pahath-moab, Ezr 10[30]; in the list of the repairers of the wall of Jerusalem is named Hasshub ben-Pahath-moab (Neh 3[11]); and amongst those who signed the covenant, 'the chiefs of the people . . . Pahath-moab,' Neh 10[14]. Here we must understand the chief of the clan Pahath-moab, this being a Jewish clan, part of which remained in Babylon, while part returned with Zerubbabel and part with Ezra. The language of Ezr 2[6] etc. shows that at the Return this clan consisted of two branches, Jeshua and Joab. In Ezr 8[9] the Bĕnê Joab are enumerated as a separate clan, which furnished Ezra with Obadiah and 218 males.

Pahath-moab, as the name of a Jewish clan, is an enigma of which we have no satisfactory solution. It is commonly explained as 'governor of Moab.' The first part of the compound name would thus be connected with the Assyrian pe̮ḥah, which occurs so frequently in the Inscriptions. Pahath-moab may be a reminiscence of the Israelite dominion in Moab, and may have some connexion with 'the dominion in Moab' of the Judahite Bĕnê Shelah mentioned in 1 Ch 4[22]. Or 'Pahath' may have replaced syllables of similar sound but different meaning, a familiar phenomenon in the history of proper names, e.g. 'Cat and Wheel' for 'Catherine Wheel.' In this case the clan Pahath-moab may have been connected with some Israelite settlement in Moab, or even with a settlement of Moabite refugees in Judah. Or, again, 'pahath' may be the word for 'pit'; or the whole word Pahath-moab may be a corruption of some name which had no connexion in meaning with either pe̮ḥah or Moab. A process of corruption antecedent to MT would be paralleled by Vulg. Phœmo in 1 Es 5[11], which no doubt goes back to the Pahath-moab of MT. Cf. Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums, pp. 146, 157.

PAI (פָּעִי).—The capital city of Hadad (1 Ch) or Hadar (Gn), a king of Edom, 1 Ch 1[50]. In the parallel passage, Gn 36[39], the name occurs in the form Pau (פָּעוּ). The LXX has in both passages Φογώρ (= פְּעוֹר; cf. Φαγώρ in Jos 15[58a]), and Ball thinks פְּעוֹר 'is probably right,' while Kittel pronounces it 'perhaps the more original.' The site of the place referred to has not been identified, although there is some plausibility in the comparison Seetzen (Reisen, iii. 18) suggests with the ruins of Phau'ara in Edom (cf. Ritter, Erdkunde, xiv. 995; but see, against this identification, Buhl, Edomiter, p. 38 Anm. 3). Hommel (AHT 264) suggests reading Pa'ish.

J. A. SELBIE.

PAINFUL, PAINFULNESS.—'Painful' was formerly used as we now use 'painstaking,' i.e. careful, industrious, laborious. We find three examples in AV, Ps 73[16] 'When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me' (בְּעֵינַי [Kerê הוּא] עָמָל, i.e. as AVm and RVm 'it was labour in mine eyes'), 2 Es 7[12], 2 Mac 2[26]. So Elyot, The Governour, ii. 275, 'Suppose ye that the same Anniball . . . coulde haue wonne from the Romagnes all Spayne . . . if he had not ben a man paynefull and of labour incomparable?'; Livingstone in Select Biog. i. 316, 'Mr. David Dickson—a man singularly gifted with an edifying way of preaching, and whose painfull labours were eminently blessed with successe.'

'Painfulness' also was used in the sense of carefulness, industry, but in its only occurrence in AV the meaning is 'toilsomeness,' 2 Co 11[27], Gr. μόχθος, which is elsewhere (1 Th 2[9], 2 Th 3[8]) rendered 'travail,' and that is accordingly the rendering of RV here also. Cf. Hooker, Eccl. Pol. I. vii. 7, 'The search of knowledge is a thing painful, and the painfulness of knowledge is that which maketh the will so hardly inclinable thereto.'

PAINT.—Mention is made Jer 22[14] of the painting (פֶּשַׁח mashaḥ) of interiors with vermilion, probably after the manner of lacquer-work, which in a somewhat debased form is still practised in Damascus. The shields of the warriors of Nineveh were painted red, Nah 2[3]. The variegation by colour was, however, chiefly by dyes in cloth, and by inlaying in wood, stone, and metal.

The application of paint was especially an art practised by the ancient Egyptians, some of whose pigments were exceedingly beautiful, and have retained their freshness through the centuries.

The other biblical references are to the painting of the eyes, 2 K 9[30], Jer 4[30], Ezk 23[40]. The substance used for this purpose is antimony (פּוּךְ pûkh, Arab. kuḥl), and the act of applying it is כָּחַל (kaḥal). It is pounded to a powder of extreme fineness, so that 'as soft as kuḥl' has passed into a proverbial expression. The eyelids are held between two fingers and drawn forward a little, and then a fine rod covered with the black paste is drawn along between the edges of the eyelids. The powder does not irritate the delicate coating of the eye with which it comes in contact, but there is a collection of the powder under the eyelid so as to produce actual distension. The effect is one of apparent enlargement of the eyes, and this is further enhanced by a line of stain prolonging the eyelashes. While the result is universally acknowledged in the East to be ornamental, the motive is too obviously ostentatious to meet with approval among the more cultivated classes. Among the Bedawin of the desert men as well as women apply kuḥl to the eyes. According to popular belief, it strengthens the eyes and protects against ophthalmia. See EYE-PAINT.

PALACE is used to tr. the following words:— 1. אַרְמוֹן 'armôn, Am 4^3 הַרְמֹן [very dub.]; βάρις, βασίλειον, θεμέλιον, etc.; palatium, domus, etc.; properly 'citadel,' probably connected with the root רוּם 'to be high'; chiefly used in Pss and Prophets, especially Amos. 2. הֵיכָל hêkhāl, βασίλειον, οἶκος, etc., palatium, etc., supposed to be derived, through the Assyr. ekallu, from the Akkadian e-gal, 'great house.' The same word is used more frequently in the sense of 'temple' as the house of J". 3. בִּירָה bîrāh, πόλις, βάρις, οἶκος, etc., civitas, castrum, etc., properly 'castle'; only in late post-exilic literature, Ch, Ezr, Neh, Est, Dn; in 1 Ch $29^{1.\ 19}$ of the temple at Jerusalem. 4. אַפֶּדֶן 'appedhen, not tr. in LXX and Vulg.; only in Dn 11^{45}=Old Pers. apadâna, 'treasury,'* 'armoury.' 5. בַּיִת bayith, בִּיתָן bîthān, 'house.' 6. תִּירָה tîrāh, only in Ezk 25^4, σκήνωμα, tentorium, RV 'encampment,' and Ca 8^9 ἔπαλξις, propugnaculum, RV 'turret,' RVm 'battlements.' 7. αὐλή, atrium, 'court.' 8. πραιτώριον, prætorium, the 'prætor's court.' Of these, 3 and 6 are incorrectly translated 'palace.' The other words used remind us that a 'palace' differs from other buildings only by the size and complexity necessitated by the private life and public functions of a ruler. Primarily, it is simply a large house (2, 5); so the Egyptian royal title Pharaoh or Palace (cf. Sublime Porte) means 'great house'; and the ordinary OT term for 'palace,' in its strict sense of 'royal residence,' is 'the king's house,' or 'his house,' 1 K 7^1 9^{10}. 'Armôn indicates that in troubled times a palace was a fortress; ('appedhen and) prætorium that, in early times, a palace included government offices, law courts, and prisons, Jer 32^2. See, further, PRÆTORIUM.

The only royal residence of which we have any details in the Bible is Solomon's palace, 1 K 7^{1-12}, which took thirteen years to build. This included the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon,' a great hall, 100 cubits long, 50 broad, 30 high, with four rows of pillars; a 'porch of pillars,' 50 cubits by 30; the 'porch of the throne' for a court of justice; a dwelling-house for himself, and another for Pharaoh's daughter. Round about the whole was a great court of hewn stones and cedar beams. The description was probably written while the buildings were still standing; but it is very obscure, and the text has suffered in transmission. Moreover, the account is obviously incomplete; the writer does not profess to mention all the apartments in the palace, and only gives the dimensions of the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon' and the 'Porch of Pillars.' With these meagre data, the various reproductions of the ground-plan are little more than guesses which help us to imagine the possible arrangement of the rooms and courts of an Israelite palace. Cf. HOUSE; see for Solomon's Palace, the Commentaries on 1 K, the Histories of Isr. on Solomon, and the Archæologies on 'Palace,' especially Benzinger, Arch. 233–243.

In Egypt the palace was not only the royal residence, but also the seat of government. The royal apartments were in an inner, the halls of audience in an outer court. If we include all the buildings required for courtiers and officials, the 'palace' becomes not a house, but a royal city. A characteristic feature was a balcony on which the king would show himself to his people. See Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 69 f., 182 f.; Maspero, Dawn, etc. 275 f.

The Assyrian and Babylonian palaces were large and magnificent. In Babylonia the palaces, like the temples, were built on the top of artificial mounds of crude bricks; and were groups of buildings forming a great fortress. For account, plans, etc., of Gudea's palace at Lagash, see Maspero, Dawn, etc. 709 f.; Hommel, Gesch. Bab. u. Assyr. 201. In Assyria a typical palace is that of Sargon II. at Dursarrakin, a huge walled square, with numerous buildings and inner courts, including a ziggurat and other temples. Special features of the Assyr. palaces were the sculptures on the walls, and the winged human-headed bulls (specimens in Brit. Mus.). See Maspero, Hist. Anc. Egyp.-Assyr. ch. xi.; Hommel, op. cit. 682 ff. (both illustrated).

PALAL (פָּלָל 'judge'), the son of Uzai, took part in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 3^{25}; B Φαλάλ, A Φαλάξ).

PALANQUIN.—Ca 3^9 RV 'King Solomon made himself a palanquin of the wood of Lebanon' (RVm 'car of state,' AV 'chariot,' AVm 'bed'). The Heb. word, אַפִּרְיוֹן, occurs only in this place, and is of unknown origin; for possible affinity cf. Sanscrit paryaṅka and Gr. φορεῖον (the LXX rendering): if it is a form of either of those words it becomes an element in determining the date of Canticles, for which see Driver, LOT[6] 449, 450.

PALE.—Besides Is 29^{22}, where the verb חָוַר in its single occurrence is translated 'wax pale'* (cf. חִוַּר 'white stuff,' i.e. cotton or linen, in Est 8^{15}; חוֹרִי with the same meaning, Is 19^9; and חוֹר 'white bread,' Gn 40^{16}), the adj. 'pale' is used in AV only in Rev 6^8 to describe the horse whose rider was Death (see REVELATION [BOOK]). The Gr. is χλωρός, which elsewhere in NT only describes grass, and is translated 'green' (Mk 6^{39}, Rev 8^7 9^4), but is common in classical writers for the paleness or lividness of the countenance. In this sense the Eng. subst. 'paleness' occurs in Jer 30^6 'all faces are turned into paleness,' Heb. יֵרָקוֹן, which elsewhere (Dt 28^{22}, 1 K 8^{37}, 2 Ch 6^{28}, Am 4^9, Hag 2^{17}) is used of 'mildew,' and which means, says Driver (Am 4^9), 'pale and unhealthy greenness.'

The 'pales' of Sir 22^{18} 'Pales set on an high place will never stand against the wind,' are stakes, palings, used for ornament or enclosure, as in Shaks. Com. of Err. II. i. 100—

> 'Too unruly deer, he breaks the pale,
> And feeds from home.'

The Gr. is χάρακες after B (confirmed, acc. to Edersheim, by Syr.), but AC give χάλικες, 'pebbles.'

PALESTINA, PALESTINE.—AV in Ex 15^{14}, Is $14^{29.\ 31}$, Jl 4^4 (3^4), where RV has 'Philistia.' See PHILISTINES, and next article.

PALESTINE (פְּלֶשֶׁת; Ex 15^{14} Φυλιστιείμ, Is $14^{29.\ 31}$, Jl 3 [Heb. 4]^4 οἱ ἀλλόφυλοι).—

i. Geology.
ii. Natural Features.
iii. Climate and Natural Products.
iv. Races.
v. Geography.
vi. Antiquities.

The word as used in the OT is more correctly rendered Philistia (so AV of Ps 60^8 87^4 108^9, and RV uniformly), which is mentioned (see COT i. 86) with Canaan, Edom, and Moab, and as a coast region attacked by the Assyrians in the 8th cent. B.C. From an early Christian period it has, however, been used to mean the Holy Land, from Dan to Beersheba and beyond Jordan. West of the river it extends 143 miles north and south, with an average breadth of 40, and an area of 6000

* So Schultze (explaining it as ‖ Gr. ἀκο-θήκη), but Darmesteter (Ét. Iran. ii. 1. 133) as 'bâtiment élevé sur une hauteur.' In Syr. it certainly='palace,' cf. Sir 507 (Syr.), where it is used of the Temple.

* RV has 'wax pale' also in Jl 2^6 Nah 2^{10} for AV 'gather blackness.'

square miles. Eastern Palestine runs to the Syrian desert, and includes 4000 square miles. Western Palestine is thus about the size of Wales, and the central mountains are about the same height above the sea as in Wales. The country thus possesses a less trying climate than that of the regions to the south and east (Egypt and Mesopotamia), and in character and products resembles the hilly parts of Southern Italy.

i. GEOLOGY.—The underlying formation is the Nubian sandstone (of the Greensand period), but this never appears west of Jordan. In the north it is found on the west slopes of Hermon and Lebanon, and east of Jordan it appears at a considerable elevation on the slopes of Moab and Gilead. Above the sandstone are limestones belonging to the Chalk period, and conformable with the lower strata. There are two main formations, the lower being a hard dolomitic limestone, often metamorphic, the upper a soft chalky stone with bands of chert, and containing ammonites, belemnites, and many genera of shells of the Cretaceous period. Where the hard limestone occurs the country is very rugged, with precipices, and with springs and streams on the surface; but in districts where the softer formation prevails, the features (like those of the upper chalk in England) are more rounded, and the water sinks in, being only attainable in deep wells, or in places where the lower strata are laid bare. Highest of all, on the summits of Gerizim and Carmel, a nummulitic limestone is occasionally found.

The present formation of the country is due to convulsions, which took place in the early Tertiary period. An immense fault was formed from Hermon southwards, rending the strata and forming the depression of the Jordan Valley and Dead Sea. The western strata fall with a steep dip to the valley, while the eastern are less contorted, the sandstone cliffs having been sheared in two, north and south. There are subsidiary parallel faults west of the valley, where the upper strata have fallen over into the great chasm. The fault continues south of the Dead Sea, but is less considerable, and a watershed 600 ft. above the Mediterranean here dammed up the waters of the Jordan Valley, forming a lake 1300 ft. deep, the surface of which is now 1292 ft. below the Mediterranean. This convulsion was accompanied by volcanic outbreaks in the north, covering the plains of Bashan and of Lower Galilee with floods of basaltic lava. Minor outbreaks of the same are traceable also on the west slopes of Carmel.

West of the main ridge of Western Palestine, cretaceous sandstones were deposited, forming foot hills, which, though dipping westwards, are unconformable with the older strata of the central ridge. Beyond these an alluvial plain was formed, and is now banked in by sandy rocks and sand dunes. In the Jordan Valley a great salt lake at first occupied the whole length of the chasm. Ancient sea-beaches are visible, especially at the Meidân el-'Abd, north of Jericho. The shells generally are lacustrine and not marine. The drying up of these waters has now left only the smaller sheets of the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea; but south of the former the bed of the valley is still strongly impregnated with salt, and salt springs occur on the slopes to the west in Samaria. The volcanic activity of this region is still not quite exhausted. Earthquakes such as are mentioned in earlier times (1 K 19^{11}, Am 1^{1}, Mt 27^{54}) still occur, like that which destroyed the towns of the north in the twelfth century A.D., and ruined Sâfed in Galilee in 1846. Hot springs occur on both sides of the valley, and the temperature of those at Tiberias rose considerably at the time of the last-mentioned earthquake. This sketch of geological structure enables us to understand the physical features of Palestine; and it is important as showing that the destruction of the Cities of the Plain cannot be explained as by Josephus (Wars, IV. viii. 4), who believed them to be buried under the Dead Sea (see Gn 14^{3}), which was certainly in existence before the appearance of man.

ii. NATURAL FEATURES.—The hills of Western Palestine are the continuation of the higher Lebanon ridge to the north, of which Mount Hermon (9200 ft.) is an outlier on the east at the springs of Jordan. In Upper Galilee, where the hard limestone prevails, the highest elevation is 4000 ft. above the Mediterranean near Meirûn, and the eastern slopes are very steep. On the west the foot hills and long spurs from the watershed exhibit the softer chalk in parts. Lower Galilee includes the plateau of Tabor, 600 ft. above the Mediterranean, and the western plain of Asochis (Buṭṭauf), separated from the shore of the large shallow Bay of Acre by the low chalky hills, which also rise on the south round Nazareth. Mount Tabor (1800 ft.) is an outlier of these hills on the south-east, with a rounded summit like an immense molehill, and south of this again the volcanic peak of Nebi Dhahy (called Little Hermon in the twelfth century) rises from the plateau, divided by the valley of Jezreel from Gilboa farther south. At this point the Palestine watershed is only about 200 ft. above the Mediterranean, at the north-east corner of the large triangular plain called Esdraelon. This plain has the range of Gilboa (1600 ft.) on its east, and is bounded on the west by the long spur which divides it from the shore plain of Sharon, and which rises into the ridge of Carmel, which, projecting north-west, attains 1700 ft. above the sea, and, continuing 15 miles, falls to 500 ft. at the promontory which forms the natural harbour of Haifa on the south side of the Bay of Acre. A smaller plain lies west of the main shed, and south of Esdraelon near Dothan, separated by lower hills from Sharon. Entering the Samaritan region the watershed gradually rises. Gilboa, which is capped with chalk, spreads north, from the rounded watershed hills to the south near Jenin; but round Shechem, and as far south as Bethel, the dolomitic limestone mountains form one of the highest and most rugged districts in Palestine. The principal features on this watershed are the summits of Ebal (3077 ft.) and of Gerizim (2850 ft.) divided by the deep pass of Shechem; and, south of Shiloh, Baal-hazor (3300 ft.). Long ridges run out westwards from this chain, sinking to the chalky foot hills east of Sharon, and on the opposite side of the watershed are rugged slopes and small plateaus bounding the Jordan Valley. Approaching Jerusalem the watershed sinks to about 2500 ft., and the chalk appears to the east on Olivet (2600 ft.); but after passing Bethlehem the flatter plateau rises again to the Hebron hills, which are in parts as rugged as those of Samaria, rising to 3000 ft. at Râmeh, north of Hebron. On the west the spurs are here longer than in Samaria, with deep ravines; and the chalky foot hills form a yet more distinct district, called Shephêlah in the Bible ('lowlands'), while the Plain of Sharon widens into that of Philistia. On the east a desert plateau extends below the Hebron mountains, about 1000 ft. above the Mediterranean, and is terminated in magnificent precipices of hard limestone above the Dead Sea. The surface of this plateau is cut up with ravines and sharp chalky ridges, and this 'desert of Judah' is the wildest and most desolate region in Western Palestine. South of Hebron the mountains are divided by a long open valley, which runs south to Beersheba. The plateaus gradually sink towards the southern plain, 800 ft. above the Mediterranean, which reaches round the hills towards that of Philistia, and sinks in steps and rounded ridges towards the Sinaitic desert, and on the east to the Arabah or broad valley south of the Dead Sea.

The extremes of elevation between the summit of Hermon (9200 ft.) and the bottom of the Dead Sea (2600 ft. below the Mediterranean) mark the depth of the great fault of the Jordan Valley, which is at first wide and marshy, at about sea-level near the Waters of Merom, flanked by the Galilæan mountains to the west, and by the volcanic ridges and craters of the Jaulân to the east. A steep spur from the Sâfed mountains forms a narrower gorge north of the Sea of Galilee, which is a natural basin, deepest on the south and east, pear-shaped, and 12 miles north and south by 8 at the widest, with precipices 2000 ft. high on the east, and others of less elevation on the south-west. On the west and north steep slopes strewn with basalt sink into the lake. The surface is 680 ft. below the Mediterranean, and the Jordan falls thence to the Dead Sea, 1292 ft. below the same level. The Jordan plain is about 10 miles wide, with high mountains on either side. The Dead Sea is flanked by mighty precipices on either side throughout its stretch of 40 miles, and is 10 miles broad; but immediately to its north the foot hills recede, forming the wider plains of Jericho and Shittim, west and east of the river, about 1000 ft. below the Mediterranean. Eastern Palestine includes the plateau of Bashan, the hills of Gilead, and the barren plains of Moab. The first of these regions is a broad plain about 2000 ft. above the Mediterranean, broken by the ridge of the Jaulân craters east of the Upper Jordan, and seamed by precipitous ravines with dolomitic cliffs, east of the Sea of Galilee. The plateau is divided from the Syrian desert by the isolated ridge of the Hill of Bashan (Ps 68^{15} only), rising to 5700 ft. The Gilead hills rise to about 3000 ft., and are only some 500 above the eastern desert. Their western slopes, of hard limestone and sandstone, are very steep, and the plateau is from 3000 to 4000 ft. above the Jordan Valley. Rugged ravines score these slopes, and the region is divided by the valley of the Jabbok into two districts, now called 'Ajlûn and Belḳa — north and south respectively of the stream. The mountains sink on the south to the general level of the plateau east of the Dead Sea, and a lower terrace of barren desert here answers to the desert of Judah west of the sea. Among the ridges which run out west from the plateau, Mount Nebo is one of the most conspicuous (2643 ft.), but it is not as high as Jebel Osh'a in Gilead (3597 ft.), and does not command as extensive a view. It is, however, the nearest high point to the plains of Shittim, and projects farther west than the others. The tremendous gorges which divide the precipices west of the Moab plateau present some of the grandest scenery in Palestine; and among these the torrent of Arnon is the most famous. The black basalt, white chalk, pink and yellow sandstones of the Zerḳa Ma'in rise sheer above a narrow brook; and into this flow the sulphur streams, bordered with orange deposits, from the hot springs of Callirrhöe, passing by a palm grove, and flowing in a cataract to the Dead Sea. This wild gorge may be the Nahaliel or 'ravine of God' (Nu 21^{19}) mentioned in the Pentateuch. The Moab plateau continues in the ridge of Edom, east of the Arabah, rising to 4580 ft. at Mount Hor. Its western ridges are called the 'Abarim, or mountains 'beyond' the Dead Sea, in the Bible (Nu 27^{12}, Dt 32^{49} 34^{1}).

These various natural features are distinguished in the OT by special terms: Har, 'mountain country'; Sādeh, 'plain' (in Philistia); and Shārōn, 'plain' farther north, and, according to Jerome, near Tabor; Shephēlah, 'lowland,' for the foot hills on the south-west; Mishôr for the plateaus of Bashan and Moab; Midbār for the desert of Judæa; and Negeb, or 'dry land,' for the plains of Beersheba and the lower plateau south of Hebron, where no surface water is found as a rule. The various kinds of valleys include: Naḥal for a torrent-valley (the modern wādy), 'Emeḳ for a broad flat valley flanked by mountains; 'Arābāh for 'desert' valleys like that of Jordan and south of the Dead Sea; Shāveh for a smaller vale; and Gai for a waterless ravine. The term Biḳ'ah appears to signify a plain between mountains, and is still so applied (Arab. Buḳ'ah and diminutive Buḳei'ah) in many places, both to the plain of the Orontes in Syria, and to the remarkable cup-shaped depression on the Gilead plateau, south of the Jabbok, which seems to be the 'circle of Mahanaim' (Ca 6^{13}). The terms Bithron (2 S 2^{29}) and Migron (1 S 14^{2}) apply to rugged gorges; and Debir, or 'the back' (Jos $15^{7\text{-}49}$, cf. 13^{26}), in three cases to ridges. None of these terms are now in use except the one mentioned; and the old names of natural features in Palestine have, as a rule, been lost.

The water supply of Palestine is fairly abundant, except in the deserts and in the Negeb, and it includes lakes, rivers, brooks, and springs. The waters of the Dead Sea are intensely bitter, containing 25 per cent. of chlorides washed down from the valley; but those of the Sea of Galilee and of Merom are sweet. The most important river is the Jordan, the geographical source of which is on the west side of Hermon near Hasbeya, 1700 ft. above sea-level; but its most important supply issues as a foaming stream, 1000 ft. above sea-level, from under the cave of Baniâs at the foot of Hermon, by the snows of which it is fed. Rushing down through a thick copse, by rows of poplars, it joins several other streams, which flow over the basalt slopes into the plain of Tell el-Ḳâḍi (the site of Dan) from the north-west; and the river is then lost in the papyrus marshes of Merom, but gathers as the valley narrows, and descends rapidly to the Sea of Galilee, where a delta about a mile long has been formed, during the last nineteen centuries, at its junction with the lake. On issuing into the southern valley the course becomes narrow and tortuous, a deep channel about half a mile to a mile wide having been worn in the valley bed. The stream is here shallow, and crossed by about twenty fords, of which the most important on the main road is called 'Abārah, and may be the Bethabara (?) of the NT (Jn 1^{28}): there is a cataract in the stream farther south, but the slope of the river-bed gradually becomes flatter after passing the Dâmieh ferry (Adam, Jos 3^{16}), the river having, however, acquired a rapid flow, which continues to its mouth. Opposite Jericho it is fordable for horses in the dry season, and is here about thirty yards wide. In early spring, however (see Jos 3^{15}), when the Hermon snows begin to melt, and after the winter rains, the Jordan will sometimes overflow its banks, and fill the whole channel, nearly a mile wide. The banks are formed by hillocks of white soft marl, which are at times undermined, and fall into the river. An Arab writer asserts that the river was known to have been thus blocked for a time (cf. Jos 3^{16}) in A.D 1267. Sultan Beybars was then building a bridge at the Dâmieh ford, and the western bank of the river fell in on 8th December, damming the stream for four hours (Nowairi, see Pal. Expl. Fund Quarterly Statement, July 1895, p. 257). The river is often quite hidden by groves of tamarisk and cane brakes. The plains on either side are much cut up by tributary channels, but are covered in spring with rich grass; towards the south, however, the bushes and acacia trees (shiṭṭim) cease, and a muddy saline flat grows only the alkali plant. The shores of the Dead Sea are strewn with gravel and salt-covered tree trunks brought down by the river in flood, and a swampy delta is also formed where the Jordan enters this lake. The name of the river Jordan ('the descender') is thought to be due to its rapid fall of 2000 ft. in a course of 100 miles. There are several important perennial affluents on both sides of the river. On the west the streams of Wâdy el-Ḥamâm flow by the small plain of Gennesaret into the Sea of Galilee. Farther south the perennial stream from Jezreel, and the waters of many springs under the Tabor plateau and Mount Gilboa, join the river. In Samaria the brook of Wâdy Far'ah (probably the waters of Ænon, Jn 3^{23}) is an important affluent north-east of Shechem, and near Jericho the ravine of the Ḳelt is a winter torrent of great velocity, identified without reason with the Brook Cherith (1 K $17^{3.5}$), which was 'east' of Jordan, probably in Gilead. East of the river several perennial brooks flow in, and the most important of these are the Yarmûk, south of the Sea of Galilee, and the Jabbok, which is fed by springs at and north-east of Rabbath-ammon. It flows north at first, and south of Gerasa turns to the west. Its bed is fringed with canes in the lower part of its course, and it is easily passable in summer. The springs of Nimrah (Nu 32^{3}) also flow with other perennial brooks through the Shittim plains, and others which rise high up on the Moab plateau flow direct into the Dead Sea.

In Western Palestine there are other perennial streams flowing into the Mediterranean. The Leontes (or Kasimiyeh), which rises in the southern Lebanon, reaches the sea north of Tyre. The Belus, which gathers the waters of the low hills to the east, is a swampy stream south of Acre, and seems to be the Shihor-libnath, Jos 19^{26} (but see Dillm. ad loc.). It is fordable at its mouth. The Kishon, which debouches on the south side of the Bay of Acre, is more important, and is perennial, though in a very dry summer its bed shows only a chain of pools, and its mouth is choked by sand dunes. It flows north-west under Carmel from a narrow pass leading out of the Esdraelon plain, where it is formed by two branches, of which the eastern is the true Kishon of the OT (see Jg $4^{6.7}$), springing from swampy pools west of Tabor. The western stream is formed by springs from the downs south of Carmel, and its chief source is at Lejjûn (the Legio of Roman times) near Taanach, west of the plain of Esdraelon. The waters of the south slopes of Carmel drain into the marshy Zerḳa or Crocodile River, remarkable from the 2nd cent. downwards as the only place where crocodiles were found in Palestine. They still inhabit its swamps. Sharon, farther south, is drained by several streams, unnoticed except in the 12th century; and north of Jaffa is one more important (the 'Aujeh), which carries a turbid sandy flood from the springs of Râs el-'Ain (Antipatris) to the sea. It appears to be the Me-jarkon, or 'yellow water,' of Jos 19^{46} (but see Dillm. ad loc.). The only perennial stream in Philistia is the Nahr Rubîn, or 'river of Reuben,' named from a Moslem shrine, and flowing under the cliff of el-Mughâr (probably Makkedah) to the shore near Jamnia. A great valley, south of Gaza, collects the waters of the Negeb hills, and supplies the deep wells of Beersheba and the shallow pits at Gerar (Gn $26^{6.15}$); but the water is only found by digging in its pebbly bed. Its modern name is the Wâdy Ghŭzzeh.

Many of the other great ravines, such as the Brook Kanah (Jos 16^{8}) in Samaria, flow with water in winter; and the most remarkable of these is the stream which bursts out of the Bîr Eyûb at Jerusalem in winter, flowing down the Kidron gorge towards the Dead Sea.

Palestine is also well supplied with springs in all parts where the hard limestone is near the surface. The hills of Gilead run with small brooks. There are minor streams in Galilee, and good springs in the central region and on the western slopes of the Hebron mountains. Near Jerusalem there is less water, and the dry regions of the Negeb and the deserts have been already noticed. The springs mentioned in the Bible include the fountain of Jezreel (1 S 29^{1}), one of several near the city, two of which ('Ain Jalûd and 'Ain Tubʻaûn) form large pools; the pool of Samaria (1 K 22^{38}), which has a fine natural spring; the pool of Gibeon (2 S 2^{13}), which rises in a cavern under the ancient site of the town; the fountain of Gihon (1 K 1^{38}, 2 Ch 32^{30}) east of Jerusalem, also now rising in a cavern—the probable site of Bethesda (Jn 5^{2}); and the well of Sirah (2 S 3^{26}), a spring well near Hebron, which retains its ancient name. To these we must add the well of Jacob at Shechem, and the Beersheba wells, which still contain natural waters. The towns called 'En (with an affixed name) in the Bible still present springs, as a rule, when the site is known. The hot springs most famous in Palestine are those near Tiberias, near Hammath (east of Jordan), and at Callirrhöe (Ant. XVII. vi. 5) as already mentioned; others occur at Gadara and in the valley south-west of Beisân.

The Palestine coast is very deficient in harbours. The ports of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Jamnia, Joppa, Cæsarea, Accho, Tyre, and Sidon, are all formed only by reefs. The Haifa open roadstead is protected by the bluff of Carmel, and is the only one now visited in winter storms. Fleets, however, found refuge at Tyre and Joppa as early as B.C. 1500, and the latter port was used by Solomon (2 Ch 2^{16}).

The natural highways of the country are equally indicated by its formation and by history. The great shore road has always been the main route of armies, and an important cross road led from Sharon across the downs south of Carmel, and from the Bay of Acre, to the Valley of Jezreel, crossing the Jordan at Bethabara (?), and gaining the Bashan plateau on the way to Damascus. The mountain roads are difficult paths; and until the Romans in the 2nd cent. laid out roads, marked with milestones, all over both Eastern and Western Palestine, commerce appears to have been mainly confined to the natural routes above indicated. The pilgrim road from Damascus to 'Aḳabah on the Red Sea leads over the eastern plateau, and formed the route by which Israel appears to have entered Moab and marched to Bashan.

iii. CLIMATE AND NATURAL PRODUCTS.—In the short distance of a hundred miles the traveller passes from an Alpine region on Hermon to the tropical plains of the Dead Sea, and finds in Palestine a fauna and flora ranging from that of Northern Europe to that of Africa. In the Bible we read of snow, hail, and ice, as well as of the desert whirlwinds and the sunstroke. There is no reason to suppose that the climate and productions of the country now differ much from those of the earliest times. Forests have, no doubt, been destroyed in Sharon and in the Hebron mountains; but, on the other hand, copses now cover the sites of former vineyards, marked by towers, terraces, and rock-cut winepresses, on Carmel and elsewhere. With decrease of population the great tanks and cisterns have fallen into ruins, with the aqueducts and rock-cut canals of Roman times. But in the Gospels we read of the fevers of Gennesaret; and the swampy plains must always have been malarious. The regions now desert or waterless are the same so described in the OT. The palm culture of the Jordan Valley has ceased, but it was mainly an artificial product of Herodian times. The plains are still as thickly covered with grass and flowers in spring as they ever were, and woods and pastures by the waters still exist.

The climate of Palestine resembles that of Sicily, and the seasons are the same as in other Mediterranean lands. The average temperature in summer rises to nearly 90° F. by day, the nights being cool, with heavy dews. When the east wind blows from the desert, and ozone is absent from the air, the heat increases sometimes to 105° F., and the nights are also very hot; but this usually only lasts for three or four days at a time. In the Jordan Valley in summer 118° F. in the shade may be experienced. The extremes from 90° F. by day to 40° F. by night in the bare deserts of Moab are severely felt in autumn, but the prevalence of a fresh breeze from the sea makes the summer heat in the hills very moderate. In winter the hills of Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee are often white with snow for several days, and the Edomite chain may be seen snow-covered from Jerusalem. The palm will consequently not grow in the hills, and there are but few groves even in the plains, where frost is rarely felt. Lebanon and Hermon retain snow patches till autumn every year. The winter begins usually in December or earlier, and in January there are heavy gales and much rain. The 'former rains' (Dt 11^{14}) fall at the time of the autumn equinoctial gales, and the 'latter rains' about the spring equinox; but in March the spring begins, and April is the month of grass and flowers. In May the east wind prevails, and dries up the herbage, but in June and July the west wind rises about 10 a.m. daily. The heat increases in August and September, and the country is entirely dried up in October. The most unhealthy time is when the autumn ploughing begins, after the first thundershowers in November. Thunderstorms in June during the harvest (1 S 12^{17}) occasionally occur suddenly. The dust whirlwinds (Job 37^{9}), which swirl along the plains in later summer—esp. in Bashan—are a peculiar feature of the hot season. The rainfall averages 25 to 30 in. in ordinary years, and is quite sufficient; but the storage of water in dry districts is very imperfect. Years of drought occur from time to time, as do earthquakes and visitations of locusts; and these are noticed in every age from the earliest times. But in spite of the deserts, and of the barrenness of the mountains, Palestine has a good soil, esp. in Bashan and Sharon, and is a land of 'corn, must, and oil,' answering to the descriptions of Deuteronomy (8^{7-9} 11^{10-12}), and capable of supporting a large population if fully cultivated.

The natural growth is dependent on the moisture brought by the sea-breeze, and thus in Lebanon and in Palestine alike the slopes west of the watershed are covered with copse, while those to the east—shut out from the moisture—are bare. In Eastern Palestine the woods of oak and pine covering Gilead are more extensive than in any other district. The slopes here face the west, and springs issue from the surface of the dolomitic rocks, the water having sunk through the chalky surface of the desert plateaus farther east. The oak woods west of Nazareth, and in Sharon, have been sadly thinned, and a pine wood south of Bethlehem—noticed by Arculphus about A.D. 670—is now represented only by a few stunted trees. The words used for forest in the OT (ya'ar and ḥōresh) refer, however, to copse rather than to woods; and the occurrence of single trees (oak and terebinth), often noticed in the OT, is still a feature of the scenery. The Aleppo pine (P. Haleppensis), which appears on Lebanon and Carmel, is probably not native. It bears a name (sinôbar) which appears to be Greek, and under this term is noticed in the Mishna in the 2nd century A.D. The native pine (P. Carica) found in Gilead is more probably the 'fir' (1 K $6^{15.\ 34}$, Ezk 27^{5}) of the OT. The copse, consisting of dwarf oak, mastic, styrax (stacte, Ex 30^{34} nāṭaph), hawthorn, and other shrubs, is found chiefly on the harder limestone, especially in Upper Galilee, on Carmel, in Samaria, and on the Hebron mountains and the spurs west of Jerusalem. Near the watershed the hills are mostly bare, but covered with thyme, mint, and the bellân (or Poterium Spinosum), a brown prickly rosaceous plant. The hyssop, and other kinds of marjoram, are commonly found growing on ruins. The carob occurs as a single tree, like the sycomore fig, and the dilb or plane (Gn 30^{37}). The poplar is found in various localities in Palestine (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, 290, and cf. Hos 4^{13}, where, however, the rendering should perhaps be 'styrax,' see art. POPLAR); but the beech does not occur south of the Northern Lebanon, though growing on chalky soils in Asia Minor. The acacia and the tamarisk (Gn 21^{33}, 1 S 22^{6} 31^{13}) are mainly found in the Jordan Valley, and the white broom (1 K 19^{4}, Ps 120^{4}, Job 30^{4}) is common in the deserts of Moab and Judah and in the Negeb. Among smaller plants the cistus (lot, AV and RV 'myrrh' [which see], RVm 'ladanum,' Gn 37^{25} 43^{11}) is very common on the chalk; and the plains of Sharon and Jordan are covered with many wild flowers, esp. the pink phlox, the pheasant's eye, and the narcissus (probably the Rose of Sharon); while the common lily of the country, planted by Moslems in graveyards, is the purple iris. A complete account of the fauna and flora of Palestine occupies two volumes of the Memoirs of the Survey, and only the more conspicuous features noticed in the Bible are here mentioned. Cultivated plants in Palestine, as corn (wheat and barley), balm, and fruits, together with wine, oil, and honey, are noticed in Egyptian records (Records of Past, 1st series, ii. 17 f.) as early as B.C. 1600. The almond (luz, Gn 43^{11}) grows wild in Lebanon and Moab, and the oil tree (1 K 6^{23}) or oleaster is also not uncommon on the hills. The apple (tappuaḥ) is not common, but the Heb. word survives in the Arabic tuffâḥ; the ash (Is 44^{14}) is the Fraxinus Ornus, the common ash being unknown. The box (Is 41^{19} 60^{13}) grows in Lebanon; the Syrian papyrus differs from that of Egypt, and is found in Merom, in the Sharon rivers, and at Gebal, as well as the Egyp. species. The chief fruit trees are the olive, fig, pomegranate, and apricot, which last, however, with the citron, prickly pear, walnut, and other fruits, seems to have been introduced at a late period. The vegetable products noticed in the Pentateuch appear to be all of great antiquity. The citron (introduced from Media by the Persians) and the walnut ('ĕgōz, Arab jôz), said to bear a Persian name, are unmentioned, as are cotton and silk, though both are now known in the country. Flax (Hos 2^{9}, see Jos 2^{6}), which was grown at Nazareth in the 12th cent. A.D., and which is noticed in the Mishna, is one of the oldest materials used by man. It may be here noted that the only foreign plants in the Pentateuch are calamus and cassia from Ionia (Ezk 27^{19} [?; text dub.]), or from Uzal in Arabia according to the LXX, with myrrh from Arabia, and probably frankincense and cinnamon

The sea trade with Asia Minor is, however, mentioned on monuments of the 15th cent. B.C., and that with Arabia goes back ten centuries earlier. Gum tragacanth and balm (Gn 37[25]), pistachio nuts (Gn 43[11]), honey, and almonds, were natural products of Palestine, as were stacte (or styrax) and ladanum (Gn 37[25] 43[11]) or cistus. Palestine has also always been very productive of gourds, cucumbers, vetches, melons, pulse, and other vegetables. The henna used as a dye (Ca 4[13]) is native, as is saffron or crocus (Ca 4[14]). The kirsenneh, which is a common crop, probably represents the Heb. kuṣṣemeth (Ezk 4[9]). The alkali plant (Jer 2[22], Mal 3[2]) grows esp. near the Dead Sea. Millet (Ezk 4[9]) is also known by its Heb. name; and the coriander (Ex 16[31], Nu 11[7]) is cultivated, with cummin (Is 28[27]) and anise (Mt 23[23]); the mustard (Mt 13[31]) grows to a tree in the Jordan Valley, where the 'Vine of Sodom' (Dt 32[32]) is found in the 'oshr tree (Calotropis Procera); the mulberry, now grown extensively for silkworms, is noticed in the NT (Lk 17[6]) but not in the OT; willows (Ezk 17[5]) occur along the Jordan; and the 'heath' of the OT (Jer 17[6] 48[6]) is the 'ar'ar or stunted juniper of the Judæan desert, from which more than one desert town was named.

Palestine has never been remarkable for its mineral products. Mines of copper and lead (Dt 8[9]) occurred only in Lebanon. Flint (of which knives were made, according to Jos 5[2] and the LXX of 24[30a]) is abundant, and is not only noticed in the 16th cent. B.C. on monuments, but is found worked into weapons in the city mounds at a great depth (as, for instance, at Lachish). The pitch of the Dead Sea is noticed (Gn 14[10], and perhaps Is 34[9]), and was collected in the time of Josephus. Precious metals were in use, however, in the country long before the Exodus.

The fauna of the country is almost unchanged from the earliest historic times. The lion and the wild ox have become extinct; the former is noticed by an Egyptian traveller in Lebanon in the 14th cent. B.C., and is even said to have survived to the 12th cent. A.D.; its bones are found in caves and in the Jordan gravels. The wild ox (rĕ'ēm or Bos Primigenius, the 'unicorn' [μονόκερως] of the LXX) was hunted in Lebanon by Tiglath-pileser in B.C. 1120, and its bones have also been found. Both these animals were still hunted in Assyria in the 7th cent. B.C. On the other hand, the buffalo, now found in the marshes, is said to have been introduced by Mohammedan rulers in the post-biblical times. With these exceptions, the Palestinian animals are those of the OT. The bear, which according to the OT (1 S 17[34], 2 K 2[24]) was found on the Palestine mountains, is now known only on Hermon and Lebanon. The leopard (in the Jordan Valley), the wolf, the hyæna, the jackal, and the fox are all found in the wilder districts; the boar is common in the mountains as well as in swamps. The wild ass is still to be found in the Eastern desert. The cat and domestic fowls, which were brought from Persia before the Christian era, are not noticed in the OT; nor are mules (1 K 18[5]) noticed in the Pentateuch, though known by the Assyrians in the 8th cent. B.C. in Palestine, and now common. The fishes of the Jordan and Sea of Galilee are numerous, but as a rule coarse. The wild bee, Apis fasciata, the cochineal insect (Is 7[18]), which feeds on the Syrian oak, and various species of locust (Lv 11[22]) and of ant, are native. Scorpions are common in the plains and deserts, where swarms of flies are also very troublesome in summer. Snakes are less numerous than in Africa, but many species are found. The camel is monumentally noticed in Palestine in the 14th century B.C.; the coney (Hyrax) is common near Sinai; the hare is also found in the desert as well as in Palestine; the fallow deer (AV hart) and roebuck (yaḥmūr) are found in the woods of Tabor and Gilead respectively, and the latter also in Lebanon and on Carmel; the gazelle (AV roe) and the wild goat (Ibex) belong to the plains and southern desert; the wild ox (Bubale) is known only in the desert; the wild sheep (AV chamois) is found in the Sinaitic desert—it is the koi of the Mishna (Turk. koi, 'sheep').*—Among birds the ostrich (AV owl) is distinctive of the desert, and the 'cuckoo' is believed to be a gull; the pelican is found in the Mediterranean and in the Waters of Merom, and the cormorant (shālak or 'diver') is a sea bird; the stork is found in the Jordan Valley in spring, and both it and the heron (Assyr. anpatu) are common in other parts of Palestine. The hoopoe (AV lapwing) also occurs in the Gilead woods, as well as in Western Palestine. Among other animals noticed in the Bible the mole rat (Spalax Typhlus) is common (Is 2[20]); the weasel is also found (Lv 11[29]). All kinds of birds of prey, vultures, eagles, falcons, kites, hawks, and ravens, are common, with small and great owls, partridges and pintails, quails, pigeons, doves, sparrows, swallows, and cranes, even in the Beersheba desert. With regard to two animals described by Job (40. 41), leviathan is usually supposed to be the crocodile, which, as above noticed, is found in Palestine; behemoth answers best to the elephant [although taken by most modern commentators to be the hippopotamus], and the Asiatic elephant seems to have been known as late as B.C. 1600 on the Euphrates near Nii (RP, 1st series, iv. 6). Ivory was commonly used in Palestine in the 15th and 14th cent. B.C., and even apes were then sent from Syria to Egypt, according to the records of Thothmes III., in which also we find notice of asses, flocks and herds, goats and horses, taken from the Canaanites (ib. 17 f.). The Hebrews did not use horses to any large extent till Solomon's time, but the Canaanites (cf. Jos 11[6]) had horses and chariots long before the Exodus, and in the 15th cent. B.C. they held the dog in as little estimation as did the Hebrews. It is remarkable that seals have been captured off the Palestine coast, though rare in the Mediterranean. Some writers think that the 'badger' (taḥash, Ex 26[14]) should be rendered 'seal'; but others prefer 'porpoise,' which is found all round the coast, and was hunted by Tiglath-pileser I. in the Mediterranean. The natural history of the Song of Songs embraces that of all Palestine; that of the Book of Job is confined to the deserts round Petra; that of the Pentateuch may be said to belong to the desert, the hills of Gilead, and the Jordan Valley.

iv. THE RACES OF PALESTINE.—Among the earliest inhabitants are noticed the Zuzim or Zamzummim, the Emim, and the Anakim. These words seem to be non-Semitic, and the latter may mean 'tall,' as a Mongol word. The Canaanites are regarded by the author of Gn 10[6]† as not Semitic, and there is monumental evidence (Tel el-Amarna Letters, No. 10 Berlin Collection) that the Syrian Hittites spoke a non-Semitic language (perhaps Mongolic) in the 15th cent. B.C. In this enumeration, however, the Amorites (? 'highlanders') are included; and from the same monumental source it seems clear that they spoke an East Aramaic language like Assyrian. They had driven out the Moabites at the time of the Exodus, and covered Eastern Palestine, as well as the Western mountains and the Lebanon.* The Hittites, according to Gn 23, extended to Hebron in an early age, but they were driven out of Central Palestine before the Exodus by Thothmes III. (Brugsch, Hist. Egyp. i. 325). The Philistines, said to appear on monuments B.C. 1200, and whose god Dagon was worshipped at Ashkelon in the 15th cent. B.C., are thought to have been of Cretan origin (Gn 10^{14} †), but the remaining tribes bear Semitic names, such as Canaanites (?'lowlanders' of Sharon and the Jordan Valley), Perizzites or 'villagers' (?), Kenites or 'spearmen' (?), Kenizzites or 'hunters' (?), Kadmonites or 'easterns.' The same cannot be said, however, of the Amalekites, who seem to have lived even in Central Palestine (Jg 12^{15}, though they are usually spoken of as a tribe in the desert S. of Palestine), or of the Girgashites—perhaps near Gergesa. The Hivites in Shechem and near Hermon (but see art. HIVITES) may be 'villagers,' and the Rephaim 'giants' little distinguished from the Anakim, whose last survivors were found near Gath (2 S 21^{22}) in Philistia, whence the original Avvim, living in enclosures, were expelled by the Philistines (Dt 2^{23}). The population thus seems originally to have included three distinct stocks, though many of the above names may be descriptive. The Hittites and Amorites alone are monumentally known—the first a hairless race with slanting eyes and pigtails, apparently Mongols; ‡ and the latter a darker people, bearded and black-haired, with aquiline Sem. features. The Heb. groups, including Ammonites, Moabites, and the half-breed Ishmaelites and Edomites, were distinguished by language from the aborigines. Hebrew, Moabite, Phœnician, and the Aram. of Syria (as known from B.C. 900 to 200) are kindred dialects, widely differing from the Eastern Aram. of Assyria and the Babylonian of the Tel el-Amarna letters. The Can. glosses in the latter show, however, that the then (c. 1450 B.C.) inhabitants of Pal. spoke a language akin to Hebrew. See also the many Sem. names quoted below (p. 647ª). In the 3rd cent. B.C. the Phœnician power and language extended over Sharon as far as Joppa, and about the same time the Greeks began to form a new element of population. The Romans were never numerous in Palestine, but during their rule a new Arab element from Yemen entered Bashan, and after Omar's conquest the old Aram. tribes (including Nabatæans and Palmyrenes) became mingled with Arab tribes from the Hejâz, whose names still denote districts in the mountains of Western Palestine, while the Bedawîn nomads trace their descent also to Arabia in the present day. European elements were added before the crusades, and in the 12th cent. colonists from all parts of Europe were numerous, especially Italians and Franks.

* The fallow deer, roebuck, gazelle, wild goat, wild ox, wild sheep are mentioned only in Dt 14[5] (see Driver's note), and not in the parallel passage, Lv 11.

† Gn 10 is treated in this art. as an 'ethnological table' (but see Dillm. ad loc., and Sayce, HCM 119 ff.).

New European and Jewish colonies are now still arising; and further elements of population have been due to the transplanting of Aramæan tribes into Palestine by the Assyrians; to the inroads of the Turks, Mongols, and Turcomans, who have left small tribes behind them in Sharon and Esdraelon; and to the recent importation of Circassians into Bashan, and Bosnians into Sharon. The evidence of language shows that the present peasantry are mainly of Aramaic extraction; they have been hardly touched by the European element except at Nazareth and Bethlehem: there has, however, been some Greek influence from an early period; and they use a few Persian and Turkish words; but their language is an Arabic dialect, though differing considerably from that of the pure Arabs or Bedawîn nomads, found in the Jordan Valley, the southern deserts, and the eastern plateau, and preserving, in vocabulary, in pronunciation, and in grammar, many archaic features of the older Syriac and Aramaic. In the Philistine plain the peasants approach the Egyptians in dress and in appearance, but the general type is very different from that of the Arabs, and is similar to that of the Assyrians on the monuments. A very ancient Can. element may be suspected to have survived, modified by a strong infusion of true Arab blood, in the 7th and even as early as the 2nd cent. A.D. The modern Jewish element, which is constantly increasing, is entirely foreign, recruited earliest from Spain and Africa, and recently from Russia, Poland, and other European countries. The Turks and Kurds are present only as a ruling class, but Greek blood is no doubt found among the native Christians of the Greek sects, and Italian among Latin Christians. The tall, handsome Druzes of Hermon and Bashan seem, by language, to be partly of Persian origin; and the Metâwileh of Upper Galilee (among whom blue eyes are not uncommon) are also Persian immigrants of the Shi'ah or Persian Moslem creed. Some of the oldest Jerusalem families, however, trace their descent to the pure Arabs who came with Omar. There is no known evidence of the survival of Norman blood derived from crusaders; and the language which they used has not affected the speech of Syrians. In the OT we have early reference to Aram. speech (Gn 31^{47}, Is 36^{11}) as distinct from Heb., and to the later mixed language of the Jews in Ashdod (Neh 13^{24}). The evidence of inscriptions seems to show that, about the Christian era, a very strong Greek element existed in Bashan, where in one case we have an Aram.-Gr. bilingual of the time of Herod the Great. The dialects spoken between B.C. 900 and 200 are moreover attested, by texts and coins, to have been cognate to ancient Heb.; and the Greek boundary-stone of Herod's temple attests the presence of Greeks, even in Jerusalem, about the time of Christ.

As regards population, the evidence of ruins shows that it was much larger in Roman and Byzantine times—and probably in the 12th cent.—than it is now. The numbers stated on Assyr. texts would indicate a population exceeding 200,000 souls in the southern mountains in B.C. 701; and the Syrian forces opposing the Assyrians in B.C. 850 are said to have numbered 80,000, representing a population of at least 400,000 souls. It cannot be said (but see Buhl, Die Soc. Verhältn. d. Isr. p. 52) that Palestine was incapable of holding a population of 6,500,000 souls (cf. 2 S 24^{9}), though the question of numbers is rendered difficult by textual alterations.* At the present time the population of Western Palestine is estimated to be not more than about 600,000; but the country fully cultivated would support ten times

† The order of words in this verse is thought to have suffered dislocation (see Dillm. ad loc., or Sayce, HCM 136; and cf. for the supposed Cretan origin of the Philistines, Am 9^{7} and Dt 2^{23}).

‡ Jensen supposes that the Hittites were the ancestors of the modern (Aryan) Armenians [cf. his Hittiter u. Armenier, and a series of papers on 'The Hittite Inscriptions' by him and Hommel (who opposes Jensen) in the Expos. Times, 1898–99]. The recently discovered texts found by Chantre in Cappadocia (see translations in The Times of 10th and 24th October 1899) appear to the present writer to show that the Hittite language was Mongolian. The whole subject is considered in detail in Conder's The Hittites and their Language, 1898.

* Instances of these variations in numbers are not confined to the chronology of Gn 11^{10-26}, which differs so greatly in the Heb. Sam. and LXX VSS, or 1 K 6^{1}, where the LXX differs by forty years. In 1 S 13^{25} the Peshiṭṭa reads 3000 for 30,000. In 2 S 8^{4} the LXX has 7000 for 700, and in 1 K 5^{11} 20,000 for 20. In 1 Ch $11^{20.21}$ the Peshiṭṭa has 30 for 3; in 2 Ch 3^{4} the LXX A (agreeing more nearly with 1 K 6^{2}) reads 20 for 120; and in Ezk 45^{1} BA have 20,000 for 10,000 (Q): to say nothing of minor differences as to the regnal years. The numbers in some parts of the OT have evidently been miscopied or altered, and sometimes largely increased. The difficulties as to numbers may thus in some cases be due to the state of the text. See, further, NUMBER, p. 562ª.

that number. According to Ex 12[37] 38[26], Nu 1[46], the Hebrews at the Exodus were about three millions.

v. BIBLE GEOGRAPHY.—The geography of Palestine forms an important element in the OT, and no book therein can be noticed on which this study does not throw some light. The Bible geography is to some extent illustrated by monumental information. The lists of Thothmes III., about B.C. 1600, include 119 towns in Palestine; others of great importance are noticed in the Tel el-Amarna letters, about B.C. 1450; others in the time of Ramses II., about B.C. 1330. Shishak gives a list of 133 towns in all parts of Palestine about B.C. 935 and Sennacherib mentions others in B.C. 701. About 90 cities noticed in the Bible are thus monumentally known, between B.C. 1600 and 700. Those earliest noticed have Aram. rather than Heb. names, and were named by the Canaanites before the Exodus. The Hebrews seem very rarely to have altered the name of any city, though alternative names sometimes occur. We may consider generally the outline of the topography during the various ages—the Patriarchal, that of the Conquest, that of the Kingdom, that following the Captivity, and that of the Greek and Roman age down to the 1st cent. A.D.—with a briefer reference to later topographical records.

Study of the topography is not seriously affected by textual discrepancies between the Hebrew and the Versions. The most important addition is in Jos (15[59a]), where 11 cities are noticed by the LXX and not in the Heb., viz. Tekoa, Ephratah, Peor (Faghûr), Etam ('Ain 'Aṭân), Kulon (Kolonia), Tatam, Sores (Ṣarîṣ), Karem ('Ain Kârim), Galem (Beit Jâla), Bether (Bittîr), and Manocho (Malhah), said to belong to Judah. The mention of Kolonia seems to show that this is a very late addition, and the cities lie, not in Judah but in Benjamin, except Tekoa, Ephratah, and Etam. There are other textual differences where the Heb. text seems to be the less probable. Zoan (Pesh. Gn 13[10]) is better than Zoar, and the addition of Seir (Pesh. Gn 36[6]) supplies a gap: 'at Jazer' (LXX Nu 21[24]) is better than 'was strong.' In Sam. Beth-jashan for Shen (Pesh. 1 S 7[11]) points to Jeshanah ('Ain Sinia) for this site, and Gibeah (indicated by LXX) is apparently the meaning of 'the high place' (1 S 10[13]). Gath (LXX B in 1 S 17[52]) is also preferable to 'the valley.' Ezel (1 S 20[19], cf. v.[41] in Pesh. and LXX) disappears as a proper name, and Hareth (now Kharâs) becomes a city instead of a 'wood' (LXX of 1 S 22[5]). Maon is also more probable than Paran (LXX of 1 S 25[1]), and Bethzur than Bethel (LXX B of 1 S 30[27]), as is Carmel for Racal (LXX B in v.[29]). Geshur for Ashurites (Pesh. and Vulg. 2 S 2[9]) is probable; and Tibhath for Betah (Luc. Ματεβάκ, 2 S 8[8]) is certainly correct; while Edom for Aram (after same VSS in vv.[12. 13]) agrees with the notice of the Valley of Salt and with the succeeding verses. Gath (Pesh. and LXX in 2 S 21[18]) is better than the unknown Gob, and 'the Hittites to Kadesh' (Lucianic text) is an important improvement on Tahtim-hodshi (2 S 24[6]), as is Ai for Gaza (MSS of 1 Ch 7[28]). Geshur for Asshur (Ps 83[8]) is a probable emendation (so Lagarde, but see Duhm ad loc.), and Baal-hermon (Ca 8[11]) for Baal-hamon (so Grätz, but see Budde, ad loc.). Gibeah (Pesh. Jer 31[39]) is better than the unknown Goath, and Accho (indicated by LXX) takes the place (so Reland et al., but see Nowack, ad loc.) of 'at all' (Mic 1[10]). In the few remaining cases of textual differences affecting topography, the Heb. text seems to be preferable.

The town names of Palestine are so ancient that their occurrence does not, as a rule, affect critical questions; yet the absence of the names of Jerusalem, Samaria, Tirzah, and Zereda in the Pent. is notable. The permanence of the population has preserved some three-fourths of the OT nomenclature to the present day, and these names are equally traceable in the 4th and 12th centuries A.D. in a large number of instances. The survey of the country has brought to light some 150 biblical sites which were unknown, because, as a rule, they do not appear on earlier maps. In Genesis the Heb. ancestors are represented as migrating from Ur on the Lower Euphrates to Harran in the north, thus entering Canaan through Syria; and Phœnician tradition points to the same line of immigration. The Amraphel and Arioch, with whom in Gn 14 Abraham is said to have been contemporary, have been supposed (though Jensen, Ball, and King [Letters and Inscriptions of Khammurabi, 1899] dispute this) to be the Bab. Khammurabi and Eriaku, whose date is fixed by many at about B.C. 2376–2333 (see Sayce, EHH 281). The Hebrews naturally reached Bethel before Hebron and Beersheba. Of the cities noticed in Gn, those of Syria (Gn 10[15-18]) are known in B.C. 1700, 1600, and 1500 on monuments in the cases of Sidon, Arka, Arvad, Zemar, and Hamath. Gerar and Gaza in Palestine (v.[19]) are noticed in B.C. 1600 and 1500 respectively; but Dan (if really a town name in Gn 14[14]) does not seem to have been so named till the time of the judges (Jg 18[29]). Dothan (Gn 37[17]) is noticed by Thothmes III. about B.C. 1600, and its site is equally certain with those of the preceding cities. Damascus (Gn 15[2]) is noticed by Thothmes III. in B.C. 1600, and on the Tel el-Amarna tablets a century later.* These tablets also refer to the land of Hobah (Gn 14[15]) north of Damascus, and to the land of Ham (Gn 14[5]) in Bashan. The topography of Exodus is mainly confined to the desert, and unfortunately contains many names of unknown localities. That of Numbers refers largely to a region never reached by the Egyptians, and only conquered by the Assyrians in the 8th cent. B.C. The chief sites in Moab and Gilead retain their ancient names, and some are noticed on the Moabite Stone about B.C. 850. The conquest of Eastern Palestine in five months by the Israelites was less arduous than many of the yearly campaigns of the Egyptians and Assyrians, which extended over much greater distances through hostile parts of Palestine. The view of Palestine from Nebo (Dt 34[1-3]) accords with the actual view, excepting that Dan and the 'Western Sea' are hidden by nearer mountains.

The great geographical book of the OT is, however, that of Joshua. The description of the boundaries of the land applies, in the judgment of the writer of the present article, to a time previous to that of the captivity of Gad in B.C. 734 (1 Ch 5[26]), and to that of the Moabite conquest in B.C. 850. It also refers to a period not later than that of David, according to the note (1 Ch 4[31]) concerning the dispersion of Simeon. Ai (Jos 8[28]) was apparently no longer in ruins in B.C. 701 (Is 10[28]), and was repeopled after the Captivity (Neh 11[31]). The curse of Joshua on Jericho (Jos 6[26]) was fulfilled (1 K 16[34]) in Ahab's time, about B.C. 850; and the regions unconquered by Joshua (13[2-6]) were part of David's kingdom. Jebus (Jos 15[63]) was also taken by David; and Nob, which is unnoticed in Jos (21) as a priestly city, had its population massacred by Saul (1 S 22[19]), but apparently was reoccupied by B.C. 701 (Is 10[32]). On the other hand, the distinction of Israel and Judah seems to be indicated geographically (Jos 11[16. 21]), and it is very remarkable that there is no account of the conquest of Central Palestine, and that the description of the Samaritan region is much less complete than that of Galilee and Judæa. There is an important difference in the order of the passage referring to the fulfilment of the law at Shechem (Jos 8^{30-35}) in the LXX, and it has been suspected that the original book has lost portions referring to Samaria. The geography, however, does not represent that of the later period (Neh 11^{25-36}), when Judah colonized the earlier possessions of Simeon, and Benjamin settled in towns that had belonged to Dan. The forty-eight Levitical cities were assigned in obedience to the law (Nu 35^{6}), but the arrangement laid down in Ezk ($45^{4.5}$) is quite different, and these cities are not so assigned in Neh (11^{36}). The majority of the Levitical cities are well-known sites, and the variations in the imperfect parallel list (1 Ch 6) are few. Beth-shemesh, Gezer, Beth-horon, Eltekeh, Aijalon, Gath-rimmon, Taanach, Ashtaroth, Daberath, and En-gannim are among the Levitical cities which are noticed on Egyp. monuments, and in the Tel el-Amarna letters, in the 16th and 15th cents. B.C., excepting Beth-horon and Eltekeh—noticed by Shishak (B.C. 935) and by Sennacherib (B.C. 701) respectively.

When we compare the final arrangements of the conquest — for at first Judah, Benjamin, and Joseph occupied country (Jos 16. 17) out of which portions were taken for Issachar, Dan, and Simeon —with the twelve provinces which existed in the time of Solomon, the two accounts are found to coincide very closely, but in subsequent ages the boundaries mentioned differ considerably from those of the Bk. of Joshua. Ephraim, Naphtali, and Asher are noticed as provinces with Issachar and Benjamin (1 K 4^{8-18}); the second province included towns of Dan; the third appears to have been in Judah; and the fourth perhaps in Zebulun. East of Jordan the northern province had its capital at Ramoth-gilead (Reimûn) and the southern at Mahanaim (probably Makhneh), while the twelfth province coincided with the lot of Reuben. Simeon had already ceased to hold the Beersheba plains.

The most completely described region in the Bk. of Joshua is that south of Jerusalem.* The north boundary of Judah ran south of Jericho by Gilgal and Adummim (Ta'at ed-Dumm) to Enrogel in the Kidron Valley; and, leaving the capital in Benjamin, it ran southward by Rachel's Tomb (1 S 10^{2}, Jer 31^{15}) to Nephtoah (Jos 15^{9}), which was at Etam according to the Talmud of Jerusalem ('Ain 'Aṭân, south of Bethlehem), whence it ran west to Chesalon (Kesla) and to Kiriath-jearim ('Erma), and south of the valley of Sorek, and to Ekron and Jamnia and the sea. The cities within this border are enumerated (Jos 15) in groups according as they were in the Negeb or 'dry land,' the Shephēlah or western foot hills, the Har or 'mountain region,' and the Midbār or desert. Of those in the Beersheba desert little is known, and the total is given as twenty-nine, while the details amount to thirty-four. Amam, Shema, Hazar-gaddah, Heshmon, and Bethpelet are, however, omitted in the parallel passage (Jos 19^{2-8}). Of the rest, only Adadah ('Ad'adah), Kedesh ('Ain Ḳades), and Kerioth-hezron (at Jebel Hadhîreh) are known, with Beersheba (Bîr es-Seb'a), Rimmon (Umm er-Rumâmin), and perhaps Ziklag ('Asluj). In the second list (Jos 19^{6}) Sharuhen stands for Shilhim, and appears to be the present Tell esh-Sheri'ah in the Philistine plains, which is noticed as early as B.C. 1700, when the Egyptians were advancing on Canaan. The second group in the 'lowlands' (Jos 15^{33-36}) is much more perfectly known, as lying south-west of the Jerusalem mountains. Of these, Zorah is noticed monumentally in the fifteenth century B.C., and is now the village Sur'ah. Eshtaol (Eshu'a), Zanoah (Zanûh), En-gannim (Umm Jina), Enam ('Ain 'Ainah), Jarmuth (Yarmûk), Adullam ('Aid el-Mia), Socoh (Shuweikeh), and Gederoth (Jedireh) retain their old names little changed. The third group is less known, but seems to have included cities on the edge of the plain of Philistia, among which Migdal-gad (Mejdeleh), Lachish (Tell el-Hesy), Eglon ('Ajlân), Beth-dagon (Beit Dejan), Naamah (Na'aneh), and Makkedah (probably el-Mughâr) are fixed. Eglon is monumentally noticed in B.C. 1600, Lachish and Makkedah about B.C. 1480–1440, and Beth-dagon in B.C. 701. The fourth group included towns nearer to the Hebron mountains, of which Nezeb (Beit Nusib), Keilah (Ḳilah), Achzib ('Ain Kezbeh), and Mareshah (Mer'ash) are all apparently noticed in the Tel el-Amarna letters of the 15th cent. B.C., and the two latter by Micah ($1^{14.15}$) in the 8th cent. B.C. The three Philistine cities which follow do not appear to have been conquered till the time of Solomon. Ekron ('Akir), Ashdod (Esdûd), and Gaza (Ghuzzeh) were, no doubt, ancient sites, but only the latter — an important city long held by Egypt —is noticed in the 15th cent. B.C. The sixth group in the mountains begins in the south, including the Negeb hills. Among these cities (vv.$^{48-59}$) Jattir ('Attîr), Socoh (Shuweikeh), Dannah (Idhnah), Debir (Dhaheriyeh), Anab ('Anab close to the preceding), Eshtemoa (es-Semû'a), Anim (Ghuwein), and perhaps Holon (Beit Aula) and Giloh (Jûla), are fixed; while in the seventh group nearer Hebron occur Arab (er-Rabîyeh), Dumah (Dômeh), Beth-tappuah (Tuffûh), Hebron itself (el-Khalîl), and Zior (Si'air). The eighth group includes towns farther east in the Hebron hills, such as Maon (Ma'in), Carmel (Kurmul), Ziph (Zif), Juttah (Yuttah), Zanoah (Zanû'a), Ha-Kain (Yukîn); while Gibeah and Timnah (Jeb'a and Tibneh) may be ruined sites north-west of Hebron, though this is uncertain. The ninth group is in the mountains north of Hebron, including Halhul (Halhûl), Bethzur (Beit Sûr), Maarath (Beit Ummâr), Beth-anoth (Beit 'Ainûn), and Eltekon — perhaps Tekoa (Teku'a). Two towns forming a separate group (v.^{60}) are Kiriath-jearim ('Erma), and Rabbah (Rubba) south-west of the preceding. The six cities of the desert are less known, but the 'City of Salt' (v.^{62}) may be Tell el-Milh east of Beersheba, and the last is En-gedi ('Ain Jidy) on the cliff above the Dead Sea. Several of the towns in the southern mountains are noticed in the lists of Thothmes III. about B.C. 1600, such, for instance, as Carmel; but the Egyptians did not penetrate far into the mountains, though they held Jerusalem before the Hebrew conquest, and knew it by that name (Urusalim), which occurs in the Bk. of Joshua (15^{63}, cf. $10^{1.3.23}$).

The north boundary of Benjamin ran from Jordan north of Jericho (Jos 18^{11-20}) to Bethel (Beitîn) and to Ataroth-addar (ed-Dârieh) on the hill south of lower Beth-horon (Beit 'Ur et-Taḥta, i.e. 'the lower'). The west border ran due south to Kiriath-jearim ('Erma), joining the border of Judah. The cities included in this mountain region (vv.$^{21-28}$) are not all known, but among them were Bethel and Parah (Fârah), Ophrah (probably Taiyibeh), Chephar-ha-Ammoni (Kefr 'Ana), Ophni (thought to be Jufna), and Geba (Jeb'a), with Gibeon (el-Jîb), Ramah (er-Râm), Beeroth (Bîreh), Mizpeh (perhaps Tell en-Naṣbeh), Chephirah (Kefîreh), Irpeel (Rafât), Eleph (Lifta), Jerusalem itself, and Kiriath (el-Kurieh, called also Kuriet el-'Anab): all these are within the border.

* Throughout this article the identifications of towns, etc., are those which were first proposed by or which commend themselves to the present writer. Space forbids the reasons for his conclusions being stated. The reader may refer to the separate articles, in some of which a different identification is adopted, and where the authorities are cited.

The lot of Dan (Jos 19[40-46]) was in the low hills and plain west of Benjamin. Its boundaries are not stated, but on the south coincided with Judah, from which tribe Zorah and Eshtaol on the border were taken. Near these was Ir-shemesh ('Ain Shems), and farther north Shaalabbin (Selbît) and Aijalon (Yalo). Timnah and Ekron (Tibneh and 'Akir) were also on the Judah border. Eltekeh (perhaps Beit Likia) and Gibbethon (Kibbieh) were on the north-east, and Jehud (el-Yehudîyeh) with Bene-berak (Ibn Ibrak) in the plain north of Joppa. Me-jarkon ('yellow water') may have been the boundary stream already noticed, and Rakkon ('shore') may be the present Tell er-Rakkeit on the shore north of Joppa (Yâfa). The territory was insufficient (v.[47]), and the plain was held by the Canaanites (Jg 1[34. 35]), so that the Danites were forced to migrate from their plain or 'camp' (Mahaneh-dan, Jg 18[4. 12]) west of Kiriath-jearim (in the valley of Sorek, south of Zorah) to the extreme north under Hermon.

Of the cities of Dan, Joppa is noticed in the Tel el-Amarna tablets (15th cent. B.C.) as well as by Sennacherib in B.C. 701, and the latter also notices Beth-dagon (on the border of Judah), Beneberak, Eltekeh, and Timnah.

The children of Joseph appear at first to have spread over all Samaria and Lower Galilee, as well as over Bashan and half Gilead. Their original boundary (Jos 16[1-3]) coincided with that of Benjamin, and approached Judah at Gezer (Tell Jezer), which was, however, not taken (v.[10]), though they claimed the plains subsequently given to Dan. Out of their territory also Issachar received a portion in the final division by lot. Ephraim had a small and rugged portion; but Manasseh was a 'great people' (Jos 17[12-18]), yet unable to drive the Canaanites out of the chariot cities in the plains. Manasseh held some of the best lands in Central Palestine, and a wooded mountain, perhaps Carmel (see Mic 7[14]). The north border of Ephraim is briefly described (Jos 16[5-8]), running on the west from the north-west angle of Benjamin to Michmethah east of Shechem (17[7]), apparently the Mukhnah plain, and thence east to Taanath-shiloh (T'ana) and Janoah (Yanûn), and thus to the Jordan Valley near Jericho. The river Kanah (Wâdy Ḳanah) formed the border on the north-west, running to the sea; but the plains north of Dan were not occupied. The list of 'separate cities' (16[9]) seems to have been lost. The boundaries of Manasseh are not stated, and only two towns within the portion of this tribe west of Jordan are noticed, namely, Shechem and Tappuah. The site of the latter is unknown, but it is perhaps the same as Yashubi 'En Tappuah, which would find a fitting site at Yâsûf close to the Mukhnah plain, the border of Ephraim (see Heb. Jos 17[7]). Manasseh had originally 'touched upon' Asher and Issachar, and claimed cities in these tribes, of which in Issachar Bethshean (Beisân), Ibleam (Yebla), Endor (Andûr), Taanach (T'ânuk), and Megiddo (probably Mujedd'a) are well known. It is remarkable that very few Samaritan towns are noticed, but in the Bk. of Joshua generally we find Shiloh, Tirzah, and Shechem mentioned. Monumental records are equally silent as to this very rugged mountain region. On the other hand, Megiddo and Taanach are noticed by Thothmes III. (in B.C. 1600) and in the Tel el-Amarna texts (a century later); and again, in the reign of Ramses II. (about B.C. 1330), Megiddo is noticed as if near the Jordan.

The boundaries of Issachar are also unnoticed (Jos 19[17-22]), but coincided with those of Manasseh, Naphtali, and Zebulun, including the plain of Dothan and that of Esdraelon. The known cities include Jezreel (Zer'in), Chesulloth (Iksâl), Shunem (Sûlem), Hapharaim (el-Ferrîyeh), Anaharath (En N'aûrah), Rabbith (Râba), Remeth (Râmeh), En-gannim (Jenîn), and En-haddah (perhaps Kefr Adân). Of these, Anaharath, and perhaps others, are noticed by Thothmes III. in his lists.

The borders of Zebulun are more particularly described. The lot included the Nazareth hills and the plain of Asochis with hills to its north. The north and south limits seem to be fixed by Dabbesheth (Dabsheh) and Jokneam (Tell Keimûn) respectively (Jos 19[10]). The south border was at Sarid (or perh. Sadid, cf. LXX B in v.[12]), which may be Tell Shadûd at the foot of the Nazareth hills. It ran east to Chesulloth and Daberath (Debûrieh), where, at the western foot of Tabor, the three tribes, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Issachar met (see 19[22]). The south border of Zebulun also touched Japhia (Yâfa, west of Nazareth), and reached the Kishon at Jokneam. The east border skirted the Tabor plateau on the west, running north on the hills to Gath-hepher (now el-Mesh-hed) and to Rimmon (Rummâneh) east of the Asochis plain. The north border started on the east at Hannathon (Kefr 'Anân) and passed along a deep valley to Dabbesheth. The remainder of the line coincided with the south border of Asher (Jos 19[27]), running north of Cabul (Kabûl) to Beth-dagon (probably Tell Daûk south of Acre) and to Shihor-libnath — apparently the river Belus. The shores of the bay of Acre seem to have belonged to Asher, perhaps as far as the Kishon (19[26]), but Zebulun would seem to have had a 'haven' for 'ships' (Gn 49[13]), probably at Haifa under Carmel, in which name the Heb. word for 'haven' or 'shore' survives. Of the other cities of Zebulun, only Bethlehem (Beit Lahm) is certainly known.

It appears to be quite clear that the Tabor plateau, as well as the hills of Upper Galilee, belonged to Naphtali. The towns included (19[33]) those in the plain, Bezaanannim (Bessûm) as well as Heleph (perhaps Beit Lîf) in the north. Among those in the plain were Adami (ed-Dâmieh), Hammath (south of Tiberias), Rakkath (believed by the Rabbis to be the old name of Tiberias, meaning 'shore'), and Adamah (Admah north of Beisân); Hukkok (Yaḳûḳ) formed with Tabor the border on the south-west. In the upper mountains were Hazor (near Jebel Hadhîreh), Kedesh (Ḳedes), Horem (Ḥûrah), Beth-anath ('Ainatha), and others which are doubtful.

The tribe of Asher claimed the lower hills between Accho and Tyre (19[24-31]), but failed to drive the Canaanites from many of the cities (Jg 1[31]). Many of the towns of Asher are doubtful, though all appear to have been north of Acre. Dor (Jos 17[11], cf. 12[23] and 1 Ch 7[29]) is quite unknown, though fixed by Eusebius at Tantûrah south of Carmel. This, like many other assertions of his Onomasticon, is unauthorized and confusing, especially as Dor seems to have been on the 'uplands.' Achshaph is probably el-Yasîf near Acre. Hammon seems to have been an important site near the shore farther north, where Renan discovered inscriptions to Baal Hammon. Kanah is in the hills east of Tyre, and Achzib (ez-Zîb) is north of Acre in the plain. Among these cities Tyre and Accho are noticed in the 15th cent. B.C. in the Tel el-Amarna tablets and Achzib by Sennacherib in B.C. 701.

East of Jordan, Reuben held the plateau round Heshbon, and the lot seems to have been bounded by the hills north of that city (Jos 13[15-23]), extending to Jordan in the valley of Shittim; but in Ahab's time several of the cities of Reuben are noticed on the Moabite Stone as having been held by 'men of Gad.' The south border was Arnon (now Wâdy Mojîb) and Aroer ('Ar'aîr) on the N. brink of its valley. The sites of Medeba (Mâdebeh), Heshbon (Hesbân), Dibon (Dhibân), and Beth-baal-meon (Ma'in) are those of considerable towns. Kiriathaim (Keriût) and Beth-jeshimoth (Suweimeh on the north-east shore of the Dead Sea) are known, with probably Sibmah (Sûmieh) near Heshbon.

The boundary of Reuben and Gad was at Jazer (probably Beit Zâr'a north of Heshbon), and the latter tribe held the Jordan Valley east of the river, and the western slopes of Gilead, bounded on the east by Aroer near Rabbath-ammon ('Ammân). On the north-east they held Ramath-mizpeh (probably Sûf, the Mizpeh of Jephthah, Jg 11^{34}) and Betonim, perhaps the district in north Gilead now called el-Butein. Mahanaim was on the border between Gad and Manasseh, the latter tribe holding 'half Gilead' (13^{31}), which appears to mean the eastern half, Gad extending to the 'border of the ridge' (Debir), and holding in the Jordan Valley Beth-aram (Râmeh), Beth-nimrah (Nimrîn), Succoth (Tell Der'ala), Zaphon (supposed by the Rabbis to be 'Amatah), and the lowlands to the Sea of Galilee. This agrees with the notice of Mahanaim in Solomon's south Gilead province (1 K 4^{14}). The rest of the large portion given to Manasseh east of Jordan included all Bashan (v. ^{31}), with the towns of Ashtaroth (Tell 'Ashterah) and Edrei (edh-Dhra'a), which are noticed on monuments in B.C. 1600–1500.

This tribal distribution of Palestine was broken up by the Assyrians. Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 745–727) conquered Galilee (2 K 15^{29}), and took captive the tribes east of Jordan (1 Ch 5^{26}) shortly before Sargon took Samaria (B.C. 722). In 711 Ashdod was besieged by Sargon, and when Hezekiah was attacked by Sennacherib in B.C. 701, Beth-dagon, Joppa, Bene-berak and Hazor (Yazûr in the plain) are said to have belonged to Ashkelon. Ammon, Moab, Edom, Ekron, and Gaza were then all independent, and Moab indeed had rebelled nearly two centuries earlier. Thus the geography of the Book of Joshua represents a condition which did not long exist after the death of Solomon. The narrative chapters show that the conquest resembled those made by the Egyptians or Assyrians in their annual campaigns: 'the cities that stood still on their mounds' (Jos 11^{13}) were not destroyed, unless taken by stratagem. The invading army attacked usually the smaller places, but the fortresses with garrisons of chariots remained in the hands of the Canaanites, and subsequent attacks had to be made on places burned by Joshua and re-fortified by their inhabitants (e.g. Jg 1^{11}, Jos 10^{38}). The first campaign from Gilgal by Ai and Gibeon to Aijalon, and thence to Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, followed apparently the line of the conquests of the Habiri noticed in the Tel el-Amarna texts (B.C. 1480–1440): for they also came from Seir, and fought at Aijalon and Lachish, and penetrated by Keilah up the valley towards Hebron. The site of Debir was in the Negeb (Jg 1^{15}) and near Anab (Jos $15^{49.\ 50}$), so that there is reason to place it at the important ancient site Dhaherîyeh ('the place on the back or ridge') near Anab, at a village where rock-cut tombs and other marks of antiquity are found. This was the southernmost extent of Joshua's original conquest. The conquest of Shechem (only about 20 miles from Ai) is not described, but the law was here fulfilled (Dt 27^{4}, Jos 8^{30}); the next great contest was in Upper Galilee, where Hazor looked down on the Waters of Merom (Jos $11^{1.\ 5}$), and where all the northern Canaanites gathered. Hazor is also a place whence letters were sent asking aid from Egypt in the 15th cent. B.C. The Book of Joshua ends with his burial at Timnath-heres (Jg 2^{9}) in Mount Ephraim (now Kefr Hâris), and that of Eleazar in Gibeah of Phinehas, probably at the site now shown at 'Awertah east of Gerizim. The bones of Joseph were buried at Shechem, where his tomb is shown near Jacob's Well; and the altar on Ebal (Jos 8^{30}) and stone monument in the plain of Shechem (Jos 24^{26}) seemed to make this central city the capital of Israel. There were, however, several successive sanctuaries which were recognized before the building of the temple, namely at Gilgal, Shiloh, Nob, and Gibeon. The ark rested in Kiriath-jearim, and an altar of Jehovah was built on Carmel before Elijah's famous visit (1 K 18^{30}). We have no notice, however, of contemporary local sanctuaries till after the division of the kingdom. The six cities of refuge were placed equidistant, three on either side of the river, at Hebron, Shechem, and Kedesh-naphtali, at Bezer (Buseirah in Moab), Ramoth-gilead (Reimûn), and Golan (Sahem el-Jaulân), in the south, the centre, and the north of the country (Jos $20^{7.\ 8}$).

A careful consideration of the geography of the Pent. and Bk. of Joshua, by the aid of modern exploration, shows that the whole is easily understood, and that in no case does there appear to be any element suggesting that the descriptions were penned after the Captivity. Towns appear in the later books, such as Samaria, Zereda (Surdah), Lod (Lydda), Ananiah (Beit Hanîna), etc. (Neh $11^{32.\ 35}$), not noticed in Joshua, just as the later Heb. differs in the use of Persian and Gr. words, and in syntax and vocabulary, from the older Heb. of the Pentateuch. The geography of the Bk. of Joshua is, however, so exhaustive, that little is added to it in the OT books that follow. In Judges, Bezek (1^{4}) may be the southern Bezkah rather than the Bezek of Saul (1 S 11^{8}), now Ibzîk north-east of Shechem. Conquests were pushed farther south than Debir to Zephath (es-Sufa) in the Beersheba plateau; but Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron were not taken (LXX Jg 1^{18}), or any chariot city in the plains. Bethel fell, and its inhabitants migrated to Luz (Luweizeh) under Hermon (v.^{23}); but intermarriage with Canaanites (3^{6}) destroyed the power of the conquering race, and the king of Mesopotamia is said (3^{10}) to have overrun Palestine (cf. the words of Burnaburias to Amenophis IV. in the Tel el-Amarna Collection). The episode of Sisera (Jg 4^{5}) is elucidated by its geography. His chariot city was Harosheth ('the woods'), now el-Ḥarathîyeh by the oak wood near the Kishon. The Kishon under Mount Tabor (v.^{7}) is treacherous and swampy, and after the battle near Endor (Ps 83^{10}) the chariots were engulfed in the stream (Jg 5^{21}), while Sisera fled east to Bezaanannim (Bessûm), near the Kedesh (Ḳadish) of the Sea of Galilee. The episode of Gideon's victory is equally clear topographically. He lived at Ophrah (probably Fer'ata) in Samaria (Jg 6^{11}), but encountered his eastern foes near the spring of Harod (Jg 7^{1}), and pursued them down the valley of Jezreel to Beth-shittah (Shuṭṭa), and to Abel-meholah ('Ain Helweh) in the Jordan Valley, and by Succoth (Tell Der'ala) to Jogbehah (8^{11}), now Jubeihah on the hills north of Rabbath-ammon. The story of Jephthah belongs to Mount Gilead, Tob (Jg 11^{3}) being the present Ṭaiyibeh south-east of the Sea of Galilee, and Mizpeh, probably Sûf, farther south on the Gilead upland. The pursuit of the Ammonites extended to Aroer on Arnon. The exploits of Samson were confined to Philistia and the Shephēlah near Zorah—the valley of Sorek (Jg 16^{4}) retaining its name at Surîk close to his home, while the 'cleft' of the rock Etam ($15^{8.\ 11}$) may be the curious cavern in the cliff at Beit 'Aṭâb rather farther east. The rock Rimmon (Jg 21^{13}) was not far south of Shiloh at Rummôn, and vine cultivation (v.^{21}) still continues south of Shiloh (Seilûn), the position of which is specially described as east of the road to Shechem, and south of Lebonah (Lubben) on that road (v.[19]).

The first capital of the Heb. kingdom was at Gibeah (Jeb'a) in Benjamin (1 S 13[2]), near Michmash (Mukhmâs), where the two great precipices divide these villages (14[5]) in the valley of Suweinît —'the little thorn trees'—which perhaps preserves the name of Seneh, 'the thorn.' The valley of Elah (Wâdy es-Sunṭ) is still remarkable for the large terebinths whence its Heb. name was derived, and its site is fixed by the notice of Socoh (1 S 17[1]), now Shuweikeh, and of Gath (v.[52]) and Ekron. Gath (Giti Rimuna) is pretty clearly fixed by a notice in the Tel el-Amarna letters at the site usually accepted—the cliff of Tell es-Sâfi —at the mouth of the valley of Elah. David's wanderings from this Philistine fortress extended up the valley of Elah to Adullam ('Aid el-Mia) on its western side; to Hareth (Kharâs), in the hills above it on the east; and to Keilah (Kîlah) farther up its course towards Hebron (1 S 21[1. 5] 23[1]); and thence to Ziph (Tell Zîf) south-east of Hebron, and Maon (Tell Ma'în) farther south. He was finally driven to the deserts of En-gedi ('Ain Jidy), but returned to Maon (LXX 1 S 25[1]) immediately south of Carmel (Kurmul)—a region still rich in sheep (1 S 23[14. 25] 24[1] 25[2]). Ziklag (27) was south of Beersheba not far from Arad (Tell 'Arâd), where the Kenites lived (cf. Jg 1[16] and 1 S 27[10]), but not more than three days' journey from Jezreel (30[1]) for men mounted on riding camels. The Philistines, driven from the mountains, encamped by a 'stream' (Aphek) in Shunem (29[1], cf. 28[4]), which still runs from the spring at Sûlem. Saul's army being to the south, on the rugged and barren slopes of Gilboa near Jezreel, his night journey to Endor, north of the Philistine camp, was especially dangerous.

The second Heb. capital was at Hebron, Saul's adherents having their centre at Mahanaim in Gilead. The well of Sirah (2 S 3[26]) retains its name ('Ain Sârah) north of Hebron. The conquests of David extended north of Hermon to Tibhath (perhaps Kefr Dubbeh) in the Baalbek plains, but not to Kadesh farther north (2 S 8[8] 24[6]), now Ḳades, on the Orontes. Damascus and Edom were subdued, with Moab and Ammon. The border towards Phœnicia extended to Dan-jaan (Daniân) near Achzib south of Tyre (24[6]), but the region from near Accho to Cabul (Kabûl) was ceded later to Tyre by Solomon (1 K 9[13]), whose kingdom extended, however, north of Damascus to Tadmor (1 K 9[18]). Tadmor retained its native name at Palmyra to the 1st cent. A.D., as attested by a Palmyro-Gr. bilingual on the site. Tiphsah (Thapsacus on the Euphrates south of Carchemish) is stated (1 K 4[24]) to have been the limit of his power, including the country of the Hittite princes (v.[21], cf. 9[20] 10[29]); and Gezer, recently wasted by the Egyptians, was ceded to Israel (1 K 9[16]). We thus reach the period of greatest prosperity, when Joppa (2 Ch 2[16]) was a Heb. port as well as Elath (1 K 9[26]) on the Gulf of 'Akabah. The Phœnicians and the Hittites (1 K 10[29]) in Syria remained, however, as dependent allies. The Cherethites and Pelethites (2 S 20[23]) may have been guards from Philistia like the Gittites (15[18]), for a town called Keratiya exists south-west of Gath (but see art. CHERETHITES). Mahanaim is described (2 S 18[23]) as situated in a 'round,' not far from a forest (v.[9]), and the remarkable basin on the Gilead plateau in which the ruins of Makhneh stand is not far from the southern oak and fir woods, whence es-Salt (the Saltus of later times) was named.

The third Heb. capital at Jerusalem had existed from the 15th cent. B.C. as a city. It requires to be separately treated (see JERUSALEM), but was chosen, probably in preference to the older centre at Shechem, from military and political considerations. The southern mountains have always been the last refuge from foreign invaders from the plains. The gradual decay of the kingdom began, even in Solomon's age, with the loss of Damascus (1 K 11[24]); and Zereda (Surdeh) in Ephraim became a centre of revolt (v.[26], cf. LXX additions, 1 K 12[24aff.]). Shishak's conquests (14[25]), according to his own record, extended over all Palestine except Upper Galilee, which was conquered by the Syrians (15[20]). The earlier boundary of Israel and Judah seems to have been near the Michmash Valley (v.[22], cf. 2 Ch 13[19] 16[1-6], Zec 14[10], 2 K 23[8]); and Tirzah, the northern capital (1 K 15[33]), was probably at Teiasîr, an ancient site north-east of Shechem. The site of Elijah's sacrifice (1 K 18) is supposed to have been at the southern peak of Carmel, now called el-Mahraḳah—'the place of burning.' The Aphek of the Syrian wars (1 K 20[30]) is probably Fîk, on the precipices east of the Sea of Galilee. The vine cultivation of Jezreel (1 K 21[1]) is attested by the remains of rock-cut winepresses east of the town, though no vines are now grown.

A new capital at Samaria now appears in history (1 K 16[24]) in a well-watered mountain region, at Sebastieh west of Shechem, but much exposed to invasion both from the western and the northern plains. Tiphsah (2 K 15[16]), smitten by Menahem, was probably not the distant Thapsacus on the Euphrates, but the modern Tafsah (spelt with the final guttural) south of Shechem; for the Hittites were still an independent people, unconquered by Assyria till the time of Sargon (cf. 2 K 7[6]), and the conquests of Jeroboam II. in Syria (2 K 14[28]) extended only to Hamath, half-way to the Hittite capital at Carchemish (2 Ch 35[20]), now Jerâbis on the Euphrates.

After the Captivity geographical indications are less numerous, but many new towns are noticed (Ezr 2), such as Netophah (Beit Netîf in the Shephēlah), Azmaveth (Hizmeh), Neballat (Bîr Nibâla), and Ono (Kefr 'Ana) in Benjamin, Elam (perhaps Beit 'Alâm west of Hebron) and others already noticed: 'the other Nebo' (Neh 7[33]) may be Nûba in the same district; the villages in the Shephēlah were colonized by men of Judah and Benjamin, who spread as far as Ziklag, Lachish, and Lod (Neh 11[25-35]). The topographical notices of the poetical and prophetic books do not require special consideration, but that of the Song of Songs is remarkable as covering the whole of Palestine east and west of Jordan, and as indicating the various natural features of the different regions—the flowers of Sharon (2[1]), the mountains of Bether (probably Bittîr near Jerusalem, 2[17]), the pastures of Gilead (4[1]), the wild summits of Lebanon and Hermon (4[8]), the fertile plain round Tirzah (6[4]), the hills above Damascus (7[4]), the pools still found beneath Heshbon (7[4]), and perhaps the copses of Carmel, and the 'circle' of Mahanaim (6[13] 7[5]).

The geography of the Hasmonæan period, in the First Book of Maccabees, is evidence of the genuine character of that work. The revolt began at Modin (Medieh) on the hills east of Lydda; and the three great passes at Bethhoron, Bethzur, and Berzetho (Bîr ez-Zeit), on the west, south, and north of Jerusalem, were defended by Judas. Adasa, the site of his last victory, was at 'Adasah near Gibeon. Bethzacharias (Beit Skaria), where Eleazar was killed under the elephant (1 Mac 6[32]), was within sight of Jerusalem on the south. The raids of Judas were carried over the whole of Eastern Palestine and into Philistia and Edom, but the only parts securely held were in the mountains round Jerusalem. After his death the surviving brothers found refuge in the desert of Judah and in the Jordan jungle before establishing themselves at Michmash. Under Jonathan the Jewish boundaries extended over all Western Palestine and Syria, even to the river Eleutherus north of Tripoli (Nahr el-Kebîr), the port of Joppa and the cities of Philistia having been also won. Gerasa (Jerash) in Gilead is first noticed in the time of Alexander Jannæus.

The NT topography is mainly confined to Lower Galilee, but the works of Josephus, the Mishna, and other early Talmudic tracts enable us to trace the boundaries of Samaria, while the village names of Lower Galilee are noticed in great numbers in the Life of Josephus, including many places not otherwise mentioned, but which retain their ancient names. The most important topographical questions in the Gospels, from a critical point of view, are those concerning the sites of Bethabara, Emmaus, and Sychar. Christian tradition from the fourth century has placed Bethabara (on the reading in Jn 1^{28} see article BETHABARA) at the Jericho ford, because John preached in the wilderness of Judæa (Mt 3^{1}); but this does not accord with the distance from Cana of Galilee, a day's journey (Jn 1^{43} 2^{1}), and the Baptist preached in all parts of the Jordan Valley (Lk 3^{3}). The name of Bethabara ('house of the ferry') survives at only one of the Jordan fords, Makhâdet 'Abârah, 'the ford of the ferry,' and this is on the confines of Galilee (Mt 3^{13}), and a day's journey from Cana. The site of Emmaus is not known (possibly Khamasa south-west of Jerusalem); the emendation of the Sinaitic MS (Lk 24^{13} reading 160 for 60 furlongs), clearly intended to point to Emmaus Nicopolis ('Amwâs), gives too great a distance from Jerusalem to agree with the context (vv.$^{15.\ 33}$). Sychar (Sam. Ischar, translated in the Arabic of the Sam. Chronicle 'Askar) is clearly the village 'Askar close to Jacob's Well (Jn $4^{5.\ 6}$). Ænon near Salim (Jn 3^{23}), where there was 'much water,' is probably to be found at the perennial stream north-east of Shechem, between the sites of 'Ainûn and Sâlim, where alone in Palestine the two names occur near each other. The site of Chorazin (Mt 11^{21}) is fixed at Kerâzeh, north of the Sea of Galilee, but that of Capernaum (Capharnaum in the earlier MSS) is disputed. Christian tradition from the 4th cent. has placed it at Tell Hûm, but the fountain of Capernaum watered the plain of Gennesaret (Jos. BJ III. x. 8), and Isaac Chelo (14th cent. A.D.) identifies the town with a city of the Minim, who, according to the Rabbis, were heretics of Capernaum; Jewish tradition seems thus to point to the ruin of Minieh in the small plain of Gennesaret. Bethsaida Julias (Jos. BJ III. x. 7) was at the mouth of the Jordan, east of the river, where it entered the Sea of Galilee. It is usually placed at et-Tell, a ruin now a mile from the mouth. The swampy delta between this site and the lake has probably been formed during the last nineteen centuries. This city appears to be the Bethsaida of the Gospels (Mk 8^{22}) on the way to Cæsarea Philippi under Hermon (v.^{27}), and apparently east of Jordan (cf. Mt $14^{13.\ 22.\ 34}$, Lk 9^{10}), although two of the oldest MSS omit the name in the last cited passage. This view is not contradicted by the other passages in which Bethsaida is noticed (Jn 1^{44}, Mt 11^{21}). Magdala (Mt 15^{39}), called Magadan in some early MSS, and possibly identical with Dalmanutha (Mk 8^{10}), is the little hamlet Mejdel north of Tiberias. Gerasa (Mk 5^{1}, Lk 8^{26} = Gadara of Mt 8^{28}) or Gergesa is usually placed at the ruin Khersa, under the cliffs east of the Sea of Galilee, a site which answers to the notice of a 'steep place' (Mt 8^{32}). See, further, under the articles GADARA, GADARENES, and GERASENES. The site of Bethphage (Mk 11^{1}) is unknown, but it was near Bethany (el-'Azeriyeh) on Olivet. Gethsemane is only traditionally indicated, but it was clearly at the foot of Olivet, east of the Kidron Valley. Ephraim (Jn 11^{54}) is traditionally the village Taiyibeh near Baal-hazor (cf. 2 Ch 13^{19} and 2 S 13^{23}). Antipatris (Ac 23^{31}), at Râs el-'Ain, on the old road from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, was a city built by Herod the Great.

The boundaries of Samaria coincided roughly with those of the old territory of Manasseh west of Jordan, and extended to the Jordan Valley (cf. Mk 10^{1}) as well as to the sea—Cæsarea Palestina and Capharsaba (Kefr Sâba) being Sam. towns according to the Rabbis. Samaritans also lived in Bethshean and on Carmel, where Kefr es-Samîr represents the older Castrum Samaritorum. The south boundary followed a great ravine eastwards from Antipatris, having Beth Rima (Beit Rîma) and Beth Laban (Lubben) on the south, and passing by Anuath and Borceos (Berkît). Acrabbi (Akrabeh) and Sartaba (Kurn Sartabah) were in Judæa; and the boundary, leaving Shechem on its west, thus seems to have followed the valley of Ænon. En-gannim (Jenîn) was the border town of Galilee in the plain of Esdraelon; but Carmel, Gilboa, and all Sharon north of Antipatris appear to have been in Samaria. Galilee was bounded on the north (see Tosephta, Siphri, and Talm. Jerus.) by Achzib north of Accho (ez-Zib), Gatin (Ja'thûn), Beth Zanita (Zuweinita), Melloth (Ma'lia), Gelil (Jilîl), and Kanah (Kanah), and thence on the north the line ran along the Leontes, and to Cæsarea Philippi (Baniâs) under Hermon. The 'coasts of Tyre and Sidon' (Mt 15^{21}) were thus beyond the Holy Land. On the east, Bashan was divided into the districts of Gaulanitis (Jaulân), Trachonitis (the Lejja or 'basalt' region), Ituræa,—usually supposed to be the Jedûr region under Hermon,—Batanæa and Auranitis (Haurân). See BASHAN. Decapolis (Mt 4^{25}, Mk 5^{20}, Pliny, HN v. 18) was a confederation of ten cities in Bashan, including Gadara (Umm Keis), Gerasa (Jerâsh), Canatha (Kanawât), Abila (Abîl), Susitha (Sûsieh), Dion (Adûn), Capitolias (probably Beit er-Râs), Pella (Fahil), and Raphana, with Bethshean (Beisân) west of the Jordan.

Palestine was enriched by Herod the Great with new cities, such as Cæsarea, and by great buildings at Jericho, Phasaelis (Fusail in the Jordan Valley), Samaria, Antipatris, Ashkelon, etc. He built the desert fortress of Masada (Sebbeh) on the south-west shores of the Dead Sea; and his tomb was in the circular fortress of Herodium, which still stands on its conical hill south of Bethlehem (Jebel Fureidis). His successors added Tiberias, Cæsarea Philippi, Bethsaida, Archelais (probably Kerâwa in the Jordan Valley), and other towns; but his dominions were divided (Jos. Ant. XVII. xi. 4), Archelaus ruling Edom, Judæa, and Samaria; Philip ruling Bashan and Abilene (north of Hermon); and Antipas ruling Galilee, with Gilead and Moab (Peræa); until under the Roman procurators Palestine became a province subject to the legate of Syria. During this period Damascus and the regions far east of the Jordan were subject to the Nabatæan princes of Petra from B.C. 95 to A.D. 106. Bashan was incorporated in the province of Syria in A.D. 34 after the death of Philip.

Later Geography.—Knowledge of the later topography of Palestine is important for a right understanding of many questions, but the subject cannot here be fully treated. The scattered notices in Pliny, Strabo, and other Roman writers do not add materially to our information, nor are many places noticed in the Mishna; but in the 4th cent. the Jerusalem Talmud contains many references. The conquests of Cornelius Palma under Trajan in A.D. 105 gave to the Romans the whole of Gilead and Moab from Bostra (Busrah) to Petra and 'Akabah on the Red Sea. Bostra was the capital of this new province of Arabia, and the quarters of the Third Legion (Cyrenaica). In A.D. 295 Auranitis, Batanæa, and Trachonitis were added to this province (which was ruled by a prætor and a procurator), these districts having previously belonged to Syria. The Syrian province continued to use the Seleucid era for dating texts, but the Arabian cities dated from A.D. 106, the era of Bostra. Hence (see Mr. A. G. Wright's paper in Pal. Expl. Fund Quarterly Statement, 1895, p. 67) it becomes possible to draw the north boundary of Arabia in A.D. 106 on the south side of Bashan passing just north of Adraa, while after A.D. 295 the border between Arabia and Syria ran farther north by Neve (Nawa) and Aere (es-Sunamein) in the north part of Bashan. The most important places historically in the 2nd cent. A.D. were Bether (Bittîr near Jerusalem), where the great revolt of the Jews from Hadrian was suppressed, and Jamnia (Yebnah), the seat of the Sanhedrin after A.D. 70; while after A.D. 135 it sat at Shafram (Shefa 'Amr), Oshah (Hûsheh), Shaaraim (Sha'rah), and Tiberias in Lower Galilee. The great Onomasticon of Eusebius, translated from Gr. into Latin by Jerome, is very important for a knowledge of the 4th cent. topography, but the identification of Bible sites by these writers, who were intimately acquainted with the whole country, is as often wrong as right (as may be shown in cases such as Aijalon, etc.), and it has no authority, although upon it was founded the Greek tradition which all pilgrim diaries repeat down to the 12th cent., and which still survives. The crusaders further confused the topography by new and ignorant identifications, often rejecting sites fixed by the consensus of Jewish, Sam., and Gr.-Christian tradition. Before the first crusade (A.D. 1099) the Greek Church divided the country into three provinces, Palestina Prima, Palestina Secunda (Galilee and East of Jordan), and Palestina Tertia in the south, including S.E. Palestine and the southern desert—all under the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem. The crusaders had four metropolitans (at Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Tyre, and Nazareth) under the Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem until A.D. 1187. Under the Romans and Byzantines the boundaries of the country were guarded by Legions and native auxiliaries, established at centres like Bostra (Busrah) on the edge of the Syrian desert, and at Sinai, with posts along the plains of Moab and Damascus. The tombstones of Roman officers are commonly found in these regions with Greek (and sometimes Latin) inscriptions. The crusaders divided all Palestine (except Bashan, which was never conquered) into fifteen baronies and fiefs under the king of Jerusalem in the 12th cent. The treaty of Richard I. and Saladin (A.D. 1192) left to the Christians all the plains of Philistia and Sharon, with Galilee and Tyre, and many new fortresses were built in these regions early in the 13th century. The last region left to the Christians, after the conquest of Bibars, consisted, about A.D. 1282, of Carmel, the plains of Acre, and the hills east of Tyre, all finally lost in 1291 on the fall of Acre. Moslem accounts of Palestine are slight and, as a rule, late, excepting the geography of El Mukaddasi, which throws light on the condition of the country before the first crusade. A considerable Christian population continued to exist under the Moslems during the centuries following Omar's conquest, and was found in the country by the crusaders. Soldiers from the west of Europe had already been planted in Palestine by the Romans in the 2nd cent., and a large population of European settlers occupied the land in the 12th; but after the 13th this element was represented till recently only by Italian traders on the coast, and by monks at Nazareth, Carmel, Jerusalem, and Bethlehem. During the last twenty years the immigration of Circassians (in Bashan), of Bosnians (at Cæsarea on the coast), and of Jews at Jerusalem, with colonies near Jaffa, on Carmel, in Galilee, and in Bashan, are the most remarkable changes in the population of the country. Our knowledge of Palestine under the Franks, in the 12th and 13th cents., is singularly minute, and the remains of their churches and castles are among the most conspicuous ruins in the country; but their influence on the native race and language seems to have been very small. Modern Palestine under the Turks is divided into four provinces,—that of Jerusalem, that of Nâblus (Shechem), to which the Belka or 'empty land' (in Moab and Gilead) is attached, and that of Acre. Bashan is directly under the ruler of the capital at Damascus. The country still possesses fine cornlands, especially in Sharon, Lower Galilee, and Bashan; its hills are covered with vines, especially on Hermon and round Hebron; and large groves of olives cover the lower foot hills. Most of its ancient towns are now either villages of huts built of mud in the plains and of stone in the hills, or they are ruins. The only city is Damascus (250,000 inhabitants), and the chief towns are Jerusalem (perhaps 60,000), Hebron (10,000), Gaza (18,000), Jaffa (7000), Bethlehem (5000), Nâblus (15,000), Jenîn (3000), Nazareth (6000), Tiberias (2000), Accho (Acre, 8000), and Tyre (3000); but these are only estimates based on local information, and the numbers constantly vary, the Moslem population and the Samaritans at Nâblus (140 souls) tending to decrease, while the Jewish, Greek, German, and Maronite-Christian elements tend to increase, in numbers and in prosperity.

vi. ANTIQUITIES. — At a time approximately dated B.C. 2800, the Akkadians from the lower Tigris were sending ships to Sinai for granite (Tell-loh inscriptions of Gudea), and cutting cedars in Amanus (Amalum), and it is not improbable that they entered Palestine as did Amraphel (Khammurabi) and Arioch (Eriaku), who raided (Gn 14^{5-7}) through Bashan, Moab, and Edom to Kadesh-barnea, returning by En-gedi up the Jordan Valley to Dan, and to the land of Hobah north of Damascus. The date of the participators in this alleged early Chaldæan raid may possibly be fixed by the cuneiform tablets c. B.C. 2300 (see above, p. 647[b]). During the same period the Men or Minyans (Jer 51^{27}, but see KAT[2] ad loc.) were ruling in Lower Egypt, and are said in Egyp. records (see Brugsch, i. 234) to have come from Assyria and from east of Syria, probably from near Lake Van. Their language, like the Akkadian, appears (Tel el-Amarna tablets, No. 24, Berlin) to have been Mongolic, and they adored Set, a deity worshipped by the Hittites, to whom they were probably akin. It is not impossible, therefore (but see above, p. 646[a]), that at this early period a Hittite tribe may have been established among the Amorites in the south at Hebron (Gn 23), though in the later times of the Heb. conquest and in Solomon's age (Jos 1^{4}, 1 K 4^{29}) the Hittites are confined to North Syria. In the lowest strata of the mound at Lachish pottery as well as flint instruments occur, which may belong to this period, and with these a signet which appears to have on it both Egyptian and Hittite hieroglyphics. To this early period may also be attributed the rude stone monuments, which are numerous in Moab, and which also occur near the Jabbok, at Rabbath-ammon, and near Sûf in Northern Gilead, as well as in the Jaulân. There are three or four examples in Upper Galilee, and a group west of Tell el-Ḳâdi (Dan), but none are known in Western Palestine south of the Sea of Galilee. These monuments resemble those of our own islands, including monumental pillars (maṣṣēbôth of the Hebrew), circles of village enclosure stones (ḥăzērîm, Arab. hadhr), and tables supported on upright or flat stones, such as are called cromlechs or dolmens in Britain. The Moabite examples of the latter class of monuments cannot have been sepulchral, and were never covered over with mounds like the tomb-chambers of Europe. They can only (in many instances) have served as tables, probably as altars, and they have often 'cup hollows' in the top stone, fitted for libations, such as are still poured into similar cup hollows in the north of Europe. The distribution of these monuments is remarkable, since they have disappeared from the regions in which Hezekiah and Josiah (2 K 18^4 $23^{4\text{-}20}$) destroyed the Canaanite altars and pillars, surviving only in regions beyond the influence of the kings of Judah. They occur on Nebo (cf. Nu 23^{14}), and at Dan, both of which were centres of idolatrous worship.

The monumental history of Palestine from Egyp. sources begins about B.C. 1700 (Brugsch's date), before which time the foreign kings of the Delta (Minyans or Hyksos) were in communication with 'the north.' Ahmes, first of the new native dynasty from Thebes (the 18th), drove the Asiatics from the Delta, and pursued them to Sharuhen (Tell esh-Sheri'ah) on the borders of Palestine. Thothmes I. marched into Palestine and Syria, and beyond the Euphrates, about B.C. 1633; and a generation later Thothmes III. won a great victory at Megiddo in Central Palestine, defeating a league of Canaanites and Hittites, and pursuing his conquests through Phœnicia by Aradus and Tunep, and beyond the Euphrates. The list of cities conquered in Palestine, about B.C. 1600, includes those of Philistia, Lower Galilee, and Bashan, as far as Ashtaroth and Damascus; but none appear to be mentioned in Samaria or Upper Judæa, or in Gilead or Moab. The Egyp. chariots could not enter these rugged mountains. Among the 119 towns in Palestine mentioned on this valuable list at Karnak (first published by Mariette) the following cities noticed in the Bible are found in the order here given:—Megiddo, Gaza, Dothan, Rabbith, Kartan, Damascus, Edrei, Abila (of Bashan), Hammath, Madon, Lasharon, Ashtaroth, Maachah, Laish, Hazor, Adami, Kishion, Shunem, Misheal, Achshaph, Taanach, Ibleam, Anem, Kadesh (of Issachar), Anaharath, Nekeb, Joppa, Lod, Ono, Shochoh (near Adullam), Naamah, Saphir, Rakkon, Gerar, Aroer (of Simeon), Lebaoth, Rehoboth, Adoraim, Anim, Gezer, Rabbath, Zorah, Anem, En-gannim (of Judah), Gibeah (of Judah), and Zephathah. These cities therefore all bore their biblical names in B.C. 1600, before the Exodus, and the list has the highest value for critical purposes. The civilization of the Canaanites at this period as described in the spoil lists of Thothmes III. is most remarkable. All the precious metals were in use; art objects from Phœnicia and Assyria were imported; ivory was used for inlaying; chariots were plated with gold and silver, or painted; armour of bronze, and iron weapons are noticed with flint axes. Thrones, footstools, and sceptres, of precious wood, were adorned with gold and ivory; tables were set with gems; and tents had pillars of iron and of gold. The cities had walls, and fine harvests of wheat and barley were reaped, while horses and flocks were captured by the Egyptians. Statues with heads of gold are also mentioned. Wine, oil, honey, balm, and fruits were presented. Even the ploughs seem to have been adorned with gold; and cedar wood was commonly used. Ships laden with timber and corn were sailing on the Mediterranean (cf. Gn 49^{13}, Nu 24^{24}), and often carried slaves from the north. In the time of Thothmes IV. further expeditions were made against the Hittites, now driven from Palestine to Ḳadesh on the Orontes. These conquests were maintained during the greater part of the long and prosperous reign of Amenophis III. (about B.C. 1500 to 1464).

The Egyptian monuments do not mention any Exodus, though Thothmes IV. is said to have driven out the Asiatics. The notices of the place Rameses (Gn 47^{11}, Ex 1^{11} *) do not serve to fix any date for such an event, and our only sources of information (see Jg 11^{26}, 1 K 6^1) point to the 15th cent. B.C. as that during which the conquest of Palestine by the Hebrews was effected. In the ruins of Lachish the seal of Teie, the Armenian queen of Amenophis III., is found, showing intercourse with Egypt about B.C. 1500; and the Egyptians were in constant intercourse with Babylon, Assyria, and Armenia at this time, the royal houses being allied by marriages from the time of Thothmes IV. A curious cuneiform tablet, sealed with a Bab. cylinder signet (Tel el-Amarna), is addressed to 'all the kings of Canaan, servants of my brother, the king of Egypt,' and served as a passport for an envoy. The great collections of 300 cuneiform tablets, found in 1887 at Tel el-Amarna (between Memphis and Thebes), contain letters to Amenophis III. and Amenophis IV. from the kings of Babylon, Assyria, and Armenia, from princes in Asia Minor, and (in about 200 instances) from chiefs of the Hittites, Amorites, Phœnicians, and Philistines, who ruled as subjects of the Pharaoh, assisted by Egyp. residents in the chief towns of the Syrian and Palestine plains, and guarded by forces of chariots. But towards the end of the reign of Amenophis III. revolutions occurred, which destroyed the Egyp. domination. The Canaanites sought alliance with Babylon, but this was refused. The Hittites and Cassites attacked Damascus, and overran Bashan. The Amorites made war on the Phœnicians, and besieged Tyre. The Egyp. forces were defeated and withdrawn from the north and from Jerusalem, and the king of that city wrote to Egypt to complain of the entire destruction of 'all the rulers,' which followed, and which was due to the conquests of a people called the Ḥabiri or 'Abiri. They are said to have come from Seir to Jerusalem, and to have fought at Aijalon, and subdued Gezer, Ashkelon, Zorah, Lachish, Keilah, and other cities. The date coincides with that of the Heb. conquest according to the OT notices, and it appears probable that (as Zimmern has proposed) the Ḥabiri are to be identified with the Hebrews.

In the reign of Amenophis IV. communication with the north was (according to these tablets) much interrupted, and about B.C. 1400 the 18th dynasty was overthrown. Seti I., a generation later, began to attempt the reconquest of the lost empire when the 19th dynasty had arisen. He penetrated to Kanana (Kana'an) near Hebron, and into the land of Zahi, famous for its wine and corn, and thought to have lain in the south of Pal., near which apparently lived the Anaugas (perhaps Anakim). Seti also fought a battle at Inuamu, perhaps Jamnia, and his famous successor, Ramses II., besieged and took Ashkelon, and the towns of Shalama, Maroma (Meirûn), Ain Anamim ('Ainatha), Dapur (Debûrieh), and Kalopu (perhaps Shalabûn), in Upper and Lower Galilee. He pursued his conquests into Phœnicia, and, after taking Ḳadesh, entered into treaty with the Hittites, who had become independent, and marched to the Euphrates and to Ephesus. This period of conquest in Galilee seems to have coincided chronologically with the oppression of Israel under Jabin II., king of Hazor, whose 'captain' (sar), with a force of iron chariots (Jg 4^2), bears a name not apparently Semitic, but easily explained as Egyp., viz. Sisera, i.e. Ses-Ra, 'the servant of Ra.' The conquests of Ramses II. were lost about B.C. 1300 by Merenptah, who was attacked in Egypt by tribes from the north, and after his time Arisu (Hareth), a Phœnician, ruled in the Delta. The power of Egypt steadily declined, and about B.C. 1200 Ramses III. was attacked by northern tribes, coming both by sea and by land to Egypt. Among those enumerated are the Danau or Greeks, and the Pulesta, thought to be the Philistines.

Early Assyr. invasions occurred (see ARAM) about this period; and in B.C. 1150 Assur-risisi set up a monument at Beirut, and about 1120 Tiglath-pileser I. entered the Lebanon. An Assyr. king was also buried at Abydos in the time of Ramses XIV., and may have passed through Palestine. But, after the death of Solomon, Shishak (B.C. 966–933) invaded Palestine, and took 133 cities, among which Jerusalem is perhaps mentioned last (Maspero). The only monument of this later age is the famous Moabite Stone, found at Dhibân, which records the revolt of Moab in the 9th cent. B.C., during the reign of Ahab (cf. 2 K 3^{4-27}). But the power of the Assyrians in Palestine was not severely felt until the time of Tiglath-pileser III., who conquered Damascus in B.C. 732. Prior to this event Menahem of Israel and Ahaz of Judah brought tribute, as Jehu had done in the 9th cent. The fall of the Syrian power beyond Jordan was followed by the capture of Samaria in B.C. 722 by Sargon. The advance to Ashdod followed eleven years later, and the attack on Jerusalem by Sennacherib, in B.C. 701, failed in consequence of the success of Tirhakah, the Ethiopian king of Egypt, after his defeat near Joppa. Sennacherib 'dwelt at Nineveh' (2 K 19^{36}) till his death twenty years later, and Judah was saved for a century. The great inscription of Sennacherib attests the wealth of Hezekiah, and mentions his ivory throne. The Siloam inscription, belonging to this age, not only gives us the characters then in use,—closely like the Phœnician,—but also shows us that the language of Judah was the pure Heb. in which the earlier books of the OT are written. Sennacherib speaks of 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver given as tribute by Hezekiah, with precious woods, gems, eunuchs of the palace, horses, mules, asses, camels, oxen, and sheep. Forty-six fortresses were besieged with battering-rams in Judæa. Manasseh is again noticed as tributary to Esarhaddon, who rebuilt Babylon (cf. 2 Ch 33^{11}) and conquered Egypt. Very few Palestine antiquities are as yet recovered previous to the time of Nebuchadnezzar (B.C. 600), excepting those noticed above. At Samaria a Heb. quarter-shekel weight* has been found (about 40 grains), and in the ruins of Lachish clay images, with pottery and seals. Certain inscribed seals from Jerusalem and Northern Palestine bear Hebrew personal names compounded with the sacred name Jah, which occurs on the Moabite Stone, and also early in Assyria and Syria. The Siloam aqueduct, and probably many rock-cut tombs of the old Phœnician character, date from this period.

After the Captivity we possess silver shekel coins (worth about 2s. 8d.), adorned with the pomegranate, which appear to be earlier than the 2nd or 3rd cent. B.C.; and the great inscription of Eshmunazar (probably of the 3rd cent. B.C.) shows that Sharon was ruled by the Sidonian kings under the Ptolemies, while dated texts of the same period attest the worship of Baal near Tyre. The Greek influence which began to affect Palestine after the conquest by Alexander the Great is witnessed by the ruins of Tyrus in Gilead, where the palace of the priest Hyrcanus (built in B.C. 176) is adorned with gigantic figures of lions, and with semi-Gr. semi-Egyp. pillars and cornices. To the 2nd cent. B.C. belong the coins of the Hasmonæan kings, inscribed in the later Heb. character, and also (from the time of Alexander Jannæus) in Greek. The Gr. masonry (like that of the Acropolis), with drafted margins to the stones, is found at Tyrus and in Phœnicia, and continued in use in the time of Herod the Great. About the Christian era the Gr. tomb also began to supersede the earlier Heb. tomb with kokim or tunnel graves, and the adornment of the façades was executed in a peculiar native style, much influenced by Greek ideas, the best examples of which occur near Jerusalem.

The second century of the Christian era was a great building period in Palestine. Roman cities like Gadara and Gerasa sprang up, and the temple of Baalbek was built. Numerous family mausolea —towers containing sarcophagi—were erected, esp. in Bashan and Gilead, and Gr. inscriptions prove that they were built in the lifetime of the owner. Bashan presents us with hundreds of Gr. texts of this age, dating from the time of Herod onwards, and witnessing to the existence of a mingled Arab-Gr. population, adoring Arab and Gr. gods. The synagogues of Upper Galilee (to which probably others on Carmel and at Shiloh may be added) are equally influenced by Gr. art, though in some cases giving square Heb. inscriptions. The most notable examples occur at Chorazin, Tell Hûm, Irbid, and in the mountains of Naphtali. Roman roads, with milestones inscribed in Gr. and in Latin, belong to the same period (esp. under the Antonines, A.D. 140 to 180); and at Gerasa we find a very perfect example of a Roman city, with its streets of columns, forum, theatres, naumachia basin, triumphal arch, baths, judgment basilica, and temples. To the 2nd and 3rd cents. A.D. belong also the Jewish and Christian osteophagi (or bone boxes) found on Olivet with Gr. and Heb. texts, and the tombstones of the old Jewish cemetery at Jaffa. The tomb of Eleazar bar Zachariah (A.D. 135) bearing his name has perhaps been found on Carmel, and that of a descendant of Rabbi Tarphon at Jaffa.

The Palestine ruins of the Byzantine period (4th to 7th cent.) are extremely numerous, including fortifications, churches, chapels, and monasteries in all parts of the country. Gr.-Christian texts are commonly found. The Gr. tomb continued in general use, and copper coins of the later emperors are found in great numbers. The remains of the Arab period before the crusades (especially the mosques at Jerusalem, Damascus, and 'Ammân) are less numerous. A text from Harrân (south-east of Damascus) proves the use of the Kufic character in Palestine before the time of Omar. The Norman buildings of the 12th and 13th cents. represent a new and foreign element in architecture, and to this age belong many coins, seals, inscribed tombstones, glass mosaics, and frescoes, with other art objects. The latest important architectural remains are found in the mosques built by the great Egyp. rulers of the 13th and 14th cents. Modern additions to the architecture include the Latin monasteries at Jerusalem, Nazareth, Bethlehem, Carmel, etc., with smaller Greek monasteries, and Protestant churches and orphanages at Jerusalem, Nazareth, etc. The real antiquities of Palestine are, however, for the most part hidden in the great mounds which mark the sites of ancient cities such as Ashkelon, Megiddo, Lachish, Cæsarea, etc., which require further excavation.

* The old Jerusalem shekel, according to Maimonides, weighed about 320 grains, but the Galilæan shekel was half the weight of the Jerusalem shekel. The weight has on it the words reba' nezep, 'quarter of half' (Clermont-Ganneau), and reba' she-l for 'quarter shekel' (Robertson Smith). See the discussion by the latter in the Academy, 18th Nov. 1893, p. 443 ff., or PEFSt, July 1894, p. 225 ff. The weight agrees with that of the quarter of a Galilæan shekel. After the Captivity the shekel weighed only 220 grains (see also PEFSt, July and Oct. 1899 and Jan. 1900, for further papers on the metrology). A specimen, apparently of the full nezep, weighing 156 grs., has recently been found by Bliss at Tell Zakarîya (PEFSt, July 1899, p. 207 f.).

LITERATURE.—The Bibliography of Palestine occupies a stout volume recently published by Herr Rohricht, but the number of standard works necessary for the student is not large. Reland's Palæstina Illustrata is still valuable, and Robinson's Biblical Researches form an invaluable storehouse of literary notices. The results of exploration are found in the publications of the Palestine Exploration Fund (1865–1900), and esp. in the Memoirs of the Survey, including seven quarto volumes illustrated. Three of these treat of Western Palestine, one of Moab, one of Jerusalem, one contains Special Papers, and the last gives the Arab nomenclature. Three volumes are added on the Natural History, Botany, and Geology, and two more are to follow on the Archæological discoveries of M. Clermont-Ganneau. To these must be added the maps (1 inch to the mile), with those on a smaller scale which give the results as bearing on ancient geography. The Egyp. records relating to Palestine will be found in Brugsch's History of Egypt, and in Chabas' Voyage d'un Egyptien, see also W. M. Müller, Asien u. Europa; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, Struggle of the Nations, and parts of Hogarth's Authority and Archæology; the spelling of the names is given in hieroglyphic types in Pierret's Dictionary. The Tel el-Amarna tablets are published in facsimile (Thontafelfund von el Amarna) by Winckler and trd by him in vol. v. of KIB (see also Petrie's Syria and Egypt from the Tell el Amarna Letters, and Conder's Tell Amarna Tablets, 2nd ed.). The Assyr. records are tr. in RP, and (better) in KIB i.–iii., and in Schrader's valuable work on the Cuneif. Inscript. and OT. The early Christian and Moslem accounts are treated in the publications of the Palestine Pilgrim Texts Society. The Greek inscriptions were collected by Waddington and de Vogüé (Inscriptions Grecques et Latines de la Syrie), and to the latter we owe valuable works on Jerusalem and on the churches of the crusaders. The history of the various scripts is given by Isaac Taylor (The Alphabet), and the coinage is treated by Madden (Coins of the Jews). The Talmudic geography is detailed by Neubauer (Géographie du Talmud), and the Arab geographies by Guy le Strange (Pal. under the Moslems); while the most important works treating of the crusaders include Bongars' Gesta Dei, the History by William of Tyre, the valuable Regesta Regni Hierosolymitani by Herr Röhricht, and Rey's Colonies Franques de la Syrie. Many other publications might be added to this list of leading works, such as the publications of the German Palestine Society, the works of de Saulcy, Guérin, and others, and scattered papers, given by the Biblical Archæological Society and other antiquarian societies. Popular works on the country are not included in this list. The features of the country may be best understood from the large model by Mr. G. Armstrong published by the Palestine Exploration Fund. The topographical questions and antiquities are treated in G. A. Smith's HGHL; Baedeker, Pal. (last ed.); Nowack, Heb. Arch.; Benzinger, do.; see also Conder's Handbook to the Bible. Important details may also be studied in the British Museum catalogues; and M. Maspero's studies of the geographical lists of Thothmes III. and Shishak have been published in the Transactions of the Victoria Institute (for Thothmes, 1886, p. 277 ff., 1888, p. 63 ff.; for Shishak, 1894, p. 63 ff.), which, together with those of the Royal Asiatic Society, contain other papers bearing on Palestine; cf. also parts of Sayce's Patriarchal Palestine. The Mediæval Samaritan Topography is to be found in Juynboll's Samaritan Book of Joshua, and in Neubauer's Samaritan Chronicle, to which Nutt's Samaritans may be added as of value. Recent researches have so entirely changed the basis on which Palestine antiquities are now studied, that the traditional Christian topography has ceased to be regarded as of primary importance, and many works founded on this information have become obsolete. Outside the Bible the most important ancient work bearing on the tradition of the country, about the Christian era, continues to be that of Josephus; but his text is so corrupt, and his statements of distance and area are so discordant, that it is impossible to rely on his accuracy in these details.

C. R. CONDER.

PALLU (פַּלּוּא; Φαλλούς, Φαλλούδ). —One of the sons of Reuben, Gn 46[9], Ex 6[14], Nu 26[5. 8], 1 Ch 5[3]. The patronymic Palluites (הַפַּלְּאִי, Φαλλουεί) occurs in Nu 26[5]. We should probably read Pallu for PELETH (wh. see) in Nu 16[1].

PALM (OF THE HAND).—The Heb. word כַּף kaph (from כָּפַף to be bent, bowed), signifies the hand as bent or hollow, the palm in readiness for holding or grasping, and it is used with great freedom in OT. Pharaoh's cup is set upon the palm of his hand (Gn 40[11. 21]); the widow of Zarephath had 'but a palmful of meal' (1 K 17[12]); the palms are clapped in applause (2 K 11[12]) or in derision (Nu 24[10]); men seize with the palm (Ezk 29[7]), and smite their palms together in hand-grasp (Pr 6[1]); the palms are spread out in prayer (Ex 9[29. 33]); it is by the toil of the palms that men earn their bread (Gn 31[42]); and to be in one's palm is the Heb. expression for to be in one's power. The Eng. idiom uses 'hand' in almost all these places. Indeed 'palm' never occurs in AV except when followed by 'of the hand' (Lv 14[15], 1 S 5[4], 2 K 9[35], Is 49[16], Dn 10[10]). In Dn 5[5. 24] 'part' (AV and RV) should be 'palm.'

In Sir 18[3] God is said to govern the world with the palm of His hand (ἐν σπιθαμῇ χειρὸς αὐτοῦ, lit. 'with the span of his hand,' cf. Is 40[12]). The Geneva and Bishops' Bibles have 'with the power of his hand'; other VSS, including RV, omit, following a better text.

The palm of the hand is thrice mentioned in NT. In Mt 26[67] it is said that 'others smote him with the palms of their hands'; the Gr. is simply οἱ δὲ ἐρράπισαν (edd. ἐράπισαν). The only other occurrence of ῥαπίζειν in NT is Mt 5[39] ὅστις σε ῥαπίζει εἰς τὴν δεξιὰν σιαγόνα [σου], 'whosoever shall smite thee (RV 'smiteth thee') on thy right cheek,' where the smiting is clearly with the palm of the hand. And, as Swete (on Mk 14[65]) points out, in two at least of the three LXX instances of ῥαπίζειν, the reference is to a blow on the face by the hand of another (Hos 11[4], 1 Es 4[30]). Field (Otium Norv.[2] on Jn 18[22]) quotes, further, a clear example from Josephus (Ant. VIII. xv. 4), who represents Zedekiah as saying, before he struck Micaiah on the cheek, 'If he be a true prophet, as soon as he is struck by me, let him disable my hand' (εὐθὺς ῥαπισθεὶς ὑπ' ἐμοῦ βλαψάτω μου τὴν χεῖρα); and he decides, after examining the use of the word in classical writers, that ῥαπίζειν (though from ῥάπις, a rod) is not used as equivalent to ῥαβδίζειν, 'to strike with a rod,' later than Herodotus. RV therefore need scarcely have repeated the AV margin 'or with rods.' In Mk 14[65] (ῥαπίσμασιν αὐτὸν ἔβαλλον [but edd. after best MSS ἔλαβον, on which see Swete, in loc.]) and in Jn 18[22] (ἔδωκε ῥάπισμα τῷ Ἰησοῦ) we have the subst. ῥάπισμα, of which the meaning is determined by the meaning of ῥαπίζω: it means a stroke with the palm of the hand. RV has in Mk 'received him with blows of their hands,' with marg. 'or strokes of rods'; and in Jn 'struck Jesus with his hand,' with marg. 'or with a rod.' The margins are to be rejected on the ground of congruity as well as the use of the word.

PALM TREE (תָּמָר tāmār, in Jg 4[5] and Jer 10[5] תֹּמֶר; φοίνιξ, palma).—The palm is indigenous in tropical and subtropical climates. It is the tree par excellence of Egypt and Nubia. It flourishes, however, in the maritime plain of Pal. and Syria, as far north as Beirût and Tripoli. Beyond this it exists, even as far as Smyrna. It grew formerly in abundance in the Jordan Valley, and would do so now if planted. Although a few trees grow in sunny places on the lower mountains, they do not usually bear fruit at an altitude above 1000 ft. The palm of Scripture is Phœnix dactylifera, L., of the Order Palmeæ. It is an endogenous tree; the trunk, composed of interlacing fibres, is very light, but exceedingly flexible and strong. A palm tree sways to and fro in the wind with inexpressible gracefulness, but seldom breaks, even in the fiercest gales. Its trunk grows by additions from above, not increasing in thickness after it has once become fairly established. Indeed, by the wearing off of the stumps of the leaves, it becomes more slender as it increases in height. This tall, slender, flexible trunk springs from an immense tuber, a little below the surface of the ground. From the lower surface of this tuber descend cord-like white roots, which spread laterally about as much as the diameter of the head of leaves, and downward for 6–8 ft. or more. These give off coarse fibres, which absorb the moisture from the soil. From the upper aspect of the tuber, and the lower part of the trunk, spring true branches. If not cut off, they will grow and produce the effect of a clump of several trees. Such clumps are the usual form of growth in the desert, or in neglected places. But branches very seldom grow at any considerable height above the ground. The palm 'branches' (called technically כַּפֹּת in Lv 23[40] [see Driver's note in PB], 'palms' [of the hand], from their shape [cf. כַּף Is 9[14] 19[15], Job 15[32]]) do not refer to these, but to the fronds, which form a hemispherical or nearly spherical dome, which waves and tosses often at a height of 50–100 ft. The fronds themselves are 6–12 ft. or more in length, with a stiff midrib, and pinnæ half folded lengthwise, ending in a prickly tip. The lowermost of these fronds are deflexed, the middle horizontal, and the uppermost erect. From the terminal bud arise the spathes, which enclose the flowers. The staminate flowers are on one tree and the pistillate on another. As soon as they have shed their pollen, the staminate flowers wither and drop off. But the clusters of dates on the fertile tree grow more beautiful as they curve more and more outward and downward on their long yellow or red stalks, and the ripening dates turn from green to yellow or red, and sometimes to a rich maroon colour or almost black. The fruit is gathered by a man who climbs the tall slender trunk, cuts the great clusters, places them in a basket, and lowers them to the ground.

The Scripture allusions to the palm tree are numerous. Its evergreen foliage and wealth of delicious fruit are compared with the righteous (Ps 92[12]), its tall, graceful stature and mien with the loveliest of women (Ca 7[7]). Immediately after the latter allusion there is another to the mode of gathering the fruit: 'I will go up to the palm tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof' (v.[8]). The boughs here are the graceful stalks of the date clusters, often 4–6 ft. long, loaded with their tempting fruit, under the dome of leaves. The upright port of the palm is noticed (Jer 10[5]). The withering of this tree is mentioned with that of the vine, fig, pomegranate, apple, and other trees, as a sign of the desolation of the land (Jl 1[12]). Sculptured and carved palm trees were used for architectural decoration (1 K 6[29], Ezk 41[19] etc.). Fronds were used for booths (Lv 23[40]). They were also used in token of triumph (Jn 12[13], Rev 7[9]).

The palm gave its name to Phœnicia and to Phœnix in Crete. Jericho was the 'city of palm trees' (Dt 34[3], Jg 1[16] 3[13], 2 Ch 28[15]). They existed in great numbers there in the time of Christ. A few wild ones exist now in the Jordan Valley. Perhaps the fronds used in Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem came from that region. Hazazon-tamar (Gn 14[7], 2 Ch 20[2]) possibly means 'the felling of the palm tree.' Palms must have been abundant in En-gedi (Sir 24[14]), a fact confirmed by Josephus and Pliny. Baal-tamar (Jg 20[33]) and Deborah's palm tree (Jg 4[5]), in the hill-country of Benjamin, were probably isolated trees —perhaps, according to Stanley, the same tree. As above said, palms were never common in the upper hills. This would make a single tree in such a situation a landmark. There are still a few in the hills of Pal. and Lebanon. Tamar in the south of Judæa (Ezk 47[19] 48[28]) must have been within the wilderness of the wanderings. Robinson (BRP[2] i. 198, 202) places it at el-Milh. Tadmor (2 Ch 8[4]) is a corruption of (or a mistake for) Tamar. It was noted for its palm trees. None now remain. Bethany is derived by some from בֵּית־תְּאֵנִים = house of dates, while others derive it from בֵּית־עֲנִיָּה = house of sorrow. The improbability of dates being produced in quantities sufficient to give their name to a place, inclines us to think that the latter is the more correct etymology. Three women are named Tamar (Gn 38[6], 2 S 13[1] 14[27]). See TAMAR.

Dates are a staple article of food among the Bedawîn of Sinai and elsewhere. A seedless palm tree flourishes in the Convent of Mar Sâba. Fine groves of palm trees are found in all the oases. The dates are dried separately, not compressed into cakes. For their weight, they contain a very large proportion of nutritious matter. A handful of them lasts an Arab a day or two. Date brandy is made in the Convent of St. Catherine in Sinai, and elsewhere. Date honey, called dibs, is also made. Though there is no unmistakable allusion to the use of dates as food in the Bible, there can be no doubt that they were so employed. No mention is made of the use of palm wood in building. In modern times it is used only for gate-posts and rafters. The midribs of the fronds are used in making crates for fruit and coops for fowls.

PALMER-WORM (גָּזָם, gāzām, κάμπη, eruca).—In the article on LOCUST, 6, we have pointed out the uncertainty as to the identification of the creatures referred to in Jl 1[4] 2[25], Am 4[9]. Bochart and his followers suppose them to be stages in the growth of the locust. The Oxf. Heb. Lex. agrees with him. The root גָּזַם = Arab. jazam, signifies 'to cut off.' This would apply to any destroying larva. We have further pointed out (LOCUST, 9) that the ḥāṣîl (AV and RV 'caterpillar') is probably, as in RVm, a stage of the locust. There are numerous larvæ of moths and butterflies which infest plants in Pal. and Syria, but none which amount to a pest, or do any damage comparable to that inflicted by the successive stages of the locust. The Eng. palmer-worm is an old name for the caterpillar, which is so called either from its wandering about like a pilgrim, or (more probably) from its resemblance to the palm, provincial Eng. for the catkin of a willow.

PALSY.—From Gr. παράλυσις (παρά and λύω 'to loosen') came Lat. paralysis, whence Fr. paralysie. In Old Fr. there were several forms, of which paralasie and palasie are typical. In Middle Eng. also the longer and shorter forms were in use with a great variety of spelling, paralisie, parlesi, palasie,* palasye,† palesie,* palsey, palsye, etc. Thus 'paralysis' and 'palsy' are doublets. The former gradually dropped out of common use, and does not occur in AV; but now it is supplanting the latter, except in echoes of biblical language.

The subst. παράλυσις is used only once (Ezk 21[10 (15)]) in LXX. It is not used in NT; 'palsy' is the tr. of either the adj. παραλυτικός or the verb παραλύομαι, generally in the form 'sick of the palsy.' When the Greek is the verb (Lk 5[18. 24], Ac 8[7] 9[33]) RV translates by the Old Eng. verb 'to palsy,' which is not used in AV, but occurs twice in Shaks. Coriol. v. ii. 46, and Meas. for Meas. III. i. 36—

> 'All thy blessed youth
> Becomes as aged, and doth beg the alms
> Of palsied eld';

and is still in poetic use. For palsy or paralysis see under MEDICINE, p. 326.

* These two forms are found in Wyclif's version.

† As in Chaucer, Rom. of Rose, A 1098—

> 'The mordaunt, wought in noble wyse,
> Was of a stoon ful precious,
> That was so fyn and vertuous,
> That hool a man it coude make
> Of palasye, and of tooth-ake.'

PALTI (פַּלְטִי, Φαλτ(ε)ί).—1. One of the twelve men sent by Moses to spy out the land, Nu 13[9]. He was the representative of the tribe of Benjamin. 2. The man to whom Michal, David's wife, was given by Saul, 1 S 25[44] See MICHAL, MARRIAGE, p. 274[b]. In 2 S 3[15] he is called Paltiel. See following article under No. 2. J. A. SELBIE.

PALTIEL (פַּלְטִיאֵל Φαλτ(ε)ιήλ).—1. The prince of Issachar, one of those appointed to divide the land, Nu 34[26]. 2. 2 S 3[15], the same as Palti of 1 S 25[44]. It is uncertain which is the original form. Paltiel is quite in place in P's list of names in Nu 34, but is less so in 2 S 3[15], where moreover Palti has the support of the Syr. and Arab. versions (see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 204, 310). Löhr, on the other hand, takes Palti to be a shortened form of Paltiel 'my refuge is El.' J. A. SELBIE.

PALTITE, THE (הַפַּלְטִי; B ὁ Κελωθελ, A ὁ Φελλωνελ; Vulg. de Phalti).—A native of Beth-pelet in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15[27], Neh 11[26]). To this town belonged Helez, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23[26]). In the parallel lists (1 Ch 11[27] 27[10]) Helez is described as 'the Pelonite' (הַפְּלוֹנִי), a variation which is supported by the reading of the LXX (A) in 2 S. Probably, however, 'the Pelonite' of the Chronicler is due to a scribal error, and 'the Paltite' of the MT (cf. Pesh. ܦܠܛܝ?

ܦܠܘܢܝ) is to be retained. See PELONITE.

PAMPHYLIA (Παμφυλία) was a country on the south coast of Asia, having Lycia to the west and Cilicia Tracheia (called in later times Isauria) on the east. In the earlier and classical usage, Pamphylia included only the narrow strip of flat, low-lying ground between the sea and the lofty front ridge of the broad belt of mountains called Taurus, which stretches from east to west along the southern edge of the great central plateau of Asia Minor. The Pamphylian coast-lands were entirely dominated by Mount Taurus, which forms a singularly grand and impressive feature as one sails along the coast or approaches it from the sea. On the west frontier and on the east, in the borderlands of Lycia and Tracheiotic Cilicia, Taurus approaches very close to the sea, and in some places actually rises straight out of the water with hardly room for a road to pass between the mountain wall and the sea. But the Pamphylian strip of land is in some places as much as 15 to 20 miles broad, and its length from east to west was estimated by Strabo at 640 stadia or 80 miles.

The Taurus ridge along almost its whole front presents an exceedingly steep and lofty face towards the south; and hence the ascent from the level plain of Pamphylia up the ridge of Taurus is very steep. In one place the road that ascends the precipitous face of Taurus was called Klimax, the Ladder; and it is still correctly described by that name, for the road ascends literally by a series of broad steps for more than 2000 ft. On reaching the summit there is no corresponding descent on the northern side; but the traveller finds himself on a high-lying ground, containing many large open valleys as well as narrower glens, and many mountains and hills. This high ground is distinguished in the most marked way from the low plain by the sea; and the classical nomenclature observed the distinction, Pamphylia being the name of the sea plain and Pisidia being the high country. In later time the name Pamphylia was extended over a considerable part of Pisidia owing to new political conditions, for in A.D. 74 the Romans made an enlarged province of Pamphylia, whose bounds reached north to the frontier of Asia and the lake Askania (see PISIDIA). But in the NT times Pamphylia had the old and narrower limits.

Though many paths across Taurus connect the Pamphylian cities with the country on the north side of the mountains, they are all so long and difficult that none of them has ever been an important route for trade. It was more convenient to send the produce of the southern plateau lands either westwards to the Ægean harbours (especially Ephesus) or by the Cilician Gates to Tarsus. Thus the Pamphylian harbours served as export and import stations only for the Pamphylian strip of coast-land and for the nearer Pisidian glens and valleys; and the Pamphylian cities never became especially important or wealthy, as they had a comparatively small country behind them. Still the land was rich enough to attract Greek colonies at an early period; the coinage of Side and Aspendos shows that they were half-Greek cities as early as the 5th cent. B.C.; and Sillyon appears as a partially Græcized city about 300 B.C. But the Greek language spoken in these Pamphylian cities was much corrupted, and in Side is said to have passed wholly out of use before the time of Alexander the Great. The coin-legends and inscriptions in dialects of Greek are sometimes hardly intelligible, owing to the peculiar character of the alphabet and of the words.

These facts prove that the Greek colonizing element in Pamphylia was not strong enough to maintain itself and to dominate the native element. It died out or melted into the native population. Even after the victories of Alexander the Great strengthened the Greek influence in Asia, Perga in Pamphylia, a purely native priestly centre, rose to importance, and struck a variety of coins. In opposition to it arose the Greek city Attalia, a Pergamenian foundation of the 2nd cent. Perhaps Ptolemais during the 3rd cent. marks a similar attempt to establish Greek influence under the protection of the Ptolemies; but the attribution of the coins ΠΤΟΛΕΜΑΙΕΩΝ to Pamphylia is far from certain, though it is quite natural that in the acme of Ptolemaic power the name may have been temporarily applied to some Pamphylian city, which was used as a centre of the authority of the Græco-Egyptian kings. But in the 2nd and 1st cents. B.C. the greatest and wealthiest city of Pamphylia was Side, whose rich coinage at this period is attributed by numismatists to its serving as the market where the pirates of Cilicia Tracheia disposed of their booty.

In these circumstances it was inevitable that the Greek, or rather Græco-Roman, element should be weak in Pamphylia in the period when Christianity first entered the country. It was not one of the more highly civilized regions, but rather one where the native Anatolian and Oriental character had proved stronger than the Western influence. This fact determined its history in the Christian period. In Pamphylia Christianity played a very small part during the early centuries. The new religion spread most in the more civilized and educated regions, and not in lands like Pamphylia.

Another feature of the country must have exercised a strong determining influence on its history. A flat plain little raised above sea-level,—sheltered by the lofty wall of Taurus from the cooling and invigorating northern breezes which make the climate of the central Anatolian plateau for the most part invigorating and temperate—with a soil always saturated with the waters that flow down from Taurus or rise in great springs at its feet, and therefore at once fertile and feverladen—with an atmosphere also heavy and saturated with the moisture from the soil and from the sea, moved only by fitful breezes setting from and to the sea,—Pamphylia was not a country likely to keep alive the vigour and energy of European colonists. Though the soil, being more thoroughly cultivated in ancient than in modern time, would not give forth the same malaria that gives the coast so infamous a reputation, yet the natural circumstances make it necessarily and always an enervating climate.

Christianity was brought to Pamphylia by Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey. This was the country which naturally came next within their sphere of work after Cyprus. Cilicia had already heard the word; and in their progress from Cyprus they must next proceed to Pamphylia. There seems no doubt that the plan of work for the missionaries, probably sketched out even before they started from Syrian Antioch (Ac 13[2]), must have contemplated the evangelization of Pamphylia next after Cyprus. Thither, then, the missionaries proceeded; but after they had reached the country there arose a difference of opinion, and John Mark left his companions and returned to Jerusalem, while the two apostles crossed Mount Taurus and reached Pisidian Antioch. It appears that they did not preach in Pamphylia at this time. The only reasonable interpretation of these circumstances is that the first intention had been to preach in Pamphylia (which, as we have seen, was the natural order of evangelization); and that all three concurred in that purpose: but, when the sphere of action was removed from Pamphylia to Pisidian Antioch, John Mark refused to acquiesce in the change of plan. Some time later, on their return, the apostles preached in Perga (though apparently with small success); and their action on that occasion proves that Pamphylia was included in their intended sphere of work. It seems irrational to suppose either that the plan of proceeding to Antioch was formed at Paphos, or that John acquiesced in that plan until he reached Pamphylia, and then abandoned the work (Ac 13).

As to the reason why the sphere of work had been changed from Pamphylia to Antioch, no information is given in Acts; but a plausible conjecture has been advanced that residence in the moist and enervating atmosphere of Pamphylia, coming after the fatigue of missionary travel and the intense effort of the scene in Paphos, brought out a certain weakness in St. Paul's constitution, causing the illness alluded to in Gal 4[13].

Christianity seems to have been slow and late in acquiring a strong footing in Pamphylia. When St. Peter wrote to the Churches in the provinces of Asia Minor, he sent no message to Pamphylia or to Lycia, which may fairly be taken as a proof that there was no body of Christians in those districts (his omission of Cilicia, where there was a body of Christians, arose from that district being classed along with Syria, and therefore being outside the range of the Epistle). On the extinction of Christianity in Pamphylia see PERGA.

A long succession of travellers have visited and described the Pamphylian country: by far the most elaborate study of some Pamphylian cities is contained in the splendid folios of Lanckoronski's Städte Pamphyliens. W. M. RAMSAY.

PANNAG (פַּנַּג pannag, κασία, balsamum).—One of the articles of commerce of Judah and Israel (Ezk 27[17]). The LXX κασία is defined as 'a shrub similar to the laurel,' but there is no hint as to its identity. Balsamum is alike indefinite. Acc. to the book Zohar (13th cent.) לֶחֶם פַּנַּג leḥem-pannag means 'pastry work.' Dr. Van Dyck in his Arab. VS of the Bible gives ḥaldwa. This is a well-known confection, made of syrup, carob honey, dibs (grape honey), or date honey, boiled with decoction of soapwort roots and sesame oil. This sweet is very extensively made and eaten by Orientals, and is a considerable article of commerce. It is known in Turkish as pĕk-mĕs. We have not seen any description of it in ancient authors, and its etymology bears no resemblance to that of pannag. In the absence of decisive evidence, the Eng. versions wisely transliterate the original, RVm gloss 'perhaps a kind of confection.' Cornill (ad loc.) and Hoffmann (Phön. Inschr. 15) emend to מִנִּי 'wax.' G. E. POST.

PAPER, PAPER REEDS, PAPYRUS.—See REED, WRITING.

PAPHOS (Πάφος) is mentioned in Ac 13[4-13] as the residence of the proconsul of Cyprus, SERGIUS PAULUS, who was visited and converted by St. Paul on his first missionary journey.

The city here meant is New Paphos, the administrative capital of the Roman province of Cyprus, the ruins of which are to be seen at Baffo, about a mile south of the modern town of Ktima, on the west coast of the island. These remains, which are all of Roman date, include a small theatre and amphitheatre, traces of a temple, numerous house foundations, parts of the city wall, and the moles of the ancient harbour. Outside the wall are traces of another columnar edifice, and on and near the site are the ruins of a Greek cathedral and other mediæval buildings. Several groups of rock-tombs in the neighbourhood seem to be of earlier than Roman date, but nothing is known of the settlement to which they may have belonged.

Old Paphos, which was deserted in favour of the site already described, lies at Kouklia, on the left bank of the Diórizo river (anc. Bocarus), about 10 miles W.S.W. of Baffo, and a little inland. Paphos was one of the most notable cities of ancient Cyprus, and owed its celebrity to the temple and cult of the 'Paphian goddess,' whom the Greeks identified with Aphrodite. Paphos is said to have been founded by the legendary Kinyras, whose clan retained royal privileges down to the Ptolemaic conquest (B.C. 295), and the priesthood of the goddess until the annexation of the island to Rome (B.C. 58). The goddess was worshipped under the form of a conical stone, in an open-air sanctuary, the general appearance of which is known from numerous representations on Roman imperial coins, and the ground plan from excavations made in 1888 on behalf of the Cyprus Exploration Fund. The temple is known to have suffered severely from earthquakes, and to have been rebuilt more than once. It consisted in Roman times of an open court surrounded on three sides by chambers and porticos, and was entered through them from the east by a gateway. The position of the sacred stone, and the interpretation of many details shown on the coins, remain uncertain. To the south of the main court lie the remains of what may be an earlier temple, or the traditional tomb of Kinyras, almost wholly destroyed except the western wall of gigantic stone slabs.

After the extinction of the native and Ptolemaic dynasties, and the foundation of New Paphos, the importance of the old town rapidly declined: the place was ruined by earthquakes, and desolate already in Jerome's time (Vita Hilarionis); though the Acts of Barnabas mention a Christian resident, formerly a ἱερόδουλος.

PARABLE (IN OT).—

1. The psychological origin of the use of Parables.
2. Relation of Parables to other devices of style.
3. The Parables of the OT and their closest analogues.

1. THE PSYCHOLOGICAL ORIGIN OF THE USE OF PARABLES.—It is a necessity imposed by its very nature upon the human spirit to illustrate with the greatest possible clearness the objects and processes belonging to the sphere of ideas. There are two leading paths which literary style pursues in order to satisfy this psychological want. The first of these is chosen when one expressly points to a parallel which the phenomenon in question has in another sphere. The second method is when two spheres of phenomena are as it were looked at together, and when in the description of the one sphere those expressions are directly employed which properly designate the notions and the phenomena of the other sphere.

2. RELATION OF PARABLES TO OTHER DEVICES OF STYLE.—(a) When the first of the above-named ways of illustrating spiritual phenomena is adopted, this gives rise to the following stylistic devices:—(α) The Simile, as in the expressions, 'he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water' (Ps 1^3), or 'thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel' (2^9), or in the Arabic 'arrows blue like the teeth of the Ghûls' (غول, lit. 'the surprising one,' a species of demon), cf. A. F. Mehren, Die Rhetorik der Araber, p. 21. (β) The Simile, however, not infrequently expands into an independent description. Hence arise the following five devices of style: (i.) The Fable is a narrative in which subjects from the mineral, vegetable, or animal kingdoms are introduced as if they were capable of thought and speech. The only instances of the Fable in the OT are the story told by Jotham (Jg 9^{8-15}; Kimchi, ad loc. משל העצים הם אנשי שכם) and that spoken by Jehoash to Amaziah (2 K 14^9). Ezk 17^{3-10} is not a Fable (see below, 2 b). (ii.) The Parable, again, is a narrative whose subject is personal, and which is constructed in order to depict something vividly. Along with its closest analogues it will be dealt with more fully below (see 3), and the question will be answered whether the OT contains something similar, such as (iii.) the Paramyth. These three kinds of fictitious illustrative narrative have their opposite in (iv.) the παράδειγμα (exemplum) or Example, for the latter is a narrative of a real occurrence, which serves to illustrate the situation in view. Instances of the παράδειγμα are found in Ps 99^6 (Moses), $106^{30f.}$ (Phinehas), Neh 13^{26} (Solomon), 1 Mac 2^{52-60} (Abraham and others), 2 Mac 6^{17-31} (Eleazar), Jth $8^{19ff.}$ (Abraham and others), 4 Mac $3^{6ff.}$ (David), etc. To the same category belong the stories of Tobit and Susanna in so far as these have a real historical kernel. It is a narrative of the same kind which has for its subject that emperor's daughter (ברוה דקסר) who at the sight of Rabbi Joshua exclaimed, 'What a pity that such renowned wisdom should be stored in so ugly a casket'; to which the Rabbi replied, 'In what does the emperor, your father, store his wine?' 'In earthen vessels,' said she; whereupon the Rabbi retorted that an emperor should use more costly vessels. When this counsel was followed, the wine deteriorated (Bab. Talm. Ta'anith 7^a; see, further, Fürstenthal, p. 150). So, too, the narrative of Ishtar's descent to Hades (Die Hollenfahrt der Iśtar, ed. Alfred Jeremias, 1887) is related as an 'Example' (l.c. p. 7). Finally, (v.) the Parallel consists in placing side by side the particular points which two sets of phenomena have in common. It is altogether a rare product of the rhetorical art, and as yet the present writer has failed to discover it in the OT.

(b) When the material and the ideal spheres are looked at as the two sides of a unity, and the expressions which properly belong to the description of the concrete sphere are applied to the ideal sphere, we have the Metaphor. One sees it in such instances as the following: 'the light of thy countenance' (Ps 4^7 [Eng.^{6}]); 'they that be wise shall shine,' etc., i.e. be held in honour (Dn 12^3), cf. ἀναλάμψουσιν (Wis 3^7), 'super stellas fulgebunt facies eorum qui abstinentiam habuerunt' (4 Ezr 7^{55}), 'ye shall shine' (Enoch 104^2), οἱ δίκαιοι ἐκλάμψουσιν (Mt 13^{43}). When the metaphorical expressions extend through a number of sentences, the description is called Allegorical; cf. Cicero, de Oratore, 27: 'cum confluxerunt plures continuæ translationes, alia plane fit oratio: itaque genus hoc Græci appellant ἀλληγορίαν.' Certain instances of allegorical language are found in Gn 49^9, Nu $24^{8b.\ 9}$ etc., Is 1^{5b} etc. Further, Ezk 17^{3-10} is not a 'Fable' [against Bertholet, Kurzer Handcomm., 1897, ad loc.], for the very expression 'the great eagle,' with which the passage commences, is to be understood not as if the author had in view a real eagle, but as referring to the subject Nebuchadnezzar which was well known to his contemporaries (cf. König, Syntax, § 297*a–c*, 298*a*, b). Consequently the phrase 'the great eagle' is a mark of the Allegory, which could not be better characterized than in the following terms: 'When an author does not describe that phenomenon of which he really means to speak, but another which has more or fewer points of resemblance to it, and yet carries out the description in such a way that one easily perceives that it is not the latter but the former phenomenon that he has in view, this constitutes an Allegory' (Heinrich Kurz, Handbuch der poetischen Nationalliteratur der Deutschen, 1840). Good instances of Allegories are Hans Sachs' Die Wittenbergisch Nachtigall, or Schiller's 'Das Mädchen aus der Fremde,' not to speak of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

3. THE PARABLES OF THE OT AND THEIR CLOSEST ANALOGUES.—(a) Parables in the ordinary sense of this term (see above, 2 a) are found in 2 S 12^{1-4} $14^{6f.}$, 1 K $20^{39f.}$, Is 5^{1-6} 28^{24-28}. An interesting essay by P. Cersoy (of Lyons) on Is 5^{1-6} appeared in the Revue Biblique (Jan. 1899; summary in Expos. Times, April 1899, p. 325) under the title 'l'Apologue de la Vigne.' He proposes to render v.^{1a} 'I will sing to my beloved my love-song touching his vineyard' (je vais chanter à mon ami mon chant amical à propos de sa vigne). But if the prophet had intended himself as the primary author of this poem, it would have been unnatural to introduce God as the speaker in vv.$^{3-6}$. On the other hand, the circumstance that at the beginning of the parable (vv.$^{1b.\ 2}$) the owner of the vineyard is treated as a third person, is quite explicable. By the selection of this third person a twofold object is gained. In the first place the commencement of the parable connects itself directly with the exordium, and in the second place the appearance is avoided of Isaiah himself being the owner of the vineyard. Cersoy suggests, further, that in v.^{1b} Isaiah 'probably utilized a short popular song.' But this view finds no support either in the difference of structure between the clauses of vv.$^{1b.\ 2}$ and vv.$^{3-6}$, or in the transition to the first person (vv.$^{3-6}$ 'I pray you,' etc.), for it is perfectly natural that the outburst of the Divine anger should find its expression in a direct address by God Himself.

Although none of the above-cited five passages of the OT is actually called a מָשָׁל (māshāl), it is not therefore to be inferred that this term could not be appropriately applied to them. Its absence may be sufficiently explained as simply due to the fact that the particular writers did not take occasion to add the terminus technicus. Jerome was quite right in his remark on Is 5^7 'Quæ prius per metaphoram dicta sunt vel per parabolam postea exponuntur manifestius.' So Ḳimchi began his exposition of 2 S 12[1-4] with המשל הזה, introduced the passage 14[6f.] with the words והיא תקנה המשל, began his exposition of Is 5[1ff.] with דברי הנביא עושה משל, and finally explained האזינו וג׳ of 28[23ff.] by אמר להם דרך משל 'He spoke to them in the way of a māshāl.' The correctness of this last interpretation results from two considerations, namely the original sense of māshāl, and the later usage of this word and its linguistic congeners.

This leads to the remark that the original sense of māshāl is very open to dispute. The now prevailing theory was argued for by Fleischer in an Excursus to Delitzsch's Commentar uber die Proverbien, p. 13 f., and it is maintained also in Gesenius-Buhl, HWB[13] ('eigentlich wohl: als etwas stehen, repräsentiren etwas,' i.e. 'lit. perhaps: stand for something, represent something'). Essentially the same view is shared by E. Meier, Wurzelworterbuch, p. 503 f. It may be stated thus: In Arabic maṯala = 'stetit erectus,' etc. Hence maṯalun (=māshāl) was originally a 'positio' κατ' ἐξοχήν. This might be looked at from the point of view of security and then became ='affirmatio' (cf. משל ב 'impose on one,' i.e. rule over one), or from the point of view of the formulating of a thought, and then the 'positio' became the investiture or representation of an idea. But this derivation of māshāl requires some very bold leaps in order to reach its goal, and hence we venture to suggest another derivation. Our starting-point shall be the fact that the sense of 'resemble,' 'be like,' is the predominating one with the verb משל and its Semitic cognates. This is the only sense of the Assyr. mašâlu, the Eth. masâla (Dillmann: 'similis, consentaneus fuit'), the Aram. mĕṯal, and it is the prevailing one also of the Arab. maṯala. On this we would rest the thesis that māshāl originally had the sense of 'likeness' or 'complex,' a view which is supported by the circumstance that the Assyr. mašlu means 'totality.' Now, what is the commonest form of an identification or combination? It is the judgment, and the embodiment of this is the simple sentence. Accordingly māshāl might be the designation of a sentence, but also of other kinds of combination of individual conceptions and of whole sets of conceptions. From māshāl ('judgment') may come a denominative verb משל ('rule') which meets us in Phœnician (cf. Bloch, Phœn. Glossar, p. 43) and in Hebrew. For the activity of a ruler exhibited itself originally in the pronouncing of judgments (cf. Solomon's words, 'to judge thy people,' 1 K 3[9]). From the stability which is a natural quality of such judgments may be derived, further, the Arab. maṯa(u)la, 'stand fast.'* With this agrees the circumstance that the Arab. maṯalun is used both for 'sententia' and 'parabola.' In like manner the Heb. māshāl has the sense of 'general proposition' (γνώμη, sententia, 'maxim'), as in 'the proverb of the ancients, Out of the wicked cometh forth wickedness' (1 S 24[13]). In the sense of 'proverb' קְשָׁל is found also in Sir 47[17]. See, further, art. PROVERB.

But none the less has māshāl the sense of 'parable.'* This is clear from the later identification of it and its cognates with 'similitude' (Germ. Gleichniss). 'Three mĕsâle' are announced in Eth. Enoch 37[5], namely those contained in chs. 38–44. 45–57. and 58–71. In these mĕsâlyât or mĕsâlêyât phenomena and processes of the supramundane sphere are employed to illustrate the earthly fortunes of the kingdom of God. These three sections, then, contain essentially what we call parables. The same purpose is the starting-point of visions. This comes out clearly in the words, 'demonstra mihi et hoc, si plus quam præteritum sit habet venire' (4 Ezr 4[35]), for this request is satisfied by a vision which is described thus, 'ecce fornax ardens transiit coram me,' etc. (v.[48]), and this vision is expressly called in v.[47] a 'similitudo.' We read of another 'similitudo' in 8[2f.], and again a vision is expressly called a 'similitudo' in the words 'vidisti similitudinem eius, quomodo filium lugeret' (10[49]). Likewise the 'amsâl, which make up the third part of the Shepherd of Hermas, are visions in which the vine, etc., is shown (see the Ethiopic version published by Antoine d'Abbadie in Abhandlungen für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, ii. 1, p. 47 ff.). In any case the Syr. ܡܬܠܐ, which exactly corresponds to the Heb. משל, is used to render παραβολή in Mt 13[18. 31. 33] etc. 21[45], Mk 4[2] etc., Lk 5[36] 6[39] 14[7] etc.

The post-biblical literature of the Jews exhibits the same use of the word māshāl. For instance, the Talmud (Shabb. 152*b*) records how a certain king distributed royal garments among his servants. The wise amongst these placed the garments in a chest, but the foolish wore them in going about their ordinary work. One day the king asked for his garments. The wise gave them back to him just as they had been when they received them, but the garments returned by the foolish were soiled. Then the king commended the wise, but ordered the foolish to be cast into prison, and their garments were handed over to the fuller (לכובס). This story is expressly called a משל למלך 'a parable of a king,' and is introduced to illustrate the saying, 'Give it (the soul) back to Him (God) as He gave it to thee' (תנה לו באשר נתנה לך). The very same expression, משל למלך, is met with in Shabb. 153*a*; and in 'Aboda Zara 54*b* one finds אמשול לך משל וג׳, namely the parable of the king who presented his son with a dog, etc. In like manner the celebrated stories of 'the seven sages' were called Mishlê Sindbad (ed. P. Cassel, 3 Auflage, 1884), and in point of fact they are only partially 'Examples' (see above 2 α β (iv.)), namely in so far as they are intended to describe real occurrences. The most of them are parables, and they contain such expressions as 'the second parable of the empress,' etc. It may be added that we hear of a Buddhist parable (cf. e.g. Edmund Hardy, Der Buddhismus, 1890, p. 124 f.), and that Herodotus (i. 141) records the parable of the flute-player and the fishes which would not dance to his playing. Volkmann (p. 379), too, speaks of the παραβολή which is clothed in the form of a narrative.

(b) How closely connected the expression māshāl was with the notion of a parable is evident from

* Fuerst (Heb.-Chald. Worterb.[3] 1876, s.v.) co-ordinates משל 'rule' with the Arab. مثل (basula), 'strenuus fuit.' This is not absolutely impossible. For the Aram. מתל is not found with the sense of 'rule,' and therefore there need not be found an Arab. مثل answering to the Heb. משל 'rule.' Further, a correspondence between m and b is not altogether rare in Semitic (cf. J. Barth, Etymolog. Studien, p. 32). But it is not necessary to appeal to this basula. By the way, the connexion between the two leading senses of משל is not explained by Abu 'l-walîd in his Kitâbu 'l-'uṣûli (ed. Ad. Neubauer), p. 395. He contents himself with simply linking together the different groups of words by the formula ومعنى اخر 'and another sense' [appears, etc.]. David Ḳimchi, in his Book of Roots, says ועניין המשל הוא דמות דבר אל דבר, i.e. 'the sense conveyed by the term māshāl is the likeness of one thing to another.' Likewise the two latest commentators on the Book of Proverbs (Wildeboer in the Kurzer Hdcomm. and Frankenberg in Nowack's Hdkomm., published in 1897 f.) have made no attempt to solve the linguistic difficulty presented by the word משל.

* A combination of 'sententia' and 'similitudo' may be observed in מְשָׁלֵי אֵפֶר of Job 13[12], 'sentences which are strewn as lightly as ashes.'

the circumstance that מָשָׁל is the title of the passage Ezk 24[3-5]. V.[3a] reads מָשָׁל וּ׳ קְשָׁל וְאָמַרְתָּ 'Utter a parable unto the rebellious house, and say' (=saying); and in vv.[3b-5] we read, 'Set on a pot, set it on, and also pour water into it: gather its pieces (i.e. those which belong to the pot), etc. Take the choice of the flock, and burn also the bones under it, and make it boil well, and let them seethe the bones of it therein.' This last passage furnishes a double proof of our position. On the one hand, it contains a narrative which corresponds with the above-cited stories in 2 S 12[1-4] etc. Consequently these five passages also might have been equally designated by the title applied to Ezk 24[3b-5], namely māshāl (Arab. VS مَثَل, Pesh. ܡܬܠܐ, LXX παραβολήν; while the Targum alone, from a supposed necessity to heighten the dignity of the passage, rendered by נְבוּאָה 'a prophecy'). On the other hand, there is a formal agreement between Ezk 24[3-5] and 3[24b-26] 4[1-12] 5[1-4] etc. In all these passages, that is to say, there is mention of a Divine command to perform some action, and then it is added that this action illustrates some idea. Thus the five passages, 2 S 12[1-4] etc., and Ezk 3[24b-26] 4[1ff.] etc. 24[3-5], agree in their didactic aim; and both sets of passages are parabolical. This conclusion is strengthened further by the consideration that the passages in Ezk just cited cannot be separated from Is 20[2-4], Jer 25[15ff.]. According to the last passage, the prophet received the commission, 'Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee, to drink it'; and the prophet adds, 'Then took I the cup at the Lord's hand, and made all the nations to drink.' This action cannot really have been performed. Hence the view is recommended that also in Ezk 3[24b-26] 4[1-12] 5[1-4] etc. we have parabolical narratives. The same category includes the Bk. of Jonah, as has been shown in vol. ii. p. 746 ff., and we must add the story of Judith, for the very name יְהוּדִית means 'a Jewess,' and stamps the heroine of this book as a personification of the Jewish nation. The Bk. of Jth is, as Luther said, 'ein geistlich schön Gedicht' (cf., further, König, Einleitung, p. 479 f.).

(c) The Paramyths, which, according to J. G. Herder, are to be distinguished from the parables, have also their analogues in the Hebrew literature (cf. παραμύθιον, which in Wis 3[18] is used for 'consolation' [=παραμυθία of 1 Co 14[3], and in Ph 2[1] for 'comfort [of love]'). Herder understood by Paramyths such narratives 'as serve for the cheering of the soul, and are based upon the ancient Greek myths.' They are stories in which personifications of ideas or of natural processes are introduced as living beings. One of Herder's paramythical narratives commences with 'Aurora complained to the gods,' and another with 'Night and Day contended with each other for the pre-eminence,' and a third with 'Once beside a murmuring stream Care sat down and mused.' Now we find instances of personification in the OT as well. For instance, we read 'the light of the righteous rejoiceth' (Pr 13[9]), and 'foolishness (14[1b]) plucketh that down which wisdom of women has built' (v.[1a]). The same foolishness is further described in a whole narrative as a seductive woman (9[13-18]); and the same wisdom, with whose help Jahweh Himself founded the earth (3[19f.], cf. 1[20]), comes forward as the subject of a dramatically worked action in 'Doth not Wisdom cry,' etc.? (8[1ff.]). A story of the same kind meets us in Sir 24[3ff.], for there, likewise, 'wisdom' is an attribute of God which was displayed in the creation of the world and the guiding of Israel. This appears with the greatest clearness from the words, καὶ ἐρριζωσα ἐν λαῷ δεδοξασμένῳ, 'and I took root in a people that was glorified' (v.[12]). It is only a personification of wisdom that is found in Wis 6[15bff.]. The words ἵνα μάθητε σοφίαν (v.[10b]) show this in the most decisive fashion. Likewise in 7[1a] wisdom stands simply for the attribute of God (cf. 'Thy wisdom' in 9[2]) which controls the world and the course of history. For Solomon could imbibe and reproduce this wisdom, cf. ἔμαθον (7[13]), εἰς ψυχὰς ὁσίας μεταβαίνουσα (v.[27c]), εἰσῆλθεν εἰς ψυχὴν θεράποντος Κυρίου (10[16]); and by wisdom nothing else is meant than by ἀφροσύνη of 10[8b].

The post-biblical literature of the Jews also contains narratives, in which personifications appear as subjects. One of these commences, 'While Noah lived in the ark, one day the Lie appeared and begged to be admitted. Noah, who did not know the Lie, was prepared to grant her request, but he declared that he could not do this until she should have procured a companion, because only pairs could be admitted into the ark. The Lie had thus to retire after a bootless errand. But scarcely had she gone a few paces when she met Injustice. Along with her the Lie was now admitted into the ark, but the two over-reached one another' (Midrash, Yalḳût, Gn 56; Fürstenthal, op. cit., No. 497). See, further, the following article.

PARABLE (IN NT).—The subject will be treated under five heads: Terminology, Christ's Use of Parables, their Distribution in the Gospels, their Classification, and their Interpretation.

1. The Term παραβολή (παραβάλλω) means 'a placing of one thing beside another' with a view to comparison. Trench contends that 'this notion of comparison is not necessarily included in the word.' But it appears as early as the word itself, and is very frequent (Plato, Phil. 33 B; Arist. Top. i. 10. 5; Polyb. i. 2. 2). From the original idea of 'throwing beside' come the derived meanings of 'exposing,' represented by παράβολος, and of 'comparing,' represented by παραβολή. Latin writers use collatio (freq. in Cic.), imago (Cic. Sen. Hor.), and similitudo (Cic. Quint.). The Lat. VSS commonly have parabola (Mt 13[3. 10. 13] etc.), which survives in the Fr. parole and through parabolare in parler; but similitudo is fairly common, esp. in Lk (4[23] 5[36] 6[39] 8[4] 12[16] 13[6] 20[19] 21[29]). But in most of these cases some representatives of the Old Lat., esp. a and d, have parabola. Conversely, many Old Lat. texts sometimes have similitudo where the Vulg. has parabola (Lk 12[41] 15[3] 18[9] 19[11]).

In LXX παραβολή very commonly represents the Heb. māshāl, which also implies comparison (Nu 23[7. 18] 24[3. 15. 20. 21. 23] etc.). But māshāl is also rendered παροιμία (Pr 1[1], Sir 6[35] 8[8] etc.), and θρῆνος (Is 14[4]), and προοίμιον (Job 27[1] 29[1]). Like Beispiel in German, it sometimes indicates an example set up for edification or warning (Jer 24[9], Mic 2[4], Wis 5[3]). When it means an utterance of deeper meaning than appears on the surface, it is sometimes joined with πρόβλημα (Ps 48[4] 77[2], Hab 2[6]), or αἴνιγμα (Dt 28[37], Sir 39[3] 47[15]), or διήγημα (2 Ch 7[20], Ezk 17[2]), or σκοτεινὸς λόγος (Pr 1[6]). The meaning of such dark utterances becomes clear through the application or comparison which is indicated; and those who miss the application lose the true meaning of the parable, which is often a short saying, such as we should rather call a proverb (1 S 10[12] 24[13], Ezk 12[22. 23] 18[2. 3], 1 K 4[32]).

In NT παραβολή is freq. in the Synoptic Gospels; and, excepting He 9[9] 11[19], is found nowhere else. It is generally used of a longer utterance or narrative intended to set forth a spiritual lesson (Mt 13[3. 18. 24. 31. 36] etc.); but sometimes of a short saying or proverb (Mt 15[15], Mk 3[23] 7[17], Lk 4[23] 6[39]). Of the other renderings of māshāl, neither θρῆνος nor προοίμιον is found in NT, while παροιμία (παρά, οἶμος) occurs only Jn 10[6] 16[25. 29], 2 P 2[22]. Originally παροιμία meant an out-of-the-way saying, or possibly a wayside saying, and hence was used of any didactic, symbolic, or figurative utterance. Like παραβολή, it is used both of longer utterances or allegories (Jn 10[6]) and shorter ones or proverbs (2 P 2[22]); comp. κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν, Κοινὰ τὰ τῶν φίλων (Philo, de Vita Mos. i. 28; de Abr. 40). Most Lat. VSS distinguish παροιμία by rendering it proverbium, which is never used for παραβολή. Eng. VSS render both words sometimes by 'parable' (Mt 21[33], Jn 10[6]), sometimes by 'proverb' (Lk 4[23], Jn 16[25]). Tindale and the Genevan use 'similitude' for both (Mt 13[33], Jn 10[6]), and are capricious in using both 'parable' and 'similitude' for παραβολή; so also is Coverdale. As St. John never uses παραβολή, and as there are no parables in the strict sense in his Gospel, it is unfortunate that RV retains 'parable' in Jn 10[6].

Attempts at definitions of 'parable,' taken from Greek Fathers and others, are given in Suicer, s.v. παραβολή. Trench quotes several Lat. definitions from Jerome and later writers. However it may be expressed, the main elements in a parable are two: (1) a saying, commonly in the form of a narrative, respecting earthly things, with (2) a spiritual or heavenly meaning. A fable differs from a parable in both these elements. It often distorts the earthly things in using them as a vehicle of instruction, making brutes and trees talk, and the like. This a parable never does; for nature, as God's wisdom made it, is far better adapted for teaching Divine truths than nature as man's fancy can imagine it. And a fable never aims higher than human morality. At best it teaches prudence, industry, caution; and it often inculcates mere shrewdness, selfishness, and cunning. Hence the only fables found in Scripture are used by men for their own ends; by Jotham (Jg 9[8]) and by Jehoash (2 K 14[9]). They are never employed by God's prophets in conveying His message, nor by Christ in explaining His kingdom. In the direct teaching of Scripture, nothing is attributed to animals or plants which is not found in nature. Moreover, it is their relation to man that is made instructive (the sheep to the shepherd or the owner, the fig-tree to the vine-dresser or the owner), not that of sheep or trees to one another. The mutual relations of brute to brute or of tree to tree are less fitted to illustrate the kingdom of God. Much the same holds good of a myth, when it is the natural product of primitive imagination, and not the artificial invention of an ingenious teacher. The latter are parables or fables rather than myths; e.g. the myths of Plato. But the myth, while resembling the fable in not being bound by the facts of nature and in not teaching spiritual lessons, differs from both fable and parable in that the myth mingles truth and fiction, whereas the parable and the fable keep them apart. Those who frame or hear parables and fables know that the narrative is nothing, and is not set forth as being historical, although accidentally it may be so. It is the lesson indicated by the narrative which is of value. But the uncritical age which spontaneously generates and accepts myths makes no distinction between fable and figure. The figurative narrative is regarded as actually true. In an allegory figure and fact, or rather figure and interpretation, are not mixed, but are parallel, and move simultaneously, as in the allegory of the True Vine or of the Good Shepherd.

As already indicated, the distinction which we draw between a parable and a proverb is not found in the Gospels. The evangelists call the short figurative sayings of Christ, no less than the longer narratives, parables (Mt 15[15], Mk 3[23] 7[17], Lk 6[39]), as also does Christ Himself (Lk 4[23], Mt 24[32]); partly because māshāl is used for both, but mainly because both in parables and in proverbs there is comparison, and the hearer has to catch the analogy in order to be instructed. We may, if we like, give the name of a parable to Christ's sayings about the salt of the earth, the lilies of the field, building on the sand, whited sepulchres (Mt 5[13] 6[26] 7[26] 23[27]), fishers of men, light under the bushel (Mk 1[17] 4[21]), a reed shaken with the wind, the green and the dry tree (Lk 7[24] 23[31]), living water, fields white unto harvest, a woman in travail (Jn 4[10. 35] 16[21]), etc. etc. Not a few of these might be expanded into a narrative without difficulty.

2. The Use of Parables was familiar to the Jews,* and ancient Rabbinic writings are full of them; but as illustrations of truths already set forth, rather than as a means of conveying truths. In the hands of Christ the use of parables as vehicles of truth reached perfection. Just as His miracles are parables,—factum Verbi verbum nobis est, as Augustine says,—so His parables are miracles, both of literary beauty and of instructive power. As elements of His teaching they had several purposes, some of which are obvious, while others He explained to His disciples (Mt 13[10-15], Mk 4[11. 12], Lk 8[9. 10]). They served both to reveal and to veil the truth; and the truths with which they are specially concerned are the mysteries of 'the kingdom of God.' They revealed these mysteries to those who deserved to know them and were capable of receiving them; and they concealed them from those who lacked these qualifications. And this pœnalis cœcitas (Aug.) with regard to Divine truth when it is clothed in parables is not merely a fact (ὅτι, Mt) in the impenitent; it is designed (ἵνα, Mk, Lk) by God, in order to withhold the mysteries of the kingdom from the unworthy. This withholding is therefore a judgment; but a judgment which is merciful in its operation. It saves unworthy hearers from the responsibility of knowing the truth and rejecting it, for they are not allowed to recognize it. It saves them also from the guilt of profaning it, for herein Christ observes His own maxim (Mt 7[6]). Nor does the mercy end here. The parable puts the truth in a form which arrests the attention at the time, and which is easily remembered afterwards. Longum est iter per præcepta, breve et efficax per exempla (Sen. Ep. 6). Those who are already receptive are caught at once; they get their lesson and do not forget it. Those who are not, although they get no lesson, yet hear something which they remember, and which will convey the lesson to them, if ever they become capable of receiving it. Moreover, the vehicle of the lesson being taken from very familiar objects, he who has once heard a parable of Christ is likely to be often reminded of it. Christ knew the grander scenery of Palestine; yet His parables are taken, not from mountains and forests, cedars and palm-trees, but from things which are common, not only in Palestine, but almost throughout the world (Stanley, Sin. and Pal. p. 432). Thus teaching by parables is both educational and disciplinary. It is a marked illustration of the law, that to him who hath shall more be given, while from him who hath not even that which he seems to have shall be taken away. The unreceptive hearer seems to have the opportunity of being instructed; but this is really withheld, because instruction is given in a form which, through his own fault, he cannot understand: *δείσω συνετοῖς, θύρας δ' ἐπίθεσθε βέβηλοι. It is quite in harmony with this principle that, at the beginning of Christ's ministry, His parables were occasional and brief; but, as opposition to Him increased, they became His usual mode of public instruction and were more elaborate.

The chief purpose of parables is to instruct by means of the exquisite analogies which exist between things natural and things spiritual, and which are the outcome of the Divine Wisdom that fashioned both. In them Christ 'utters things which have been hidden from the foundation of the world' (Mt 13^{35}), for the whole universe is a parable, which hides God from the unworthy, while it reveals Him more and more to the devout. Schelling says that nature and history are to one another as parable and interpretation (Philos. Schriften, ed. 1809, p. 457). Christ makes both nature and history a parable, of which the kingdom of God is the interpretation; and thus the whole world becomes a 'picture-gospel' to those who can understand it. In His synagogue-teaching Christ expounded the book of the OT. In His parables He expounded the book of nature and of human life. In the one case the written letter, in the other the experience of facts, was used to reveal the spirit which inspires both. By the facts of everyday life the parable shows how the principles of the higher life may be known; for the universe is the outward expression of the laws of the kingdom of God.

It is remarkable that the Epistles, although they contain allegories and frequent similes, never exhibit anything which corresponds to the parables of our Lord. The attitude of the writers to this element in His teaching is analogous to that of the evangelists to the title 'the Son of Man,' which they record as often used by Jesus of Himself, but which they never apply to Him themselves (Nösgen, Gesch. Jesu, p. 346). Reverence of this kind, whether conscious or not, renders the hypothesis that some of Christ's parables have been altered by those who recorded them all the less probable. It is more reasonable to believe that the differences between parables which have marked resemblances are the result of variations made by Jesus Himself. He certainly sometimes employed pairs of parables, in order the better to impress the required lesson upon His hearers; e.g. the Treasure in the Field and the Pearl of great Price (Mt 13^{44-46}), the Ten Virgins and the Talents (25^{1-30}), the Garment and the Wine-skins (Lk 5^{36-39}), the Mustard-seed and the Leaven (13^{18-21}), the Rash Builder and the Rash King (14^{28-32}), the Lost Sheep and the Lost Coin (15^{3-10}). And it should be noted how often the effect of Christ's parables is intensified by a contrast; e.g. obedient and disobedient sons (Mt 21^{28}), wise and foolish virgins (25^{1}), profitable and unprofitable servants (25^{14}), heartless clergy and charitable Samaritan (Lk 10^{30}), Dives and Lazarus (16^{19}), Pharisee and Publican (18^{9}), etc.

3. The Distribution of the Parables in the Gospels is very unequal. In the narrower sense of the term there are no parables in Jn. It is in harmony with the respective characteristics of the other three Gospels that Lk, who aims at completeness, gives us most, and that Mk, who records events rather than discourses, gives us fewest parables. Only one parable is peculiar to Mk,—the Seed growing secretly (4^{26}); and he gives three others, which are also in Mt and Lk,—the Sower, Mustard-seed, and Wicked Husbandmen. Two are common to Mt and Lk,—the Leaven (Mt 13^{33}, Lk 13^{20}) and the Lost Sheep (Mt 18^{12}, Lk 15^{1}). Of the remainder, eighteen are peculiar to Lk and ten to Mt. Lk's eighteen include some of the most beautiful. They are the Two Debtors, Good Samaritan, Friend at Midnight, Rich Fool, Watchful Servants, Barren Fig-tree, Chief Seats, Great Supper, Rash Builder, Rash King, Lost Coin, Lost Son, Unrighteous Steward, Dives and Lazarus, Unprofitable Servants, Unrighteous Judge, Pharisee and Publican, and the Pounds. The ten peculiar to Mt are the Tares, Hid Treasure, Pearl of great Price, Draw-net, Unmerciful Servant, Labourers in the Vineyard, Two Sons, Marriage of the King's Son, Ten Virgins, and the Talents.* Reasons have been given above why the Marriage of the King's Son in Mt should not be identified with the Great Supper in Lk, nor the Talents in Mt with the Pounds.

The number of Christ's parables cannot be satisfactorily determined, because of the difficulty of deciding what is to be regarded as a parable. Some, as Trench, omit one or two of those given above, as the Watchful Servants (Lk 12^{36}) and the Chief Seats (Lk 14^{7}). But many would have to be added, if all the short parabolic sayings of Christ were included. The usual estimate is from thirty to thirty-five, of which about two-thirds are preserved by Lk, the majority of them being peculiar to his Gospel.

It is one of the many signs of inferiority in the apocryphal Gospels that they contain no parables. While they degrade miracles into mere arbitrary and unspiritual acts of power, they omit all that teaches of the deep relations between the seen and the unseen.

4. The Classification of the Parables is a problem which perhaps does not admit of a satisfactory solution. One of the simplest is that of Goebel in Die Parabeln Jesu, Gotha, 1880, which is followed by Edersheim in The Life and Teaching of Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 579. He makes three groups, distinguished by the time and place of delivery: (i.) those belonging to Christ's ministry in and near Capernaum, collected in Mt 13; (ii.) those belonging to the journeyings from Galilee to Jerusalem, recorded in Lk 10–18; and (iii.) those belonging to the last days in Jerusalem. The first group mainly has reference to the kingdom of God as a whole, the second to the individual members of it, and the third to the judgment of the members of it. Godet, in Schaff's Herzog, suggests another arrangement into three groups, which is more elaborate. Out of thirty parables he regards six as showing the preparatory existence of the Kingdom under the Jewish dispensation; viz. the Wicked Husbandmen, Marriage of the King's Son, Great Supper, Strait Gate, Barren Fig-tree, and Two Sons. Six others show the realization of the Kingdom in the form of a Church; viz. the Sower, Tares, Mustard-seed, Leaven, Draw-net, and Unrighteous Judge. The remaining eighteen refer to the realization of the Kingdom in the life of individual members. This group is subdivided; nine being referred to those who are entering the Kingdom (Lost Sheep, Lost Coin, Lost Son, Pharisee and Publican, Friend at Midnight, Hid Treasure, Pearl of great Price, Rash Builder, and Rash King), and nine to those who have already become members (Chief Seats, Labourers in the Vineyard, Unmerciful Servant, Good Samaritan, Unrighteous Steward, Dives and Lazarus, Rich Fool, Talents, and Ten Virgins). But to put the Unrighteous Judge and the Friend at Midnight, which teach much the same lesson, into different classes, does not seem to be right. Nor does one see how the sheep, coin, and son could be lost, unless they were already members of the community. Lange, in his Life of Christ, i. p. 484, and in Herzog², art. 'Gleichnis,' makes another threefold classification. The first cycle treats of the Kingdom in its development; the second of its completion by acts of mercy; the third of its completion by acts of judgment. Somewhat similar is the division made by Steinmeyer in Die Par. des Herrn, Berlin, 1884, into kerygmatic, pastoral, and judicial. A very elaborate classification is drawn out by Westcott in his Elements of the Gospel Harmony, App. D; and Int. to the Study of the Gospels, App. F. He makes two main classes, of which the second has three divisions; and each of these divisions has three subdivisions, some of which are bisected or trisected. The chief features are these. I. Parables drawn from the material world; viz. the Sower, Tares, Seed growing secretly, Mustard-seed, and Leaven. II. Parables drawn from the relations of man (i.) to the lower world; viz. the Draw-net, Fig-tree, Lost Sheep, and Lost Coin: (ii.) to his fellow-men, e.g. the Lost Son, Friend at Midnight, and Unrighteous Steward, etc.: (iii.) to Providence; viz. the Hid Treasure, Pearl of great Price, and Rich Fool. Thus the parables drawn from the relations of man to his fellows (which is not one of the main classes) are the largest group, being about two-thirds of the whole. Secondly, those under the head of man's relations to Providence might be assigned to man's relations to the lower world; for to the lower world treasure, pearls, and crops belong. Thirdly, the Tares and the Draw-net seem clearly to belong to the same group; and, if this is admitted, then the two groups to which they are respectively assigned may be merged in one. These changes would give us two main divisions: (i.) Parables drawn from man's relations to the lower world; and (ii.) parables drawn from man's relations to his fellows. Nösgen also, in his Gesch. Jesu, München, 1891, p. 342, makes two main classes, partly on the same lines as Goebel and Godet: (i.) those which treat of the development of the Kingdom as a whole; and (ii.) those which treat of the lives of individual members of it. And he regards this classification as indicated by Christ Himself, according as He uses or omits the formula 'The kingdom of heaven is likened' (Mt 13^{24} 18^{23} 22^{2} 25^{1}), or 'the kingdom of heaven is like' (Mt $13^{31.\ 33.\ 44.\ 45.\ 47}$ 20^{1}), or 'so is the kingdom of God' (Mk 4^{26}). Comp. Mt 11^{16}, Lk 7^{31}, Mk 4^{30}, Lk $13^{18.\ 20}$.

* See the anticipation of this principle in the symbolical teaching of the Pythagoreans as given by Stobæus, Serm. v. 72, ed. Gaisford, i. p. 164.

* 'St. Matthew's are more theocratic, St. Luke's more ethical; St. Matthew's are more parables of judgment, St. Luke's of mercy' (Trench).

It is probable that the three parables which are in all three Gospels are in some way typical: they are taken from seed-time, growth, and harvest. The Sower tells of the preparation for the kingdom in the hearts of the recipients; the Mustard-seed of its powers of development; and the Wicked Husbandmen of God's long-suffering mercy and stern judgment upon those who persist in opposing it. But it does not follow from this that a basis for classification is thus indicated.

5. In the Interpretation of Parables we have to be on our guard against the opposite dangers of ignoring important features, and attempting to make all the details mean something. No general rules can be given, for the amount of symbolical detail differs greatly in different parables. This is clear from those cases in which we have Christ's own interpretations. In the Sower nearly all the features have meaning; not only the seed and the various soils, but the birds, the heat, and the thorns. In the Tares several features are explained: the sower, the good seed, the enemy, the tares, the field, the harvest, and the reapers. And several are left unexplained: the people sleeping, the enemy's going away, the blade springing up, the servants of the householder, and the binding of the bundles (Mt $13^{24-30.\ 37-43}$). In the Unrighteous Steward the meaning of the parable as a whole is indicated, viz. the wisdom of using present opportunities as a provision for eternity (Lk 16^{9}); but none of the details are interpreted; and it is probable that they have no meaning. Most of the difficulties respecting this parable have been produced by making the separate features of the story mean something, especially the reduction in the bills. Nevertheless, the interpretations of the Sower and of the Tares forbid us to assert that each parable has one main lesson, and that when this is ascertained all the details may be ignored as meaningless. Chrysostom seems to go too far when he declares οὐδὲ χρὴ πάντα τὰ ἐν ταῖς παραβολαῖς κατὰ λέξιν περιεργάζεσθαι, ἀλλὰ τὸν σκοπὸν μαθόντας, δι' ὃν συνετέθη, τοῦτον δρέπεσθαι, καὶ μηδὲν πολυπραγμονεῖν περαιτέρω (in Mt. Hom. lxiv. 3). But the extravagant lengths to which some patristic commentators go in the interpretation of minute details, especially of numbers (e.g. on Mt 13^{33} 25^{15}, Lk 7^{41} 11^{5} 13^{7}), provoked strong protests, as from Tertullian (de Pud. 9) and others, who sometimes erred in this way themselves. The question is well handled by Trench, whose third chapter is one of the best in his admirable work, Notes on the Parables, which for English readers is likely to remain the chief guide on the whole subject.

PARACLETE.—This is the English form of the Gr. παράκλητος, paraklētos, which occurs only in the writings of St. John. In Jn $14^{16.\ 26}$ 15^{26} 16^{7} it is used by Jesus to describe the Holy Spirit, promised to the disciples after His own departure; and in 1 Jn 2^{1} it is applied by St. John to the ascended Lord Himself. In AV the word is translated 'Comforter' in the Gospel and 'Advocate' in the Epistle, without any marginal alternative. In RV these translations are retained, but at each occurrence in the Gospel there is found the marg. note 'Or Advocate, or Helper, Gr. Paraclete'; and at 1 Jn 2^{1} the note 'Or Comforter, or Helper, Gr. Paraclete.' These translations reflect the history of the interpretation of the word in NT. In its reference to Christ the meaning of 'Advocate' has been generally acquiesced in; but, in its references to the Holy Spirit, it has all along been disputed whether the meaning is Advocate (taken by most in the largest sense, not only Pleader or Defender, but Helper) or Comforter (in the sense of Consoler).

i. THE ETYMOLOGY AND USE OF THE WORD.—The verb παρακαλεῖν is frequently used both in LXX and in NT (though not found in St. John's writings) with the meaning to comfort or console, a meaning which is rare in classical Greek. Thus Gn 37^{35} 'And all his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted' (ἦλθον παρακαλέσαι αὐτόν· καὶ οὐκ ἤθελεν παρακαλεῖσθαι); Mt 5^{4} 'Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted' (μακάριοι οἱ πενθοῦντες· ὅτι αὐτοὶ παρακληθήσονται). Moreover, the abstract subst. παράκλησις, formed from παρακαλεῖν, often means comfort or consolation, as 2 Co $1^{3.\ 4}$ 'Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God' (θεὸς πάσης παρακλήσεως, ὁ παρακαλῶν ἡμᾶς ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ θλίψει ἡμῶν, εἰς τὸ δύνασθαι ἡμᾶς παρακαλεῖν τοὺς ἐν πάσῃ θλίψει, διὰ τῆς παρακλήσεως ἧς παρακαλούμεθα αὐτοὶ ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ). But the oldest meaning of παρακαλεῖν is not to 'comfort,' but to 'send for,' 'summon to one's aid' (=Lat. advocare). Thus in Xenoph. Anab. i. 6. 5, παρακαλεῖν τινα σύμβουλον, 'to call one in as adviser';* and this meaning is found in NT, Ac 28[20] διὰ ταύτην οὖν τὴν αἰτίαν παρεκάλεσα ὑμᾶς ἰδεῖν καὶ προσλαλῆσαι, 'For this purpose, then, have I called for you, to see and to speak with you.' The question, then, is whether παράκλητος, which is undoubtedly passive in form, signifies 'one called in' (for aid of some kind), or has assumed an active meaning (after παρακαλεῖν, to console), 'one who comforts or consoles.' The question must be determined by an examination of the use of the word elsewhere and of its context in NT.

1. The Classical Use.—In classical Greek παράκλητος is a judicial word. It is the equivalent in use as well as etymology of the Lat. advocatus. Both are wider in meaning than our 'advocate,' and approach nearer our 'counsel.' Asconius (ad Cic. in Q. Cæcil.) says, Qui defendit alterum in judicio, aut patronus dicitur, si orator est; aut advocatus, si aut jus suggerit, aut presentiam suam commodat amico. Our 'advocate' is the Rom. patronus (qui orator est), the Gr. παράκλητος is the Rom. advocatus. Thus Demosth. de Falsa Leg. p. 341, 10, αἱ τῶν παρακλήτων δεήσεις καὶ σκυδαί, 'the petitions and pains of the partisans.' The occurrence of the word is rare, but, where it occurs, this, or something very near this, is its meaning.†

2. The Evidence of the LXX.—The word παράκλητος is not found in the LXX. The adj. παρακλητικός occurs in Zec 1[13] 'And the LORD answered the angel that talked with me with good words, even comfortable words' (λόγους παρακλητικούς). Once also there occurs the subst. παρακλήτωρ, Job 16[2] 'Miserable comforters are ye all' (παρακλήτορες κακῶν πάντες). The use of this word, which has a proper active form and meaning, is on the whole to be regarded as evidence against the sense of 'comforter' for παράκλητος. The one being already in existence, taken directly from παρακαλεῖν in the sense of 'console,' it is improbable that the other would have come (against its passive form) to be used for the same meaning. It is true that Aq. and Theod. use παράκλητος in this passage; but they may have felt the influence of the word as used in St. John's Gospel, which at the time they wrote (c. 120–150 A.D.) was probably interpreted 'Comforter.' Symm. uses παρηγοροῦντες.

3. The Use of the Word by Philo.—Philo employs παράκλητος several times in the sense of 'intercessor' or 'advocate' (in its classical meaning). In de Joseph. c. 40, Joseph, after discovering himself to his brethren, is made to say, ἀμνηστίαν ἁπάντων παρέχω τῶν εἰς ἐμὲ πεπραγμένων· μηδενὸς ἑτέρου δεῖσθε παρακλήτου, 'I grant forgiveness for all that you have done against me; you need no one else as intercessor.' And in Vit. Mos. iii. 14, the reason why the high priest on entering the Holy of Holies should wear the symbol of the Logos, is given in the words, ἀναγκαῖον γὰρ ἦν τὸν ἱερωμένον τῷ τοῦ κόσμου πατρὶ παρακλήτῳ χρῆσθαι τελειοτάτῳ τὴν ἀρετὴν υἱῷ πρός τε ἀμνηστείαν ἁμαρτημάτων καὶ χορηγίαν ἀφθονωτάτων ἀγαθῶν, 'It was indispensable that he who was consecrated to the Father of the world should employ as his Advocate the Son, most perfect in virtue, for both the forgiveness of sins and the supply of unlimited blessings.' It has been claimed that Philo uses παράκλητος once in the direct active sense of παρακαλεῖν, to comfort, viz. in de Opif. Mund. c. 6; but there also the meaning is passive and general, 'one called to help'—οὐδενὶ δὲ παρακλήτῳ. τίς γὰρ ἦν ἕτερος, μόνῳ δὲ ἑαυτῷ χρησάμενος ὁ θεὸς ἔγνω δεῖν εὐεργετεῖν . . . τὴν . . . φύσιν, 'employing no helper (for who else was there?) but only Himself, did God think good to bless the world.'

4. In the Targums and Talmud.—The Gr. word appears in the Targ. and Talm. in the form פַּרְקְלִיט or פַּרְקְלִיטָא, and always in the sense of helper, intercessor, or advocate, i.e. always as a passive. Thus the Targ. at Job 16[20] 'My pĕraḳlîṭs are my friends' (AV and RV 'My friends scorn me'); and at 33[23] the pĕraḳlîṭ is placed in antithesis to קָטֵיגוֹר, Gr. κατήγορος (in Rev 12[10] κατήγωρ), 'accuser.' At Job 16[2], however, where the LXX has παρακλήτωρ and the meaning is 'comforter,' the Targ. does not use pĕraḳlîṭ. The passages from the Talm. have been collected by Buxtorf, s.v. Perhaps the most pertinent example is found in Pirḳe Aboth, iv. 15 (see Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers[2], p. 69): 'Rabbi Li'ezer ben Jacob said, He who performs one precept has gotten to himself one advocate (פַּרְקְלִיט); and he who commits one transgression has gotten to himself one accuser (קָטֵיגוֹר).'

5. The Earliest Christian Writers.—We find the same passive sense—called to one's side, as advocate or intercessor—even in the early Christian writers, when they are using the word independently and not interpreting the NT use. Take II Ep. of Clement, vi. (Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, p. 46)—'Who shall be our advocate, unless we be found having holy and righteous works?' (τίς ἡμῶν παράκλητος ἔσται, ἐὰν μὴ εὑρεθῶμεν ἔργα ἔχοντες ὅσια καὶ δίκαια); and Ep. of Barnabas, xx. (Apost. Fathers, p. 274)—'advocates of the wealthy, unjust judges of the poor, sinful in all things' (πλουσίων παράκλητοι, πενήτων ἄνομοι κριταί, πενθαμάρτητοι).

ii. THE INTERPRETATION OF THE NT WORD.—It seems, then, that παράκλητος, wherever it is used outside and independently of the NT, agrees with its etymology. A passive participle in form, it follows the passive voice of the verb παρακαλεῖν in the meaning of 'called to one's side' for help, and especially against an accuser or judge. But the interpretation of the word as found in St. John's Gospel has not followed its etymology and usage. It has there been often understood to mean 'comforter' or 'consoler' (=ὁ παρακαλῶν). This is the prevailing interpretation in the Fathers and in the Versions, and it is still upheld by some modern expositors.

1. The Greek and Latin Fathers.—ORIGEN (as quoted in Latin by Ruffinus, de Princ. II. vii. 4) says, 'The Holy Spirit is called Paracletus from consolation. For in Latin παράκλησις is called consolatio. . . . But in 1 Jn paracletus is used of the Saviour in the sense of intercessor. For in Greek παράκλητος signifies both intercessor and consoler (deprecatorem et consolatorem).' Thus Origen gives to παράκλητος a double meaning, 'consoler' in the Gospel, 'intercessor' in the Epistle. But even 'intercessor' he takes from the active voice of παρακαλεῖν in the sense of 'request,' 'plead' (as in Mt 8[5] προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ ἑκατόνταρχος παρακαλῶν αὐτόν, 'There came to him a centurion beseeching him'), for in his Com. on St. John, i. 33 [38] (Brooke's ed. 1896, vol. i. p. 45), he says, 'But none of the names mentioned above expresses His representation of us with the Father, as He intercedes for the nature of men and atones for it, as the intercessor and propitiation and the atonement' (παρακαλοῦντος ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀνθρώπων φύσεως καὶ ἱλασκομένου, ὡς ὁ παράκλητος καὶ ἱλασμὸς καὶ τὸ ἱλαστήριον). CHRYSOSTOM in his Com. on Jn 14[16] says, 'He calls the Spirit παράκλητος because of the afflictions that then beset them'; but in his Hom. in Joh. lxxv., 'Concerning the Spirit He said . . . παράκλητος in order that they might not be disheartened in thinking there would be none to be their patron and helper.' CYRIL gives the meaning 'consoler'—Catech. xvi. 20, 'The Holy Spirit is called παράκλητος because He comforts and consoles and helps our infirmities' (διὰ τὸ παρακαλεῖν καὶ παραμυθεῖσθαι καὶ συναντιλαμβάνεσθαι τῆς ἀσθενείας ἡμῶν). With this the most of the Gr. Fathers agree. On the other hand, the Lat. Fathers (influenced probably by the early Lat. versions) generally use Advocatus (esp. in 1 Jn, very often Paracletus in the Gospel) as the trans., and seem to interpret as Advocate or Helper. But, as Pearson (On the Creed, p. 500, Bohn's ed.) has pointed out, it is probable that the Lat. writers when using advocatus mean consolator, 'for in the ancient Christian Latin, advocare signifieth "to comfort," and advocatio "consolation," as being the bare interpretations of παρακαλεῖν and παράκλησις.' Cf. Rönsch, It. u. Vulg. 348. Thus Tert. translates παρακαλέσαι πενθοῦντας (Is 61[2]) advocare languentes (adv. Marc. iv. 14). And both Hilary (Sumus nunc quidem consolati, quia Dominus ait, 'Mittet nobis Pater et alium Consolatorem'—Enar. in Ps. 125) and Aug. (Consolabuntur Spiritu Sancto, qui maxime propterea Paracletus nominatur, id est, Consolator—de Serm. Dom. in Monte, i. 2) as well as others, use consolator as the tr. of παράκλητος.

* Cf. Æsch. c. Ctesiph. § 200, τί δῆ σε Δημοσθένην παρακαλεῖν;

† Cf. Diog. Laert. Vita Bionis, iv. 50, τὸ ἱκανόν σοι ποιήσω, ἐὰν παρακλήτους ['a deputation' is Field's trans.] πέμψῃς, καὶ μὴ αὐτὸς ἔλθῃς.

2. Ancient and Modern Versions.—(1) The Old Latin has Advocatus in the Ep. in all copies; in the Gospel there is variation between Advocatus (Pal. at 15[26] 16[7]; Pal. Verc. Colb. at 14[16]) and Paracletus or *Paraclitus (Pal. Verc. Ver. Colb. Corb. in the other passages). (2) The Syriac versions seem to have retained the original word 'Paraclete' everywhere. So at least in all extant passages (Curetonian in Jn 14[16]; Pesh. in all places; Sin. in the Gospel). (3) The Arabic, Ethiopic, and Memphitic versions also retain 'Paraclete.' The Thebaic has 'Paraclete' in the Gosp., but in the Ep. 'One that prayeth for us' (Lightfoot, Fresh Rev.[2] 61). (4) The Vulg. has Paracletus (or Paraclitus) in the Gosp. and Advocatus in the Ep. (5) Wyclif and Purvey translated the Vulg. Paraclitus into 'Comforter' in the Gosp., and retained 'Advocate' from advocatus in the Ep. (1382 'we han avoket anentis the fadir'; 1388 [Purvey] 'we han an advocat anentis the fadir'). Luther likewise has 'Tröster' in Jn and 'Fürsprecher' in 1 Jn. Then Tindale also adopted 'Comforter' in the Gosp. and 'Advocate' in the Ep., and these translations have come down through all the Eng. versions, except the Rhemish, which in the Gosp. has taken 'Paraclete'† directly from the Vulgate.

It must be remembered that in the language of the English versions 'to comfort' is not always to console as it is in the English of the present day, and 'comfort' is not always consolation. Its first meaning, like the Latin con-fortare (from con intensive prefix, and fortis 'strong'), is to strengthen. Thus Wyclif's translation (1382) of Is 41[7] is 'he coumfortide hym with nailes, that it shulde not be moued' (1388, 'he fastenede hym with nailis'). Coverdale translates 2 S 27 'Let youre hande now therefore be comforted, and be ye stronge' (AV 'let your hands be strengthened, and be ye valiant'; RV 'let your hands be strong'). And AV gives in Job 10[20. 21] 'Let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return,' a translation which RV retains, though the same Hebrew word is translated 'recover strength' in Ps 39[13] by both versions. We next find the meaning exhort or exhortation, as Wyclif's translation of He 12[5] 'And ye han forgete the comforte that spekith to you as to sones.' And then encouragement (not necessarily to goodness), as in Wyclif's Select Works, iii. 328, 'Not to coumforte hem in here synne'; and in Cranmer's Works, i. 209, 'By your comfort the vulgar people conceiveth hatred towards such things as by the prince's commandment are set forth.'

But when Wyclif chose the word 'Comforter' to express the Latin Paracletus (he may have coined the word, since the earliest examples of 'comforter' yet discovered are in his writings), it is probable that the sense he desired to convey was 'one who consoles.' His translation (1382) of Job 16[2] is 'Alle yee ben hevye coumfortoures'; and this was the meaning which was attached to the Greek word παράκλητος and the Latin paracletus in the Church in his day. Any other sense, indeed, is somewhat rare. Lord Berners' Froissart (ch. cccl. Globe ed. p. 229) may be quoted for the meaning 'aider' or 'abettor': 'Who durst begin such a riot as to enterprise to slay the earl's baily holding the earl's banner in his hands, doing his office, without some bolsterer or comforter in their deed?'

iii. How has it come to pass that παράκλητος, which nowhere else has the meaning of 'consoler,' has been so generally taken in that sense in St. John's Gospel? The explanation must be found in the context. Our Lord, in promising the Paraclete, spoke of His own impending departure. The disciples' hearts were filled with sorrow. It is natural to understand that the Paraclete the Holy Ghost was promised to the disciples to console them for the loss of their Lord. And when that meaning was found in the context, it was easy to give it to the word itself. The same thing happened to advocatus in Latin; the sense of 'consoler' is equally unknown to that word outside ecclesiastical usage; Tertullian must have given it that meaning because he found it in his version as the designation of Him who was sent to console the disciples.

But the Paraclete was not sent to console the disciples. They did not really need consolation. If they had understood, no sorrow at Christ's departure would ever have filled their hearts. As soon as they did understand, the sorrow left them. Before the Paraclete came they 'returned to Jerusalem with great joy' (Lk 24[52]). As soon, indeed, as they realized the fact of Christ's resurrection their sorrow was turned into joy. Even the women 'departed quickly from the tomb with fear and great joy' (Mt 28[8]). But it was then that the battle with unbelief had to begin—the unbelief of their own hearts in part, but chiefly the unbelief of the world. And the Paraclete was sent to aid them in that strife.

In Jn 14[16. 26] 15[26] the reference seems to be to the unbelief or half-belief of the disciples' own hearts. The Paraclete as the Spirit of truth guides them into all the truth. He brings to their remembrance the things the Master had said to them; in the light of events He interprets these things; they understand that 'all is of God that is and is to be, and all is good.' He witnesses for Christ in their hearts; and then when they know that He is the Messiah, the Son of God and Saviour of the world, they are ready to be witnesses themselves (Jn 15[26. 27]).

In Jn 16[7] the Holy Spirit is the Paraclete of the disciples in their witness before the world. Just like the παράκλητος and advocatus of the ancients (but not quite as the advocate of our day), He comes to the disciples. 'I will send him unto you' (Jn 16[7]). He is their personal unofficial Friend; His services are at their disposal. In their debate with the world He is at their right hand that they may not be moved. Through them He convicts the world concerning sin, concerning righteousness, and concerning judgment—a conviction which means their acquittal and the world's condemnation.

In 1 Jn 2[1] it is Jesus Himself that is the Paraclete: 'If any man (i.e. here 'any believer') sin, we have a Paraclete with the Father, Jesus Christ

* On the spelling paraclitus see Hare's note in Mission of the Comforter, ii. 522, note Ja (in later ed. note K).

† The Rhem. version has the foll. marg. note to Jn 14[16], 'Paraclete by interpretation is either a comforter or an advocate; and therefore to translate it by any one of them only is perhaps to abridge the sense of this place.' There is no note on the tr. at 1 Jn 2[1], where the Vulg. 'advocatus' is given as 'advocate,' with the Gr. παράκλητον in the margin.

the righteous.' So the believer has a conflict in heaven as well as on the earth. The conflict upon the earth is with the sin of the world; the conflict in heaven is with his own sin. Through faith he wins the battle upon the earth, for 'this is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith' (1 Jn 5[4]). Through repentance he wins the victory in heaven. In both cases it is not he but his Paraclete that wins. Both victories are of grace, lest any man should boast. But why two Paracletes? Because the Holy Spirit has to do, not with the sin of man, but with his holiness. In so far as the believer does not sin, the Holy Spirit is his Paraclete. When he sins it is Jesus Christ that becomes his Paraclete. For Jesus has always to do with his sin, and Jesus only.

iv. The question remains, Which is the best translation?

1. COMFORTER is false to the etymology of the Greek word and to its usage, and it misses the meaning. The arguments used in its favour are these: (1) That it agrees with the Hellenistic usage of παρακαλεῖν 'to comfort' and παράκλησις 'comfort.' To which M'Clellan replies that this usage justifies the sense of 'comforter' for παρακλήτωρ but not for παράκλητος, which would rather be one comforted. 'It would be just as reasonable to contend that in harmony with the use of καλεῖν to "call," the word κλητός "called" (Ro 1[6, 7] etc.) signifies a caller; or that in harmony with the use of parere to "bring forth," parens signifies "a child."' (2) That the Eng. word 'comforter' really means 'strengthener' (so esp. Hare and Trench). It does not mean so now, however; and it has been shown that in the Eng. versions it probably never meant so. (3) That it is better to retain 'Comforter' 'on the ground of prescription and long familiarity.' So Field, who recalls Schaff's remark (Companion to Gr. Test. and Eng. Versions, p. 446) that 'after long deliberation the Revisers retained the dear old word.' Field does not blame the Revisers; but if it is to be retained he would derive it, not from παρακαλεῖν 'to console,' but from παρακαλεῖν 'to send for.' 'We send for a confidential friend on various occasions; and according to the particular service which we require from him he is our Counsellor in difficulties, or Advocate in danger, or our Comforter in distress.' But he warns against the apparent countenance given to the old favourite by the mistranslation of ὀρφανούς in Jn 14[18], AV 'comfortless'; RVm rightly 'orphans.'

2. ADVOCATE. This is the word approved of by most modern commentators. It has also no little 'prescription' in its favour. It is etymologically identical with παράκλητος. And it accounts for the passive form. The objection to 'Advocate' is that it does not in modern use correspond closely enough with either the Lat. advocatus or the Gr. παράκλητος. It answers fairly well to the Paraclete of 1 Jn, but in the Gosp. the Holy Spirit does not plead for but in or through the disciples.

3. INTERCESSOR. Pearson (On the Creed, pp. 499, 501) urges the adoption of 'Intercessor,' and others agree. Its fitness to express the Paraclete of 1 Jn is evident. And it is clear from certain passages (cf. the words already quoted from Demosth., τῶν παρακλήτων τούτων δεήσεις) that entreaty or intercession was at least part of the work of the Paraclete in the ancient law courts. But the word is somewhat restricted in meaning to cover all that is said of the Holy Spirit as Paraclete.

4. PARACLETE. It is perhaps best to transcribe the word, as has been done in so many versions, including the very oldest, and as the Eng. versions have unanimously done with 'Christ,' 'apostle,' 'deacon,' and other words. The objection to this is, not that it empties the word of all meaning (M'Clellan), for that is better than putting a wrong meaning into it, and it would gather its meaning for itself;* but that it might come to be applied as almost a proper name to the Holy Spirit, who is after all only 'another Paraclete' (Jn 14[16]). If this danger were avoided, it is the best word, for there is no English word in existence that covers the original both in the Gosp. and the Ep. and covers it exactly; and Paraclete, says Westcott (Lessons of RV, p. 94), 'is now almost naturalized among us.'

PARADISE (פַּרְדֵּס, παράδεισος, Paradisus, Fr Paradis, Ital. Paradiso, Sp. Parayso).—A word used in different applications in Scripture, and having an interesting history both before and after its appearance in the Bible. In all probability it is of Median or Persian origin.

Other explanations indeed have been given of it. Some fanciful etymologies have been proposed for it; e.g. from פרה and רשא, as if the root idea was 'bringing forth herbs'; from παρά and δείω, as if 'well watered'; from παρά and a supposititious δεῖσα with the sense of 'plant' or 'plants,' etc. (cf. Suidas and Suicer, s.v.). It has been taken by some from an Armenian source, pardez being Armenian for 'garden.' It has been held to have Sanskrit connexions. But the term pairadeça, with which it is thought to be in affinity, or from which it is supposed to come, means a 'foreign country' (from pairа =distant, and deça=country), and the likeness is only accidental (cf. Benfey, s.v.). A Semitic origin has been claimed for it by some scholars of repute. Fried. Delitzsch, e.g., suggests a Babylono-Assyrian source (cf. Wo lag das Paradies? pp. 95–97). But there is no evidence that the Assyrian people had the thing which was called by this name among the Persians; while, on the other hand, they expressed the idea of 'garden' or 'wood' by other words (cf. Schrader, COT ii. 71 f.). The attempt to find for the term a Semito-Assyrian or an Akkado-Sumerian etymology, therefore, is now generally given up, and most scholars are of opinion that the word comes from the Zend pairidaêza (cf. modern Persian and Arabic firdaus='garden,' 'paradise,' pl. faradis), meaning a wall enclosing something, and then the space enclosed, a park, a pleasure-ground, or hunting-ground (Ges. Thes. ii. 1124; Max Muller, Chips, iv. 22; Renan, Langues Sémitiques, II. i. 153; Justi, Zendsprache, 180; Lagarde, Ges. Abh. p. 75; Haug in Ewald's Jahrb. v. 162; Spiegel in Delitzsch's Hoheslied under ch. 4[13]; Noldeke, ZDMG xxxvi. 182; Skeat, Etymol. Dict. of Eng. Lang. s.v.). The old Greek etymologists also explained the word as of Persian origin. So Pollux (Onom. ix. ch. 3) expresses himself thus: οἱ δὲ παράδεισοι, βαρβαρικὸν εἶναι τοὔνομα, ἥκει καὶ μετὰ συνήθειαν εἰς χρῆσιν ἑλληνικήν, ὡς καὶ ἄλλα πόλλὰ τῶν περσικῶν.

The word came very early into use in English, e.g. in Layamon, l. 24,122. It was adopted by Wyclif in his rendering of Rev 27: 'To hym that overcometh Y Schal gyve to ete of the tre of lijf that is in the paradis of my God.' The different forms in which it has appeared, and the different things for which it has served as a name, make a curious story. It has been used to designate the magnificent parks of Persian monarchs, the original abode of man in his integrity and happiness, the residence of righteous souls in the intermediate state, and the heaven of the future. It has been employed as a figure of the Word of God by some of the Fathers (e.g. Chrys. Hom. I. ad pop. Antioch. t. vi. p. 448; Hom., Quod Scripturarum lectio utilis sit, t. viii. p. 111); and from these higher uses it has descended to be the name of humbler things—courts, porches, altars, berths, etc. The word parvis, denoting the outer court of a great house or palace, and more particularly the porch of a church, is supposed to be paradise in the Low Latin form paravisus, a Neapolitan paraviso being quoted as a variety of the Italian paradiso (Skeat, Etym. Dict. of Eng. Lang. s.v.). The church-porch is said to have been taken to represent paradise when the old mystery-plays were enacted in the yard. (Cf. Littré, s.v., and Tyrwhitt's ed. Cant. Tales, v. 183). The word (parvis, parvise, parvys) occurs in Chaucer—

> 'There was no wight in all Parys
> Before our ladie at parvys
> That he ne mighte bye the book
> To copy, if him talent took.'
>
> —(Rom. of Rose, 7108).

* Cf. 'demon' of RV for AV 'devil' (δαιμόνιον).

Among the Persians the term meant a royal park, the enclosed pleasure-ground of king or of noble, richly wooded, well watered, and amply stocked with game, comprehending at once the vivarium and the viridarium of the Romans. Classical Latin did not possess the word, and Roman writers of the classical period had to express the thing in a roundabout way (cf. Cicero, de Senect. 17). From Persia it passed over into later Hebrew and into Greek. It appears to have been introduced into the latter by Xenophon, and it occurs frequently in Greek writers from his period onwards. In these it is applied mostly to the great parks of the Persian kings. Numerous references are made to these, and large descriptions are given of them (cf. Xen. Anab. i. 2. 7, iii. 4. 14, Cyr. i. 3. 14, viii. 1. 38, Œc. iv. 13, 14, Hell. iv. 1. 15; Diodor. Sic. xvi. 41; Plut. Artax. 25; Theophr. Hist. Plant. v. 8. 1; Lucian, Ver. Hist. ii. 23; Ælian, Var. Hist. i. 33, etc.). The word seems to have been used sometimes also of smaller gardens or enclosures (Inscript. Car. in CIG 2694*b*). In the sense of 'park' it occurs also in Josephus and some of the Apocryphal books (Jos. Ant. VII. xiv. 4, VIII. vii. 3, IX. x. 4, X. iii. 2, etc., Bell. Jud. VI. i. 1; Sus v.[4] etc.; Sir 24[30]). It is explained to the same effect by Hesychius, Olympiodorus (Eccles. ch. ii. p. 611), Greg. Nyss. (Hom. IX. in Cantic. t. i. p. 611), etc.

It was taken over into the OT in the Hebrew form פַּרְדֵּס (LXX παράδεισος), and with the literal sense. It occurs thus in Ca 4[13] (RV 'orchard,' with marginal note, 'or, a paradise'); Ec 2[5] (AV 'gardens and orchards,' RV 'gardens and parks'); Neh 2[8] ('keeper of the king's forest,' where the reference is explicitly to the royal Persian park, in the primary sense. But the OT occurrences (in the Greek form) are not confined to these three cases. The word is exalted to a higher use, the Seventy having adopted it as their translation of the גַּן עֵדֶן in which man was placed at first by his Creator. The עֵדֶן is sometimes left as a proper name Ἐδέμ; sometimes it is reproduced in its etymological sense as τῆς τρυφῆς. So in the LXX (and a similar form is used in the Peshiṭta) παράδεισος, παράδεισος τῆς τρυφῆς, is the Garden of Eden (Gn 2[8. 10. 15] 3[2. 3. 23. 24]). Outside the record of man's creation and fall it was also used by the LXX where the Heb. has 'garden,' especially in figurative passages, or when the idea of the glory of man's first abode was in any way in view. In Gn 13[10], e.g., the plain of Jordan is said to be 'as the paradise of God' (ὡς ὁ παράδεισος τοῦ θεοῦ); Nu 24[6] Balaam describes the tents of Jacob and the tabernacles of Israel (ὡς νάπαι σκιάζουσαι καὶ ὡσεὶ παράδεισος ἐπὶ ποταμῶν). See also Is 1[30], Jl 2[3], Jer 29[5], and especially Ezk 31[8. 9], where it is said of the Assyrian under the figure of a great cedar tree in Lebanon that 'the cedars in the garden of God could not hide him' . . . 'nor any tree in the garden of God (ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ τοῦ θεοῦ) was like unto him in his beauty,' and that he was made so fair that 'all the trees of Eden that were in the garden of God (τὰ ξύλα τοῦ παραδείσου τῆς τρυφῆς τοῦ θεοῦ) envied him.'

In the NT it is raised to still higher uses. The primeval Eden gives place to a 'garden of God' that is not of earth, the thought of the Paradise of the past is lost in the hope of a Paradise of the future, and the word becomes a name for the scene of rest and recompense for the righteous after death. Only the most sparing use, however, is made of it in the NT. While the idea which it expresses appears more frequently, the word itself occurs only in three passages—once in the Gospels (Lk 23[43]), once in the Epp. (2 Co 12[4]), and once in the Apoc. (2[7]). The history of the term suggests reasons for this remarkable abstention in the case of the NT writings. To understand the place which it has in these writings, and to define its precise meaning in these few passages, it is necessary to look into the course which Hebrew thought took on the subject of Sheol and a future existence after the close of OT prophecy, and into the condition of popular Jewish belief in the times of Christ and the Apostles. It is of the greatest importance to know the ideas which had become connected with the term 'Paradise' and its cognates in the various sections of Judaism.

In some cases 'Paradise,' the 'garden of Eden,' and such terms, lost their objective meaning, and were made symbols of spiritual things. The tendency to idealize is seen, e.g., in Sirach, where the rivers of Eden become symbols of the streams of true wisdom (Sir 24[25-30]). It appears, too, in the Psalms of Solomon, where we have the 'garden of the Lord' and the 'trees of life' introduced as figures of the saints in their blessedness—ὁ παράδεισος κυρίου, τὰ ξύλα τῆς ζωῆς ὅσιοι αὐτοῦ (14[2]). It is seen in its absoluteness in the philosophizing Judaism of Alexandria. To Philo himself 'Paradise' was a symbol of ἀρετή, or spiritual excellence. The spiritualizing method of interpretation, however, was limited for the most part to that school, and was not of a kind to affect popular Jewish thought to any great extent. The prevailing tendency was in the opposite direction. To what extremes of literalism and curious circumstantial definition it ran, and in what extravagant and incongruous speculation it indulged, can be gathered from the Rabbinical literature and from the Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphical writings.

Fancy ran riot in the Rabbinical schools on the subject of Paradise, its location, its extent, its glories, etc. The Rabbinical theology as it has come down to us exhibits an extraordinary medley of ideas on these questions, and in the case of many of them it is difficult to determine the dates to which they should be assigned. In some Rabbinical books פַּרְדֵּס is used for Paradise; which has, however, the sense of 'park' in the Mishna and Targums. But the more frequent term is the OT גַּן עֵדֶן. The primeval garden of Eden was held by some to exist still, and to lie in the distant east. Paradise was regarded as created before the world. In later Jewish theology it had seven names, and copious rhetorical descriptions of its blessedness abounded. Two gates of rubies were said to lead into it. Beside them stand sixty myriads of holy angels, with countenances shining like the light of heaven. When a righteous man enters, the vestures of death are taken off him; he is clad in eight robes of the clouds of glory; two crowns are placed upon his head—one of pearls and precious stones, another of gold of Parvaim; eight myrtles are put into his hand; he is lauded and hailed with words of welcome, etc. (Jalkut Schim., Beresch. 20). It was believed also that in Paradise there are degrees of blessedness (Baba bathra 75*a*). Seven ranks or orders of the righteous were said to exist within it, and definitions were given both of those to whom these different positions belonged and of the glories belonging to each. Taking the literature as it is, it might appear that Paradise was regarded by some as on earth itself, by others as forming part of Sheol, by others still as neither on earth nor under earth, but in heaven; while some also held that there were two Paradises—one in heaven, for those who are perfect in holiness, and one on earth, for those who come short of that. But there is some doubt as respects, at least, part of this. These various conceptions are found indeed in later Judaism. They appear most precisely and most in detail in the mediæval Cabbalistic Judaism; in which also extravagant descriptions are given of the relations of the earthly Paradise and the heavenly, the latter being declared to be sixty times as large as the lower earth (Eisenmenger, Entd. Jud. ii. 297). But it is uncertain how far back these things can be carried. The older Jewish theology at least, as it is represented in the Rabbinical literature, seems to give little or no place to the idea of an intermediate Paradise. It speaks of a Gehinnom for the wicked, and a Gan Eden, or garden of Eden, for the just. It is questionable whether it goes beyond these conceptions and affirms a Paradise in Sheol (cf. Weber, Jüd. Theol. 244, etc.).

Of more importance, however, is the witness of the Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphical writings. These books reflect a remarkable variety of opinions, which it is impossible to harmonize, and many of which were extremely fantastic. In the later Jewish belief Sheol appears to be regarded as a place of moral issues, with preliminary rewards and punishments, and with different divisions in it for different classes of the departed. The more prevalent view seems to have been that the world of the dead had two sections separated by a wall or a chasm—one for the righteous, and one for the unrighteous. But the opinion also was held that Sheol had four divisions—one for the righteous who on earth suffered death for their righteousness' sake; one for sinners who on earth suffered penalty for their sins; one for others of the just; and one for sinners who were not punished on earth (Enoch 20, 102^{15}). But in addition to these, which were no doubt the prevalent beliefs and were held especially by the Pharisees, there was also the opinion, favoured especially by Jews influenced by Alexandrian thought, that the separation of the righteous from the unrighteous took place immediately after death, and that the souls of the just were received by God into heaven (Wisdom 3^{14} 4^{10} $5^{5.17}$; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 3, Bell. Jud. II. viii. 14). The Essenes, again, are reported to have held the abode of the departed just to be neither in the under-world nor in heaven, but in a Paradise belonging to earth itself; and this idea also appears elsewhere (e.g. Enoch $32^{3.23}$ etc.). There is reason to say that by our Lord's time various ideas of Paradise had become current among the Jewish people. So that sometimes it was thought of as an earthly place or scene, sometimes as a heavenly, sometimes as a thing of the distant future. Sometimes it was supposed to be hid in heaven and to be destined to reveal itself on earth, and sometimes it was supposed to be destined to realize itself in the perfected theocracy, and to be transported to Sion.

This idea of a Paradise somewhere on earth appears frequently in the Book of Enoch, in the Book of Jubilees (ch. 4), and elsewhere. It persisted into Christian times, and on even to the Middle Ages (cf. Thilo, Cod. Apoc. etc.). In 4 Ezr we find also the idea that the Paradise which formed the dwelling-place of man in his integrity was made before the earth (1^{7}). It is implied in this that the original Paradise was not of the earth, and so the book speaks elsewhere of a heavenly Paradise (6^{51-76}). And this upper Paradise is practically a Paradise of the future. Select souls, such as Enoch, Elijah, Moses, are indeed received into it immediately, and Ezra himself was to be so received. But it is not exhibited as the present dwelling-place of the righteous generally. These pass into preliminary abodes in the underworld.

A special interest belongs here to the Book of Enoch, although the composite nature of its contents and the different ideas which are expressed in its different sections make it difficult to define the precise force of its testimony as a whole. In its more recent parts and in the Noahic fragments the primeval Paradise is in view, and it is described repeatedly as on earth itself (20^{7}), among the more mysterious parts of earth (65^{2} 106^{8}), in the east of the earth. It is visited by Enoch in his journey (32). Enoch and Elijah are taken up into it (60^{8} $87^{3.4}$ 89^{52}), and other righteous souls are understood to be included ($60^{8.23}$). The general idea of the under-world as the gathering place of all the dead, with different sections in it for the evil and the good, seems at the same time to subsist (32. 102^{11} 103^{7}). In the older parts of the book, again, the Messianic kingdom is represented as one hid in heaven at present, and to be revealed on earth hereafter; and in these parts the dwellings of the righteous appear to be heavenly abodes (39^{4} $41^{1.2}$ 43^{1} 70^{4} 71^{14-17}). The passages bearing more directly on Paradise itself are these:—32^{3-6}, which speaks of the 'garden of justice,' with its varieties of trees, and refers to the earthly Paradise; $60^{8.23}$, which also speaks of the 'garden where the chosen and holy ones shall dwell'—'the garden of the just'; 61^{12}, which refers to the 'chosen who dwell in the garden of life'; $70^{3.4}$, in which the seer is said to have seen the 'place for the chosen and the just,' and in it 'the first fathers and the just, who dwell in the place from the beginning'; and 77^{3}, where the 'fourth quarter called the north' is said to be divided into three parts—one for the dwelling of men, one for the seas, the valleys, the winds, and the streams, and the third for 'the garden of justice.' The ideas which are expressed in these passages, therefore, are far from consistent, and the same is still more obviously the case with the book as a whole. In 37–7 and in the Noahic fragments the garden is the abode of the departed just; but in 1–37 the righteous dead dwell in a special division of Sheol. The garden in view in 32^{3} etc. is the earthly Paradise; but in 37–70 it is the heavenly. The locality of Paradise varies in different sections. In $32^{2.3}$ the garden lies in the east; in 70^{2-4} between north and west; in 77^{3} in the north. The accounts of those who people it also differ. In 32^{3} it appears to be empty; in $60^{8.23}$ 61^{12} it is the abode of the righteous and elect in Enoch and Noah's time; in 70^{2-4} the fathers are found in it; in 89^{52} it is described as receiving Enoch and Elijah. (See the editions of the Book of Enoch by Dillmann, Schodde, and Charles).

Among other writings of this class a special value belongs also to the Apocalypse of Baruch. The idea that the earthly tabernacle and its contents were copies of antitypes or originals in heaven (Ex $25^{9\ 40}$, He 8^{5}) is applied in this book to the holy city. In B^{1} (ch. 6^{9}) Jerusalem, the centre of the new theocracy, is described as destined to be restored and established for ever; in which case it is the Jerusalem of earth that is in view. But elsewhere (4^{3} 30^{2-4}) it is the heavenly Jerusalem that appears—the city that is preserved in heaven and is to come from heaven. In this connexion the book speaks also of Paradise, of the counsel which the Lord took to make it, and of its preservation with the Lord in heaven. In ch. 4^{3-6} (in a passage, however, which is suspected of being an interpolation) God is represented as speaking of the city as that which 'will be revealed' with Him; which was 'prepared beforehand' from the time when He 'took counsel to make Paradise, and showed it to Adam before he sinned'; which was removed from Adam, 'as also Paradise,' when he transgressed; which was shown afterwards to 'Abraham by night among the portions of the victims,' and again to Moses on Mount Sinai; of which also the Lord says, 'And now, behold, it is preserved with me, as also Paradise.' In ch. 59^{8}, too, we are told how the Lord showed to Moses 'the height of the air and the greatness of Paradise, and the consummation of the ages, and the beginning of the day of judgment'; as in the Book of Enoch (61^{1-4} $70^{3.4}$) the angels are said to take the measures of Paradise for Enoch.

The ideas, therefore, which had become connected with the terms גַּן עֵדֶן, παράδεισος, and the like, were of a very mixed kind—crude, fantastic, and inconsistent. They impressed themselves in their sensuousness, extravagance, and confusion on the popular Jewish sentiment and belief. There was much in the history and associations of the word παράδεισος that made it a doubtful vehicle for the communication of spiritual truths, but a very ready instrument of fanciful and overdriven speculation. Much is made of it in the Apocryphal Gospels and Apocalypses. In the Gospel of Nicodemus, in particular, a considerable place is given it. In the section on the 'Descent of Christ into Hell' the story is told in large and swelling terms of the Saviour's victory over Satan—how He sprang out of Hades and set out to Paradise, taking Adam and all the just and delivering them to the archangel Michael; how, as they were entering the door of Paradise, they were met by Enoch and Elijah; how there came to them also a lowly man carrying a cross upon his shoulders, who declared himself to be the thief who was crucified with Christ and received the promise of Paradise; how the robber described himself to have come to Paradise bearing his cross, and to have been received by Michael; how the flaming sword, seeing the sign of the cross, opened to him, so that he went in, and so forth (ch. ii. 25, 26, Greek form). In sharpest contrast with all this is the NT way of dealing with the subject and with the term. The general reticence of the NT writings on the question of Paradise, and their extreme sparingness in the use of the word, are remarkable. Neither in Gospel nor in Epistle is the word selected for the purposes of direct instruction. In speaking of the blessedness of the future, our Lord makes use of figures of speech taken from marriage feasts, the drinking of wine, and the like. But He never employs the term 'Paradise,' so far as the Gospels show, either in His public discourses or in words addressed more privately to His disciples. Nor does St. Paul use it anywhere in the argument of his Epp. The one occasion on which it occurs in his writings is in his account of a singular experience of his own belonging to the region of rapture or ecstasy, and expressed in apocalyptic terms.

It has been asked what view of 'Paradise' is expressed by our Lord Himself in His words from the cross (Lk 23^{43}). Some have argued strongly that His promise to the robber was a promise of entrance with Himself into the happy side of Sheol; others that it meant that the penitent thief would be taken with Himself, as it was believed had been the case with Enoch, Elijah, and Moses, immediately into heaven. It is certain that the belief in a lower Paradise prevailed among the Jews, as well as the belief in an upper or heavenly Paradise. But it is not clear that the lower Paradise was ever conceived to be in the under-world, or that the happy side of Hades was called by that name. The probability, looking at the witness of the Jewish literature, is on the side of the second interpretation, that Christ referred to the Paradise of heaven. But it is difficult to say what sense the robber would attach to the word. It would give him the solace which he needed—the hope of rest and happiness associated with the idea of Eden. It is questionable whether it can be pressed beyond that large and general idea. To bring it into the service of the dogma of the Descensus ad inferos, in the Lutheran sense or any other, seems to the present writer to be beyond the mark. Some have even identified it with the φυλακή of 1 P 3^{19} (e.g. Horsley), and have drawn remarkable inferences from it with regard to Christ's preaching to the spirits in prison. But this is surely in defiance of the Greek usage.

It has been held, too, that the 'Paradise' of Lk 23^{43} is identical with the 'Abraham's bosom' of Lk $16^{22.\ 23}$, both being designations of a particular division of the under-world. But in the Parable it is only the rich man that is described as in Hades, while of Lazarus it is said simply that dying he was carried into 'Abraham's bosom.' Even granting that the Parable is meant to represent the rich man and the beggar as both in Hades, the one in the division of retribution and the other in that of reward, it would not follow that 'Paradise' and 'Abraham's bosom' are synonymous. The point would be, that being in Paradise the beggar is received into the fellowship of Abraham (see Meyer on Lk 16^{22}; also art. ABRAHAM'S BOSOM).

In 2 Co 12^{4} it is the heavenly Paradise, not the lower or earthly, obviously, that is in view. It is impossible to understand it, in this case of rapture, of the intermediate state or any place in Hades. Neither does it satisfy the terms to say that παράδεισος here is nothing more than an abstraction or a figure of speech for 'the present communion of the blessed dead with God as it is on this side of the end of things' (Hofm. Schriftbeweis, II. i. p. 489). It denotes the heaven that is the dwelling-place of God. The question of the relation in which the 'Paradise' of v.[4] stands to the 'third heaven' of v.[2], however, is much debated. It has been supposed that St. Paul has the doctrine of a threefold heaven in view here, and identifies Paradise with the third or highest heaven. There is abundant evidence indeed that the belief in a plurality of heavens prevailed among the Jews. But it is doubtful whether it was a belief in a threefold heaven. The doctrine of a threefold division of heaven, it is true, obtained at one time a considerable place in the Christian Church (Suicer, Thes. ii. p. 520, etc.) and it has been asserted by some even to be the doctrine of the Bible (Estius, le Clerc, etc.). But the evidence is rather to the effect that the prevailing, if not the only, conception among the Jews of our Lord's time was that of a sevenfold heaven. (See article on HEAVEN). It is improbable, therefore, that St. Paul speaks with reference to a triple order of heavens. The main reason for questioning whether in this passage he identifies 'Paradise' with the 'third heaven' is that he seems rather to be indicating distinct stages in his rapture—up to the third heaven, and even to Paradise. The chief argument in favour of the identification is the fact that in the Pseudepigraphical literature Paradise is sometimes placed in the third heaven. In the Slavonic Enoch, e.g., it is said that in the third heaven the seer beheld, in the midst thereof, 'the tree of life, in that place on which God rests, when He comes into Paradise' (ch. 8)—a passage in which an attempt seems to be made to reduce to one the older idea of an earthly Paradise and the later idea of a heavenly (cf. Morfill and Charles, Book of the Secrets of Enoch, p. xxxvii and pp. 7, 8). The words of St. Paul do not themselves define how the 'third heaven' and 'Paradise' are related.

In Rev 2^{7}, where the reading 'in the Paradise of God' is to be preferred, it is the heavenly Paradise that is in view. The imagery is taken again from the picture of Eden in Genesis. The terms recall Ezk 28^{13}. In briefer form they express what is given with greater fulness of description in 22^{1-5}. The promise being to him that overcometh, is a promise of the final recompense and blessedness under the figure of a restored Eden. Some, however (e.g. Bleek), have taken it to be founded on the idea that the primeval Paradise of Adam still exists somewhere.

The idea expressed by the word Paradise has prevailed widely. Many different peoples have had the conception of a Paradise in the sense of a home of innocence and peace and blessedness on earth or its confines. The Hindus have had their visions of Meru, the mountain of the gods, whence flow the great streams into all the world. The Arabs have dreamt of the garden of bliss on the summit of the hill of jacinth, in the East. Iranian thought has dwelt upon the stream Arvanda, that went out of the throne of Ahuramazda to water the earth, and on Airyanavaejo, the land in the extreme East, among the sources of the Oxus and Jaxartes—in later Persian ideas a fabulous land. The term Pardêsu is reported to have been found on some Babylonian cuneiform tablets, coupled with the land of Bit-Napsanu as the name of a country, apparently mythological; and the resemblance to the word Paradise פַּרְדֵּס is noticed. (See art. EDEN, vol. i. p. 644). The Chinese and many ruder races have also had the same idea, and have clothed it in many strange forms.

Theologians have also given the rein to fancy and speculation on the subject. They have often overlooked the restraint of Scripture, and have gone in the way of Rabbinical definition and refinements. The Patristic writings give much attention to Paradise. Some of the Fathers spoke of it as a resting-place or refrigerium, in which the righteous dead have visions of Christ and His saints and angels (Just. Martyr, Resp. ad Orthod. 75, 85). Some distinguished between Paradise and heaven. Irenæus refers to what the presbyters said of a distinction between awards,—how some shall go to heaven, some to Paradise, and some to the splendour of the city; those who produce an hundredfold being taken up into the heavens, those who produce sixtyfold being destined to dwell in Paradise, and those who produce thirtyfold being to inhabit the city (adv. Hær. v. 1, 2). Some, descending to more detail, taught that no one enters at once into the presence of the Lord in Paradise except by the prerogative of martyrdom, but that all pass into Hades. Tertullian dwells at length upon the Christian idea of Hades and the blessedness of Paradise immediately after death. He explains the Christian belief to be that Hades is 'a very deep space in the interior of the earth'; that the souls of the faithful pass into it; and that heaven shall be opened only after earth has passed away. 'Shall we then have to sleep,' he asks, 'high up in ether, with the boy-loving worthies of Plato; or in the air with Arius; or around the moon with the Endymions of the Stoics? No, but in Paradise, you tell me, whither already the patriarchs and prophets have removed from Hades in the retinue of the Lord's resurrection. How is it, then, that the region of Paradise, which, as revealed to John in the Spirit, lay under the altar, displays no other souls as in it besides the souls of the martyred?' (de Anima, ch. xliii., and espec. ch. lv.; Clark's 'Ante-Nicene Lib.'). Origen held it to be somewhere on earth, and to be a kind of schoolroom for souls. 'I think, therefore,' he says, 'that all the saints who depart from this life will remain in some place situated on the earth, which holy Scripture calls Paradise, as in some place of instruction, and, so to speak, classroom or school of souls, in which they are to be instructed regarding all the things which they had seen on earth, and are to receive also some information respecting things that are to follow in the future.' And he adds that 'if any one indeed be pure in heart, and holy in mind, and more practised in perception, he will, by making more rapid progress, quickly ascend to a place in the air, and reach the kingdom of heaven through these mansions, so to speak, to the various places which the Greeks have termed spheres, i.e. globes, but which holy Scripture has called heavens' (de Princ. bk. ii. ch. ix. 6; Clark's 'Ante-Nicene Lib.'). Augustine, too, in his great treatise on the City of God, discoursed of the primeval Paradise as both physical and spiritual, and went into curious discussions on the conditions of life in it. The leading theologian of the Greek Church gave a chapter to it in his great dogmatic work, describing the 'divine Paradise' as planted in Eden by the hands of God, on a site 'higher in the East than all the earth,' flooded with light and transcending imagination 'in sensuous freshness and beauty' (John of Damasc. de Fide Orth. ch. xi.). Mediæval Latin Theology and Roman Catholic Dogmatics have dealt largely with it in connexion with the doctrine of the Intermediate State. In these systems Paradise has been identified with the Limbus Patrum, and some notable divines of the Roman Catholic Church have taught further that Christ, in His Descent to Hell, preached to those in Paradise on the fringe of Hades, as well as to the souls in Purgatory (so Estius). And in some modern theologies, Lutheran and Anglican no less than Tridentine, much has been made of it in connexion with the Doctrines of a Middle State, the position of the righteous dead before Christ's Advent, and the like. But all this is in the most singular contrast with the silence and reserve of Scripture, and is of little profit.

PARALYSIS, PARALYTIC.—See MEDICINE, p. 326.

PARAN (פָּארָן, Φαράν) occurs in Gn 14[6] 21[21], Nu 10[12] 12[16] 13[3. 26], Dt 1[1] 33[2], 1 S 25[1], 1 K 11[18], Hab 3[3]. Note the insertion in Nu 33[36] by LXX after the word 'Zin,' 'and they removed from the wilderness of Zin and pitched in the wilderness of Paran.' Paran is here introduced into the itinerary of Nu 33 and identified with Kadesh as in Nu 13[26] ('and they went and came to Moses and to Aaron . . . unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh'). κατασκίου δασέος in LXX of Hab 3[3] should not be passed by unnoticed.

Of these passages two are poetical, and contain the expression 'Mount Paran' or the mountains of Paran (Dt 33[2], Hab 3[3]). With these should be compared the opening verses of the Song of Deborah (Jg 5) and of Ps 68. The similarity of thought in these passages is evident. Although there is some variation in the use of proper names (e.g. Paran occurs only in the first two, and Sinai is not found in Hab), yet one idea is prominent in all, that God comes forth from His holy habitation as a deliverer of His people when in distress. Around Him rages the thunderstorm, and at His presence the hills melt. Sinai, Seir, the Field of Edom, Teman are mentioned as the region whence He 'came' or 'shined forth,' and the mountains of Paran form part of that region. If the emendation of Dt 33[2] noticed in art. MERIBAH be accepted, Mt. Paran stands in parallelism with Kadesh, as well as in close connexion with Sinai and Seir.

El-paran (? the terebinth of Paran) occurs in the description of Chedorlaomer's campaign in Gn 14[6]. It appears to have been the southern limit of the expedition which 'smote the Hivites in their mount Seir' and returned to 'En-mishpat, which is Kadesh.' Here the indications of position are similar to those in the poetical passages; El-paran is in the neighbourhood of Seir and Kadesh. It is 'by the wilderness,' with which may be compared the expression 'wilderness of Paran' occurring elsewhere. El-paran is by many identified with Elath at the head of the Gulf of Akabah. In Dt 1[1] the connexion between the names mentioned and the context is so uncertain that no inference can be drawn. The LXX of 1 S 25[1] has Μαάν in B, Φαράν in A. The MT may be questioned here; but if it be accepted, the wilderness of Paran extended into the southern part of Judah.

According to 1 K 11[18] Hadad, with a company of his father's servants, fled from Edom to Midian, and then passed through Paran on their way to Egypt. The remaining passages all contain the expression 'the wilderness of Paran.' In Gn 21[21]

it is Ishmael's place of abode when he and his mother Hagar are driven away at Sarah's instigation. From the context it seems to be on the way from Beersheba to Egypt. In the narrative of Hagar's flight, contained in Gn 16 (which is considered by many as another version of the same tradition), the well where the angel of the Lord appeared to her was between Kadesh and Bered. The connexion between Kadesh and Paran is most marked in the passages which have yet to be considered. They are all in Nu, and given above. According to 10^{12}, when the children of Israel moved out of the wilderness of Sinai the cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran, so that the wilderness of Paran is regarded as adjoining that of Sinai. According to 12^{16} the people pitched in the wilderness of Paran after the encampments at Taberah, Kibroth-hattaavah, and Hazeroth. According to $13^{3.\ 26}$ the spies were sent from the wilderness of Paran to search the land, and returned to the same place after completing their search. The account in Dt 1 gives Kadesh as the place whence the spies were sent (cf. Nu 13^{26}). From these notices it appears that the wilderness of Paran stretched from the wilderness of Sinai to the border of the Promised Land, and the inference from Nu 13^{26} as well as from comparison of the accounts in Nu and Dt is that Kadesh was within its border. The position is thus indicated as south of Palestine and west of Edom, a position which accords generally with the other passages in which Paran is mentioned. The positions of Sinai, Kadesh, and Hormah must be determined before anything more definite can be stated as to the boundaries of the wilderness of Paran, and the articles on these names may be consulted. Some remarks will be found in § iv. of art. EXODUS (vol. i. p. 804b) on the connexion between Paran and Zin, and it is there stated that Paran does not occur in the itinerary of Nu 33. The attempt of the LXX to supply this deficiency (referred to above) adds to the difficulty by making Paran follow Zin. See ZIN. A. T. CHAPMAN.

PARBAR (פַּרְבָּר,—as pointed, with the art.).—A colonnade (it is supposed) on the W. side of the outer temple-court, mentioned in 1 Ch 26^{18} as a place at which six of the gatekeepers were stationed, four apparently outside, at the 'causeway' (v.^{16}), and two in the 'Parbar' itself. The account purports to be a description of the arrangements made by David, but in reality it refers to those of the Chronicler's own time, as the word Parbar alone is sufficient to show; for this is certainly not a native Hebrew word, and to all appearance it is Persian. As Ges. (Thes.) observed, 'parbār' agrees closely with the Pers. parwār (acc. to Ges. from par 'light,' and -bār a termination meaning 'possessing'), a summer-house or open kiosk; and so it is supposed to have found its way into late Hebrew—like apadâna, for instance, in Dn 11^{45}—with the sense of a sun-lighted portico or colonnade. What is generally explained as the same word, in a form exactly corresponding to the Persian, occurs in the plur. (פַּרְוָרִים; LXX φαρουρειμ) in 2 K 23^{11}, where the horses given by the kings of Judah to the sun are said to have stood 'by the chamber (לִשְׁכַּת) of Nathan-melech the eunuch, which was in the colonnades.'* In the Targums (occasionally) and in the Mishna, etc., parwār occurs in the sense of the suburbs of a city (e.g. of Jerusalem), probably (as Ges. observed) because in Oriental cities, as with us, such suburbs would consist largely of the open summer-houses of the wealthy. This usage is the source of AV 'suburbs' (cf. Targ. פרוריא) in 2 K 23^{11}, and of RV 'precincts' (2 K 23^{11}, and marg. of 1 Ch 26^{18}); but the sense thus obtained is not suitable in either passage. By what means, however, a Persian word can have reached Judah before the Exile (2 K 23), is difficult to understand: if this explanation of the word in 2 K 23^{11} is correct, the text would seem to have been adjusted to post-exilic usage.

PARCEL.—Derived from Lat. particula (dim. of pars a 'part') through Fr. parcelle, a parcel is 'a small part' of anything; and that is the primitive sense in which it is used in AV. The words so tr. are (1) חֶלְקָה ḥelḳāh (Gn 33^{19}, Jos 24^{32}, Ru 4^{3}, 1 Ch $11^{13.\ 14}$), and χωρίον (Jn 4^{5}); and as both words mean specifically a portion (or 'plot,' as 1 Ch $11^{13.\ 14}$ RV) of land, it is always to land (and not, as now, to something that can be carried) that the word is applied. It was, however, used of 'a part' or 'a small part' of almost anything, as Erasmus, Commune Crede, fol. 18, 'Sanctorum communionem. The communion of saynctes. This parcel certayne men do so understonde, that it do by apposytion expounde the nexte parcel goyng before, whiche is sanctam ecclesiam catholicam, The holy catholike churche.' So T. Adams, Works, i. p. xix—'These Meditations, which before were scattered abroad in parcels, are now presented to thee in one entire volume.' Shaks. has it exactly as we now use 'particle,' I Henry IV. III. ii. 159—

> 'I will die a hundred thousand deaths
> Ere break the smallest parcel of this vow.'

PARCHED CORN.—To parch is to scorch, as in Mt 13^{6} Rhem., 'After the sun was up, they parched,' where it is used intransitively. The trans. use is more common, as Sir 43^{3} 'At noon it [the sun] parcheth the country' (ἀναξηραίνει, RV 'drieth'); but it is rarely used except in the ptcp. 'parched.' Parched is used of the ground (Is 35^{7},* Jer 17^{6}, Sir 43^{3}) as we still use it. But it is also used of corn (Lv 23^{14}, Jos 5^{11}, Ru 2^{14}, 1 S 17^{17} 25^{18}, 2 S 17^{28}) in the obsolete sense of 'roasted.' Cf. Haliburton, Sam Slick, Clockmaker, xxv—'Marm Porter moved about as brisk as a parched pea.' The process of parching corn is described by Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 40 f., 'A quantity of the best ears, not too ripe, are plucked with the stalks attached. These are tied in small parcels, a blazing fire is kindled with dry grass and thorn bushes, and the corn-heads are held in it until the chaff is mostly burned off. When the grain is sufficiently roasted, it is rubbed out in the hand and eaten as there is occasion.' See also Robinson, BRP ii. 50 f., 'In the season of harvest, the grains of wheat, not yet fully dry and hard, are roasted in a pan or on an iron plate, and constitute a very palatable article of food. Indeed, the use of it is so common at this season among the labouring classes, that this parched wheat is sold in the markets.'

PARCHMENT.—Parchment is a writing material prepared from the skin of the sheep or goat. 'The skins are first soaked in lime to remove the hair,

* For a conjectural site, cf. Schick's art. on ancient Jerus., PEFQSt, 1894, p. 13, with the accompanying Plan.

* Is 35^{7} 'The parched ground shall become a pool.' The word rendered 'parched ground' here is שָׁרָב shārābh, which occurs also in Is 49^{10} and nowhere else. As the Arab. word for the mirage is serâb, and as the idea of the mirage suits the sense here, it has generally been understood that the prophet's meaning is that where there is only the mocking semblance of water there will be found real pools. Cf. Koran (Sura xxiv 39—quoted in Ges. and Skinner)—

> 'The works of the unbelievers are like the mirage in the desert,
> The thirsty takes it for water, till he comes up to it and finds that it is nothing.'

But this sense is less suitable to the other passage; so RV has here 'glowing sand' and at 49^{10} 'heat,' with 'mirage' in the marg. at both places (see, further, Cheyne, Intr. to Is. 26 and are then shaved, washed, dried, stretched, and ground or smoothed with fine chalk or lime and pumice-stone.' The finest kind is made from the skins of calves or kids, and called vellum. The Eng. word 'parchment' is a form of pergamina or pergamena (Gr. περγαμηνή), an adj. signifying 'of Pergamum,' the city of Pergamum (now Bergamo) in Asia Minor being the place where parchment was invented, or at least brought into use. The t is no proper part of the Eng. word which was adopted from the Fr. parchemin. Chaucer says (Bœthius, v. iv. 14, Skeat's ed. p. 200), 'Thilke Stoiciens wenden that the sowle hadde ben naked of it-self, as a mirour or a clene parchemin, so that alle figures mosten first comen fro thinges fro withoute-forth in-to sowles, and ben empreinted in-to sowles.' The word occurs only in 2 Ti 4^{13}, where St. Paul asks Timothy to bring to him the cloke which he left at Troas, 'and the books, especially the parchments' (καὶ τὰ βιβλία, μάλιστα τὰς μεμβράνας). The Greek word is simply the Lat. membrana (properly an adj. membrana cutis, from membrum, a limb, member of the body), the skin, parchment. This is its only occurrence in bibl. Greek. It is impossible to say what the parchments were, or why they chiefly were wanted. Perhaps they were more precious than the books because parchment and not paper (papyrus); they may even have been vellum.* Perhaps their value was in their contents—the Old Test. in Greek (Kenyon), his diploma of Roman citizenship (Farrar), his 'commonplace books' (Bull), or even a copy of the Grundschrift of the Gospels (Latham).

PARDON.—See FORGIVENESS in vol. ii. p. 56.

PARENT.—See FAMILY in vol. i. p. 848.

PARLOUR occurs in AV as translation of three different Heb. words. 1. עֲלִיָּה, used of the room in which Eglon, king of Moab, was interviewed and assassinated by Ehud, Jg $3^{20.\ 23.\ 24.\ 25}$ (LXX ὑπερῷον, cf. Ac 1^{13} $9^{37.\ 39}$ 20^{8}). This was an upper storey 'raised above the flat roof of the house at one corner, or upon a tower-like annex to the building,' containing generally only a single apartment, thoroughly ventilated by lattice windows on all sides, and constituting the most comfortable part of the house (see Moore, Judges, pp. 96, 98, and cf. also such passages as 1 K $17^{19.\ 23}$, 2 K 1^{2} $4^{10.\ 11}$, Jer $22^{13.\ 14}$, Neh $3^{31.\ 32}$). Moore's rendering 'roof-chamber' is much more suitable than 'parlour,' which is most unfortunately retained by RV, although American RV has 'upper room.' 2. לִשְׁכָּה (RV 'guest-chamber,' LXX κατάλυμα), 1 S 9^{22}. This was a room in which the sacrificial meals at the bāmāh were held (cf. the mention in 1 S 1^{18} [in the LXX, according to which the MT ought to be restored—Wellh., Driver, etc.] of a lishkah also at Shiloh, near the הֵיכָל יהוה). A suitable rendering would be 'sacrificial dining-room.' In later times the Heb. word was used for a chamber in a palace, Jer 36^{12}, or for the chambers in the Temple court in which the priests lived, Jer $35^{2.\ 4}$, Ezk 40^{17}, or for store-rooms in the second Temple, Ezr 8^{29}, Neh $10^{38.\ 39}$. 3. חֶדֶר, 1 Ch 28^{11}, where AV tr. חֲדָרִים הַפְּנִימִים 'inner parlours,' but RV has 'inner chambers.' The most suitable rendering for חֶדֶר is 'chamber.' The Heb. word generally connotes the idea of privacy. The LXX tr. in 1 Ch 28^{11} by ἀποθῆκαι.

In no case is the Eng. word 'parlour' a very suitable tr. of the Heb., and it was formerly less suitable than now. Coming from parler, to speak (Low Lat. parabolare, to talk; Gr. παραβολή, a parable), it signified in early Eng. the public reception-room, the drawing- (= with-drawing) room being then what is now the parlour, the private apartment of the family.

PARMASHTA (פַּרְמַשְׁתָּא; B Μαρμασιμά, A Μαρμασιμνά, Phermesta).—The seventh of the ten sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews (Est 9^{9}). The name is perhaps the Sansk. parmashta=chief (so Benfey).

PARMENAS (Παρμενᾶς).—One of the 'Seven' appointed, Ac 6^{5}. The name is Greek, a shortened form of Parmenides. Nothing further is known of him. He is said by later tradition to have been martyred at Philippi, and is commemorated by the Latins on Jan. 23, by the Greeks on July 28.

A. C. HEADLAM.

PARNACH (פַּרְנָךְ, Φαρνάχ).—The father of Elizaphan, who as prince of Zebulun took part in the dividing of the land, Nu 34^{25}.

PAROSH (פַּרְעֹשׁ 'flea'; Φορός, Φαρές).—The name of a post-exilic family, of which 2172 returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^{3} (=Neh 7^{8}), and 150 with Ezra, Ezr 8^{3}. Seven of the Bĕnê-Parosh had married foreign wives, Ezr 10^{25}. The name appears also in connexion with the repairing of the walls, Neh 3^{25}, and the sealing of the covenant, 10^{14}. The Gr. form Phoros is adopted in 1 Es (5^{9} 8^{30} 9^{26}).

PAROUSIA [παρουσία, lit. 'presence,' as opposed to absence (2 Co 10^{10}, Ph 1^{26} 2^{12}), hence the arrival which introduces that presence (cf. Col 1^{6} τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τοῦ παρόντος εἰς ὑμᾶς, 'the gospel which is come unto you'; 1 Co 16^{17} the coming of Stephanas; 2 Co $7^{6.\ 7}$; 2 Th 2^{9}; 2 P 3^{12} the coming of the Day of God)].—A technical term used in NT to denote the coming of Christ in glory at the end of the age. In this sense it is used Mt $24^{3.\ 27.\ 37.\ 39}$, 1 Co 15^{23}, 1 Th 2^{19} 3^{13} 4^{15} 5^{23}, 2 Th $2^{1.\ 8}$ (cf. v.^{9} where it is used of Antichrist), Ja $5^{7.\ 8}$, 2 P 1^{16} 3^{4}; cf. v.^{12}, 1 Jn 2^{28}. Both AV and RV translate 'coming,' although RV adds in the margin the alternative rendering 'presence.' The expression Second Coming, while it occurs in later ecclesiastical Greek (Ev. Nicod. c. 22 end; Just. Apol. i. 52, Trypho, cc. 40, 110, 121) in contrast to the first coming (Trypho, cc. 40, 110, 121), is not found in Scripture. Synonymous expressions are the Apocalypse (ἀποκάλυψις; so 2 Th 1^{7} the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven; 1 Co 1^{7}, 1 P $1^{7.\ 13}$ 4^{13}, the revelation of His glory, cf. Lk 17^{30}) and the Day (ἡμέρα) of Christ (1 Co 1^{8}, 2 Co 1^{14}, Ph $1^{6.\ 10}$ 2^{16}, 1 Th 5^{2}, 2 P 3^{10}, 2 Th 2^{2}; cf. Lk 17^{22} one of the days of the Son of Man). The term Parousia differs from these latter in that it emphasizes the element of permanent presence which the coming of Christ is to introduce. But it is incorrect, with some modern interpreters (so Warren, Parousia, p. 21), so to magnify this element as to reject altogether the meaning 'coming.' Both elements, the coming and the presence, are united in the word as in the doctrine.

Interpreters find reference to several distinct comings of Christ in the NT. There is (1) a physical Advent at His resurrection (so Jn 14^{18} 16^{16}; cf. Holtzmann, Hdcomm. iv. 163); (2) a spiritual Advent by the Paraclete, which is to take place during the lifetime of the disciples, and to result in a perpetual dwelling of Christ and the Father in their hearts (Jn 14^{23}; cf. 16^{7}); (3) an Advent to the disciples at death, when Christ will come to receive them into the mansions which He has prepared for them above (Jn 14^{3}, and comments of Holtzmann, l.c. iv. p. 160; cf. also 2 Co 5^{8}); (4) a historical Advent for judgment, taking place at different times in the history of the Church, but distinguished from the final Advent at the end of the age (Rev $2^{5.\ 16}$ $3^{3.\ 11}$; cf. also Mt 26^{64} 'Henceforth [ἀπ' ἄρτι] ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven,' which Meyer interprets in the sense of a continual historical revelation of Christ's power and triumph); and, finally, (5) an Advent at the end of the age (Mt 24^{3}) to judge the world, to destroy evil, to reward the saints, and to establish the Kingdom of Glory. While it is with the last of these that we are primarily concerned in the doctrine of the Parousia, it is impossible wholly to ignore the others. The sharp line of distinction which later theology has drawn between the final Advent and these preliminary advents is not always observed in the NT. There are passages, like Mt 26^{64}, where the coming of Christ in glory is represented as a continuous process. There are others, like those in the Fourth Gospel (e.g. Jn 14^{23} $16^{7ff.}$), in which the spiritual advent by the Paraclete takes the place elsewhere filled by the final Advent. It is important, therefore, while clearly recognizing the technical meaning of the phrase, not to interpret our theme too narrowly.

The doctrine of the Parousia is a New Testament doctrine. It had its origin in Jesus' prophecy of His own return, and depends for its existence upon the unique position which He holds in Christian faith. Nevertheless, it is not without preparation in the past. It has its parallel within the OT in the prophetic anticipation of the Day of the Lord (e.g. Am 5^{18}, Is 2^{12} 13^{6}, Jl 1^{15} 2^{1}, Zeph 3^{8}), —that great crisis of human history when J" shall be manifested as the Judge and Saviour of Israel, and His Kingdom shall be set up among men (see ESCHATOLOGY in vol. i. p. 735 f.). Many features in the NT doctrine are anticipated in OT. Thus the warlike imagery of Rev $19^{11ff.}$ finds parallels in Is 13^{4} 34^{6}, Jer 46^{10} etc. The connexion of the resurrection of the dead with the deliverance and judgment of the living is made in Dn 12^{1-3}. The great convulsions of 2 P 3^{10} have their anticipation in Is 34^{4}. The signs in the heaven predicted in Mt 24^{29} and parallels are foretold in Is $13^{10ff.}$, Jl $3^{15.\ 16}$ etc. The renewal of nature prophesied in Is 65^{17} reappears in Rev 21^{1} (cf. Ro 8^{21}, 1 Co 7^{31}). Most striking is the parallel in Dn $7^{13ff.}$, where the seer has a vision of one like unto a Son of Man coming with the clouds of heaven to receive 'dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him.'

A further preparation for the doctrine of the Parousia is to be found in the revived Messianic expectation which characterized the period immediately before Christ, and which has left its traces in the contemporary Apocalyptic literature. This literature prepared the way for our doctrine, partly by intensifying the sense of an impending crisis, partly by identifying that crisis, as was not always the case in the OT, with the coming and activity of the Messiah. It is true that in some of the Apocalyptic books there is no mention of a personal Messiah. But in others, and these among the most important (e.g. Ps.-Sol, Eth. Enoch, Baruch, 4 Ezra), the Messiah holds a prominent place. The material is so fully presented by Charles in the article on the ESCHATOLOGY OF THE APOCRYPHA AND APOCALYPTICAL LITERATURE in vol. i. p. 741 ff., that it is unnecessary to enter into it here. Suffice it to say that the climax is reached in the great passage in the Eth. Enoch (c. 48 ff.), in which the Son of Man is revealed upon the throne of His glory as the righteous judge both of the living and of the dead. This passage, which in many ways reminds us of Dn 7^{13}, is the closest parallel, outside the NT, to the great judgment scene in Mt 24^{31-45}.

The points of contact thus briefly indicated suggest an interesting question. Are we to conceive the doctrine of the Parousia as simply the continuation on Christian soil of the contemporary Jewish expectation? Or does it stand for something new and distinct? Did Jesus and the apostles understand the OT prophecies in substantially the same sense in which they were understood by the Jews of their day, with this difference only, that the Messiah of whose identity the latter were ignorant was known by them to be Jesus? Or did they give to these prophecies, as we know that our Lord gave to the law (Mt 5–7), a deeper and more spiritual interpretation? And if the latter, was this equally true of them all, or must we distinguish within the NT between the teaching of the Master and the more or less imperfect apprehension of the disciples? These are questions of the highest importance, not merely for the understanding of the teaching of Jesus, but of Christianity itself.

The answer to these questions is by no means easy. No part of the biblical material is more difficult to interpret than the eschatological passages. This is true not merely of the Bk. of Revelation,—admittedly the most obscure portion of the NT,—but of the Apocalyptic portions of the Synoptic Gospels as well. Scholars are not agreed how far the language of these passages is to be taken literally, how far symbolically. Moreover, there are critical questions of great intricacy connected with the present condition of the text. There are some (like Haupt) who, while admitting that all the eschatological discourses in the Synoptics are composed of genuine sayings of Jesus, maintain that these sayings are not always given by the evangelists in their original connexion. There are others (Wendt, Weiffenbach, etc.) who hold that in their present form these discourses include foreign elements, the teaching of Jesus having been combined by the evangelists with materials drawn either from Jewish or Jewish-Christian sources. Under the circumstances, a thorough discussion of the critical question would seem to be a necessary prerequisite to an adequate treatment of the doctrine.

Such a discussion it is manifestly impossible to give within the limits of the present article. Nor is it necessary to our immediate purpose. Without settling all the critical questions involved, it may be possible to give a bird's-eye view of the material as it lies in our sources, to discover how far it lends itself to a single consistent interpretation, and to indicate what are the chief problems which it presents, and what are the most important methods proposed for their solution. We shall begin our survey with the Synoptics, partly because in them the eschatological teaching of Jesus is most fully set forth, partly because they present the difficulties connected with our doctrine in their most acute form. We shall then offer a brief survey of the doctrine of the Parousia as it is found in the other NT books, giving special attention to the teaching of St. Paul. The Fourth Gospel, for reasons presently to be explained, will be reserved for separate treatment. In conclusion, we shall briefly indicate the course of the later development, and point out the chief lines which the interpretation of the doctrine has followed. Thus our discussion will cover the following four points: —(i.) The Parousia in the Synoptics; (ii.) the Parousia in Acts, Epistles, and Revelation; (iii.) the Parousia in the Gospel of John; (iv.) the Parousia in the later Church.

i. THE PAROUSIA IN THE SYNOPTICS. — The doctrine of the Parousia is set forth in the Synoptics most fully in the so-called Apocalypse of Jesus (Mk 13, and parallels Mt 24, Lk 21). A prophecy of Jesus as to the destruction of the temple leads to a question by the disciples (so Mt; Mk specifies Peter, James, John, and Andrew; Lk leaves the questioner indefinite), 'when these things shall be, and what shall be the sign when these things are all about to be accomplished' (Mk, Lk). In the discourse which follows, Jesus not merely answers this question, but passes on to give the signs of His own Advent in glory, which He represents as following immediately after that tribulation (Mt 24^{29}; cf. Mk 13^{24}, otherwise Lk)—a connexion for which Mt has already prepared the way in the introductory question, 'When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy Parousia, and of the end of the age?' After the prediction of certain preliminary woes (the coming of false Messiahs, wars and rumours of wars, the rising up of nation against nation, famines, and earthquakes; Lk adds signs from heaven) and a warning to the disciples to be firm under the persecutions which are to come, not merely at the hands of the civil and religious authorities (the synagogue, Mk, Lk; the Gentiles, Mt), but of their relatives and friends,—persecutions incidental to that world-wide preaching of the gospel (Mt 24^{14}, Mk 13^{10}; otherwise Lk, who omits all reference to the preaching of the gospel to the world) which must precede the end (Mt 24^{13}), but in which they will be supported by the Holy Ghost (Mk) and preserved from all harm (Lk),—He goes on to predict the destruction of Jerusalem, and the miseries connected therewith. The ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (wh. see) of Mt and Mk is replaced in Lk by the Roman armies, but the general situation is the same in all three Gospels. Then follows in Mt and Mk a renewed warning against the false Messiahs who will arise at that time, working signs and wonders, and seeking to deceive the very elect. Many shall say 'Lo here, or lo there,' but they are not to be deceived. When the Christ comes there will be no possibility of mistaking Him, for His Parousia will be like the lightning which 'cometh forth from the east and is seen even unto the west' (Mt 24^{27}). This last saying, which Mk omits, is given by Lk in another connexion (17^{24}). It is therefore probable that Mt $24^{27ff.}$ formed no part of the original text, a suggestion which Weiss (Marcusev. p. 424; cf. Briggs, Mess. Gosp. p. 151) extends to the previous context omitted by Lk (Mt 24^{23-26}, Mk 13^{21-23}). After the destruction of Jerusalem follows the Parousia. Mt and Mk make the connexion immediate. 'But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened,' etc. (Mk 13^{24}; Mt is even stronger, introducing the word εὐθέως; 'immediately after those days'). Lk, on the other hand, introduces between the destruction and the Parousia certain 'times of the Gentiles' (21^{24}), which seem to take the place of the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles in Mt and Mk. All the evangelists represent the Parousia as preceded by certain theophanic signs in the heaven (cf. Jl $3^{15, 16}$ 2^{1-10}, Is 13^{10}). Lk adds, 'upon the earth distress of nations in perplexity for the roaring of the sea and the billows; men fainting for fear and for expectation of the things which are coming on the world' ($21^{25, 26}$). Peculiar to Mt is a reference to 'the sign of the Son of Man in heaven' and the mourning of the tribes of the earth (24^{30}; cf. Zec 12^{10-14}). The Parousia itself is described in language suggestive of Dn $7^{13, 14}$ 'And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory' (so all three evangelists). 'And he shall send forth his angels (Mt adds 'with a great sound of a trumpet'), and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other' (Mt, Mk). As to what takes place after this, we are not told in this place. The 'Apocalypse' concludes with certain further indications of time. By the parable of the fig-tree, Jesus indicates the close connexion between the signs and the Parousia, and ends with the explicit statement given by all three evangelists, 'Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all these things be accomplished. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away,' to which Mt and Mk add the qualifying clause, 'But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father (only)' (cf. Ac 1^{7} 'It is not for you to know times or seasons which the Father hath set within his own authority').

The exegetical difficulties of this passage are such as to render a consistent interpretation of the present text difficult. On the one hand, the account in Mt and Mk associates the Parousia with the destruction of Jerusalem, and puts both within the lifetime of the generation then living (cf. Gould, Mark, 240 ff.). In Lk the connexion between the destruction and the Parousia is not so close, but the closing verses (Lk $21^{32f.}$) agree with the other evangelists in placing all the events described within a single generation. On the other hand, we have in Mt (24^{14}) and Mk (13^{10}) references to a world-wide preaching of the gospel preceding, and in Lk (21^{24}) a prophecy of certain times of the Gentiles following the destruction of Jerusalem. If it were not for Mt 24^{14}, Mk 13^{10}, it would be easy exegetically to bring the entire prophecy of Mt and Mk within the limits of a single generation. On the other hand, were it not for Lk 21^{32}, it would be natural to regard the account in Lk as postponing the Parousia to a distant future—a postponement natural in view of the later date of the Gospel. Various attempts are made to meet the difficulty. It is claimed that γενεά may mean an indefinite period of time (Dorner). But, apart from the linguistic objections to this translation, it does not overcome the close connexion between the destruction and the Parousia. One of the most elaborate attempts to solve the difficulty without recourse to interpolation has been made by Briggs (Mess. Gosp. p. 156 ff.), who distinguishes between the time and the signs. To the first he finds reference in Mt 24^{14}, Mk 13^{10}, Lk 21^{24}, where the text points to an extended period. On the other hand, only the signs are referred to in the 'all these things' which are to be accomplished within the generation then living (cf. Mt 24^{34}, Mk 13^{30}, Lk 21^{32}). According to this view, Jesus predicted His Parousia after an unknown period (εὐθέως = the prophetic קְרוֹב), but the signs within a single generation, a position which is certainly difficult to reconcile with the close connexion between the signs and the Advent in the parable of the fig-tree. Under the circumstances, many scholars believe that the difficulty can be most easily solved by the hypothesis of composite origin. E. Haupt (Die eschatologischen Aussagen Jesu) argues that the evangelist has brought together in this passage a number of sayings originally spoken by Jesus on different occasions. Others hold to the interpolation either of a Jewish (so Weizsäcker, J. Weiss) or of a Jewish-Christian Apocalypse (Colani, Pfleiderer, Keim, et al.). As constructed by the most recent and careful scholars (Weiffenbach, Der Wiederkunftsgedanke Jesu, p. 170 f.; Wendt, Die Lehre Jesu, i. 10 ff.), this consists of three sections: Mk 13^{7-9} and parallels giving the beginning of tribulation; vv.$^{14-20}$ giving its height (the destruction of Jerusalem); and vv.$^{24-27}$ giving the Advent at the conclusion of the tribulation. Vv.$^{30, 31}$, which conclude the 'Apocalypse,' put the entire content of the prophecy within the generation then living. After these excisions, there remain in the original text only the prophecy of the destruction of Jeru salem, and the prediction by the Saviour of His own return at an hour of which He knows not (cf. the reconstruction in Weiffenbach, p. 182 ff.; Wendt, i. pp. 10, 11).

Apart from this 'Apocalypse,' the Parousia of Jesus is predicted in the Synoptics in many passages. Thus in Mt 16[24-28] (cf. Mk 8[34]–9[1], Lk 9[23-27]) Jesus predicts His Advent in glory with His angels to reward every man according to his works, adding, 'Verily I say unto you, There be some of them that stand here, who shall in no wise taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom' (so Mt; Mk 'the kingdom of God come with power,' Lk 'the kingdom of God'). At His farewell over Jerusalem, He declares that they shall not see Him again until they shall say, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord' (Mt 23[37-39], Lk 13[35]). When declaring His Messiahship before the high priest, He predicts that His judges shall 'see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven' (Mt 26[64], Mk 14[62]). So in interpreting the parable of the tares (Mt 13[36]) He declares that at the end of the age 'the Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth,' adding, 'Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.' Especially important is the great judgment-scene, Mt 25[31-45] 'When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all the nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats.'

As to the time of the Advent we have conflicting evidence. Mk 9[1] and parallels represent it as within the lifetime of the disciples. There is nothing in the context leading us to discriminate two Advents, as has sometimes been done. The same is true of Mt 10[23]. In referring to the terrible persecutions which are to come upon the disciples (cf. Lk 17[22]), He declares that they shall not make the circuit of the cities of Israel in their flight before the Son of Man come. On the other hand, Ac 1[7], which seems to take the place in Lk of Mt 24[36], Mk 13[32], makes the time of the Advent unknown. Lk represents the parable of the pounds as spoken to those who supposed that the kingdom would immediately appear (19[11]; cf. 12[45] 'my Lord delayeth,' etc.). In Mt 26[64] the coming, which in Mk (14[62]) seems to be a single event, is transformed after the analogy of the Fourth Gospel into a continuous process, beginning immediately after Christ's death. The two points continually emphasized are (1) the necessity of watchfulness, since the hour of the Parousia is uncertain (so the parables of the servants, Mk 13[33-37], Mt 24[42], Lk 12[37. 38]; cf. Lk 21[34-36] the day coming 'suddenly as a snare'; of the goodman taken unaware by the thief, Mt 24[43. 44], Lk 12[39. 40]; of the virgins, Mt 25[1-13], cf. Lk 12[35]; the reference to the days of Lot and of Noah, Lk 17[26-30]). (2) The necessity for faithfulness, since, though the Lord seem to delay, He will surely come and reward His servants according to their works (Mt 24[45-51], Lk 12[41-46], and the parable of the talents Mt 25[14-30], and the pounds Lk 19[11-27]; cf. Lk 18[8] 'When the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?').

It thus appears that the Synoptics represent Jesus as predicting His own return, now within His own generation, now after an indefinite future. This return is to be preceded by great trials, which none but the faithful shall be able to endure. The return itself is pictured as a glorious coming on the clouds to punish evil-doers, to reward the saints, and to establish that kingdom predicted from the foundation of the world. This coming is by Christ Himself associated with the end of the age and the day of final judgment, which is represented, now, after the fashion of OT, as a destruction of all the enemies of the Messiah before His face; now, as in the great judgment-scene in Mt, as a formal process in a law court in which all the nations are assembled to receive the sentence of the judge. For the disciples it introduces the time of their redemption (Lk 21[28]), a period of joy and glad communion with Christ, set forth now by the figure of the marriage feast, in which the Master Himself ministers to His faithful servants, now by that of the kingdom in which the disciples enjoy special honours, sitting upon thrones and judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

Those interpreters like Wendt, Weiffenbach, etc., who regard the Apocalypse of Jesus as of Jewish-Christian origin, explain the other Apocalyptic features in the Synoptic doctrine as due to a similar source. Those who refuse to take this view are obliged either (1) to explain away those passages which predict an Advent within the generation then living; or (2) preserving the connexion to regard Jesus as actually predicting during the lives of men then living a visible advent in the clouds—a prediction which was not fulfilled; or (3) to understand the language of Jesus symbolically as the prediction, in language taken partly from OT, partly from the Apocalypses of the time, of an advent which, while seemingly external and catastrophic, is really to be understood after the analogy of Mt 26[64], Rev 2[5. 16] 3[3. 11] and Jn 14[23] as spiritual and continuous.

ii. THE PAROUSIA IN ACTS, THE EPISTLES, AND REVELATION.—The expectation of a speedy Advent of Christ to establish the Messianic kingdom is one of the most prominent features of the apostolic hope. It is a part of the gospel of St. Paul no less truly than of that of the Jewish Christians. As in the Synoptics, it is ordinarily associated with the judgment at the end of the age, the only certain exception being Revelation, which distinguishes a preliminary from the final judgment, associating the former, which, after OT analogy, it conceives as a battle-scene, with the Advent of Christ, and inserting between this and the final judgment a millennial kingdom of 1000 years. Cf. MILLENNIUM. Thus the first chapter of Acts begins with the prediction of the angels to the weeping disciples that 'this Jesus . . . shall so come in like manner as ye beheld him going into heaven' (1[11]). Accordingly we find St. Peter regarding the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost as a sign of that impending Day of J" to which OT prophecy looks forward (2[20]), and urging the Jews to pray that God may send the Christ whom He hath appointed, even Jesus, whom the heavens must receive until the time of the restoration of all things (3[19-21]). To Cornelius he preaches Christ as the judge of quick and dead (10[42]); while St. Paul warns the Athenians to repent, inasmuch as God 'hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by the man whom he hath ordained' (17[31]; cf. 24[15], the resurrection of just and unjust). Equally explicit is the testimony of the Epistles. St. James urges patience until the coming of the Lord, and warns Christians not to judge one another, since 'the judge standeth before the doors' (5[7. 9]). St. Peter regards the present tribulations of Christians as the beginning of that judgment which is presently to overtake 'the ungodly and the sinner' (1 P 4[17. 18]), and the preceding context (v.[13]) shows that reference is had to the Parousia. St. Paul, while in certain passages associating the final judgment directly with God (so Ro 1[18] 2[2. 3. 7], and especially vv.[5. 6] 'the day of wrath and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works'; cf. He 10^{30} 12^{23}, Rev 20^{11}), elsewhere explicitly connects the judgment with Christ (so Ro 2^{16} 'the day when God shall judge the secrets of men according to my gospel, by Jesus Christ'; 2 Co 5^{10} 'the judgment-seat of Christ'; 2 Th 1^{5-8}, 2 Ti 4^{1} 'Christ Jesus, who shall judge the quick and the dead'). At this judgment not only must Christians themselves be tested to see whether their work shall abide (1 Co 3^{13}), but they themselves shall take part as judges in the great world assize, which includes even the angels (1 Co 6^{3}).

But although the Parousia is thus associated with the judgment, it is not upon this aspect of Christ's return that the Epistles lay the most stress. The Advent is to introduce that salvation which is the end of their faith (1 P 1^{7-9}; cf. Ro 13^{11}, He 9^{28}); that redemption for which they were sealed (Eph 4^{30}; cf. 1^{14}, Ro 8^{23}). Then shall be established 'the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' (2 P 1^{11}; cf. 2 Th 1^{5}, 2 Ti 4^{18}, Ja 2^{5}). Then shall appear that heavenly Jerusalem in which there shall be no more sin and sorrow (Rev $21^{2ff.}$. It is true that Revelation postpones the appearance of the heavenly Jerusalem till after the Millennium, but the conception itself is found in other books which show no trace of millenarianism, e.g. Gal 4^{26}, He 12^{22}). Then shall be revealed the glory of Christ (1 P 4^{13}; cf. Tit 2^{13}); and His followers, renewed in body (1 Th 5^{23}, Ph $3^{20.\ 21}$, Ro 8^{23}), soul (1 Th 5^{23}), and spirit (1 Th 5^{23}, 1 Co 5^{3-5}), shall be manifested with Him in glory (Col 3^{4}, 2 Th 1^{10}), and rejoice in the vision and likeness of Christ (Ph 3^{21}, 1 Jn 3^{2}). Then shall they receive that inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, which, during this present period of tribulation, is reserved for them in heaven (1 P $1^{4ff.}$; cf. Eph 1^{14}); that rest for which now they vainly long (2 Th 1^{7}); that crown of life which the Lord has promised to all who love His appearing (2 Ti 4^{8}, cf. 1 Co 9^{25}, Ja 1^{12}). This is the Day of Visitation (1 P 2^{12}), that consummation for which the whole creation, now groaning in pain, longs and cries, the revelation of the children of God in the liberty of that glory when all sin shall have ceased, and the bondage of corruption have been done away (Ro $8^{21.\ 22}$).

To the emphasis which St. Paul lays upon the Parousia as introducing the kingdom of glory is doubtless to be attributed the fact that he speaks only of a resurrection of believers (1 Th 4^{16}, Ph 3^{11}, 1 Co 15^{23}). From this fact many have concluded that St. Paul was a chiliast, distinguishing, like Revelation, between the first resurrection introducing the millennial kingdom and the final resurrection of all men before the last judgment. In favour of this view is quoted 1 Co $15^{23.\ 24}$, where St. Paul distinguishes between the resurrection of believers and the end when Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father. Cf. MILLENNIUM. But, apart from possible exegetical objections (Salmond, pp. 520 ff., 561 ff.), this view not only ignores those passages in which St. Paul seems to associate the final judgment with the Parousia (e.g. Ro 2^{16}; cf. Pfleiderer, Paulinismus[2], p. 280 f.), but also fails to account for the admitted fact that St. Paul nowhere speaks of a higher glory to follow that of the Messianic kingdom.

As to the manner of the Advent, with the exception of the Apocalyptic passages, 2 Th 2^{8}, Rev 19, which follow the warlike imagery of the OT, it is represented, as in the Synoptic Gospels, as a coming on the clouds of heaven (Rev 1^{7}, Ac 1^{11}, 1 Th $4^{15.\ 17}$), accompanied by hosts of angels, to gather His saints living and dead into His heavenly kingdom. The fullest account is 1 Th $4^{16ff.}$ 'For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the deaa in Christ shall rise first. Then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air. And so shall we be ever with the Lord'; cf. 1 Co 15^{52}. This coming is further associated with a renewal of nature (Ro 8^{21}, 1 Co 7^{31}; cf. Ac 3^{21}, Rev 21^{1}), after the fashion of Is 65^{17}, a transformation which 2 P represents as a great world conflagration in which all the present elements shall be dissolved and melt away in fervent heat (3^{10}, cf. He 12^{26}).

As to the time of the Advent, it is near (Ja 5^{8}, 1 P 4^{7}, He 10^{25}, Rev 22^{7}, Ro 13^{11}, 1 Co 7^{29}). 'The Lord is at hand' (Ph 4^{5}). 'Yet a little while, and he that cometh will come, and will not tarry' (He 10^{37}). St. Paul expects His arrival within his own lifetime (1 Th 4^{15}, 1 Co $15^{51.\ 52}$). Yet the exact time is unknown (1 Th 5^{2}, 1 Ti 6^{15}). There are certain preliminary signs which must be accomplished (the destruction of Antichrist, 2 Th 2^{8}; the conversion of Israel, Ro $11^{25.\ 26}$; cf. Eph 1^{10} 'a dispensation of the fulness of the times'). It is with these preliminary signs (the things shortly to come to pass, 1^{1}) that Revelation chiefly deals. The coming to which the seer looks forward most vividly is not the Advent of the Last Day, but the impending judgment which awaits unfaithful Christians (Rev $2^{5.\ 16}$ $3^{3.\ 11}$). When the day comes it will be as a thief in the night (1 Th 5^{2}, 2 P 3^{10}). Hence there is need of patience (Ja 5^{7}), and of watchfulness (1 Th 5^{6}). Even in St. Paul's day there were those who doubted the resurrection (1 Co 15^{12}; cf. 2 Ti $2^{17.\ 18}$). In the later books such doubt has become common. 2 Peter speaks of mockers who ask 'Where is the promise of his coming? For from the day the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation,' and answers their objection by reminding them that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. 'The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some count slackness, but is long-suffering to you-ward, not wishing that any should perish' (3^{3-9}).

From this brief survey the importance of the Parousia in the apostolic thought has been made manifest. Especially significant in this connexion is the teaching of St. Paul. The Christian to St. Paul is indeed already a spiritual man (Ro $8^{9.\ 10}$), and as such a new creature (2 Co 5^{17}). Even in this life he rejoices in the peace of Christ (Ro 15^{13}), and sits with Him in heavenly places (Eph 2^{6}, cf. He 6^{5}). But his full salvation lies in the future, in that completed kingdom to which his thought continually turns (see SALVATION). Entrance to this kingdom is the goal of all his endeavour (Ph 3^{11-14}). By the hope of it he is sustained when all seems darkest. Without it he would be of all men the most pitiable (1 Co 15^{19}). Thus the entire thought of St. Paul is dominated by the expectation of the speedy coming of Christ. This expectation he finds expressed in the frequent celebration of the Eucharist, which shows forth the death of Christ 'until he come' (1 Co 11^{26}). It gives character to his ethics, leading him to desire for himself and for his disciples freedom from those family cares which may render their service less efficient during that short time which remains before the coming of the Lord (1 Co 7). It is ever present in his prayers, whether, in his fear lest he himself fail to reach the goal, he commit himself to Him who is able to keep that which he has entrusted to Him against that day (2 Ti 1^{12}), or, in his fatherly anxiety for those converts who are to be his glory and crown at the Parousia (2 Co 1^{14}), he prays that the good work begun in them may be perfected unto the day of Jesus Christ (Ph 1^{6}).

This sense of the nearness of the time leads to a passing over in St. Paul's thought of the period between death and the Advent. The middle state, when referred to, is described as a sleep (1 Th 4^{14}, 1 Co $15^{20.51}$), from which the disciples of Christ shall awake to share the gladness and triumph of the Parousia. This is not, indeed, always the case. In certain important passages (2 Co 5^{1-3}, Ph $1^{21.23}$) we find St. Paul's thought passing over into that mysterious region, and expressing the hope of a communion with Christ which nothing can disturb, not even death before the Parousia. Especially significant in this connexion is 2 Co $5^{1ff.}$, where St. Paul associates this hope with the possession of a new body to be put on at death. In this much-discussed passage some interpreters find evidence of a departure from St. Paul's earlier views of the future—a departure to be accounted for only on the ground of experiences which have led him to revise his former expectation of himself living to witness the Parousia, and hence have brought into the foreground of his thinking the life immediately after death. Hence they attribute to it great historic significance, as marking the transition between St. Paul's own earlier thinking and that type of doctrine represented in the Fourth Gospel. See especially Schmiedel, Hdcomm. ii. pt. i. pp. 200–202. Cf. also art. RESURRECTION.

iii. THE PAROUSIA IN THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—With the Fourth Gospel, we find ourselves transported into a different atmosphere. The Coming at the Last Day is not, indeed, denied (cf. 5^{29} 6^{40} 21^{23}, 1 Jn 2^{28}, possibly also 14^{3}; cf. Stevens, Joh. Theol. p. 333), but it is no longer the centre of interest. The coming on which Jesus lays most stress in His farewell words to His disciples is not His judicial coming at the end of the age, but His personal Advent to His disciples, whether physical at His resurrection or spiritual in the gift of the Paraclete (Jn $14^{18.23}$). This fact is the more significant, because these discourses take the place in the Fourth Gospel of the 'Apocalypse' of the Synoptics with its prediction of the Parousia and the destruction of Jerusalem. The Day to which reference is repeatedly made in these discourses (14^{20} 16^{26}) is not the 'Last Day' of the judgment, but the gospel dispensation. So of the allied conceptions, the resurrection and the judgment. The resurrection at the Last Day is not denied, but it is not upon this that Jesus lays the most stress, but rather upon that present resurrection which introduces a man here and now into the life which shall never end. 'I know,' says Martha, 'that [my brother] shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day.' Jesus answers, 'I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die' (11^{24-26}; cf. the passages which speak of eternal life as a present possession, e.g. 6^{54} 17^{3}). So of the judgment of which Christ is the agent. While its decisions are not finally disclosed till the last day, they are being passed upon men here and now. 'He that believeth not hath been judged already' (3^{18}). This emphasis on present spiritual life is not, indeed, peculiar to St. John. We have found it already in St. Paul, who no less than St. John has the doctrine of a spiritual resurrection. But with St. Paul the chief stress falls on the future, with St. John on the present. This change of emphasis, while no doubt chiefly due to the mystic tone which pervades the entire Gospel, may be partly explained by the changed conditions under which it was composed. St. Paul and his generation have passed away. The period between death and the last day looms ever larger, as an increasing company of believers pass over into the unseen world. The Church is firmly established as an institution in the world, and looks forward to a period of continued existence. The Antichrist to be feared is no longer external but internal; not a hostile power to appear at the end of the ages, but those false teachers who are already working in the Church (1 Jn 2^{18}). It is natural, then, that chief stress should be laid on present communion with Christ—a communion not only real and precious here, but continuing unbroken in the life immediately after death. In such a theology the Parousia is no longer, as with the Synoptics, the centre of interest. Instead of a sudden catastrophe, introducing the disciples into a new order of existence, we have a gradual process, of which the 'Last Day' is only the final consummation. Cf. Holtzmann, Hdcomm. iv. 177.

We have thus completed our survey of the NT material, and we find that it presents us with two distinct types of thought. To the one, represented most fully in the 'Apocalypse' of the Synoptics and the earlier Epistles of St. Paul, but present also in most of the other books, the Parousia is conceived after the analogy of the contemporary Jewish Apocalypses as a great catastrophe, bringing to a conclusion the present order of the universe, and introducing the new age in which alone the Kingdom of God can be realized. To the other, represented most fully in the Fourth Gospel, but having points of contact in Revelation, in such Synoptic passages as Mt 26^{64} 18^{20}, and in the Pauline doctrine of the present union of the believer with Christ, the Parousia is rather the completion of an order of things which is already existing, than the beginning of one which is new. The question naturally presents itself as to which of these two types most fairly represents the teaching of our Lord? Are we to think of Him (with Holtzmann and others) as sharing the common expectation of the early disciples of a visible Advent in glory within the first generation? And does the Fourth Gospel represent the fading out of this early expectation, in view of later experiences? Or is the very opposite the truth? And is it the fact (as E. Haupt contends) that the Fourth Gospel presents us with the true eschatology of Jesus—a teaching which, because of its depth and originality, the disciples were able only gradually to apprehend? It is perhaps not possible to answer this question from a study of the eschatological passages alone. The view taken must be determined in part by considerations drawn from Jesus' teaching as a whole. Here, as elsewhere, our Lord's doctrine of the Kingdom is fundamental. Those who give the phrase a purely eschatological meaning, and minimize Jesus' teaching concerning the present Kingdom (e.g. J. Weiss), will naturally interpret the passages concerning the Parousia after the analogy of their Jewish parallels. Those, on the other hand, who see in Jesus' doctrine of the Kingdom something radically new, and who find this newness in His assurance that the Messianic Kingdom is already present in the little company of believers who accept His gospel, will favour a spiritual interpretation. Faced with a difficulty on either side, it will seem to them easier to account for those passages which are inconsistent with such an interpretation as due to an imperfect apprehension by the disciples of the Master's meaning, than to believe that He, who in all other respects possessed an insight so much clearer than His contemporaries, should, in the matter of eschatology alone, have had nothing new to contribute.

iv. THE PAROUSIA IN THE LATER CHURCH.—No doctrine was more prominent in the early Church than that of the Parousia. It was the great hope by which the Christians were supported under the persecution and contempt which were so frequently their lot. It meets us not only among the Jewish Christians, with whose expectation of a conquering Messiah it was naturally in accord, but among the Gentile Christians as well. In many cases, as in the Canonical Apocalypse, it is associated with the hope of a Millennial Kingdom, preceding the final judgment—a Kingdom conceived now carnally (Papias), now spiritually (Barnabas). See MILLENNIUM. In others, as in most of the NT books, it is associated with the final judgment, and regarded as introducing the world to come. By Marcion and the Gnostics it was rejected as part of the Jewish corruption of the gospel. The Montanists preached a speedy Advent, and looked for the setting up of a Millennial Kingdom at Pepuza. The extravagances of their doctrine, together with the growing strength and self-consciousness of the Church, led to a gradual shifting of emphasis to other doctrines. Tertullian, Irenæus, and Hippolytus still look for a speedy Advent; but with the Alexandrine Fathers we enter a new circle of thought. As in the Fourth Gospel, the Parousia is not denied, but another set of conceptions is placed in the foreground. With Augustine's identification of the Millennium with the period of the Church militant, the Second Advent is postponed to a distant future, and the way prepared for that view of eschatology which has been on the whole controlling ever since.

Into the history of modern interpretation we cannot enter. We may distinguish four different positions, each of which has its advocates—(1) It is possible with Marcion and the Gnostics to regard the hope of the Parousia as a remnant of Judaism, useful indeed in supporting the faith of the disciples in the trying days of the beginnings, but without foundation in fact, and so destined to give place in time to a higher and purer set of conceptions. But this involves the assumption of a mistake not only on the part of the apostles, but on that of Jesus Himself, since it seems impossible to deny not only that Jesus predicted His own return, but that this expectation was an important element in His Messianic consciousness. (2) It is possible, with Augustine and the majority of theologians since his day, to regard the Parousia as a literal coming on the clouds to judgment, but to postpone this coming to an indefinite future, concentrating attention in the meantime upon the life immediately after death. But this does violence to those passages, both in the apostolic teaching and in that of Jesus, which predict the Parousia within the generation then living. (3) It is possible, with Russell, to identify the Parousia with the destruction of Jerusalem, and so to regard it as past. But this is open to the objection that the present condition of the Church does not correspond to that glorious state to which the NT writers look forward. (4) It is possible, finally, following the suggestion of the Fourth Gospel, to regard the Parousia rather as a dispensation than as a single event, beginning with the spiritual Advent by the risen Jesus, and continuing on through all the intermediate experiences of the Church until that 'Last Day' when the work of salvation shall be fully accomplished, and the kingdoms of the world shall have become the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ. PARSHANDATHA (פַּרְשַׁנְדָּתָא; Φαρσάν, Φαρσανεστάν) —The eldest of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews in Shushan (Est 9[7]). For the etymology Benfey suggests Pers. fraçna-data = 'given by prayer.'

PARTHIANS (Πάρθοι; Vulg. Parthi). — This nationality is mentioned only in Ac 2[9], in which passage the descendants of Jews that had settled in Parthia and afterwards returned to Jerusalem are clearly intended (see v.[5]). The Parthians inhabited a mountainous district, situated south of the Caspian Sea, having on its north Hyrcania, on its south Carmania, on its west Media, and on its east Ariana. Justin (bk. xli.) describes them as Scythian exiles, the word Parthian meaning 'refugee' in their language. The tract where they located themselves is a very fertile one, and is watered by a number of small streams that flow down from the mountains, liable to sudden and violent floods on the melting of the snow thereon, but of exceedingly small volume in summer-time. The principal mountains were the Labus or Labutas (identified with the Sobod Koh), the Parachoathras (Elburz), and the Masdoranus. It was divided into several districts, of which Camisene on the north, Parthyene on the south-west of Camisene, Choarene on the west, Apavarticene on the south, and Tabiene along the borders of Carmania Deserta, were the principal. From the second of these divisions, Parthyene, the country is regarded as having received its name. In ancient times it was, to all appearance, much more densely populated than now, as, according to Fraser (Khorassan, p. 245), the tract contains the ruins of many large and apparently handsome cities; and Ptolemy relates that it had 25 large towns. The capital of the district was Hecatompylos, and Darius Hystaspis (Behistun Inscription) refers to two other cities—Vispauzatiš, where a battle took place, and Patigrabana.

It is doubtful whether any credence can be given to the various stories of the origin of the Parthians. Moses of Chorene calls them descendants of Abraham by Keturah, and John of Malala agrees with Strabo (xi. 9, sec. 2), Arrian (Fr. 1), and Justin (xli. 1–4), in regarding them as Scythians brought by Sesostris from Scythia when he returned from that country and settled in a district of Persia. The first authentic information about them, however, is given by Darius Hystaspis, who speaks of them as inhabiting the tract with which they are generally associated. However faithful they may have been to their suzerain in the centuries preceding the rule of the great Persian, on the accession of Darius they evidently joined with the Hyrcanians in support of the pretender Fravartis. Darius' father, Hystaspes, went against them with those who were faithful to his son's cause, and defeated the allied army of the rebels at Vispauzatiš, on the 22nd of the month Viyakhna. To all appearance, however, the Parthians and Hyrcanians were far from being beaten, and Hystaspes was in want of reinforcements. Darius therefore at once sent to him an army of Persians from Raga. With these Hystaspes once more took the field against the allies, and a second battle was fought at Patigrabana, on the 1st of Garmapada, the result being a second victory for the Persians. 'Thereafter,' says Darius, 'was the land mine. This did I in Parthia.'

According to Herodotus (iii. 93), the Parthians were in the 16th satrapy of the Persian empire as divided by Darius, and they had along with them the Chorasmians, the Sogdians, and the Areians. This united province had to pay to the royal treasury a sum of 300 talents of silver. In the war of Xerxes against the Greeks, according to Herodotus (vii. 66), the Parthians were in the same division as the Bactrians, and had the same commander as the Chorasmians. To all appearance they remained faithful to the Persians to the end, serving with them at Arbela against Alexander, to whom, however, they made but a feeble resistance when he passed through their country on his way to Bactria (Arr. Exp. Alex. iii. 8).

After the death of Alexander they formed part of the domain of the Seleucidæ, but revolted about B.C. 256, under Arsaces, who founded the native dynasty known as the Arsacidæ. This dynasty contained no fewer than thirty-one kings, and lasted from about B.C. 248 until about A.D. 226, when Sassan founded upon its ruins the dynasty of the Sassanidæ. The family of the Arsacidæ, however, continued to exist in Armenia as an independent dynasty.

Having founded the empire of the Parthians, which was to overshadow that of the Romans, Arsaces devoted himself to the development of his kingdom, and founded, in the mountain Zapaortenon, the city of Dara. His son Tiridates is supposed to have defeated Seleucus. Arsaces III. (Artabanus I.) came into conflict with Antiochus III. Arsaces V. (Phraates I.) subdued the Mardi, and, notwithstanding that he had many sons, following an old Persian custom, he left his throne to his brother Arsaces VI. (Mithridates I., B.C. 164–139). This king is renowned as having greatly extended the limits of his kingdom. Having subdued the Medes, the Elymeans, the Persians, and the Bactrians, he enlarged his dominions into India, beyond the conquests of Alexander. He also overcame the king of Syria, and added Babylonia and Mesopotamia to his empire, which now had the Ganges as its eastern and the Euphrates as its western boundary. Other great rulers down to the Christian era are the 7th, 9th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th of the name (Phraates II., Mithridates II., Phraates III., Mithridates III., Orodes I., and Phraates IV.). Additional accounts of the earlier rulers will probably be obtained from the astronomical tablets of Babylonia, which often give details of historical events, the material for dates, and the names of distinguished personages with their doings.

In the end the Parthians possessed the rule of the greater part of Western Asia, from India to the Tigris, and from Chorasmia to the shores of the Indian Ocean. Their long wars with the Romans are well known, and their peculiar method of fighting enabled them to make a more successful resistance to the advance of the Roman armies than any other Eastern race. The greater and more organized power at last gained the upper hand, however, and Arsaces XV. (Phraates IV.), who reigned from B.C. 37 to A.D. 13, delivered to Augustus his five sons, with their wives and children, who were all sent to Rome. Arsaces XIX. (Artabanus III.), who began to reign in A.D. 16, was the ruler of the country at the period referred to in Ac 2^9. He had a chequered career, and came into conflict with the Romans, who set up other members of his family in opposition to him. Though twice obliged to quit his kingdom, he was twice recalled, and was succeeded, in A.D. 43, by his son Gotarzes. The subjection of the country was continued by Trajan, Antoninus, and Caracalla; and the new Sassanian native dynasty of Persia, under the command of Artaxerxes I., son of its founder, put an end to Parthian rule A.D. 226.

Like the Boers in S. Africa, the Parthians early learned the importance of accurate shooting, and they became celebrated in the use of the bow, which was apparently their chief weapon. It is also noteworthy that they were good horsemen; and these two facts enabled them, like their more modern imitators, to harass their opponents and cause them loss. It was apparently on account of this that they were enabled to retrieve, in the reign of Hadrian, losses that they had suffered under Trajan. The fact that they were all mounted gave them an enormous advantage in the matter of mobility, which is now recognized as an all-important feature in operations in the field of battle. Indeed, the Roman writers of the period of the defeat and destruction of Crassus near Carrhæ (Haran), attribute to them great military prowess, for which they became renowned. Even whilst their horses were going at full speed, they shot their arrows with wonderful precision, thus preventing an enemy from following them in their flight.

In art and civilization they were inferior to the Persians and the Greeks, whose heirs, in a sense, they were. Notwithstanding this, however, their decorative designs sometimes possess a simple excellence of their own that reminds one of similar designs of the Greeks, by whom, indeed, they must have been greatly influenced, as is indicated by the figures on the arch at Takht-i-Bostan, by the designs on the reverses of their coins, and by the fact that the inscriptions on the last are in the Greek language. They would thus seem to have adopted a gloss from that nation whom they conquered. That they were not a literary people may be gathered from the circumstance that their language is still practically unknown to us, the Parthians having produced no literature that could preserve it. Nevertheless, it is at least probable that they were not so regardless of literature as they have been thought, for Justin states that Mithridates I., having conquered several nations, gathered from every one of them whatsoever he found best in its constitution, and framed from the whole a body of most excellent laws for the government of his empire. If this be true, he must have been one of the wisest rulers of his time. Among the cities founded by the Parthian dynasty, Dara has already been mentioned, and the foundation of Ctesiphon is also attributed to them (Ammianus, xxiii. 6). This city is described by Strabo as the winter residence of the Parthian kings (Epit. xi. 32). Its ruins are even now the wonder of the beholder. T. G. PINCHES.

PARTICULAR, PARTICULARLY.—1 Co 12^{27} 'Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular' (μέλη ἐκ μέρους, RV 'severally members thereof,' RVm 'members each in his part'); Eph 5^{33} 'Let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself' (καὶ ὑμεῖς οἱ καθ' ἕνα, ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα οὕτως ἀγαπάτω ὡς ἑαυτόν; RV 'Do ye also severally love each one his own wife even as himself'). RV has given the mod. equivalent of the phrase 'in particular' which is found in those places only. So Melvill, Diary, p. 308, 'The King . . . calling the Magistrats and certean of the ring-laders, ordeanit them to be tryed, in particular, be the Barones, and gentilmen of the countrey about St. Androis.' The subst. is used in 2 Mac in the sense of detail, 2^{30} 'To be curious in particulars belongeth to the first author of the story' (ἐν τοῖς κατὰ μέρος); 11[20] 'Of the particulars . . . to commune with you' (ὑπὲρ τούτων κατὰ μέρος, RV 'in detail'). Cf. Shaks. I Henry IV. II. iv. 414—'Examine me upon the particulars of my life'; and II Henry IV. IV. ii. 36—

'I sent your grace
The parcels and particulars of our grief.'

'Particularly' has the same meaning as 'in particular.' It occurs in Ac 21[19] 'He declared particularly what things God had wrought' (ἐξηγεῖτο καθ' ἓν ἕκαστον ὧν ἐποίησεν ὁ θεός; RV 'He rehearsed one by one the things'); and He 9[5] 'Of which we cannot now speak particularly' (κατὰ μέρος, RV 'severally'). So Knox, Hist. 115—'This present Writ is to make answer particularlie to everie Article.'

The adj. is used in the first Prol. to Sirach, 'It [Sirach] containeth . . . certain particular ancient godly stories of men that pleased God' (μερικάς τινας παλαιὰς θεοφιλεῖς ἱστορίας), where the meaning is evidently 'special' (Vulg. peculiares), as in Bunyan, Holy War, p. 142, 'Then did Emmanuel address himself in a particular Speech to the Townsmen themselves.' J. HASTINGS.

PARTRIDGE (קֹרֵא, ḳōrē').—This word occurs but twice in OT, 1 S 26[20] (where the LXX tr. it νυκτικόραξ) and Jer 17[11] (πέρδιξ). In both the Vulg. gives perdix. That ḳōrē' is not an owl (νυκτικόραξ) is evident from the context of the passages in which this Gr. word is tr[d] 'owl.' On the other hand, Caccabis chukar, C. R. Gray, the red-legged partridge, or Ammoperdix Heyi, Temm., the sand partridge, would suit exactly the comparison which David makes between himself and the ḳōrē'. As regards the passage in Jeremiah, the best explanation is to view the act of the partridge there alluded to as founded upon a popular belief as to its habits rather than upon strict fact. Bochart quotes such a belief (ii. 85) from Damir, who says that 'it is of the nature of the partridge to come to the nests of its congeners, and take their eggs and incubate them; but when the chicks come to fly they return to the mothers which laid their eggs.' There are numerous instances in the Bible of the adoption of popular beliefs and their use to point a moral. Such have been adduced in articles on the ostrich, goat, owl, night-monster, leviathan, satyr, horseleech, etc. The proper name 'En-haḳḳōrē' (Jg 15[19]) means 'spring of the partridge.'

Caccabis chukar is a gallinaceous bird, the male with a drab coat, beautifully mottled with crescentic markings of white and black beneath, red legs, and a white throat. Ammoperdix Heyi is a little smaller. The plumage of the male is sandy buff, washed with dark grey on the crown and cheeks, pencilled and barred beneath with brown, with a strip of white behind the eyes, an orange beak, and olive-yellow legs. Both species inhabit the most retired situations they can find, preferring rocky hillsides clothed with shrubs and tufted grass. C. chukar is much more widely disseminated than its relative. It is found most abundantly in the middle and upper regions of Lebanon and Antilebanon. It is also very abundant in the mountains of the Syrian desert, often many miles away from water. The Arabs of that region say that it does not drink. The sand partridge is found only in the Dead Sea and Jordan Valleys. Both species, but especially the latter, will run a considerable distance rather than take to wing. A hen with chicks will almost allow herself to be caught in her anxiety to lead them out of danger. The present writer once dismounted and caught two chicks out of a brood which the hen was luring away. She waited near by until he had satisfied his curiosity by examining the fluffy creatures, and, when he released them, ran to meet them, and evinced the greatest satisfaction as she led them to the rest of her brood, and got them all out of sight as soon as possible. Red-legged partridges are hunted by means of tame decoys (Sir 11[30]), which call the wild birds. The sportsman shoots them from an ambush. Sometimes wheat is scattered near the decoy, and large numbers of wild birds settle down to eat it, and numbers are killed by a single shot. This, however, is considered quite unsportsmanlike by the better class of natives. The partridge is also hunted by falconry. The red-legged species is easily tamed, and becomes very affectionate and confiding towards his owner. G. E. POST.

PARUAH (פָּרוּחַ; B Φουασούδ, A Φαρρού, Luc. Βαρσαούχ).—Father or clan of Jehoshaphat, Solomon's prefect in Issachar. Issachar stands tenth (in the LXX twelfth) among the prefectures. In Galilee these coincide with tribal districts. Outside Galilee only Benjamin is a prefecture in itself.

PARVAIM (פַּרְוַיִם, LXX Φαρουάιμ).—Only in 2 Ch 3[6], where Solomon, in the ornamentation of his temple, is said to have used 'gold of Parvaim.' Gesenius (Thesaurus, p. 1125) suggests after Wilford its derivation from Sanscrit pûrva, 'eastern,' i.e. eastern regions. Sprenger (Alte Geog. Arabiens, p. 54 f.) found a Farwa in Yemen. Glaser (Skizze d. Ges. u. Geog. Arabiens, ii. p. 347) identifies Parvaim with Sâḳ el-Farwaim, which lies about one day from Dharijja, and not far west of the two Abâns, between which flows the Wady er-Rumma. IRA M. PRICE.

PASACH (פָּסֵחַ; B Βαισηχί, A Φεσηχί).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7[33].

PAS-DAMMIM (פַּס דַּמִּים; B Φασοδομή, A Φασοδομί, Luc. [ἐν] τοῖς Σερὰν).—The name of a place in the west of Judah, between Socoh and Azekah, as given in 1 Ch 11[13]. It is simply a variant of EPHES-DAMMIM (wh. see), the place where David slew Goliath (1 S 17[1]).

PASEAH (פָּסֵחַ). — 1. A descendant of Judah, 1 Ch 4[12] (B Βεσσῆε, A Φεσσή). 2. The father of Joiada, who repaired the old gate, Neh 3[6] (Φασέκ). It is possible, however, that 'Paseah' here has not an individual but a family sense, as in—3. The eponym of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2[49] (B Φισόν, A Φασή) = Neh 7[51] (B Φεσή, A Φεσσή, ℵ Φαισή). The name appears in 1 Es 5[31] as Phinoe.

PASHHUR (פַּשְׁחוּר; Πασχώρ, Φασχώρ, Φα(σ)σούρ(α), Φάσσορος, Φαισούρ, Φασε(δ)ούρ; Fosere [1 Es 9[22]], Pha(s)sur, Pheshur. Etymology unknown; Ges. Thes. suggests 'safety on every side' [Arab. fsḥ and פָּחוֹר] in contrast to Magor-missabib; others 'splitter,' from פּשׁח).—1. The son of Malchiah, one of the princes sent by Zedekiah to inquire of Jeremiah concerning Nebuchadrezzar's invasion, Jer 21[1]. He is named also among the princes who heard that Jeremiah was urging the people to desert to the Chaldæans. He joined in urging the king to put Jeremiah to death, and in imprisoning him in a muddy oubliette, from which he was rescued by Ebed-melech, Jer 38[1-13]. This Pashhur was perhaps the father of the Gedaliah ben Pashhur also mentioned in 38[1] (but cf. 2); and probably the Pashhur ben Malchiah mentioned in 1 Ch 9[12] Neh 11[12] as the ancestor of a certain Adaiah is the same person.

2. The son of Immer, governor of the temple, and priest. When Jeremiah announced the ruin of Judah, Pashhur had him beaten and placed in the stocks, but released him the next day. Thereupon Jeremiah repeated his threats, declaring that J" had called Pashhur's name not Pashhur but MAGOR-MISSABIB (wh. see), 'terror on every side,' and added that Pashhur should die in exile at Babylon, Jer 20^{1-6}. V.^{6} implies that Pashhur had prophesied the deliverance of Judah from the Chaldæans. Pashhur ben Immer was perhaps the father of Gedaliah ben Pashhur mentioned in Jer 38^{1}, but cf. 1.

3. Pashhur, the father of Gedaliah, Jer 38^{1}, may be identical with either 1 or 2; or may be a third Pashhur.

4. Bĕnê Pashhur, a priestly clan, mentioned in Ezr 2^{38} Neh 7^{41} as contributing 1247 (1 Es 5^{25} 1047) to those who returned with Ezra; and six, mentioned by name (Ezr 10^{22}, 1 Es 9^{22}), to those who divorced foreign wives. According to Neh 10^{3}, Pashhur, either the clan or its chief, sealed the covenant referred to in that chapter. It is possible, but very improbable, that the name of the clan was derived from one of the above Pashhurs. Cf. Meyer, Entstehung d. Judenthums, p. 169 f.

W. H. BENNETT.

PASS, PASSAGE, PASSENGER.—The verb to pass is both trans. and intransitive. Of its trans. use in AV the only meaning demanding attention is to exceed, surpass: 2 S 1^{26} 'Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women'; 2 Ch 9^{22} 'King Solomon passed all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom' (RV 'exceeded'); Ezk 32^{19} 'Whom dost thou pass in beauty?'; 1 Es 1^{49} 'The governors . . . passed all the pollutions of all nations'; Sir 25^{11} 'The love of the Lord passeth all things for illumination'; Eph 3^{19} 'The love of Christ, which passeth knowledge'; Ph 4^{7} 'The peace of God, which passeth all understanding.' Cf. Gn 26^{1} Tind. 'There fell a derth in the lande, passinge the first derth that fell in the dayes of Abraham'; Dt 25^{3} Tind. 'xl. stripes he shall geve him and not passe.' So the participle as adj. in Rhem. NT, Eph 1^{19} 'That ye may know . . . what is the passing greatness of his power.' A slight difference=go beyond, is Pr 8^{29} 'When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment' (לֹא יַעַבְרוּ־פִיו, RV 'should not transgress his commandment').

Intransitively 'pass' is used in AV as we now use 'pass away': Job 14^{20} 'Thou prevailest for ever against him and he passeth'; Ps 148^{6} 'He hath made a decree which shall not pass'; Mt 5^{18} 'Till heaven and earth pass'; Mt 24^{34}, Mk 13^{30}, Lk 16^{17} (RV always except Job 14^{20} 'pass away,' which is the usual AV tr. for the verb used). So Hamilton, Catechism, fol. xiv, 'Hevin and erd sall pas, bot my word sall nocht pas'; Ja 1^{10} Rhem. 'As the floure of grasse shal he passe.' Cf. also Chaucer, Squieres Tale, 494—

> 'Whyl that I have a leyser and a space,
> Myn harm I wol confessen, ere I pace';

and Shaks. K. Lear, v. iii. 314—

> 'Vex not his ghost: O let him pass! he hates him much
> That would upon the rack of this tough world
> Stretch him out longer.'

A passage is in AV either a ford across a river or a mountain pass, except that once the word is used for 'leave to pass,' Nu 20^{21} 'Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border.'* The Heb. is always some form from עָבַר 'ābhar, 'to cross.' The meaning is ford in Jos 22^{11} 'at the passage of the children of Israel' (אֶל־עֵבֶר בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, RV 'on the side that pertaineth to the children of Israel'),† Jg $12^{5.6}$ (RV 'ford'), Jer 51^{32} (RVm 'ford'); and mountain pass in 1 S 13^{23} 14^{4}, Is 10^{29} (all 'pass' in RV), Jer 22^{20} (RV 'Abarim,' which see). Cf. Coryat, Crudities, i. 210, 'There are in Venice thirteen ferries or passages.' Passage occurs also in Jth 6^{7} 7^{7} of the approach to a city (ἀνάβασις, RV 'ascent'), and in Wis 19^{17} of the way to the door of a house (δίοδος). Cf. Milton, PL x. 304—

> 'From hence a passage broad,
> Smooth, easy, inoffensive down to Hell.'

Passenger in AV means 'passer-by,' not, as now, one 'booked for a journey': Pr 9^{15} 'She sitteth at the door of his house . . . to call passengers who go right on their ways' (לִקְרֹא לְעֹבְרֵי־דָרֶךְ, RV 'to call to them that pass by'); and Ezk 39^{11} bis. $^{14.15}$ (הָעֹבְרִים, RV 'they that pass through').* Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 104, 'Not as a passenger did Christ walke this way, but as a visitor, not to punish, but to heale'; Adams on 2 P 1^{3} 'The passengers in mockery bad Christ come down from the cross.'

J. HASTINGS.

PASSION in AV has two meanings. 1. Suffering (the lit. sense of Lat. passio; cf. 'compassion'),† applied to the suffering of our Lord in Ac 1^{3} 'To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion' (μετὰ τὸ παθεῖν αὐτόν). The word is a good one (being etymol. connected with παθεῖν), it was taken by Wyclif from Vulg. post passionem suam, goes right through the Eng. versions, and is retained in RV. Cf. 'Passion-week.' But it is the only case in which 'passion' was accepted by AV from the earlier VSS: see He 2^{9} Wyc. 'Ihesus for the passioun of deeth, crowned with glorie and honour' (so Rhem., the rest 'suffering'); 1 P 1^{11} Wyc. 'the passiouns that ben in Crist' (so Tind., Cran., Rhem., but Gen., AV 'sufferings'); 4^{13} Wyc. 'Comyne ye with the passiouns of Crist,' Tind. 'partetakers of Christes passions,' so all until AV 'partakers of Christ's sufferings.' Also in ref. to the believer's sufferings (in the plu.) Ro 8^{18} Wyc. 'I deme that the passiouns of this tyme ben not worthi to the glori to comynge,' so Rhem., but Tind. and the rest 'afflictions,' AV 'sufferings'; He 10^{32} Wyc. 'Ye suffriden greet striif of passiouns,' Tind. 'a greate fyght in adversities,' Rhem. 'a great fight of passions,' AV 'a great fight of afflictions.' It is evident that 'passion' in the sense of suffering was passing away when AV was translated (the Rhem. version follows the Vulg. too slavishly). Craik says that Shaks. retains the word in this sense only in two or three antique expressions. Indeed, except Hamlet, II. i. 105, 'Any passion under heaven that does afflict our natures,' the only use in this sense is in strong scurrilous exclamations in reference to Christ's last sufferings. But it is of course found in writers of the time and later; cf. Hall, Works, ii. 150—'Jewes and Samaritanes could not abide one another, yet here in leprosie they accord, . . . community of passion hath made them friends, whom even religion disjoyned.'

2. Feeling, emotion, only twice in AV, and both plural, Ac 14^{15} 'We also are men of like passions with you' (ὁμοιοπαθεῖς ἐσμεν ὑμῖν, RVm 'of like nature'); Ja 5^{17}. Cf. Article i. (in Thirty-nine Articles), 'There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions.' This is nearly the sense of 'passions of sins' in Ro 7^{5}, AVm and RV for AV 'motions,' where it is a literal tr. of the Gr. (τὰ παθήματα τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν),

* Cf. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. (Selby's ed. p. 36), 'As if the multitude, or the wisest for the multitude's sake, were not ready to give passage rather to that which is popular and superficial, than to that which is substantial and profound.'

† The AV tr., which is from the Geneva Bible, refers to the place where the Israelites crossed the Jordan. But the word so tr. means usually 'the other side,' as in 1 S 26^{13}, whence LXX ἐν τῷ πέραν υἱῶν Ἰσραήλ, Vulg. contra filios Israel.

* The Hebrew is difficult, probably corrupt. See Davidson, in loc. Some (by changing עֹבְרִים into עֲבָרִים) translate 'a valley of Abarim.' This, however, is to enlarge the extent of that geographical name on the basis of an emendation.

† Andrewes, Works, ii. 123, 'Compassion is but passion at rebound.' Cf. also 'passionless renown' in the well-known hymn.

though the approach is nearer to our modern use of 'passions.' In the mod. sense RV has introduced the word also into Ro 1^{26}, Gal 5^{24}, Col 3^{5}, 1 Th 4^{5}. J. HASTINGS.

PASSOVER.—Our knowledge of the origin and early history of the Passover is derived from the accounts of the OT, supplemented by the relevant material thus far gained from the study of the early customs of other Semitic and primitive peoples. The most important passages are, of course, found in the laws of the Pent., and for our present purpose we shall accept the generally received conclusions as to the age and authorship of the various strata of legislation (see HEXATEUCH). But even so, our attempt to trace the history and development of this feast will necessitate considerable critical discussion.

i. OT REFERENCES.—The passages to be considered are—Ex 23^{18} 34^{25} 12^{21-27}, Dt 16^{1-8}, Ezk $45^{21ff.}$, Ex $12^{1-13.\ 43-49}$, Lv 23^{5}, Nu $9^{1ff.}$ 28^{16}, Jos 5^{10}, Hos 2^{11} 9^{5} $12^{9\ (10)}$, Am 5^{21} 8^{10}, Is 30^{29}, 2 K 23^{21-23}, 2 Ch 8^{13} $30.$ 35^{1-19}, Ezr $6^{19f.}$.

A. In the Law and Ezk.—1. JE.—In the so-called 'Second Decalogue' (Ex 34^{10-26}) we have the command (^{25}) 'Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leavened bread; neither shall the sacrifice of the feast of the Passover (וְזֶבַח חַג הַפָּסַח) be left until the morning.' The same prohibition appears Ex 23^{18} in the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 20^{22}–23^{33}), but instead of the phrase 'the sacrifice of the feast of the Passover' we there have 'neither shall the fat of my feast (חֵלֶב חַגִּי) remain all night until the morning.' Many have held that this latter expression has precisely the same content as the former, and have thus established the entire agreement of the two verses. We should then find our feast mentioned in the very oldest portions of the Law. That this is really the case, however, becomes somewhat doubtful upon closer examination. In both sections we have mention of the three great feasts of later legislation, which are to be kept unto J"—the feast of Unleavened Bread, of Weeks, and of Ingathering. And according to subsequent usage it is in connexion with the first, the feast of Unleavened Bread, held in the month of Abib, the month in which Israel came out of Egypt (Ex 23^{15} 34^{18}), that we should expect to find mention of the Passover. It might, indeed, seem that this was intended in Ex $34^{19f.}$, where, breaking the parallelism to the account of Ex 23, there is a command regarding the offering of the firstborn males of all the herds. One might naturally conclude that this sacrifice came at the time of the preceding feast. However this may be, the 'Book of the Covenant' in its present form knows nothing of such a connexion, for there the firstborn is to be offered on the eighth day, after being seven days with its dam (Ex $22^{29\ (30)}$; cf. Lv 22^{27}, Nowack et al. make this a later insertion see Arch. ii. 147, n. 3). Furthermore, there is in the 'Book of the Covenant' nothing that can be legitimately interpreted as a reference to the Passover. This is certainly true of the expression in 23^{18}, which one would naturally limit neither to the Passover nor to the sacrifice of the firstborn, but rather would understand as referring to all bloody offerings and as including all feasts. Possibly we should so vocalize as to read the plural 'my sacrifices' and 'my feasts' (זִבְחַי, וְחַגַּי; cf. Dill.-Rys. Com. in loco. In Ex 34^{25} LXX reads θυμιαμάτων μου). As to Ex 34^{25}, where the explicit mention of the Passover is met with at present, we need to note, first, that the term ḥagg (חג הפסח) is nowhere else in the Pent. applied to the Passover, but confined mainly, if not exclusively, to the three great feasts mentioned above (cf. Driver, Deut. p. 188; and on ḥagg, Wellh. Reste Arab. Heidentums, 1897, pp. 68 ff. and 79 ff.). Such a usage (cf. Ezk 45^{21}) as we have here indicates the blending of Passover and maṣṣôth (feast of Unleavened Bread); but in Dt, where this actually occurs, we find no such designation for the Easter festival as a whole. It may well be, as some maintain (Wellh. Proleg.[4] p. 84; Benzinger, Arch. 470 n.; W. R. Smith, Encyc. Brit.[9] xviii. 343 as against RS 221 n.), that the expression is a later insertion which makes specific application of the more general principle stated in 23^{18}. If, however, we think the passage should be retained and assigned to J, as many do (Nowack, l.c. ii. 147, n. 3; Bertholet, Deut. p. 50, et al.), then we may claim the early occurrence of the name Passover, but can not affirm any connexion between it and maṣṣôth. The point of the verse would be, that in the case of the Passover, as in that of other animal sacrifices, everything in the nature of putrefaction must be avoided. It would thus stand as a precursor of the kindred Levitical ordinances of later times. We find among other primitive peoples injunctions of like nature in relation to sacrifice (cf. RS p. 221; Smend, AT Relig.-Gesch. p. 140).

Ex 12^{21-27} may be next considered. It states how Moses summons the elders, and bids them go and kill the Passover, as though such a command needed no further explanation. With a bunch of hyssop (cf. Lv $14^{4ff.}$) they are to stain the lintel and the doorposts, and no one is to leave his home until the morning. All this is to be done because J" is to pass through and smite the Egyptians; but where He sees the blood on the doorway He will not allow the destroyer to enter. This same ceremony is to be observed hereafter as a lasting memorial. In the Promised Land they are to keep it, and explain its significance to their children. They are to tell them it is the sacrifice of the Passover to J", who passed over the houses (פסח על בתי) of Israel, and delivered them, when He smote the Egyptians. On hearing this the people bow in worship and proceed to do as commanded.

It is generally recognized that we have in this section an account not originally belonging to the present context, although it seems at first sight to fit in admirably with the preceding narrative, and to tell how Moses imparted the command to the people which he had received from J". It is, however, a very different command in content and in language. The essential details previously given (v.$^{3ff.}$) are not included, and, what is even more important, new ones are introduced and emphasized. There is no hint that it is the firstborn who are slain, no allusion to the paschal meal, but the blood ceremonial * is the all-important feature. The conception is, that the blood stained on the doorway works exemption from destruction for all within; but there is no explanation as to how this comes about. The resemblance to v.[7ff.] may explain why the section was inserted here. Whatever the source from which it came, the simplicity of detail as over against the former account (vv.[1-13]) supports the view of its priority and independence. In its essence it may go back to JE, even though, as most agree, its present form is later than Dt (cf. Wellh. Comp. d. Hex. p. 75; Dill.-Rys. Com. pp. 111, 126; Nowack, Arch. ii. 148 n. 1).

These are the only passages where we can look for explicit references in JE. But there are, besides, the notices of Israel's oft-repeated request for permission to go forth and celebrate a feast in the wilderness of Sinai (Ex 3^{18} 7^{16} $8^{25ff.}$ 10^{9} et passim). These indicate the existence at this period of a festival that may in some way be related to the Passover. We return to this question later on (ii. 6).

2. Deuteronomy.—Here in 16^{1-8} we have the earliest undisputed explicit reference to our feast and use of the word Passover (cf. above, and Wellh. Proleg.[4] 84 n.). Its observance, we are told, falls in the month of Abib, the month of ears (cf. Ex 13^{4} 23^{15} 34^{18}), which is the older name for Nisan (Mar.-Apr.), because in this month J″ brought them out of Egypt at night. At this season they are to sacrifice to J″ the Passover, consisting of sheep and cattle, at the place which He may choose for His worship. With the sacrificial meal and during seven days they are to eat only unleavened bread. This is the bread of affliction, because of the trepidation with which they came forth from Egypt. So are they to be ever reminded of that anxious day. During the seven days no leaven is to be allowed to remain within Israel's borders, and of the offerings of the first day none of the flesh is to be permitted to remain until the morning (cf. Ex 23^{18} 34^{25}). The Passover may not be sacrificed at one's dwelling-place, but only at that place which J″ shall choose for His worship. There at the setting of the sun, at the time when they came forth from Egypt, it shall be sacrificed. Six days shall unleavened bread be eaten, and on the seventh there shall be a festal gathering to J″, and no work shall be done.

As compared with other legislation, four points are especially noteworthy. (a) Instead of merely introducing maṣṣôth (P), the Passover here becomes an integral part of it, i.e. the Passover day becomes the first day of that feast. It is striking that so much attention should be paid in these eight verses to this one ordinance, and so little to the further regulations. The explanation may be that the centralization of all worship in one sanctuary, which is the novel and most important feature of Deuteronomic legislation, especially affected the Passover, and so required more explicit formulation (cf. Nowack, Arch. ii. p. 153). But even then other difficulties still remain, and it may be reasonably doubted whether the section stands at present in its original form. Vv.[3b-4b] seem an interpolation into the connected account contained in vv.[1. 2] and [5-7] (בַּיּוֹם הָרִאשׁוֹן in v.[4] would then, of course, be a later addition). V.[8], which makes further mention of maṣṣôth, seems incongruous in suddenly speaking of six days when seven were named before (v.[3]). The stated assembly (עֲצֶרֶת) recalls the priestly legislation, and contradicts the preceding command to return home on the following morning. So it seems probable that this apparent blending of the two feasts comes from reconstruction by a writer of later date than the Deuteronomist.* (b) It is expressly stated and strongly emphasized that the Passover is not to be observed as a domestic rite in the individual homes, but at the temple in Jerusalem (vv.[2. 6. 7]). But this does not mean, as we see, that it is to take the form of a general offering for all (so Ezk), but that it is rather made up of the private individual sacrifices (cf. Wellh. Proleg.[4] p. 89). (c) The offering is not limited to a lamb (Ex 12), but may be taken from the flock or the herd (v.[2]). To explain this statement in the light of later usage, i.e. as referring to the private sacrifices alluded to in 2 Ch (30^{22-24} 35^{7-9}), the later ḥagîgah (חגיגה), or peace-offerings, does violence to the text. This would mean the mention of a detail, and silence regarding the all-important feature. Furthermore, the use of the sing. in vv.[6. 7] shows that the writer has in his mind the sacrifice on the Passover evening.* (d) Another point to be noted is the manner of preparing the Passover sacrifice. It is to be boiled (v.[7]).† The OT allusions seem to point to this as an early method of preparing sacrifice (Jg $6^{19ff.}$, 1 S $2^{13. 15}$; and cf. Ex 23^{19} 34^{26}, Dt 14^{21}), and some think that this was gradually replaced by the more refined mode of roasting (cf. Benzinger, Arch. 435, 451; Wellh. Proleg.[4] p. 68). The prohibition of the use of leavened bread is found in the three great codes of the Pent., but nowhere else is it called the bread of affliction (לֶחֶם עֹנִי). We can compare this with the account in Ex $12^{34. 39}$ (JE), which is suggested by the expression 'in trepidation' (בְּחִפָּזוֹן Ex 12^{11}).

3. Ezk 45^{21-24}.—Turning next to Ezk, we find the Passover mentioned in a section discussing the part of the prince in the feasts and sacrifices (45^{17}–46^{15}). It is assigned to the 14th day of the first month, and spoken of as a feast of seven days, during which unleavened bread is to be eaten. On the first day the prince is to prepare a bullock as a sin-offering for himself and the people of the land, and otherwise daily a he-goat for this same purpose. There shall be, besides, a daily burnt-offering of seven bullocks and seven rams, with an accompanying daily offering of fourteen ephahs of meal (509·6 lit.), and fourteen hins of oil (84·98 lit.). This is such a large quantity that Cornill would so correct as to make it indicate the amount for the entire seven days; but it is probably better explained by Ezk's conception of the fruitfulness of the land in the new age. The sacred year is here clearly divided into halves, and so the suggestion (Smend, Bertholet) that v.[21] has been corrected according to Ex 12^{18} (Lv 23^{5}, Nu 28^{16}), seems in place, especially as the text has been disturbed (שִׁבְעַת for שִׁבְעָה). The parallelism of the feasts makes probable an original reading, 'In the first month, on the fifteenth day of the month, ye shall have the Passover' (cf. Bertholet, Com. in loco). The Passover appears with the atoning significance which Ezk puts into all the cultus. This is manifested especially in the sin-offering, which is not elsewhere so connected with it. The festival is to be celebrated throughout at the central sanctuary, whereas Dt seems to demand this expressly for only the first part. The daily sacrifice is accurately defined, and the record is otherwise more explicit than Dt in naming not only the month, but in giving further the exact day. As in Dt, it is a seven-day festival, and maṣṣôth is so blended with the Passover as almost to lose its

* Cf. Steuernagel, 'Deut.' in Handkom. He assigns the Passover to J and maṣṣôth to E, and considers all references to maṣṣôth here as later additions after the union of J and E, i.e. makes RJE later than D; cf. Bertholet in Kurzer Handcom.; Cornill, Einleit. p. 25, regards vv.[3. 4] as an interpolation correcting v.[8]; Stade, Gesch. i. 658, thinks vv.[1-4] and [5-8] are irreconcilable doublets. In support of this, cf. Holzinger, Hex. p. 399.

* Cf. Driver, Com. p. 191; Bertholet, Com. p. 50; Wellh. Proleg.[4] p. 99; Nowack, Arch. ii. p. 153, n. 1. J. Müller (Kritischer Versuch uber d. Ursprung u. d. gesch. Entwicklung d. Pesach- u. Mazzothfestes, Bonn, 1884) makes this a later custom than P. Against this see Dill.-Rys. Com.

† בשל, primarily 'to become ripe,' but is the usual word (in Piel) for boiling, so used in related dialects. The later (harmonizing?) expression בִּקַּע בָּאֵשׁ (2 Ch 35^{13}) cannot count against this usage. The usual verb for roasting is צלה; cf. Driver, in loco; and Nowack, Arch. ii. 153, n. 3.

identity. There is no mention of a Passover lamb or of any private celebration whatever. It is rather the sacrifice of the community offered by the prince for himself and the people.

4. Lv 23[5], Ex 12[1-13. 43-51], Nu 9[1-14] 28[16], Jos 5[10].—As we pass to the body of law assigned to the priestly stratum, we can begin with the 'Law of Holiness' (Lv 17–26), which is supposed to embody in a later modified form an earlier independent body of law. A very close relationship clearly exists between this section and Ezk, but as a whole it is probably later (but see the discussion of this point in Driver, LOT[6] 147 ff., and the literature there cited). All that bears on our subject is confined to the simple statement that the Passover, as the opening festival of the year, is to be held on the evening of the 14th of the first month (23[5]). Apparently it is mentioned only for the sake of completeness in the enumeration of the feasts, and presupposes the fuller legislation of Ex 12.

Ex 12[1-13] explains the origin of the Passover, and gives details not elsewhere mentioned. While they are yet in Egypt, the LORD speaks to Moses and Aaron, and directs that they reckon the current month as the first month of the year. In anticipation of what is to come, they are to command all the congregation to take, on the tenth day of the month, lambs according to their families. Where the family is too small to dispose of a lamb, the head of the household is to unite with his neighbour, and they together are to take one, the number thus included and the capacity for consumption of each member being taken into account. A lamb or a kid may be taken, but it shall be a perfect animal (so usually for sacrifices, cf. Lv 22[19]), a male (cf. Lv 1[3. 10]), and one year old (cf. Lv 22[27]; for all these points cf. Benzinger, Arch. 451 et passim). It shall be kept until the 14th of the month, and then all the congregation shall slay it (i.e. each his lamb) at the evening hour. With the blood they are to stain the lintel and doorposts of the house in which the feast is held. The flesh shall be eaten that night with unleavened cakes and bitter herbs. It may not be eaten raw or boiled, but roasted, the victim being kept intact with head, legs, and inwards. All remnants shall be burned that night, and no part left till morning. The participants are to eat in haste, prepared for a journey, with their flowing garments girt about them, their sandals bound on, their staves in their hands. For this is the feast of the LORD'S Passover, who saith, 'I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and smite all the firstborn of man and beast. And against all the gods of Egypt will I execute judgment. I am the LORD.' The blood shall be a sign to mark the houses where Israel dwells, and into these the destroying plague shall not enter when the LORD smites Egypt. In vv.[43-51] comes an added ordinance as to those who may observe the Passover. The context implies that this was given in Succoth, apparently because of the presence of the mixed multitude (v.[38]); but all the allusions show that the observance in the Holy Land is especially intended. No foreigner, sojourner, or hired servant may eat the Passover. Only the circumcised are to be admitted under any circumstances. If a stranger be circumcised with all the males of his household, and thus becomes identified with the Jewish nation, he may observe it. So also circumcised servants are to be included, for all Israel must observe it. In v.[46] we have repeated, from the previous section, the particulars which serve to lay emphasis on the idea of unity which is here throughout made so prominent. V.[50] would seem to mean that ever after they observed the Passover as here directed. V.[51] repeats [41b], and is not in place at present.

In Nu 9[1-14] another law is added. The date of this is given as the first month of the second year after the Exodus. In obedience to the command of J" given through Moses, they observe the Passover. But some who were ceremonially unclean by reason of contact with a dead body are excluded, and they come to ask why they must be deprived of their share in the sacrifice. Moses seeks instructions from J", and receives command that any who are unclean at the Passover season, or who are absent on a journey, shall observe it on the 14th day of the second month in the same manner as the regular Passover is observed. Several details are repeated (vv.[11. 12]): unleavened bread and bitter herbs are to be eaten with it; nothing shall remain until the morning, and no bone is to be broken. If a man who is not hindered in either of the above ways fails to keep the Passover, he is to be cut off from the nation. Strangers must observe the same regulations that are binding for the Jews.

Once more—and again apparently for the sake of completeness—we find an allusion to the Passover in Nu 28[16]. The section deals with regular and special sacrifices; but since there are no temple sacrifices in the case of the Passover, only the mention of its occurrence on the 14th of the first month was needed.

The same writer records in Jos 5[10] the first Passover in Canaan. At the close of the wandering in the wilderness, after the renewal of circumcision, it is celebrated on the 14th of the month while they are encamped at Gilgal.

These accounts of P, which we have thus brought into review, show certain divergences from the ordinances of the previous writers, and reveal a wealth of detail not elsewhere found. As over against Dt (as it now stands) and Ezk, the Passover is always carefully distinguished from mazzôth, which begins on the following day. The celebration is domestic, and not apparently at all connected with the central sanctuary. In Dt we found the time given simply as the month of Abib. P does not use this name, but calls it the first month, and gives the exact day; in both these particulars agreeing with the present form of Ezk. Why the lamb was chosen on the tenth day, so long in advance, we are not told. Possibly it is because of the significance attached to the decad among ancient peoples (cf. Nowack, Arch. ii. p. 172, n. 3; Ideler, Chronol. i. p. 279, on Attic month), or it may be to fit into some scheme giving this day a special significance like that of the corresponding day of the seventh month celebrated as New Year's Day (Lv 25[9], Ezk 40[1]), and then as the Day of Atonement (Lv 16[29]). The killing of the lamb and the staining of the doorway was probably done by the father of the house. This feature is made of less importance than in 12[21ff.], and there is no mention of the hyssop. The significance of the command to roast the lamb whole with all its members, and to consume it before the morning, may be made to consist either in the desire to keep its parts from profanation, or to emphasize the idea of its unity, i.e. as a single sacrifice valid for all in the common group which partake of it (cf. Bähr, Symbolik, p. 635). The command to roast might be explained along these same lines, as also the prohibition of the earlier mode of boiling. Eating the flesh raw would mean the eating of the blood, which was always forbidden (e.g. Lv 7[26]). With this and the other details noted above we can compare the accounts of certain Arab sacrifices, where a camel was killed and devoured—skin, bones, entrails, and all—in wild haste, between the appearance of the day-star and sunrise (cf. RS p. 338 ff.; Well. Reste d. Arab. Heid.[2] 119 ff.). In our account, of course, all are dressed and eat in haste, that they may avail themselves of the opportunity for flight which will follow the impending plague. The bitter herbs (Ex 12^8, Nu 9^{11}) are not explained. They may have at first been used as relishes, apart from any atoning significance or reference to the suffering in Egypt which later rabbinical writers gave them.* In P the covenant idea is made especially prominent. So at the first Passover, and so also at each recurrence of the festival, when this covenant is renewed. This explains why only those who have entered into the unity of the nation by circumcision can participate; and, on the other hand, why any one who does not so participate is to be cut off from the nation. To meet emergencies which might work injustice,—such as necessary absence on a journey, ceremonial impurity arising from contact with the dead,—a second opportunity is given on the 14th of the succeeding month.

B. In the Historical and Prophetical Books.—1. The Prophetical Writings.—Outside the Hexateuch there is no explicit mention of the observance of a Passover until after the discovery of Dt (B.C. 621). For the time of the earlier kings, indeed, none of the feasts are explicitly mentioned except Tabernacles; but others together with the Passover may be included in such general statements regarding feasts as we find, e.g. Hos 2^{11} 9^5, Am 5^{21} 8^{10}, and Is 29^1 ('add year to year: let the feasts come round'). Some (Nowack, Arch. ii. p. 149) find an almost certain reference in Hos $12^{9\,(10)}$ 'I will yet again make thee to dwell in tents, as in the days of the solemn (i.e. fixed) feast.' And this is more probable than that the reference is to Tabernacles (Wellh. Die kl. Propheten^{2}, p. 126 f., excludes this passage from Hosea. He does not think it suits the threat there expressed; cf. Nowack, Arch. ii. 155, n. 2).

In Is 30^{29} the allusion to the Passover was formerly considered (Dill. Del. et al.) to be beyond question, but at present it is thought by many others to refer to the night preceding the New Year's feast (see art. TIME; cf. Duhm, Com. p. 203; Budde, ZAW, 1891, p. 200).

2. The Historical Writings (pre-exilic).—Here we find our first reference in 2 K $23^{21\text{-}23}$ 'And the king commanded all the people, saying, Keep the Passover unto J" your God, as it is written in this book of the covenant. Surely there was not kept such a Passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, nor of the kings of Judah; but in the eighteenth (cf. 22^3) year of king Josiah was this Passover kept to J" in Jerusalem.' There seems little doubt that this celebration under Josiah was novel, above all else, in following the law in Dt 16, and thus being celebrated at the central sanctuary. Such a fact would give ample reason for the extraordinary character assigned to it. The extreme brevity of the notice may be due to later curtailment (cf. Benzinger, 'Könige,' in Kurzer Handcom. 194 ff.). This is the only explicit reference to a Passover before the Exile. There are, to be sure, notices in 2 Ch (8^{13} (?) 30. 35) of Passovers during this time, but these very probably reflect the usages of the writer's own age, and cannot be classed along with the passage in 2 K. The most that can be deduced from them is that the Chronicler may have found in his sources mention of Passovers on the occasions where he gives his fuller descriptions.

3. The Historical Writings (post-exilic).—In Ezr $6^{19.\,20}$ (in Heb.) we have an account of how the returned exiles celebrated the feast. The Levites killed the lambs at this time, not only for themselves, but for the priests and the rest of the community as well. This is also made to be the case, in part at least, in 2 Ch. There in ch. 30 is a description of a Passover in Hezekiah's reign. For this the king sends out an especial summons (v.^{1}); and since they could not arrange for it in the first month it is held in the second (Nu 9^{11}), as is also the feast of maṣṣôth (v.^{13}). It is explained that it is because some were not purified according to the law, that the Levites kill the lambs for them (v.^{17}, but cf. v.^{18}). The priests receive the blood from the Levites and sprinkle it on the altar. An exception is made to the usual requirements, and all present are allowed to eat the Passover, although not purified according to the law. The following feast of seven days is extended yet another seven; and we are told that since Solomon's time such a festival had not been held in Jerusalem (v.^{26}). 2 Ch $35^{1\text{-}19}$ gives an extended description of the same Passover under Josiah, mentioned in 2 K 23. In this instance the implication seems to be that the Levites kill the lambs for all (v.^{6}). The priests receive the blood and sprinkle it on the altar (v.^{11}) as before, and as was usual in the case of other sacrifices. The Levites skinned the lambs, and apparently the other sacrificial animals as well (vv.$^{11.\,12}$). Here the writer tells us that since the days of Samuel the prophet no Passover like to this one had been kept. This same account with modifications is reproduced in the opening chapter of 1 Es. (For a comparison of the text of 2 Ch with the Greek of 1 Es see ZAW, 1899, p. 234 ff.).

C. Résumé.—We have thus in our OT Canon notices that take us down to the Greek era, and range back over documents falling within a period of some six centuries. For the earlier ones there are only the briefest notices, which do not justify many deductions, even if accepted in their present form. But it is extremely probable that our feast continued to be observed during all this time in the Southern, even if not so generally in the Northern kingdom. Many of the rites mentioned by the later writers were certainly of very ancient origin. In Dt, in the last quarter of the 7th cent., we get on undisputed ground. In this first extended account, the strong emphasis on the historical significance of the Passover is especially marked. It commemorates the emancipation from Egypt, the day of the nation's birth. The domestic character, which it probably possessed originally, disappears, but not the individual idea, which is so far retained that we still have separate sacrifices. There continues to be room for much of the spontaneity and joyousness that belong to a voluntary celebration. At this time it would seem it either stood by itself or introduced the maṣṣôth feast as later.—We find our next notices after a half century in the ideal portrayal of Ezekiel. Here the memorial significance gives way to the piacular conception which grows out of Ezekiel's exalted view of J"'s holiness. The individual element disappears in the collective idea of the nation. Thus it comes that the Passover loses its distinctive character, and is taken up and embodied in the general class of sacrifices. It is accurately dated so as to fit into his scheme of the sacred year. All this falls within Ezekiel's vision of Israel's future restoration, and so his notice serves to emphasize the importance of the Passover in the religious life of the people. From a historical point of view, the account is not so much valuable in itself as it is in marking the transition from Dt to the priestly document.

During the Exile the Passover was probably one of the few observances still possible to the Jews, and must have greatly aided in keeping alive religious faith and hope. The memory of the deeds once done for the fathers would become the ground of assurance of that inevitable future when J"'s promise to His chosen people would be realized. The commemorative side would be thus developed, the more so as any connexion with the sacrificial cultus was, of course, impossible. Just as in later days, after the destruction of the temple, so now they would love to linger long, on this night, recalling the past and thinking of the future. The fact that in P the Passover is seen to be in its essential nature a sacrifice, and yet is so unlike all other sacrifices, may be due in large measure to the development and strengthening of the domestic and historical features during this period. We might then understand in part the departure from the view of the Deuteronomist. Undoubtedly, the Passover assumes a new prominence in P. In many points there is a close connexion with Ezekiel, but there is greater amplification and much that differs. Not only is the day definitely fixed, but all the minute details of observance are added. With this writer, further, it is not merely a memorial, but it was instituted beforehand as a means of accomplishing deliverance, and thus gains a deeper historical meaning. It is in the first instance the saving deed itself (cf. Wellh. Proleg.[4] p. 100).—The Chronicler gives us our last notices in the Canon. By him the priestly legislation is usually followed, as it is throughout the norm of post-exilic worship; but in the case of the Passover a striking preference is given to the ordinances of Dt. The sacrificial character again comes into prominence, possibly under the growing influence of worship in one sanctuary.

ii. ORIGIN AND PRIMITIVE SIGNIFICANCE.—Whatever differences there may be in our OT records as to the manner of observing the Passover, we have seen that it is uniformly associated with and commemorative of the deliverance from Egypt. Of its meaning to the Israel of historic time there can be no question. But do we thus arrive at the real explanation of its origin and primitive significance? Our accounts in their present form are, of course, an inadequate explanation for the institution of an entirely new feast. So much is mentioned as well understood that we see it must have been firmly rooted in the national life when the writers lived. In view of this fact; in view of the many features which seem to point to something behind the interpretation given to them; in view of what we find in the observances of related peoples, so far as these are known to us; and in view of the development in the case of all the other great feasts, and the historical interpretation which came to be given them,—it is probable that we have here another instance in which Israel's religion takes up, transforms, and appropriates an existing institution. We might expect to find some starting-point for conjecture in the name Passover, but it proves of little aid.

1. Name.—פֶּסַח, J.-Aram. פַּסְחָא, Syr. ܦܨܚܐ, and hence πάσχα (2 Ch, Jer 38 (31)[8] φασέκ; Jos. several times φάσκα. Later derivatives πασχάζω, πασχάλιος, πασχαλικοί). The root פסח* appears in what are usually regarded as two distinct verbs: (1) 'to pass over' in sense of sparing, with the prepos. עַל Ex 12[13. 23. 27], and without Is 31[5], cf. תְּפַסַּח 1 K 5[4]; (2) 'to be lame,' 'to limp' (cf. ܦܣܚ, ܦܨܚ), 1 K 18[21], Pi. 18[26] ('dance'?), Niph. 2 S 4[4]. For the first, from which the noun Passover is derived, there is no means of gaining a primitive meaning (so Wellh., Benzinger, et al.). It is undoubtedly an old word. In Syriac ܦܨܚ means to be joyous,

* Ewald would trace to root פס Salvere, and from this derive other meanings which might give the idea of festal rejoicing, and this would be the most we could infer as to a primal conception. The name Passover is used in a twofold way, (a) of the feast, (b) of the sacrifice at that time (in 2 Ch we meet the plural פְּסָחִים). It is made the object of various verbs. So of עשׂה 'to keep the feast of the Passover' (e.g. Ex 12[48]); שׁחט 'to kill the Passover' (e.g. Ex 12[21]); זבח 'to sacrifice the Passover' (e.g. Dt 16[2]); בָּשַׁל בָּאֵשׁ 'to roast the Passover' (2 Ch 35[13]); אכל 'to eat the Passover' (e.g. Ex 12[43]). (On חג המצות cf. above, i A. 1).

2. Older Views.—From the many conjectures regarding the pre-Mosaic Passover there are several which do not commend themselves at present sufficiently to warrant more than a brief mention. George (Die Jüd. Feste, p. 239) starts from the root פסח and makes it a commemorative feast of the passage of the Red Sea. Redslob (Hamburger Gymnasial Programm, 1856) regarded it as a shepherd's festival celebrated in the pastures on the night before the Exodus ('Ein in der Nacht vor dem Auszug der Hirten auf die Triften gefeiertes Hutfest'). Von Bohlen (Gen. p. 140 ff.) and Vatke (Bibl. Theol. i. p. 492 ff.) make it the celebration of the entrance of the sun into the zodiacal sign Aries, and so many others have connected it with the spring. (See Kalisch, Ex, p. 184 ff.; Dill.-Rys. Ex, p. 120 ff.). There have been from time to time views connecting the early rite with human sacrifice (cf. Kalisch, l.c. 186 ff.).

3. Offering of the Firstborn.—This is the view at present most widely accepted, and perhaps best set forth by Wellhausen in the chapter of his Prolegomena dealing with the whole question of the feasts (4th ed. pp. 82–117; cf. also p. 358 f.).* This holds that, in the main, the Passover was the sacrifice of the firstborn. The simple and natural meaning and occasion of the feasts is to be found in the statement of Gn 4[2b-4a] 'And Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground. And in the process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock.' The Passover is the shepherd's offering, given in thankful recognition that the fruitfulness of the herd is from J". That the firstborn belong to J" is a primitive ordinance, and it is pointed out that in our present accounts such an offering is closely connected with the Passover (Ex 13[12ff.] 'Thou shalt set apart unto the LORD all that openeth the womb . . . the males shall be the LORD'S,' Dt 15[19ff.] 16[1ff.]). This custom, it is said, can alone explain the remarkable choice made by the plague in smiting the firstborn. Because Pharaoh prevents the bringing of this offering which is due, J" takes the firstborn of the Egyptians. The oft-repeated demand is to let the people go to keep a feast in the wilderness with cattle and sheep (Ex 3[18] 7[16] 8[27] et passim). For this purpose they borrow the ornaments from the Egyptians. Thus in reality the feast was the occasion of the Exodus, if only the ostensible one, and not the Exodus of the feast, as would appear from the accounts in Dt and Ex 13. (For Ex 13[1-16] is held by Wellhausen to belong in its present form to a Deuteronomic editing). And he concludes that, while a slight inclination to assign a historical motive to the Passover may possibly be traced earlier, this first actually occurs in Dt. This is apparently due to the fact that in the older tradition the feast explains the occasion and time of the Exodus. Then comes the change that the slaying of the Egyptians is the reason for offering the firstborn;

* Cf. also in this connexion J. Müller, Kritischer Versuch über den Ursprung und die geschichtliche Entwicklung des Pesach- und Mazzothfestes, Bonn, 1834.

and the time is in the spring, because the Exodus took place then. Then in P comes the further change that the connexion of the Passover with the sacrifice of the firstborn is lost to view. It is no longer based on the fact that J″ slew the firstborn of the Egyptians, but it was instituted before the Exodus, that He might spare the firstborn of Israel.

4. A Feast of Atonement.—Another line of conjecture starts from the piacular ritual appearing in both the accounts of Ex 12. We have seen that the second section there (vv.[21-27]) deals almost exclusively with the blood ceremonial. F. C. Baur (Tübinger Ztschr. f. Theol. 1832, p. 40 ff.) connects the feast with that celebrated in India, Persia, Asia Minor, and Egypt at the time of the vernal equinox. The Passover sacrifice is offered in place of the firstborn of men, and is thus essentially a sacrifice of atonement. Cf. העבר in Ex 13[12] (JE) with the use of the same word in connexion with the rite of Molech in such passages as Lv 18[21], 2 K 23[10], Jer 32[35]. Dillmann in his Com. on Ex and Lv (p. 636 and cf. 121, ed. by Ryssel, Leipzig, 1897) regards the Passover as an offering of reconciliation and purification, introducing the equinoctial festival. The connexion with the Exodus came from the fact that Israel left Egypt at this season. Contiguity in time also explains the later association with mazzôth.

In the same way Ewald (Antiquities of Israel, p. 352 ff.) affirms—'from the earliest times an atonement offering was an indispensable constituent of every Spring festival.' It comes at a time when there is serious reflexion and anxious care for the unknown future, and so man felt himself impelled to offer 'sacrifices of purification and reconciliation, not alone on account of particular transgressions of which he knew himself to be guilty, but also to secure the Divine exemption and grace generally on the occasion of this uncertain transition, so that, as it were, if, during the new year, his god were to visit him and call him to account, he might not slay him, as he perhaps deserved, but might graciously pass him over.' The lamb was accordingly 'unmistakably an expiatory offering,' and the streaking of the doorway with blood was 'to make atonement for the whole house and all who were contained therein celebrating the festival.'

Schultz in his OT Theol. (Eng. tr. i. p. 364) presents much the same view, although he admits the possibility that it 'may originally have been the feast of the firstlings of the cattle.'

5. A Blood Covenant.—In the OT Theol. of Kayser-Marti we find a somewhat different presentation. Here (2nd ed., Strassburg, 1894, p. 37 f.) it is maintained that originally the Passover was unconnected with the Spring or the Firstborn, but was rather a celebration by means of which one secured his house from all harm in times of pestilence. This was effected by the blood ceremonial which brought one into the closest relations with his divinity, and so, as he believed, secured him from all danger. The application of blood to the doorway suggests that the house divinities (Hausgötter) who dwelt there are possibly the ones whose protection was sought.* H. C. Trumbull (The Threshold Covenant, p. 203 ff.) holds that the Passover goes back to a rite, which he seeks to trace among many peoples, of a covenant welcome given to a guest, or to a bride or bridegroom in marriage, 'by the outpouring of blood on the threshold of the door, and by staining the doorway itself with the blood of the covenant.' The Passover sacrifice was, then, the threshold cross-over sacrifice which marked the welcome of J″ to the household. The idea was familiar, and so needed no explanation when commanded for the night of the deliverance (Ex 12). He would translate 'threshold' (סף) rather than 'basin' in Ex 12[22], as is done in the LXX and Vulg. (cf. op. citat. p. 206 ff.). The sacrifice killed is one of welcome,* and J″ honours this by covenanting with those who proffer it; where He is not so welcomed, His executioner enters. The firstborn of the Egyptians are taken, since it was a common thought of primitive peoples 'that the first-fruits of life in any sphere belonged of right to God or the gods,' and so His taking them is evidence that the gods of Egypt could not protect them. The Egyptian Passover was in the eyes of the people the rite of marriage between J″ and Israel. The 'stamp of the red hand of the bridegroom is the certification of the covenant union, at the doorway of the family.' But since here Israel is the virgin, the hyssop (Ex 12[22]), i.e. the tree or bush as a feminine symbol, is used for this purpose. In his earlier work, The Blood Covenant, Trumbull suggests that in the rite of circumcision it was Abraham and his descendants who supplied the blood of the covenant, while in the Passover sacrifice it was the Lord who commanded the substitute blood in token of His blood-covenanting (p. 351, cf. 230 ff.).

6. Conclusion.—In the Passover we probably have one of Israel's oldest feasts. It is the only one represented in the OT as established before the Exodus. The only other occasion that could at all be compared to it in the matter of age would be the feast at sheep-shearing (1 S 25[2], 2 S 13[23ff.]; cf. H. P. Smith's Com. in loco). Both point to the nomad stage of development, and may well date from those early days. All expositors, whatever their lines of conjecture, agree in recognizing this. Many of the writers cited above do not advance their views to the exclusion of all others, although that is true of some, but rather as setting forth that which they think was of central significance in the primitive Passover. In valuing any of these theories we must always distinguish between the facts at the foundation and the brilliant reconstruction that imagination has built upon them, and by so doing we shall probably conclude that it is extremely hazardous to attempt anything like a complete picture of the primitive Passover. For the Passover of historic times this result will doubtless be ultimately so far attained that there will be general agreement; but for the earlier age we must be content to note the separate features which the existing material preserves to us, and to recognize them as such. We shall probably in this way approximate more nearly to the truth. For it would not be strange if the Passover which we know, combined in itself features belonging to an original feast of much larger proportions, or rather if it had taken up into itself in the course of time various features from what were in reality different festivals. As within the period covered by our records we find modifications coming in from time to time, so it undoubtedly was earlier, although not with the same rapidity or to the same extent. In this way it is quite possible that certain particulars, which now receive little notice more than the mere mention, at one time had a much greater importance. Recalling what seem to be the most important features of this primitive festival, we may note—(a) the time of its celebration, namely, the vernal equinox. This is not unimportant or accidental. It suggests a connexion with the changing seasons, and affords a legitimate

* One is reminded in this connexion of the presentation in the Bk. of Jubilees (49[15])—'And no plague shall come upon them in this year (i.e. any year) to kill and destroy them, if they observe the Passover at its season according to its ordinance' (cf. further, Ex 5[3b]).

* He cites the custom of modern Jews of opening the outer door at a certain stage of the feast, and placing an extra cup and chair.

basis for those hypotheses cited above, which give especial recognition to this feature. The fact that so many other peoples celebrate this occasion lends credibility to such a view. Of course, however, we cannot be certain that we do not have here a feature of lesser antiquity than some one of the others. The further observance at the middle of the month and at night, indicates an almost certain connexion with the full moon. Later on, in Israel and outside, the new moon was apparently much more regarded, but not to the entire exclusion of the full moon (Dill.-Ryssel on Lv, p. 632 ff.).

(b) In the older days a feast seems always to have meant a sacrifice. And we have found both these conceptions embodied in the Passover, the festal side being very evident, and the sacrificial hardly less so. The fact that it does not conform in its details to any one of the later classes of Levitical sacrifices, cannot be made an objection to such a view. For here we go back to a time when all such requirements were as yet undeveloped. All the later treatment of the Passover, as well as most of the terms applied to it (cf. above), indicate throughout such a conception of its significance.

(c) As a sacrifice, the piacular side stands out in the present accounts with especial prominence. For the blood ceremonial (cf. Ex 12) can hardly have any other meaning. In it a practice from the early tribal life seems to be preserved to us. We see that blood had much the same significance in worship in the case of Israel as was given to it by other peoples. Developments of this same conception could then be found in the many later rites of blood: the pouring, the sprinkling, and the staining. Trumbull's books greatly help one to see how this could come about. At the same time, as a sacrifice the Passover has another side, no less important and no less primitive (cf. RS p. 239 et passim). It ranks with the shĕlāmîm or peace-offerings, where the common meal is central, as the means of establishing or renewing the covenant with God and with one another.

We have seen how P gave marked emphasis to this sacramental side. And this cannot be made to conflict with the previous aspect or to exclude it. The fact that the sin-offering of later times could not be used for such a meal, cannot be made a norm for practice at this early stage. Rather one could urge, as some do, the probability that in the case of all sacrifices the blood then found some such application. And in saying this we must remember that it by no means implies that the words atonement and reconciliation need to have the same serious content that a later age gave to them. Originally offered as all other sacrifices, we should expect no other priest than the head of the family.

(d) If we keep within the bounds of our records, it can hardly be denied that the sacrifices at this feast were for the most part, if not entirely, the firstborn. Such an offering is mentioned in the oldest portions of the law, and is closely associated with those passages dealing with the Passover. In view of the previous discussion, we need at present merely mention this aspect (cf. ii. 3).

(e) It seems, furthermore, to be an undoubted part of the old tradition, that the Exodus was closely connected with the observance of this ancient feast. In the case of P there is, to be sure, a demand for complete release, but otherwise there is no indication that the Israelites gave any hint of their intention not to return. The demand which Moses and Aaron repeatedly urge upon Pharaoh is—'Thus saith J" the God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness . . . let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the wilderness, and sacrifice unto J" our God, lest he fall upon us with pestilence or with sword' (Ex 5^{1-3}). With young and old, with its sons and its daughters, with its flocks and its herds, Israel seeks to go forth into the Sinaitic peninsula to hold a feast unto the Lord (Ex 10^{9}). That they should ask to do so, does not apparently seem a strange or unintelligible demand to the king. Possibly because such religious pilgrimages, which were a frequent occurrence with later Semitic peoples, were not unusual in those earlier times (cf. Dillmann, Ex. p. 46 f.).

Such a feast as this need not, of course, be the Passover; much less the prototype of the later maẓẓôth (so Dill. in loc. p. 636). But that it stood in close relation to the Passover and the sacrifice of the firstborn, seems an almost necessary conclusion from the OT accounts.

Such are the features which the Passover seems to include within itself. But to give the name Passover especial application to any particular one of them in this early time does not seem warranted, for we have no means of judging of its age or meaning. It may have belonged originally to some particular part, or may have been the designation of the entire feast or series of feasts. In any case it has come to stand for a most important recurring occasion in the early nomad life of Israel, one that was possibly then what the feast of Tabernacles was for the early agricultural life—the Feast. The very fact that it survived the many changes attending the passing from this nomad to the agricultural stage, as well as later changes hardly less revolutionary, points to something deeply rooted in the popular life and tradition. From first to last it keeps this character of a people's feast, and reforms which failed to recognize this feature could not be ultimately successful. Such a celebration could well be the occasion of the Exodus, and this supposition affords adequate explanation for the subsequent traditions. That the old character should become merged in the memorial significance, was to be expected in the face of the new life and institutions. Contiguity in time seems the best explanation for its association with maẓẓôth, which always remains really distinct.

iii. THE POST-EXILIC PASSOVER.—1. Manner of Observance.—The practice subsequent to the return from captivity, as we have seen in 2 Ch and Ezra, conformed more closely to Dt than to P. This is borne out by the extra-canonical sources (esp. Tract Pesachim, Josephus, Bk. of Jubilees). Many details in Ex 12 were interpreted as intended only for the Egyptian Passover (פסח מצרים) as over against the permanent Passover, which future generations were to observe (פסח לדרות or פסח ראשון) as distinguished from the second or little Passover (פסח שני). Such features were (a) the selection of the lamb on the 10th day; (b) the slaughter at the home; (c) the sprinkling of blood on the doorposts; (d) the admission of those who might be Levitically impure; (e) the haste indicated in dress and manner of eating (i.e. standing); (f) lodging where the feast was held. These were assigned to the feast of preparation, but not intended to be perpetuated in the feast of commemoration. It is to be noted that the priestly writer does not expressly enjoin these features save for the first Passover, but the whole tenor of his narrative indicates that they were undoubtedly given for all time. The Samaritans so continue to understand them. It is only among them that there is still an attempt to observe the Passover with actual sacrifice as in earlier days (cf. the account in Baedeker's Palestine and Syria; Trumbull's Studies in Oriental Social Life, p. 371 ff.; Thomson in Expos. Times, xi. (1900) 377).

Preparation for the Passover really began at the middle of the preceding month (Adar). Roads and bridges were repaired, sepulchres were whitened anew, that they might be readily seen and avoided. It was the season of ceremonial and all other kinds of purifications. In the last days the household utensils were all carefully cleaned. The Sabbath preceding the 14th of Nisan came to be known in the modern synagogue as the Great Sabbath (שבת הגדול), because it was held that the 10th, when the lamb was selected in the first instance, fell on a Sabbath. There seems to be no evidence, however, that this view was in existence at the beginning of the Christian era.

On the evening of the 13th the head of the family searched the house with a lighted candle, that he might seek out all the leaven. The hour on the 14th at which one must refrain from eating leavened cakes was variously fixed. It was always before noon, however, the precise time being indicated by the disappearance of two cakes which were exposed before the temple. When the signal was thus given, all leaven must be burned or scattered to the winds. Under the head of leaven the Mishna (Pesach. 2–5) includes cakes made from wheat, barley, spelt, oats, and rye. If bread be made from any of these grains, it must be before the dough ferments at all. Work ceased on the morning, or at noon, of the 14th, save in a few occupations (tailors, barbers, laundresses). All able-bodied males, not ceremonially impure, within a radius of 15 miles were required to appear this day before the LORD at His sanctuary with an offering. Women were not required to attend, but apparently did so* (Jos. BJ VI. ix. 3; Pesach. IX. 4).

The regular evening sacrifice was killed and offered an hour earlier than usual (i.e. at 1.30 and 2.30 respectively) in order to give opportunity for sacrificing the Passover. When the 14th fell on a Sunday the evening sacrifice came two hours earlier (12.30 and 1.30). The time of the Passover sacrifice is defined in the Law as 'between the two evenings' (בֵּין הָעַרְבַּיִם Ex 12^{6}, Lv 23^{5}, Nu $9^{3.\,5.\,11}$). This was interpreted by the Pharisees and Talmudists to mean from the hour of the sun's decline until its setting; and this was the later temple practice (cf. Pesach. v. 1; Jubilees, 49; Jos. BJ VI. ix. 3). The Samaritans, Karaites, and Sadducees, on the other hand, held that the period between sunset and dark was intended.

Companies, which could consist of from 10 to 20 persons, were organized indiscriminately, and not of a man and his neighbour (Ex 12^{4}); the number in each instance to be definitely fixed in advance. At the appointed hour the representatives of these various groups, each provided with a lamb not less than eight days old nor more than a year, were divided into three divisions. These were admitted successively to the temple court. The priests blew a threefold blast from the silver trumpets, and thereupon each Israelite in the division just admitted killed his lamb. The blood was caught by the priests, who stood in two rows, one row having gold and the other silver bowls. These bowls were then passed along from hand to hand, and the priest nearest the altar dashed the contents on its base. The lambs were hung on nails, or from staves resting upon the shoulders of two men (not allowed when the day was a Sabbath), and dressed. The fat was removed, and offered by the priests on the altar. While all this was taking place, the Levites sang the Hallel (Ps 113–118); and this they repeated, or sang even a third time, if the division had not meantime finished its sacrifice. This same order was followed in the case of each division.

The lambs were then taken to the homes outside and roasted whole on a wooden spit, pomegranate wood being used, that no sap exude. No bone was allowed to be broken under penalty of scourging, and the flesh must not come in contact with any foreign substance: should this happen, the portion must be cut away. Nothing was eaten after the evening sacrifice until the Passover meal. This must close at midnight. The participants were clad in their best garments. Though not enjoined in the Law, wine came to be regarded as an indispensable part of the feast. Each one must be provided with at least four cups of red wine, even if the money had to come from the fund for public charity, or was raised by the pledging of one's garments, or by his labour. Another dish, which later seems to have been usual but which was not obligatory, was the ḥarôṣeth (חרוסת). It consisted of bruised fruits, such as dates and raisins, mingled with vinegar (a symbol, it was said, of the clay from which the bricks were made in Egypt). The real meal, however, had for its elements (a) the bitter herbs, of which the Mishna specifies five varieties; (b) the unleavened cakes; (c) the ḥagîgah (חגיגה) or free-will festal offering; (d) the Passover lamb. The supper was opened with the blessing, pronounced by the head of the company over the first cup of wine, which was then drunk. Then came a hand-washing and an accompanying prayer. Then the bitter herbs, dipped in the ḥarôṣeth, were handed round. After the pouring of the second cup of wine came the question of the son, or of one speaking for him, as to the significance of the feast (Ex 12^{26}). Following the father's explanation came the first part of the Hallel (Ps 113 and 114). After the third cup grace after meals was said, and after the fourth followed the completion of the Hallel (Ps 115–118). In earlier times nothing was eaten after the paschal lamb, but a later custom permitted a piece of unleavened cake as dessert (apîḳômen). There were slight modifications for the observance of the second Passover on the 14th of the following month.

With the destruction of the temple and the cessation of the sacrificial cultus there naturally came a considerable change in the mode of celebration. This was partly in the direction of amplification. The historical significance was emphasized, and an elaborate ritual took shape, cf. the paschal Haggāda, portions of which are as late as the 15th cent. A.D. (Hamburger, Supplement to Real-Encyc. p. 113). Much the same general order was observed and much the same articles of food were used, except that for the temple sacrifices the roasted shankbone of a lamb and a roasted egg were employed.

2. Number of participants.—The number of those who attended the feast at Jerusalem was undoubtedly great, even if Josephus' use of figures makes us somewhat sceptical of his estimates. At one time, under Nero, he makes the probable number over two and a half millions, and on another occasion (A.D. 65) three millions (BJ VI. ix. 3, II. xiv. 3). It was at such times that Rome took especial measures to guard against insurrections (Ant. XVII. ix. 3, XX. v. 3; cf. Mt 26^{5}). It may be that there were both executions and pardons on these occasions; both aimed at the restraint of the multitude (cf. Mt 27^{15}). The city could not accommodate all the visitors, and so they camped outside in tents or lodged in neighbouring villages. Guests were freely entertained, but left the skins of the lambs and the utensils used at the feast with their respective hosts (Mishna, Yoma xii. 1).

3. The Date.—The day of the celebration was determined by the condition of the harvest. If this did not promise in the 12th month to be ready to be gathered in four weeks, and the animals were not yet grown sufficiently for sacrifice, then the month was declared intercalary, and a thirteenth was added. This question was settled by the Sanhedrin, and there were certain regulations laid down to guide their decision. The opening of the month of Nisan was also proclaimed by them. This took place when messengers came who had actually seen the new moon (see art. NEW MOON). It was not till about the time of Christ that there came to be a fixed calendar. Fires on the hill-tops sent the signal through the land that the Passover month had begun. After the Samaritans made use of such fires to mislead the Jews, it was ordered that messengers should carry the news throughout the country. The difficulty of fixing this date, and of informing those who were remote when it had been done, led to the doubling of important festal days for those in the Diaspora. (On question of date cf. Mishna, Rosh hashshana ii. 1 ff.; Ideler, Chronol. pp. 491 ff. and 508 ff.; Schürer, GJV i. 625 [HJP I. ii. 370 f.]).

The question of the number of passovers traceable during our Lord's ministry, as well as that of the relation of the Last Supper to the Passover, are discussed in art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 406 ff.; cf. JESUS CHRIST, vol. ii. p. 633 f.

PASTOR.—This word was at first used literally (like its Lat. equivalent) of a keeper of sheep. So in the OT, Jer 2^8 3^{15} 10^{21} 12^{10} 17^{16} 22^{22} $23^{1.2}$. But already in AV it has assumed a metaph. meaning. In Eph 4^{11} (the only NT occurrence) RV retains 'pastor'; but elsewhere (except Jer 2^8, RV 'ruler') changes 'pastor' into 'shepherd,' probably on account of the special modern use of the word to designate the minister of a Christian congregation. For the lit. use see Mt 25^{33} Rhem. 'As the pastor separateth the sheep from the goates'; and for the transition Mt 26^{31} Rhem. 'I wil strike the Pastor, and the sheepe of the flocke shal be dispersed.' PATARA (τὰ Πάταρα) was a city on the Lycian coast, about 60 stadia south-east from the mouth of the river Xanthos, at the modern village Gelemish. It served as the principal harbour for the inland cities in the valley of that river, including Xanthus the city, Tlos, Araxa, etc. It was also a link in the chain of coasting trade, which had been maintained for more than a thousand years before Christ, and which steadily grew and in the centuries immediately before and after Christ attained vast proportions. Ships sailing between the Ægean or Italian harbours and the Levant (Cyprus, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Syria, Egypt) touched at Rhodes and then at Patara, making a straight run across the intervening sea. That is well exemplified in the account of St. Paul's voyage (Ac 21^1) from Miletus and Cos by Rhodes and Patara to Syria. In Patara he found a ship bound for Phœnicia by the direct sea voyage; and he transhipped into it with his company. The ship in which he had come to Patara was not so suitable for his purposes, whether because it was bound for the continuous coasting voyage, hugging close the shore of Asia Minor, or possibly because it was not going farther than the Lycian harbours. Many ships engaged in the Syrian or the Egyptian trade, especially those which were larger and stronger, stood direct across the Levant from the Lycian coast to their destination, keeping west and south of the island of Cyprus. They could do this easily with the prevailing westerly breezes of the Levant; but the return voyage outside (i.e. south and west) of Cyprus was not easy; it could be tried from Egypt, but from Syria was hardly possible for the ancient ships. Hence, when St. Paul was coming back from Cæsarea to Rome, he had to keep inside, i.e. east and north, of Cyprus, on account of the prevailing westerly breezes, Ac 27^2. See also MYRA, which was the next important link in the chain of trade eastward.

This situation assured to Patara considerable importance and wealth. Its coinage begins about B.C. 440, sometimes as autonomous with Lycian legends (name Pttara) or under dynasts about 430–410. In the 4th and 3rd cents. B.C. it seems to have struck no coins, being under foreign rule; but when the Lycian League was established (see LYCIA), Patarean coinage began again, B.C. 168–81, and it continued in bronze under the Roman empire until about A.D. 230–240. Alliance coins with Myra, under Gordian III., attest the close relations of the two cities, as above mentioned.

The importance of Patara as a link in the connexion between Egypt and the Ægean harbours is shown by the fact that, when the Ptolemaic power attained its acme in the 3rd cent., Ptolemy Philadelphus enlarged the city and re-named it Arsinoe after his queen; but the new name disappeared with the Egyptian power.

The name of Patara in ancient times was closely connected with the cultus and the oracle of Apollo; and its later coins show Apolline types, though on its earlier coinage Athena and Hermes (Greek ideals of art and trade) are the prominent figures. The Roman poets, and the later Greeks like Lykophron, associate the epithet Patarean with Apollo, just as they call the god Delphian. The oracle spoke only during part of the year, viz. the six winter months.

In the history of Christianity Patara was of small consequence. Lycia, like Pamphylia, seems to have been slow in adopting the new religion. Patara was a bishopric, and is mentioned as such in all the Notitiæ. There are still considerable ruins of the city, on which see Beaufort, Texier, Fellows, Spratt, and Forbes, and, above all, the splendid work of Benndorf-Niemann on Lykia.

PATE (formed by loss of l from 'plate,' which came to be applied to the crown of the head, esp. the bald crown, from its appearance: cf. Germ. Platte, 'a plate,' 'bald head,' and vulgarly 'the head') occurs once in AV (Ps 7^{16} 'His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate') and is retained in RV, because of the distinction thus brought out between רֹאשׁ rō'sh, the usual word for 'head,' and קָדְקֹד ḳodhḳōdh, the 'crown of the head' (which elsewhere, however, is rendered 'crown of the head,' Gn 49[26], Dt 33[20], 2 S 14[25], Job 2[7], Is 3[17], Jer 2[16] 48[45], or 'top of the head,' Dt 28[35] 33[16], or 'scalp,' Ps 68[21]). The AV tr. in Ps 7[16] comes from Coverdale (Wyc. has 'nol' in 1382, 'necke' in 1388); it is used by Knox in a tr. of the passage (Works, iii. 90), 'The dolour whilk he intendit for me sall fall upon his own pate; and the violence whairwith he wold haif oppressit me sall cast doun his awn heid.' Shaks. uses the word freely, and always in contempt or ridicule, which seems to accompany its use everywhere, but this is not pronounced in, e.g., Tymme, Calvin's Genesis on Gn 31[22] (p. 650), 'It was a heavie and miserable sight, that Jacob . . . should flee away as one that had done amisse; but this was more sharpe and fearefull, that the destruction which Laban intended against him, was readie to light on his pate.' J. HASTINGS.

PATHEUS (Παθαῖος), 1 Es 9[23], the same as PETHAHIAH the Levite, Ezr 10[23].

PATHROS (פַּתְרוֹס, LXX γῇ Παθουρῆς, B also Φαθωρῆς, Ezk 29[14] 30[14], Vulg. Phatures, also Phethros) appears in the following passages:—Jer 44[1], the Jews fleeing before the Babylonians settled 'in the land of Egypt, and at Migdol, and at Tahpanhes, and at Noph (i.e. Memphis, so far three cities of Lower Egypt), and in the country of Pathros,' evidently a part of the land south of Memphis. V.[15], all people that dwelt in the land of Egypt [and] in 'Pathros' answer Jeremiah's accusation. The 'and' is wanting in the Heb. and already in the text of the LXX, but it has evidently been omitted by mistake, and must be inserted after the analogy of the first verse. Pathros denotes, not a part of (Lower) Egypt or Mizraim, but a region parallel to it. Is 11[11] 'the remainder of Israel will be brought home from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros (LXX strangely 'Babylonia'), and Ethiopia (Cush), and Elam,' etc. Ezk 30[14], we find again, in the prophecy against Egypt, this country parallel to Pathros (the following cities are not arranged in any geographic order).

We see, consequently, that the prophets did not use Mizraim in the old sense 'Egypt,' but in a limited sense, distinguishing between Mizraim, Egypt proper, i.e. Lower Egypt or the Delta of the Nile, and Pathros or Upper Egypt (this definition was correctly perceived already by S. Bochart in his book Phaleg). Pathros denotes, therefore, the same thing as the Thebais of the Greeks, the country beginning a few miles S. of Memphis, at a place called Acanthus by the Greeks and extending to Syene on the first cataract. The name is of good Egyp. formation: P-to-rêṣ, 'the southern (rêṣ) country,' an etymology given correctly already by Quatremère. Other etymologies have not maintained themselves; e.g. the comparison with the Pathyrite (νόμος Παθυρίτης) of the Greeks, a small county or nomos of Upper Egypt, which was very tempting for former scholars (G. Ebers in 1867), is inadmissible. (It would be in Heb. letters [פתחתור]ם Pe-ḥathor-(res) or something similar). The Assyr. king Esarhaddon calls himself in a cuneiform inscription 'king of the kings of Egypt (Muzur), of Paturisi and Ethiopia' (Kusi, i.e. Cush of the Hebrews). Possibly the Heb. word should be read פתורים Pathorîs, in accordance with this testimony, the versions, and the Egyp. etymology.

The reason why the prophets drew this line of distinction between Egypt proper and the 'Southern country' was their old political division, renewed about 800 B.C. At that time the Eth. king of Napata extended his power beyond the first cataract and seized Thebes. About 770 B.C. the Ethiopian P(i)'ankhi (Piankhi) possessed Upper Egypt down to Hermopolis. The rest of Egypt was split up into ten small kingdoms perfectly independent of the legal Pharaoh, Shoshenk IV. Of these petty kings residing in Sais, Bubastis, Hermopolis, etc., Tefnakht of Sais finally gained the supremacy. He failed to subject Middle Egypt owing to the interference of the Ethiopians. Tefnakht's defeat and nominal subjection under P(i)'ankhi's sovereignty did not prevent him and his successor Bocchoris (Egyptian Bok-en-renef, the famous founder of the Egyptian code of laws) from gaining finally all Lower and Middle Egypt. In 728 the Eth. Shabako, interfering again, defeated Bocchoris, burned him alive, and united Egypt under his rule. But the political division of Pathros under administration of the Eth. kings and of Mizraim under native rulers, which had lasted for some 70 years, was kept in memory by the Hebrews during the 7th cent. and even by Ezekiel (572 B.C.)

Ezk 29[14] (after Egypt has been desolate for 40 years and its inhabitants exiled), 'I will bring back the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into (LXX, 'will cause them to dwell in,' perhaps better) the land of Pathros, into the land of their birth, and they shall be there a base kingdom.' It is very remarkable to find in Ezekiel a knowledge of the correct Egyp. tradition concerning the priority of the Southern country over the North. The earliest known dynasties of kings resided in Memphis on the border of Upper and Lower Egypt, but the first historical king, Menes, came from This (Thinis) near Abydos in Upper Egypt. Therefore the inscriptions always place the South as the aboriginal country before the North. The issue of that prophecy is not quite clear. The downfall of Egypt's power and the loss of her independence for ever in 525 B.C., brought about by Cambyses, are a clear fulfilment. But we do not know of an independent Egyp. kingdom limited to Upper Egypt, except about 200 B.C., when the Egyptians, rebelling against the Greek kings (Ptolemy IV. and V.), held their own in the Thebaid for about 20 years. Ezekiel's words apparently require some less literal interpretation, which we cannot well give in our present state of knowledge. From Pathros the branch of the Egyptians came, called Pathrusim (Gn 10[14], LXX οἱ Παπροσωνιείμ).

PATMOS (Πάτμος). — This island is once mentioned in the Bible, Rev 1[9] 'I John . . . was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ.' Patmos lies off the coast of Asia Minor, in 37° 20′ N. Lat. and 26° 35′ E. Long., and on the map has roughly the shape of a horse's head and neck, the nose pointing eastwards. It is about 10 miles long by N. and S., and 6 broad along its northern end. Its much indented coastline is 37 miles round; according to Pliny, 30 Roman miles. It consists of three main masses of volcanic hills which, at their highest point, Hagios Elias, rise to over 800 ft. In the Middle Ages its palms won it the name of Palmosa, but under Turkish rule its vegetation, trade, and inhabitants have nearly disappeared. The ancient capital occupied an isthmus connecting what are now called the inlets of La Scala and Merika. Its ruins are still visible, and the Cyclopean work of the citadel denotes great antiquity. The chief feature of the modern island is the monastery of St. John, dominating with its battlements the modern town, which lies a mile and a half south of La Scala, the landing-place. This monastery was founded in 1088 under Alexius Comnenus by St. Christodulos. Whether the 'cave of the apocalypse' halfway up the hillside, now shown as the spot at which St. John received his revelation, was already famous before that date, is not known. The monastery contains a poor remnant of the valuable library which was once there. Mai, in his Nova Bibliotheca, VI. ii. p. 537, has published from a Vatican MS a list of the books preserved there in the 13th cent. It was here that the English traveller E. D. Clark purchased of the monks, in Oct. 1814, the great 9th cent. codex of Plato now in the Bodleian. It remains to add that, according to an uncertain tradition preserved in Irenæus, v. 30; Eusebius, HE iii. 18; Hieronymus, de Scr. Ill. c. 9, and others, St. John was exiled to Patmos in the 14th year of the emperor Domitian, and returned thence to Ephesus A.D. 96 under Nerva. A modern traveller, Mr. Theodore Bent, has suggested that the natural scenery of the island determined some features of the imagery of the Apocalypse: a suggestion which Dean Stanley in his Sermons in the East had already made.

F. C. CONYBEARE.

PATRIARCHS.—The discussion of this subject falls naturally into two parts, viz., a few general remarks, and a more detailed examination of the immense age ascribed to the individual members of this class.

i. General Remarks.—When the title 'patriarch' is applied to a biblical character, it is usually understood to mean one of the earliest fathers of the human race, or one of the three great progenitors of Israel, namely, Abraham, Isaac, or Jacob. In the NT it is extended so as to embrace the sons of Jacob (Ac $7^{8.9}$) and David (Ac 2^{29}). The LXX, from which the title comes, favours the less restricted use. At 1 Ch 24^{31} πατριάρχαι (Heb. רָאשֵׁי הָאָבוֹת) are heads of the Levites; at 1 Ch 27^{22} π. τῶν φυλῶν Ἰσ. (שָׂרֵי שִׁבְטֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל) are the chief officials of the kingdom; at 2 Ch 19^{8} τῶν π. Ἰσ. (רָאשֵׁי הָאָבוֹת לְיִשְׂרָאֵל) are leading men, fit to serve as judges; at 2 Ch 23^{20} τοὺς π. (שָׂרֵי הַמֵּאוֹת) are the captains of hundreds; at 2 Ch 26^{12} π. τῶν δυνατῶν (רָאשֵׁי הָאָבוֹת לִגְבּוֹרֵי חַיִל) are officers in Uzziah's army; 4 Mac 7^{19} speaks of οἱ π. ἡμῶν Ἀβ. Ἰσ. Ἰακώβ, and 4 Mac 16^{25} of Ἀβ. καὶ Ἰσ. καὶ Ἰακ., καὶ πάντες οἱ π. In this article we shall not need to say anything about the later patriarchs: for them the articles ABRAHAM, etc., should be consulted. We have to deal only with two classes—the antediluvian patriarchs, and those who are placed between the Flood and the birth of Abraham.

Of the former we possess two lists: a Cainite, in Gn $4^{17.18}$, ascribed to J; and a Sethite, Gn 5^{3-31}, the work of P. They cover the same ground, Lamech being the terminus ad quem in both cases; but the former begins with Cain, the latter with Seth. They run as follows:—

Gn $4^{17.18}$	Gn 5^{3-31}
Cain	Seth
Enoch	Enosh
Irad	Kenan
Mehujael	Mahalalel
Methushael	Jared
Lamech	Enoch
	Methuselah
	Lamech

The editors to whom we owe the Book of Genesis in its present form evidently understood the Lamech of ch. 4 to be the same person as the Lamech of ch. 5. Yet one and the same man cannot have been the descendant in the direct line of two individuals so sharply distinguished from each other as Cain and Seth. And there is a striking similarity between some of the names on the one side and on the other, compelling us to conclude that P altered Irad into Jared, Mehujael into Mahalalel, Methushael into Methuselah. See, further, the separate articles on these names.

The 11th chapter of Genesis carries us from the Flood to the birth of Abraham. MT and Sam. have here a list of nine names: LXX (followed by Lk 3^{36}), obviously for the sake of reaching the number ten, as in Gn 5, inserts Cainan between Arpachshad and Shelah, and attributes to him precisely the same age at the birth of his firstborn and at death as to Shelah. Many of the names in this genealogy have been identified (but see Dillm. ad loc.) as those of localities in Mesopotamia.

There is much to be said for Ryle's conclusion respecting the patriarchs as a whole: 'Perhaps we should not be far wrong in regarding them as constituting a group of demigods or heroes, whose names, in the earliest days of Hebrew tradition, filled up the blank between the creation of man and the age of the Israelite patriarchs. Such a group would be in accordance with the analogy of the primitive legends of other races. The removal of every taint of polytheistic superstition, the presentation of these names as the names of ordinary human beings, would be the work of the Israelite narrator' (Early Narratives of Gen. p. 81). In such purification of derived material we see inspiration at work.

For more particulars see articles ARPACHSHAD, etc.

ii. Longevity of the Patriarchs.—A notable difference between J and P is, that the former (Gn $4^{17.18}$), if he furnishes anything beyond a name, connects with it an interesting statement; whilst the latter (Gn 5. 11) gives the age at which each patriarch begat his firstborn son, and that at which he died. The figures mentioned for the second of these events are so high that, if they had been found anywhere but in the Bible, we should have dismissed them as inventions. We do not trouble to inquire whether the first seven Egyptian kings reigned in all 12,300 years, or whether any credence is due to Ephorus and Nicolaus, who, as Josephus (Ant. I. iii. 9) says, 'relate that the ancients lived a thousand years.' And the attempts hitherto made to vindicate P's numbers are powerless to carry conviction.

There is no sufficient historical evidence to show that in earlier ages or under more favourable conditions human life has been prolonged to anything like 900 years. Delitzsch would have liked to make a point of this, but it is nothing to the purpose when he quotes (New Comm. on Gen. p. 212) Becker's statement that 'a lifetime of 150 is not uncommon in the snow mountains of South Dagestan.' Prichard (Nat. Hist. of Man, p. 653) is inclined to accept Easton's tables, according to which three Europeans have attained the age of between 170 and 180, two between 160 and 170, and so on. Yet, even if this were so, it falls far short of the mark. The human frame, as men have known it in historical times, is not calculated to last 200 years, to say nothing of 900. And there is no more reason for believing that its vigour gradually declined during and after the days of the grey forefathers of the race, than there is for accepting the Talmudic absurdity that the first man reached from earth to heaven, but after his sin the Holy One laid His hands upon him and made him little (Chag. 12*a*). Gn 6^{3b} has been adduced as marking a turning-point at which the deterioration began. But this clause is either a gloss, explanatory of the preceding words (Wellh.), or, more probably, it has been transposed from its original position in the story of the Fall (Budde).

In any case it will not serve the purpose for which it is brought forward. It precedes the account of the Flood. But Gn 11 does not limit the patriarchs after the Flood to 120 years: Shem lives 600 years; Arpachshad, 438, etc.

When it is said that 'the numbers 930, 912, 905, etc., designate epochs of antediluvian history, which are named after their chief representatives' (Del. New Comm. on Gen. p. 213), it must be remembered, on the other hand, that this was not P's meaning. To him Methuselah and the rest were individual men who actually attained the age with which he credits them. And under the same heading of arbitrary attempts to vindicate the trustworthiness of the figures must be classed the suggestion that the year was not one of 12 months' duration, but of 1 or 2 or 3 or 4 or 6. שָׁנָה 'year,' in the Bible, has only one signification, the ordinary one.

Are these desperate attempts necessary? Our answer might conceivably have been in the affirmative if there had been no uncertainty about the numbers themselves. But the three authorities, the MT, the Sam., and the LXX, are hopelessly disagreed. To see this, it needs but a glance at the two following tables, which are reproduced mainly from Holzinger's Gen. pp. 61, 115:—

The slightest inspection of Table I. shows that the discrepancies are not due to accident. The regularity with which the LXX advances the age of the father at the birth of his first son by 100 years betrays purpose. The manipulation of MT and Sam., so that, although they do not agree as to the year after the Creation in which Methuselah died, they yet, both of them, date his death in the year of the Flood, is equally significant. The date of the Flood in MT, 1656, is obtained by adding the remaining 349 years of Noah's life to the 1307 of the Samaritan. Our documentary authorities, therefore, did not pay blind respect to the numbers which they found before them.

Budde (Urgeschichte, ch. iv.), followed by more recent writers, has endeavoured to show that the Sam., by dating the death of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech in the same year as the Flood, meant to imply that they perished in that catastrophe. He also sees in the names of these patriarchs indications of sinfulness and degeneracy. But the etymology is too uncertain to justify the latter inference (see the new Oxford Heb. Lexicon, and also the name list in Ball's Light from the East).

The list in ch. 11 is still more evidently artificial. In all three authorities the purpose is to indicate a gradual diminution of longevity from 600 to 200 years, thus preparing the way for the still shorter lifetime of Abraham and his successors. The LXX, by adding 100 to each of the earlier lives, after the first, makes the slope more gradual. The Sam., by adding 100 to the age at the birth of the firstborn, avoids the startling transition from 100 in Shem's case to 35, 30, etc., in the succeeding ones. This version also, to escape the apparent inconsistency between the supposition that Abraham's begetting a son when 100 years old is a miracle, and the statement that 130 was the ordinary age for this in the preceding cases, has the 79 and 70 of the LXX for Nahor and Terah. As an example of the freedom with which the MT treated this matter, the instance of Terah may be cited. The Sam. gives him 145 years: this would make Abraham leave Haran immediately on his father's death. But Gn 12^{1} relates that Abraham was called to leave his father's house. Hence the 205 years ascribed to Terah in the MT: according to it, Terah survived his son's departure 60 years. Finally, we must note the startling discrepancy between the 290 years of MT, the 940 of Sam., and the 1070 of LXX, as the length of the period from the Flood to the Birth of Abraham.

In endeavouring to account for these extraordinary figures we must never forget that we owe them to P. The earlier documents, J and E, show no trace of anything similar. It is P, too, who attributes to Abraham 175 years, to Isaac 180, to Jacob 147; and, when compelled to limit Moses to 120, seems to think his comparatively early decease requires comment: 'his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated.' The periods determined by such landmarks as Creation, Flood, Birth of Abraham, needed to be filled up. P was especially attracted by names and numbers. The names were supplied by tradition. We have no evidence to prove that a definite number was attached to each of these names. But we do know that in ancient times the belief prevailed that human life had formerly been prolonged far beyond the limits which have since been familiar. Hesiod asserts that in the Silver Age childhood lasted 130 years. A Hebrew prophet (Is 65^{20}), picturing the Messianic future in colours drawn from popular ideas respecting the far-distant past, predicts that 'the child shall die an hundred years old' (on this passage see Expos. Times, Nov. 1899, p. 61).

LITERATURE.—Besides the best Commentaries on Genesis, Budde's Urgeschichte is helpful. See also Ryle's Early Narratives of Genesis, and the art. CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT in the first vol. of this Dictionary. J. TAYLOR.

PATROBAS (Πατρόβας).—The name of a member of the Roman Church greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{14}. It is a shortened form of Patrobius. The name was borne by a well-known freedman of Nerc, who was put to death by Galba (Tac. Hist. i. 49, ii. 95), and occurs in inscriptions (Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 175). Patrobas is commemorated on Nov. 4, and all later legends about him will be found in Acta Sanctorum, Nov., vol. ii. 1, p. 222. A. C. HEADLAM.

PATROCLUS (Πάτροκλος).—The father of the Syrian general Nicanor (2 Mac 8^{9}).

PATTERN.—Various words are so rendered. 1. תַּבְנִית tabhnîth [from bānah, to build], the shape of a thing, elsewhere tr. 'example' or 'ensample,' 'figure,' 'form,' etc., is tr. 'pattern' in Ex. $25^{9\ bis.\ 40}$, Jos 22^{28}, 2 K 16^{10}, 1 Ch $28^{11.\ 12.\ 18.\ 19}$, in reference to the model or idea (lit. 'construction') of the tabernacle, etc. 2. תָּכוּנִית tokhnîth [fr. tākhan, to regulate, adjust, used in Job 28^{25}, Is $40^{12.\ 13}$ of God's work 'in ordering creation by weight or measure'] occurs only in Ezk 28^{12} (of the symmetry or perfection of the prince of Tyre [see Davidson, in loc.], AV and RV 'sum,' RVm 'Or measure, or pattern'), and 43^{10} (of the idea of the temple before building, AV and RV 'pattern,' AVm 'Or sum or number,' RVm 'Or sum'). 3. מַרְאֶה mar'eh [fr. rā'ah, to see], a sight, the appearance of something, is tr. 'pattern' in Nu 8^{4} 'According unto the pattern which the Lord had showed Moses.' 4. ὁμοίωμα [fr. ὅμοιος, ὁμός, similis, same], something made like some other thing, a copy, is in Sir 38^{28} tr. 'pattern,' 'His eyes look still upon the pattern of the thing that he maketh,' Gr. κατέναντι ὁμοιώματος σκεύους. 5. τύπος, which is both the model and 'copy' (see FIGURE, § 3), is tr. 'pattern' in Tit 2^{7} (RV 'ensample'), He 8^{5} (quot. from Ex 25^{40}). The meaning is clearly image, an idea before one in the formation of character (Tit 2^{7}) or of the tabernacle (He 8^{5}), not copy. Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 148, 'There must be much caution used in our imitation of the best patternes, (whether in respect of the persons or things;) else we shall make our selves apes, and our acts sinful absurdities.' 6. ὑποτύπωσις in 1 Ti 1^{16}, AV 'pattern,' RV 'ensample,' but in 2 Ti 1^{13} (its only other occurrence) AV 'form,' RV 'pattern.' It is an outline or sketch under one's eye. 7. ὑπόδειγμα, like τύπος, is used for both the model and the copy, and in the only place where it is rendered 'pattern,' He 9^{23} (as well as in 8^{5}, where it is tr. 'example,' RV 'copy'), the meaning is clearly copy or representation: He 9^{23} 'It was therefore necessary that the patterns (RV 'copies') of things in the heavens should be purified with these but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.' But in 1611 this tr. was quite legitimate, as 'pattern' then was used for both the exemplar and its copy. Trench (On AV of NT, p. 118 f.) denies this; but there are unmistakable examples in Shaks. as well as elsewhere. Thus I Henry VI. v. v. 65—

> 'For what is wedlock forced but a hell,
> An age of discord and continual strife?
> Whereas the contrary bringeth bliss,
> And is a pattern of celestial peace.'

So Othello, v. ii. 11—

> 'Thou cunning'st pattern of excelling nature.'

See also Henry V. II. iv. 61, Lucrece 1350, Lover's Complaint, 170; and cf. Book of Homilies (1573), 'where most rebellions and rebels be, there is the express similitude of hell; and the rebels themselves are the very figures of fiends and devils, and their captain the ungracious pattern of Lucifer and Satan, the prince of darkness.' I. THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL.—1. Birth and Training. 'I am a Jewish man, a Tarsian of Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city (Ac 21[39]) . . . brought up at the feet of Gamaliel in this city [Jerusalem], trained in the strict way of the law of our fathers, full from the first (ὑπάρχων) of zeal for God' (22[3]); 'Whom I serve from my forefathers in a pure conscience' (2 Ti 1[3]); 'Circumcised on the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew sprung from Hebrews, in respect of the law a Pharisee, in respect of zeal a persecutor of the Church, in respect of legal righteousness showing myself blameless' (Ph 3[5. 6], 2 Co 11[22], Ro 4[1] 9[3] 11[1], Ac 23[6]); 'I made proficiency in Judaism beyond many of my contemporaries, being more extreme than they in zeal for my ancestral traditions' (Gal 1[14], Ac 26[4. 5]); at the same time, a 'Roman' and so 'born' (Ac 22[26-28], 16[37]). Thus much we learn from St. Paul about himself. [On the genuineness of the speeches see art. ACTS OF APOSTLES]. Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 5; ad Philem. 23), who knew Palestine, has a tradition that St. Paul was born at Gischala in Galilee, 'quo a Romanis capto cum parentibus suis Tarsum Ciliciæ commigravit'; Krenkel (Beiträge z. Aufhellung d. Geschichte u. d. Briefe d. Ap. P. § 1) prefers this story to the statement of Paul's Tarsian origin in the Acts, insisting that a 'Hebrew sprung from Hebrews' signifies one born in Palestine. The above condition was fulfilled, however, if St. Paul's family retained the native traditions; and Jerome's tale, besides its gross anachronism, is too late and isolated to weigh against that of St. Luke. A modicum of truth there may be in it: Gischala may have been the old domicile of the family (tradition is tenacious on this point), which in any case had emigrated not many generations before Paul's birth, for it was still 'Hebrew' in home-speech and spirit. Hence Saul is sent in his boyhood for education to Jerusalem; in later years he had a 'sister's son' residing there (Ac 23[16-22]). The Cilician Jews kept up a close connexion with the mother city, where they appear to have had a synagogue of their own (Ac 6[9]); they distinguished themselves by patriotic bravery in the siege of Jerusalem. The wealth of Paul's father we may fairly infer from the education given him (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, etc., pp. 31, 310, 312); his occupation as a tent-maker is no disproof of this, for well-to-do Jews wisely taught their sons some handicraft. His mother's piety is implied in Gal 1[14]; comp. the sympathetic allusions of 2 Ti 1[5] 3[15].

He was named Saul (Σαῦλος in Acts where spoken of, Σαούλ where spoken to), presumably after the hero-king of his tribe (Ac 9[1] etc., 13[1] etc.; cf. 13[31]). But his Hebrew name (Σαῦλος has, moreover, in Greek, the ridiculous sense of 'waddling') is displaced in Acts by the Roman cognomen Paul (Παῦλος, Paulus, 'little') from the time the apostle enters on his wider career and meets Roman society. With the Heb.-Rom. Saul-Paul compare John-Mark (Ac 15[37]), Jesus-Justus (Col 4[11]), also Flavius-Josephus. The change of name occurs in Luke's narrative on the occasion of the conversion of Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus—a coincidence suggesting to many, after Origen (Comment. ad Rom., præfat.), Jerome (ad Philem. 1: 'a primo ecclesiæ spolio, proconsule Sergio Paulo, victoriæ suæ trophæa retulit erexitque vexillum'), Augustine (Confess. viii. 4), that St. Paul took his apostolic name from this conquest—a proceeding in bad taste, and on other accounts improbable. If Paulus was a personal name, it might have been due to the bearer's littleness; Saulos perhaps suggested it by resemblance of sound (Renan): so Jesus-Jason, Joseph-Hegesippus, etc. (but these combinations are Heb.-Greek, not Latin). Others explain it as an epithet, self-assumed in humility (cf. 1 Co 15[9]), or conferred by way of contrast with Elymas (Ac 13[8. 9]) overcome by the apostle as Goliath by little David (Lange); or as derived from a Hebrew root—sc. פעל = 'wrought (by God),' or the like. But these conjectures are needless. With his Roman citizenship Paul inherited a Latin name; and Paulus was a cognomen not uncommon in Roman families, borne, e.g., by the great Æmilian gens. What his Roman gentile name (or nomen proper) and prænomen were, never appears. The low stature which, according to good tradition (Acta Pauli et Theclæ, 3; see Ramsay's Ch. in the Rom. Emp.[5] p. 32; cf. 2 Co 10[1. 2. 10]), distinguished Paul, may have been a family trait suggesting the sobriquet, as in other instances. The apostle was 'Paulus' to Romans, Παῦλος amongst Greeks, while he was 'Saul' to his fellow Jews and at Jerusalem. As 'Saul, Saul,' in his mother-speech, the voice of Jesus addressed him (Ac 26[14]). See, further, Ramsay, St. Paul, etc. p. 81 ff.; and Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 184 ff.

In this apostle, Jew, Greek, and Roman met. The Jew in him was the foundation of everything that Paul became. He was 'Jew' (Judæan in nationality and education), 'Israelite' (in descent and creed), 'Hebrew' (in language and tradition). The current Hebrew (i.e. Aramaic) of Palestine was spoken in his father's house; and his student days gave him the mastery of it which enabled him to address the multitude of Jerusalem in their vernacular (Ac 22[2]) and to make himself everywhere 'to the Jews as a Jew' (1 Co 9[20]). His OT quotations, though based on the LXX, occasionally indicate the knowledge of the ancient Hebrew which the pupil of Gamaliel must have possessed. No man more highly prized the privileges of Israel, or more fervently believed in its Divine election (Ro 3[1. 2] 9[4. 5] 11. 15[8], Ph 3[7]); no man more passionately loved his Jewish kin (Ro 9[1-5] 11[14]); none had drunk more deeply at the springs of OT revelation. As a Christian and a Gentile apostle Paul claimed to be the truer Israelite, for he was carrying out 'the promise of God to the fathers' (Ac 13[32. 33] 24[14], Gal 3[7-14] 6[16], 2 Co 11[22], Ro 4[16. 17] 9[4-6] 10[4] 15[8-12]); imprisoned in pursuance of his calling, he was 'wearing this chain for the hope of Israel' (Ac 26[6. 7] 28[20]).

Bearing in his Pharisaic youth all the weight of its yoke, Saul had proved the impotence of the law as a means of justification before God, and the hopelessness of Israel's attempts to win through its observance the Messianic salvation (Ac 13[38. 39], Ro 4[13-15] 7[5-25] 8[3] 9[31]–10[4], Gal 2[15. 16] 3[10-25] 5[2. 3], 1 Co 15[56] etc.). This was the chief gain of Paul's apprenticeship to Mosaism: 'through law I died to law'; the law acted as a relentless spur on Saul's sensitive conscience; it was his παιδαγωγὸς εἰς Χριστόν, driving him from itself to the gospel of Jesus even while, in its fancied interests, he was His persecutor (Ac 26[14]). Thus Paul's legalistic rearing was an essential negative preparation for his conversion and apostleship. But it contributed thereto in a positive sense. At Rabban Gamaliel's feet (see art. GAMALIEL) he learnt much that never left him. Paul's theological method and style, and use of Scripture, are Rabbinical of the purest age. The most fruitful recent expositions of his teaching (such as Sanday-Headlam's Romans, Pfleiderer's Paulinismus,[2] and Kabisch's Eschatologie) draw their best illustrations from Jewish theology. In several of his doctrines, notably that of original sin and of the resurrection (Ac 23[6-9] 24[14. 15] 26[8]), Paul continued a Pharisee. As against the sceptical, minimizing Sadducees, his sympathies were always with his early comrades (Ro 10[2]). He had an intimate knowledge, both practical and theoretical, of the ground of the legalistic controversy, on which he was to play a decisive part. He brought with him to the Christian camp the resources of a trained Jewish jurist, a skilled Rabbinical scholar and disputant. He was the one man qualified to effect the transition in doctrine and institutions from the old faith to the new, to transplant Christianity, without destroying any of its roots, from the ancient soil of Judaism into the wide and rich field ready for it in the Gentile world. This transition had been virtually effected in his own conversion to Christ. Hausrath questions the account in Acts of his studentship under Gamaliel at Jerusalem (Der Ap. Paulus, i. 3), on the ground of Gamaliel's mildness and Paul's severity of temper; but Paul was a zealot, Gamaliel a moderate, by temperament.

St. Paul's education and native bent were strongly Palestinian and Pharisaic. But he could not help acquiring knowledge of the broader Hellenizing theology that had spread from Alexandria amongst the Greek Diaspora, with which Apollos (Ac 18[24]) and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews were imbued. He used freely the Book of Wisdom, which emanated from this school. In Col 1[12-20] (written, however, after Paul had met with Apollos) he shows his mastery of the theosophic speculations of the Alexandrian (and Essenic) Jewish teachers; and his language appears to indicate some literary contact with his elder contemporary Philo (see Lightfoot and Klöpper on Col. ad loc. and Jowett's Essay on 'St. Paul and Philo' in his Epp. of St. Paul). Paul's use of types and allegory may have been learnt from his masters at Jerusalem.

St. Paul's Tarsian birth and Roman citizenship secured to him an outfit for the Gentile apostleship such as no mere Palestinian Jew could possess. When Krenkel (as referred to above) contests the former point, and Hausrath (op. cit. p. 19), with Renan and others, the latter, they show undeserved distrust of the Acts; and they deny to Paul the status and equipment indispensable for his mission to the Græco-Roman world (see Lightf. Bibl. Essays, iv.). Of his Gentile connexions, along with his Jewish antecedents, the apostle was thinking when he spoke of God as 'having marked me out [for my life-mission] from my mother's womb' (Gal 1[15]). The Rabbinical student of Jerusalem was first a Jewish boy in the streets of a heathen city, and his home continued to be there (he was certainly absent from Jerusalem during the visits of Jesus). St. Paul's insight into the moral working of idolatry, and his ready appreciation of Gentile sentiment, speak for this. He is everywhere at home in the synagogues of the Dispersion. In the Græco-Asiatic Tarsus (see art. TARSUS) the products of East and West met, ships of all countries lay at its wharves—a place to stir in an impressionable child thoughts and dreams of the wide world, and to impart an instinctive aptitude for mixing with all sorts of men. In Saul's nature Greek versatility was blended with Jewish tenacity.

Tarsus was the capital of Cilicia, then incorporated in the province of Syria. This city issued fortunately from the troubles of the Roman civil wars, receiving the title of metropolis and the immunities of an urbs libera (Dio Chrys., Orat. 2; Pliny, HN v. 27; cf. Ac 21[39]); it had therefore its ecclesia, its elective magistrates and local jurisdiction; and Paul's father doubtless held the municipal along with the imperial franchise. This environment made Saul a citizen of the world, while he was a Jewish scholar and devotee. His mental imagery is not gathered, like that of Jesus, from the fields and the face of nature; where not borrowed from the OT, we trace it to the Jewish household and synagogue within doors, and out of doors to the streets, the agora, the stadium, the temples, the traffic of a Greek seaport town. Such cities Paul sought by predilection; their society was his native element. The contact of Jew and Gentile gave the apostle his point of vantage; and he found his main constituency in the large circle of piously disposed men and women of Greek culture attracted to the Hellenistic synagogues. Tarsus was at this period a university town of the highest repute (Strabo, xiv. 10. 13–15; Philostratus, Apollonius, i. 7); it sent out distinguished professors of the Stoic philosophy, and afterwards of Roman law. Strict Jewish families held aloof from the Greek schools, and Paul's style bears scarcely any trace of classical discipline; his Greek is the κοινή of the Levantine shores, enriched with Hebraisms of the LXX and the Synagogue and adapted to the new Christian ideas with creative originality. The citations he makes from Greek authors are of a popular, proverbial stamp (Ac 17^{28}, 1 Co 15^{32}, Tit 1^{12}). Passages like 1 Co 1^{20} and Col 2^{8} indicate St. Paul's contempt for the empty sophistic and meretricious show into which philosophy had degenerated. Tarsus was a conspicuous arena for such display, and must often have witnessed scenes resembling that in which Paul himself took so ready a part in Athens (Ac $17^{17ff.}$). At the same time St. Paul could not but receive intellectual stimulus, if only by way of aversion, from such a theatre of mental activity. His master Gamaliel is said to have encouraged Greek studies. Especially when Saul returned home after his conversion (Ac 9^{30} 11^{25}, Gal 1^{21}), with his mission to the heathen definitely in view, we cannot suppose that he failed to use the facilities afforded by his native city for studying the Gentile thought of the day (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 354). His address to the Areopagus shows that the apostle, when he chose, could become a philosopher to the philosophers. The parallels in thought between St. Paul's ethics and those of Seneca and the Stoics (see the Essay ad rem in Lightfoot's Philippians) are, however, scarcely closer than may be accounted for by the Stoical ideas in the air and by the unconscious sympathy with the nascent Christian faith existing in high-minded Gentile thinkers of the age.

In regard to form and expression, it is likely that Paul learnt something from the schools of his native town. 'In general, the Epp. of St. Paul stand much nearer to the forms of the Cynic and Stoic diatribé, as regards their methods and the complexion of their speech, than to the involved Rabbinical dialectic. Recent investigations on the subject (Wendland u. Kern, Beiträge z. Geschichte d. griech. Philos. u. Relig. pp. 3–75, Philo u. d. kynisch-stoische Diatribe) bring this relationship increasingly into light': so Heinrici, Vorrede to 1 Co in Krit.-exeg. Kommentar[8] (Meyer); also Canon Hicks' Paper on 'St. Paul and Hellenism' in Stud. Bibl. iv.

From Tarsus Paul carried off, if not a scholarly Greek training, at least his trade of tent-making (Ac 18^{3}). Tarsus was a centre for the manufacture of cilicium, the coarse goats' hair fabric of the district, famed for its durability, of which shoes, mats, and coverings of all kinds were made; and the boy Saul was taught this local handicraft. An industry everywhere in demand, this craft supplied him in his wandering apostleship with a means of livelihood, laborious and irksome enough, but adequate for his scanty needs (1 Th 2^{9}, 2 Th 3^{8-10}, 1 Co 9^{6-18} etc.). 'These hands,' as Paul held them up, rough and black with stitching at the hard canvas, told their tale of stern independence and self-denial (Ac 20^{33-35}).

Of Roman law Paul had the knowledge qualifying him to exercise his valued rights as a citizen of the Empire. This discipline contributed to his large Christian apprehension of 'law' as a universal Divine institute, which has its nearest analogue in the Roman jus gentium. His prominent doctrine of Adoption (υἱοθεσία) is based upon Græco-Roman, not Jewish practice. His conception of the Church borrowed something from the Roman State as well as from the Israelite Theocracy (see Eph 2^{19}, Col 2^{19}, Ph 1^{27} 3^{20}). Not merely for his own protection (Ac 16^{37} 22^{25}) and as a passport to his message did the apostle pronounce the words 'Civis Romanus sum' and 'Cæsarem appello,' but with genuine loyalty and with a true sense for the grandeur and enduring power of the rule of Rome. 'We cannot fail to be struck with the hold which Roman ideas had on the mind of St. Paul. . . . He had conceived the great idea of Christianity as the religion of the Roman world; and he thought of the various districts and countries in which he preached as parts of the grand unity' (Ramsay, Ch. in the Rom. Emp.[5] pp. 147, 148, St. Paul the Trav. pp. 125–127, 135; also Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. xiv). He had the Roman genius of the statesman and organizer. He planted his churches, by preference, in Roman colonies (Pisidian Antioch, Philippi, Corinth, etc.). To Rome St. Paul addressed his most studied and complete Epistle; toward this metropolis of the world the advance of his mission from Jerusalem westwards, for many years previously, had been directed (Ro 1^{8-15} 15^{22-29}, Ac 19^{21} 23^{11}). Only when at last he had made his defence and delivered his message before the Imperial Court, could the 'teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth' consider that his 'preaching was fulfilled' and his course finished (1 Ti 2^{7}, 2 Ti $4^{7.17}$). To the Jewish student and the Greek cosmopolitan in Paul there was added the Roman gentleman. His courteous dignity of bearing enabled him worthily to stand before magistrates and kings (Ac 9^{15} 26, etc.). He commanded the respect of governors like Sergius Paulus and Porcius Festus, and the deference and goodwill of Julius the centurion in whose charge he voyaged to Rome. There, too, an 'ambassador in chains,' he gained a wide influence, and his presence greatly stimulated the Christian cause (Eph 6^{20}, Ph 1^{13} 4^{22}, Ac $28^{30.31}$). Though his prison, Rome was his best vantage-ground and his adoptive home. It was here that the apostle arrived, as appears from the Epistles of the First Captivity, at his loftiest conceptions of the nature and destiny of the Universal Church.

2. St. Paul's Idiosyncrasy.—The 'striking originality' of Paul's character is 'due to the fruitful combination in it of two spiritual forces, which are seldom found united in this degree in one personality—dialectical power and religious inspiration, or (to borrow Paul's own language) the activity of the νοῦς and that of the πνεῦμα' (A. Sabatier). Add to these attributes the apostle's heart of fire, the glow of passion and imagination which fused his mystical intuitions and logical apprehensions into one, his fine sensibility, his resolute will, his manly sincerity and courage and woman-like tenderness, his vivacity, subtlety, and humour, his rich humanity and keen faculty of moral observation, his adroitness and ready tact, his genius for organization and inborn power of command, and the vigorous and creative, though not facile, gift of expression that supplied the fitting dress, as original as the thought behind it, with which his doctrine clothed itself,—all these qualities and powers went to the making of Jesus Christ's apostle to the nations, the master-builder of the universal Church and of Christian theology.

St. Paul's physical frame appears by no means to have matched the greatness of his soul. With a frankness that charms while it pains the reader, he quotes the taunt of his Corinthian opponents, 'His bodily presence is weak, and his speech of no account'; he reproaches those who 'counted of' him 'as though walking according to flesh,' and 'had an eye for matters of (bodily) presence,' judging the lowly apostle by his unimposing exterior (2 Co 10^{1-10}). The barbarians of Lystra took Barnabas for Zeus, but Paul for Hermes, comparing the dignified port of the one with the lively speech of the other traveller. The disadvantages of his bodily presence were aggravated by the effect of his occupation as a journeyman tentmaker, and of the severe mishandling he had suffered from time to time on the part of his persecutors (Gal 6^{17}, 2 Co 11^{23-26}). Yet these physical disabilities and humiliations became, through 'the power of Christ overshadowing' him, a new source of spiritual strength (2 Co 11^{30} $12^{9.\ 10}$). It was a constant feeling of Paul's, only heightened by recent illness, to which he gave expression in 2 Co 4^{7}–5^{5}: 'We have this treasure in frail earthen vessels. . . . In this tabernacle we groan, being burdened' (cf. Gal 4^{12-14} 6^{17}). The Acta Pauli et Theclæ, as Ramsay has shown (Ch. in Rom. Emp.[5] xvi.), 'goes back ultimately to a document of the 1st cent.'; and it thus describes (§ 3) Paul's appearance as he first approaches Iconium: 'bald-headed, bowlegged, strongly built, a man small in size, with meeting eyebrows, with a rather large nose, full of grace, for at times he looked like a man and at times he had the face of an angel.' 'This plain and unflattering account seems to embody a very early tradition' (op. cit. pp. 31, 32). The lifelike and unconventional figure of the Roman ivory diptych, 'supposed to date not later than the 4th cent.' (Lewin's Life and Epp. of St. Paul, Frontispiece, and vol. ii. p. 211), partly confirms the above description.

St. Paul's constitution, if somewhat stunted and sickly, must have been nevertheless of a tough and stout fibre. His arduous travels, attended for many years with the double strain of manual and intellectual labour, above all the catalogue of his hardships in 2 Co 11, bespeak in him a man of exceptional vitality and nervous energy. And, in spite of his uncomeliness, he exerted a rare personal fascination. 'Rude in speech' as he was to a fastidious Greek ear, his charm of manner and the incisive force and sympathetic aptness of his address commanded a hearing from all kinds of assemblies. He could never be listened to with indifference. His preaching excited warm assent or contradiction. He set all minds astir and in debate around him; his presence and discourse acted like an electric current that drives to opposite poles the mingled elements through which it passes (Ac 13^{42-45} 14^{4} etc., 2 Co 2^{14-16}).

The emotional nature of the apostle counted for as much in the effects of his eloquence as did his intellectual powers. His temperament was choleric and impetuous, his nervous organism finely strung and quivering with sensibility. There was nothing in him of the impassive Stoic. His affections towards his converts were those of a mother or a lover, rather than of a pastor. He 'travailed a second time in birth over' the untoward Galatians, 'till Christ should be formed in' them (4^{19}; cf. 2 Co 11^{29}, 1 Th $2^{7.\ 8}$). 'Now we live,' he writes to the Thess., 'if you stand fast in the Lord' (1 Th 3^{6-10}). The attacks of sickness and the anxieties and disappointments of his calling threw him at times into paroxysms of anguish. But his mental buoyancy and elasticity were equally marked; his 'consolation through Christ' brought him an exultancy proportioned to the depth of grief in which he shared 'the sufferings of Christ' (1 Co 2^{3} $15^{31.\ 32}$, 2 Co 1^{3-11} 4^{7-11} 7^{4-6}, Col 1^{24}, Eph 3^{13}, Ph $2^{17.\ 18}$). His letters—esp. 2 Co, Gal, Ph, 2 Ti—reflect the ardour and quick responsiveness of the apostle's feelings, his sudden alternations of mood, the conflicts of fear and hope, of affection and indignation, by which his soul could be torn and tossed. This lively play of emotion, expressed by look and gesture (e.g. Ac 13^{9} 14^{12-14} 20^{34} 23^{1-6} 26^{1}, Gal 3^{1}, Ph 3^{18}, etc.) but held under the firm control of judgment, gave a peculiar animation to Paul's discourse, which, however abrupt and unpolished in phrase, was arresting and affecting in the highest degree. He spoke from the heart and to the heart. The effectiveness of his utterance he ascribed to the energy of the Spirit of Christ possessing his mind; he was conscious of 'Christ speaking' in him; a Divine force 'energized mightily' through his 'wrestling' of spirit and of speech (2 Co 13^{3}, Col 1^{29}, 1 Th 1^{5}, etc.). Here was the true secret of St. Paul's transcendent power. Before everything else he was a πνευματικός—a man of the largest spiritual capacity, filled with the living Spirit of Jesus Christ. If we must admit a fault, his vehemence was apt to break out into a heat and haste of temper, manifested occasionally in expressions which he was disposed afterwards to regret (see Ac 15^{39} $23^{4.\ 5}$; and perhaps 2 Co $7^{8.\ 9}$, Gal 5^{12}).

St. Paul shared eminently in the supernatural experiences and χαρίσματα special to the apostolic age, as well as in the permanent and normal endowments of the Church. He exercised miraculous powers of healing and of discipline (Ac 13^{9-11} $14^{9.\ 10}$, 1 Co 4^{19-21} $5^{4.\ 5}$, 2 Co 13^{1-10}), though he did not regard these as the chief 'signs of the apostle' (2 Co $11^{23ff.}$ 12^{12-14} 3^{1-3}). He 'spoke with tongues more than all,' but thought this an inferior gift (1 Co 14^{18-20}). In 'visions and revelations of the Lord' no one could rival him (2 Co 12^{1-4}); he had been once 'caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words.' To Paul the living God, the Lord Christ, the indwelling Spirit, the unseen world, were immediate and overwhelming realities.

His thorn in the flesh (or rather, thorn for the flesh, σκόλοψ τῇ σαρκί) is connected by himself with his unique experiences of trance and vision (2 Co 12^{1-9}). The former served as a kind of counterpoise to the latter: 'Because of the excess of the revelations, that I might not be excessively lifted up, there was given to me a thorn for my flesh, an angel of Satan sent to buffet me,—that I might not be excessively lifted up.' We gather that this infliction was bodily in nature, acutely painful and humiliating, prostrating in effect, and repeated in occurrence (ὑπεραίρωμαι and κολαφίζῃ are both Greek presents of recurrent action); that it was also mysterious in origin, and such as to be fitly associated with the working of a malignant unseen power. From the connexion of v.[7] with the foregoing context, it appears probable that the outbreak of this malady attended Paul's supreme vision, 'fourteen years' previously to 2 Co (i.e. about A.D. 43), when in a state of trance (vv.[2. 3]) he was 'seized and caught up into paradise and heard unspeakable words.' The 'thorn' attached itself to this 'ὑπερβολή of the revelations' (cf. Gn $32^{30.\ 31}$), in which the apostle 'exults' as he writes, and which, he feels, might otherwise have excited him to an unholy pride; this cruel affliction was therefore used by God for a merciful end. Hence the Lord, though thrice besought, did not remove the evil; He allowed 'Satan's angel' 'to buffet' His servant; but He promised grace sufficient for endurance, and assured the sufferer that 'power is perfected in weakness.' Thus Paul learnt to glory in this as in other weaknesses and injuries, and had indeed found himself strongest when nature was most beaten down (vv.[9. 10]).

Further light is thrown on St. Paul's malady by Gal 4[13-15], for it is probably the same affliction that we meet with here: 'In nought did you (Galatians) wrong me. But you know it was due to an infirmity of the flesh that I preached to you at that former time. And your temptation in my flesh (my physical condition) you did not treat with contempt nor loathing [lit. did not spit out], but as an angel of God you received me,—as Christ Jesus! Where, then, is your self-gratulation? For I bear you witness that, if possible, you would have dug out your eyes and given them me!' The 'thorn,' then, was disabling; it compelled Paul unexpectedly to halt on his way, and so to preach to these 'Galatians' (but see Ramsay's view of the circumstances, stated below). Its effects were such as to excite the scorn and aversion of beholders, so that it supplied a severe test of the candour and generosity of the Galatians who had witnessed Paul's abject condition under its infliction. It may also be inferred, though less certainly (see Lightfoot, ad loc.), that the complaint, at least temporarily, affected the patient's eyesight.

The diagnosis excludes—(1) the hypothesis of spiritual temptations (to pride, blasphemy, etc., injectiones Satanæ) made current by Luther; and (2) equally that of carnal incitements, favoured by mediæval and Roman Catholic interpreters in accordance with the erroneous Latin rendering, stimulus carnis. (3) Nor could the 'thorn' have signified human opposers, such as the 'ministers of Satan' of 2 Co 11[15]; nor the hindrances and afflictions related in 2 Co 11[23-33] (Chrysostom, Erasmus, and others). (4) The evidence points to physical disease of some distressing and disfiguring kind, recurrent at intervals, having its seat in St. Paul's nervous constitution and supervening upon the ecstasy of his 'visions and revelations' (so Ewald, Holsten, v. Hofmann, Klöpper, Lightfoot, Schniedel, Krenkel). Of known diseases, epilepsy, or some obscure form of hysteria, best answers to these conditions. Krenkel has elaborately discussed the question in his Beiträge (pp. 47–125), showing that epilepsy was regarded by the ancients with peculiar horror as a supernatural visitation, and often associated with lunacy (Mt 4[24] 17[15]), with which also Paul was taxed (2 Co 5[13] 12[11]). He observes, further, that spectators witnessing epileptic attacks used to spit out in superstitious dread and by way of averting the evil (the morbus qui sputatur of Plautus' Captivi, III. iv. 18, and the despui suetus of Pliny's HN x. 23 [33])—a circumstance explaining the οὐδὲ ἐξεπτύσατε of Gal 4[14]. Epileptic seizures taking place in mature life and at distant intervals are not necessarily fatal to activity and mental vigour: witness the cases of Julius Cæsar, Peter the Great, Napoleon I.; the instance of king Alfred (Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 183–188) is strikingly parallel in some particulars to that of Paul. The hypothesis of ophthalmia (advanced in Farrar's St. Paul, vol. i. Excursus x.) has its starting-point in Gal 4[15]; it meets some but not all the conditions of the case. This disease, in the severe form supposed, damages the eyes to a degree inconsistent with Paul's quick observation and powerful gaze. W. M. Ramsay has recently suggested malarial fever (comp. Conyb. and Hows. Life and Epp. of St. Paul, ch. viii.), which (Ramsay conjectures) attacked Paul in Pamphylia (Ac 13[13. 14]), compelling Barnabas and himself to seek relief in the bracing air of the uplands of Asia Minor. To this necessity Ramsay supposes Paul to refer in Gal 4[13], on the theory that the 'Galatians' of the Ep. are the South Galatians of Antioch, Iconium, etc. (Ch. in Rom. Emp.[5] iii., St. Paul the Trav. v. 2, and more recently in Hist. Com. on Gal., 1899, p. 422 ff.). This hypothesis, again, agrees with some but not all the symptoms of the malady. A long and perilous journey, like that from Perga to Pisidian Antioch, would scarcely be undertaken in such 'weakness of the flesh.' Nor is malarial fever likely to have excited the aversion indicated in Gal 4[14]. And Mark's desertion, under these circumstances, becomes almost incredibly base. The references of Tertullian, and other early interpreters, to violent headache and similar complaints are in the right direction, but inadequate. They may be an echo of the earliest tradition. If the apostle's liability to nervous disorders supplies unfriendly critics with a ground on which to discredit his visions and his Divine inspiration, these disparagements are but a repetition of those made in his lifetime. The fact that his malady exposed St. Paul's apostleship to this reproach, gave a cruel and piercing sharpness to the 'thorn.' So much the more perfect was the triumph of Christ's grace in this deeply wounded man.

3. St. Paul's Conversion.—The interest of St. Paul's life centres in his conversion to the faith of Jesus Christ. The root of his doctrine is also here. This was the most pregnant event of apostolic history; it is more fully related in the NT than any other outside of the Gospels. It was one of those lightning strokes occurring at decisive moments in the advance of revelation, which precipitate the issue of a long course of previous spiritual development, and liberate new forces for operation in some new era of the kingdom of God. The call of Saul of Tarsus to His service by the risen Jesus, while it put a last seal, from the hand of one hitherto His bitter enemy, to the testimony concerning His resurrection and exaltation (1 Co 15[5-11]), supplied the starting-point for a fresh departure in the dispensation of the gospel (Eph 2[7], 1 Ti 1[16]). In the soul of the converted Saul a world-wide revolution lay germinally hidden. In his mind the Christian principle, the λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ, first displayed its full significance; in him Christ appropriated that 'chosen vessel' through which His gospel was to work out its largest intellectual and social results, the instrument whereby the society of Jesus was to be expanded from a Jewish Messianic sect into the Church of the nations, coextensive with the Roman Empire and set on its way to re-create the civilized world.

Saul's conversion took place in a fashion befitting its historical importance. The passionate young Pharisee had witnessed with approval the stoning of Stephen, whose radical and incisive preaching recalled the tones of Jesus and reawakened the deadly fear and hatred of the Pharisees toward His doctrine. The struggle between the followers of Jesus and the existing Judaism, as Saul truly saw, was one of life and death. The mild policy of his master Gamaliel had allowed this monstrous imposture, this proclamation of a crucified Messiah and pretended Son of God, to make dangerous headway. The heresy must be trampled out at any cost. In this conviction Saul was 'breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord.' He acted 'ignorantly, in unbelief,' out of a sincere and uncompromising zeal for God, and doing violence therein to his kindlier feelings. The Jewish ecclesiastical leaders found in Saul, thus disposed, their fit agent in the attempt they made after the murder of Stephen, and at a moment when political circumstances gave them a free hand, to suppress the sect of the Nazarenes. Saul was travelling to Damascus, commissioned by the high priest, to bring as prisoners to Jerus. any that he should there find 'of that way'; he was nearing the city about noonday, bent on harrying its defenceless Christian flock, when he was arrested by a burst of light 'surpassing the brightness of the sun,' that encircled his troop. Out of the blaze there appeared a glorious human Form, who at his challenge declared Himself to be 'Jesus, whom thou persecutest!' The sequel of the story we need not repeat. It is told three times in the Acts: once by the historian on his own account (9^{1-16}), and twice as reported from Paul's speeches—to the people at Jerus. (22^{4-16}), and before king Herod Agrippa II. and Festus at Cæsarea (26^{9-18}). The variation of the three narratives is interesting as showing how much difference in descriptive detail was deemed consistent with identity of fact by a careful writer like St. Luke. The only real discrepancy lies in St. Paul's omission in Ac 26 of the part of Ananias, on which he naturally dwelt in addressing the Jews (22). In the later address, speaking more summarily, he ascribes to Jesus directly, and as though communicated at the outset, the revelations consequent upon 'the heavenly vision.' Vv.$^{10-21}$ of ch. 9 appear to embody Ananias' account, which Luke would be sure to obtain (comp. Lk 1^{3}) if within his reach. The train of events is most vividly reproduced in Paul's unfinished speech at Jerus. (ch. 22), the objectivity of the appearance of Jesus and the overpowering compulsion that it exercised upon Saul's mind being asserted with strong emphasis (esp. vv.$^{14.\ 15}$). Here alone the two questions addressed by Saul to Jesus are reported. In his speech at Cæsarea the apostle brings out the startling and complete reversal effected in his conduct; to this account we owe also the statement that Jesus spoke in 'the Hebrew language,' and the significant sentence, 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad(s)' (words which do not belong to the true text of Ac 9^{5}).

The Epp. furnish many instructive references to Paul's conversion. In 1 Co 9^{1} his apostolic office (resembling that of the Twelve, v.^{5}) is grounded on the fact that he 'has seen Jesus our Lord.' Indeed, Paul claims to be a witness of Christ's resurrection in the same sense as were those who saw Him during the forty days, and the last of such witnesses, his birth into faith and apostleship, notwithstanding its abnormality and his unworthiness, being therefore as valid in itself as it was justified by its results (15^{5-9}). In the latter passage we see the humiliating aspect of St. Paul's conversion; in 2 Co 4^{4-6} and 5^{16-19}, its splendour. God's creative fiat bade 'the illumination of the knowledge of His glory' shine through Saul's blinded eyes into his dark and bitter heart, 'in the face of Christ' disclosed amid 'the glory of that light' (Ac 22^{11}). There arose 'a new creation' resembling that which attended the word, 'Let there be light.' Paul was at the same instant 'reconciled to God' and received a 'ministry of reconciliation' for the world (2 Co $5^{18.\ 19}$). Gal 1^{11-17} shows him intent on proving his independent apostleship: his knowledge of Jesus Christ and his commission to preach Him to the Gentiles were derived, he asserts, at first hand from the Lord Himself, and at a time when his relations with the Church at Jerusalem had been only those of the persecutor. To no human mediation or indoctrination did he owe his 'gospel' (comp. 1^{1}); 'Jesus Christ' personally 'revealed' it to him (v.^{12}). The sight of the risen Jesus, allowed to Saul by the mercy of God, 'revealed in' him 'the Son of God,' his own and the world's Lord and Redeemer (vv.$^{15.\ 16}$). This vision gave Saul the purport of his message to the Gentiles, impressing upon this message a special Divine stamp and authority that raised him above the need and the wish to 'confer' in respect to it 'with flesh and blood.' Hence upon his conversion he did not follow the natural course of repairing to Jerusalem in order to seek the recognition and instruction of the heads of the Church there, but 'went off into Arabia,' where he remained for some time in comparative solitude (vv.$^{17.\ 18}$). In this connexion Paul speaks of the Twelve as 'the apostles before me,' since the manner of his call put him on an equality with them as one commissioned by Jesus Christ in person; for he had 'seen Jesus our Lord' in His visible human form, and had 'heard'—no mere spiritual call such as every servant of Christ hears—but 'a word from His mouth' (Ac 22^{14}). In this sense he introduces himself to the Romans (1^{1-5}) as 'a bondman of Jesus Christ, a called apostle, one separated [marked off from others by his call] to proclaim God's good news about His Son.' It is noticeable that in the Address both of Romans and Galatians, where Paul reminds himself of the unique character of his apostleship, he speaks with emphasis of the resurrection of Christ, for it was the risen Saviour the sight of whom had changed everything for him. 'The glory of that light' reflects itself in many passages of St. Paul's letters,—2 Th 1^{9-11} 2^{8}, 1 Co 15^{44-49} ('the image of the Heavenly One'), Ro $8^{18.\ 29}$, 1 Ti $6^{15.\ 16}$, 2 Ti $1^{10.\ 11}$; and especially Ph $3^{20.\ 21}$ ('the body of His glory'). Often, and more feelingly as time goes on, he dilates on the astonishing grace of God that called him, a violent enemy of the gospel, to be its bearer to all nations,—Gal $1^{13.\ 14.\ 23.\ 24}$, 1 Co $15^{9.\ 10}$, Eph 3^{7-13}, 1 Ti 1^{11-17}, etc.

While miraculous in the means that effected it, Paul's conversion was no act of violence. There was an inward preparation for the revelation of Jesus, which brought to its issue a long struggle in the nature of Saul, and opened the door of escape from a moral situation that had become miserable beyond endurance to the proud and strict young Pharisee. The words of Jesus, 'Hard is it for thee to kick against the goad(s),' touched the secret of the hearer's heart. The 'goad' of Ac 26^{14} is the pædagogus and prison-keeper of Gal 3, 'the law' of Ro 3. 4. 7 that 'works out wrath,' 'the power of sin' of 1 Co 15^{56},—that, good in itself, supplied to sin the instrument by which it 'wrought out death' to Saul, setting his reason and flesh at internecine war. Fiercely as Saul attacked the name of the Nazarene, he carried a more devouring strife within his breast. That Judaic law which he strove to honour by extirpating its contemners, through its impracticable yet most just demands was meanwhile driving him, though he knew it not, into their ranks.* Such was the irony of the situation revealed by this illuminating word of Jesus. St. Paul's subsequent doctrine of the impotence of the moral law as a means of salvation is the transcript of this experience. As he rode to Damascus, Saul was labouring under the painfully suppressed conviction of his powerlessness, and the powerlessness of his people, to fulfil the legal righteousness and therefore to attain the Messianic salvation which depended, he believed, upon this one condition. This inward rage made him a more furious persecutor. He was 'kicking against' a 'goad' which wounded his soul; he was fighting down his secret misgivings respecting Judaism. Until this moment, however, Saul had no suspicion that the Nazarenes were in the right. The crucifixion had falsified the

* The interpretation here given to the words πρὸς κέντρα λακτίζειν, reads more into the figure than is usual; but this fuller meaning appears to be forced upon us by the data of the Epp., the main doctrines of which are a product and reflex of the writer's vital experience. Paul's teaching on the Law and Faith rehearses the process that turned him from a Pharisee into a Christian. His soul had been pierced and lacerated by his sense of moral impotence in face of the Law. Like a stupid beast, Saul knew not whither this incessant goad was driving him, nor whose was the hand that plied it; he had struggled in wild and vain resistance, till the appearance and words of Jesus explained everything.

Messianic claims of Jesus; it proved Him a blasphemer in calling Himself 'the Son of God.' To the testimony for His resurrection Saul's mind was as completely closed, on a priori grounds, as that of many able and sincere men to-day. He had never met Jesus during His earthly life, or he would have thought of Him differently. (The words of 2 Co 5[16] signify, 'We have known a carnal Messiah'). Had Saul so heard or seen Him, this fact would have aggravated the guilt of his persecution; and he would surely have alluded to it in his later poignant confessions. In the words of 1 Ti 1[13], 'not knowing (Him),' he 'acted in unbelief.' A 'blasphemer, persecutor, injurer' of his Lord, Saul was an object of pity for this reason; pity, not anger, spoke in the voice of Jesus. He had not sinned against the light. He testifies before Agrippa, 'I verily thought with myself that it was my duty to do many things against the name of Jesus of Nazareth' (Ac 26[9]). The speech of Stephen and the confessions and bearing of the persecuted Christians, though raising many questions in Saul's mind, had not seriously shaken his conviction of the falsity and banefulness of their doctrine. Had Saul before his vision of Jesus, as Holsten and others suppose, been so wrought upon by contact with his Christian prisoners that he was half persuaded to join them; had the predisposition to faith in the Nazarene grown up within him beforehand and seized his heart so strongly, at the time of his journey to Damascus, that it was ready upon a nervous shock to project itself in the form of an apparition,—had such an incipient reverence for Jesus and a secret attraction to the persecuted cause arisen in him, the persecutor would have been disarmed. On the contrary, 'Saul was breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord' up to the moment of his arrest; he acted throughout with a single mind. The mental elements out of which a self-generated vision of the glorified Jesus might conceivably have been formed, the material for such a hallucination, were wanting in him at that period. Instead of being preoccupied by the reproachful image of Jesus, Saul was confounded at His appearance, and the current of his opinions and feelings toward Him was reversed. He knew himself to be a sinful man; but that the crucified Nazarene would be his Saviour was an idea altogether alien and repugnant to his thoughts. The knowledge Saul had gained of Christianity and Christians in the office of a persecutor explains the enthusiasm of his revulsion and the readiness with which he fell into rank when once he had changed sides, but it does not account for the interior change itself, which was unique in its conditions and antecedents, differing from all transformations of character brought about by human influences and subjective reflexion. The latter explanation the apostle formally repudiates (Gal 1[11. 12]). See McGiffert's Hist. of Christianity in the Apost. Age, p. 121 ff.

The conversion of Saul is a psychological and ethical problem, the solution of which is to be found only in the actual appearance of Jesus Christ to his senses on the way to Damascus, as he believed this to have taken place. Nothing but his certainty of that appearance could have convinced him that Jesus was raised from the dead, and was therefore the Messiah and the Son of God. Nothing but the fact itself can, under the circumstances, fairly account for his certainty. This first vision is put, by himself and by St. Luke, upon a footing quite distinct from the other 'visions and revelations of the Lord' about which he glories in 2 Co 12. There was no question in this case as to whether he was 'in the body or out of the body.' The revelation took place in broad daylight, on the highway, as Saul was journeying with limbs and senses in full exercise, and his mind intent on a purpose diametrically opposed to the obedience of faith in Jesus; and some of the phenomena attending it were sensible to others besides himself. The ablest attempt to explain the vision of Saul on naturalistic grounds still remains that made by Holsten in his Essay entitled 'Die Christusvision des Paulus' (Zum Evangelium d. Paulus u. Petrus, 1868); see also his Das Evang. d. Paulus dargestellt (1880).

For three days Saul remained at Damascus as a man stunned by a sudden, heavy blow. His world of thought was turned upside down by the discovery that 'this Jesus' was, after all, 'the Son of God.' A silent and profound revolution was going on in the persecutor's breast; God was 'revealing His Son within' him. At the end of this time the penitent was prepared to welcome Ananias, who gave him the assurance of forgiveness and the right hand of Christian fellowship. By the seal of baptism and the bestowment of the Holy Spirit he became a member of the Church; and Ananias' prophecy opened to him the prospect of his missionary calling. For 'some days' he stayed 'with the disciples in Damascus,' and made public his conversion by 'immediately proclaiming in the synagogues that this Jesus is the Son of God' (Ac 9[19. 20]). Saul felt the need, however, of retirement to collect his mind after so bewildering a shock, to think out his new position and the import of his strange experiences. It is thus we understand the retreat to Arabia, to which the apostle refers in Gal 1[16-18]. St. Luke may have omitted this episode, because it belonged to St. Paul's private life; it falls between vv.[21. 22] of Ac 9. V.[20] relates the simple declaration of faith in Jesus that followed 'immediately' on Paul's conversion, while v.[22] shows us the apostle in possession of a developed faith and working out, in the manner to which we become afterwards accustomed, a sustained and effective proof of the Messiahship of Jesus: 'Saul grew the more strong, and confounded the Jews that dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the Christ.' From his Arabian meditations he had gathered this new force; and the powerful arguments he now brings to bear upon his old position were the fruit of a prolonged reflexion.

4. St. Paul's Missionary Career.—Ac 9[15. 16] and 26[16-18] distinctly state that Saul's vocation as Gentile apostle was revealed at the epoch of his conversion. Gal 1[15. 16] implies as much. Saul went into Arabia with the knowledge that his ultimate destination was to 'preach the Son of God amongst the Gentiles.' Failure amongst his fellow-countrymen quickened this conviction. His Gentile ministry had its root in his first experience of the grace of Christ. Yet he thought it his duty to 'begin from Jerusalem'; his witness, he imagined, would be especially convincing amongst his old comrades; so that on his escape from the plots of the Jews against his life in Damascus (2 Co 11[32. 33]) Saul returned to the Holy City, where 'he preached boldly in the name of the Lord; and he spake and disputed against the Hellenist Jews; but they went about to kill him' (Ac 9[29. 30]). It was then, rather than at any later time, that the trance befell him in the temple, when the Lord bade him 'Make haste, and get quickly out of Jerusalem,' since his testimony was rejected there and his mission was to lie 'far hence among the Gentiles' (Ac 22[17-21]). This vision confirmed Saul's primary call, and overcame his reluctance to accept defeat at Jerusalem. He stayed in the city, on this first visit after his conversion, only 'fifteen days'; and now 'made the acquaintance of Cephas'—of him only amongst the apostles—and of 'James the Lord's brother' (Gal 1[18. 19]). Ac 9[26-30] relates further that 'Barnabas introduced him to the apostles' (the plural is inexact; Peter and James represented the Twelve), standing sponsor for him. 'The disciples' were shy of their old tormentor; his disappearance from Damascus and the delay of his return had probably aggravated their suspicions. It did not take long for Saul's preaching to rouse the hatred of the murderers of Stephen, who looked on him as a traitor. The urgency of 'the brethren' seconded the command of the Lord in the temple vision, and Saul was 'brought down to Cæsarea, and sent forth (by ship) to Tarsus.' Saul had little opportunity during the fortnight to make acquaintance amongst the Christian community in and around Jerus.; 'and,' he says, 'I remained unknown by face to the Churches of Judæa that are in Christ. Only they heard from time to time that our former persecutor is now preaching the faith of which he once made havoc' (Gal 1^{22-24}).

(a) With his arrival at Tarsus, in the second or third year after his conversion ('after three years,' Gal 1^{18}, reckoning by years current), St. Paul's missionary activity properly begins,—when he 'came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia' (v.^{21}: Cilicia was a dependency of Syria; and Paul here includes his whole ministry up to the time of the Jerusalem Council, 2^{1}). This first period, of more retired and preparatory labour, extended from the year 37 A.D., or thereabouts, to 44,* when Barnabas summoned Saul to assist him at Antioch (Ac $11^{25.\ 26}$). It was a seven years' apprenticeship for the Gentile apostle. The language of Gal 1, and the reference of Ac 15^{23} to 'the brethren from among the Gentiles throughout Cilicia,' as well as 'Antioch and Syria,' imply that numerous Churches were formed during this period in Saul's native province. St. Paul's work in his homeland, however, lay outside that main course of the Church's development which Luke made it his business to sketch; and we have no letters from him to Cilicia. But these apprentice years served important ends, in ripening St. Paul's convictions, maturing his plans, and giving him mastery of the weapons of spiritual warfare that he was to ply upon a larger field. Independently, under no human master, he learnt his business as a missionary to the heathen. Over his relations to his family at Tarsus a veil is drawn; but it seems unlikely that Paul would have stayed in this district so long had those relations been altogether hostile (cf. Ac 23^{16}).

(b) The second stage of St. Paul's ministry begins with his removal to Antioch under the auspices of Barnabas, who had been now for some years superintending the Church of the Syrian capital, to which he was despatched from Jerusalem under the circumstances related in Ac 11^{19-24}. Shortly before the summons to Antioch, Paul experienced the extraordinary vision referred to in 2 Co 12^{2-4}. By the side of Barnabas, Saul took a commanding position in this metropolitan Church, next in importance to that of Jerusalem, planted in the third city of the Empire, the place where 'the disciples were first called Christians.' Along with Barnabas he was sent, a year after his arrival, to convey the alms of the Antiochene Christians to their needy brethren in Judæa, who were threatened by famine (Ac 11^{27-30}). When this 'ministry was fulfilled,' which strengthened the ties binding the Gentile to their Jewish brethren, the Holy Spirit singled out 'Barnabas and Saul' from amongst the 'prophets and teachers' of Antioch to an adventurous 'work,' which was, in fact, the setting on foot of organized Gentile evangelism. With this step the Church commences the second stage of her history, that of her expansion through the Roman Empire; and at ch. 13^{1-3} begins the second half of the Acts of the Apostles, with St. Paul for its hero, as St. Peter was the hero of chs. 1–12. The pointed repetition of the definite expression 'the work' at the beginning and at the end (14^{26}) of the story of this mission, and again in 15^{38} relating to its middle and turning point,—when one considers St. Luke's careful choice of language, and the absence in $13^{13.\ 14}$ of any explanation such as he is accustomed to give of critical changes in St. Paul's line of movement (see $9^{25.\ 30}$ 16^{6-10} $17^{14.\ 15}$ 20^{3}),—leads one to think that the plan of campaign, at least in its general outline (through Cyprus, across to Pamphylia, and round by South Galatia home again), was settled under the direction of the Spirit before leaving Antioch. Mark deserted, while his two leaders 'fulfilled, the work' to which they were 'delivered by the grace of God.'

On the FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY Barnabas and Saul, with John Mark, Barnabas' cousin (Col 4^{10}), for their assistant, set sail from Seleucia, landed at Salamis, and traversed the island of Cyprus from east to west, preaching wherever Jewish synagogues gave opportunity. At Paphos the missionaries were invited to speak before Sergius Paulus the proconsul, a Roman governor of unusual intelligence and interest in religious matters. The conversion of this Roman nobleman was a triumph for the new faith, and a happy augury for the enterprise of the missionaries. But it has importance in two further respects: as the first collision of Christianity upon such an arena (comp., however, the case of SIMON MAGUS [wh. see] at Samaria, Ac 8) with the great religious force of Magianism and Oriental theosophy represented by Elymas (or Etoimas),—the type of many such encounters; and secondly, as the occasion when, before all eyes and in the field of the Gentile mission, St. Paul's ascendency of character and inspiration asserted itself and a signal crisis called into exercise his hidden powers. The judgment upon Bar-Jesus was one of those emphatic 'signs of the apostle' by which God designated His chosen instrument. It is at this point, 'when Saul stands forth by himself and becomes the principal actor' (Lewin), that Luke makes the change in his name (v.^{9}); when the missionary band set sail from Paphos to Perga of Pamphylia, the voyagers are described as 'those about Paul' ('Paul and his company,' v.^{13})—a phrase suggesting that Paul took the initiative in the measures for departure from Cyprus. This fact, together with the hazard and uncertain duration of the tour now extended to the mainland, may explain the withdrawal of Barnabas' kinsman and his return to Jerusalem. When the matter was discussed at Perga, it appeared that in South Galatia lay 'the work' on which the apostles had been 'sent out by the Holy Spirit.' It was not Paul's 'infirmity of the flesh' (Gal 4^{13}) that forced him and Barnabas out of their way to visit South Galatia; they were prosecuting the main object of their journey; and Mark was deserting not a sick companion, but 'the work' he was pledged to pursue. See, further, for the reasons that may have prompted this desertion, the art. MARK (JOHN).

Hence the travellers made no stay at Perga, but pushed on rapidly to Pisidian Antioch—'the centre of military and civil administration in the southern parts of the vast province called by the Romans Galatia' (Ramsay). If it was St. Barnabas' predilection that drew the missionaries first to Cyprus ($4^{36.\ 37}$ 15^{39}), in the occupation of Antioch we may trace St. Paul's strategic skill; it was his habit to strike at the centres of provincial life, wherever in such cities a Jewish synagogue offered a foothold. This city commanded the great highroad from Syria to Ephesus and the west, and was central for southern Asia Minor. On the journey of a hundred miles from Perga to Antioch, through the wild ranges of the Taurus, Paul may well have met some of those 'perils of rivers' and 'of robbers' which he associates in 2 Co 11[26]. For the route see Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. ii. 2 and map. At Antioch, and onwards, Paul takes the lead in speech and action (14[9. 11]). 'Barnabas and Saul' set out on the expedition; 'Paul and Barnabas' will return (Ac 13[1] 15[2]).

St. Paul's address in the Antioch synagogue (Ac 13[16-41]) holds a place in Ac 13–28 corresponding to that of St. Peter's Pentecost sermon in Ac 1–12; it is a typical specimen of his preaching to Jews of the Dispersion. As on subsequent occasions, he is listened to at first with attention, and 'many of the Jews and devout proselytes' are favourably affected, until 'on the next Sabbath' the synagogue is crowded with Gentile hearers, whose presence excites Jewish rancour. The courage of the apostles rises with the storm; denied a further hearing, they solemnly exclaim, 'Lo, we turn to the Gentiles!' So the inevitable rupture takes place. The Jewish leaders are enraged to hear their Messianic hopes and the privileges of the chosen race extended to heathen 'dogs,' and to see the Gentile frequenters of the synagogue flocking to the preachers of this scandalous 'gospel' and admitted by baptism into their schismatic 'congregation.' They cast about for means, usually not far to seek, of exciting the city magistrates, or the mob, against the missionaries, who appear in the light of disturbers of the public peace (Ac 17[6]) and are, in one way or other, before long expelled, to pass on to the next city, repeating this experience and finding themselves not infrequently pursued thither by their previous assailants. 'Perils from' their 'countrymen, perils from the heathen,' followed immediately on those 'perils of rivers' and 'perils of robbers' through which the missionaries had arrived at S. Galatia. They were hunted in turn from Antioch to Iconium, and from Iconium to Lystra and Derbe; and this was a foretaste of what became with St. Paul the familiar order of things. Still he persisted in appealing to 'the Jew first,' and made the synagogue in each new city his starting-point. Though he might win only a handful of his compatriots, he always found prepared hearers in the proselytes and Gentile synagogue worshippers, amongst whom were many pious Greek women of the educated classes (Ac 17[4]).

Driven from Antioch, the missionaries travelled (some 80 miles E. by S.) to Iconium (mod. Konieh), a flourishing commercial city, with a synagogue, where, despite persecution, they preached for 'a considerable time' ('the whole winter,' thinks Ramsay) and with much success, till Jewish intrigues compelled their flight 'to the cities of Lycaonia, Lystra and Derbe' (14[1-7]). The four towns enumerated lay within the province of Galatia, and were all places of importance in the Roman administration,—Antioch and Iconium within Phrygian, and Lystra and Derbe in Lycaonian Galatia. Lystra (20 miles S. of Iconium) was, like Antioch, a colonia, a link in the chain of fortresses planted by Augustus to secure the Pisidian and Isaurian frontier. Derbe (50 miles S.E. of Iconium) was the border town of Galatia in this direction. Here the Jewish persecution, organized from Antioch, appears to have ceased. At Lystra 'the multitudes,' who deified Barnabas and Paul on the healing of the lame man, shouted 'in the Lycaonian tongue'; but they gave the visitors the names of Greek gods, and understood Paul's Greek speech (14[15-17]), in which we have an example of his preaching to the simpler sort of heathen audiences. Throughout the missionaries kept to the track of Græco-Roman civilization and rule, and Jewish settlement. It was the local magistrates, not the Roman officials, with whom they came into conflict; hence it was possible to escape by moving on,—possible also after a lapse of time, probably in the new year under new magistrates (see Ramsay, Ch. in Rom. Emp.[5] pp. 70–72), to return to the cities previously visited. The two travellers retraced their steps from Derbe to Antioch, 'confirming the souls of the disciples' and 'appointing elders in every Church' (vv.[22. 23]). At Lystra Paul underwent the single stoning of his experience (2 Co 11[25]), which left on him probably some of the 'stigmata of Jesus' referred to in Gal 6[17]. Although no synagogue is mentioned in Lystra or Derbe, Jews certainly resided in the former place, or the 'Jews from Antioch and Iconium' could not have stirred up the murderous assault they did. The half-Jewish Timothy sprang from Lystra (Ac 16[1. 2]). Returning homewards, Paul and Barnabas 'spake the word in Perga,' and then sailed from the neighbouring port of Attalia (14[24-26]) to Syrian Antioch. They had been absent, as Ramsay calculates, above two years, leaving Antioch in spring and returning in the third summer or autumn following. Navigation, and travelling in the interior of Asia Minor, were possible only from March to October. On the topography, and the political and social conditions of the regions traversed, Ramsay has superseded all other authorities (Ch. in Rom. Emp. ch. ii., and St. Paul the Trav. chs. iv. v.).

Two things were made clear by this experimental mission from Antioch. First, that the heathen in the Græco-Roman cities were prepared in large numbers to receive the gospel—'God had opened to the Gentiles a door of faith' (v.[27]). Secondly (and though Luke does not say this, he indicates it strongly), Paul was marked out as chief of the Gentile mission. With the hour had arrived the man. At Paphos, Antioch, Lystra—in speech, action, suffering—Paul had come to the front by the force of events. God has now put a broad public seal, known and read of all men, upon the vocation of which His servant had been conscious long before. 'The signs of the apostle' subsequently wrought among the Corinthians (2 Co 12[11. 12]), were plainly visible in St. Paul through this journey. As they returned to Antioch, Barnabas surely thought concerning his companion, 'He must increase: I must decrease.' Accordingly, when after the lapse of 'no small time' (a year or so) the Antiochene Church was disturbed by circumcisionists from Jerus., it is 'Paul and Barnabas' (not 'Barnabas and Paul') who debate with them; and 'Paul and Barnabas' are sent to lay the matter before the mother Church at Jerusalem (15[1. 2]). This latter Church, however, gives Barnabas courteous precedence (Ac 15[12-25]); he was the senior man, and its own delegate.

The most striking evidence of St. Paul's ascendency is afforded by his own account of the Conference at Jerus. in Gal 2[1-10]. (We assume, with most scholars, that Gal 2[1-10] corresponds to Ac 15[1-33]: see art. ACTS OF APOSTLES; also Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 122–127; Lipsius in 'Handcomm. z. NT,' Galat., ad loc.; Harnack, Die Chronol. d. altchristl. Litteratur, Bd. i. p. 237).* To Paul comes the 'revelation' directing the deputation from Antioch. He adopts the bold step of taking with the party Titus, representing the Gentile Christians whose status was disputed. He 'communicated to those of repute the gospel' that, he says, 'I preach amongst the Gentiles,' putting it to them as the substantial question for decision, whether he had 'run in vain.' If the Gentiles must be circumcised in order to be Christians, St. Paul's mission is stultified. The 'Pillars' now 'see' that to Paul is 'entrusted the gospel of the uncircumcision, as that of the circumcision to Peter'; they approve his work as being of God. Barnabas is duly honoured, and was heartily with Paul in his contention; but Paul unmistakably plays the leading part in the negotiations, and the controversy gathers round his person. He acted throughout as the responsible head of the Gentile mission, and was so acknowledged by the elder chiefs of the Church. All this we can understand, as taking place after the first missionary tour and the events of Ac 13. 14, which brought Paul to the forefront and displayed in him powers fully comparable to those manifested in Peter's ministry. In A.D. 44–46, when Antioch sent relief to the famine of Jerus., there was no such evidence of Paul's supereminent gifts before the Church; nor is it likely that either Barnabas, or Peter and James, then regarded him in the light in which he appears in Gal 2^{1-10}. The historical situation, the occasion of dispute (viz. the attempt to impose circumcision on Gentile Christians), and the chief persons concerned in the discussions of Ac 15^{1-35} and Gal 2^{1-10}, are the same. The contrast between the narratives is fairly explained by the fact that St. Luke gives the public and exterior view of the proceedings as they concerned the Church at large; St. Paul, their personal aspect and bearing.

The Council of Ac 15 naturally had its inner history; private conferences paved the way for the public settlement. In complicated and delicate affairs of this sort very different representations may be equally true. 'The two accounts admirably complete each other. . . . The discrepancies can, for the most part, be explained simply from the difference of the standpoint of the relaters' (Pfleiderer, Hibb. Lect. 1885, on 'The Influence of the Apostle Paul,' p. 103): see, however, chs. iii. and vii. of Ramsay's St. Paul the Trav., where the coincidence of the second visit of Paul in Gal with the second in Ac (11. 12) is vigorously but not convincingly maintained. Luke gives no hint at the earlier juncture of the momentous controversy of Gal 2, for which, indeed, the occasion arose only after the joint mission of Barnabas and Paul to S. Galatia, when mere Gentiles were received in large bodies into the Church (see Hort's Jud. Christianity, pp. 64–67): the Jerus. Church was occupied in A.D. 44–46 with the famine and the Herodian persecution; for Paul to have raised the question of his apostolic status then would have been premature and officious. Paul ignores in Galatians the second visit to Jerus., because it was devoted to the specific business stated by Luke, and nothing arose out of it affecting his relations with the first apostles or his own apostleship (see Lightf. Gal., note appended to ch. ii.). Returning from Jerus. at that time, Saul resumed his place among the 'prophets and teachers' of the Church of Antioch (Ac 13^{1}).

The second stage of Paul's ministry culminates with the Council at Jerus., which gave validity to Gentile Christianity and St. Paul's plenary apostleship, now attested by God in the successes of the first missionary journey.

(c) The third period of Paul's ministry is signalized by the extension of his mission to Europe, and by the writing of his earliest apostolic letters (1 and 2 Th). The history of the SECOND MISSIONARY JOURNEY is contained in Ac 15^{36}–18^{22}. It begins with the rupture between Paul and Barnabas, occasioned by Paul's refusal of the companionship of Mark (to whom in the end he was reconciled: Philem ^{24}, Col 4^{10}, 2 Ti 4^{11}), but of which a deeper cause lay in the changed relations of the two leaders. Paul must now go his own way. He proceeds to the mission field in Asia Minor, taking for his associate Silas (or Silvanus), one of the two delegates sent from Jerus. to accompany Barnabas and Paul on their return to Antioch (Ac $15^{22.\ 27.\ 32}$). Silas, like Paul, was a Hebrew of Latin name and Roman citizenship (16^{37}),—a 'prophet,' moreover, and a 'leading man' in the Jerus. Church. He accompanied Paul only for this journey. Much later, we find him acting as St. Peter's secretary (1 P 5^{12}). Silas and Mark were important links between the Apostles Paul and Peter, and between the Judæan Church and the Gentile mission. Paul and Silas journeyed by road, through the Cilician Gates, to S. Galatia, arriving first at Derbe, then at Lystra. At Lystra Paul enlisted young Timotheus, possibly to fill the place of Mark as assistant to himself and Silas. He first, however, 'circumcised him,' since he was the son of a Jewess, to avoid scandalizing the Jews (Ac 16^{1-4}). At each place Paul and Silas delivered the resolutions of the Council of Jerus. (15^{23-29}), which were received everywhere (15^{30-33} $16^{4.\ 5}$) with lively satisfaction. They effected their immediate purpose of composing the Judæo-Gentile Churches and putting a stop to the legalistic agitation. The circumcision of Timothy was another conciliatory step on St. Paul's part (see Hort's Jud. Christianity, pp. 84–87). The line of Churches between the two Antiochs were now becoming 'solidly established in the faith, and they were increasing in number daily.'

Ac 16^{6} brings us to the turning point of the second missionary journey, and to a critical moment in Paul's career. St. Luke is pressing forward to the Macedonian mission, and sketches intervening movements less distinctly than his wont, in the long and somewhat awkward sentence of vv.$^{6-8}$. We gather that St. Paul's plan had been, after the visitation of the S. Galatian Churches now completed, to push on westwards along the great highway to Ephesus, the chief city of Asia Minor and the stepping-stone to Greece and Rome. But the travellers were 'forbidden by the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia' (the Roman province of that name, with Ephesus for its capital). When afterwards, 'having come over against Mysia,' much farther north, 'they were trying to enter Bithynia,' 'the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not.' They were thus compelled finally to make for Troas, where the vision appeared which summoned Paul to the help of the Macedonians. This was a great and pregnant movement in apostolic history—the step which carried Paul and Silas across the Ægean; other events of the time were of importance, in Luke's view, only as leading up to this. Three distinct Divine interpositions occurred, forcing Paul and his companions upon a venture quite unanticipated by themselves.

But how are we to construe the first clause of v.^{6}—according to the critical text its principal and governing sentence, 'But they passed through the Phrygian and Galatian country, having been (i.e. since they were) forbidden* by the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia'? (διῆλθον δὲ τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, κωλυθέντες κ.τ.λ.). Ramsay (who has reinforced with powerful arguments the theory held by Mynster, Perrot, Renan, Hausrath, Weizsäcker, that Paul never entered N. Galatia, and that the Galatians of his Ep. are the people of the Phrygian and Lycaonian Churches founded on the first tour) argues that 'the Phrygian and Galatian region' of this passage is simply the Phrygo-Galatian district extending from Iconium to Antioch traversed before, and that Paul and Silas journeyed in a direct line, and with no considerable delay, from this region to Troas. It seems to be clear, on the other hand, that v.[5] concludes the account of St. Paul's visitation of S. Galatia, and that v.[6] relates his setting out on a new campaign. Forbidden to preach in Asia, the missionaries moved in another direction; and 'the Phrygian and Galatian region' is Luke's definition of the fresh field upon which they now enter. Here St. Luke first employs the word Galatian, although the travellers have been within the Roman province of that name since arriving at Derbe, for the cities of Asia Minor evangelized on the first tour all lay (as Ramsay has decisively proved) within its bounds. We naturally look for this new 'Galatian region' in Galatia proper or N. Galatia, the western part of which, with Pessinus for its centre, marched with Phrygia not far to the east of the direct way from Antioch to Troas. The presumption from Greek usage is that τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν signifies two adjoining districts coupled together, rather than one district known by two different names (comp. Ac 27[5], Lk 3[1], 1 Th 1[8]), and that the co-ordinate 'Phrygian' and 'Galatian' are used in the same sense (the former ethnic, and so therefore the latter). Emerging from N.W. Galatia, the travellers would find themselves (v.[7]) close to Bithynia on the north, and with Mysia presenting itself on the west. V.[6] thus fills in the geographical space between vv.[5] and [7], and defines the tract, first Phrygian in population then Galatian, which separated Bithynia from St. Paul's old mission field.* (On the question of N. v. S. Galatia see, in addition to writers mentioned before, Lightf. Galatians, Introd.; Ramsay's Ch. in Rom. Emp. chs. iii.–vi., St. Paul the Trav. chs. v., vi., viii., ix., Studia Biblica, IV. ii., and art. Theol.*, 1892, p. 471; Crit. Review, III. [1893] 356; Lipsius, 'Handcom.,' Galat., Einleitung). The verb διῆλθον (16[6]) connotes a 'missionary progress' (St. Paul the Trav. p. 384); and when Paul revisits this district on his third journey (18[23]), he 'travels through the Galatian region and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples,—the last clause implying that on the ground so lightly passed over in 16[6] considerable time had been spent and many souls won for Christ. To this second journey the origin of the Galatian Churches, addressed in Paul's great Ep. of that name, has been generally referred, its interpreters seeing in the recipients Galatians by race,* inhabitants of the north (preferably the N.W.) of the great Roman province of Galatia. Paul made acquaintance with his 'Galatians' unexpectedly, when compelled by illness to seek their hospitality and so to give them the gospel (Gal 4[12-20]). Twice during this journey he was turned aside from his purpose by the voice of the Holy Spirit; it appears that the hand of God was further laid on him, in the shape of disabling sickness, obliging him to halt in this out-of-the-way district, which he had meant to traverse without lingering. God was giving to His strong-willed servant a hard schooling in submission. It may have been Bithynia that Paul and Silas were making for when thus checked; or it may have been (according to Paul's wont) Ancyra, the capital of the Galatian province, already evangelized in its southern part. In any case, the Galatians, with whom he now tarried, received the infirm apostle with enthusiasm, and he made numerous and attached converts amongst them, the objects of his warm affection but anxious solicitude.

* Ramsay prefers the reading of the TR, διελθόντες κ.τ.λ., which he interprets as resumptive of vv.$^{4\ 5}$, thus detaching κωλυθέντες from the foregoing clause. Even with the reading διῆλθον δέ, it is maintained that κωλυθέντες . . . Ἀσίᾳ conveys a distinct predication, not explaining the διελθεῖν, but supplementing it and stating the next occurrence (see, besides Ramsay as below, Askwith's Destination and Date of the Ep. to the Gal., ch. iii.). With the given arrangement of words, this construction at the best is artificial.

If other reasons besides the writer's eagerness to bring us to Macedonia are required to account for the silence of Acts about the Galatians of the Ep., the fact that the N. Galatian mission was a parenthesis in Paul's work and lay off the main line of missionary progress may account for the slightness of St. Luke's references thereto; and the defection feared may have made the apostle's work there, to a large extent, a labour lost.

It was at Troas that St. Luke met St. Paul and joined his company (Ramsay conjectures Luke himself to have been the 'Macedonian man' of Ac 16[9]: St. Paul the Trav. ix. 3); and at Philippi Luke stayed, being found there when Paul revisited that town. (The 'we' of the Acts continues from 16[10] to 16[17], to be resumed at 20[5. 6]). The 'vision' may have prepared St. Paul for St. Luke's invitation to Macedonia (Ramsay, as above), as St. Peter was prepared at Joppa for the summons of Cornelius. Philippi was an important Roman colony, with a small Jewish settlement worshipping at an open-air proseuché by the river-side. Among 'the women who assembled' there Paul and Silas found their first hearers, and in the proselyte Lydia their first European convert and their hostess (vv.[13-15]). Women played a leading part in this Church from the outset (Ph 4[1-3]). The missionaries had preached at the proseuché for some time, when their work was stopped by the accusation brought against them by the masters of a fortune-telling, ventriloquist slave-girl from whom 'in the name of Jesus Christ' they had exorcized the evil spirit (vv.[16-18]). This attack was one of Paul's many 'perils from the heathen.' The gospel damaged the vested interests of idolatry; and those who saw 'the hope of their gain' endangered attacked its preachers through the passions of the populace—at Ephesus subsequently as despisers of 'the great goddess,' at Philippi as 'Jews' who brought in 'customs illegal for Romans' and affronting their pride (vv.[20. 21]). In this colonia Paul suffered one of the three beatings with (Roman) rods that he recounts in 2 Co 11[25]. The scenes attending his imprison-

* The writer is now (1900) inclined to Ramsay's construction of τὴν Φρυγ. κ. Γαλατ. χώραν as denoting the Phrygo-Galatian [he would prefer to say, Galatic-Phrygian] region; but unless this phrase had an accepted political limitation, of which there is no evidence, it covered presumably the west of the province of Galatia generally, the whole of which was (in the substratum of its population) Phrygian ethnically and Galatian politically. Even in the N.W., as Ramsay intimates, the Galatæ were never more than a ruling clan. On this modified view, it would appear that Paul and Silas, when forbidden to preach 'in Asia,' moved northwards from the field of the earlier mission, confining themselves still to Phrygia Galatica where they were allowed to 'speak the word,' and avoiding Phrygia Asiana which they had been previously on the point of entering (τῇ Ἀσίᾳ is thus seen to be antithetical to τὴν . . . Γαλατικὴν χώραν). Taking this course and marching within the eastern side of the border-line separating the two provinces, which parted Phrygia between them, the apostles arrived at the N.W. corner of Galatia, with Bithynia fronting them, and Mysia flanking them at some distance to the west. Here, once more, their course was supernaturally diverted—from north to west, as previously from west to north—and 'passing over Mysia' (a part of Asia, where they had been 'forbidden to speak the word') they reached the sea at Troas. Paul and Silas thus traversed, in west central Galatia, a wild and desolate country; but this route was forced upon them, and Paul 'would not be deterred by rough or unfrequented paths' (Ltft.). There must have been at this time regular communication between the S.W. and N. of the great Galatian province. The view followed in this note gives a good sense to Ac 18[23], διερχόμενος . . . τ. Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν, which means, in this light, 'traversing the (above-mentioned) Galatian region and Phrygia' at large—not the Galatian part of it alone, to which Paul's travels had been specifically limited on the Second Journey.

* This assumption as to the race of Paul's 'Galatians' is modified by the later note above. It is still maintained that in locality and origin the Churches in question are distinct from those of S. Galatia, which were founded upon the First Journey and owed allegiance not to Paul alone, but to Paul and Barnabas jointly.

ment here along with Silas, form one of the most stirring and most graphic episodes in the Acts.

St. Paul's campaign in Macedonia was one of severe conflict, but signal success. The missionaries entered Thessalonica (now Saloniki), the capital of Macedonia, full of vigour and hope (1 Th 1^{5} $2^{1.2}$). Next to Syrian Antioch, this city was the most important which Paul had so far reached, being the chief emporium of the Thracian peninsula and the seat of Roman administration, containing also a large and influential synagogue. Once planted at Thessalonica, 'the word of the Lord sounded out' far and wide; the gospel was advertised through the whole of Macedonia and Achaia (1 Th 1^{8-10}). St. Paul's experience here resembled that at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 17^{1-10}). At this loyal imperial capital, however, the attack on Christianity takes a new form, reminding us of the charge against Jesus before Pilate. The preachers are accused of sedition, of 'setting up another king, Jesus.' The emphasis which Paul laid at this time upon the doctrines of 'the kingdom of God' and the parousia lent colour to this dangerous impeachment. Paul left Thessalonica for Berœa with his work unfinished, and firmly resolved to return soon (1 Th $2^{17.18}$ 3^{10}); he had a peculiar affection for his converts here (as at Philippi), and a strong sense of the importance of the position won in this city. But he had to be content with sending Timothy from Athens in his place; and it was only on Timothy's return (who found the apostle removed to Corinth, Ac 18^{5}) that his anxiety was relieved. St. Luke's account throws at this point a further light on St. Paul's method of argument with Jews: 'He discoursed to them from the Scriptures, expounding and explaining [1] that the Christ should suffer, and [2] should rise from the dead, and [3] that this is the Christ, this Jesus whom I proclaim to you.' Up to the last point (reached on the third Sabbath?) the Jews listened with tolerance—to the general doctrine of a suffering and rising Messiah; the critical moment came when this Christ was identified with the crucified Nazarene.

The synagogue of Berœa received the gospel with rare candour; a Church was quickly formed, including 'many' Jews; everything went well, until Jews from Thessalonica arrived to stir up the heathen multitude against the apostles. The danger to St. Paul's life must have been great, for he was sent by sea right out of the country and escorted all the way to Athens (17^{10-15}). This deadly persecution by the Thessalonian Jews justifies the anger he expresses in 1 Th 2^{14-16}.

At Athens, the city of philosophers but 'full of idols,' things take a different course. Paul is hailed as a wandering lecturer upon some curious form of religious speculation, and is brought by 'certain of the Stoics and Epicureans' before the court (not up on the hill) of the Areopagus, which was charged with the oversight of public teaching in the city. The profound and earnest discourse reported in Ac 17^{22-31}—which leads up from the general truth, then widely accepted, of God's spiritual nature and fatherly relation to men, to the proclamation of Christ's coming in judgment and the resurrection of the dead—made no decided impression on this audience. A single Areopagite accepted the faith, with a few other persons (17^{34}), but no considerable Church could be gathered; and Paul went on to Corinth (on 'Paul at Athens,' see especially Ramsay's St. Paul the Trav. xi. 1–3). Silas' movements at this time cannot be traced with certainty: probably he followed Paul to Athens, along with Timothy (Ac 17^{15}), and was separately, and a little later (1 Th $3^{1.2}$, 'we sent Timothy'), despatched from that place—sc. to Philippi or Berœa, journeying with Timothy back from Macedonia to rejoin the apostle (Ac 18^{5}).

Paul reached Corinth alone, 'in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling' (1 Co 2^{3})—a condition due partly to sickness, but partly, one thinks, to his small success at Athens and his distress about the Thessalonians. The elation of his Macedonian mission was followed by a period of dejection. He gained, however, at the outset a couple of fast friends in Aquila and Priscilla, recently driven from Rome through the emperor Claudius' decree of expulsion against the Jews. Their acquaintance turned his thoughts more definitely to that city, which at Corinth came into Paul's nearer view. St. Paul's opening addresses in this synagogue were received with favour both by 'Jews and Greeks' (Ac 18^{1-4}), until after some weeks, on the arrival of Silas and Timothy with cheering news from Macedonia, he proclaimed in its full scope, and with renewed energy, the Messiahship of Jesus and 'the word of the cross' (Ac 18^{5-8}, 1 Co 1^{18-25} 2^{2}). At this the Jews were scandalized, and an angry separation ensued. Paul occupied the house of a converted proselyte, Titius Justus—judging from his name, a Roman citizen of the colonia—close to the synagogue; the ruler of the synagogue followed him When he tells the Corinthian brethren that there were 'not many wise, mighty, highborn' amongst them, it is evident that some persons of distinction and culture attached themselves to this Church (cf. Ro 16^{23}).

The Corinthian Church shone by its intellectual gifts and variety of talent. Its constituency was drawn from the lowest as well as the higher walks of life. On this rank soil, in the metropolis of Greek vice, a Christianity sprang up of abounding vitality, but rife with seeds of strife and corruption (1 Co 1^{5} 6^{9-11}, 2 Co $12^{20.21}$, etc.). In Corinth the Jews had no popular influence, and Paul was able to stay for eighteen months. He was encouraged by a vision assuring him of personal safety and of a rich harvest of souls (Ac 18^{9-11}). Paul experienced at Corinth the full benefit of the protection of Roman law. The proconsul Gallio, known through his brother Seneca as an amiable and large-minded man, dismissed contemptuously the charge of illegal action brought by the Jews against Paul, and winked at the beating thereupon given to the accuser by the Greek bystanders (vv.$^{12-17}$). In no other great city, with the exception of Syrian Antioch, did the apostolic Church experience so little persecution.

The date of the FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESS. is determined by comparison of 1 Th 3^{6} and Ac 18^{3} as falling within the first period of St. Paul's sojourn at Corinth, within six months probably of his leaving Thessalonica. The SECOND EPISTLE followed speedily after the First; for it deals with the same situation, aggravated in some particulars, and corrects a misapprehension due in part to misunderstanding or perversion of the First (2 Th $2^{1.2}$). These two Epp., with the Address at Athens and the allusions of 1 Co, show the prominence of the doctrine of the Last Things in St. Paul's teaching at this epoch. Though his specific doctrine of the Cross is only once alluded to in the Thess. letters (1 Th $5^{9.10}$), the Epp. to Corinth and Galatia prove, by their references to his preaching on the second journey (1 Co $2^{1.2}$, Gal 3^{1}, etc.), that this was his central theme throughout.

The course of the Second Journey, possibly, throws some light upon the obscure figure of 'the man of lawlessness' in 2 Th 2. Many indications point to the apostle's interested study of the Roman Empire and its relations to the kingdom of Christ. The majesty and equity of Roman law, the ability of Roman administration, the unity and peace which Roman rule gave to the civilized world,

Paul appreciated; they had created the field for his great work. He saw in the Roman magistrate 'the restrainer' of evil forces that might have crushed the Church in its infancy. But there was one feature in the Roman system that must have stirred his extreme abhorrence—the Cæsar-worship then rapidly spreading in the provinces, which was becoming, in fact, the religion of the Empire. This development of imperial autocracy was, in principle, quite distinct from the authority of the State, and could be regarded by Paul only as the climax of lawlessness. The attempt of Caligula, in the year 39, to place his statue in the temple at Jerusalem had horrified the Jewish world; the blasphemous freaks of this Cæsar were probably in the apostle's mind when he wrote 2 Th 2^4. In their progress through Asia Minor the missionaries were confronted with multiplied signs of the imperial religion; not improbably they passed, e.g., through Pergamum (marked out in Rev 2^{13} as the place 'where Satan dwelleth'), where stood the Augusteium, in which the godhead of the Divus Augustus was honoured by a splendid cultus renowned through the peninsula. Such observations gave a sharper edge to St. Paul's conception of 'the kingdom'; and his reflexions upon this antithesis may well have affected his language in such a way as to lend colour to the charge made against him at Thessalonica (Ac $17^{7.8}$). On this subject he had spoken more freely than he ventures to write (2 Th 2^5). The OT forecasts of Antichrist, combined with the contemporary deification of the Cæsars, supply the material for the image of the ἀντικείμενος of 2 Th. This same Cæsar-worship inspired the hatred of Rome which burns through the Apocalypse. St. Paul and St. John, with profound insight, discerned in this cult the true rival of Christianity among the forces of the time; the numen of Cæsar, as the great martyrdoms proved, was the crucial alternative to that of Jesus. Antichrist was latent in the world-god of the Palatine.

In his progress westwards Paul was increasingly attracted, yet repelled, at each step by the grandeur of Rome. The second missionary tour was the time of the apostle's boldest enterprises, his largest conquests. In a single march the gospel was carried over more than half the breadth of the eastern Roman Empire, and Corinth was brought into fellowship with Jerusalem. But these rapid successes in Galatia and Corinth prepared for the apostle his greatest sorrows.

The second tour, occupying scarcely less than three years, closed with Paul's voyage to Cæsarea for Jerusalem. On the way he called at Ephesus, where he left Priscilla and Aquila, promising to return. This fourth visit to Jerusalem was of the briefest. At Antioch he spent 'some time'—an expression probably covering the ensuing winter.

(d) THE THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY commenced with the spring, when St. Paul set out for 'the Galatian region and Phrygia,' accompanied by Timothy (Ac 18^{18-23}). During the interval between the second and third journeys we place (with Neander, Wieseler, A. Sabatier) St. Peter's visit to Antioch and collision with St. Paul, related in Gal 2^{11-21}. The defeat of Ac 15 must have arrested the Judaistic movement for the time; nor is St. Peter, to say nothing of St. Barnabas, likely at once to have stultified his action at the Council. The Epp. to the Thess. give no indication that St. Paul's mind was disturbed during his first mission in Europe by controversy with the legalists, as it could hardly fail to have been if the settlement made at Jerus. had been already jeopardied by 'the dissimulation' of Peter and Barnabas and the renewed activity of the ψευδάδελφοι παρείσακτοι. The proceedings of the 'certain from James' at the time of St. Peter's visit to Antioch amounted to 'a regular declaration of war,' a renewal of the struggle between the principle of Jewish privilege and Christian universalism. This conflict, breaking out in Antioch, spread rapidly over the field of St. Paul's mission and raged bitterly in the Galatian and Corinthian Churches, where emissaries from Jerus. appeared on the same errand as those who had 'carried away' the Jewish Christians of Antioch. 'Evidently, the apostle had quitted Jerus. (after the Council of Ac 15 and the understanding with the "Pillars") and proceeded to his second Missionary Journey full of satisfaction at the victory he had gained and free from anxiety for the future. The decisive moment of the crisis necessarily falls between the Thess. and Gal. Epp. What had happened meanwhile? The violent discussion with St. Peter at Antioch, and all that the recital of this incident reveals to us,—the arrival of the emissaries from St. James in the Gentile Christian circle, and the countermission organized to rectify the work of St. Paul. A new situation suddenly presents itself to the apostle on his return from the second Missionary Journey' (Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, pp. 10, 11, also 124–136). The Judaizers had recovered from the shock of their former overthrow; and the enormous accessions to the Church from heathenism were threatening to overwhelm them. They determined on a new and more artful attempt to capture the Gentile Churches. They did not now, as before, bluntly insist that circumcision was necessary to salvation (Ac 15^1). But they maintained that the law of God created an indelible distinction between the circumcised Israelite and all others, and that this separation was guarded by the Levitical ordinances respecting meats. While the Messiah was the Saviour of all men, there belonged to His own people, with the apostles whom He chose from amongst them, an inalienable primacy. Only through circumcision and conformity to the sacred ordinances could Gentile believers become the legitimate heirs of faithful Abraham, and enter into all the blessedness of the kingdom of God. Such was the theory of the new Judaizers, as we gather it from St. Paul's polemic against them. They no longer denied the Christian status of uncircumcised believers in Christ, but they vindicated a higher status for the circumcised. Thus Peter and Barnabas, in withdrawing from the common Church table at Antioch under the pressure of these men, virtually 'compelled the Gentiles to Judaize'; for only, it seemed, on this condition would the latter be in communion with Jewish believers and be recognized as Christians in the fullest sense. 'The decrees' of the Jerus. Council, though certainly not designed for this purpose, and not corresponding (as it has often been alleged) to the 'Seven Commandments of the Sons of Noah' imposed on the gēr tôshābh or sebomenos (Hort, Jud. Christianity, pp. 68–76), might with a little ingenuity be construed in favour of the distinction now alleged, as though they placed Gentile Christians on a footing resembling that of proselytes to Judaism.* The law was brought in again to complete the work of the gospel; and those who had 'begun in the spirit' were to be 'perfected by the flesh' (Gal 3^3).

While the legalists sought in this way to foist Judaism upon the Pauline Churches, they equally strove to destroy the influence of the Apostle Paul. They came forward as the authorized representatives of the chiefs at Jerus., and showed 'letters of commendation' to this effect (Gal 2^{12}, 2 Co 3^1); in their name they assumed to correct the imperfect doctrine of Paul, and to claim the allegiance of all believers for the mother Church. Paul, they asserted, had no knowledge of Jesus Christ and no authority to preach Him, beyond what he had received from Peter and the Twelve. Amongst other proofs of this, they even argued at Corinth that his declining to receive a stipend betrayed the consciousness of inferior right. With these unscrupulous opponents Paul was in conflict throughout the third tour. At the outset he had warned his Galatian converts against the seducers who were following on his track (Gal 1^9 5^3; cf. Ac 18^{23}). His opponents anticipated his arrival at Corinth; from Corinth he writes to Rome, expecting that they will carry the agitation there and may prepossess the Roman Church against him. If these men were really supported, as they alleged, by the responsible heads of the Jewish Church, St. Paul's position was almost untenable; but the studious respect shown in the Epp. of this period for the 'Pillars' indicates his confidence in their loyalty to the fellowship established between himself and them (Gal $2^{9.\ 10}$). The failure of the attack on St. Paul's apostleship goes far to prove that there was no schism between him and the Twelve.

This fourth period, therefore, of St. Paul's ministry is distinguished as the period of his struggle with the Judaistic reaction in the Church, and of the four great evangelical Epistles which were its outcome. The evangelist becomes the controversialist; the church-founder must defend the churches of his foundation. The apologetic and doctrinal interests now predominate in St. Paul's work; he is employed in consolidating the conquests already won.

Even his missionary activity bears at this time somewhat of a supplementary character. After 'confirming' on his way 'all the disciples' gained on his last tour (Ac 18^{23}, cf. 16^6: for the expression τ. Γαλατικὴν χώραν κ. Φρυγίαν see note * on p. 707[a]), 'when he had made a missionary progress through the higher-lying quarters' (this implies a fairly complete evangelizing of central Asia Minor), Paul 'came to Ephesus' (19^1). Ephesus, with its rich and populous province of Asia, lay in the centre of the fields already occupied. It was the objective point of St. Paul's second journey; God's hand had then diverted his course (16^6), but only for a while. Here, as at Corinth, Paul's work was under the shield of the Roman administration (19^{38-40}); and he won the friendship even of 'some of the Asiarchs' (v.[31]), who were the 'high priests of Asia, the heads of the imperial politico-religious organization of the province' (St. Paul the Trav. p. 281). 'Many,' therefore, as his 'adversaries' were, and though he had to 'fight with wild beasts in Ephesus' (1 Co 15^{32} 16^9), Paul held his ground in this city for three years, until 'all those that dwelt in Asia had heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks' (Ac $19^{10.\ 17-20.\ 26}$ 20^{31}). This success led to a great destruction of the Ephesian books of magic; it so much diminished the sale of the images of Artemis that the craftsmen took alarm and stirred up a riot of the city multitude, who were enraged at the disparagement of their world-famed goddess. The tumult hastened Paul's departure; but he had done an immense work at Ephesus. This city, afterwards the home of the Apostle John, was the most powerful centre of Christianity in the later apostolic age. The Ep. to Philemon and that to the Colossians, written to an outlying town of the province which Paul had not himself visited, and the general (provincial) destination of the so-called Ep. to the EPHESIANS (see art.), indicate how widely Paul's mission permeated the province of Asia. With the establishment of the gospel at Troas, evangelized by Paul on leaving Ephesus (2 Co $2^{12.\ 13}$; cf. Ac 20^{6-12}), and the excursion into Illyria (Ro 15^{19-21}) made apparently during his sojourn in Macedonia in the following summer, two more links were added to the chain of Churches, which by the end of the third tour stretched 'from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum.' The apostle felt that things were ripening for his advance to Rome (Ac 19^{21}).

Besides the daily pressure of his mission, never perhaps so great as at Ephesus, there lay on St. Paul heavily at this time 'the care of all the Churches' (2 Co 11^{28}). Of this care the Corinthian and Galatian Epistles are evidence. GALATIANS is commonly referred to the Ephesian sojourn; 'Lightfoot has given good reasons, though not all equally good' (Hort's Jud. Chr. p. 99), for placing it later, between 2 Co and Ro, as written from Macedonia or Corinth (Comm. on Gal., Introd. iii.). Ramsay, in accordance with his S. Galatian theory, carries the Epistle back to St. Paul's stay at Antioch before the third journey; while Clemen (Chronologie d. Paulin. Briefe, ii. A. 1) makes it follow Romans because of its extreme controversial position.

In 1 AND 2 CORINTHIANS we see Paul closely watching affairs at Corinth, during his residence in Ephesus. But the exact course of his proceedings is difficult to determine. Krenkel (in his Beiträge) and Schmiedel (in the 'Handcommentar z. NT,' Einleit. an Kor.) have lately examined the data minutely, arriving at involved and contradictory theories as to Paul's communications with Corinth during this period. From 2 Co $13^{1.\ 2}$ it is almost certain that Paul had been at Corinth a second time, 'in sorrow' (2^1) and humiliation ($12^{20.\ 21}$). He found a number of his converts relapsing into heathen vice; and he rebuked and warned, but forbore to strike. This forbearance had compromised his authority and given an impression of weakness on his part, of which his opponents subsequently took an injurious advantage, contrasting his imperious letters with his feeble presence and challenging a 'proof' of his apostolic powers (2 Co 10^{1-11} 13^{1-10}). This intervening visit (an excursion by sea from Ephesus, unnoticed by Luke) was made not long before 1 Co (so Schmiedel),—and, since this letter was written in the spring (1 Co 5^8 16^8), probably in the previous autumn. In 1 Co 4^{18-21} Paul meets the insinuation, based on the result of this encounter, that he is afraid to come to Corinth; his seeming vacillation between the 1st and 2nd Ep. gave additional colour to the imputation, afterwards repeated (2 Co 1^{15-24}). This episode, not directly mentioned in 1 Co and which both parties might wish to forget, Paul is compelled to recall in 2 Co by the taunts of his opponents. On his return to Ephesus under the painful impression of what he had just witnessed at Corinth, the apostle wrote a sharp disciplinary Epistle, to which 1 Co 5^{9-13} refers in explanation and reinforcement. In spite of this appeal, the Church of Corinth had permitted 'the old leaven' to remain, until the monstrous case of incest compelled the apostle to give the solemn and peremptory directions of 1 Co 5^{1-8}.

Concurrently with the news of this outrage, Paul hears of the factions dividing the Church, in which the names of Cephas and of Apollos (much against his will) figure in rivalry with his own,—even the name of Christ being dragged into the competition. The Apollos party, affecters of philosophical breadth and culture, were conspicuous at the moment; and Paul deals with them in chs. 1–4 of 1 Co, referring to Apollos with brotherly frankness ($3^{4.\ 22}$ 4^6). The Church had also addressed to the apostle at Ephesus a public letter, avoiding the grave matters taken up in St. Paul's first six chapters, and writing with a self-complacency sadly unbefitting (4^8 $5^{2.\ 6}$ 11^2), but asking his guidance on a number of important practical questions, with which he deals in chs. 7–14: see the headings

$7^{1.25}$ 8^{1} 12^{1} 16^{1}. Three leading Corinthian Christians brought this letter to Ephesus (16^{15-18}); and Paul, in sending them back with his reply, warmly commends them. In this Epistle we first hear of 'the collection for the saints' at Jerusalem, gathered by Paul on his third missionary tour, to which he attached great importance (16^{1-4}, 2 Co 8. 9, Gal 2^{10}). He had already given instructions to the Churches of Galatia on the business, probably on his way through Asia Minor (Ac 18^{23}); and Gal 6^{6-10}, as well as 2^{10}, tacitly refers to it. The phrase introducing the topic in 1 Co 16^{1} (cf. 7^{1} etc.) suggests that the Corinthians were already interested in this charity (see also 2 Co 8^{10} 9^{2-5}). This ministration to the poverty of the persecuted Church in Jerus. (1 Th 2^{14}), in which Paul had been engaged from an early time (Ac 11^{30}), helped to unite Jewish and Gentile Christians; it was a counteraction to the Judaistic propaganda, since it exhibited to the mother Church the true grace of God in the daughter Churches among the heathen.

When Paul despatched our 1st Ep. to Corinth, he was expecting to travel thither soon, but not immediately, and to make a considerable stay; meanwhile he has sent Timothy, now in Macedonia upon his way, who 'will remind' the Corinthians of Paul's 'ways in Christ,' which they were in danger of forgetting. He had some apprehension that Timothy might not be well received (1 Co 4^{17-19} 16^{10}; cf. Ac $19^{21.22}$). Although Timothy shares in the greeting of 2 Co, and 2 Co 1–7 (quite otherwise than 1 Co) is written mainly in the first person plural, not a word is said about Timothy's visit to Corinth. This silence is significant, as was St. Paul's silence in 1 Co respecting his own, then recent, visit. Had Timothy never arrived at Corinth, some explanation would surely have been given; clearly, he is not forgotten (1^{1}). Now, in the same letter there is notable reference to some one, unnamed, who had been grievously 'wronged,' and wronged in such a way that Paul felt the injury as his own. About this wrong he has written shortly before, 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart, with many tears' ($2^{3.4}$ 7^{8-12}). In this painful letter, which had made the Corinthians 'sorry after a godly sort' and 'to repentance,' Paul must have demanded the exemplary punishment of 'him that did the wrong'; and a 'censure' had been accordingly inflicted upon him 'by the majority' of the Church, under which the offender was so humbled that Paul forgives him and desires his restoration (2 Co 2^{5-11}).

Chs. 1–7 of the 2nd Ep. turn upon this incident. Who were the sufferer and inflicter of wrong? (1) The father and son of 1 Co 5; so it is often replied (see e.g. Edwards and Beet on 1 Co, and Klöpper on 2 Co, ad locc.). But the language and feeling of 2 Co 2^{5-11} 7^{6-16} are as unsuitable as those of 1 Co 5 are suitable to this infamous offence, and one hardly thinks that even the Church of Corinth could hesitate or be divided about so flagrant a crime when solemnly brought up for judgment; nor does 1 Co correspond to the description of 2 Co 2^{4}. (2) St. Paul himself and some insolent Corinthian Christian, who had defied the apostle either when present on the second visit (thus interjected between 1 and 2 Co), or in his absence; so Sabatier (The Ap. Paul, pp. 171–175), Schmiedel, and others. This explanation sets us at the right point of view for understanding 2 Co 2 and 7; but St. Paul's second visit to Corinth probably came about earlier (see p. 710[b]); and St. Paul is not the man to have retreated before a personal attack, shooting Parthian arrows by letters from a distance; such a defeat would have been irreparable. (3) Beyschlag and Pfleiderer, with greater probability, suggest Timothy as the ἀδικηθείς. Appearing at Corinth on Paul's behalf about the time of the arrival of the 1st Ep. (4^{17-21} $16^{10.11}$), and perhaps taking the initiative in the trial of the incestuous man, Timothy received a gross insult from 'some one' of note in the Church, the injury thus inflicted striking the apostle through his representative, and, not improbably, involving an angry reflexion upon him for sending a stripling in his place. This attack on Timothy accounts for the emphatic and continuous identification by the apostle in 2 Co 1–7 of his young helper with himself, and for the subtle interchanges between the first person plural and singular in the passages relative to the ἀδικήσας and ἀδικηθείς.

On Timothy's return, soon after 1 Co, with this grievous news, Paul wrote 'out of anguish of heart' the lost epistle between 1 and 2 Co (not to be identified with 2 Co 10–13^{10}, as by Hausrath and Pfleiderer; these chapters have nothing to do with the affair of the ἀδικηθείς), conveyed by Titus (before this time employed at Corinth on the business of the collection, 2 Co 8^{6} $9^{2.5}$ 12^{16-18}), in which Paul called on the Church to condemn the ἀδικήσας and thus 'show itself clear in the matter.' This the Corinthians did—at least 'the majority' of them (2^{6})—with earnest apologies to Paul and Timothy ($7^{11.12}$). Paul had sent Titus in confidence that such satisfaction would be given; but Titus' delay in returning awakened the most distressing apprehensions ($2^{12.13}$ $7^{5.6}$). He was compelled to leave Ephesus, and, after awaiting his messenger for some time at Troas, passed on to Macedonia still in painful suspense. At the moment when he sent Titus from Ephesus, Paul was disposed to come round by way of Corinth to Macedonia,—supposing, of course, that the Corinthians submitted (cf. 1^{15} and 7^{14}),—and Titus had intimated that the apostle, contrary to the intention of 1 Co 16^{5-7}, might thus give them 'a second joy.' But this was now impossible (Paul would not come without better news from Corinth, $2^{2.3}$), and the apostle reverted to the earlier plan of travel. He must have apprised Titus of this change, with directions to meet him in Troas or Macedonia; and in this way the news of St. Paul's illness reached Corinth before Titus left (1^{11} 7^{7}). The Corinthians were full of sympathy; at the same time, reflexions were made on the apostle's seeming fickleness, which touched him keenly (1^{15-22}).

The illness from which Paul suffered between 1 and 2 Co was severe and all but fatal (2 Co 1^{9} 6^{9}). This affliction left a deep mark in his experience; it overshadows 2 Co. Chs. 4^{16}–5^{10} record his thoughts as he then lay confronting the last enemy. For the first time he realizes the likelihood that he will die before the Lord's return; we do not find him subsequently speaking of the παρουσία in the first person plural of 1 Th and 1 Co. The terrible closing scenes at Ephesus, the revolt of Galatia and Corinth, and this prostrating attack of sickness, by their concurrent effect brought him into the lowest depths of affliction (1^{8-11} 4^{7-12} $7^{5.6}$); and God is now to him, above all, 'the Father of compassions.' It was the darkest hour that the apostle had known. His life and his mission seemed both to be ending in defeat.

The acute personal question raised by the ἀδικήσας at Corinth is terminated; but the larger controversy remains, and has been exasperated through the arrival of Judæan emissaries (3^{1} $11^{22.23}$ 12^{11}). Of these men and their proceedings Titus, on his return from Corinth, gave a full report. The Church, while sincerely loyal to Paul, had received the 'false apostles' and 'deceitful workers'; it was being imposed on and was too likely to be seduced by them ($11^{2-4.19.20}$). Their self-commendations and disparagements of Paul, at whose expense they exalted the Twelve, were listened to with unworthy tolerance. He is compelled in 2 Co 3–6, and more polemically in the concluding chapters, to vindicate at length both his character and apostleship. The contrast, in temper and purport, between 2 Co 1–7 and 10–13, which leads some able scholars (e.g. Hausrath, Schmiedel) to regard these sections as distinct epistles, is due to the peculiar situation at Corinth, to the fact that, while the majority of the Church had rallied to Paul (2[6]), there remained a minority all the more embittered, in which the newly-arrived agitators found the means for operating upon the entire community. The four parties of 1 Co have resolved themselves in a few months into two; and 2 Co is at once a message of peace to the well-disposed, and a thunderbolt launched by the apostle against the Judaizing promoters of 'another gospel' and his own malignant detractors.

This powerful Epistle appears to have subdued the mutiny at Corinth, for Paul carried out his purpose of spending the winter there before his journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20[2.3]: cf. 2 Co 2[1]), and there he wrote the calm and deliberate Ep. to the Romans, the tone of which reflects his softened mood. This conciliatory temper befitted the apostle addressing a strange Church, where Jewish believers are numerous but, as he supposes, not unfriendly to his gospel. Meanwhile Titus, attended for this purpose by two companions (2 Co 8[16-23]), is commissioned in conveying 2 Co to conclude the business of 'the collection,' which had doubtless been hindered by strife; chs. 8 and 9 of 2 Co are devoted to this matter. In 1 Co 16[3] Paul had suggested the election of deputies to convey the charity to Jerus.; such election the Macedonians had now made (2 Co 8[19]): Ac 20[4] furnishes a list of these deputies, as they gathered to accompany St. Paul to Palestine. Prevented by a plot of the Jews against his life from taking ship at Corinth for Syria, Paul went round by way of Philippi (where he spent Passover) and Troas (Ac 20[5-6]). His voyage thence and arrival at Jerusalem are fully described by St. Luke (Ac 20. 21), now St. Paul's companion once more. (On this journey see Ramsay's St. Paul the Trav. xiii.). St. Paul's reception by St. James and the Church of Jerusalem signalizes his victory over the legalists.

The Ep. to the Romans sums up the development of St. Paul's work and thought at this central epoch. The struggle with the Judaistic reaction which he has just passed through, was in effect a rehearsal of the internal conflict that issued in the conversion of Saul the Pharisee and his call to the apostleship of the Gentiles. He saw his converts in Galatia and Corinth, and those who 'had been delivered' to the same 'form of teaching' in Rome (6[17] 16[17. 18]), in danger of being reduced to the very bondage from which he had himself been rescued by the signal intervention of Jesus Christ (Ro 7[24]–8[4], Gal 2[4.5] 4[31]–5[4]). The Ep. to the Galatians is a vehement apologetic reassertion, and the Ep. to the Romans a luminous and methodical exposition, of 'the truth of the gospel' in which Paul's experience of twenty years, as a converted Christian man and an evangelist to Jews and Gentiles, was comprised. It is here unfolded in its mature expression, the form into which it was wrought by dint of use and conflict and through profound and intense reflexion, embracing in its compass the whole course of sin and redemption, and the relations of Israel and of mankind to God viewed in their largest aspects. Such a treatise and manifesto it was fitting for the apostle to send to Rome—addressing himself 'urbi et orbi,' and with an eye probably to other readers besides those of the lowly Christian Church he expected to visit there. Fronting the imperial city, Paul rises to a higher stature and assumes a loftier accent. The added stateliness of diction and amplitude of treatment betray an imagination, and a statesmanlike sense, touched by the majesty of Rome. Standing at Corinth, with the east behind him and a line of churches, now securely established, studding the road to Jerusalem, and with new fields before his sight stretching westwards to Spain (Ro 15[17-29]), the apostle pauses to review his progress and to give account of his mission and his doctrine that have been subject to so fierce a challenge. At the same time there is present to his mind the contingency that his voyage to Jerus. may have a fatal end, and that the Ep. he is now writing may prove to be his legacy rather than his introduction to the Roman Church (15[30-33]; see Hort, Prolegomena to Romans and Ephesians, pp. 42–50). The situation, while it explains the critical importance and representative character of the Ep. to the Romans, accounts also for its limitations. This writing is retrospective; it is the consummation of the legalistic controversy, and of Paul's missionary course 'from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum': it is no more than this. The apostle's life was to open into a new period fraught with other conflicts; changed surroundings and demands will turn his thoughts in directions as yet unforeseen; and the later groups of Epp. contain developments and applications of doctrine that are implicit, rather than realized, in the series of writings which concludes with the grand Ep. to the Romans.

The apostle to the Gentiles now stands at the summit of his career. During the third missionary tour he has founded the prosperous Asian Churches; he has written his four great Epp. and repelled the Judaistic invasion of Gentile Christianity, while he has preserved peace with the mother Church in Judæa. But these hardly-won successes engendered for the soldier of Christ new perils and conflicts.

(e) Fifth Period.—Under many omens and forebodings of danger St. Paul travelled to Jerusalem. Though he was 'gladly received' by 'the brethren' there, the language of Ac 21[20ff.] shows that the mass of Jewish believers were alienated from him. At St. James' suggestion he took the occasion of publicly conforming to Mosaic practice, becoming 'to the Jews as a Jew' in the same conciliatory spirit in which he wrote the Ep. to the Romans. But this did not propitiate Jewish hostility. The Asian Jews at the feast, who would have murdered Paul in the temple but for the Roman guard, denounced him as the universal enemy of Judaism (Ac 21[27-36]). Through all the regions where he had laboured he was now a marked man in the eyes of his compatriots, the apostate, the waster of Israel, the profaner of its holy things.

To this furious hatred Paul owed his four years' imprisonment and the long suspension of his missionary work. His addresses of defence—(1) before the people from the temple steps, Ac 22; (2) before the Sanhedrin, 23; (3) before the procurator Felix, 24; (4) his appeal to Cæsar before the procurator Festus, 25; (5) his apology before Herod Agrippa II. at the court of Festus, 26—enable us to follow the course of the proceedings against him. The Roman judges saw that Paul was innocent of civil crime, but that the Jews, whose fanatical violence they feared to provoke, were bent on his destruction. As a Roman citizen, he must not be sacrificed to the Jews; his detention seemed the safest course; and Felix in the first instance had hoped that a bribe would be offered for his release (24[26]). A vision, on the first night of his imprisonment (23[11]), encouraged Paul's long-cherished hope of 'seeing Rome' (19[21]); and when the change of governors at Cæsarea led to a renewal of the abortive local trials, Paul determined to accomplish that purpose by the words Appellr

Cæsarem. This course involved the appellant in heavy expense; it is unlikely that Paul taxed the Churches for personal ends; and Ramsay finds here, and in other circumstances of his imprisonment, reason to think that the apostle at this time was in command of considerable private means, and had entered into his patrimony (St. Paul the Trav. xiii. 8).

The voyage to Rome, with its shipwreck and winter detention in Melita (Malta), related in Ac 27 and 28 with vividness and accuracy, exhibits Paul's practical and manly qualities to great advantage, his singular personal ascendency and strong good sense. He was received cordially by the Church at Rome. The Jewish leaders profess to know nothing of his case: his appeal must have taken the rulers at Jerus. by surprise, and they had failed during the winter to advertise their brethren at Rome of the matter. Paul preaches to them with the same result as at Pisidian Antioch, Thessalonica, and Corinth (28[17-28]). The narrative of Acts leaves him at Rome, 'remaining in his own hired lodging,' in libera custodia, allowed to 'receive all that came to visit him, preaching the kingdom of God and teaching the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ with all freedom, unhindered.' The government at Rome took the same view of Paul as Gallio and Festus: he was a man politically harmless, but the cause of troublesome ferments amongst the Jews, and therefore well out of the way. His trial was allowed to linger. King Agrippa may have joined with Festus in making favourable representations of the prisoner's character; and the report of the centurion Julius probably helped him with the military officer (the Princeps Peregrinorum, St. Paul the Trav. p. 348) in whose charge he was placed.

The fact that the account of St. Luke, written a considerable time after the events, concludes with the words above quoted, raises a decided presumption against this trial having issued in the apostle's condemnation and death. The indications of Ac 21-28 (going to show that no capital charge was forthcoming against Paul), and the expectations of the Epp. of the captivity (Philem [22], Ph 1[24-26] 2[24]), point the other way. If Paul had remained in Rome till the summer of 64, he would doubtless have fallen a victim to the Neronian persecution; and this many critics have supposed. Chronological inquiry, however, makes it more and more certain that the 'two years' of Ac 28[30] terminated before this epoch—in 63 A.D. at the latest.

The two years (Ac 24[23-27]) of Paul's residence in Cæsarea, but for the speeches of defence, are almost a blank for us. He was granted such alleviations as a strict confinement allowed, and private friends had access to him; but public work was impossible. The apostle, doubtless, communicated by messenger and letter with his Churches; and the extant Epp. to Philemon, the Colossians, and Ephesians are dated by some leading critics—even Philippians (very improbably), by one or two—from the Cæsarean captivity. The weight of opinion inclines to the Roman origin of all four (see artt. on these Epp.). At Rome Paul enjoyed greater freedom, and exercised a notable public influence. His misfortunes 'have resulted in the progress rather [than hindrance] of the gospel' (Ph 1[12]). His trial has given him the opportunity of representing Christ before 'the prætorium' (the emperor's court of justice, v.[13]: cf. 2 Ti 4[16, 17]; and see St. Paul the Trav. p. 357), and Christianity has penetrated the palace (4[22]). St. Paul's courage under his trials has stimulated the Roman Church generally to greater boldness; even the ill-disposed (legalist) minority, which existed at Rome (cf. 3[2, 3]), has been provoked by jealousy to exertions which, since they served to spread the name of Christ, caused to Paul added joy (1[15-18]). From Col 4[10, 11] it appears that Paul could name only three Jewish Christians at Rome who were heartily on his side; and two of these were helpers from a distance (cf. Ph 2[20, 21]). Notwithstanding certain notes of depression and the sense of weariness and age (Ph 1[23], Philem [9]—but see Lightfoot, ad loc.), these Epp. breathe a tranqui and elevated joy. Compared with the letters of the third journey, those of the Roman captivity are more inward and chastened in spirit. Solitude, restraint, and advancing years have told on the heroic missionary. There is less passion, less vivacity, less exuberant strength of thought; but more uniform tenderness, a richer fragrance of devotion, and a quiet insight that reaches to the depths of the things of life and of God. The letter to Philemon, moreover, shows a genial and playful humour refreshing in a man of St. Paul's stern intensity. These are well styled the after noon Epp., as the writings of the Judaic controversy are the noonday Epistles of Paul.

COLOSSIANS signalizes the rise of a new antagonism in the Church, of which Paul was to see but the beginnings. His address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Ac 20[17-35]) reveals his presentiment of the rise of heresy in the province of Asia, and strikes the keynote of his later ministry. The missionary and the controversialist now becomes above all the pastor, devoting himself to 'feed the Church of God, which he purchased through the blood [of] his own [Son]' (Ac 20[28]; see critical note of WH). The greatness of the Church and the Divine glory of Christ fill Paul's prison meditations. Epaphras reports to him the attempt of some speculative teacher visiting Colossæ to amalgamate the gospel with Alexandrian theosophy, by ranging Christ amongst angelic mediators, and by prescribing Jewish ritual and ascetic regimen as means of salvation. This report elicits the great Christological deliverance of Col 1[14-23]. The larger representation of the sovereignty of Christ here made gives completeness to St. Paul's system of thought, bringing the entire sum of things within its compass. The Lordship of the crucified and risen Saviour is based upon the universal Lordship of the Son of God; our redemption springs out of the ground of creation itself, and the new creation is evolved from the hidden root and rationale of the old. The Head of the Church is the centre of the universe, the depositary of 'all the fulness of the Godhead,' who 'fills all things,' above and beneath, with His plenitude and 'gathers all things into one' (Eph 1[10, 18-23] 4[7-10], Col 2[9, 10]). In Galatians and Romans the thought of salvation by Christ broke through Jewish limits and covered the field of humanity; in Colossians and Ephesians the idea of life in Christ overleaps time and human existence, and subjects the entire cosmos to its sway. Ph 2[6-11] puts the top-stone on the apostle's doctrine of the person of Christ, and therefore upon all his doctrine.

The movement of thought which completed Paul's Christological teaching gave a parallel expansion to his idea of the Church, which attains at this epoch its full dimensions. The philosophical Judaism of Colossæ, like the legal Judaism of Galatia, bred caste-feeling and schism,—evils to be corrected only by a right sense of the greatness of the Christian society and the sacredness of its fellowship, such as the apostle conveys in the Epistles of this period.

Rome was the very spot to stimulate thoughts of this nature, and to bring to its final shape St. Paul's conception of Christ's imperial dominion. The ampler prospect, both in time and space, which now opens out for the Church under his eyes, accounts also for the attention given in the prison Epistles to family and social relations, and for their fuller and more balanced ethical teaching.

These years of martyrdom drew to the apostle the reverence of the whole Church. He no longer spends a word on his own defence. We mark in the prison Epistles a calm sense of authority, a strong assurance, blended with the deepest humility, of the perpetuity of his work and its universal import, such as are but partially to be observed in the Ep. to the Romans. As Nero's prisoner at Rome and Christ's bondman for the Gentiles, St. Paul rose to the full unassailable height of his doctrine and his vocation.

(f) From the conclusion of the Acts we infer that Paul was released, and his ministry extended to a sixth period. The Pastoral Epp. require this by their altered style and the changed doctrinal and ecclesiastical situation they present, by their references to person and place, and by the impossibility of inserting them within the scheme furnished by the Acts. If genuine (see the Articles on 1 and 2 TIMOTHY and TITUS), they are later than Ac 28^{31}; and even if not from Paul's hand, they indicate the existence of a strong and detailed post-apostolic tradition relating to a missionary activity of Paul outside the scope of the Acts, and recording an imprisonment in Rome quite distinct from that disclosed in the third group of the Epistles. Most scholars who reject the Pastorals admit a Pauline nucleus in them, including the personal and local references of 2 Ti and Tit; and these enable us to trace, though imperfectly, Paul's movements in the last years of his ministry. To these slight but valuable data we may add what may be conjectured from the apostle's intentions signified in earlier letters.

Approaching the end of the first Roman imprisonment, Paul expected speedily to see his friends in Colossæ and Philippi (Philem ^{22} and Ph 1^{26} 2^{24}). His first business would be, especially after so long separation, to revisit his Churches extending from Greece to Syria—a duty demanding considerable time. Paul had set his heart years ago on evangelizing Spain (Ro 15^{28}); in the words of Clement, written a generation later, we have good evidence that this wish was realized: 'Paul having been a herald both in the east and in the west, received the high glory of his faith. When he had taught righteousness to the whole world, and had come to the limit of the west, and borne witness before the rulers, he so departed from the world and went to the holy place' (1 Ep. 5). 'The limit of the west,' in a Roman writer, can hardly mean Rome. The Muratorian Fragment, representing the oldest Roman traditions, is explicit to the same effect, and is supported by the oldest Acta Apocrypha; and the Ὑπόμνημα of Symeon Metaphrastes, traced by Lipsius and others to a 2nd cent. source, gives details of the Spanish mission. [On the whole subject see the discussion of Spitta, Urchristenthum, Bd. i., Die zweimal. röm. Gefangenschaft d. Paulus]. The judgment of Credner is borne out by subsequent inquiry, that 'there cannot be found during the first four centuries a trace of the assumption that Paul did not travel westwards beyond Rome, or that his life ended at the point where the Acts of the Apostles concludes.' But this controversy is not likely to be closed, unless further and decisive evidence should present itself.

The references of the PASTORAL EPISTLES belong to Paul's last journeyings in the East, antecedent to his renewed imprisonment and subsequent to the (assumed) Spanish voyage. The three letters touch at various points and are closely consecutive. He writes his last Ep. (2 Ti) from prison with winter in prospect, when the first stage of his trial is past and he has already pleaded once at the bar of the emperor. It will be some time before the trial ends, and he needs the cloak left at Troas when he last passed through that port, along with some valued books; but he craves above all the company of Timothy. His helpers have been sent off, probably at the time of his arrest, on various missions; Luke is his single companion; at his public trial he was absolutely alone ($4^{9\text{-}21}$). Quite otherwise than on his former trial, he counts upon his condemnation and death (vv.$^{6\text{-}8.\ 18}$). He had been, as it seems, at Troas earlier in the year, and probably at Miletus and Corinth (4^{20}) upon the same round of visitation (following upon his return from Spain?). Now 1 Ti dates, apparently, from Macedonia (1^{3}), whither Paul has journeyed after meeting with Timothy, to whom in this Ep. he gives further instructions for his charge at Ephesus. Miletus and Troas lie along the line of travel terminating at Corinth. Ac 20^{25} records a prediction of Paul that he would not see the Ephesian Church again; and the language of 1 Ti 1^{3} (see von Hofmann ad loc.), in view, moreover, of the detailed directions of this Ep. respecting Church affairs, indicates that Paul had not himself been present in Ephesus, but had held an interview with Timothy (say at Miletus; cf. Ac 20^{17}) in passing on his way north (see Appendix to Eng. ed. of Sabatier's Ap. Paul, pp. 366–368). Paul appears to have travelled on from Macedonia to Corinth, and to have written to Titus (in Crete) about the time of his arrival there, when he was expecting to spend the next winter in the port of Nicopolis opposite to Italy (Tit 3^{12}); shortly after this he was arrested and carried as a prisoner to Rome. On this construction, the details of time and place given in the Pastorals fit together and belong to a consistent whole. Previously to the journey from Miletus to Corinth just traced, Paul and Titus had made a tour in Crete, the latter remaining behind to organize the Cretan Churches (Tit 1^{5}). Paul had wished Titus to join him at Nicopolis, purposing to send a substitute (3^{12}). Possibly Paul had landed at Crete in returning from Spain; certainly the voyage of Ac 27 gave no opportunity for evangelizing the island.

The letters to Timothy and Titus are writings of Paul's old age. They bear a conservative stamp. 'Guard the deposit; hold fast the form of sound words': this is their predominant note. Sound doctrine and practical piety are the interests in which they centre. St. Paul's great creative days are over. His battles are fought, his course is run. The completing touches remain to be added, and his final seal set to the work and teaching of his life: such is the purpose these letters serve. The instructions respecting church order given in 1 Ti are much fuller than anything of the kind in previous letters; but this was a time of rapid development, and the Ephesian Church was now of twelve years' standing. His directions to Titus at Crete are notably simpler. These are the only pieces of this nature that we have from Paul—letters of instruction to his assistants on church management; they show the administrative wisdom, the love of order, and the eye for practical detail, of the great church-founder and pastor. Colossians and Ephesians have prepared us for the emphasis which Paul now throws on all that belongs to the life of the Christian community. We pass from the thought of the 'great house' to that of its 'vessels' of service, their qualities and uses (2 Ti 2^{20}). The Pastorals carry on the combat commenced in those earlier Epp. against incipient Gnosticism, with its false intellectualism and uncertain morality, its jumble of philosophy and Jewish fables, its destructive influence upon church life. St. Paul's last cares are directed to guard the gospel he had so amply set forth, and to fence the fold into which he had led such a multitude of souls. If these documents do not come, in their integrity, from Paul's own hand, they are written by a disciple who has interpreted his mind and caught his spirit and manner and applied his ideas to a new situation (see v. Soden's Einleitung zu Pastt. vii., in 'Handcommentar z. NT,' III.), with astonishing verisimilitude; and the nearer to Paul it is found necessary to place the Past. Epp. in personal connexion and derivation of thought, the more improbable—and the more superfluous—does the theory of personation become.

The words of 2 Ti 4[6-8] are exquisitely fitting as St. Paul's dying testimony. They are the final pronouncement of Christ's faithful servant on his own career, crowned already in the witness of his conscience with the earnest of the crown awaiting him from the hand of his Lord. Paul died by beheading—so the credible Roman tradition relates—at a spot 3 miles from Rome along the Ostian Way, anciently called Aquæ Salviæ and now Tre Fontane. Near to the place of execution stands the splendid Basilica Pauli, first founded by the emperor Constantine in his honour. But the universal Church is his monument.

5. Chronology of St. Paul's Life.—Luke supplies no such point d'appui for the chronology of his Second Book as that furnished in ch. 3[1. 2] of his Gospel. Only one of the many points of contact with secular history in the Acts gives an indisputable datum, viz. the death of Herod Agrippa I. at Cæsarea (see Ac 12[1-4. 19-23], and Jos. Ant. XIX. viii.), which happened not long after Easter 44 A.D., and followed upon his persecution of the Church at Jerusalem. The famine that occasioned the visit of relief made by Barnabas and Paul from Antioch, synchronized with Herod's death (Ac 11[27]–12[1. 20. 25]); but it appears to have lasted several years. If (with Ramsay) we could identify with this mission of charity the visit of Paul to Jerus. related in Gal 2[1] (see on this point p. 705[b], above), we should then easily fix the chronology of his earlier Christian course. Taking 45 or 46 (so Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. ch. iii.) for the date of the Judæan famine, the '14 years' of Gal 2[1], upon this calculation, bring us back to 33 (or 32) A.D. as the year of Paul's conversion, 33–35 being the '3 years' subsequent (included in the above-mentioned 14) alluded to in Gal 1[18], 44 (or 45) the year of his summons to help Barnabas at Antioch, 10 years being thus assigned to Paul's unrecorded labours in Cilicia.

The above scheme is open to the following amongst other objections:—(1) It throws back the stoning of Stephen and the judicial proceedings of the high priest against the Christians (Ac 8[1-4] 9[1. 2] 11[19])—events antecedent to St. Paul's conversion—to the year 33 at the latest, when Pilate was still in the vigour of his rule. We may infer from St. Luke's silence, since he carefully informs us on such points in other places, that the Judæan persecution was unhindered by the Roman Government: this we can understand as happening in the interval after Pilate's deposition, which took place in the autumn of A.D. 36 (when he was suspended by L. Vitellius the prefect of Syria and sent for trial to Rome), or in the period immediately preceding, when, under fear of accusation, Pilate's control of the Jewish authorities was probably relaxed. (2) If St. Paul's conversion took place in 32 or 33, then Aretas must have been in peaceful possession of Damascus so early as the year 35 (2 Co 11[32. 33], Gal 1[18], Ac 9[23-26]). This is unlikely. Aretas was at war with Herod Antipas (who had divorced his daughter in favour of Herodias) for some years before the deposition of the latter in A.D. 37, and inflicted on him a severe defeat (Jos. Ant. XVIII. v. 1, 2); but this success could not give him possession of Damascus, in Roman Syria. The emperor Tiberius took the side of Antipas in the quarrel, and under his command Vitellius was at Jerus. at the Pentecost of A.D. 37 on his way to attack Aretas in Petra, when the campaign was arrested by tidings of Tiberius' death. The new emperor Caius reversed much of the policy of Tiberius in the East. Antipas fell into disgrace and was deposed, his rival Agrippa being released from prison and made king; and Aretas is found in possession of the coveted city of Damascus after this time. In all probability, it was ceded by Caius Caligula (see Lewin in Life and Epp. of St. Paul[5], i. 67, 68; also Schürer, HJP I. ii. 354, 357). The years 36–38 supply the political situation at Jerus. and Damascus, under which this train of events—including the execution of Stephen, the overt and systematic attempt of the Jewish rulers to crush the sect of the Nazarenes, and the circumstances attending the flight of Saul from Damascus—is historically intelligible.

For the later period of St. Paul's life Ramsay finds a datum in the marks of time given in Ac 20[6. 7]: from these it is clear that Paul left Troas on his last voyage to Jerus. on a Monday morning, while he had left Philippi for Troas immediately the Passover feast was ended; and the number of intervening days is continuously stated. Given these conditions, the problem is to find the year in which the Jewish Passover so fell as to make them possible. Lewin (Fasti Sacri, Nos. 1856, 1857) and Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. xiii. 3, Expositor, v. iii. 336, v. 201) have separately worked out this problem, Lewin giving 58 and Ramsay 57 A.D. as the solution. Ramsay's calculation appears to be sound, granting that St. Luke's data are precise.

Assuming 57 to be the year of St. Paul's last voyage to Jerus. and his consequent arrest and imprisonment in Cæsarea, we get the date 59 for Felix' removal and the succession of Festus to the procuratorship, for Paul's appeal to Cæsar and his autumn voyage to Melita, with 60–62 for the term of his first imprisonment in Rome. Five years then remain—a period none too long—for the last stage of his life, including the revisitation of his eastern Churches, the long-deferred mission to Spain, the mission in Crete, and the subsequent extended tour in Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Achaia witnessed to by the Pastoral Epp., and for the months of his second imprisonment and trial. 67 A.D., falling just within the reign of Nero, is the date for St. Paul's martyrdom which best accords with Roman tradition and the Chronikon of Eusebius: here tradition should be at its strongest.

Counting backwards from A.D. 57, we get 53 as the date of St. Paul's arrival at Ephesus in the early part of the third missionary tour, and 49–52 as the probable term of the tour of Paul and Silas; the first journey (sc. of Barnabas and Paul) lay between 46 and 49 A.D. The Council at Jerus. (Ac 15 and Gal 2) then falls in the year 49, i.e. 13 years—in Luke's inclusive reckoning (by years current), 14 years—after Paul's conversion (Gal 2[1]), assuming, as we have done provisionally, 36 as the date of his conversion. If the three years of Gal 1[18] be not included in the 14 of 2[1], we must carry back Paul's conversion to 33 or 34 A.D.; but the difficulties previously noted seem to forbid this supposition. Supposing him to have been 30 at the time of Stephen's stoning,—'a young man,' but competent, according to Jewish practice, for public office,—then he was born c. 6 A.D., and was not much beyond 60 at the time of his death. He may have been older, but scarcely younger than this. He calls himself 'such an one as Paul the aged,' when writing to Philemon (v [9]: according to the more probable interpretation of πρεσβύτης) about the year 61.

A. Harnack in his great work, Chronologie d. altchristl. Litteratur bis Eusebius (Band 1, 'Chronologie d. Paulus,' pp. 234–239), disposes Paul's Christian career between 30 and 64 A.D. He thus finds all the Epp. written (except the rejected Pastorals) by the year 59, when Paul was acquitted at Rome. In this way Harnack makes room for St. Paul's release from the first Roman captivity, and for the mission to Spain, before the Neronian persecution. He refers the Council of Ac 15 and Gal 2 (in his view identical) to the year 47, so reckoned as 14+3 years (Gal 2^1 and 1^{18}) after the conversion. The 'few months' which Harnack allows at the beginning for the progress of events sketched in Ac 1–9 will not easily be accepted as sufficient; at the other end, Harnack rejects the authority of Eusebius' Chronikon for the date of St. Paul's death, though he builds upon it confidently for the time of Festus' accession to the procuratorship (55–56), which supplies the pivot of his scheme. Schürer, however, following Anger, Wieseler, and Wurm amongst earlier investigators, shows strong reasons (not shaken by Harnack) for abiding by the conclusion generally accepted hitherto, that Eusebius was mistaken in this particular, and that Felix remained governor for some years after the disgrace of his brother Pallas at Rome in 55. Schürer prefers 60 A.D. for the date of Felix' recall, but admits (after Wurm) that the conditions of the case allow of any year from 58 to 61 (see his HJP I. ii. 174–187; also Ramsay v. Harnack in Expositor, V. v. 201). On the calculation here adopted, Festus succeeded Felix in the year 59, and St. Paul appeared before the latter in A.D. 57. This allows 7 years for Felix' procuratorship, and 3 for Festus'—periods adequate to the events assigned to each by Josephus. The 'many years' of rule credited to Felix in Ac 24^{10} must surely have meant more than the two (before Paul's trial) allowed in Harnack's chronology. Felix became procurator in A.D. 52 (Schürer, as above, p. 174).

On the whole subject see art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, with which the conclusions here reached largely agree.

ii. THE DOCTRINE.—The Apostle Paul's writings (the Ep. to the Romans like the rest) are occasional letters, pièces de circonstance. He was a missionary preacher, who brought everything to bear on his work in the salvation of souls and the edification of the Church. But from the make of his mind St. Paul's thinkings and teachings took a logical mould; they grew spontaneously into a great fabric of spiritual truth. There is unity, method, rational coherence in the theology of the apostle, notwithstanding its incidental and homiletic form, the unity that belongs, not to a compendium drawn up for abstract study, but to the conceptions of an orderly mind possessed by a single master-principle of truth and striving incessantly to apprehend and realize in life and action 'that for which' it 'was apprehended by Christ Jesus.' We must ascertain the point of departure of Paul's Christian logic, and take account of the growth and advancement evident in his system of thought as in every living structure. We must allow for his rare versatility and lively susceptibility of temperament, for the love of paradox natural to his bold intellect, as well as for the variety of topics in his letters, for the discordant and variously blended elements with which they deal and which coloured their composition. Recognizing the 'changes of voice' thus occasioned, we discover harmony and correlation throughout the 13 writings that bear Paul's name. The same accent is heard; the stamp of the same powerful idiosyncrasy is set on them all, though not with equal emphasis of distinction. Embedded in these discursive missionary letters, with their abrupt transitions, their glancing allusions, their shifting play of emotion and argument, there is a body of solid principle, a theological system, as large and original in conception as it has proved enduring and fruitful in application.

The fertility of the apostle's genius, and the numerous and tempting points of view which the documents afford, render the analysis of his teaching difficult. Theologians differ widely, even within the same school, as to the order and interdependence of the Pauline ideas. The old mode of analysis, which applied the ready-made categories of scholastic theology to the various books of Scripture and catalogued their texts under these headings, is discredited. The dogmatic point of view is exchanged for the historical and psychological. We have been taught to interpret St. Paul's teaching in the light of his times and under the conditions of his life. The various types of NT doctrine are distinguished, and the lines of connexion, sympathetic or antipathetic, are traced out by which Pauline theology is related to earlier or contemporary thought. But here a new danger arises. The prepossessions of historical theory may be equally warping with those of dogmatic system; the focus of the picture may be displaced and its colours falsified by philosophical no less than by ecclesiastical spectacles.

Modern Analyses.—With F. C. Baur of Tübingen, 'Paul' stood for the antithesis to the Judaic legalism in which it was supposed that the first disciples of Jesus were held fast. The Paulinism so conceived Baur found in the four major Epp., rejecting, as the work of imitators touched by other influences, everything that was not covered by this formula. Baur set out from the true Lutheran standpoint. St. Paul's doctrine he conceived as a system of experimental religion, deducing it from the apostle's conversion, of which, however, he took too narrow and cold a view. Saul of Tarsus underwent a complete reaction from the Pharisaism of his youth, and his subsequent career Baur explained by that revulsion. Developing this antithesis with subtlety and clearness, and with unrivalled historical learning, Baur gave a powerful restatement in modern terms of the Pauline principle of justification by faith and drew out its doctrinal consequences. This master of historical criticism has left us in his great book on Paul, his Life and Work, an invaluable testimony to the historical truth and cardinal significance of St. Paul's 'gospel of the grace of God.'

Later writers of Baur's school, such as H. J. Holtzmann and O. Pfleiderer, acknowledge the genuineness of other Epp. besides the major four—of 1 Thess., Phil., and Philemon at least. They feel the inadequacy of Baur's negative explanation of St. Paul's line of thought. The Gentile mission and its astonishing success involve other factors than those of which their master took account. Paul was something more than an inverted Jewish Rabbi; the uncontested Epp. contain ideas looking beyond the anti-Judæan polemic. 'To the Greeks' he became 'as a Greek.' Hellenism had its part in moulding Saul of Tarsus along with Hebraism (see Hicks, 'St. Paul and Hellenism,' Stud. Bibl. IV. i.); and certain prevalent Greek ideas, it is suggested, had entered his mind and set up a hidden ferment, so that the Jewish zealot carried under his Rabbinical cloak and orthodox straitness the germs of the revolution he was destined to accomplish. Pfleiderer writes accordingly of 'a double root' of Paulinism in 'Pharisaic theology and Hellenistic theosophy,' of two sides presented by the apostle's teaching—'a Christianized Pharisaism' embodied in the doctrine of justification by faith, and 'a Christianized Hellenism' in the doctrine of salvation by the risen, celestial Christ and the operation of the Holy Spirit (Urchristenthum, Vorwort, and pp. 174–178: in this work, and in his Paulinismus[2], 1890, Pfleiderer has recast the exposition presented in the original Paulinism, Eng. tr. 1878, and the Hibb. Lect. of 1885). The theories ascribing to Greek thought a radical influence on Pauline theology do not, however, commend themselves. 'Notwithstanding Paul's Greek culture, his conception of Christianity is, in its deepest ground, independent of Hellenism'—as Harnack rightly says, and again: 'The Pauline theology, this theology of a converted Pharisee, is the strongest proof of the self-complete and universal power of the influence of the person of Jesus.'

The inconsistency disclosing itself in Baur's position has led to the division of his following into two wings—right and left. The former, of which Holtzmann (in the successive editions of his Einleitung), Harnack, Lipsius, von Soden (in the 'Handcommentar z. NT'), and Jülicher (Einleit. in d. NT), are representatives, have approximated towards the conservative position in regard to the Pauline documents. The ultra-Baurians,—consisting of the Dutch school of radical critics, headed by Loman, Pierson, Naber, and van Manen, with the Germans Steck and Völter,—applying Baur's method with uncompromising rigour, find that large parts of the 'undisputed' Epp. are post-Pauline, and that mere morsels survive of the genuine apostle. See a series of articles entitled 'A Wave of Hyper-criticism,' in which van Manen states and defends his position, in the Expos. Times, 1898, pp. 205 ff., 257 ff., 314 ff.

The French theologians E. Reuss and A. Sabatier have better apprehended the personal stamp of St. Paul's theology, its vital relations to experience and society. 'The doctrine of Paul,' says Reuss, 'is the natural corollary of his history. The life of Paul is the key to his theology; the life of the Christian will be its demonstration' (Hist. de la Théol. au Siècle Apostol.[3] tome ii. p. 15, Eng. tr. 1873: a work far from superseded). Paul's Christianity was no combination of Jewish and Greek elements imposed from without; it was born out of the inward travail by which Christ was formed in him. Not that the Pauline gospel leaped full-grown and armed from the author's mind at Christ's lightning stroke. But it was born at his conversion, in its essential elements and features and with all its latent potencies. St. Paul's OT knowledge and training, his striving after legal righteousness and his poignant convictions of sin, his Rabbinical culture, his large acquaintance with the Gentile world, constituted the material to which the revelation of the living Jesus supplied the magnetic centre around which that troubled world of thought and feeling crystallized as in a moment. 'From the moment that Paul was arrested by the risen Lord on the way to Damascus and surrendered himself to Him, his whole soul was thrown wide open to His influence, to receive impressions that resulted in the communication to him of what was most distinctive in the personal life of his Master, and in the forming within him of an experience with features of its own, that in its turn shed light on the nature of the Heavenly Being with whom he had been brought into so intimate a fellowship' (Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, p. 33).

The revelation that generated the Pauline gospel may be conceived, objectively, as a manifesting of Christ to the soul of Paul; or, subjectively, as the imparting of salvation through Christ. Reuss adopts the latter point of view, and finds the focus of St. Paul's doctrine, therefore, in Ro 3^{21-24} and the principle of righteousness through faith. The topics of his digest of Paulinism run thus: Righteousness, Sin, the Law, the Gospel, God the Author of Salvation, Christ—His Person and His Work, and so forth. Sabatier puts himself at the former standpoint: 'The Person of Christ is the principle of the Christian consciousness' (The Ap. Paul, pp. 280–285); and in the text, 'It pleased God to reveal his Son in me' (Gal $1^{15.16}$), he sees 'the germ of Paulinism' (p. 71). Baur practically took the former position, making the fundamental question to be, not what Jesus Christ is, but what He does for men. Sabatier's analysis, however, is scarcely true to its 'generating principle,' since it relegates the Person of Christ to its third, metaphysical, division. His synopsis does not observe the original lines of cleavage and connexion as marked in his historical analysis, nor lay bare the real articulation of the system, but is rather a modern philosophical digest of Paulinism. He traces the unfolding of 'the Principle of the Christian Consciousness' (1) in the sphere of Psychology—the doctrine of Man, embracing Sin, the Flesh, the Law, Death on the one hand, and Righteousness, the Word of the Cross, Faith, Life on the other; (2) the Christian Principle in the sphere of Society and History—the doctrine of the Church, with the Two Covenants, the First and Second Adam, the End of all Things, Faith, Hope, and Love; (3) the Christian Principle in the sphere of Metaphysics, or Theology proper—the doctrine of Grace, the Divine Purpose, the Nature of Christ, the Trinity, the Conception of God (pp. 280, 281).

W. Beyschlag (NT Theology, Bk. iv.) pursues more consistently the path adopted by Sabatier. The chapters of his analysis of 'The Pauline System' are thus headed: Flesh and Spirit; Adam and Christ; God and the World; the Establishment of Salvation; Life in the Spirit; the Church; the Consummation of the Kingdom. Paulinism thus becomes a psychological evolution, with its generating point in the antithesis of Flesh and Spirit, and with Adam and Christ for its representative exponents. In such texts as Ro 8^{1-4} and 5^{12-21} Beyschlag finds the essence of Paulinism; he brings into prominence factors of importance too much neglected by other interpreters. With his anthropological starting-point, Beyschlag arrives in the end, however, at 'an anthropocentric Christology' (vol. ii. p. 76, Eng. tr.). He sees in St. Paul's Christ the archetypal man, the representative of the spiritual, as Adam of the natural, in humanity. Pfleiderer's analysis proceeds in a similar order: he holds a somewhat higher Christology than Beyschlag, regarding Paul's pre-incarnate Christ as a real heavenly man with a σῶμα πνευματικόν, existing in a Dei-form mode of being (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, Ph 2^{6}), and the administrative Lord of creation (Paulinismus[2], pp. 115–145); similarly Weizsäcker (Apost. Zeitalter[2], pp. 117–122).

A. B. Bruce in his masterly work, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, gathers the apostle's 'entire conception of Christianity' from 'the four great Epistles of the Judaic controversy,' and contests any further advancement in his doctrinal views. (B. Weiss, on the other hand, Bib. Theol. of NT, Part iii. § 3, finds in the Epp. of the imprisonment Paul's 'more developed doctrines'; similarly Hort in Proleg. to Rom. and Ephes. p. 123 ff., and The Christian Ecclesia, pp. 138–152). The Ep. to the Romans supplies Bruce with the scheme of Paulinism: 'in Gal 2^{14-21} we have the Pauline gospel in nuce' (p. 12). Hence his analysis begins with Sin, the Righteousness of God, the Death of Christ, and ends with chapters upon the Person of Christ, the Christian Life, the Church, the Last Things. He regards the apostle throughout as a practical, in distinction from a metaphysical, theologian: 'Jesus was for Paul the Lord, because He was the Saviour' (p. 328)—a statement to be reversed with equal or greater truth. Vital as the doctrines of salvation are to St. Paul, his belief in the Lordship of Jesus was anterior to them. What Christ did for men is accounted for by what He is to God. The Ep. to the Romans, the grand exposition of Paul's Soteriology, is the writing of one who was 'separated unto the gospel of God concerning his Son.' D. Somerville (St. Paul's Conception of Christ, or the Doctrine of the Second Adam) pursues, on the other hand, with much skill and persuasiveness, the line of Sabatier and Beyschlag, finding St. Paul's fundamental idea in Christ considered as 'the Archetype of Humanity,' but conserving His Divine pre-existence and 'Eternal Nature' as necessary deductions from, because presuppositions of, His sovereign and creative relations to mankind. With him, too, the Pauline system is anthropocentric; and the fact that it was the product of personal (human) experience, appears to him to make this inevitable. In Paul's 'Son of God' he sees a title that slopes upward from the human to the Divine.

OT Antecedents and Starting-Point. — The apostle's doctrine is theocentric, not in reality anthropocentric. What is styled his 'metaphysics' holds for Paul the immediate and sovereign fact of the universe; God, as he conceives Him, is all and in all to his reason and heart alike. So far the dogmatic analysis was right, in starting with the doctrine of God, and disposing under that the notions of law, righteousness, sin, which form the basis of St. Paul's Soteriology. This path of exposition is resumed in the very competent and judicious work of G. B. Stevens of Yale, The Pauline Theology. The vision of the glorified Jesus revealed to Saul the Son of God as his Saviour; but the God whose Son the crucified Jesus is seen to be, was now to be known in a far nearer and happier relation than before. No passage strikes more deeply into St. Paul's experience than 2 Co 4[4-6]: 'There beamed forth the illumination of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God . . . it is God who said, Out of darkness light shall shine, that shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of his glory in the face of Christ.' It was the God of Israel whose moral splendour dawned upon Saul's mind through the dazzling form of the Lord Jesus; 'God' was there 'in Christ, reconciling' Saul 'unto himself,' and the old things became new to him from that hour—'all things are of God' (2 Co 5[17-19]). A new conception of God was imparted to Saul, a new relationship to God established for him. Henceforth his life is 'hid with Christ in God.' St. Paul's Soteriology and Christology are rooted in his Theology.

A profound unity underlies the Judaic and Christian stages of St. Paul's life. The convert carried with him the Scriptures of his youth, which he read now with the veil lifted from his heart (2 Co 3[14-16]), finding in them everywhere testimonies, preparations, adumbrations of the things of the new covenant, the σκιὰ τῶν μελλόντων, the παιδαγωγὸς εἰς Χριστόν (Ro 3[21] 15[4], Gal 3[24], Col 2[16. 17], etc.). The Christian apostle blossomed out of the Israelitish believer and scholar. At times he speaks as though there had been no break in his career (2 Ti 1[3]). Instead of ceasing to be a Jew by becoming a Christian, Paul regarded himself as now properly belonging to the Israel of God (Ph 3[3]). Instead of severing himself from the stock of Abraham, he would graft the Gentiles into that 'good olive tree,' in whose 'root and fatness' is nourishment for all races; by their admission to the covenant, Abraham becomes, according to the promise, 'father of many nations' (Ro 4[16. 17] 11). It was for this reason that Paul laid stress on the Davidic birth of Jesus (Ro 1[3] 9[5], 2 Ti 2[8]),—not as a mere title to the Messianic throne, but as a link between the past and present of revelation and a symbol of the right of those who are 'in Christ to serve themselves heirs of the spiritual wealth of Israel.

1. St. Paul's Doctrine of God.—In systematizing the Pauline teaching, we therefore ask first, What was St. Paul's earlier belief in God? and how was that belief enlarged and recast by his conversion? When he speaks of 'the righteousness of God,' of 'holiness' and 'sin,' when he repeats the watchword 'God is one,' when he exclaims 'O the depth of the riches and the wisdom and knowledge of God!' we are sensible how large and powerfully developed a doctrine of the Godhead the apostle brought with him from the Synagogue. Such terms as 'the grace of God,' 'the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord,' as 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' indicate the immense change that supervened.

(a) The Fatherhood of God.—St. Paul's theology, like that of Jesus, is a doctrine of the Fatherhood of God; this principle is its tacit presupposition and basis throughout. A true disciple, Paul has assimilated in this fundamental article the essential teaching of our Lord. Ἀββὰ ὁ Πατήρ is the distinctive cry of the new life, taken from the lips of Jesus (Ro 8[15], Gal 4[6. 7], Mk 14[36]), which marks the transition from Judaism to Christianity. St. Paul's careful discrimination between 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' and 'God our Father,' with the expression 'firstborn amongst many brethren' (Ro 8[29]) that links the two, reflects the personal attitude of Jesus towards God and men respectively. To the character of Father belong the attributes of love, mercy, compassion, grace, the gifts of peace, consolation, hope, and joy, of which Saul the Judaist had known so little. The forensic term adoption must not be so understood as though Paul by its use implicitly denied man's original sonship towards God: see to the contrary Ac 17[28. 29]; also ἵνα τὴν υἱοθεσίαν ἀπολάβωμεν, Gal 4[5] (Lightf. ad loc.; 'nec dixit accipiamus sed recipiamus,' Aug.), and the ἀπο of ἀποκαταλλάσσω (Col 1[21. 22], Eph 2[16]). 'The love of God,' which precedes and determines our redemption (Ro 5[7. 8], Eph 2[3ff.]), is love toward those kindred to Himself and destined from their creation to be His sons (Eph 1[4. 5]).

Grace is the regnant word of Paul's theology. In this aspect he habitually sees God's face. The entire contents of the new revelation are included in the phrase τὰ ὑπὸ τ. θεοῦ χαρισθέντα ἡμῖν (1 Co 2[12]). 'Grace' signifies God's favour to undeserving men shown in Christ, His love at work for their salvation. 'The grace of God' had made His Son's persecutor His apostle (Ro 1[5], 1 Co 15[9. 10]); its light illuminated his whole course of action and of thought; his life and his theology were devoted to 'the praise of the glory of God's grace.' The all-controlling Divine power and providence, exercised over men and nations, the apostle saw to be directed to ends determined by God's fatherly love, even in dispensations the most severe (Ac 17[24-28], Ro 4[16] 11[15. 33], Gal 3[23]–4[7], Eph 1[4-11] 2[4-7. 13-18] 3[7-12]),—in a word, 'to the end that grace may reign through righteousness unto life eternal' (Ro 5[21]). See, further, under art. GRACE.

(b) The Righteousness of God is the special theme of the Ep. to the Romans. St. Paul's doctrine of God's righteousness shows the new faith rooting itself in and transforming the old. The δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ of Ro 1[16-18] should not be resolved into a 'righteousness from God' (Paul can write ἡ ἐκ θεου δικαιοσύνη when he chooses, Ph 3[9]). Righteousness is God's property (see art. GOD, vol. ii. pp. 209–212), the principle of His moral sovereignty, the ethical ground and norm of His dealings with men, and therefore of the gospel in which those dealings culminate. The Divine righteousness is now 'revealed' on a side hitherto veiled, as redeeming, communicative (2 Co 5^{21}),—a righteousness that elicits and appeals to human trust instead of fear; in this disclosure there resides 'God's power (an instrument of sovereign moral efficacy) unto salvation for every believer.' The gospel righteousness is that of 'God our Father,' the 'one God of Jews and Gentiles' (Ro $1^{4.7}$ 3^{21-30} 4^{25} and 6^{4} 5^{8-11}, 2 Co 5^{18}–6^{1}, etc.); not the abstract impersonal justice of a Supreme Ruler, but that of the essential Father, into whose relations with men there enter fundamentally the considerations attaching to fatherhood,—who is accordingly 'just himself' (cf. 1 Jn 1^{9}) when He 'justifies him that is of faith in Jesus'—a 'just God and a saviour' (Is 45^{21}), just because He is a saviour and a saviour because He is just. The gospel is equally 'the overflow of grace, and of righteousness' (Ro 5^{17}: omit 'the gift'). Love and law, however distinct, are not contradictory in God, any more than in man (Ro $13^{9.10}$). Righteousness takes grace into alliance; it wins from the heart 'the obedience of faith,' where before it wrought by mere command and in the ways of constraint. It is seen at length in its fulness and majesty, a 'stern lawgiver,' yet wearing 'the Godhead's most benignant grace.' 'The law' that breeds transgression and 'worketh wrath,' made righteousness the accuser of a world of hapless criminals; under the gospel righteousness becomes the arbiter and reconciler of the moral universe, giving its due to the sin of men but also to the love of God.

The Second Isaiah and the later Psalmists had arrived at the thought that the rectitude of God's character guarantees Israel's salvation, and must, in some way, impress and bestow itself upon Israel: thus 'righteousness' and 'salvation' become synonymous terms (Is $46^{12.13}$ 51^{4-8} 56^{1} 59^{16-21} $61^{10.11}$, Ps 22^{31} 89^{16} 98^{2} 143^{11}). Paul seizes and builds upon this identification, which was amply verified by the revelation of God made in Christ and the cross. This eternal righteousness—God Himself in moral action—swift to condemn its opposite, eager to impart itself to those capable of it but without it, 'made him who knew no sin to be sin for us, that we might become a righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5^{21}); in this righteousness the Father 'spared not his own Son, but for us all gave him up,'—purposing 'that we should be conformed to the image of his Son'—His own image humanly expressed—'to the end that he should be firstborn among many brethren.' Manifestly, any righteousness gained by this means is 'God's' and not 'one's own' (Ro 10^{3}, Ph 3^{9}); it comes only and wholly through 'believing on him that justifies the ungodly' (Ro 4^{5}). Cf. Sanday and Headlam on 'The Righteousness of God,' in Intern. Comm., Ro $1^{16.17}$. See, further, the two articles on RIGHTEOUSNESS.

(c) The anger of God is called forth wherever righteousness comes into contact with sin, blazing out against those who 'hold down the truth in unrighteousness' (Ro 1^{18}, 2 Th 2^{10-12}). Its effects are seen in widespread moral degradation (Ro 1^{18-32}), and in the ruin of particular men and nations (Ro $9^{17.22}$, 1 Th 2^{16}). Its final issue is 'destruction' for those who will not 'know God,' who persist in that 'carnal mind' which is 'enmity' to Him (Ro 1^{28} 2^{5-9} $8^{6.7}$, 1 Th $5^{3.9}$, 2 Th 1^{5-10}). God loves the ungodly as men (Ro 5^{8}, Eph $2^{4.5}$); as sinners they are His 'enemies,' and lie helplessly under 'the law' that 'works out wrath' (Ro 7^{22}–8^{2}). The knowledge of God's grace in Christ deepened the apostle's sense of the imminence and terribleness of His judicial anger (Ro 1^{16-18} 2^{16} 11^{22}, Ac $17^{30.31}$, 2 Co 2^{14-16}). See, further, art. ANGER.

(d) The Law of God.—Along with his conception of righteousness, St. Paul's conception of the law of God was greatly widened, and altered in several respects, by his knowledge of Christ. Here the Jewish and Christian stages of thought are distinctly marked; but the larger, evangelical view of Law is indicated rather than developed. Familiar usage, emphasized by the legalistic controversy, dictates the frequent and characteristic expressions in which law and faith, law and grace, law and promise, 'righteousness that is of law' and 'righteousness that is of God through faith,' stand opposed; and we actually have the paradox that 'apart from law a righteousness of God is manifested!' (Ro 3^{21-31}). This last sentence, with its context, gives clear evidence that Paul looked beyond the polemical antithesis; a righteousness 'distinct from law' must be a righteousness positing some higher, larger law than legalism had conceived of.

The range of Divine law is extended, as in Ro $2^{14.15.26.27}$; the moral code is found written on the conscience of mankind. When Paul writes, in Ro 5^{13} 'Sin is not imputed where there is no law,' he asserts law to be universal as sin and death, whose very connexion is a first article thereof (8^{2}). At the bottom, 'there is no distinction—all the world has become guilty (ὑπόδικος) in relation to God' (Ro 3^{19-23}); the Jew, if first in privilege, is first in condemnation (Ro 2^{1}–3^{2}). Jew and Gentile are equally lost if God's law knows nothing more than 'the command' of Mosaism, if His normal relation to men is that expressed in the covenant of Sinai with its maxim, 'He that doeth these things shall live in them.' In itself 'holy and righteous and good,' the law in effect 'was found to issue in death for me,' by its very prohibitions awakening and sharpening lawless desire (Ro 7^{7-24}); thus it proved to be 'the power of sin' (1 Co 15^{56}), whereas 'the gospel' is the 'power of God unto salvation.' Every man that is 'under the law' is 'under a curse'—the curse that was consummated on Calvary and is terminated for those who are in Christ (Gal 3^{10-14}).

St. Paul's experience and logic combined to work out to this deadly and comprehensive issue the juridical conception of law—true, of course, but fatally incomplete and bearing fruit in moral impotence and death; to it he had died in Christ (Ro 7^{1-6} 10^{4}, Gal 2^{19}). Paul had done with 'law' in the old sense, but in a new sense he is more true to law than ever: 'The law of the Spirit of life has in Christ Jesus freed' him 'from the law of sin and death'; he is neither ὑπὸ νόμον nor ἄνομος, but ἔννομος Χριστοῦ (Ro 6^{14} 8^{2}, 1 Co 9^{21}). Formerly the expression of the normal relation of Israel to God defined by the Mosaic covenant, law is now to be conceived as the normal relation of man to God determined by the new covenant in Christ, whose basis lay deeper than the old, for it was contained in the Abrahamic promise (Gal 3^{14-22}). 'The law of Christ,' embracing all the essentials of ethics, operates from the heart, as an inward principle not an external and alien 'command'; love is its fulfilment (Gal 5^{14} 6^{2}). It embraces faith and the action of the Holy Spirit as legitimate and decisive factors in God's dealings with His children; and the apostle speaks consistently of a 'law of faith' and 'the law of the Spirit of life.' These are no strained or casual expressions; the identification is profoundly characteristic. Nothing was more foreign to St. Paul's nature than Antinomianism A love at variance with righteousness, a faith resting upon no settled principle of the Divine government, neither his reason nor reverence could have tolerated. 'Do we make void law through our faith (in Christ)? Anything but that; nay, we establish law!' (Ro $3^{30.31}$). Paul combats Jewish legalism in the interests of a larger legality.

a juster righteousness, which lies deep in the heart of Scripture and in the nature of God. The same in its contents, the law takes quite another hold upon the conscience now that the Lawgiver is beheld as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. 'Love' becomes its 'fulfilling'—'faith operative through love' (Ro 13[10], Gal 5[6]): thus 'the righteous demand of the law is fulfilled in those that walk according to the Spirit,'—those 'in' whose 'hearts' 'God's love has been poured out through the Holy Spirit' (Ro 5[5] 8[4]). See, further, art. LAW (IN NT).

The manifestation of God in Christ makes repentance imperative, and determines its nature and direction. Of repentance (μετάνοια) Paul had much to say in his missionary preaching (Ac 13[24] 17[30] 20[21] 26[20]; comp. Ro 2[4]); in the Epp. it is implied in such terms as 'turning to God from idols,' 'coming to know God'; on the other hand, in 'dying to sin,' 'crucifying the flesh,' 'putting off the old man' (1 Th 1[9], Gal 4[9] 5[24], Ro 6[2. 19-21], Eph 4[22] 5[8-14], etc.). It is tacitly assumed as a condition precedent to justification and sanctification, which are inconceivable without the confession and renunciation of sin; it is indeed a constituent of saving faith.

Christian prayer corresponds to the character of the Christian God (Eph 3[14. 15]), in its confidence (παρρησία), intelligence, constancy, universal range, its accompaniment of thanksgiving (Eph 3[12], 1 Co 14[15], Col 4[2], 1 Th 5[17. 18], etc.), in its dependence on the mediation of Christ and on the sympathetic aid of the Holy Spirit (Eph 3[12], Ro 8[26. 27]); it is the prayer of sons to a Father.

2. Doctrine of Man.—Over against the apostle's conception of God lies his conception of Man—the individual and the race.

(a) The Constitution of Mankind.—The OT belief is Paul's, that man—the ἀνήρ more immediately—is the 'image and glory of God' (1 Co 11[7]). The Gentile consciousness is witness to the fact that 'we are his offspring' (Ac 17[28. 29]). 'The Son of his love' is God's perfect image (Col 1[15]); Christian men are such in so far as they are renewed 'after the Creator's image' and become His children (Col 3[10], Eph 4[24] 5[1]). In all men the reason (νοῦς), unless 'reprobate,' discerns God in creation and is 'bondman to God's law' (Ro 1[19. 20. 28] 7[25]), so that they are 'without excuse' for sin. With the OT, Paul affirms the race-unity and moral solidarity of mankind—in Adam on the one hand, in Christ on the other (Ro 5[12-21]); as against Judaism, he repudiates any real difference between Jew and Gentile, either in sin or salvability (Ro 3).

'The woman is the glory of the man,' who is her 'head.' She is relatively subordinate, and Paul does not 'allow' her 'to teach nor to have dominion' in church or house,—though intrinsically the man's equal, since 'in Christ Jesus there can be no male and female' any more than 'Jew and Greek' (1 Co 11[3-15], 1 Ti 2[12-15], Gal 3[28]). The prohibition of 1 Co 14[34. 35] to exercise any spiritual gift in public appears to have been due to circumstances; otherwise it would be in conflict with 11[5]. The two sexes are necessary to each other 'in the Lord' (1 Co 11[11. 12]); both shared in the guilt of the Fall—the woman, as Paul seems to put it, 'being deceived' (2 Co 11[3], 1 Ti 2[14]) and sinning through weakness, whereas Adam's sin was a deliberate and responsible 'transgression' and 'disobedience' (Ro 5), culpable and decisive in the highest degree.

(b) Spirit and Flesh.—Paul's doctrine of human nature is that of the OT. Man is constituted of flesh and spirit—allied by the former to the perishable material creation, by the latter to God and the world unseen. 'The body' is flesh in the concrete, the man's individual form; 'the soul' with Paul, as throughout Scripture, is not a tertium quid between spirit and flesh, but rather their unity, the living self behind the bodily form of each man. (See, however, in favour of Trichotomy, Ellicott, Destiny of the Creature, and on 1 Th 5[23]; Heard, Tripartite Nature of Man; Delitzsch, Bibl. Psychology). 'Soul' is a word relatively infrequent in Paul; the 'heart' takes its place as the seat of the manifold thoughts and feelings,—which ψυχή concentrates into the self, the conscious Ego. 'Πνεῦμα is the principle, Ψυχή the subject, and Καρδία the organ of life' (Cremer). The νοῦς of Ro 1[20] 7[23-25], etc., is the πνεῦμα operative as a faculty of knowledge directed toward Divine things, while the συνείδησις of Ro 2[15], etc., is the same power introverted, the ethical self-consciousness.

'Flesh' and 'spirit' hold in Paulinism a more specific religious sense based upon, but distinguishable from, their psychological meaning: the former term regularly denotes the sinful nature of man, the latter its opponent in the influence of God operating in and through His Spirit (see e.g. Ro 8[1-17], Gal 5[16-25]). This raises the question whether Paul referred sin to man's constitution, grounding it in his physical system and in the (supposed) evil intrinsic to matter, as Baur, Holsten, and others argue, who make sin to be, in its essence, sensuousness or sensuality. Pfleiderer sees in Paul's doctrine of σάρξ proof of his Hellenism; Sabatier finds two discrepant Pauline theories of Sin—the Rabbinical view of Ro 5, deriving it from the fall of Adam; and the psychological view of Ro 7, where it arises from the inevitable collision between physical desire and ethical law ('L'origine du Péché' in Append. to L'Apôtre Paul[3]). But the αὐτὸς ἐγώ of Ro 7 is a child of his race, one 'sold under sin' and compromised beforehand, in whom sin 'revives' at the impact of the law, having been therefore already latent. On the other hand, Paul's prominent doctrines of the sinlessness of Christ, of the resurrection of the body and its sanctity as the temple of the Holy Spirit, forbid the notion, which in fact he combats in Col and the Past. Epp., of an inherent sinfulness attaching to physical nature. In 2 Co 7[1] he speaks of 'defilement of flesh and of spirit' (and a possible cleansing of both); Gal 5[19-21] enumerates non-physical sins among 'works of the flesh.' The ne plus ultra of human sin, described in 2 Th 2[4], is a self-deifying pride—atheism, or anti-theism, full-blown. The use of 'flesh' for 'sin' and 'carnal' for 'sinful' is a synecdoché; the more conspicuous and prevalent kind of sin stands for the whole.

But more than this:—(1) sin has occupied the body and become a sort of 'law in the members' (Ro 7[14-25]), so that human flesh is ordinarily, though not essentially, 'flesh of sin' (Ro 8[3], cf. 7[14] ἐγὼ σάρκινος). The same disparagement is extended to the body: qua 'body of sin' it must be 'nullified,' that we may no longer be 'bondmen to sin,'—a deliverance effected by the crucifixion of 'the old man' with Christ (Ro 6[6] 7[23. 24] 8[13], Col 3[5]). In man's proper Christian state his spirit, aided by the Spirit of God, rules his body and makes its 'members instruments of righteousness unto God' (Ro 6[12-19], 1 Co 9[25-27]); in his natural unrenewed state the flesh preponderates. (2) The heredity of sin is involved in Ro 5[12] (comp. Jn 3[6]); its taint is associated with fleshly descent, while the children of God are 'begotten κατὰ πνεῦμα' (Gal 4[29]). As the term 'spirit' rose in the NT vocabulary and came to be appropriated for the Holy Spirit of God, so 'flesh' sank to its lowest significance as denoting the antagonistic evil nature in man (Gal 5[16. 17], ταῦτα ἀλλήλοις ἀντίκειται). When Paul describes 'the first man, Adam' as 'earthy' (χοϊκός), as a 'living soul' wearing a 'natural body' (σῶμα ψυχικόν), in contrast with 'the second man,' the risen Christ who is the 'life-giving Spirit' already clothed with the 'spiritual body' (σῶμα πνευματικόν), these former terms do not signify a fallen condition but a gross and undeveloped condition—the 'natural' (sensuous) as it precedes the 'spiritual,' not the 'carnal' as the negation of it.

(c) Sin and Death dominate man's existence (Ro 5[12-21]). They set at war his flesh and spirit, and destroy both in turn. 'Sin reigned in death,' is St. Paul's epitome of human history: 'Sin came to life, and I died. . . . Wretched man that I am, who will rescue me out of this body of death?'—his summary of personal experience out of Christ. Sin (ἡ ἁμαρτία) is thus personified, in contrast with God's grace or righteousness, as the master principle of unredeemed humanity. Its seat is the flesh. 'Ungodliness' (ἀσέβεια) and 'unrighteousness' (ἀδικία, Ro 1[18]) are its chief forms, as it is related to God Himself or to His law for men: sin is irreligion, or immorality, or both at once,—'enmity against God' and insubordination to His law (Ro 8[7]). Moral corruptions have, in the apostle's view, a religious root; heathen vice is the product of idolatry; ἀδικία is the nemesis of ἀσέβεια (Ro 1[18-32], Eph 4[17-19]), and wilful ignorance of God the prime cause of moral disorder. Sin is at the bottom a 'disobedience,' to be rectified only in the way of 'reconciliation,' of 'justification' through an adequate 'obedience' (Ro 5[19. 6-11]). The act of sin is transgression or trespass (παράβασις, παράπτωμα, e.g. Ro 2[23], Gal 6[1]), when it is a conscious breach of law or lapse from rectitude. Ἁμαρτία includes whatever is ethically amiss in nature or conduct, tendency or action. Sin is not defect or weakness; it is a positive and culpable depravation. It has 'passed along' from the progenitor of the race 'unto all men.' Negatively, it has robbed 'all men' of 'the glory of God,'—that splendid image in which man was formed; positively, it makes 'all the world guilty before God,'—a consequence dreadfully realized in the universality of death (Ro 3[19. 23] 5[12. 21], 1 Co 15[22. 56]). In 'the fulness of time' sin has reached its climax. 'The wisdom of the world' that 'knew not God' is thus proved by its fruits to be utter folly (1 Co 1[18-25]; comp. Ro 1[21-25]). And 'the [Mosaic] law' prohibiting sin, has aggravated it to the utmost. This was, in truth, its hidden purpose: it 'came in by the way, in order that the trespass might multiply,' that 'sin might become exceeding sinful' (Ro 5[20. 21] 7[13], Gal 3[19-22]),—that, in short, sin 'might be shown to be sin,' the ineffectual restraint stimulating sin's violence while it deepened the consciousness of guilt, thus ripening the disease for the application of the remedy.

Sin and death go hand in hand. 'Death entered' at the door of Adam's transgression: 'Sin came to reign in death.' Bodily death is the fruit and penalty of sin in man, and evidences its universal sway. Not that Paul supposes the termination of our present bodily existence to be due to sin: 'flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God'; the 'earthy man' must in any case have been changed to 'the image of the heavenly,' and 'the natural' was bound to give place to the 'spiritual body' (1 Co 15[44-49]). But death, as known in this 'body of humiliation' and 'of death,' gets its 'sting' from sin. Under this doom 'the body is' virtually 'dead because of sin,' even when 'the spirit is life because of righteousness' (Ro 8[10]). Sin brings death upon the entire man: when 'sin came to life, I died' (Ro 7[9]); till the life of the risen Christ was theirs, Gentiles and Jews alike were 'dead by reason of their trespasses and sins,' since they lay under God's 'anger' and were 'alienated from his life' (Eph 2[1-5] 4[18]). This is no figurative death,—a state of apathy and impotence,—but a real death of the spirit, attended by moral dissolution, since 'life indeed' is found only in fellowship with God (Ro 6[10] 8[6. 10], Col 3[1], 1 Ti 6[19]). As it is through and with the dying Christ that we enter into this 'newness of life,' the change itself is called, relatively, a death; 'our old man was crucified with Christ' (Ro 6[6], Gal 2[20]).

(d) The history of the race is but the story of the 'wretched man' of Ro 7 writ large; it is a history of sin and redemption. There are with Paul, as in Jewish theology, two ages—ὁ αἰὼν ὁ ἐνεστὼς and ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων (1 Co 2[6] 7[31], 2 Co 4[4], Ro 12[2], Gal 1[4]), two worlds corresponding to the 'new' and 'old man'—one corrupt and perishing, the other newborn in Jesus Christ. His cross marks the boundary between them (Gal 6[14]). From the ascension of Jesus dates the Messianic age, the reign of grace, the dispensation of the Spirit, the new humanity, the establishment of 'the kingdom of the Son of God's love' on the territory of 'the dominion of darkness.'

But the earlier times were never God-forsaken. A fatherly and forbearing Providence directed the nations; in the bounties of nature God 'left himself without witness' to none; through His works of creation His 'eternal power and divinity' appealed to man's intelligence (Ac 14[15-17] 17[22-31], Ro 1[18-20]). The lives of the heathen, with no express 'law,' disclose not infrequently the marks of His working in the human conscience (Ro 2[14. 15. 26. 27]). The Gentile world, as a whole, had notwithstanding sunk into desperate guilt. The more wanton or monstrous a cult might be, so much the more it was pursued; and the popular idolatry might be roughly described as half lies, half devilry—'the Gentiles sacrifice to demons and not to God' (Ro 1[18-32], 1 Co 8[4] 10[19-21] 12[2], Gal 4[8]). Under the sway of such religions, moral debasement went on apace; the most horrible vices throve rankly in the great cities where the apostle taught. Satan was de facto 'the god of this world.' 'The law of sin and death,' operating incessantly from Adam downwards, was working out for society its last results. Here was at least a negative preparation for Christ. The world was lost, and Paul proclaims to Rome a gospel that is the 'power of God unto salvation'; to its 'obedience of faith' he proposes to reduce 'all the nations.'

In Israel a different, but concurrent, preparation had taken place. The Mosaic law, fastening its yoke on the Jewish conscience, compelled it to the hopeless path of salvation by works. The Jew was God's 'bondman' (Ro 8[15], Gal 4[1-7. 21-5[1]]), striving to win 'a righteousness of his own' and to secure by merit the Messiah's coming. The attempt was an acknowledged failure. The law was not kept; it provoked rather than repressed transgression, and produced more hypocrites than saints (Ro 2). The Jew was no better than the Gentile whom he condemned,—nay, worse because of his boasted knowledge. The Divine anger burnt hotly against his nation; their spiritual privileges had bred in them a stubborn and inhuman pride (Ro 2[3-9], 1 Th 2[15. 16], Ac 13[40. 41]). The Messianic salvation, as they conceived it, was farther off than ever. Gentile and Jew alike—'all the world'—were 'guilty before God,' with no defence and no resource 'shut up unto the faith that was to be revealed' (Ro 3[9-24], Gal 3[22. 23]). The former age extending, with the Mosaic interlude, from Adam to Christ, had culminated in a general moral bankruptcy.

At the same time, the apostle viewed the expiring age in another and more favourable light. Both in heathenism and Judaism an education of intellect and conscience had all the while been going on; the elementary truths of religion (τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, i.e. not 'the' physical 'elements,'—starry powers or the like, identified with angels, as many interpreters suppose,—but 'the rudiments' belonging to a childish, pupillary state: see Lgtft. on Gal. 4[3] and Col 2[8]; also Weiss, NT Theol. § 70) had been inculcated and widely understood, however ill practised, and had disciplined the κληρονόμος νήπιος for his emancipation in Christ. In and around the Synagogue there was a people prepared for the Lord —'a remnant according to the election of grace'; and 'the salvation of God,' sent from unbelieving Judaism to the Gentiles, found these in multitudes ready to hear; so that the present 'casting away' of Israel is proving a 'reconciliation of the world,' which in turn was destined to end in Israel's full 'reception' (Ro 11, Ac 28[28]). On all accounts it was clear that 'the fulness of the times,' the turning-point of human destiny, had come,—at once the consummation of the shameful past and the foundation of a glorious future. At the crisis where the apostle stands, 'God has shut up all together unto disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all' (Ro 11[32], Gal 3[22]).

3. Doctrine of Christ and of Salvation.—On the basis of St. Paul's doctrines of God and of righteousness, of man and of sin, stands his doctrine respecting Christ and salvation, — the birth of 'the fulness of time' (Gal 4[4]).

(a) The Person of Christ.—The Pharisee Saul persecuted Jesus of Nazareth after His death for the reason for which He had been put to death,—His claim to be the Son of God. In a moment he discovered his utter mistake, and reversed his judgment of the Nazarene. Jesus was, after all, the Messiah;—and not a mere human 'Son of David,' a Χριστὸς κατὰ σάρκα, but as He was understood to assert before the Sanhedrin and as His apostles continually preached, the Lord of glory, the Son of the Highest. These convictions entered, with a lightning flash, the mind of the stricken persecutor. 'Who art thou, Lord?' was his question to the Celestial One who appeared to him in the way. The terms of Saul's faith in the Person of Christ were already present to his thought; he needed but to substitute 'Jesus Lord' for 'Jesus anathema' (1 Co 12[3]), and to adore whom he had blasphemed. 'Immediately in the synagogues [of Damascus] he preached that this Jesus is the Son of God' (Ac 9[19. 20]); what 'the Son of God' meant to Jewish ears, the trial before the Sanhedrin and the record of St. John's Gospel show. The relationship of Christ to God gave supreme worth in St. Paul's eyes to His sacrifice, and turned the shameful cross into the glorious revelation of God's love to mankind: 'God sent forth his own Son (ἑαυτοῦ) to redeem those under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons'—'He spared not his own Son (τοῦ ἰδίου; comp. Jn 5[18]), but delivered him up for us all'; it is thus that God is known to be 'for us,' thus He 'commends his own (ἑαυτοῦ) love toward us' (Gal 4[4. 5], Ro 5[8-10] 8[31. 32]).

Son of God is a name shared by the 'firstborn' with 'many brethren.' Yet however much they partake with Him, God's 'own Son' stands immeasurably above both men and angels (Eph 1[20-23], etc.). We receive the same impression from the apostle's phrases that the Jews received from what Jesus said of Himself (Jn 5[20]); not least from the solemn distinction and frequency with which God is named 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.' Paul styles Him habitually 'the Lord,' 'the Lord Jesus,' 'the Lord Christ,' 'the Lord Jesus Christ.' To minds familiar with the Greek OT, these names, in the formal manner in which they are employed, carried irresistibly the connotation of Godhead. Words of Scripture relating to 'the LORD' (Jehovah, but read as Adonai) are freely, as a matter of course, appropriated for Christ. The title 'Lord' denotes Christ's sovereignty in the Church (e.g. 2 Co 4[5]), and through the universe (Ph 2[9-11]); He is designated 'Head' in Col and Eph in the same twofold way. This Lordship is so lofty and wide as to be inconceivable in one less than God (see esp. Col 2[9. 10], in connexion with 1[14-20]). 'The kingdom of the Son of God's love' embraces 'all creation,' of which He is the ground, means, and relative end (Col 1[15-17]), while 'God the Father' is the fountain and absolute end of 'all things' (1 Co 8[6]). 'They derived their being from His agency, the Divine power that called them into existence travelling to its goal through Him. . . . To believe in Him, to accept Him as our ideal and find our life's end in doing His will, is to be true to a relation that lies in creation itself, and that expresses the eternal law of our being' (Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, pp. 192, 193). Though Lord in this unlimited sense, Christ is always obedient as a Son, and 'delivers up the kingdom to the Father' who sent Him, when His task of redemption is complete (1 Co 15[28], cf. Ph 2[11]). Such free subordination of love implies no inequality of nature (cf. 1 Co 11[3]); it is essential to the Divine unity. Despite his horror of creature-worship, St. Paul addresses prayers to the Lord Jesus side by side with the Father, and this frequently in the two earliest letters; he defines Christians as those 'who call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Co 1[2], Ro 10[13], 2 Ti 2[22]). To St. Paul's imagination as to that of St. John, the heavenly throne is that 'of God and of the Lamb.' There is nothing really surprising if, as seems most probable in both instances, Paul has actually in Ro 9[5] and Tit 2[13] given to Christ the predicate 'God' (cf. Jn 1[18], μονογενὴς θεός).

Christ's Headship over the redeemed Church rests upon His premundane Lordship (Col 1[15-18]). If His present rule is Divine, His prior state must have been Divine; He was not constituted Son of God by His resurrection, but so 'marked out' (or 'instated,' ὁρισθείς, Ro 1[4]). He who at the end of the ages will be confessed as 'Lord' by every tongue, subsisted originally 'in the form of God'—ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων (the μορφὴ signifies that which constitutes Godhead, Ph 2[4-11]). Not of this 'form' did Christ 'empty himself' in His humiliation, but of the external conditions described by the words τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ; the Divine state was surrendered, the Divine essence could not be (Ph 2[6]: see Gifford, Incarnation; also Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, and Lightfoot, Philippians, ad loc.). Since He was originally God, Christ's renunciation of the Divine condition in His incarnation and crucifixion showed an infinite regard for 'others,' that must win unbounded adoration. The height of His previous 'riches' measures the depth of the 'poverty' to which He descended (2 Co 8[9]).

'The apostle nowhere establishes or teaches the pre-existence of Christ, but presupposes it as familiar to his readers and disputed by no one' (Beyschlag, NT Theology, ii. 78). Baur, Pfleiderer, Beyschlag, Schmiedel, with other able scholars, see in Paul's pre-incarnate Christ the ideal, celestial man, the archetype and divinely constituted Head of humanity, who in this capacity was primevally (whether in esse or in posse) Lord of the human creation. This explanation starts from 1 Co 15[45-47], interpreted according to the Philonian and later Rabbinical distinction between the two Adams of Gn 1[27] and 2[7]—the first, the ideal man after God's image, remaining with God as a heavenly pattern (sometimes identified with the Messiah); the second, the earthy, phenomenal man. But St. Paul reverses this order, and writes in v.[46] as though he would contradict Philo (see Edwards, ad loc.); the δεύτερος ἄνθρωπος of 1 Co 15 is ὁ μέλλων of Ro 5[14]. When he distinguishes the two as 'from earth,' 'from heaven,' he points to their respective source of being, implying nothing as to previous state of being. 'The second man' is, in this context, the risen (not the pre-incarnate) Christ, clothed already, to our knowledge, with His 'spiritual body,' the 'house from heaven' of 2 Co 5^2 and Ph 3^{21} (see Meyer and Heinrici on 1 Co 15^{47}).

The coexistence of the Divine and human in the Lord Jesus is St. Paul's constant wonder. He puts the two natures in signal contrast (Ro $1^{3.4}$ 9^5, Gal 4^4), but nowhere attempts to define their relations in the one person. 'Jesus Christ is Lord' in His redeemed kingdom not as mere Son of God, but under the name of Jesus, who was 'found in fashion as a man' and held concealed beneath the μορφὴ δούλου His original μορφὴ θεοῦ (Ph 2^{5-11}). Now the enthroned 'mediator of God and men,' He remains evermore 'man' (1 Ti 2^5). His connexion with the race is pre-incarnate; Christ was the source of spiritual blessing to the Jewish fathers (1 Co 10^4). He is, in truth, the fountain of life to mankind in the spiritual, as Adam in the natural order,—a fact implied in the unfinished parallel of Ro 5^{12}. 'The head of every man is Christ,' as 'the man is head of woman' (1 Co 11^3); thus family life and social order rest on His prior authority. Marital love has its model in that of Christ to the Church (Eph 5^{22-31}, ἀντὶ τούτου). If God has 'sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts' and we are to be 'essentially conformed (συμμόρφους) to the image of his Son' (Gal 4^4, Ro 8^{29}), this implies an aboriginal kinship. The Son of God is the mould in which our nature was cast, the representative and root of our race in the Godhead: so much truth there is in the Baurian doctrine of the Urmensch (see Edwards' The God-man). 'We' especially are 'through him' and 'unto him'—'through whom are all things' and 'in whom all things consist' (1 Co 8^6, Col 1^{16-18}). St. Paul looks into the ground-plan of creation when he says that God 'chose us in him before the foundation of the world,' and that we 'were created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God prepared beforehand' (Eph 1^4 2^{10}). The Incarnation and Atonement spring, therefore, out of the fundamental relations of God and man in Christ.

In virtue of the primitive relationship of mankind to Him, the Son of God is concerned in the curse that came upon us through transgression, and becomes answerable on this account (see Dale, Atonement, Lect. x.). God 'made him sin on our behalf.' Yet His freedom was never compromised, His purity remained unspotted; 'in the likeness of sinful flesh' He was 'sent forth,' not in its actual carnality; in fact, He 'knew no sin' (Ro 8^3, 2 Co 5^{21}: contrast Ro $7^{7.8}$). This statement implies a large acquaintance on St. Paul's part with the personal life of Jesus, to which his references are few but significant (Ro 15^3, 2 Co 10^1, Eph 4^{20-24}, 1 Ti 6^{13}, Ac 20^{35}, 1 Co 11^{23}). The miraculous conception, which in a manner explains the unique character of Jesus, the apostle never alludes to. His powerful manifestation as 'Son of God,' from the time of the resurrection, was 'in accordance with the spirit of holiness' that marked His earthly course (Ro 1^4).

The Messiahship of Jesus, expressed in His name Christ—the main topic of missionary preaching to Jews (Ac 9^{22} $13^{22ff.}$ etc.)—is taken for granted in the Epp., like the Fatherhood of God, as accepted to begin with by all Christians. Two points Paul had to make out in proving Jesus to be 'Christ': (1) to show from Scripture that the Christ was παθητός, was destined to suffer in order to reign—this general doctrine of a suffering Messiah being an open question in the Jewish schools; (2) to identify Jesus with the Christ so defined (Ac $17^{2.3}$ $18^{4.5}$). On the abstract point of doctrine he might carry his Jewish hearers with him, but fail when he applied it to the crucified Nazarene. That Christ was 'of David's seed according to flesh,' that His Jewish birth was the crown of Israelite privilege and glory, that 'Christ had become minister of the circumcision,' and that God had 'thus fulfilled the promise made to the fathers': these were essential conditions of the case, and sacred matters to the Gentile apostle (Ro 1^3 $9^{4.5}$ 15^{8-12}, Ac $13^{32.33}$). But the Messianic kingship of the OT has expanded into the larger royalty of 'the Lord Jesus Christ'; and he who had fervently expected a Χριστὸν κατὰ σάρκα, 'now no longer knows him' (2 Co 5^{16}). See, further, art. MESSIAH.

(b) The Death of the Cross.—The Christ so constituted, David's seed and God's own Son, sin-curst yet sinless, died the death of the cross—a victim for human transgression. THE CROSS is the main shaft of the superstructure resting on the basis already described; it is the trunk into which run up all the roots of Paul's Christian thought, and that supports its branches and fruitage. 'Far be it from me to glory,' he exclaims, 'save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ!' Everything that Paul knows, exults in, builds upon, is poised there.

The apostle uses many terms to express the meaning of the death of Christ, for it is a fact of boundless significance. It is a vicarious, representative death, as He who thus suffered is the Leader of the race, the 'One' who 'died for all,' who alone had the right and power to do so (2 Co $5^{14.15}$). It is a legal expiation in the very largest sense, coming under that awful law which links death to sin as its universal human penalty (Ro 5^{12} 8^3, 1 Co 15^{22}, Gal $4^{4.5}$); the pardon based upon it is accordingly a 'justification,' an acquittal and release in the court of the Divine justice, since 'he that died hath been justified from sin,' and 'all died in him' (Ro 4^{25} 6^7, 2 Co 5^{14}, Col $2^{13.14}$). Christ's death was an intrinsically 'justifying act' (δικαίωμα), right in itself and rectifying in its scope, that turned to 'justification of life' the 'condemnation' lying on 'all men' in consequence of Adam's trespass; it is 'the obedience of the One,' through which 'the disobedience of the one man' is countervailed (Ro $5^{18.19}$). It was a 'propitiation,' since He who thus shed 'his blood' in doing so realized with sympathy and entire submission the holy resentment that burns against sin through all the miseries which it entails, and the endurance of this undeserving voluntary Sufferer for His guilty brethren was 'an odour of sweet smell' (Ro 3^{25}, Eph 5^2). In every fitting sense the death of Jesus was a 'sacrifice,' offered upon man's part, which God in His righteousness accepts. In His grace God first provided it; for 'Christ is God's' rather than ours. The Father of Christ and of men 'sent his own Son, in likeness of sinful flesh and for sin'; He 'delivered him up for us all'; He 'set him forth a propitiation,' and so 'commends his own love toward us . . . sinners' (Ro 5^8 $8^{3.32}$). Thus the sacrifice effects a 'reconciliation' (καταλλαγή), proposed by God who through Christ admits into favour those who could otherwise be treated only as enemies, and accepted by men who endorse the satisfaction which Christ renders on their behalf (Ro 5^{1-11}, 2 Co 5^{18-21}). On this ground God and man meet in friendship. The Divine family is gathered again round the Elder Brother, who restores to each other those whom He reconciles to God, slaying all enmity by the blood of His cross (Eph 2^{13-18}). On the basis of this atonement the entire sum of blessings making up our salvation is bestowed—blessings collectively named 'redemption' (ἀπολύτρωσις), as they are won for us at the cost of the blood of Christ (1 Co 1^{30} 6^{20}, Eph 1^{14}, Ac 20^{28}).

But there is another side to the Pauline doctrine of the cross. When it is said in Ro 8^{1-4} that 'God by sending his own Son in likeness of sinful flesh, and (as a sacrifice) for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us,' the subjective moral effect of Christ's death comes into view. The mission of Christ has so brought home the guilt of human sin as to bring about a full reaction. While enduring the penalty, Christ has broken the power of sin, and dethroned it (cf. 5^{21}), even in that 'flesh' which was its seat; so sanctification (Ro 6), equally with justification (Ro 3–5), springs from the death of the cross, the saving power of which is certified and made efficacious by the resurrection of the Sinbearer (Ro $4^{24.25}$ 8^{34} 10^{8-10}, Ph 3^{10}). As 'condemnation' ceases for 'those who are in Christ Jesus,' there begins to operate upon them that 'law of the Spirit of life in him' which 'frees from the law of sin and death,' substituting 'the mind of the Spirit' for 'the mind of the flesh' and giving them victory over bodily death, whose 'sting' is gone for those who in Christ have 'died to sin' (Ro 6^2 8^{1-11}, 1 Co $15^{56.57}$). The change of status and the change of character effected in believers are, to Paul's mind, inseparable; he blends them in Ro 6, where those who 'died to sin' are such as have in Christ at once expiated its curse and renounced its dominion, to 'walk' with their risen Lord 'in newness of life'—living in Him, and as He does, 'to God.' In the pregnant words of v.[7], they are 'justified (so as to be free) from sin.' The so-called 'juristic' and 'ethical' theories of the Atonement are complementary to each other; Paul passes from one to the other with no sense of discrepancy (see Stevens' Pauline Theol., on 'Justification'; Pfleiderer's Paulinismus[2], 'Der Tod Christi'; Sabatier's Apostle Paul, p. 297 ff.). See, further, arts. ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION.

(c) The new Life of Faith.—From the moment that he dies with Christ, there begins for the believer the new life of faith (Gal $2^{19.20}$). The word Faith on the human side is as characteristic of Paulinism as Grace on the Divine. Faith is the hand reached out to receive the gifts of grace; it is the root by which the soul is planted into Christ and draws its life from Him. It is 'prora et puppis' to Christian experience (Ro $1^{16.17}$), and conditions all security and progress (Eph 6^{16} 14^{13}).

Faith is the characteristic function of the 'heart' (Ro 10^{10}, Eph 3^{17})—of the entire inward man there centred. It includes the response of the affections to the love of God and of Christ (Ro 5^8, Gal 2^{20}), self-surrendering submission to the will and call of God (the 'obedience of faith,' Ro 1^5 $6^{16.17}$ $10^{3.16}$, 1 Th $2^{12.13}$), and the grasp of the understanding which apprehends 'the truth of the gospel' (2 Th 2^{10-13}). Especially in the later Epistles, addressed to instructed Churches now endangered by intellectual forms of error, stress is laid on the mental element in faith; and 'knowledge (of God, of truth,' etc.; ἐπίγνωσις, advanced, exact knowledge) is represented as the means of growth and the condition of safety (Col 1^{5-11} 2^2 3^{10} 4^6, Eph 1^{17-19} 4^{20-24}, Ph 1^{9-11}, 1 Ti 2^4, Tit 1^1). St. Paul's ἐπίγνωσις is simply an educated faith. This is one of the aspects of Christian perfection. The revelation of the gospel assumes faith and depends at every point on this condition (Ro $3^{22.25}$ 4^{24} $5^{1.2}$, 1 Co 1^{21}, 2 Co 1^{24}, Gal 3^{22}, Eph $1^{13.19}$, 1 Th 2^{13}, Tit 3^8, etc.), just as the legal covenant assumed for its efficacy the performance of 'works.' Christian men are briefly described as 'believers' (οἱ πιστεύοντες, οἱ πιστεύσαντες, οἱ ἐκ πίστεως). Faith is the one subjective condition of justification,—that Divine acquittal with which our salvation begins and in which its whole process is virtually contained. The 'righteousness of faith,' the 'gift of righteousness,' supersedes that 'righteousness of one's own' which the legalist vainly sought by self-directed efforts; failing to be 'justified of works,' men are freely 'justified of faith' (Ro 3^{22-25} 5^{15-17} 9^{30}–10^3). The power of faith lies in the fact that it is man's reliance on God's power and grace; it recognizes and 'submits to God's righteousness'; faith accepts His promise—in a word, it 'gives glory to God' without any thought of merit or claim upon man's part (Ro $4^{1-5.20-24}$ 10^3). On this account Abraham's faith,—the instantia probans for Israelites,—notwithstanding the difference of its content, is a pattern to Christians (Ro 4, Gal 3). Such 'faith is reckoned for (to amount to) righteousness'; this is, in fact, the normal attitude of the soul toward God, the disposition which alone makes a right understanding and right relations possible between man and God. While faith appears to supersede law, it is a principle profoundly just, and supplies the true guarantee for the establishment of Divine law in human life (Ro $3^{30.31}$: cf. ii. 1 (d), above). Christian faith has for its specific object the revelation of God's grace and righteousness in Christ, and for its primary result the remission of sins grounded on His expiatory death.

While such faith sets the believer right with God, it unites him personally to the risen Christ. 'Faith in Christ' (sometimes 'in Jesus,' 'in Jesus Christ') attaches itself to the resurrection along with the death of the Redeemer (Ro $4^{24.25}$ 8^{32-34})—to His resurrection, in the first place, as making valid the justification wrought in His death, but further as the ground of an abiding spiritual union (unio mystica) with the living Lord. Christ's ascension completes His resurrection (Eph 1^{19-23}); 'having died in regard to sin once for all,' He 'lives to God,'—and we in Him (Ro $6^{10.11}$); God 'raised us up and seated us in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus' (Ro $6^{10.11}$, Eph 2^{4-6}). By virtue of this union one comes to be in Christ—St. Paul's normal designation for the Christian state. Under the 'law of faith,' we thus appropriate and assimilate Christ's redemption; what He has done for us is reproduced in us. We 'coalesce with him (σύμφυτοι γεγόναμεν) by the likeness of his death' and rising, which are rehearsed symbolically in baptism, actually in the process of a sympathetic, self-committing faith (Ro $6^{5.6}$). 'Thus the idea of substitution receives its complement in the mysticism of faith . . . and the idea of "one for all" receives the stricter meaning of "all in and with one"' (Pfleiderer). St. Paul's doctrine of life to God in the celestial Christ is the correlative to that of death to sin through the crucified Christ. 'The change from death to resurrection brought to Him an accession of personal endowment that qualified Him to exert His influence as a principle of new life in man, and it meant also His investiture with supreme power as the Lord of human life and destiny' (Somerville),—πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, ἵνα γένηται ἐν πᾶσιν αὐτὸς πρωτεύων (Col 1^{18}). While through faith in Christ's death the working of sin is at each point undone, in the place of what is thus destroyed there is built up, through fellowship with His life, the new man and the new world (Ro 5^{10} 6^{8-23}, 1 Co 15^{20-28}). 'To the Christ within Paul attributed all that he did and experienced as a Christian man. . . . It was as if the very personality of Christ had entered into the apostle, and used him as the organ of its expression' (Somerville); such is the δύναμις τῆς ἀναστάσεως αὐτοῦ, making Him a πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν to His race. St. Paul's theory of morals comes under this head; it is the ethics of the 'life hid with Christ in God' (Col 3). If the cross is the main pillar of Paul's theology, the objective fact on and around which its fabric is built, the consciousness of union with the living Christ is its subjective centre and the heart from which its movements proceed. See, further, art. FAITH.

St. Paul's doctrine of adoption (υἱοθεσία) supplies the meeting-point of two cardinal principles—the Fatherhood of God, and spiritual union with Christ. The sonship of believers is matter of God's eternal counsel, and was provided for 'in Christ before the world's foundation' (Eph $1^{3.4}$). It is a status derived wholly through Christ, in which we partake with the Son of God, and are conformed 'in the spirit of our mind' to Him who is God's complete image (Ro $8^{29.30}$, Eph $4^{20-24.32}$ 5^2, Col 3^{8-13} 1^{15}, Ph 2^5, Gal 4^{19}, etc.). This resemblance of the many brethren to the Firstborn is at present spiritual, and therefore 'hidden'; but we await, along with 'the creation' which has shared our 'bondage of corruption,' 'the unveiling of the sons of God,' 'the redemption of our body,' which will be recovered from the grave and in its turn 'conformed to his body of glory' (Ro 8^{18-25}, 1 Co 15^{43-57}, Ph $3^{20.21}$, Eph 1^{14}, Col $3^{3.4}$). Endowed with this hope, which is vital to their salvation (Ro 8^{24}, 1 Co 15^{19}), Christians are consciously 'heirs of God and Christ's fellow-heirs—if children, also heirs' (Ro $8^{16.17}$, Gal $4^{6.7}$). See, further, art. ADOPTION.

4. Doctrine of the Holy Spirit.—In the development of St. Paul's Christology, or Christianity proper, a further movement of thought is involved, —that embracing the doctrine of the Holy Spirit.

(a) God Immanent.—The thought of the Holy Spirit as the organ of the Divine in man is inwoven into the whole tissue of Paulinism. While the Son of God is the root and ground of human relations to God, the Spirit is the living energy forming and sustaining those relations, the moral dynamic (ἐξ ὕψους δύναμις, Lk 24^{49}; cf. 1 Th 1^5, 1 Co 2^4, Eph 3^{16}). Christ is God manifest to us; the Holy Spirit is God working in us (e.g. Ro $15^{13.16}$, 1 Co 12^{11}, Gal 5^{25}). He is the 'gift' imparted in God's grace to each believer by way of witness to his adoption (Ro $8^{15.16}$, Gal 4^6), and supplying the inward substantial counterpart of this endowment—a new power corresponding to the new status (Ro 5^5 8^2, Gal $3^{2.3}$, Tit 3^{4-7}, etc.). The positive gift of the Spirit, equally with the negative gift of remission of sins, is procured through the death of Christ.

Paul's conception of 'the Spirit,' like that of 'the Father' and 'the Son,' was drawn from the teaching of Jesus. The OT 'Spirit (breath) of God' is the Divine influence touching man's invisible spirit, which is kindred to and was created by it. In the doctrine of Jesus the Holy Spirit assumes the distinctness of a personal being, and the permanence of a fixed indwelling in man. The Spirit is associated with the person of Christ in such a way that He 'rests upon' Him, is concentrated in Him, given forth by Him, and becomes the element of life-communion with Him. These ideas supply the staple of St. Paul's doctrine upon this subject. They are found mainly in the Fourth Gospel, whose tradition St. John did not confine within his breast until that work was published (see Knowling's Witness of the Epp., pp. 329–347, which summarizes the full examination of this question made by P. Ewald in his Hauptproblem der Evangelien; also Matheson's 'Historical Christ of St. Paul,' in Expositor, II. i. 193–199, ii. 137–143).

On the one side, the Spirit is the organ of communication from God through the exalted Christ, whether in the way of knowledge or power (Ro 5^5 8^{16} 15^{19}, 1 Co 2^{10-16}, Gal 4^6, Ph 1^{19}, 1 Th 1^5, 1 Ti 4^1, 2 Ti 1^7); on the other side, He prompts the heart's movements towards God and its activities for God (Ro $8^{4-10.26.27}$ 12^{11}, 1 Co 12^{7-11}, Eph $2^{18.22}$, 1 Th 5^{19}, Tit 3^5). Above all, He gives the witness of sonship, with its privilege of access to the Father (Ro 8^{14-16}, Eph 2^{18}); and He is the element which identifies us with Christ and constitutes us 'members of his body' (Ro 8^{9-17}, Gal $4^{6.7}$, 1 Co 6^{15-20}, Eph 3^{16-19}). He is thus the 'Spirit of Christ,' as 'of God.' The body and spirit of man are His temple —the spirit already redeemed from death by His power, the body ultimately to be so (Ro 8^{11}). All the experiences and virtues of the new life are accordingly His 'fruit' (Gal 5^{22-25}). The glorified Christ acts on men so entirely through the Spirit, and the Holy Spirit so perfectly imparts Christ's influence and makes Him present, that the two are practically identified: 'The Lord is the Spirit' (2 Co $3^{17.18}$); Christ is, at the same time, 'Lord of the Spirit' (this seems the fitter rendering of κύριον πνεύματος), since He rules in that realm which the Spirit fills. (See Somerville, as above, pp. 116–118, who, however, presses the identification too far). Amongst the offices of the Spirit, the following are conspicuous in Pauline teaching:—

(b) The Spiritual Man.—The Holy Spirit is the sanctifier—being holy, He makes holy. Sanctification accompanies justification (1 Co 6^{11} 7^{14}: cf. ii. 3 (b), last par.). St. Paul counts all his readers 'saints,' however faulty saints (e.g. 1 Co 1^2). The children of God, those who possess Christ's Spirit, are pro tanto holy persons, being claimed by God (κλητοὶ ἅγιοι) and personally devoted to God. But sanctification, unlike justification, is progressive and variable. While complete in principle and tendency (and possible realization) from the first, in practice it admits of degrees, and is advancing in the most obedient (εἰς ἁγιασμόν, Ro 6^{16}). For saints the apostle prays, 'Sanctify them unto full perfection' (1 Th 5^{23}). Growth in holiness is the fruit of the Spirit's inner working; to live a holy life is to be κατὰ πνεῦμα and to 'walk πνεύματι' (Ro 8^{4-19}, Gal 5^{16-25}). The residence of the Holy Spirit in man is a powerful motive to holiness, while it is the means to its attainment (1 Th 4^{3-8}, 1 Co $6^{19.20}$). Sanctification is not ethical purity, but connotes and requires this; and the Spirit of God is the purifier of heart and conduct (1 Co 6^{11}, Ro 8^{13}, Gal 5^{22}, etc.). This office of the Spirit comes under St. Paul's favourite antithesis of 'flesh and spirit.' The Christian ethical life is at once the ascendency of spirit over flesh in the man, and the possession and assimilation of the man by the Spirit. In many Pauline expressions the individual and universal spirit are blended; 'the spiritual man' (ὁ πνευματικός, ὁ κατὰ πνεῦμα) is he in whom, through the operation of the Spirit of God upon his nature, spirit (not flesh, nor even mere 'soul' —the individual selfhood) holds sway and determines character and bent (Ro 8^{5-9}, 1 Co $2^{14.15}$). While the Holy Spirit brings the soul into harmony with God, He establishes order and health, true life, in the constitution of the man (Ro 8^6).

(c) The Communion of the Spirit.—Peace is the Spirit's fruit; the life of love in the Church is His creation. The Holy Spirit is the unifier. As the element which binds believers to Christ, He binds them to each other in Christ. 'There is one body' because, and so far as, 'there is one Spirit'; all 'were baptized in one Spirit into one body, all were made to drink of one Spirit' (1 Co $12^{12.13}$, Eph 4^4). 'Communion' is His note in the Trinitarian benediction of 2 Co 13^{13}; the grace of Christ, and the love of the Father, are translated into fellowship when subjectively realized by the indwelling of the Spirit,—who is God immanent in the individual man, and in the community.

(d) The Earnest of the Inheritance.—The indwelling Holy Spirit is the guarantor of final salvation. 'God gave the earnest (ἀρραβών) of the Spirit in our hearts' (2 Co 1^{22} 5^5, Eph 1^{14})—'the firstfruit' (ἀπαρχή, Ro 8^{23}), since the life eternal will be of the same nature as the hidden life of the Spirit already experienced by the child of God. His presence is the pledge of God's purpose wholly to sanctify the abode where He thus dwells, and of His ulterior purpose to recreate our physical and mortal frame as 'a spiritual body' conformed to that of Christ, and so to perfect the redeemed in the integrity of their nature as the image and habitation of God (Ro 8^{10-25}, Eph

1[13. 14] 2[22]). Till then salvation is incomplete: our redemption is exposed to hazard; our sonship remains half realized (Ro 8[23]). The Holy Spirit is the 'seal' of the future, as He is the witness of the past and the energy of our present life in God—a seal broken by relapse into sin (Eph 4[30], 2 Co 1[22]). See, further, art. HOLY SPIRIT.

5. Doctrine of the Church.—The Church is the witness and counterpart of the Spirit of God on earth (1 Co 3[16. 17] 12[11], Eph 2[22]); it is the specific organ for the continued manifestation of God through Christ to the world (1 Th 1[8], 1 Co 12[24. 25], 2 Co 3[3], Eph 3[21], Ph 2[12-18], 1 Ti 3[15]).

(a) The Body of Christ.—As the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of Christ amongst men, the Church is, correspondingly, His body. It is constituted by the common presence of the Spirit in many souls, and is animated by His power (Eph 2[18] 4[4. 12], 1 Co 12[13]). It is 'the church' (OT 'congregation')—or 'churches' in 1 Th 2[14] and 2 Th 1[4]—'of God,' and, as consisting of His children, the 'house,' also the 'habitation, of God,' tenanted by His Spirit,—'a holy temple in the Lord' (Ac 20[28], Eph 2[19-22], 1 Ti 3[5. 15], 1 Co 3[16. 17]). Paul's idea of the ecclesia grew with the growth of his work (see Hort, Ecci. 107 ff.). In 1 and 2 Th the word denotes the local 'assembly,' or 'assemblies,' of believers—'the Church of Thessalonians in God,' etc.; the readers of 1 and 2 Co are 'the Church of God that is in Corinth'—the one Christian society existing in many places. In the letters of the third group the conception of the Church Universal, as the spiritual union of all who 'hold the Head,' is completely formed. In Col and Eph the fuller doctrine of the Church and of the Person of Christ are unfolded pari passu. The Church is the body of which He is Head (Eph 1[22] 5[23], Col 1[18] 2[19]), new significance thus accruing to the figure previously employed in 1 Co 12. The body is the organic complement of the Head, supplying Him with limbs and instruments, while the Head gives to it unity, impulse, and direction. The reciprocal duties of the two, and the fundamental nature of their union, are shown in the analogy of Eph 5[22-33]. The Church is the bride of Christ, who 'loved her and gave himself up for her,' who labours to 'present her to himself' at last in perfect spiritual beauty. The Church is not a temporal institution subserving mere present necessities. The collective fellowship of believers with their Head will subsist eternally; and in Eph 3[21] 'the Church and Christ Jesus'—Bride and Bridegroom—are seen together rendering praise to God, 'unto all generations of the age of the ages' (cf. Mt 16[18], Rev 21. 22).

(b) The Brotherhood.—The first note of the Church is brother-love (φιλαδελφία, 1 Th 4[9-12], Ro 12[9. 10], etc.). Brethren is the name by which Paul oftenest speaks to and of his fellow-believers,—or beloved. The compellation 'brothers,' of Jewish kinship, is appropriated by the larger household of faith. In the family of God, Love is to have its home and hearth, from which its influence radiates to those without (1 Th 5[15], Gal 5[14] 6[10], Ro 12[12-21]). Since it is God's love and grace in Christ that call forth our faith, faith in turn 'works through love'; all its activities pass along this channel and take this colour (Gal 5[6]). The Church 'builds up itself in love' (Eph 4[16]). No faith, no gift or power or qualification of any kind, avails without love,—which finds in the brethren its chief object, in Christ its pattern, and in the Holy Spirit its sustaining power. Love is greater than faith or hope, as the Divine surpasses the human and auxiliary, as the fruit the seed (1 Co 13). In all this Paul shows himself the pupil of Jesus.

The 'good works' of the Pastoral Epp. are definite forms of 'the work of faith and toil of ove' commended in 1 Th,—e.g. the care of the widows and the poor, and hospitality to strangers; the Church charities regulated in the latest Epp. flow from the brotherly love conspicuous in the earliest.

(c) The Charismata.—The Pauline Churches—eminently that of Corinth—were endowed by the Spirit with a rich variety of gifts for edification (χαρίσματα). All social talents, natural or supernatural, from apostleship down to the washing of feet, the apostle regards from this practical standpoint. Everything must subserve the building up of the Church after the measure of Christ (Eph 4[7-13], 1 Co 12[7-11] 14, 2 Co 13[7-10]). Hence 'prophecy' is rated amongst 'the greater charisms,' while the gift of 'tongues,' though more admired, is really inferior. 'The word of wisdom' and of 'knowledge' mark the ordinary 'teachers' (in Eph 4[11] associated with the 'pastors'), in distinction from the prophets and speakers with tongues, whose utterances come by an incalculable inspiration, and may need restraint where such gifts are widely distributed (1 Co 14[27-33]). The earliest Church meetings, as described in 1 Co, were little bound by any stated order, those present praying, prophesying, singing, teaching in turn as the Spirit prompted utterance. But this unchartered freedom bred disorder; it was only possible in the first simplicity of Christian fervour: Paul writes expressly to chasten it, intending to take measures to this effect (11[34]); he declares that, along with the other charisms, 'God appointed in the Church governments' (12[28]). In the interests of edification Church proceedings were gradually reduced to rule and precedent; by the time of the Pastoral Epp. signs appear of a fixed gradation of office and an established usage in Divine service. It is assumed, by way of fundamental principle, in Ro 12[4-8] and Eph 4[1-16], that the Church is, under Christ, self-governing and self-edifying, that the manifold functions of administration and instruction exercised in it belong to and exist for the body as a whole, however lodged in this member or that; the body, as such, must press the powers of every limb into its service.

(d) Baptism and the Lord's Supper.—The apostle refers to the two sacraments incidentally, and without bringing them into connexion with each other, unless it be by allusion in 1 Co 10[1-4]. Their established observance is assumed, in accordance with the story of their institution,—expressly related for the Lord's Supper in 1 Co 11[23], where there is no need to suppose that 'received from (ἀπό) the Lord' signifies more than tradition from the fountain-head. These rites mark respectively the believer's entrance upon, and continuance in, the Christian life. They signalize, each of them, his relation to the Church as well as to Christ Himself, to the body with the Head (1 Co 12[13] 10[17]). The 'one baptism' is a visible token of the 'one Lord' and the 'one faith' (Eph 4[5]); the 'one loaf' of which 'we all partake,' pictures the 'one body' to which 'the many' belong. The 'blessing' and 'thanksgiving' pronounced over the elements at the Lord's Table (1 Co 10[16] 11[24]) impress their character on the whole rite, which is analogous to the post-sacrificial feasts of ancient religion (10[17ff.]), being a symbolic act of grateful and joyful communion with men in the supreme gifts of God.

These ordinances are no arbitrary signs of Christian faith and fellowship, having a value conferred by the bare fact of their appointment; they are parables of the spiritual acts which they accompany. Baptism, in its most complete and picturesque form of immersion, is strikingly applied in Ro 6[1-4] to set forth a Christian conversion: as the baptized sinks into the water, remains there for a moment, and emerges a new man, he rehearses the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus —he dies to sin, is severed from the past, and rises to live with Christ unto God. St. Paul's argument presumes that baptism is the expression on the candidate's part, and the recognition on the Church's part, of the faith that alone joins the soul to Christ; its efficacy lies in the uttered 'word' of faith attending the ceremonial act (Eph 5^{26}, ἐν ῥήματι; cf. Ro 10^{8-10}). A like interpretation of the Lord's Supper is indicated in 1 Co 10 and 11. The bread and the cup represent 'the body and the blood of the Lord' (11^{27}), so that he who desecrates the former outrages the latter; while the sharing of each in the same cup and loaf exhibits the 'fellowship' of Christians in the incarnate and crucified Redeemer ($10^{16.\ 17}$), whose 'death' is thus evermore 'proclaimed' and kept in remembrance (11^{24-26}). Such public representations are, in the nature of the case, binding professions of faith, covenant transactions (see 1 Co 10^{18-22}, and the parallels there adduced). The expression 'seal of faith,' which Paul applies to Abraham's sacrament in Ro 4^{11}, is equally appropriate to the new ordinances. The person by whom the rite is administered (1 Co 1^{13-17}), matters but little; everything depends upon (a) the institution of Christ, and (b) the intention and spirit of those engaged, the faith and fellowship by which they are actuated. Not as matters of official prerogative, but of stated communion between Christ and His people, did Paul exalt the sacraments. See, further, arts. BAPTISM, LORD'S SUPPER, SACRAMENT.

(e) Church Organization.—In respect to Church order and organization there is a contrast between the first and last Epp., so extreme that it raises grave difficulties in regard to the authenticity of the latter. 1 Ti and Tit are devoted to matters which occupy only a line in 1 Th. In the fifteen years' interval a great development had taken place. On the first missionary tour in S. Galatia, Paul and Barnabas 'appointed elders in every church' (Ac 14^{23}), resembling in their functions, mutatis mutandis, the elders of Jewish communities. A like office probably belonged to 'those who preside' in the Thessalonian Church (1 Th 5^{12}; cf. 1 Ti 5^{17}). In the letters to Corinth we have no traces of local Church office; from the silence of 1 Co 5 on this point, and from the scenes indicated in ch. 14, we may infer that official elders did not as yet preside here: 'helps, governments'—corresponding to deacons and bishops—are referred to in the abstract (12^{28}; otherwise in Ro $12^{7.\ 8}$); ch 11^{34} intimates better regulation to come. In the salutation of Philippians, four years later, the 'bishops and deacons' are distinctly addressed, and these two orders figure conspicuously in the Pastorals—the former as directing, the latter as assistant officers. The apostle is anxious about the character and true piety of these ministers, wishing to fence out from office unworthy candidates. The term 'bishop' in Tit 1 is synonymous with 'elder' (Lgtft. Christian Ministry; but cf. Hort, Eccl. 212), and is now preferred by Paul as it denotes the work of the office (1 Ti 3^{1}), while 'elder' suggests status and dignity. 'Bishop' (ἐπίσκοπος, overseer, superintendent) appears first in Ac $20^{28.\ 29}$, where Paul tells the Ephesian 'elders' that 'the Holy Spirit made' them 'bishops, to shepherd the Church' (cf. Eph 4^{11}, 'shepherds and teachers'; also 1 P 2^{25} 5^{1-5}). It is not unlikely that Paul then introduced the term and gave it vogue. Hatch (Organization of the Early Christian Churches) traced the episcopate to a Greek, as the presbyterate to a Jewish origin; he supposed that these were distinct institutions amalgamated in post-apostolic times—a theory, in its extreme form, contrary to Ac and 1 P as well as to the Pastoral Epistles. The charities of the Church and the maintenance of its ministry (1 Co 9^{7-14}, Gal 6^{6}) required business management (bishops and deacons are alike to be μὴ αἰσχροκερδεῖς, 1 Ti $3^{3.\ 8}$); Hatch derived the title ἐπίσκοπος from this financial charge (but see Cremer's Bib.-Theol. Lexicon, s.v., and Kühl's Gemeindeordnung, p. 87 ff.), whereas Ac 20 and 1 P make the bishop emphatically a pastor. The elders are encouraged to take a leading part 'in word and teaching' (1 Ti 5^{17}); some of them, it appears, did not teach, and any competent member of the Church might speak his word of exhortation. By the date of 1 Ti 5^{9}, the older 'widows' were 'enrolled' for Church maintenance and service, being included probably amongst the deaconesses, of whose existence at this early time Ro $16^{1.\ 2}$ affords the only, but sufficient, evidence. See, further, artt. on BISHOP, ELDER, and DEACON; also, generally, on CHURCH and CHURCH GOVERNMENT. The data furnished by the Ac and Epp. for the reconstruction of the forms of apostolic Church life and worship are comparatively slight, and open to conflicting interpretations. It is possible that the organization of the first Christian communities was more definite, and borrowed more freely from contemporary social institutions and usages than is shown by the incidental references of our documents.

Two important distinctions in Church service are to be observed: (1) between the clerical and the charismatic ministry—the ministry of official status and of personal gift, the former in some degree presuming the latter, but the latter not of necessity carrying with it the former; (2) between the local, congregational ministry and the itinerant, missionary ministry—the bishops and deacons, elected in the single community for its service, belonging to the former; to the latter, the apostles and evangelists (Eph 4^{11}, 2 Ti 4^{5}, Ac 21^{8}). Prophets and teachers, such as Agabus and Apollos, might labour in a single community or travel from Church to Church, their gift not of itself carrying with it local rule. Timothy is 'an evangelist'; to this work he was ordained by the hands of Paul and the local eldership at his setting out (1 Ti 4^{14}, 2 Ti 1^{6}). St. Paul's other companions, presumably, held the like travelling commission; other powers were conferred on them ad hoc, as in the case of Titus when Paul's delegate in Corinth or Crete.

As 'a called apostle of Christ Jesus,' an equal of the original Twelve, Paul claims the highest prerogatives under the Lord Himself: he is 'father' of his Churches, 'master-builder' in the fabric of Divine revelation, 'teacher of nations in faith and truth' (1 Co 3^{10} $4^{14.\ 15}$, 1 Ti 2^{7}, Ro $1^{5.\ 6}$ 15^{16-20}, Eph 3^{7-11}). The gospel of God he may therefore call 'my gospel,' since its dispensation was committed to him directly from the Lord. He does not expect this claim to be admitted without proof, but points to 'the signs of the apostle' visible in him, to the multitude of believers who were his living 'letters of commendation,' to the commanding inspiration of his word, to 'the grace given' to him and acknowledged by the Church leaders at Jerusalem (2 Co 12^{12} 13^{3} 3^{1-6}, 1 Co 14^{37}, Eph 3^{4}, Gal 2^{7-9}). Yet he writes in the plural of the 'ministers of Christ and stewards of God's mysteries,' including his fellow evangelists (1 Co 4^{1}, 2 Co $1^{18.\ 19}$) with himself. And 'the fair deposit' of his inspired word he commits, through those who received it at his mouth, to the 'faithful men' whom they should choose, to the Church which is the 'pillar and stay of the truth,' above all to the Lord who first gave the trust (1 Ti 1^{18} 3^{15} 6^{20}, 2 Ti 1^{12-14} 2^{2}). In questions of doctrine, Paul claims complete and incontestable authority; in matters of discipline, even the gravest, he requires the free concurrence of the Church concerned (1 Co 5, 2 Co 2^{6}, 2 Th 3^{6-15}).

6. Doctrine of the Kingdom of God.—The Jewish idea of the kingdom of God (the perfect Divine rule on earth to be established by the Messiah), which was adopted and spiritualized by Jesus, lies at the basis of the Pauline system. St. Paul's 'kingdom of God and of Christ' (known as Christ's from His exaltation onwards: Eph 1^{20-22}, Ph 2^{9}) transcends all national, and even earthly bounds; its glory fills the horizon of faith, which stretches indefinitely beyond death and the limits of sense.

The apostle's doctrine of the Last Things comes under this conception, which is both his alpha and omega. As missionary of Christ, Paul 'went along heralding the kingdom' (Ac 20^{25} 19^{8} 28^{31}); his hope in dying is that 'the Lord will bring me safe into his heavenly kingdom' (2 Ti 4^{18}). When a Pharisee, he had sought legal righteousness not to ensure his personal salvation so much as to bring about for Israel's sake, and for God's glory, the Messiah's promised kingdom (Ac 26^{7} etc.). This goal the Christian apostle still pursues, seeing it in larger proportions and with a brighter certainty. The Church never displaced the Kingdom in Paulinism (see e.g. 1 Th 2^{12}). These are correlated, and not equivalent or rival terms. One with its Head, the Church is the centre and mistress of the Kingdom; she furnishes it with citizens and dignitaries (1 Co 6^{2}). But the Kingdom embraces all orders of being (angels e.g., the mightiest of them, no less than men, Col 2^{10}),—the entire system of things as subject to our Redeemer's sway (Eph 1^{20-23}, Col 1^{15-20}, 1 Co 15^{24-28}, Ph 2^{9-11}).

As to the seat of its power, the kingdom of the Lord Christ is inward and spiritual. It is concerned essentially with 'righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit' (Ro $14^{17.18}$, Col $2^{16.20}$–$3^{4.15}$, Ph 4^{7}). Its ways of rule are wholly opposite to those associated with the Χριστὸς κατὰ σάρκα of Judaism, to the external methods and perishing glory of the Mosaic covenant. From this interior world of the spirit, through the sanctified body, all outward activity is to be dominated, and thus conformed to 'the good and well-pleasing and perfect will of God' (Ro 12). See art. on KINGDOM OF GOD.

(a) The Divine Sovereignty.—The doctrine of the Kingdom rests on the presupposition of the absolute sovereignty of God (see ii. 1, above)—'the Creator,' 'the blessed and only Potentate, King of those that reign and Lord of those that have lordship,' 'the only God' (1 Ti 1^{17} $6^{15.16}$, Ro 1^{25}). There is no appeal against His judgments (e.g. in the reprobation of Israel), no arresting of His decrees: 'whom he will he compassionates, whom he will he hardens' (Ro 9^{14-21}). Faith adores this Potentate as 'God our Father'; despite appearances, 'there is no unrighteousness with God.' St. Paul chiefly contemplates the Divine sovereignty in the aspect of wisdom (Ro 11^{33-36} 16^{27}). God's foreknowledge, joined with His love, laid down the προθεσις τῶν αἰώνων, the plan unfolded in the successive periods of human history (Eph 3^{11}, Ro 8^{28}, 2 Ti 1^{9}). This purpose of the ages, centring in the mission of Christ, is executed by Him 'who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (Eph 1^{11}, 1 Co 12^{6}). As a counsel of grace, the purpose is called 'the good pleasure (εὐδοκία) of his will'; hidden until Christ's coming, it was 'the mystery of his will' (Eph $1^{5.9}$ $3^{5.9}$, Ro 16^{25-27}). As an orderly disposing of men and things directed towards an all-wise end, the counsel of grace becomes the 'dispensation (οἰκονομία) of God' (Eph 1^{10} 3^{2}, 1 Ti 1^{4}); in pursuance of this counsel, a special 'dispensation (or stewardship) of the grace of God' is committed to each of His ministers (1 Co 9^{17}, Eph 3^{2}, Col 1^{25})—notably to St. Paul himself—its conditions, with those of every bestowment of grace, being determined by God's sovereign good pleasure in the interests of His kingdom (Ro 1^{5}, Eph 2^{4-7} 3^{2-11}). Creation and redemption are parts of one scheme, whose aim grows clearer as the ages pass; Christ is the point of unity to the mighty movement (Col 1^{15-23}, Eph 1^{10} $3^{10.11}$). 'In the Christ all things' must be 'summed up.'

The 'call' of God, both gracious and authoritative—conveyed generally in the message of the gospel, or particularly in some specific appointment—summons men to His service: the 'called saint' or 'called apostle' (Ro $1^{1.6}$, 1 Co 1^{2}) is alike the subject of a Divine vocation. Such calling springs from an antecedent 'choice' (election or selection, ἐκλογή), in which God's wise foreknowledge and gracious sovereignty are manifest (Ro $8^{28.29.33}$ 9^{11} 11^{5}, 1 Th 1^{4}, 2 Th $2^{13.14}$). The election of believers Paul refers (Ro $8^{28.29}$, Eph 1^{4}) to God's eternal counsel in Christ, since the future is known to Him as the present, and His will attends His knowledge: 'whom he foreknew, he did also foreordain.' 'Called' and 'elect' are synonymous expressions (1 Co $1^{26.27}$)—not distinguished as in Mt 20^{16}. St. Paul's doctrine of election is not so conceived as to negative freedom and the prerogative of faith. By these God has sovereignly, and eternally, conditioned His dealings with men. See arts. on ELECTION and PREDESTINATION.

(b) The Enemies of God.—In St. Paul's view of the kingdom of God its enemies are conspicuous. Chief amongst them is Satan (the Adversary), named in Eph and the Pastoral Epp. 'the devil' (calumniator); in 2 Co 6^{14-16} 'Beliar,' as the patron of heathen impurity and the antagonist of Christ; also 'the god of this age' (2 Co 4^{4}), 'the ruler of the dominion of the air' (Eph 2^{2}), 'the tempter' (1 Th 3^{5}), 'the evil one' (2 Th 3^{3}, Eph 6^{16}). Satanic powers, the Christian's most formidable enemies, are described in the plural in Eph 6^{12} as 'the principalities, the dominions, the world-rulers of this darkness, the spiritual (forces) of wickedness.' In heathenism these malignant forces have full sway; 'demons' are practically worshipped under the forms of the idols (1 Co 10^{19-21}). The lawlessness, uncleanness, and moral darkness there prevailing constitute Satan's empire, which assumes the character of an organized dominion—a 'kingdom of darkness' opposed to 'the kingdom of the Son of God's love' (Col 1^{13}; comp. Jn 14^{30} etc.)—with a hierarchy of powers under the direction of its chief, bearing titles parallel to those assigned to the ranks of God's angels (Eph 1^{21}, Col 1^{16}). (It seems likely that Paul borrowed these distinctions in angelic rank from popular speech, and employed them by way of argumentum ad hominem). Paul's conviction of the existence of evil spirits is unmistakable, as was that of Jesus. Satan first beguiled our race (2 Co 11^{3}—'the serpent'; 1 Ti $2^{13.14}$), and is habitually 'the tempter' (1 Th 3^{5}, 2 Ti 2^{26}). Paul's 'thorn in the flesh' was 'a messenger of Satan,' since it hindered his work and provoked him to discontent (2 Co 12^{7}, Gal 4^{14}, 1 Th 2^{18}). Physical maladies and death are, in some sense, under Satan's jurisdiction; he is used as executor in Divine judgments of this nature, which may turn notwithstanding to the salvation of the sufferer (1 Co 5, 1 Ti 1^{20}: comp. He 2^{14}, 1 P 4^{1}). The reign of death (Ro $5^{14.21}$) is coextensive with the rule of 'the god of this world'; only when 'death, the last enemy, is abolished,' shall God's kingdom be consummated (1 Co $15^{20-28.54}$). St. Paul anticipates a last deadly struggle in human history between these opposing realms. 'The mystery of lawlessness,' working previously under restraint, will be allowed one day a full manifestation (cf. Ro 7^{13}); and 'the lawless one,' Satan's perfect embodiment (apparently, a self-deifying autocrat of universal power), 'shall be revealed, whom the Lord shall destroy' by His coming (2 Th 2[3-12]). Nowhere more decidedly than in this field of thought does Paul show himself the child of Judaism. See, further, art. MAN OF SIN.

(c) The Consummation.—The Divine kingdom embraces in its scope present mundane affairs; the 'powers that be are ordained of God,' e.g. those of Rome though heathen and corrupt; the magistrate is 'God's servant to thee for good,' enforcing His laws in the civil state (Ro 13[1-7]). Throughout the perishing 'fashion of this world' Paul recognizes the will of Him 'of whom and for whom are all things,'—the demands of duty, the exercise of conscience; a realm where, despite 'the god of this world,' the true God leaves Himself at no point without witness or without authority.

But the Kingdom belongs in its proper manifestation and glory to the future. In 'this present evil world' it is hidden and thwarted, realized at best only 'in part' and with 'groanings'; its bestowments are no more than an earnest and firstfruit, the experience of a babe, in comparison of 'the glory that shall be revealed to us-ward' (Ro 8[18-25], 1 Co 13[8-12], 2 Co 4[16]–5[5]). It is 'through much tribulation' that we shall reach the goal and 'enter into the kingdom of God.' Hope, therefore, plays a leading part in St. Paul's teaching, by the side of faith and love. The certainty of the consummation of the kingdom of God crowns his theology, and determines it throughout as the end determines the way. The aims of Paul's life, as of the whole NT teaching, converge upon 'the kingdom and glory' yet to come. The following chief points may be noted in the apostle's doctrine of the Last Things:—

(a) The moral perfection of each believer, and the collective perfection of the Church, are the ends of the apostle's ministry as of Christ's own sacrifice (Col 1[20-22. 27. 28], Eph 5[25-27], Tit 3[4-7], 1 Th 2[19. 20] 3[12. 13] 5[23], Ph 2[15-18]). This inner glory and true wealth of God's kingdom, now being acquired (2 Co 3[18], Ro 8[30], 9[23]), shall shine forth at 'the unveiling of the sons of God,' when state shall correspond to character and the 'spiritual body' to the worth and needs of the informing spirit. On the other hand, it is well known that 'the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God' (1 Co 6[9] etc.). Their 'end shall be according to their works' (Ro 2[6-9], 2 Co 11[15], 2 Ti 4[14]).

(β) The resurrection of the body is necessary to the realization of the life of the spirit. St. Paul knows nothing of Hellenic or Oriental dualism. The body is not the detachable envelope, but the proper organ of the spirit. Its existing form of flesh and blood perishes, but only to be reconstituted in fitter fashion. It is true that in 1 Co 15[12] etc. Paul thinks only of οἱ τοῦ Χριστοῦ; but if the wicked exist in the world to come, they too must have an appropriate bodily form; there is nothing in the Epp. inconsistent with the statement of Ac 24[15], 'that there shall be a resurrection both of just and unjust' (cf. Jn 5[29]). In the risen Christ Paul sees 'the firstfruit of them that have fallen asleep'; the certainty and the kind of the harvest are evidenced by this first ripened sheaf (1 Co 15[20]). The fact that 'Jesus died and rose again' assures our faith that the Christian dead shall return, with Him (1 Th 4[13. 14]). The saints found alive at the παρουσία shall be transformed, the natural body giving place to the spiritual, and 'the mortal' in them being 'swallowed up of life' (1 Co 15[49-53], 2 Co 5[1-4]).

(γ) On the intermediate state Paul has no revelation. 'Sleep,' Jesus' name for death, implies comparative quiescence (cf. Rev 14[13]), yet without unconsciousness or torpor. The apostle expects 'to depart and be with Christ, which is very far better,'—in some communion nearer than the earthly; hence 'to die is gain' (Ph 1[21-23], 2 Co 5[6-8]; cf. Lk 23[43]). In his earliest Epp., up to 1 Co, the interval before the Parousia appears inconsiderable ('the time is short,' 1 Co 7[29]); Paul includes himself with those alive at the Lord's return (1 Th 4[7]). Afterwards the Advent receded in his view; when writing 2 Co, he anticipated a martyr's death and was 'bearing about the dying of the Lord Jesus' (4[7-18]). This experience effected 'a marked change in the Pauline eschatology' (Sabatier, Ap. Paul, on 2 Co 4. 5); St. Paul's earlier, half-Judaistic idea of a visible advent, a universal resurrection of the sleeping dead and a great judgment-scene, gave place, it is said, to the more spiritual theory of the soul's entrance through death into its perfected heavenly state and full communion with Christ. Similarly, Beyschlag (NT Theology, ii. pp. 268–272); and, with limitations, Kabisch (Eschatologie d. Paulus, 296–305); Pfleiderer thinks that the apostle held in his mind the two conceptions, Judaic and Hellenistic, unassimilated (Paulinismus[2], pp. 274–289). This interpretation is incorrectly deduced from 2 Co 5[1-9] (see Meyer and Klöpper, ad loc.; Weiss, NT Theol. § 96*d*). The apostle says (5[1]) that 'if the earthly tabernacle should be dissolved, we have an eternal house in the heavens,'—not that we enter it at once, but it belongs to us (as συγκληρονόμοι Χριστοῦ) and awaits us. He sighs for this heavenly house; without stripping off the present body, he longs to 'put on over it' (ἐπενδύσασθαι) the other,—were it only possible for him to be found 'not naked' (bodiless), but still in the flesh at the Lord's coming (vv.[2-4]). Though weary of the earthly tabernacle, Paul's Jewish imagination shuddered at the naked, houseless state of the dead. But he has gathered a great comfort which dispels the dread of dissolution; he is now 'well-pleased to leave home in departing from the body,' for he will be 'at home with the Lord' (vv.[5-9]). 'The dead in Christ' are His guests in Paradise (1 Th 4[14. 16]; cf. Lk 23[43], 2 Co 12[4]). Thus the sense of indissoluble union with Christ delivered the apostle from the pangs of Sheol, which came upon him in the interval between 1 and 2 Co (2 Co 1[9] 5[8], 1 Th 5[10], Col 1[28] 3[1-4]; see p. 711[b]). The Advent and Judgment were as necessary to the consummation of the kingdom of God, in St. Paul's belief, after he wrote 2 Co as before (see 5[10. 11], also Col 3[4]).

The chiliastic doctrine of a twofold resurrection has no support from Paul; when he writes (1 Th 4[16]) 'the dead in Christ shall rise first,' that means not, before the other dead rise, but before 'the living' are 'caught up' to join them. In 2 Co 5[10] bad and good appear side by side at Christ's tribunal, as in Ac 17[30. 31] and in the scene of Mt 25[31-46]. There is no reason to think that the apostle departed from the doctrine of his Master concerning the general resurrection and universal judgment.

(δ) The second coming of the Lord Jesus closes the horizon of St. Paul's Christian thought, and ushers in the end of all things. The Advent shines vividly in the first three and last three of his Epistles. The παρουσία of 1 and 2 Th and 1 Co becomes the ἐπιφάνεια of the Pastorals (also 2 Th 2[8])—a glorious Divine manifestation, such as, indeed, the first coming was in its kind (Tit 2[11], 2 Ti 1[10]). This expectation rested on the explicit promise of Jesus, and on the prophecies of the Messianic salvation and 'the day of the Lord' as yet unfulfilled (Ac 17[31], Ro 2[5-16], 1 Th 5[1-4], 2 Th 2[8], 1 Co 15[54]), but especially upon the sense of the glory due to Christ Himself (Ph 2[5-11]). The Parousia is 'the manifestation of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Christ Jesus'; therefore it is 'the blessed hope' (Tit 2[13], 2 Th 2[14]). The great day of the Lord, the goal of prophecy, becomes 'the day of Christ.' His resurrection began, the triumphal advent of the Lord Jesus shall complete, His vindication. He will descend from heaven in a visible 'body of glory' (1 Th 1^{10}, Ph $3^{20.21}$), surrounded by angels, and 'in fire of flame' terrible and fatal to His enemies (2 Th 1^{7-9} 2^{8}, 1 Th 4^{16}, 1 Co 15^{52}). At His word, uttered by the archangel's trumpet, the dead rise, the living saints are transformed and lifted from the earth; all assemble before Him for judgment, and with body and spirit reunited 'each shall receive the things done in the body, whether good or bad,' 'reaping corruption' or 'life eternal' according as he sowed to flesh or spirit (2 Co 5^{10}, Gal 6^{7-10}). So 'we shall all be manifested'—'the day shall disclose each man's work, the fire shall test' its worth (1 Co 3^{12-15}, Ro 2^{6-11}).

It might seem—indeed it has been asserted—that Paul thus reverts at the end to the principle of salvation by works which he overthrew at the beginning. But, as we have seen (ii. 3 (c)), the faith that justifies, operating through love, is the spring of all worthy living, while 'works of law,' wrought under constraint and fear, are no 'good works.' Faith justifies the believer now; the 'work of faith' shall commend him then. God, who sees the fruit in the germ and 'calls the things that are not as things that are' (Ro 4^{17}), judges according to truth both first and last.

The judgment-seat of Christ is the proximate goal of revelation. There the final settlement of human affairs takes place, the dénoûment of the drama of history,—of the successive dispensations of God's righteousness and grace to mankind. When death has been abolished and all Christ's enemies, human or superhuman, have received sentence from His mouth, 'then cometh the end'; He 'yields up the kingdom to God, even to the Father'; and 'the Son himself shall be subjected to him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all' (1 Co 15^{24-28}). For the mission on which the Father sent forth His Son is then fulfilled: the Lordship of Jesus is acknowledged throughout creation (Ph $2^{10.11}$); Christ lays at the Father's feet the homage of a reconciled universe rendered to Himself, the love of a multitude of obedient sons made perfect in Himself, the praise and service of the Church of the redeemed united with Himself for ever. His own subjection as a Son to the Father displays the absolute oneness of the Godhead, whose glory streams through all realms of being in unchecked and unbounded plenitude. Thus God the Father is eternally supreme, and 'grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life.' See, further, under ESCHATOLOGY OF NT.

K. COMMENTARIES.—For works of exegesis on particular Epp. see special articles. For the Epp. as a whole, or in considerable sections: of Gr. Fathers, Origen (Fragg. in Epp. P.), Chrysostom (followed by the rest), Theod. Mops., Theodoret, John of Damascus, Theophylact, Œcumenius; of the Latins, Ambrosiaster, Pelagius. In the Middle Ages, Thom. Aquinas, Expositio in omnes epp. S. Pauli. At the Revival of Learning, Laurentius Valla, Collatio (bearing on text); Nicholas à Lyra. J. Colet, with his Lectures on St. Paul's Epp., and Erasmus (In NT Annotationes) led the way in the Reformation period; J. Calvin towers above all others (In NT Commentarii), followed by Th. Beza (Interpretatio and Annotationes in NT), with the Rom. Cath. G. Estius (Commentt. in Epp.) for a worthy rival; Cornelius à Lapide and Bernardinus à Piconio (Epp. P. tripartita expositio: richly spiritual) are R.C. interpreters of the 17th cent., Hugo Grotius (Annott. in NT—humanistic and Arminian) the chief Prot. exegete; John Locke wrote a characteristic Paraphrase and Notes on Gal., 1 and 2 Cor., Ro., Eph.; J. Pierce, 'after the manner of Mr. Locke,' on Col., Phil., Heb. (of distinct value); J. J. Wetstein, NT Græcum, rich in classical and Jewish illustration. J. A. Bengel opens the modern period, with his inimitable Gnomon NT; J. F. Flatt, early in this cent., Commentar über Römer . . . Titus, in 5 vols.; then followed the standard critical works of W. M. L. de Wette, H. A. W. Meyer (tr.; re-edited since his death in Germany by various leading scholars). J. C. K. von Hofmann's exposition, Die hl. Schrift NT untersucht, and H. Ewald's Die Sendschreiben d. Ap. Paulus, are of special value for Paul. The recent Kurzgefasster Kommentar (ed. Zöckler) and Handcommentar z. NT (Schmiedel, Lipsius, v. Soden) continue the task of scientific exegesis in Germany—the former in a conservative, the latter in a critical sense. In England, St. Paul has attracted our best exegetical scholarship: H. Alford and C. Wordsworth have interpreted the whole Gr. Test.; J. B. Lightfoot, Gal., Phil., Col. and Philem., with posthumous Notes on Epp. of Paul, covering 1 and 2 Th, 1 Co 1-7, Ro 1-7, Eph 1[1-14]; C. J. Ellicott, all the Epp. except Ro and 2 Co (in 6 vols.); B. Jowett, 1 and 2 Thess., Ro., Gal. (a continuous work); J. Eadie, Gal.-2 Thess. (5 vols.); J. A. Beet, Ro.-Col. (4 vols.); M. F. Sadler, all the Epp.; J. R. Boise, Notes, Critical and Explan., on the Gr. Text of Paul's Epp. (New York); various writers, in the Internat. Crit. Comm., Speaker's Comm., Popular Comm., NT Comm. for Eng. Readers, Pulpit Comm., Expositor's Bible and Gr. Test., Camb. Gr. Test. and Bible for Schools, etc. R. Whately's Essays on some Difficulties in the Writings of St. Paul is worth consulting. In French, H. Oltramare has written very ably on Ro., Eph. and Col. with Philem. (5 vols.); F. Godet, on Ro. and 1 Co. (tr.; 4 vols.); L. Bonnet, Épîtres de Paul.

C. Clemen, Einheitlichkeit d. paulin. Briefe (1894), digests recent hypotheses of interpolation and compilation in the Epp., attempting a reconstruction on his own part.

G. G. FINDLAY.

PAULUS, SERGIUS (Σέργιος Παῦλος, Sergius Paulus). — During what is generally called St. Paul's First Missionary Journey he visited Paphos in the island of Cyprus. There he and Barnabas were summoned to appear before Sergius Paulus, the proconsul (AV deputy), a man of understanding (συνετός), in whose train was one Elymas or Bar-jesus, a Magus. The proconsul, who 'sought to hear the word of God,' appears to have been at least impressed; and Elymas is said to have attempted to turn him aside from the faith. At St. Paul's rebuke, Elymas becomes blind for a season; and the proconsul, we are told, 'when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the teaching of the Lord' (Ac 13[6-12]). It may be added that for the first time we are told (v.[9]) that the second name of Saul was Paul. That name is used henceforth in the narrative, and from this time Paul and not Barnabas seems to take the leading place.

The Sergii were a Roman patrician gens (cf Verg. Aen. v. 121: 'Sergestusque domus tenet a quo Sergia nomen'); and Paulus was a cognomen in use in this and other gentes. There was a L. Sergius Paulus consul in A.D. 168, and another consul suffectus at some date unknown. In the Index of Authors to Pliny's Natural History (bk. i.), a Sergius Paulus is twice mentioned as an authority for Books ii. and xviii.; and in both, as Lightfoot shows, Pliny seems to give special information about Cyprus. The suggestion of identity is interesting, but of course very uncertain; it accords with the fact that the proconsul has a magus, a man of science, in his train. That Sergius Paulus is rightly described as proconsul is undoubted. At the original distribution of the provinces Cyprus was under the emperor (B.C. 27), but in B.C. 22 it was transferred with Gallia Narbonensis to the senate, the emperor receiving Dalmatia in exchange (Dio Cassius, liii. 12, liv. 4). At a later date under Hadrian it was again governed by a proprætor and was imperial, probably owing to the Jewish insurrection. Inscriptions, two dating from the years 51, 52 (CIS 2631, 2632), and coins of the 1st cent., clearly mention the island as governed by proconsuls. Of these the most interesting is one discovered by Cesnola (Cyprus, p. 425), and accurately published by Hogarth (Devia Cypria, pp. 113, 115). It runs as follows: 'Apollonius to his father . . . son of . . . and his mother Artemidora, daughter of . . . consecrated the enclosure and this monument according to your own (his parents) command, . . . having filled the offices of clerk of the markets, prefect, town clerk, high priest, and having been in charge of the record office. Erected on the 25th of the month Demarchexusius in the year 13. He also revised the senate by means of assessors in the time of the proconsul Paulus.' The date of the inscription is probably A.D. 55, and the revision of the senate presumably took place nine years previously. As Hogarth says (op. cit. p. 115), 'there can be no good reason for doubting our identification, which would unquestionably have been proposed and hardly disputed had Sergius Paulus been known from any other source than the New Testament.'

The question has been raised: Is there any connexion between the Gentile name of the apostle, Paulus, and the name of the proconsul? The answer must be in the negative. Paul, as a Roman citizen by birth, would have his Roman nomen, prænomen, and cognomen, and the resemblance of names, therefore, is only a coincidence. The Gentile name is here used in the Acts for the first time, because for the first time the apostle is in contact with Gentiles. See, further, art. PAUL, p. 697 f.

A. C. HEADLAM.

PAVEMENT (מִרְצָפָה, רִצְפָּה; βάσις, λιθόστρωτον, περίστυλον).—In early days the floors of houses no doubt were simply of beaten earth, but gradually people learned to make some kind of cement, with which to harden the floor, from the admixture of lime, bitumen, or oil. At the present day a hard cement is used in cisterns and floors in Palestine, made by mixing red earth with olive oil; and during the PEF excavations (1867-71) ancient tanks were discovered in which this cement had been used, which was of a very tenacious description, breaking with a conchoidal fracture. The floors of houses of the wealthy were seldom boarded, but were paved with cement, stone, marble and mosaics, bricks, tiles, etc. Many of the floors of the palaces in Chaldæa and Assyria were merely beaten earth. In the recent PEF excavations (Quarterly Statement, July 1899, 181) at Tell Zakarîya the floors of the houses are found to be of mud and ashes, grouted with small pebbles, about 3 inches thick, with an uneven surface. During the PEF excavations at Jerusalem (1867–71) a large number of floors of houses of the poorer (?) classes were examined, and found to consist of rough cubes of marble laid in some kind of white cement. In better houses those cubes were set in patterns. In some of the houses large flags or paving stones were used, and these were sometimes of polished marble. The great street outside the temple enclosure was found during the excavation to be paved with white marble, as described by Josephus (Ant. XX. ix. 7): 'Herod Agrippa did not obstruct the people when they desired that Jerusalem might be paved with white stone.' 'Solomon laid a causeway of black stones along the roads that led to Jerusalem, both to render them easy for travellers and to manifest his riches and grandeur' (ib. VIII. vii. 4). This no doubt was basalt. In the ruins of Babylon the pavements of roofs, courts, and chambers are composed of two layers of burnt brick with a thick layer of asphalt underneath (Perrot and Chipiez, i. 156). Rassam tells us that he found at Abou Abba (Sippara) in Chaldæa a chamber paved with asphalt, much in the same fashion as a road or street in London or Paris (ib. ii. 401).

There were three kinds of pavements or flooring in the Assyrian palaces—beaten earth, brick pavements, and limestone slabs (Place, Ninive, i. 295). In the palace of Sargon nearly every chamber except those of the harem had a floor of beaten earth, like those in a modern fellah's house. Even in the most sumptuous hall there was no exception to this rule. These floors were probably covered with mats or cloth carpets. In the harem chambers at Khorsabad, as well as in the open courts and terraces, a very carefully laid pavement is found, composed of two layers of large bricks with a thick bed of sand between them, the lower course of bricks being set in a bed of bitumen which separates it from the earth and prevents any dampness passing either up or down. In some of the harem rooms, courts, and vestibules, before the gates of the city, and in paths across wide open spaces, a limestone pavement has been found. Thus stones are often seen there 3 feet square and 2 feet 6 inches thick; but they are not cubical, but rather of the shape of a reversed pyramid, roughly hewn on all sides except the base, which is uppermost. They are laid without mortar or cement, and are singularly durable (Perrot and Chipiez, i. 239).

As bitumen was obtainable at Jerusalem, it is possible that it may have been used in the construction of floors of palaces and large houses. Josephus (BJ IV. viii. 4) tells us that the Dead Sea casts up black clods of bitumen which float on the water and are drawn into the ships, and then used for caulking ships and for medicine. At the present day bitumen is now and then cast up and brought to Jerusalem.

In Egypt, where stone was plentiful, the temple courts were usually paved with flagging. Strabo, in describing the plans of temples of Egypt generally (XVII. i. 25), says that at the entrance into the temenos is a paved floor, in breadth about a plethrum or even less, its length three or four times as great. In front of the Great Pyramid of Gizeh is still a great pavement, which is thus described by Petrie (Great Pyramid, 14): 'This basalt pavement is a magnificent work, which covered more than a third of an acre. The blocks of basalt are all sawn and fitted together! Round the pyramid itself, and extending some distance, about 500 feet on each side, was a limestone pavement about 21 inches thick.'

Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt. ii. 115) says that the floors of houses in Egypt were sometimes made of stone, or a composition of lime and other materials.

The references to pavements and floors in the Bible are not numerous, and refer generally to the temple. The floor of the temple of Solomon was made of 'boards of fir' or cypress (1 K $6^{15.\ 16.\ 30}$) overlaid with gold. King Ahaz took down the sea from off the brazen oxen, and put it on a pavement (מַרְצֶפֶת) of stone, 2 K 16^{17}. At the dedication of the temple at Jerusalem by king Solomon, 'they bowed themselves with their faces to the ground upon the pavement (רִצְפָּה), and worshipped,' 2 Ch 7^{3}. The pavement (רִצְפָּה) in the bedroom of the palace of the king of Persia was of red, white, yellow, and black marble, Est 1^{6}. There was a pavement (רִצְפָּה) in the temple of Ezekiel (Ezk $40^{17.\ 18}$ 42^{3}, and see Davidson on 41^{8}).

The dust of the floor of the tabernacle is spoken of as though the floor was of beaten earth (Nu 5^{17}). The very beautiful pavements found all over Palestine in recent years are nearly all of a comparatively late period, i.e. since the Roman occupation. See also GATE, HOUSE, ROOF, WALLS.

For the 'pavement' (λιθόστρωτον) of Jn 19^{13} see GABBATHA.

C. WARREN.

PAVILION is formed (through Fr. pavillon) from Lat. papilio, which meant a 'butterfly,' and also (from the resemblance to a butterfly's outspread wings) a tent. Tindale, in his 'Prologe to Exodus,' explains TABERNACLE as 'an house made tentwise, or as a pavelion.' Pavilion is the tr. in AV of סֹךְ ṣōk in Ps 27^{5}, and of סֻכָּה ṣukkah in 2 S 22^{12}, 1 K $20^{12.\ 16}$, Ps 18^{11} 31^{20} (to which RV adds Job 36^{29} and Is 4^{6} for AV 'tabernacle'). Elsewhere ṣōk occurs in Ps 10^{9} (סֻכּוֹ, AV and RV 'in his den'), 76^{2} (AV and RV 'tabernacle,' RVm 'covert'), and Jer 25^{38} (AV and RV 'covert'). Ṣukkah is of frequent occurrence, and is rendered 'booth' or 'tabernacle,' once 'tent' (2 S 11^{11}). Besides these, שְׁפְרוּר shaphrûr (Kerê שְׁפָרוּר) in its single occurrence, Jer 43^{10}, is tr. 'royal pavilion' (RVm 'glittering pavilion'). RV has also given 'pavilion' in Nu 25^{8}, with m. 'alcove' for AV 'tent' (Heb. קֻבָּה). See BOOTH, TABERNACLE, TENT.

PE (פ).—The seventeenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 17th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by p or ph.

PEACE, the tr^{n} in OT of the Heb. שָׁלוֹם shālôm (from the root שָׁלַם 'to be whole')='wholeness,' 'soundness,' hence health, wellbeing, prosperity; more particularly, peace as opposed to war, concord as opposed to strife; in NT it is tr^{n} of the Gr. εἰρήνη (which in LXX ordinarily translates שָׁלוֹם), 'peace,' 'quiet,' as opposed to war or strife, hence security, safety, prosperity.

The fundamental meaning of שָׁלוֹם is prosperity, wellbeing, good of any kind (Ges.), a meaning which reappears in the Gr. εἰρήνη. (So Ps 122^{7}, peace and prosperity; Is 52^{7}, Jer 29^{7} peace as opposed to evil; 1 Th 5^{3} peace and safety; Ac 24^{2}). In this sense it is used in the formulæ of greeting (Is it well—Heb. peace—with thee? 2 K 4^{26}, Gn 29^{6}, cf. Gn 37^{14}; Peace be unto you, Lk 24^{36}, Jn $20^{19.\ 21.\ 26}$) or of dismissal (Go in peace, 1 S 1^{17} 20^{42}, 2 S 15^{9}, Mk 5^{34}, Lk 8^{48}, Ac 15^{33}; cf. the blessing, Nu 6^{26}). In a secondary sense it is used of peace as opposed to war (Ec 3^{8} 'a time for war and a time for peace,' Jg 4[17], 1 S 7[14], Lk 14[32], Ac 12[20], Rev 6[4]), of concord as opposed to strife (Ob[7], Ps 28[3], Jer 9[8]; cf. Mt 10[34], 1 Co 7[15], Eph 4[3]). Hence the expression 'man of one's peace' for an intimate friend (Ps 41[9] 'mine own familiar friend'; Jer 20[10. 38][22]). In this sense God Himself is said to be a God, not of confusion but of peace (1 Co 14[33]). Hence He requires peace of men (Zec 8[16], Ps 34[14] 35[20], Ro 14[17], 1 Co 7[15], Eph 4[3], He 12[14]). Those who practise it He rewards (Ja 3[18], cf. Mt 5[9]), but those who disregard it are punished (Is 59[8. 9], Ro 3[17]).

In the primary sense of prosperity, peace is a blessing of which God alone is the author (Is 45[7] 'I, J", make peace and create evil'; cf. Job 25[2], Ps 147[14]), and which He bestows upon the righteous (Gn 15[15] Abraham; 2 K 22[20] Josiah; Ps 37[37] the perfect man; Ps 119[165] those who love God's law; Pr 3[2] those who follow the divine Wisdom; cf. Ps 4[8], Job 5[24], Is 32[17] 'And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness, and confidence for ever.' Cf. also Ja 3[18]). It is a gift which God desires to impart to all His people (Jer 29[11]), but which He is often unable to grant because of their sins (Is 48[18], Jer 4[10]; cf. v.[14]). For there can be no peace to the wicked (Is 48[22] 57[21]). Those who hope for it, while continuing in their iniquity, are self-deceived (Jer 6[14] 8[11], Ezk 13[10. 16]).

Among the blessings to which Israel looks forward in the Messianic time none is more emphasized than peace. The covenant which God made with the fathers at the first (Nu 25[12], Lv 26[6], Mal 2[5. 6]), and for the fulfilment of which the prophets confidently look, is a covenant of peace (Is 54[10], Ezk 34[25] 37[26]). The messenger who brings tidings of the coming salvation is one who publishes peace (Is 52[7], Nah 1[15]). The Messiah Himself is the Prince of Peace (Is 9[6]; cf. Mic 5[5], Zec 6[13]). Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end (Is 9[7]). In His days the righteous shall flourish, and abundance of peace till the moon be no more (Ps 72[3. 7]). Psalmist and prophet alike are full of pictures of the time when J" shall bless His people with peace (Ps 29[11]); when the meek shall inherit the land and delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps 37[11]); when peace shall be within the walls of Jerusalem (Ps 122[7]); in the temple (Hag 2[9]); when men shall go in with joy and be led forth with peace (Is 55[12]; cf. 54[13]); when the very officers shall be peace and the exactors righteousness (Is 60[17]); when peace shall extend to Jerusalem like a river and the glory of the nations like an overflowing stream (Is 66[12]); nay, when God shall speak peace to the very Gentiles (Zec 9[10]). Even Jeremiah, bitter in his denunciations of those who cry peace when there is no peace, and prophesy before the time (4[10] 6[14] 8[11] 14[13] 23[17] 28[9]), is firm in his belief that a time is coming when God will reveal to His people abundance of peace and truth (33[6]).

The NT shares with OT the view of peace as a characteristic of the Messianic time (Lk 1[79] 2[14] 19[38], Ac 10[36]). In this sense is probably to be understood the greeting of the disciples on their missionary journey (Mt 10[12. 13], Lk 10[5. 6]). The gospel of the Messiah is expressly called a gospel of peace (Eph 6[15], Ac 10[36]). As such it is opposed to all strife and confusion. Jesus Himself is the great peace-maker, who, by preaching peace to those who are near and to those who are afar off, and reconciling both to God, has Himself become our peace (Eph 2[14f.]; cf. Mic 5[5], He 7[2] Melchizedek, King of Peace, as a type of Christ). Hence, while God is frequently called in NT the God of peace (Ro 15[33] 16[20], 2 Co 13[11], Ph 4[9], 1 Th 5[23], 2 Th 3[16], He 13[20]), we have reference not merely to the peace of God (Ph 4[7]), but to the peace of Christ (Col 3[15]; cf. the apostolic salutations. 'Grace to you, and peace from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ,' Ro 1[7] and often). Thus in His farewell words to His disciples Jesus represents peace as a gift to them from Himself (Jn 14[27] 16[33]: 'My peace I give unto you. These things have I spoken to you, that in me ye may have peace').

Characteristic of NT is the view of peace as the present possession of the Christian. In a single case it is used by St. Paul of that future blessedness which is to be expected by the righteous at the Parousia (Ro 2[10]), but in general it denotes a state of the Christian in this present life. It is so used by Jesus in His farewell promise (Jn 14[27] 16[33]), 'My peace I give unto you.' It is regularly so represented by St. Paul. Cf. Ro 8[6] 'The mind of the Spirit is life and peace'; Ro 15[13] 'Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing'; 2 Th 3[16] 'The Lord of peace give you peace at all times in all ways'; Col 3[15] 'Let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts'; Ro 5[1] 'We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ' (so Lipsius, Hdcom. ii. pt. 2, 108; Cremer, Lex. 364 et al., who read ἔχομεν in place of the better attested ἔχωμεν). In this connexion peace acquires the technical meaning of 'the tranquil state of a soul assured of its salvation through Christ, and so fearing nothing from God, and content with its earthly lot, of whatever sort it be' (Thayer, Lex. 182). As such it is the direct result of the redemption of Christ (Eph 2[16. 17]), and consists primarily in a state of conscious reconciliation with God (Ro 5[1]), though often used in a broader sense to denote all the blessings which accompany and flow from that reconciliation (so 2 Th 3[16], and in the apostolic greetings, Ro 1[7], 1 Co 1[3], and often).

PEACE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

PEACOCKS (תֻּכִּיִּים and תוכיים tukkiyyim).—The word 'peacocks' occurs in two passages, 1 K 10[22] (where LXX seems to have translated it by πελεκητοί = 'things [sc. λίθοι, stones] carved by an axe') and 2 Ch 9[21] (where LXX omits the word). The Vulg. in both has pavi. A third place in which AV gives 'peacock' (Job 39[13]) has another Heb. original (רְנָנִים rĕnānīm), which doubtless refers to the ostrich, as in RV. As we have no reason to doubt the correctness of the rendering 'peacocks' for tukkiyyim, this stately bird, Pavo cristatus, L., was doubtless imported by Solomon either direct from India (? Ophir = Abhira) or from some port to which Hiram's sailors had brought it from India (see Cheyne in Expos. Times, July 1898, p. 472). Sir E. Tennant (Ceylon, ii. 102) has shown that the Tamil name of 'peacocks' is tokei, apparently a cognate of tukkiyyim. It is very abundant in the forests of India, and in some of the native states it is illegal to shoot it. We have no mention of its introduction into Mediterranean regions earlier than the time of Solomon. It is, however, very frequently alluded to in the Gr. and Lat. classics.

G. E. POST.

PEARL.—There is no evidence in favour of the AV 'pearl' for גָּבִישׁ gabhīsh (Job 28[18]). The LXX merely transliterates γαβείς. It means far more probably 'crystal' (so RV, Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, Dillmann, A. B. Davidson, et al.). Although this is not, and never has been, regarded as a precious stone, yet fine pieces of rock crystal, especially if large enough to be made into vases, have always been highly valued. The word פְּנִינִים which occurs in the same passage, and in Pr 3^{15} (Ḳerê) 8^{11} 20^{15} 31^{10}, La 4^{7}, should perhaps be tr^{d} 'pearls' (see Dillm. on Job 28^{18}). Both AV and RV text have 'rubies,' RVm 'or red coral or pearls' (in La 4^{7} 'or corals'). Pearls (μαργαρῖται) are mentioned in the NT in several places. They were and are much prized gems (1 Ti 2^{9}, Rev 17^{4}). They were chosen by Christ as a type of that which was most precious, to be compared with the kingdom of heaven (Mt 13^{45}). The verb nazam in Arab., coupled with lulu='pearl,' signifies 'to string pearls.' Coupled with shi'r='poetry,' it means 'to arrange verses.' Thus poetry is compared with pearls. The Arab poets and authors ring innumerable changes on the names for pearls in characterizing their literary productions. Thus a poem is called 'the Lone Pearl,' or 'The Precious Pearl,' or 'The String of Pearls,' etc. Our Saviour warns us against giving that which is holy unto dogs, and casting our pearls before swine (Mt 7^{6}). The instinct of Christian consciousness has usually interpreted pearls here as referring to the precious words of Divine revelation. This would be in strict accord with the Oriental usage above illustrated. The gates of pearl (Rev 21^{21}) are probably to be understood as mother of pearl. Separate pearls are the same in composition and origin as the shell, being formed by the gradual deposition of layers of the secretion of the oyster, Avicula margaritifera, L. They are usually deposited in the most fleshy parts, particularly within and around the adductor muscle. When the secretion of the oyster is morbidly increased, not only are separate pearls formed, but nodules and excrescences of the same sort are produced on the inner surface of the shell. These are often detached and sold as pearls, but at a lower price.

PECULIAR.—The Heb. word sĕgullah (סְגֻלָּה) is used in Ex 19^{5} of the people of Israel as God's special possession and care, and it is translated in AV and RV 'a peculiar treasure.' It is applied to Israel in the same sense, but with 'am (עַם), 'people,' prefixed in Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} 26^{18}. Ex 19^{5} is echoed in Ps 135^{4} 'For the Lord hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure'; and in Mal 3^{17}, where the reference is transferred to the Israel of the future.* The origin of the word is unknown, and no form of its root is elsewhere found in the Bible, but its meaning is made clear by 1 Ch 29^{3} and Ec 2^{8}. In the former passage David says that in addition to the public money to be used in the building of the temple, he has a private store which he is ready to hand over for the same purpose. 'We might say that it was the fiscus as distinguished from the ærarium, the privy purse as opposed to the public treasury' (Lightfoot, Fresh Rev.^{2} p. 264). In Ec 2^{8} the reference is also to the 'peculiar treasure of kings.' The sĕgullah is therefore that which is one's own, that to which no one else has a claim.

The LXX translators seem to have caught the meaning, but found it difficult to express in Greek. In 1 Ch 29^{3} they use the verb περιποιεῖσθαι (ὃ περιπεποίημαι, 'which I have saved up'); but that verb is unsuitable in the other places, and they appear to have coined an adj. περιούσιος,† which (along with λαός, 'people') they use in Ex 19^{5} 23^{22} (not in the Heb. or Eng.), Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} 26^{18}, and a subst. περιουσιασμός, which they use in Ps 135^{4}, Ec 2^{8}. In Mal 3^{17} they use the subst. περιποίησις. The adj. περιούσιος occurs twice in NT, (1) Tit 2^{14} λαὸς περιούσιος, a verbal quotation from Dt 14^{2}; (2) 1 P 2^{9}, in which, though a quotation from Ex 19^{5} (where the LXX is also λαὸς περιούσιος), the expression is λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν (the same as in LXX of Mal 3^{17}).

Jerome (Op. vi. 725 f.) was puzzled with the περιούσιος which he found in the LXX, and, discovering it nowhere else, he concluded, from an examination of the biblical passages and from the verb περιεῖναι, to excel, that it expressed separation in the sense of superiority. But finding that Symmachus, who usually gives ἐξαίρετος for περιούσιος, once used the Latin adj. peculiaris, he perceived that the true force of the Heb. and Gr. words is 'separation to one's self,' and chose the words peculium and peculiaris as the usual translation, thus replacing the inadequate abundans of the Old Lat. by a singularly felicitous word. For *peculium (whence adj. peculiaris) is a word of special significance in Roman society, being a person's private purse, and especially the private property possessed by a son or daughter independently of their father, or by a slave independently of his master.

Jerome did not always use this word. In Ex 19^{5} he has in peculium, in Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} 26^{18} populus peculiaris, in 1 Ch 29^{3} peculium meum, and in Mal 3^{17} in peculium. But in Ps 135^{4} he uses the more general in possessionem, and in Ec 2^{8} simply substantias. In Tit 2^{14} he has populus acceptabilis, and in 1 P 2^{9} populus acquisitionis. These unsatisfactory renderings in the Vulg. NT are due, Lightfoot thinks, to the fact that the NT was translated first, and that only after its translation had Jerome recognized the value of the rendering suggested by Symmachus.

We have no subst in Eng. to correspond with the Lat. peculium, and even the adj. 'peculiar' seems not to have been available for Wyclif's purpose, for he never uses it, though translating directly from the Vulgate. In Ex 19^{5} he has 'my propre tresour' (but in 1388 'a specialte'), while in Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} 26^{18} he has (and so Purvey, 1388) 'a special people.'† It was Tindale, in his NT of 1526, who introduced 'a peculiar people.' He was followed, in Tit 2^{14}, by all the Eng. versions except the Rhem. ('a people acceptable'), and in 1 P 2^{9} by all except Cran. ('a people whych are wonne') and Rhem. ('a people of purchase'). It is greatly to be regretted that the adj. 'peculiar' has lost its honourable meaning. Its earlier use may be illustrated from Udall's Erasmus' Paraphrase, i. fol. 32, 'Every tree hath his peculyer and proper fruyte, which by the taste doeth declare the stocke'; Synode at Dort, p. 6, 'The true cause of the free Election is the good pleasure of God . . . consisting herein, that out of the common multitude of sinners he culled out to himselfe, for his owne peculiar, some certaine persons, or men'; and Knox, Works, iii. 13, 'Seeke God, who is a peculiar Father to the faithfull, delivering them from all tribulations, not for their worthynesse, but for his own mercie.'

The Revisers have been divided on the propriety of retaining the word. In Tit 2^{14}, 1 P 2^{9} 'a peculiar people' is changed into 'a people for his (God's) own possession.' But in Dt 7^{6} 'a special people' is turned into 'a peculiar people,' and that phrase or 'a peculiar treasure' is retained in the OT wherever it occurs in AV. In 1 Ch 29^{3} 'mine own proper good' becomes 'a treasure of mine own'; and in Mal 3^{17} the familiar 'in that day when I make up my jewels' of AV is changed into 'in the day that I do make, even a peculiar treasure' (see JEWEL, vol. ii. p. 655^{b}, § 5).

The adj. 'peculiar' occurs also in Wis 19^{6} 'Serv-

* See Neubauer on 'Expressions employed concerning Israel as a Chosen Nation,' in Expos. Times, vol. iii. (1891–92), p. 10.

† So also it is probable that ἰσιούσιος, which is not found earlier than in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6^{11}, Lk 11^{3}), was coined by the Evangelists, as similar compounds (ἑτεροούσιος, ὁμοούσιος, ὁμοιούσιος, συνούσιος) were formed by eccles. Gr. writers.

* Peculium is from pecus, cattle, that being the chief part of property in early Roman days.

† Wyclif's and Purvey's renderings in the other places are: 1 Ch 29^{3} 'Myne owne tresor' (1388 'my proper catel'—which, when we think of the origin of peculium, and compare Eng. 'chattel,' the same word, brings us very near the true meaning); Ps 135^{4} 'into possessioun'; Ec 2^{8} 'substaunces' (Purvey, 'the castels'—a various spelling of 'catels' or a slip. Purvey uses 'castels' for 'tents' in Ex 14^{20}, but it seems to be found nowhere else in the sense of property); Mal 3^{17} 'into a special tresoure'; Tit 2^{14} 'a peple acceptable'; 1 P 2^{9} 'puple of purchasinge.'

ing [=observing] the peculiar commandments that were given unto them' (ὑπηρετοῦσα ταῖς ἰδίαις ἐντολαῖς, RV 'ministering to thy several commandments'); and RV introduces it into Wis 3[14] 'There shall be given him for his faithfulness a peculiar favour' (τῆς πίστεως χάρις ἐκλεκτή, AV 'the special gift of faith'). This is the sense in which the word is used by Udall (quoted above); by Adams on 2 P 1[5] 'Woe to them that engross faith, that enclose God's commons, that make that several and peculiar, which the Lord hath laid open and made common'; and by Herbert in the familiar lines from The Temple (§ 158, 'Judgment')—

'Almightie Judge, how shall poor wretches brook
Thy dreadful look,
Able a heart of iron to appall,
When Thou shalt call
For ev'ry man's peculiar book?'

PEDAHEL (פְּדַהְאֵל, Φαδαήλ).—The prince of Naphtali, one of those who took part in dividing the land, Nu 34[28] P. The name belongs to the late and artificial class which has so many representatives in P (cf. Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 198, 200, 210, 310, and in Expos. Sept. 1897, p. 179 ff.).

PEDAHZUR (פְּדָהְצוּר, Φαδασ(σ)ούρ).—The father of Gamaliel, the prince of the tribe of Manasseh, at the time of the Exodus, Nu 1[10] 2[20] 7[54. 59] 10[23]. The question of the early or late character of such compound names, and of the early use by the Hebrews of Ẓur (='rock') absolutely as a divine name will be found fully discussed by Hommel (AHT 300, 319 f.), who affirms such use, and G. Buchanan Gray (Heb. Proper Names, 196, and especially in his criticism of Hommel in Expos. Sept. 1897, pp. 179 ff.), who denies it. See also art. ROCK. J. A. SELBIE.

PEDAIAH (פְּדָיָה 'J" has redeemed,' פְּדָיָהוּ in 1 Ch 27[20]; the Sept. MSS have a great variety of forms; Φαλαιά, Φαλαδαιά, etc., are probably corruptions of Φαδαιά in which Δ has been mistaken for Λ).—1. Father of Joel, who was ruler under David over western Manasseh (1 Ch 27[20], B Φαλαδαιά, A Φαλδιέ, Luc. Φαδαλας). So early an occurrence of a compound name in which one of the elements is פְּדָה can be paralleled from P only (Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 198 f.). 2. Father of Zebidah, one of the wives of king Josiah (2 K 23[36], B Ἐδδείλ, A Ἐλεδδιλά). Through his daughter he became great-grandfather of king Jehoiachin, one of whose sons has the same name (No. 3), accidentally it may be supposed (cf. Gray, Heb. Proper Names, p. 6). It is stated that he was an inhabitant of Rumah. 3. Third son of Jehoiachin (Jeconiah), the captive (1 Ch 3[18] B Φαλδαίας, A Φαδαίας, Luc. Φαδαιά). Jehoiachin was probably still without children when he was taken to Babylon (2 K 24[8]; cf. his age given in v.[15]). Pedaiah's birth may therefore be dated after his father's release from prison in 561 (2 K 25[27-30]). His name (see meaning above) is appropriate to such circumstances. In 1 Ch 3[19] he is named Zerubbabel's father. Elsewhere Zerubbabel is his nephew, son of his brother Shealtiel (Hag, Ezr, Neh, Mt, Lk; also A and B in 1 Ch). It is more probable that there is an error in the text of 1 Ch than that Zerubbabel was merely Shealtiel's legal son (Dt 25[6]), being actually Pedaiah's son by his brother's widow. It is questionable if the child of a levirate marriage could be called son of the levir. If he were entered as such in family registers, the whole purpose of the custom would be nullified. 4. One of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem at the instigation of Nehemiah (Neh 3[25] BA Φαδαιά, Luc. Φαδαΐ). He belonged to the clan Parosh, which was an important part of the post-exilic community (Neh 7[8], Ezr 8[3]). He is contemporary with two others of the same name (5 and 6), and all, presumably, were resident in Jerusalem. Perhaps he is identical with the next following. 5. One of those who 'stood beside' Ezra when he read the Law to the people (Neh 8[4] Φαδαίας, in 1 Es 9[44] B Φαλαδαῖος, A Φαλδαῖος, Phaldeus). His position seems rather one of prominence in the community than of association with Ezra. 6. One of a committee of four appointed by Nehemiah, on the occasion of his second visit, to receive and distribute the tithes and offerings of the people (Neh 13[13] B Φαλαιά, AN Luc. Φαδαιά). He was a Levite, and evidently chosen to represent the interests of his class. There is no proof that he is identical with 5. Neither the priest nor the scribe who were his colleagues appear elsewhere. 7. An ancestor of Sallu, who was one of the Benjamite inhabitants of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh 11[7], B Φαλαιά, A Luc. Φαδαιά). He is put in the third generation before Sallu. In the version of the list contained in 1 Ch 9 Sallu's ancestry is given differently, and Pedaiah's name does not occur (v.[7]).

W. B. STEVENSON.

PEDIAS (B Πεδίας, A Παιδείας, AV Pelias), 1 Es 9[34], a corruption of BEDEIAH, Ezr 10[35].

PEEL, PILL.—The origin of these verbs is severally pellis, skin, and pilus, hair; but they cannot be traced directly back to these separate sources, because the Old Fr. words peler and piller, from which they come, were confused in spelling before the Eng. words were formed. The confusion was made greater when the (probably) separate Lat. pilare, to plunder, was adopted into French and English, and spelt indifferently 'pill' or 'peel.' Brachet says that piller, in the sense of 'rob,' 'plunder,' was introduced into the Fr. language in the 16th cent. along with many other military words. We find its derivative 'pillage,' however, in Fabyan, Chron. i. 114.

Peel is the AV spelling in Is 18[2. 7] 'a nation scattered and peeled,' 'a people scattered and peeled' (מְקֻשָּׁךְ וּמוֹרָט, AVm 'outspread and polished,' RV 'tall and smooth,' RVm 'dragged away and peeled'). Here 'peel' is probably taken in the sense proper to 'pill,' i.e. pull off the hair, for that is the primary meaning of the Heb. word. But the reference is to the Ethiopians, and as the Heb. verb comes usually to mean to polish (by stripping off superfluous hair), RV and most modern exegetes take the expression in the sense of 'polished,' 'bronzed,' referring to the Ethiopians' tawny skin. In Ezk 29[18] 'Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled' (כָּל־רֹאשׁ קָרֻחָה), the meaning is more primary, 'laid bare' by the chafing of a burden (Amer. RV 'worn').

Pill is the spelling in Gn 30[37. 38] (of the rods in which Jacob 'pilled white strakes'), where the meaning is clearly to pull off the skin. RV spells 'peeled.' Pill occurs also in To 11[13] 'When his eyes began to smart, he rubbed them; and the whiteness pilled away from the corners of his eyes' (ἐλεπίσθη, RV 'scaled'), and 1 Mac 1[22] m. for AV text 'pulled off' (ἐλέπισε, RV 'scaled').

Shaks. uses 'peel' in the sense of stripping off the bark ('pill' of Gn 30[37. 38]), as Mer. of Ven. I. iii. 85, 'The skilful shepherd peel'd me certain wands'; and in the sense of plucking off the hair, 1 Henry VI. I. iii. 30, 'Peel'd priest.' He uses 'pill' only in the sense of rob: Timon, IV. i. 12—

'Large-handed robbers your grave masters are,
And pill by law.'

PEEP.—To peep in Is 8[19] 10[14] (מְצַפְצֵף, Pilp. ptcp. of צפף; LXX κενολογεῖν, ἀντειπεῖν) is not to chirp (as RV), but to cheep, i.e. it expresses not the cheerful contented note of little birds, but the feeble cry of nestlings. It is an imitative word, and is used also of a mouse's cry, as Purchas, Pilgrimage, 357, 'Hee procuring such peace in the East (saith Vopiscus) that a rebellious Mouse was not heard to peepe.' In Sir 21[23] 'peep' is used in its mod. sense, 'A fool will peep in at the door into the house' (παρακύπτει: cf. Jn 20[5], 1 P 1[12]). So Jer 6[1] Cov. 'A plage and a greate misery pepeth out from the North.' J. HASTINGS.

PEKAH (פֶּקַח, LXX Φάκεε, Assyr. Paḳaḥu) was the son of Remaliah. The name in full form was probably פְּקַחְיָהוּ, the same as that of his predecessor. Following the current OT significations of the verb פקח, the name would signify either (a) 'Jehovah hath beheld [lit. opened his eyes upon] (me)'; see 2 K 4[35] 19[16], Jer 32[19], Zec 12[4], Job 14[3], and cf. יהוה יראה and Assyr. proper name Bilimurani, 'Bel hath beheld me'; or (b) far more probably 'Jehovah hath opened (my eyes)'; cf. Gn 21[19], 2 K 6[17. 20]. The omission of the Divine name as subject is illustrated in the case of Aḥaz (=Aḥaziah), Nathan (=Nethaniah, El-Nathan), which stands for נָתָן יהוה בֶּן; cf. Marduk-apla-iddin(a) and other Assyrian parallels which further exemplify the omission of the object in the abbreviated form of the proper name. See the illustrations which have been collected in Schrader, COT ii. p. 326, by the present writer.

Peḳaḥ, son of Remaliah, was of obscure parentage, to which Isaiah refers with a touch of satire (7[4]). The story of his brief but important reign is told in the short extract 2 K 15[27-31]. Twenty years are ascribed to him, but chronological considerations based on the data of the Assyrian annalistic inscriptions, and the Canon of Rulers, can assign him a reign of only about three years (736–733). Comp. Schrader, COT ii. p. 321 ff., and art. CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT in vol. i. p. 401 f.

Peḳaḥ was captain of Peḳaḥiah's Gileadite bodyguard, and held the important confidential post of *Shalîsh near the king's person. This gave him unusual opportunities, when with fifty chosen men he compassed the destruction of king Peḳaḥiah. We are left in entire ignorance as to the circumstances which led to this violent act (2 K 15[25]), and the text is, moreover, far from certain.† All that we definitely know is that it took place at Samaria, probably in the stronghold of the royal palace.‡

It is possible, however, in the light of subsequent as well as preceding events, to frame an adequate theory for the motives of state policy which underlay Peḳaḥ's conspiracy.

The history of Israel and Judah from the days of the disruption downwards was largely determined by the lines of foreign policy. While Syria was the most formidable foe, and Egypt remained quiescent, the problems of this policy were not complex. Resistance or unwilling submission to Syria was the keynote of Israel's foreign policy in the reigns of Baasha, Omri, and Ahab. But in the reign of the last-mentioned monarch the formidable power of Aram (Syria) was dwarfed by the rising might of Assyria awakening from its slumber of centuries (see art. AHAB). In the reign of the Assyrian king Ramman-nirâri III. the power of Syria was broken, never more to recover its former vitality. From this time forth the chief menace to the security of all the Palestinian states was the advancing (though occasionally quiescent) power of Assyria. Now, just as Napoleon I. in his career of conquest (like the kings of France who preceded him) profited by a disunited Germany and a disunited Italy, so the successive monarchs who reigned in Nineveh reaped an abundant harvest from the divided and too often mutually hostile policies of the Palestinian states. Only for a brief period near the close of his career did Ahab pursue the only intelligent principle of self-preservation against the peril (which was then somewhat distant from Israel), viz. alliance with Syria against the Assyrian foe. This sound course of action was abandoned at the close of Ahab's life, as the result of a humiliating defeat at the hands of Assyria; and the fatal and short-sighted policy of selfish isolation, and even of compliance by means of tribute to the Assyrian power, was pursued in succession by Jehu, in all probability by Jeroboam II., and also, as we know definitely from both Assyrian and Hebrew records, by Menaḥem.

Peḳaḥ and his contemporary Reẓîn,* king of Syria, had the intelligence to perceive that it was only through a common policy pursued by the allied Palestinian states that the formidable power of Tiglath-pileser III. could be checked. Accordingly we may regard it as probable that the insurrection against the son of Menaḥem was sustained by the deep discontent aroused by his continuance of his father's policy of subservience and tributary vassalage to Assyria. Whether this insurrection was fomented by an Egyptian party, as Kittel† supposes, we consider very doubtful. For Egypt at that time (viz. the close of the 23rd and the brief 24th dynasty) was hardly in a position to give any practical support to the patriotic opponents of Assyria.‡ Six years later, during the strong rule of the Ethiopian Sabaco (Shabaka), Egypt rose into a position of much greater strength, and endeavoured to control the course of Western Asian politics. Two parties then arose in Ephraim as well as in Judah which favoured the claims respectively of Assyria and of Egypt. See HOSHEA.

Jotham was the monarch who reigned in Judah at the time when the alliance was concluded between Peḳaḥ king of Ephraim and Reẓîn of Damascus against Assyria. We read nothing of overtures made to Jotham to join this confederacy. It is not improbable, however, that they were made. Jotham, as we may certainly suppose, declined to join the alliance, deeming the policy of neutrality to be safest. Accordingly the armies of Damascus and Samaria were united against Judah in order to coerce the latter into compliance. In the midst of the campaign Jotham died, and was succeeded by the youthful Ahaz. By this time, if not before, Philistia had joined the coalition. Peḳaḥ, during the reign of Ahaz, assumed the offensive, and moved with his army against the capital of Judah itself. Meanwhile his ally, Reẓîn, was carrying on operations in the east and south-east of Judah, in the trans-Jordanic country. Elath, the port in the Red Sea, a valuable outlet for the commerce which passed into and from the Red Sea, was wrested from Ahaz by the successful arms of Reẓîn (2 K 16[6]). See art. ELATH.

Jerusalem was now closely invested by the beleaguering force of the Ephraimites. 2 Ch 28[6-15] containing a beautiful episode in which the prophet Oded plays a conspicuous part, but containing also characteristic exaggerations of numerical detail, must be placed in a secondary rank of historic record. The graphic scene described in Is 7 need not detain us, as it properly belongs to the reign of Ahaz (see AHAZ). It was proposed by the hostile

‡ We have no alternative but to follow the MT at this point; LXX ἐναντίον αὐτου is an obvious corruption of the text εἰς ἄντρον αὐτου. Cf. the closely parallel 1 K 16[18]. Klostermann in place of את ארגב וגו would read אֶת אֲדֹנֵי מֹאֵת בְּבָרְיו, evidently based on the LXX ἀπὸ τῶν τετρακοσίων and מִמְּגִנֵּי נְלָעָרִים of the Heb. text in the latter part of the verse.

* LXX 'Ραασσών and Assyr. Raṣunnu clearly indicate that רְצוֹן is the true and original form of the name (signifying 'good pleasure,' 'grace,' or 'favour').

coalition to place a son of Tâb-ēl on the throne of Judah. The parallelism with ben Remaliah would lead us to suppose (1) that Reẓîn (or perhaps his brother) is meant, and (2) that Tâb-ēl was an obscure personage. Winckler (Alttest. Unters. pp. 73–76) considers that Tâb-ēl (=Tâb-Rammân) reigned in Damascus c. 773–740. The Judæan king in his extremity paid no heed to Isaiah's inspiriting counsels 'not to fear nor let his heart be soft because of the two stumps of smoking firebrands, Reẓîn and the son of Remaliah,' but despatched envoys to Tiglath-pileser tendering abject submission, and conveying a rich tribute in money. The Assyrian monarch soon turned his conquering legions towards the Palestinian states (B.C. 734). His heavy hand was first felt by Damascus. Reẓîn was overpowered, and lost his life. For Israel the results were overwhelming and disastrous. The kingdom was shorn of its northern and trans-Jordanic(?) provinces. Isaiah, with that marvellous literary power of description,

> 'With hue like that when some great painter dips
> His pencil in the gloom of earthquake and eclipse,' portrays for us in graphic and lurid touches the onward march of those marshalled hosts of Tiglath-pileser's army of invasion. 'Behold, hastily, swiftly he cometh. There is none that is weary or stumbleth. He stumbleth not nor sleepeth. The girdle of his loins is never loosed, nor the thong of his sandals rent—whose arrows are sharp, and all his bows bent; whose horses' hoofs are accounted as flint, and his wheels like the whirlwind. His roar is like that of the lioness; he roareth like the young lions, moaning and catching the prey and carrying it off safe, and there is none to rescue. And at that time there is moaning over it like the moaning of the sea; and if one looketh to the earth, behold, oppressive darkness!' (Is 5^{26-30}).*

In the annals of Tiglath-pileser we read the following brief details from a seriously mutilated inscription:†—'The town Gil[ead] . . . Abel [Maacha] which are above the land Beth Omri (Samaria) . . . the broad, I smote in its entire extent into the territory of Assyria, and placed my officers as viceroys over them.‡ Hanno of Gaza, who had taken to flight in fear of my weapons, fled into the land of Egypt. Gaza I captured; its possessions, its gods I carried away captive . . . The land Beth Omri (Samaria), the whole of its inhabitants, together with their booty, I carried off to Assyria. Peḳah their king, I slew. Hoshea (Ausi) I appointed as ruler over them.'

So perished 'like a chip on the water's surface' (Hos 10^{7}) another ill-fated king of Ephraim. The Deuteronomic redactor paints him in the dark and monotonous hues of the long line of Jeroboam ben Nebat's successors. This may be interpreted to mean that he was tolerant of the religious conditions which prevailed during the middle of the 8th cent. The numerous high places or bāmôth, where Jehovah was worshipped, fostered modes of cultus which closely approximated to those of the Canaanite baalim. The oracles of the prophet Hosea, which clearly belong to the Ephraimite kingdom, vividly depict the disorders that prevailed during the reign of Peḳah. Chapters 4 and also 6 and 7 present a lurid picture of the social evils of the time. Gilead, we are told, 'is a city of them that work iniquity, it is tracked with blood-stains. As robber bands lie in wait for a man, so the company of priests murder on the way to Shechem' ($6^{9.\ 10}$). In ch. 4 the prophet rebukes the lying and stealing, the murder and bloodshed, while among all classes of society the grossest forms of sensuality and superstition prevailed (vv.$^{12.\ 13}$); see article HOSEA.

Winckler (Gesch. Isr. pp. 92–95) would place the latter part of the prophetic activity of Amos as late as the reign of Peḳah on account of the references to the dismemberment of Israel in 3^{12}. Moreover, LXX read אשור in place of ארם in v^{9}. Perhaps, however, it is not necessary to bring his oracles down to a later date than B.C. 738.

PEḲAḤIAH (פְּקַחְיָה 'J" has opened'; B Φακεσίας, A Φακείας, Luc. Φακειά).—King of Israel for two years, son and successor of Menaḥem (2 K 15^{22-26}). Two dates fixed by Assyrian records determine with unusual closeness the years of his reign. The inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III. show that Menaḥem was alive in 738, and that Peḳaḥiah's successor, Peḳaḥ, was dethroned in 734–733. It follows in all probability that the years 737 and 736 include the whole or the greater part of Peḳaḥiah's reign. The synchronism of 2 K 15^{23} is improbable. It is unlikely that Azariah of Judah was living in 737, since Aḥaz was king in 734 and the reign of Jotham comes between.—The internal condition of Israel in this reign has all its features in common with Hosea's general picture of the period (see HOSEA). Nor can there be any doubt what the critical question of foreign policy was,—whether the attitude to Assyria should be one of submission, or one of resistance in co-operation with other Syrian states. The absence of Tiglath-pileser in the north allowed time for negotiation and debate. Peḳaḥiah's assassination by his military adjutant or attendant may have been planned in consequence of his opposition to war with Assyria. Possibly Reẓîn of Damascus was cognizant of the plan, and sanctioned it as a means of bringing Israel and Damascus into line. The text relating the event is now corrupt (2 K 15^{25}). The usurper seems to have employed a force of Gileadites, which was probably sufficient to secure Samaria and so accomplish the revolution. It is not clear whether 'Argob' and 'Arieh' were defenders or assailants of the king. The name Argob suggests that the words were originally some statement about the Gileadites (cf. Stade, Geschichte, i. 588).

The Lucianic recension of the LXX assigns 10 years to Peḳaḥiah's reign. It has been observed that 2 K 17^{1} implies the same duration. From the 2nd year of Azariah to the 12th of Aḥaz is 30 years according to the Hebrew chronology, and this demands 10 years of Peḳaḥiah's to be added to the 20 of Peḳaḥ. Klostermann (Bücher Sam. u. Kön.) accepts 10 years as the proper figure. But this cannot be harmonized with the data of the Assyrian inscriptions. It originated in a system which endeavoured to equalize the sum of the reigns of the Israelite kings with the sum of the reigns of the Judæan kings (Benzinger, Könige, p. xx f.). See preceding article.

PEKOD (פְּקוֹד; Ezk 23^{23} B Φακούκ, A καὶ Φούδ; Jer 50 [Gr. 27]^{21} B ἐκδίκησον, connecting with verb פקד).—The name of an important tribe and of the place it occupied in Lower Babylonia. The passage in Jer 50^{21} is called by Orelli (Com. on Jer. ad loc.) a symbolical name (cf. RVm 'visitation') of Chaldæan-Babylonia. But we find in the Assyr. inscriptions, notably those of Sargon, a thrifty people dwelling near the mouth of the Uknu river, called Puḳûdu (cf. Sargon's Annals, lines 233, 265, 269, etc.). Tiele (Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. 222, 236) regards them as an Aram. people. They were at times allies of the Elamites, and gave the Assyrian

* This was probably written by the prophet as a reminiscence of what he had actually experienced by personal observation or learned from eye-witnesses of the events of B.C. 734. The date of the oracle is probably B.C. 726. See article HOSHEA, and footnote †, p. 426 in vol. ii.

‡ The towns Iyyon, Abel-beth-Maacah, Kadesh, and Janoah (2 K 15^{29}, cf. 1 K 15^{20} 9^{11}) appear to have all belonged to Galilee and Naphtali. Janoah is evidently a different place from that of the same name in Jos 16^{6}. Kittel identifies it with Jenoam (Jeni'amu of the Egyptian records; see Müller, Asien u. Europa, p. 394), an Israelite frontier town towards Tyre. Benzinger would delete Gilead from the text (perhaps dittography). III Rawl. 10. 2, lines 17 foll. . . . ti (maḥâzu) Ga-al . . . kings great trouble in ruling Lower Babylonia (cf. Delitzsch, Paradies, p. 240; Schrader, COT ii. pp. 117, 120; Winckler, Gesch. Bab. u. Assyr. 223, 283; Maspero, Passing of Empires, 119, 191, 230, 256, 306, 416; and art. KOA). IRA M. PRICE.

PELAIAH.—1. (פְּלָיָה; B Φαρά, A Φαλαιά) a son of Elioenai, a descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{24}. 2. (פְּלָאִיָה) a Levite who helped Ezra to expound the law to the people, Neh 8^{7} (LXX om.). His name or that of his family occurs also in the list of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{10} (B om., A Φελειά).

PELALIAH (פְּלַלְיָה; A$^{c\text{-}a}$ Φαλαλιά, Luc. Φαλλαλίας).—A priest in the time of Nehemiah, Neh 11^{12}. The Syr. has ܦܠܠܝܐ i.e. Pelaiah; the other versions support the MT.

PELATIAH (פְּלַטְיָה and פְּלַטְיָהוּ).—1. (Φαλτίας) one of the princes of the people, mentioned by Ezekiel as seen by him in vision standing at the east gate of the LORD'S house, Ezk 11^{1}. He died, as the prophet delivered his message, v.^{13}. It is difficult to decide whether Pelatiah's death is to be understood as actual or merely symbolical, and what relation, if actual, it bears to the form in which Ezekiel's vision is narrated (see Davidson or Bertholet, ad loc.). 2. (B Φαλεττί, A Φαλλετιά) a grandson of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{21}. 3. (B Φαλαεττιά, A Φαλεττιά) one of the 500 Simeonites who smote the Amalekites of Mt. Seir, 1 Ch 4^{42}. 4. (Φαλτιά) one of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{22}.

PELEG (פֶּלֶג).—One of the two sons of Eber, the other being JOKTAN (wh. see), Gn 10^{25} 11^{16} (Φάλεκ) =1 Ch 1^{19} (B om., A Φάλεκ) ^{25} (B Φάλεχ, A Φάλεκ), cf. Lk 3^{35} (Φάλεκ, whence AV Phalec). In Gn 10^{25} a characteristic etymology is given for the name by J, 'Peleg, for in his days the earth was divided (niphlĕgah).' 'The earth' here should probably be taken to mean 'the population of the earth,' as in 11^{1} (so Dillmann), and the 'dividing' to refer to the narrative in $11^{1\text{-}9}$ of the confusion of tongues and the dispersion of men 'over the face of all the earth.' In all probability the remark is due, not to the original J, but to a redactor of the same school (R_J, so Budde and Kuenen). The name Peleg has been sought by some (e.g. Knobel) in Phalga, a place at the junction of the Chaboras with the Euphrates, by Lagarde (Orientalia, ii. 50) in al-Falj on the road between Basra and Yemâma, and by Sprenger (Geog. Arab. 233, 294) in el-Falaj in Yemâma. The common noun peleg in Heb. means 'a watercourse,' and Peleg might appropriately enough be the designation of a people dwelling in a land furrowed by watercourses, whether in Babylonia or N. Arabia. J. A. SELBIE.

PELET (פֶּלֶט).—1. A son of Jahdai, 1 Ch 2^{47} (B Φάλεκ, i.e. Peleg, A Φάλετ). 2. A Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^{3} (B Ἰωφάλητ, A Φάλλητ).

PELETH (פֶּלֶת).—1. A Reubenite, the father of On, Nu 16^{1}, JE (Φαλέθ). The MT is certainly corrupt; we should probably read Pallu instead of Peleth. See art. KORAH, p. 12^{b}. 2. A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2^{33} (B Θάλεθ, A Φάλεθ).

PELETHITES.—See CHERETHITES.

PELICAN.—The word קָאַת ḳā'ath is usually derived from the root קִיא ḳî = 'to vomit,' corresponding with the Arab. ḳâ'a. The ḳā'ath is 'the vomiter.' It was interdicted as food (Lv 11^{18}, Dt 14^{17}). It inhabited the wilderness (Ps 102^{6} קִדְרָר = 'uninhabited place'). It is one of the creatures that were to be found in the ruins of Edom (Is 34^{11}) and Nineveh (Zeph 2^{14}). Unfortunately the LXX gives us no help, but on the contrary confuses us by translating it at Lv 11^{18} πελεκάν, Dt 14^{17} καταράκτης (AV and RV in both 'pelican'), Is 34^{11} ὄρνεα, Zeph 2^{14} χαμαιλέων (AV both 'cormorant,' AVm and RV 'pelican'), Ps 102^{6} πελεκάν (AV and RV 'pelican'). The weight of scholarship is in favour of 'pelican,' which suits the idea of an unclean bird, and is a bird of uninhabited places (wilderness). As to its being in ruins, it could well inhabit the marshes near the site of Nineveh. As regards Edom, where there is little water, this bird typifies desolation, and the absence of man (see BITTERN).

The pelican belongs to the order Steganopodes, family Pelicanidæ, to which the cormorant also belongs. Two species are found in Palestine and Syria—Pelecanus onicrotalus, L., the roseate or white pelican; and P. crispus, Brush, the Dalmatian pelican. Both have white plumage, the former with a roseate tinge. The legs of the former are greenish-black, the pouch yellow, and irides crimson; of the latter the legs and pouch are flesh colour, and irides greyish-white. They are 5–6 feet long from the tip of the bill to the end of the tail. The bill is from 16–18 inches long. Under the lower mandible is a pouch which will hold several gallons. In this pouch it stores food for itself and its young. Pelicans are abundant in the swamps of the Jordan Valley and the Orontes, and seen frequently in other regions of Palestine and Syria. Their breeding-places are in the remotest parts of the swamps. The attitude of the pelican when at rest is singularly listless and melancholy. It leans its head against its breast and stands motionless until hunger compels it to activity. It then flies 30–40 feet above the surface of the water, turns its head with one eye downwards, and, when it sees a fish sufficiently near the surface, swoops down upon it, and rarely fails to seize it. It immediately stores it away in its pouch, and proceeds to fish for more until its receptacle is full. It often fishes as far as twenty miles out at sea. It then not infrequently retires inland to a lonely spot, and sits in the melancholy attitude above described until it has digested its enormous meal. This is the Psalmist's sad 'pelican of the wilderness.' The pelican is called by the Arabs 'abu jerâb='the father of a pouch,' and ḥauṣal='a pouch,' and in Egypt begaʿ.

PELISHTIM.—RVm of Gn 10^{14}=PHILISTINES (which see).

PELONITE, THE (הַפְּלֹנִי; in 1 Ch 11^{27} B ὁ Φελωνεί, A ὁ Φαλλωνί; in v.^{36} B ὁ Φεδωνεί, A ὁ Φελλωνί; in 1 Ch 27^{10} B A ὁ ἐκ Φαλλούς).—Two of David's heroes are thus described (1 Ch $11^{27.36}$), viz. Helez and Ahijah. In 2 S 23^{26} the former is called 'the Paltite,' and, though the LXX A in that passage agrees with the reading of the Chronicler, it is probable that the MT has preserved the better text. This view is confirmed by the fact that, in the case of the second hero, the reading of 1 Ch 11^{36} (אֲחִיָּה הַפְּלֹנִי) is clearly a mutilation of the fuller text preserved in 2 S 23^{34} (אֱלִיעָם בֶּן אֲחִיתֹפֶל הַגִּלֹנִי 'Eliam the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite'). We must therefore read 'Helez the Paltite' in 1 Ch 11^{27} 27^{10}: the addition 'of the children of Ephraim' (מִבְּנֵי אֶפְרַיִם 27^{10}) not improbably conceals the gentilic name.

PEN.—See WRITING.

PENCIL occurs only once in the Bible, Is 44^{13} (RV). The first four clauses of this verse, which describes the making of an idol, read in MT חָרַשׁ עֵצִים נָטָה קָו יְתָאֲרֵהוּ בַּשֶּׁרֶד יַעֲשֵׂהוּ בַּפַּרְכֹּנוֹת וּבַמְּחוּגָה יְתָאֲרֵהוּ; the LXX has ἐκλεξάμενος τέκτων ξύλον ἔστησεν αὐτὸ ἐν μέτρῳ, καὶ ἐν κόλλῃ ἐρύθμισεν αὐτό, which, as Cheyne points out, implies a reading ויבחר חרש עץ יתנהו בנֵרֶת ובמקעָה יתארהו; RV 'The carpenter stretcheth out a line (AV 'his rule'), he marketh it out with a pencil (AV 'line'), he shapeth (AV 'fitteth') it with planes, and he marketh it out with the compasses' (AV 'compass'). In the first clause RV 'line,' i.e. measuring line, is decidedly to be preferred to AV 'rule' as the tr. of קָו (cf. 2 K 21[13], Is 28[17] 34[11], Jer 31[39], Zec 1[16], and see art. LINE). The meaning of the word שָׁרֶד in the second clause is quite uncertain. It is a ἅπ. λεγ., and quite possibly a corrupt reading. Cheyne (SBOT, 'Isaiah,' p. 137) thinks the final ד is doubtful, and he suggests (comparing the Aram. root מרם=lineavit) that we should read שָׁרֶם (with the meaning 'stylus'), although he notes that this word in Lv 19[28] means a cutting in the flesh. Grätz boldly reads חָרֶם. P. Haupt, in an editorial note in SBOT, ad loc., thinks that במחונה 'with the compass' (he prefers the sing.) should be read after בשׂרר, and taken as an explanatory gloss of the latter. If sered='compass,' he suggests a connexion with the Assyr. sirdu, 'yoke.' The Babylonian use of compasses is described by him in a note in 'Ezekiel' (SBOT), p. 100 f. Other explanations come nearer the RV 'pencil,' e.g. 'red chalk' (Kimchi, Vitr.; cf. RVm 'red ochre'), Reissstift (Siegfried-Stade, Dillmann-Kittel, and V. Ryssel [in Kautzsch's AT]), Röthel (Nowack, Lehrb. der Heb. Arch. i. 246).

J. A. SELBIE.

PENDANT occurs twice in the Bible, but both times RV only. The first instance is Jg 8[26], where the word (Heb. נטיפות, LXX B στραγγαλίδες, AV 'collars') is used of one of the ornaments worn by the Midianites who were conquered and spoiled by Gideon; the other is Is 3[19] (Heb. נטפות, LXX κάθεμα, AV 'chains') in a list of articles of female attire. In both passages the reference appears to be to ear-drops (so Cheyne, 'Isaiah,' in PB), the Heb. nĕṭîphôth being, perhaps, equivalent to Arab. naṭafat, a small clear pearl resembling a drop of water, or a bead of gold or silver of a spherical or elongated form, fastened to the lobe of the ear. See Moore, Judges, ad loc. J. A. SELBIE.

PENIEL (פְּנִיאֵל only in Gn 32[30], LXX Εἶδος θεοῦ), elsewhere PENUEL (פְּנוּאֵל). — This name appears on three occasions only, in connexion respectively with Jacob, Gideon, and Jeroboam. The word means 'face of God,' and is traced in Gn 32[30] to the fact that Jacob had there seen God 'face to face.' Perhaps a different derivation is alluded to in 33[10] (Wellh. JDTh, xxi. 435). It has been suggested (see Merrill, East of the Jordan, p. 392) that the name may have been originally given to some projecting rock in whose contour a face was seen. We may compare Strabo's (xvi. 2. 15 f.) Θεοῦ πρόσωπον. The place was east of the Jordan, and somewhere on the line of the Jabbok. It was a city whose chief feature was a strong tower or castle (Jg 8[8-17]), which at a much later period was rebuilt by Jeroboam (1 K 12[25]). These facts show that Penuel had considerable strategic importance. It was a great tribe from the eastern desert that invaded Palestine and were driven back to their homes by Gideon (Jg 6 ff.). These invaders always entered the lowlands, that is, the plain of Esdraelon, and there was a main road from the Jordan Valley eastward by which they came and returned. On this road the castle of Penuel was designed to be a protection. Succoth, now Tell Deir 'Alla, was on this road, and Penuel was in the hills not far beyond it. Such desert people never go over mountains when there is a good valley route open to them.

In the valley of the Jabbok, 4 miles from Succoth, two sharp hills, called Tulul edh-Dhahab, and covered with ancient ruins, rise to a height of 250 ft. 'Whether approached from the west or the east, or looked down upon from the mountains above them, they form very striking objects. . . . On one side of the eastern hill a strong wall of massive stones runs from the summit to the foot. . . . The platform of the "tower" or castle was supported by a wall, the remains of which are 15 or 20 ft. high, which extends to a distance of over 100 ft. These substantial structures, considering the size of the stones employed, must have been built at great expense. The stones are unhewn blocks, and appear to date from a remote period' (Merrill, East of the Jordan, pp. 390–392). That these desert invaders did not climb over mountains, that they followed a valley route, that the easy and main route to the East was through the valley of the Jabbok, and that at a certain point on this road these ruin-crowned hills exist at no great distance from Succoth,—all this seems to indicate them as the most probable site for Penuel.

PENINNAH (פְּנִנָּה 'pearl' or 'red coral'; Φεννάνα; Phenenna).—The second wife of Elkanah, the father of Samuel. Despite the fact that Peninnah had borne him children, while Hannah, her rival or fellow-wife, was childless, the latter was the more favoured by Elkanah; and this was doubtless the cause of the ill-will displayed by Peninnah towards her (1 S 1[2f.]). PENKNIFE (חֶעֶר הַסֹּפֵר 'the knife of the scribe'; LXX τὸ ξυρὸν τοῦ γραμματέως [Symm. substitutes σμίλη for ξυρόν]).—Mentioned only in Jer 36[23], where king Jehoiakim cut up Baruch's roll of Jeremiah's prophecies. Orientals use a reed pen in writing (calamus, Arab. ḳălăm), and always carry a knife for the purpose of mending it. Penknives are made in Damascus and in many of the villages of Lebanon; they are without spring backs, and are like miniature razors. W. CARSLAW.

PENNY.—See MONEY, p. 428[a].

PENSION.—Only 1 Es 4[56] 'He commanded to give all that kept the city pensions and wages' (κλήρους, AVm 'portions of land,' RV 'lands'). This is one of the 'archaisms' which Scrivener (Par. Bible, p. lxv) blames the AV translators of the Apocr. for retaining. It is first found in the Geneva version, and is used in the orig. sense of 'payment' (Lat. pensio). This wider sense of the word is seen in Robinson's translation of More's Utopia (Lumby's ed. i. p. 50, Lupton's ed. p. 83), 'An other cummeth in wyth his v. egges, and advyseth . . . to bringe to theyr parte certeyne peers of hys courte for greate pensions' (Lat. certa pensione). PENTECOST. — This term, adopted from the Gr., means 'fiftieth' (ἡ πεντηκοστή, scil. ἡμέρα), and was applied by Greek-speaking Jews, as חַג חֲמִשִּׁים יוֹם was by the Rabbins, to the second of the three chief Heb. festivals, because it fell (Lv 23[9-21]) on the fiftieth day after the offering of the barley-sheaf during the feast of unleavened bread (To 2[1], 2 Mac 12[32]; Jos. Ant. III. x. 6, XIII. viii. 4, XIV. xiii. 4, XVII. x. 2, BJ II. iii. 1, VI. v. 3; Philo, de Septen. § 21, see also de Decal. § 30; in NT Ac 2[1] 20[16], 1 Co 16[8]). In OT it is called 'the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of thy labours' (Ex 23[16] חַג הַקָּצִיר בִּכּוּרֵי מַעֲשֶׂיךָ, LXX ἑορτὴν θερισμοῦ πρωτογενημάτων τῶν ἔργων σου); 'the feast of weeks, of the first-fruits of wheat harvest' (Ex 34[22] חַג שָׁבֻעֹת בִּכּוּרֵי קְצִיר חִטִּים, LXX ἑορτὴν ἑβδομάδων; so also Dt 16[10], 2 Ch 8[13]), and 'the day of the first-fruits' (Nu 28[26] יוֹם הַבִּכּוּרִים, LXX τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν νέων); while the later Jews also denominated it עֲצֶרֶת, Aram. עֲצַרְתָּא (Jos. Ant. III. x. 6 (Gr. ἀσαρθά); Mishna, Arach. ii. 3, Chag. ii. 4, Rosh hash. i. 2; Targ. on Nu 28^{26}), a term meaning 'solemn assembly' (2 K 10^{20}, Is 10^{20}, Jer 9^{2} etc.), but applied in OT to the closing day of the feasts of unleavened bread and tabernacles (Lv 23^{36}, Nu 29^{35}, Dt 16^{8}, 2 Ch 7^{9}, Neh 8^{18}; RVm 'closing festival,' not as AVm 'restraint'), and hence applied also to Pentecost as the closing festival of the harvest season. Jos. inaccurately says (Ant. III. x. 6) that עֲצֶרֶת signifies (σημαίνει) Pentecost.

In the Heb. legislation, the titles 'feast of harvest' and 'day of first-fruits' indicate that this festival was fundamentally an agricultural one, expressing gratitude to God for the returns from the labours of the field. It celebrated specifically the wheat harvest (Ex 34^{22}), the last of the cereals to ripen in Palestine. It marked, therefore, the closing of the grain harvest, as the feast of tabernacles (or ingathering) celebrated especially the return from oliveyards and vineyards as well as the close of the husbandman's labours as a whole (Dt 16^{13}). This of itself implies that the feast fell in the late spring or early summer; and, since the Israelites became agricultural only after entering Canaan, it could not have been pre-Mosaic, but was established with a view to the settlement in the promised land (Ex 34^{12} [JE], Lv 23^{10} [H] etc.). On the other hand, the title 'feast of weeks' already given it in Ex 34^{22} [JE], as well as the general description of the time of its observance in Dt 16^{9} ('Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee: from the time thou beginnest to put the sickle to the standing corn shalt thou begin to number seven weeks,' RV), find their definite explanation in Lv 23^{9-21}. From the latter we learn (1) that the beginning of the harvest season was celebrated during the feast of unleavened bread by the ceremony of waving before the Lord 'a sheaf (עֹמֶר) of the first-fruits (רֵאשִׁית) of harvest,'* together with the waving of a he-lamb and the rendering of appointed meal- and drink-offerings; and that none of the new crop could be eaten until this had been done. Since the barley ripened first, the sheaf was understood to be of that grain (Philo, de Septen. § 20; Jos. Ant. III. x. 5), though it is not specified in OT. The 'feast of weeks' came on the fiftieth day after the barley-sheaf was waved (vv.$^{15, 16}$, i.e. the day after the completion of seven weeks). Hence we read (Jer 5^{24}) of 'the appointed weeks of harvest'; and Philo (de Septen. § 21) says that the sheaf-waving προέορτός ἐστιν ἑτέρας ἑορτῆς μείζονος.

(2) We learn also from Lv 23 that the barley-sheaf was waved on 'the morrow after the Sabbath' (vv.$^{11, 15}$ מִמָּחֳרַת הַשַּׁבָּת). The meaning of this phrase, on which the computation of Pentecost depends, has been much disputed. The Jews of Christ's time understood it to designate Nisan 16th, without regard to the day of the week; 'the Sabbath' being interpreted as the first day of the feast of unleavened bread (Nisan 15th) on the basis of v.^{7} [see Jos. Ant. III. x. 5; LXX at Lv 23^{11} (τῇ ἐπαύριον τῆς πρώτης); Targums (מִבָּתַר יוֹמָא טָבָא); Mishna, Chag. ii. 4, Menach. x. 1–3]. There was dissent, however, from this interpretation even at that time. The 'Baithusians' (Sadducees) are said to have held that 'the morrow after the Sabbath' meant the day following the weekly Sabbath which occurred during the feast of unleavened bread (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Lk 6^{1}; Adler, 'Phar. u. Sad. u. ihre differirende Ausleg. d. מבחרת השבת,' in Monatschr. f Gesch. u. Wissensch. d. Judenth. 1878, p. 522 ff., 568 ff., 1879, p. 29 ff.; Montet, Essai sur les orig. des partis Sad. et Phar. 1883), and the Karaites of the 8th cent. A.D. followed the same view (see Trigland, Diatribe de secta Kar. 1703, ch. 4). There are also traces in antiquity of the view that the phrase in question designated the last, not the first, day of the paschal festival (see Dillmann in Schenkel's Bib.-Lex. under 'Pfingsten'). Some modern scholars likewise contend that the traditional interpretation was wrong, chiefly because שַׁבָּת elsewhere means the weekly Sabbath, and because, it is said, שֶׁבַע שַׁבָּתוֹת (Lv 23^{15}) can only mean weeks which ended with Sabbaths. Hence George (Die älter. Jüd. Feste, 1835) understood the 'Sabbath' in question to be the weekly Sabbath which fell immediately before harvest, holding the harvest festivals to have had originally no connexion with the Passover. Hitzig (Ostern u. Pfingsten, 1837, Ost. u. Pf. im zweit. Dekalog, 1838) went so far as to maintain that in the Heb. Calendar Nisan 14 and 21 were always Sabbaths, so that the year must always have begun (Nisan 1) with a Sunday; and that 'the morrow after the Sabbath' was the day following the weekly Sabbath of the feast of unleavened bread, and therefore always fell on Sunday, Nisan 22. With him agreed Knobel (Com. on Lev.) and Kurtz (Sacr. Worship of OT, Eng. tr. p. 356), except that they identified the 'Sabbath' in question with Nisan 14, and the day of the sheaf-waving with Nisan 15. Against this unsupported conception of the calendar, however, is the well-known custom of beginning each month by the new moon, as well as the fact that in such a calendar there would be an incomplete week at the end of the year, which would conflict with the sanctity of the seventh day. Hitzig's theory, moreover, would place the sheaf-waving after the feast of unleavened bread had ended. Hence more writers have followed the Sadducean interpretation, although this also might, when Nis. 15 fell on Sunday, throw the ceremony of sheaf-waving outside the feast of unleavened bread (Saalschütz, Das Mos. Recht^{2}, 1853, p. 418; Fürst, Heb. u. Chald. Wörterb. 1863, under שבת; Wellhausen, Jahrb. f. deutsch. Theol. xxii.; Proleg. p. 86; von Orelli in Herzog's RE^{2}, art. 'Pfingstfest'). The traditional interpretation, however, may be successfully defended. There is no sufficient proof that the connexion of the sheaf-waving with the feast of unleavened bread was not original, nor can Lv 23^{9-22} be separated from the surrounding legislation, since otherwise no directions concerning the feast of weeks would be given in it at all. If, however, the two were thus connected, the sheaf-waving may most naturally be supposed to have occurred during, not after, the feast. This is also made probable by Jos $5^{10, 11}$, where it is stated that, after having kept the Passover on the 14th day of the month in Gilgal, 'they did eat of the produce (RVm, not 'old corn' as AV and RV; עָבוּר means simply produce) of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes and parched corn in the self-same day.' The latter clause shows that the feast of unleavened bread was not over, and 'the morrow after the passover,' while it may mean (as in Nu 33^{3}) Nis. 15, may also mean Nis. 16, since the paschal meal was celebrated on Nis 15, in the evening following the 14th when the lamb was slain; but at any rate the phraseology shows that the sheaf-waving, without which the new corn could not be eaten, was regulated by the date of the Passover itself, not by any weekly Sabbath. Finally, the application of שַׁבָּת to the first day of unleavened bread may be justified by the language used (v.^{32}) of the day of atonement ('In the ninth day of the month . . . shall ye keep your sabbath'), and by the application of the term to the sabbatical year (Lv $25^{2.4.6}$ $26^{34.43}$); while the use of שָׁבוּעוֹת in the general sense of weeks may be justified by the analogy of the Aramaic and Syriac, the interpretation of the LXX (τῶν ἑβδομάδων), and the use of σάββατον and σάββατα in NT, e.g. Mt 28^{1}, Lk 18^{12} [see Bahr, Symb. ii. 619; Dillm. in Schenkel's Bib.-Lex. (in his Com. also Dillm. regards this view as exegetically defensible); Schürer, HJP II. ii. 37; W. H. Green, Heb. Feasts, ch. vii.]. It is at any rate certain that the Jews celebrated the sheaf-waving on Nis. 16, and Pentecost on the fiftieth day after (usually Sivan 6), without regard in either case to the day of the week. Reland (Antiq. Sacr. Vet. Heb. part iv. ch. iv.) states, indeed, that they took care that Pentecost should not fall on the third, fifth, or seventh day of the week; but this was probably only a later Rabbinical rule (see Ideler, Handb. d. Chronol. i. p. 537 ff.).

The feast of weeks or Pentecost, therefore, as it appears in the Pent., was a joyful acknowledgment of the completion of the harvest in the land which God had given Israel. The whole harvest season was in a sense sacred time. Hence Pentecost lasted but one day. By its prelude, the sheaf-waving, it was dependent on Passover, commemorative of Israel's redemption; and by the interval of seven weeks between it and Nis. 16, it was brought into the sabbatical system in accordance with which the Heb. feasts were arranged.

Those modern writers who maintain the post-exilic origin of the Levitical code, consider Pentecost, like the other agricultural feasts, to have been originally a nature-festival, which in the development of the Heb. cultus was taken up into an artificial ecclesiastical system. Wellhausen (Proleg. Eng. tr. ch. iii.) points out that in the early prophetical narrative of JE (Ex 23^{16} 34^{22}) the dates of the harvest festivals are vaguely described; that first in Dt (e.g. $12^{6\text{-}14}$ $14^{23\text{-}26}$ $12^{6.16}$) is Pentecost, as well as the other feasts, connected with a central sanctuary, and the freewill offerings tend to appear as liturgical obligations, though there is still no mention of a single communal offering; but that in the Levitical code (Lv 23, Nu 28, the former including, however, elements from older sources; see also Driver, LOT^{6} p. 56; Dillmann, Comment.) the offerings have become mere dues, the communal offering through the priests outranks the freewill offerings of the people, and the festival has been brought into an arbitrary system of dates and relations quite different from its primitive freedom.

The ceremonies for the celebration of Pentecost are described in Lv $23^{15\text{-}21}$. On it no servile work could be done. Two loaves of bread, made from two-tenths of an ephah (RV) of fine flour from the new wheat (Ex 34^{22}) harvest, were to be baked with leaven and presented by the priest before the LORD as a wave-offering. 'Ye shall bring (the loaves) out of your habitations' (מִמּוֹשְׁבֹתֵיכֶם, LXX ἀπὸ τῆς κατοικίας ὑμῶν) does not mean that each household was to present two loaves (as Vulg. and Luther read, 'out of all your dwellings'; so Calvin, Osiander, George, et al.), but that the loaves were to be taken from the ordinary bread made from wheat of the land for household purposes. Hence also they were to be leavened,* and therefore could not come upon the altar (Ex 23^{18}, Lv 2^{11}), but were merely waved before the LORD and consumed by the priests. With them two lambs were to be also waved as peace-offerings, significant of the fellowship between J″ and his people; while at the same time a burnt-offering was to be made, consisting of seven yearling lambs without blemish, one young bullock, and two rams, with the appropriate meal- and drink-offerings, and also a he-goat as a sin-offering—these latter expressing the need of redemption, which properly mingled with the people's thanksgiving.

In Nu $28^{26\text{-}31}$ a slightly different set of offerings is directed for 'the day of first-fruits,' as Pentecost is there called, to be made in addition to the daily sacrifices. Many consider this list also to refer to the offering accompanying the loaves, and either pass over the differences as unimportant or explain them as due to corruption of the text or to diverse and unharmonized sources. The later Jews, however, regarded the two lists as supplementary,—that in Nu referring to the sacrifices for Pentecost considered as a special feast-day; that in Lv to the sacrifices directly connected with the loaves; so that on Pentecost three series of sacrifices were made: (1) the daily burnt-offerings; (2) the special offerings for a feast-day; (3) the waving of the loaves and lambs, and the sacrifices connected therewith. This usage appears from Jos. Ant. III. x. 6, where the offerings of both lists are added together (except that he specifies two rams, which is probably an error for three); also from the Mishna (see Menach. iv. 2, 5). Neither is there any reasonable objection to thus combining the lists, since Nu 28. 29 contain directions for sacrifices on special days without describing other ceremonies which fell on those days. Finally, besides these communal offerings, Pentecost was celebrated by the freewill offerings of individuals both to the sanctuary and to the poor (Dt $16^{10.11}$, Lv 23^{22}).

These ceremonies emphasized the relation of Pentecost, as the close of harvest, to the sheaf-waving at its beginning. There a single sheaf of barley, here two prepared loaves of wheat-bread; there one lamb, here two, together with accompanying burnt- and sin-offerings. That, therefore, was the prelude of this. The two included the harvest period of seven weeks,* and expressed in climacteric form the increased gratitude of the people. No voluntary offerings of first-fruits could be made before Pentecost (see Ex 23^{19}). Of course the harvest was not always finished in all the land by Pentecost; but the seven weeks covered the normal period, and brought the festival into the sabbatical system.

In the second temple these ceremonies were fully observed. Multitudes attended the feast (Jos. Ant. XVII. x. 2, BJ II. iii. 1; Ac 2^{5}). In anticipation of it, a portion of the best wheat, previously selected, was cut, thrashed, brought to the temple, ground, and passed through twelve sieves to ensure its fineness. On the day before Pentecost [unless it were a Sabbath, in which case on the second day before] two omers of the flour were baked into loaves. The size of the latter is described in the Mishna as 4 handbreadths wide, 7 long, and 4 fingers high. Soon after midnight the temple gates were opened that offerings for the day might be examined by the priests. At sunrise occurred the regular daily sacrifice, and soon afterwards the festal offerings directed in Nu $28^{26\text{-}31}$. Amid the singing of the 'Hallel,' the peculiar ceremonies of Pentecost began. 'The two lambs were first waved alive; then, after their sacrifice, the breast and shoulder were laid beside

* Edersheim (The Temple, etc. p. 230) thinks the leaven represented the sense of sin which mingled with the thanksgiving. The common explanation is that the loaves were intended to represent the ordinary food of the people, and this explanation appears sufficient.

* The phrase, 'ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρώτῳ' found in TR of Lk 6^{1} (supported by many MSS), has been explained as meaning the first Sab. after the second day of the feast of unleavened bread, i.e. the first Sab. of the harvest period. (So, first, Scaliger, de Emend. Temp. vi. 577, followed by many. See Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on the passage). The word must have originated in some known custom; and this explanation is not improbable, since the Sabbaths between Nis. 16 and Pentecost were carefully noted. The adj., however, is probably a Western and Syrian gloss intruded into Lk's text, and is rejected by WH after ℵBL and other weighty authorities.

the loaves and "waved" (generally toward the East) forwards and backward, and up and down' (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 230). Then followed the other appointed sacrifices, and the freewill gifts; and the rest of the day was spent in festive gatherings, to which the poor and the stranger and the Levite were invited. The attendant festivities are said to have often continued several days.

The Jews of the post-biblical period held Pentecost to celebrate the giving of the law at Sinai, which was calculated to have taken place on the 50th day after the Exodus (Ex 19[1]). No such view of the day, however, is found in OT, Josephus, or Philo. Philo, in fact, seems to regard the feast of trumpets as commemorative of Sinai (de Septen. § 22). It was probably after the fall of Jerus. that this view originated.* Thereafter it was generally adopted by the Rabbins, and the day is described in the later liturgy as 'the day of the giving of the law' (Saalschütz, Das Mos. Recht, p. 420). The same view appears among the Christian Fathers (see Jerome, Ep. ad Fabiolam; Augustine, contra Faustum, xxxii. 12). Maimonides (More neb. iii. 41) expressly says, 'festum septimanarum est dies ille, quo lex data fuit'; but Abarbanel, while admitting the fact, denies that Pentecost was a celebration of it (Bahr, Symb. ii. 645). Modern Jews accept the tradition, and spend the previous night in reading the law and other appropriate Scripture. The later Jews also observed Pentecost for two days; but this custom arose in the Dispersion from the difficulty of determining exactly the Palestinian month, which was fixed by observation of the moon. See NEW MOON.

In the Christian Church the importance of Pentecost was continued, and its significance emphasized, by the outpouring of the Spirit on that day (Ac 2).† The day of the week on that occasion is traditionally represented as Sunday. Its determination, however, depends on the date assigned to Christ's death. It is to be assumed that He died on a Friday (see e.g. Mk 15[42]). If, then, as many suppose the Fourth Gospel to teach, He died on Nis. 14, Nis. 16 and Pentecost fell on a Sunday; but if, as the Synoptists seem to state, He ate the passover with His disciples at the regular time, He was crucified on Nis. 15, and Nis. 16 and Pentecost fell on Saturday [see CHRONOLOGY OF NT]. Wieseler (Chron. d. Apost. Zeitalter, p. 20) plausibly suggests that the festival was fixed on Sunday by the later Western Church to correspond with Easter.

But, whatever the day of the week may have been, the events of that Pentecost were of fundamental importance to the Church, and as appropriate to that festival as Christ's death had been to the Passover season. They indicated the Divine origin of Christianity on its subjective side, and the Church was then endowed for its future work. The suddenness of the manifestation indicated the supernaturalness of the endowment; the 'sound as of the rushing of a mighty wind' was the natural emblem of the almighty Spirit; the tongues 'parting asunder' or 'distributing themselves' on the disciples [not 'cloven' as AV] symbolized the universal gift of power to proclaim the gospel; the semblance of fire indicated the purified zeal, born of faith and love, which was to characterize the proclamation; while the polyglot (?) utterances of the believers were a sign of the world-wide destination of the truth which filled their lips with praise [see TONGUES, GIFT OF]. The occurrence of these events on Pentecost was also significant. The gift of the Spirit was the first-fruit of the spiritual harvest (cf. Ro 8[23] 11[16] Ja 1[18]) procured through the work of Christ; and the dependence of Pentecost on Passover harmonized with the dependence of the Spirit's work on the objective sacrifice of the Redeemer. The eucharistic character of Pentecost harmonized also with the joy of the disciples over their spiritual blessings; while, providentially, the presence of multitudes at the feast made it a fit opportunity for the first public proclamation of the now completed gospel.

Among the early Jewish Christians observance of the Heb. feasts continued, doubtless with fresh significance derived from the new revelation. So it is noteworthy that St. Paul earnestly desired to present the gifts of the Gentile Churches to the saints in Judæa at Pentecost (Ac 20[16]). There is no evidence, however, that the Gentile Churches of the apostolic age observed this feast; but at the close of the 2nd cent. it appears as one of the established festal periods of the Church. The name Pentecost was at first applied to the whole time between Easter and the festival of the Holy Ghost (Greg. Naz. Orat. 44 de Pent.). This larger meaning of the word is abundantly shown by Tert. de Idololatria, 14, de Baptismo, 19; Orig. c. Cels. viii. 22; Apost. Const. v. 20, etc. The period was one of joyfulness. As on the Lord's day, no fasting or kneeling in prayer were allowed (Tert. de. Cor. 3). Afterwards the term was limited to the 50th day after Easter (Apost. Const. lib. viii. cap. 33; Counc. Eliberis, Canon 43); and, at a still later period, the following days, or in some places the week, were included in the festival. The Pentecost season was especially used for baptisms. From the white robes worn by the candidates, the English term 'Whitsunday' is supposed to have arisen (see Riddle, Manual of Chr. Ant. p. 681, and esp. Skeat, Etym. Dict.[2], for various explanations of the origin of the word).

PEOPLE is the AV rendering of a great variety of Heb. and Gr. terms, the most important of which are גּוֹי, לְאֻמִּים or עַם, δῆμος, ἔθνος, λαός, ὄχλος. The distinctive meanings of these are discussed under GENTILES. While in many instances no doubt can exist as to the reference of the word people, there are cases where the Eng. reader cannot but feel uncertain whether he is to understand by it the people of Israel or people in the sense of Gentile nations. This ambiguity is avoided by RV, which, for the latter sense, freely employs the

* Dt 16[12] gives a reason for observing the feast as directed, not a statement of what the feast celebrated. See 5[15], 15[15]. Vaihinger in Herzog's RE[1], art. 'Pfingstfest,' appeals for this view also to 2 Ch 15[10], and even to Jn 5[39]; but his arguments are not convincing.

† The language of Ac 2[1] ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι ἡμέραν τῆς πεντηκοστῆς has been understood by some (as Olshausen and Baumgarten, so also Blass) to mean that the Spirit came before the day of Pentecost; while Lightfoot in *Hor. plur. peoples, which in AV occurs only in Rev 10^{11} 17^{15}. The effect of this change in clearing up the meaning is very evident in such passages as Ps 67^{4}, Is 55^{4} 60^{2} etc. See Preface to RV of OT.

Special notice is required of the phrase 'people of the land' (עַם־הָאָרֶץ), which occurs frequently in the OT, especially in Jeremiah (1^{18} 34^{19} 37^{2} 44^{21} $52^{6.\,25}$), Ezekiel (7^{27} 12^{19} 22^{29} 33^{2} 39^{13} $46^{3.\,9}$), and 2 Kings ($11^{14.\,18.\,19.\,20}$ 15^{5} 16^{15} 21^{24} $23^{30.\,35}$ 24^{14} $25^{3.\,19}$), with the parallel passages in 2 Chronicles ($23^{13.\,20.\,21}$ 26^{21} 33^{25} 36^{1}). In most of these instances it means the general body of the people, as distinguished from the king and the aristocracy. The fuller phrase רַלַּת עַם־הָאָרֶץ is used in 2 K 24^{14} for 'the poorest sort of the people of the land' (cf. 2 K 25^{12}, Jer 40^{7} $52^{15.\,16}$). In Gn $23^{7.\,12.\,13}$ (P), Nu 14^{9} (JE), 'am-hā'āreẓ is employed with reference to non-Israelites. The title 'ammê hā'āreẓ (or 'ammê hā'ărāẓôth) has a technical sense in the book of Ezra-Nehemiah, being used of that half-heathen half-Jewish population of Palestine with whom less scrupulous Jews intermarried and maintained friendly relations, but with whom the party represented by Ezra and Nehemiah refused all but the most unavoidable intercourse (Ezr $9^{1.\,2}$ $10^{2.\,11}$, Neh $10^{29\text{-}32}$). The phrase 'am-hā'āreẓ was used by the Rabbins not only collectively but in an individual sense (they spoke of an 'am-hā'āreẓ) for the class distinct from the strict observers of the law (cf. Jn 7^{49} 'this multitude [ὁ ὄχλος οὗτος] which knoweth not the law are accursed'). See, further, art. PHARISEES, p. 804; Schürer, GJV[3] ii. 400 [HJP II. ii. 22 f.]; Smend, *Alttest. PEOR (פְּעוֹר; Φογώρ; Phogor, and [Jos 22^{17}] Beelphegor, etc.).—1. Nu 23^{28} only, a mountain in Moab, the last point to which Balak took Balaam, after he had sacrificed at Bamoth-baal and in the field of Zophim, at the top of Pisgah. Peor is described as looking down upon Jeshimon (RVm; RV text 'the desert'). The Onomasticon describes the mountain as opposite Jericho, and as having upon it a town, Danaba (DINHABAH, wh. see), 7 miles from Heshbon. Peor is not certainly identified. PEFSt (1882, p. 87) suggests the peak above 'Ain Minyeh overlooking the Dead Sea. Buhl (GAP 116) places Beth-peor at the mouth of the Wâdy Ḥesbân, and is inclined to identify Peor with el-Mušaḳḳar, between Wâdy 'Ajûn Mûsa and Wâdy Ḥesbân. For further details see BETH-PEOR.

PERÆA (ἡ Περαία, Περαῖος, Περαίτης) is the name given by Josephus to the district which is spoken of in Rabbinical literature as 'the land beyond Jordan.' (In like manner the NT, which never mentions Peræa by name, uses the phrase πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, Mt 4^{15} 19^{1}, Mk 3^{8}, Jn 1^{28} 3^{26} $6^{1.\,17}$ 10^{40} 18^{1}). He says (BJ III. iii. 3) that it stretches from Machærus in the south to Pella in the north, while its breadth is from Philadelphia ('Ammân) to the Jordan. In another place (BJ IV. vii. 3, 6) he makes Gadara the capital of Peræa; and Schürer (HJP II. i. 113, note) infers that in the former case the name is used in a political sense, i.e. with exclusion of the towns of the Decapolis. In a geographical sense it must have reached farther north, at any rate to the bank of the Yarmuk, while its southern boundary was probably the Arnon. It thus covered the districts of Jebel 'Ajlûn and el-Belḳa. It may be roughly described as a high tableland, torn in many parts by deep water courses, mighty and picturesque ravines, breaking down towards the 'Arabah, or, as it is now called, el-Ghôr. Along the western edge the heights sink abruptly into the Jordan Valley; eastward they fall away more gently into the desert. The great gorge of the Yarmuk in the north and that of the Arnon in the south form natural boundaries.

Josephus observes that, while larger in extent than Galilee, it is inferior in fertility, and less adapted for the growth of the finer fruits. The Peræan soil, however, is rich, and has always yielded good returns to the husbandman. Much land now used for pasture is well capable of cultivation; and an excellent supply of water is provided by its streams and perennial springs. Great reaches of these healthy uplands are covered with a forest of oak. The olive flourishes in many of the valleys, while the vine trails over the fruitful slopes. Towards the eastern border the country is treeless, and parts are barren and stony (Guy le Strange in Schumacher's Across the Jordan, 292 ff.), but the fellaḥîn of the Arabs find space to grow tolerable crops. Yāḳūt (A.D. 1225) observes that the region is noted for its wheat crops (Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, 35). The raisins most highly prized in the country come from the district capital es-Salṭ. Muḳaddasi (A.D. 985) says that next to Ba'albek it is the coldest place in Syria (op. cit. 15). See arts. GAD, GILEAD, REUBEN.

In the earlier days of the Maccabees, Peræa was inhabited chiefly by Gentiles, among whom was a 'dispersion' of Jews. Accordingly Judas, after he had discomfited the heathen, conveyed all the Israelites for safety into Judæa (1 Mac 5^{45}). The policy of Judaizing the province was not introduced before the time of Hyrcanus; probably by one of his successors (Schürer, HJP I. i. 192). It shared in the reduction of taxes ordered by Jonathan (Ant. XIII. ii. 3). Alexander Jannæus waged war with varying fortune throughout his reign, and before his death had the whole country, from Merom to the Dead Sea, under his sway (Schürer, l.c. pp. 297, 306). At Herod's request it was given as a tetrarchy to his brother Pheroras, who in the end fled hither, to die, it was thought, by poison (Ant. XV. x. 3, BJ I. xxiv. 5, XXX. 3, 4). It was the scene of some of Herod's building enterprise (Ant. XV. viii. 5). On Herod's death, Antipas was appointed tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa (Ant. XVII. viii. 1). When Augustus confirmed Herod Antipas in the tetrarchy, Gadara was cut off and added to Syria (BJ II. vi. 3). On the site of the ancient Beth-haram (Jos 13^{27}) the tetrarch built a city and called it Julias in honour of the emperor's wife (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1, BJ II. ix. 1), which Nero afterwards gave to Agrippa, with 14 villages about it (Ant. XX. viii. 4). It is now represented by Tell er-Rameh (HGHL[1] 488, note). Peræa was the scene of Simon's rising, so swiftly suppressed by Gratus (Ant. XVII. x. 6, BJ II. iv. 2). Felix was appointed by Claudius procurator of Galilee, Samaria, and Peræa (BJ II. xii. 8). After the defeat of Cestius, Manasseh was set over Peræa (BJ II. xx. 4). The whole region was finally subdued to the Romans by Placidus, acting under Vespasian (BJ IV. vii. 3–6). When the Moslems conquered the country, the district, with its capital 'Ammân, was attached to the province of Damascus (Ya'ḳûbi, A.D. 874–890). Later it was included in the kingdom of Kerak [Dimashki (A.D. 1300); Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, 34, 41].

In the beginning of our era the population was prevailingly Jewish. Peræa sent a multitude of Jews to Jerusalem in the rising against Sabinus (BJ II. iii. 1). When Gadara fell they were mostly Jews who perished (BJ IV. vii. 3, 6). They were strong enough to venture on armed strife with the inhabitants of Philadelphia ('Ammân) over the boundaries of a certain village (Ant. XX. i. 1), and were reduced to order only by the iron hand of Fadus. The Mishna constantly refers to Peræa—'the land beyond Jordan'—as a province of the land of Israel, along with Judæa and Galilee. Treating of the disposal of the seventh year's fruits it is said, 'The land of Israel is divided into three parts: Judæa, the land beyond Jordan, and Galilee' (Shebiith ix. 2). With regard to the marriage law, it is in the same case with the other two (Kethubîm xiii. 10); so also with regard to possessions (Baba bathra iii. 2). Peræa lay between two Gentile provinces on the east, as did Samaria between the two Jewish provinces on the west of the Jordan. The fords below Beisân and opposite Jericho afforded communication with Galilee and Judæa respectively. Peræa thus formed a link connecting the Jewish provinces, so that the pilgrim from any part might go to Jerusalem and return without setting foot on Gentile soil; and, what was at least of equal importance, he could avoid peril of hurt and indignity, which the Samaritans loved to inflict on those passing through Samaria (Lk 9^{52}; Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 1, Vita 52).

Jesus seems to have been baptized on the Peræan side of Jordan (Jn 10^{40}). Farrar thinks He passed that way after the Samaritans refused to receive Him (Lk $9^{52ff.}$). From the Feast of the Dedication He escaped to Peræa (Jn 10^{40}), whence He was summoned by the sisters at Bethany (Jn 11^{3}). The visit, with incidents and teaching, described in Mt 19, Mk 10^{1-31}, Lk 18^{15-30}, is commonly referred to the period succeeding His retirement to Ephraim (Jn 11^{54}); and from Peræa He made His last journey to Jerusalem.

Niger, 'a man of great valour in the war with the Romans,' who belonged to this district, is called 'the Peræan' (Περαίτης, BJ II. XX. 4, IV. vi. 1). One of the most awful incidents in the siege of Jerusalem perpetuates the name of Mary, a woman of Peræa, from the village of Bethezob (BJ VI. iii. 4). In the nation's crowning calamity, when the Romans destroyed Jerusalem, and the temple sank in flaming ruins, Josephus names Peræa for the last time, as if in sympathy 'echoing back' from afar the dolorous tumult and uproar (BJ VI. v. 1).

PERAZIM (הַר־פְּרָצִים, ὄρος διασεβῶν).—Mt. Perazim of Is 28^{21} ('the LORD shall rise up as in mount Perazim') is probably to be identified with BAAL-PERAZIM, the scene of one of David's victories over the Philistines, 2 S 5^{20}=1 Ch 14^{11}. It lay apparently N.E. of Adullam, on the ridge above 'Ain Fâris (see PEFSt, Oct. 1899, p. 347). C. R. CONDER.

PERDITION.—One of the renderings of ἀπώλεια in NT (AV and RV), but not found at all in OT, in either version. It occurs eight times both in AV and in RV, but the latter has substituted 'perdition' for 'destruction' at Ph 3^{19} ('whose end is perdition'), and 'destruction' for 'perdition' at 2 P 3^{7} ('destruction of ungodly men'), apparently because in the former passage the 'final perdition' (cf. τέλος) of the soul is the prominent sense, and in the latter the OT Messianic destruction of the present bodily mode of existence. It would seem as if the Revisers took this view of the eschatology of 2 P generally, for they have translated ἀπώλεια by 'destruction' in all the five passages containing it, even in $2^{1.3}$ and 3^{16}. It is difficult, however, to see why, if this distinction between destruction and perdition is to hold (cf. Gwynn's note in Speaker's Commentary on Ph 3^{19}), the Revisers did not carry it out more consistently. At Ro 9^{22} (κατηρτισμένα εἰς ἀπώλειαν) 'destruction' has no doubt been allowed to remain as more suitable to the figure of the potter and the clay; but why is it left at Mt 7^{13} 'broad is the way that leadeth εἰς τὴν ἀπώλειαν'? The more technical and complete sense of ἀπώλεια as perdition (Ph 3^{19}, Mt 10^{28}) in comparison with the more general sense of ὄλεθρος as destruction (cf. 1 Co 5^{5}), comes out at 1 Ti 6^{9}, where ἀπώλεια serves as a definitive climax—'hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition.'

The question whether the word ἀπώλεια, with its correlates, (a) involves annihilation, (b) admits of unending existence and punishment, or (c) gives room for restoration, has already been dealt with in the article on ESCHATOLOGY (see vol. i. esp. pp. 738–740, 752 f., and 756). It is a question which (as it seems to us) can never be absolutely decided by the phraseology. An objection to the unconditional acceptance of (a) lies in the Jewish views of Sheol and Gehenna, and in such a moral use of ἀπόλλυμι and its correlates as in the phrase (Lk 19^{10}), 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost (τὸ ἀπολωλός),'—a moral use which can be illustrated from the Greek prose of Polybius and Plutarch, and from the exegesis of Philo.* (b) is rendered uncertain, not only by a priori considerations as to the character of God, but by the proved relativity in the sense of alών and alώνιος. It is impossible to dogmatize in the direction of (c) in face of the manifest efforts of our Lord and the writers of the NT to depict a finality of destiny for those who reject the truth. But when these can be said finally to reject it we are not distinctly informed. Without doubt, it is to men in the present state of existence that the gospel makes its urgent appeal. But nowhere in the NT are unbelievers warned that after the cessation of the present mode of existence all chance is gone. Of two things only can we speak with any confidence: freewill will never be forced; repentance will never be spurned. J. MASSIE.

PERESH (פֶּרֶשׁ, B om., A Φάρες).—A 'son' of Machir, 1 Ch 7^{16}. See MANASSEH, p. 232a.

PEREZ (פֶּרֶץ 'rupture,' or 'breach'; cf. Perez-uzzah, Baal-perazim, etc.).—In AV of OT this name is, except in 1 Ch 27^{3}, Neh $11^{4.6}$, spelt Pharez, a modification of the LXX Φάρες and Vulg. Phares. This last form is found in AV of Mt 1^{3}, Lk 3^{33}, and is retained by RV in 1 Es 5^{5}.

Perez was one of the twin sons of Judah by Tamar his daughter-in-law, and received his name from the manner of his birth, Gn 38^{29}. Nothing else is known of his personal history. In the genealogies he takes precedence of his twin brother Zerah, and to him the leading families of the tribe of Judah traced their descent. According to Gn 46^{12}, Nu $26^{20.21}$, there were four Judahite clans, two of which, Hezron and Hamul, represented Perez; the others were descended from Shelah and Zerah respectively.

Ewald (HI i. 365) has an ingenious theory, that as in Levi, so in Judah there were twelve families, and that the clan of Perez preponderated in the latter tribe, as that of Kohath did in the former, the Kohathite families being equal to the Gershonite and Merarite combined. In support of this he appeals to 1 Ch 2 and 4^{1-23}, which he thinks represent two different genealogies of Judah. In 1 Ch 2 six sons are assigned to Hezron, equalling in number Shelah and the five sons of Zerah. Ewald here, however, ignores Hamul, the addition of whom increases the preponderance of the Perez families. Indeed 1 Ch 2 deals almost exclusively with them. But the account in 1 Ch 4[1-23] is quite different. Here there is explicit mention of six 'sons' of Judah: (1) Perez (=Hamul acc. to Ew.), (2) Hezron (elsewhere son of Perez), (3) Carmi (grandson of Zerah, Jos 7[1], and his representative here, acc. to Ew.), (4) Hur, (5) Shobal (=Shobab, ch. 2[18]), (6) Shelah. Hur and Shobal are in ch. 2 sons of Chelubai or Caleb, son of Hezron. In order to make up the required number of 12 families, Ewald finds in this chapter six other 'sons' of Judah. His selection, however, seems quite arbitrary; ch. 4 is merely a disjointed list of names of persons and places, the mutual relationships of which are scarcely defined. Ewald is on surer ground when he says that in both 'genealogies' 'the proper family history of the tribe was combined with the history of the country as a whole, as well as of the possessions and residences of the more powerful families.' The blessing pronounced on Boaz by the elders of Bethlehem, Ru 4[12] 'Let thy house be like the house of Perez,' indicates, indeed, that the descendants of Perez were numerous, but is a natural expression in the mouths of members of that family. In later times, the fact that David and the royal line of Judah were descended from Perez through Ram, son of Hezron, naturally accounts for the prominence assigned to the family; the precedence of Jashobeam among the captains, 1 Ch 27[3], was, however, due rather to his personal prowess than to his descent; and it is to be noted that on comparing the mutually complementary lists, 1 Ch 9[4], Neh 11[4.6], we find that in the time of Nehemiah the descendants of Perez were not so numerous as those of Zerah. Perez occurs, of course, in the genealogy of Christ, Mt 1[3], Lk 3[33].

PERFECTION.—We exclude from present consideration the absolute perfection peculiar to God. Wherever the term is applied in Scripture to the Divine Being (Dt 32[4], 2 S 22[31], Ps 18[30] 19[7], Mt 5[48]), no limitation of its meaning is possible. It is certainly significant that the Divine holiness itself is proposed as a motive and pattern to man, Lv 11[44], 1 P 1[15f.], 1 Jn 3[3]. Hence there is a close connexion between man's conception of the Divine holiness and his conception of the holiness possible to and obligatory on himself. The latter, however, is our immediate subject.

The terms used in Scripture (שָׁלֵם, תָּמִים, τέλειος), being general and abstract, tell us little until defined by the context; and the context is the Divine law as understood in a particular age. Their connotation varies with man's knowledge of moral and religious truth. The same terms are used throughout the OT, and indeed throughout Scripture; but their meaning grows with the growth of revelation. Even within the limits of the OT the development is great. How much more does 'perfect' mean to the later prophets than to the patriarchs! On NT ground the development is, of course, greater still. The perfect man in a particular age is the man who realizes in himself the Divine law, or the ideal (τέλος) of man as known in that age. Thus, in order to give a complete view of the growth of the term in meaning, it would be necessary to trace step by step the growth of moral and religious ideas in Scripture. It will be enough here to indicate the chief stages in the development.

Speaking broadly, we may say that the OT idea of moral perfection is distinguished from the NT one in three respects. It is negative rather than positive, refers to outward act rather than to inner disposition and spirit, and may be summed up in righteousness rather than in love. It will be obvious at once that such a statement is to be taken with qualifications. There are beyond question positive elements in OT ethics, rightness of disposition as well as of act is required, love has a place beside righteousness. Still, we think, careful examination will show that the negative, the outward act, righteousness, are the prominent, emphatic elements in OT, as the other elements are in NT. The higher, spiritual aspects are just mentioned in OT, and then reserved for fuller exposition till the fulness of time.

At the earliest stage the 'perfect' man is simply the 'upright' man in contrast to the 'wicked' (Job 1[1.8] 2[3] 8[20] 9[22], Ps 37[37], Pr 2[21]); in Ps 37[37] and elsewhere תָּם and יָשָׁר are used convertibly. The term is probably applied to Noah, Abraham, Jacob, and Job in the same sense Gn 6[9] 17[1] 25[27], Job 1[1], although in Gn 17[1] 'Walk before me' suggests higher thoughts, as also in Dt 18[13] 'Perfect with the LORD thy God' does the same. In Gn 17[1] LXX has ἄμεμπτος. In Dt 6[5] and Lv 19[18] the two great commandments are definitely formulated, but they are nowhere expounded and worked out in detailed application (see Lk 10[27]). In a similar way the forbidding of sins of desire Ex 20[17], the requirement of inner truthfulness Ps 15[2] 51[6], 'circumcision of the heart' Dt 30[6] (cf. with Ro 2[29]), preference of moral to ceremonial purity Is 1[16], Mic 6[8], Jl 2[13], Jer 31[33], Ps 17[15], are germs of great developments; but they remain germs in OT days.

The growth in the meaning of perfection in the NT is immense. The goal of the old economy is the starting-point of the new. The positive side of the law is everywhere foremost, Mt 7[12.21.24] 25[45], Jn 13[17] 14[15.23] 15[14], Ja 1[22.25] and often. Insistence on inward righteousness is just as marked a feature of NT teaching. This is in great part the burden of the Sermon on the Mount, Mt 5[22.28]; the beatitudes are blessings on gracious disposition. Outward obedience is too little, nothing but an inner transformation is sufficient, the roots and springs of man's life must be made new, Mt 7[17] 15[18], Jn 3[3.6], Ro 8[6] 12[2], 2 Co 5[17], Gal 5[24], He 9[14] etc. Above all, love, which is righteousness raised to the highest power, appears everywhere as the central law of life, Mt 5[44], Lk 10[27f.37], Jn 13[34], Ro 13[10], 1 Co 13, Ja 2[8], 1 Jn 3[18.23] 4[7.11.16.18] etc. This substitution of love of God and man for righteousness involves a complete transformation of the Divine law. The two great commandments of the law are applied in detail to the different relations and duties of human life, Mt 5[44], Ro 12[10], He 13[1], 2 P 1[7]. Such summaries of duty as are found in Ro 12 and 13 are simply different applications of the two chief commandments. The distance we have travelled is seen in comparing the 'perfect' of the Lord's words in Mt 5[48] with the 'perfect' of the OT. The qualifying clause 'As your Father,' the context with its command 'Love not merely your neighbour but your enemies,' and the entire strain of precept in the discourse, forbid the fixing of narrow limits. St. Paul's teaching in Ro 12[19-21] is in the same spirit.

The proposal of Christ Himself as the example of Christian life is very significant. Not merely His teaching, He Himself is the law, the ideal of renewed man, Jn 13[15], Ph 2[5], Eph 4[32] 5[1f.] ('Be ye imitators of God'). This suggests the further fact that the new, the Christian type of character is the one in which the mild virtues and graces prevail, Mt 5^{2-9} 11^{29}, Jn 13^{14}, Gal $5^{22f.}$ 6^{2}, Ph 2^{3} 4^{5}, Col 3^{12}.

The apostolic prayers and wishes for Christian Churches are full of instruction on this subject. Passages like Eph 1^{16-19} 3^{14-19}, Col 1^{9-11}, 1 Th 5^{23}, 2 Co 13^{9}, are the final expositions of the law of love, and show to what a height the idea of moral perfection has risen. Nothing has been or can be added to the type of spiritual excellence there described. The two remarkable words used in 1 Th 5^{23} may be taken as an inspired interpretation of τέλειος, namely ὁλόκληρος and ὁλοτελής; the former occurs again in Ja 1^{4}, the latter is a ἅπ. λεγόμενον. The former, Ellicott says, 'serves to mark that which is entire in all its parts,' the latter indicates the 'thoroughness and pervasive nature of holiness' (see also Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 71, and Lightfoot, ad loc.). These passages explain very fully the meaning or contents of the moral perfection, which is to be the aspiration of every Christian for himself, as it was the aspiration of the apostles for the Christians of their day. The natural doubt respecting the possibility of attainment is anticipated by St. Paul's doxology, 'Unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think,' Eph 3^{20}, a passage which reminds us that the believer is kept absolutely dependent on the grace and Spirit of God for the beginning and perfecting of all that is good in him, Eph 2^{10}, Ph 1^{6} 2^{13}, Col 2^{28}, 1 P 1^{5}.

Another line of phraseology, taken from human growth, sheds much light on our subject. The perfect (τέλειοι) are the mature, full-grown in contrast to babes and children (νήπιοι, παιδία). 'Every one that partaketh of milk is a babe. Solid food is for perfect' (men), He $5^{13f.}$ 'Wherefore let us go on to perfection' (τελειότης), 6^{1}. 'Be not children in mind: in malice be babes, in mind be perfect' (τέλειοι), 1 Co 14^{20}, also 2^{6} 3^{1}. All this explains 'unto a perfect (full-grown) man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, that we may be no longer children,' Eph $4^{13f.}$. St. John has 'little children, fathers, young men,' 1 Jn 2^{13-15}. 'The τέλειος is one who has attained his moral end, that for which he was intended, namely to be a man in Christ' (Trench, NT Syn. p. 74). 'In this sense St. Paul claimed to be τέλειος, even while almost in the same breath he disclaimed the being τετελειωμένος, Ph $3^{12.\ 15}$' (ib.). The apostle's disclaimer intimates that there is no state of perfectness which excludes the possibility of advance; the full-grown man is still in process of growth. St. James also has the idea of perfection, 1^{4} 3^{2}.

It is encouraging to remember that this high teaching of Scripture has always been kept before the mind of the Church. Here again St. Paul is our leader, 'Forgetting the things which are behind, I press on toward the goal,' Ph $3^{13f.}$. The question of the possibility of Christian perfection in the present life was raised by Augustine and answered in the affirmative. To doubt it, he said, would be to limit the power of Divine grace. But he doubts, or rather denies, that there have been perfect Christians, assigning as reasons the weakness of human nature, the danger of pride, the need of discipline (see quotations in Pope, Compend. of Theol. iii. p. 70). The mediæval and Roman Catholic Church holds not only the possibility but the fact in the case of 'saints,' canonization being the Church's seal on the perfect life. The use of the term 'saints' to denote a special class of Christians is extra-scriptural, as in Scripture the term is applied to all Christians, Ro 1^{7} and elsewhere. The motive of the monastic system in its long history and multitudinous forms has been to secure favourable conditions for living a perfect Christian life, supposed to be impossible in ordinary circumstances. 'If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast' (Mt 19^{21}), has been held to dictate the condition of such a life, as it was the voice ever sounding in the ears of Francis of Assisi. Whatever our judgment on the monastic system, the nobility of its original aims must be acknowledged. The great succession of mystics of the à Kempis type in every Church and age has done much to preserve the tradition of a deep spiritual life. The passages of Scripture which are their watchwords (Jn 15^{4}, Gal 2^{20}, Col 3^{1-4}) have been shown to describe true experiences. John Wesley's doctrine on the subject merely follows in the wake of many teachers and communities whose aim has been the promotion of the highest Christian life. It is a doctrine of relative perfection in a very strict sense. His own favourite definition of its nature is expressed in the terms of the two chief commandments, which he insists are an ideal intended to be realized in actual life. His doctrine differs only in name from the teaching of all who desire and seek the highest life of holiness. In any case the perfect conformity to the image of the Son, which is God's eternal purpose (Ro 8^{29}), must ever remain the cherished hope of every believer in Christ.

PERFORM, PERFORMANCE. — These words have lost the idea of finishing, completing, which once belonged to them. Tindale translates Lk $14^{28.\ 29}$ 'Which of you disposed to build a toure sytteth not doune before and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to performe it? lest after he hath layde the foundacion, and is not able to performe it, all that beholde it beginne to mocke him.' And Robinson in More's Utopia, ii. (Lupton's ed. p. 170), says, 'The lacke of the one is performed and fylled up with the aboundaunce of the other.' This is often the meaning of 'perform' in AV. Thus Is 10^{12} 'When the Lord hath performed his whole work upon Mount Zion' (בְּיַקְצֵעַ, lit. 'when he hath cut off,' the figure being taken from the cutting off of the finished web from the loom; LXX ὅταν συντελέσῃ; Vulg. cum impleverit; Wyc. 'shall fulfelle,' Purvey 'hath fillid'; Cov. 'As soone as I have perfurmed'). Lk 2^{39} 'When they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord' is not merely 'when they had done all things,' but 'when they had completed' or (RV) 'accomplished' (ὡς ἐτέλεσαν). To 'perform the doing' of a thing (as in 2 Co 8^{11}) is now tautology, whence RV 'complete the doing' (τὸ ποιῆσαι ἐπιτελέσατε). The change in the meaning of 'perform' is due to the supposition that it is made up of per and form, and to form is to do, to make. It has no connexion with form, being derived from Fr. parfournir, to furnish completely, accomplish. Its original and proper meaning is well expressed by Maundeville (Travels, p. 265), 'But whan he saughe thet he myghte not dou it, ne bringe it to an ende, he preyed to God of Nature that he wolde parforme that that he had begonne.' Cf. Ps 20^{5} 21^{11} 57^{2} (Pr. Bk.).

Performance is used in AV only in the sense of bringing to an end, completing, viz. Lk 1^{45} (τελείωσις, RV 'fulfilment'), 2 Co 8^{11} (τὸ ἐπιτελέσαι, RV 'the completion').

J. HASTINGS.

PERFUME, in the sense of a fragrant material, is tr^{n} of קְטֹרֶת kĕṭoreth, in Ex 30^{35}, and of [רְקָחִים, only in plur.] rikḳūḥîm, in Is 57^{9}. In the verbal form to sprinkle scents, in Pr 7^{17}, it is נוף nûph. Fragrance, a word which does not occur in AV, has been introduced by RV in Ca $1^{3.\ 12}$ 7^{13} in place of 'savour' or 'smell,' and is the rendering of רֵיחַ. The same word occurs in Gn 27^{27}, Hos 14^{6}, Ca 4^{10} 7^{8}.

The use of odorous or strongly-smelling materials has been alluded to under OINTMENT and INCENSE, as well as under the specific names of the various scents. Most of these Scripture perfumes are pungent rather than sweetly-smelling, and would not please the present taste; but, as Pliny has said, there have been fashions in odours as in clothes. The raw materials are gums, resins, roots, barks, or leaves, and these were variously combined, according to the skill and fancy of the perfumer. These רֹקְחִים are called 'apothecaries' in Ex 30[25-35] 37[29], 2 Ch 16[14], Neh 3[8] (רוֹקְחִים), Ec 10[1], Sir 38[8] 49[1] (LXX in both μυρεψός), and 'confectionaries' in 1 S 8[13] (רַקָּחוֹת). RV substitutes 'perfumers' except in 2 Ch, Neh, and Sir; but these texts also refer to perfumers, not apothecaries in the modern sense of the word. These perfumers constituted a guild among the Jews; see APOTHECARY, i. 126; CONFECTION, i. 464; MEDICINE, above, p. 332.

These odorous compounds were either for personal or for ritual use. Those used for the former usually took the form of ointments (which see), and were (1) for the purpose of masking the odour of the body, which is apt to be strong and disagreeable in a hot country. This is especially the case with the feet, hence the Greeks and Romans regarded it as a great luxury to have their feet anointed with sweet-smelling ointment. Athenæus quotes a number of authorities in reference to this practice (xii. 78). It was in accordance with this mode of showing honour to guests that the woman anointed the feet of our Lord (Lk 7[38], cf. Jn 12[3]). For other cases of the cosmetic use of ointments or perfumes see ANOINTING. The use of these was looked upon as an effeminate luxury by Pliny, who deprecates the lavish use of them in Rome (xiii. 1).

(2) Perfumes, such as frankincense, were sometimes chewed to give to the breath a sweet scent (Ca 7[8]). For modern instances see Lane, Mod. Egyp. i. 238.

(3) Ladies among the Jews sometimes carried perfume boxes at their girdles (Is 3[20]); these were called בָּתֵּי הַנֶּפֶשׁ, and this is translated 'tablets' (i.e. lockets) in AV. They were most probably metallic boxes containing ointment or frankincense. Such boxes have been found in Egypt.

(4) Perfumes were sprinkled on garments or placed in boxes with clothing to give them a pleasant odour (Ps 45[8], Ca 4[11]). This is still done in the East as in the West (see Lane, ib. i. 256).

(5) Perfume was sprinkled on couches or beds as in Pr 7[17].

(6) In the Persian harem, perfumes were the chief means of purification in use: six months unction with oil of myrrh, and six months with spices and the 'ointment of the women,' LXX σμήγμασι τῶν γυναικῶν (Est 2[12]). At the present day rosewater is used for such purificatory washing (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 68).

(7) Odours and spices were used at funerals, applied as antiseptics to the body. Asa was laid in a bed filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the perfumers (2 Ch 16[14]); and Nicodemus provided about 100 lbs. of myrrh and aloes for the burial of our Lord. They were also burned at funerals; probably the burnings of 2 Ch 16[14] 21[19] were made of them. At Poppæa's funeral Nero burned more perfumes than Arabia could produce within a year (Pliny, xii. 18).

Of the ritual or ceremonial uses of perfumes, usually in the form of incense, mention is made in many places in the OT. Sometimes it was burned before a king when making a state procession. To this there is an allusion in the pillar of smoke which preceded the king in Ca 3[6]. Quintus Curtius speaks of a similar ceremonial in the case of Indian princes (viii. 38). See INCENSE in vol. ii. p. 468[a].

The period at which incense was introduced into the Jewish worship is unknown, but it was perhaps used in very early times (see, however, INCENSE, ib. p. 467[a]). The Egyptians used it as far back as the 4th dynasty, and on almost every stele of the period which covers the whole of the Israelite sojourn in Egypt there is specific mention of ntr sntr or incense. Odorous fumigations are used in all ceremonial religions, and the sweet smell is supposed to propitiate the god. Oedipus says that Thebes 'reeks with incense and rings with prayers' (Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus, 4), and Herodotus records that Datis, the Median, burnt 30 talents of frankincense on the altar at Rhenæa (vi. 97). Similar references might be multiplied for other places, and for cults the most dissimilar. To this idea Amos alludes, when speaking for the offended Deity he says that 'He will not smell' in their solemn assemblies (5[21]). RV renders it 'will take no delight,' which is a paraphrase, the AV being the literal rendering. In the NT there is no account of the use of perfumes in Christian worship, but the idea is spiritualized like the other typical observances of the old worship: thus St. Paul calls the self-sacrifice of Christ 'a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour' (Eph 5[2]); and he also calls the gifts which the Philippians had sent to him by Epaphroditus 'an odour of a sweet smell' (Ph 4[18]). In the apocalyptic vision the four living creatures and the 24 elders before the throne of God are said to offer incense, which is the type of the prayers of saints, Rev 5[8].

The perfumes mentioned in the Bible will be found under their specific names. They are Aloes, Apples (said to yield a fragrance, but scarcely a perfume in the strict sense), Balm, Bdellium (probably derived from a species of Amyris and allied to myrrh, see Jos. Ant. III. i. 6), Calamus (probably one of the lemon-grasses, such as Andropogon pachnodes, or schœnanthus. The former yields the sweet-scented Turkish grass-oil of commerce. It might, however, be the Acorus calamus or sweet-cane, but this is unlikely), Camphire (henna), Cassia, Cinnamon, Costus (see OINTMENT), Frankincense, Galbanum, Ladanum (the לֹט of Gn 37[25] 43[11] translated 'myrrh,' but much more probably the odorous gum exuded by a Cistus, either C. Ledon or C. laurifolius, perhaps Creticus), Mandrakes (mentioned as fragrant, but not a perfumer's material, Ca 7[13]), Mastic (σχῖνος, the Pistacia lentiscus, mentioned only in the Apocr. Sus [54]), Myrrh (yielded by Balsamodendron myrrha), Onycha (the שְׁחֶלֶת of Ex 30[34], either ladanum, as in the Arabic Version, or the sweet-smelling operculum of a Strombus. Its smell is alluded to in Sir 24[15]), Saffron, Spikenard, Stacte (probably storax, the resin of Styrax officinale), Tragacanth (נכאת of Gn 37[25] 43[11], the gum exuded by Astragalus tragacantha).

The proper names Keturah, Basemath, and Euodia seem to be derived from the words for 'incense' or 'fragrance.' A. MACALISTER.

PERGA (Πέργη; the form Πέργα, which might have been expected, seems not to occur:* in Latin commonly Perga, but Pliny has Perge) was one of the two greatest cities of Pamphylia in ancient times (Side being the other). Strabo describes it as being on the Cestrus, 60 stadia, 7 to 8 miles, from its mouth; and he speaks of the river as navigable. There is some inaccuracy in this statement, as Perga is fully 5 miles west from the Cestrus; but it is true that the nearest point on the river is about 60 stadia above the mouth. Mela more correctly says that Perga was situated between the rivers Cestrus and Cataractes, but nearer the former (which he too describes as navigable). The earliest known memorials of Perga are its coins, which begin early in the 2nd cent. B.C. But its walls are of Seleucid, not Pergamenian style, and, therefore, probably were built in the 3rd cent.; and Perga began to strike coins when set free from the rule of the Seleucid kings of Syria in B.C. 189. Its coins last in a fairly rich series till about A.D. 276; and it was the only Greek city' except Alexandria that struck coins of the emperor Tacitus. Side and Perga both ranked as metropolitan cities of Pamphylia: on coins Perga is styled metropolis under the emperor Tacitus, but certainly had that rank earlier (as Side also must have ranked as metropolis, though its coins do not mention the title).

* A coin in the British Museum Catalogue, No. 27, reads ΠΕΡΓΑ; but this may be an abbreviation of the adjective On No. 48 the city name is indubitably ΠΕΡ[Γ]Η.

Perga was evidently the stronghold of native Pamphylian feeling in opposition to the Greek colony ATTALIA, which was founded during the 2nd cent. B.C. Its coinage is invariably associated with the native goddess, who was identified with the Greek Artemis, but evidently was more like the Ephesian than the true Hellenic deity. Sometimes she is called on coins the Queen of Perga (Ἄνασσα written in Pamphylian alphabet), but commonly Artemis of Perga. She is represented either as the Greek short-clad huntress Artemis, sometimes with a sphinx beside her, sometimes with a stag, or as the Greek goddess, wearing a long tunic, but still carrying the bow; but far more characteristic is the type common in imperial times, in which she is symbolized by a quaint simulacrum, probably representing a large stone with a rounded top: the top is sometimes modified to resemble a female head with long veil and kalathos, while the stone in its lower part then seems like a rude and massive human body. On the stone sometimes there appear to be zones of dancing figures. The sphinx or the eagle are frequent accompaniments of the simulacrum. This goddess may safely be described as similar to the Ephesian (see DIANA). The name Leto seems probably to belong to her, whether it be a modification of the Lycian word lada (the lady), or of the old Semitic Al-lat or Alilat.*

The site of Perga is now called Murtana, and is about 12 miles north-east of Attalia. The temple is described by Strabo as standing on a higher ground beside the city. This higher ground was the site of the older city, and constituted the acropolis. It is not an isolated hill, but part of that steep-edged plateau which occupies much of the country between Cestrus and Cataractes. In the time of Strabo the city seems to have been on the low ground south of the acropolis. All the ruins—walls, gates, theatre, stadium, churches, etc.—are in that part, while few remains are now visible on the acropolis; but the platform with the lower part of six granite columns near the south-east of the acropolis (which G. Hirschfeld and other travellers took for the temple of Artemis) is considered by Petersen too rude for that doubtless splendid building.† The greatness of the city was bound up with that of the goddess: compare the speech of Demetrius about the Ephesian Artemis in Ac 19. The right of asylum, doubtless, belonged to her temple and precinct (see Arch. Epigraph. Mittheil. aus Oesterreich, 1897, p. 65).

Paul and Barnabas, with John Mark, on their first missionary journey, sailed from Paphos and came to Perga in Pamphylia (Ac 9[13]); and the expression reminds us of Strabo's opinion that Perga was on the navigable river. It would appear from all the passages taken together that there was a port-town on the river, ranking not as a separate city, but as part of Perga. The apostles seem not to have stayed long in Perga, and they are not said to have preached there. The failure of any allusion to preaching may safely be taken as a proof that they did not preach, but for some reason changed their plan, and thus lost the company of John (see PAMPHYLIA). The form of expression, 'Perga of Pamphylia,' Ac 13[13], does not imply distinction from any other Perga (for there was no other city of that name): it means only 'to the province Pamphylia, and specially the capital Perga.' But on their return, perhaps two years later, Paul and Barnabas preached in Perga, though apparently with no marked success. Thereafter they went to Attalia, on the coast, to get a ship for the Syrian coast: many ships would pass to and fro between Syria and the west, touching at Attalia, but not going up to Perga.

The early history of Christianity in Perga is very obscure, and probably its progress was slow (see PAMPHYLIA). Some martyrs—Theodorus, Philippa, Socrates, and Dionysius—at Perga (Acta Sanct., 20 Sept., p. 137) are mentioned under one of the many emperors called Antoninus, perhaps Elagabalus. But Perga is never mentioned in the oldest Martyrologies, the Syriac and the Hieronymian; nor is Side.

Under the Christian empire, Perga and Side, as being metropolitan bishoprics, each exercised authority over a part of the whole province; Perga being head of Secunda Pamphylia, the western division. It is by no means certain that this division affected the civil administration; it may have been only ecclesiastical; but the point is not determined as yet. Hierocles, about A.D. 530, gives only one province Pamphylia, yet he gives first all the Pergaian cities, and thereafter all the Sidetan, apparently implying both a knowledge of the distinction and a refusal to recognize it as a real fact of government.

Perga fell into decay in later Byzantine time. It had not sufficient military strength for that disturbed period. Between A.D. 787 and 812 it was amalgamated in the ecclesiastical system with the neighbouring city of Sillyon as a joint metropolitan bishopric; Sillyon had been an independent autokephalos bishopric for about a century previously. Evidently, these two inland cities were both decaying in the 8th century. The ruin of Perga proceeded steadily. In A.D. 1084 Attaleia* was made a metropolis. The official lists, Notitiæ Episcopatuum, represent this as if Attaleia were made then an independent archbishopric, and Perga remained metropolis of Pamphylia Secunda. But in reality Perga was now a mere ecclesiastical title, and Attaleia was the residence of the real head of all the Pamphylian Church that remained: in truth, most of Pamphylia provincia was now in partibus infidelium, having been conceded to the Turks by the feeble competitors who were struggling with one another for the throne of the Byzantine empire after the ruin of the imperial power at the battle of Manzikert in 1071.

The true state of matters is quite frankly recognized in the (late) Fourth Notitia, where the entry reads: ὁ Συλαίου ὃς καὶ Πέργης λέγεται, ἀνθ' οὗ ἔνι νῦν ὁ Ἀτταλίας. So, too, a MS (Tischendorf, Nov. Test. iii. Proleg. p. 629, No. 99), dated A.D. 1345 or 1445, was written by the hand of Theognostus, μητροπολίτου Πέργης καὶ Ἀτταλείας, ἐξάρχου τῆς κενῆς (i.e. καινῆς) δευτέρας Παμφυλίας. To complete this account of the decay of Christian organization in Pamphylia, it may be added that Side was degraded (1283–1321) from tenth to thirteenth in the order of rank of the metropoleis (its place being given to Philadelphia, which was then so important a city to the narrowed Christian empire); and in 1328–1341 Side disappeared entirely from the list of metropoleis, Monemvasia as head of the whole Peloponnesus taking its place.* Thus we reach the modern state of things, in which there is in Pamphylia only the single Christian dignitary at Attalia. It would appear perhaps, that, when Perga was at last definitely recognized as being in partibus infidelium, the new bishopric of Pyrgion, in the Cayster valley, was identified with it, so that the titular bishop of Perga officiated at Pyrgion with his old order of precedence according to the official lists (which never formally accepted the real historical facts): this seems implied in the entry in a late document printed in Parthey's Notitiæ Episcop. p. 314, No. 60, Πέργη τὸ νῦν Πυργίν (i.e. Πυργίον). The elevation of Pyrgion took place between 1193 and 1199. Similarly, Proconnesos was put in the place of Mokisos-Justinianopolis † (head of Cappadocia Tertia), and Monemvasia in that of Side. But in almost all such cases the official lists continued to preserve the old situation, and rarely recognized the facts of the time when they were written.

PERGAMUS or PERGAMUM (ἡ Πέργαμος or τὸ Πέργαμον; the word occurs in NT only in dat. and accus., leaving the nom. uncertain; in other authorities both forms occur; Ptolemy, Dion Cassius (lix. 28. 1), and Stephanus Byz. have Πέργαμος,‡ while almost all other writers and inscriptions have Πέργαμον) was a great and famous city of Mysia, adjoining the district called Teuthrania, about 15 miles up the Caicus valley from the sea, and about 3 miles north of the river, which was navigable for the small ancient ships. Two small streams joined the Caicus near Pergamum, the Selinus actually flowing through the city and the Ketelos washing its walls on the east. Between these two streams was a well-marked hill, which was the site of the earliest city and of the Acropolis of the later city (with many of its most magnificent buildings, agora, gymnasium, Greek theatre, temples of Dionysos, Athena, Faustina, Trajan, etc., and the great altar of Zeus). The enlarged later city extended across the Selinus to the south-west; and here were amphitheatre, circus, Roman theatre, probably the temple of Augustus, and farther west the sacred precinct and temple of Asklepios.

Pergamum was an ancient city, which struck coins as early as 420–400. But its greatness began early in the 3rd cent., when Philetærus managed to appropriate a great treasure deposited there under his charge by king Lysimachus; and by the support of Seleucus, the Syrian king, he gradually made himself independent and powerful (B.C. 284–263). He was succeeded by his nephew, Eumenes (263–241); thereafter succeeded Attalus I., who took the title of king (241–197); Eumenes II. (197–159); Attalus II. (159–138); and Attalus III. (138–133), who bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans.

The military glory of the Attalid kings and of Pergamum lay in the wars with the Gauls or Galatians (which see), who invaded Asia Minor in B.C. 278. Eumenes I. paid tribute to the Gauls; but Attalus I. refused to continue this humiliating custom; and when war followed he won a great victory at the sources of the Caicus, about B.C. 241–240. It was in the flush of this victory that Attalus assumed the title of king. The success was celebrated in art and literature as a triumph of Hellenic civilization over barbarism. This and other victories gave Attalus supremacy over great part of western Asia Minor (Asia cis Taurum); but about 222 the Seleucid dominion over this country was restored, and Pergamenian power shrank once more to its previous narrow bounds, what was called the πατρώα ἀρχή immediately round Pergamum. Attalus slowly reconquered his lost empire, and, taking advantage of the Roman enmity against the Seleucid kings, he threw all his strength on the side of the great republic. About 205 he actively aided the Romans to get from Pessinus the sacred image of the Phrygian mother of the gods, which the Sibylline books directed them to bring to Rome as a condition of success in the war against Hannibal. Eumenes II. continued the policy of alliance with Rome. He actively co-operated in the war of 190, and at the peace of 189 the whole Seleucid dominions on this side of Taurus were given to him. Thus once more Pergamum became the capital of western Asia Minor, and in the following 18 years Eumenes carried on vigorous operations in central Asia Minor, and won several successes over the Gauls (who had been settled in the part of ancient Phrygia and Cappadocia which was henceforth called GALATIA). But the Romans were not inclined to allow Eumenes to become too strong, and their steady though carefully veiled support maintained the Galatians in independence, when they seemed on the point of falling into subjection to Pergamum.

In the spring of the year 133 Attalus III. died, leaving a will in which, while he ordered that Pergamum and the other towns should be administered as constitutional, self-governing cities, he bequeathed his entire kingdom to the Romans.* At this point the coinage of Pergamum again begins to illuminate the city, whereas from 284 to 133 the coins were exclusively royal. The most famous class of Pergamene coins, the cistophori, struck first by the kings, were continued after the royal rule ended. Cistophori were struck, not only at Pergamum but also at many other of the great cities of Asia (including Mysia, Lydia, Phrygia, and Caria), and they were the commonest current silver coin in the Ægean lands. The type was composite, uniting the cista mystica and other accompaniments of Dionysiac worship. The coinage of Pergamum continues in an unbroken and very rich series down to the reign of Gallienus, in the latter part of the 3rd cent. after Christ.

In 133 the Pergamenian realm, bequeathed to the Romans, was formed into a Roman province; but the province was much smaller than the kingdom, for Phrygia Magna was given away to Mithridates, king of Pontus. Phrygia was reclaimed by the Senate after B.C. 120, when Mithridates died; but, though loosely attached to the province, it was not properly organized and definitely incorporated in Asia (as the new province was called) until the year B.C. 85–84 under the government of Sulla. From that time onwards the province had much the same extent as the old Pergamenian realm. The name Asia as applied to the province was apparently a Roman invention, but it was taken up by the Greek population, and is used freely in the inscriptions of the great cities to indicate the Roman provincial unity with all the countries embraced in it (see LYDIA, ASIA).

* Notitia, iv. 60, xii. 14, 35 (Parthey, pp. 136, 237, 238): the stubborn unwillingness of the official Notitiæ to recognize the real facts appears in the Fourth Notitia, which still continues to mention Side (iv. 11) in its old place as head of Pamphylia, besides recording its new situation. But xii. mentions the new situation twice, under each name.

The four chief gods of Pergamum are mentioned in an oracle of about A.D. 167, which ordered the Pergamenians to seek relief from the great pestilence by appealing to Zeus, Dionysos, Athena, and Asklepios.* All appear frequently as types on the coins of the city. Zeus Soter and Athena Nikephoros were especially honoured as having given victory over the Gauls in the olden time. The whole strength and skill of Pergamenian art was directed to glorify them as the patrons of Greek genius triumphing over barbarism. Asklepios was introduced from Epidauros, probably in a comparatively recent historical period (perhaps in the 5th cent. B.C.). Dionysos was apparently a native Anatolian deity, worshipped with mysteries and rites of a peculiar society called Boukoloi or Ox-herds, who were the attendants of the ἄξιος ταῦρος, a mystic name of Dionysos. All these gods had splendid places of worship. Zeus and Athena were more of Hellenic and artistic conceptions, Dionysos Kathegemon more purely religious. Under the Roman empire, Asklepios the Saviour (Soter) became the most fashionable deity of Pergamum; but he appears on coins as early as 159–138 and often in the 1st cent. B.C. As the god of the healing art, he had a temple and a sacred precinct to which flocked many invalids for medical treatment, which they received partly directly from the god (who revealed the method of cure in dreams when the sufferers slept in his sacred place), partly from the priests and physicians in attendance on the temple. As this worship and medical treatment brought many wealthy visitors to Pergamum, the god was naturally highly popular in the city. Hence, in the 2nd and 3rd cents. after Christ, Asklepios was the representative deity of Pergamum, standing for it as type on most of the symbolical alliance coins.

The view has been often maintained that the richness of the accessories with which the worship of these and other deities was conducted in Pergamum suggested the words in Rev 2^{13}, describing the city as the place 'where the throne of Satan is,' and as the place 'where Satan dwelleth.' According to that view, Pergamum is pictured as a religious centre, and contrasted with purely commercial cities like Smyrna and Ephesus and Corinth. But this picture is hardly true to the facts as they existed when the Apocalypse was written. It was not the case that commercial cities were less given to religion in ancient times than those which, like Pergamum, lay apart from the great lines of commerce and intercourse. Writers who take that view are misled by modern ideas, natural in modern time when religion has become a moral force, resisting and seeking to withdraw men from many of the practices conducive to commercial success. But in ancient times religion was rather the glorification of success, commercial and otherwise: the gods were the patrons of every side of common life; and the great commercial city was most likely to be the great religious city. If the greatest centre of pagan ritual in the province Asia is the place where the throne of Satan is, then Ephesus is the city that beyond all others merits that description.

The words of Rev 2^{13} must refer to some other attribute which can be truly attached to Pergamum. Pliny sets us in the right path by his remark, Nat. Hist. v. 30, that Pergamum was far the most distinguished city of Asia (longe clarissimum Asiæ, i.e. provinciæ). These words show clearly that Pliny regarded Pergamum as the capital of the province. The province Asia had come into existence as an enfranchised † kingdom, with a universally recognized capital: Pergamum was the germ out of which the kingdom had slowly grown to maturity and strength. Occupying this historical pre-eminence, Pergamum was naturally recognized as the capital of the new province Asia; and it retained this position for over two centuries. By the middle of the second century after Christ, on the contrary, there can be no doubt that Ephesus was recognized generally as the capital of the province. It is uncertain at what time the change was made. It is even uncertain whether the change was formally made at some definite time by imperial order, or gradually came about in practice without any authoritative imperial recognition. It is, however, certain that, under Augustus, Pergamum was still the capital, for the provincial council (called the Κοινὸν Ἀσίας)* built there the temple dedicated to Rome and Augustus to serve as its meeting-place, while Ephesus then was not officially regarded as leading city. The provincial council built a temple at Smyrna to Tiberius, and it was perhaps not until A.D. 41–54 that it built at Ephesus a temple and dedicated it to Claudius.† Down to this time it seems reasonably certain that Ephesus had not been recognized, either by general consent or by imperial act, as capital of the province. The provincial council necessarily made its temple and meeting-place first in the provincial capital; and by degrees the modification was introduced that temples and meetings were arranged also in other great cities of the province. Asia was peculiar in having so many meeting-places of the provincial council; in many provinces there was one single unvarying place of meeting for the council. Ephesus had built a temple of Augustus before B.C. 5;‡ but this seems to have been only a dedication by the city, and not arranged and sanctioned by the provincial council;§ and it stood in the sacred precinct of Artemis, not in a separate precinct of its own.

Even in the beginning of the 2nd cent. Pergamum probably still ranked officially as the capital, for it had got a second temple of the Emperors, and the title 'twice Neokoros,' before A.D. 123 (and probably already in the time of Trajan), whereas Ephesus acquired these honours only late in the reign of Hadrian, between the proconsulate of Peducæus Priscinus, A.D. 127, and that of Aurelius Fulvus Antoninus about A.D. 130 or 135.‖

Should we not, then, explain by this primacy in the worship of the Emperors the statement in Rev 2^{13}, that 'the throne of Satan' is at Pergamum? The city was still officially the capital of the province, and, especially, it was recognized as the chief centre of the imperial worship, in which the unity and loyalty of the province was expressed. In this latter point lay the peculiar aggravation and abomination. It was the worship of the Emperors that was recognized, when the Apoc. was written, as the special foe of Christianity, as Antichrist, as Satan. It was the refusal of the Christians to pay the proper respect to the emperor by performing the prescribed acts of ritual and worship in the imperial religion that formed the test by which they could be detected, and the reason why they were outlawed: their refusal

† This, though regarded as practically certain by Buchner, de Neocoria, p. 38, is far from being so well established as he represents. It is not at all certain that there was a temple of Claudius at Ephesus. The temple built by the council at Ephesus is called 'temple of the Emperors' in Inscr. Brit. Mus. No. 481, and Smyrn. Mous. iii. p. 180.

‡ See Hicks, Inscrip. of Brit. Mus. No. 522 (where date B.C. 6 should be corrected to 5).

§ Buchner (loc. cit.) seems to have failed to observe the existence of this temple at Ephesus: he never refers to it.

was interpreted as a proof of disloyalty and treason, for it was a refusal to acquiesce in, and to be members of, the imperial unity.* Pergamum, as the chief centre of that imperial worship for the province, was the seat and 'the throne of Satan.'

We are too ignorant of the details regarding the imperial worship in Asia to be able to say exactly what was implied in that primacy. The Council of Asia met also at other places, as Ephesus (hence the presence of the Asiarchs there, Ac 19), Smyrna, Sardis; but some sort of pre-eminence belonged to Pergamum at least as late as A.D. 127 (as has been stated above). Now Hadrian visited Pergamum probably in A.D. 123.† He was again in Asia in 129, when he visited Laodicea in the Lycus valley, and presumably Ephesus and Tralleis. His interest in and knowledge of the province, the freedom with which he changed old institutions to suit the circumstances of the day, and the fact that he not merely permitted Ephesus to attain a second Neokorate (like Pergamum), but also struck imperial silver coins bearing the type and name of DIANA EPHESIA (thereby recognizing her as a Roman deity),‡ all combine to prove that it was he who recognized the overwhelming practical importance of Ephesus, and transferred the primacy of the province from Pergamum to Ephesus about A.D. 129. If this be so (and it seems practically certain), then we have an important piece of evidence about Rev 2^{13}: that passage was written before A.D. 129.

But the order of enumeration of the Seven Churches of Asia, beginning with Ephesus, seems to start from the capital, and then to go round the important cities in geographical order—Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. The explanation probably is that a conflict existed between the official view and the popular view: the former still regarded Pergamum as the capital, while the latter had regard to the practical fact that Ephesus was the greatest and most important city of Asia, on the main route of communication, whereas Pergamum lay on a bypath, and had only a historical title to the primacy in Asia. In this case the ecclesiastical organization accepted the facts of the situation from the time of Paul onwards; so also did the emperor Caligula in a decree quoted by Dion Cassius, lix. 28. 1 (unless he was following chronological order).

Even after it lost the pre-eminence in the province, Pergamum continued to be a great and specially honourable city. It was granted a third Neokorate by Caracalla; and no Asian city ever attained more. This title has often been misapprehended by the older writers: when a city styles itself Neokoros on coins and in inscriptions, this always implies 'warden of a temple dedicated to the imperial worship.' When a city has the title 'thrice Neokoros,' this implies three separate temples of Emperors, each with its separate priesthood and services and staff of attendant ministers. Ephesus, by a solitary exception to the rule, sometimes boasts itself 'four times Neokoros,' where the fourth Neokorate refers to the worship of Diana the Ephesian, recognized as a Roman deity by Hadrian (see above). Pergamum on its coins boasts itself as the first city honoured with triple Neokorate; but no stress can be laid on this boast, for the three cities, Pergamum, Ephesus, Smyrna, vied with one another in titles, inventing or appropriating them, and all three claimed the primacy of Asia on different grounds.§

The allusion to the martyr Antipas at Pergamum (Rev 2^{13}) is remarkable. No martyr from any other of the Seven Churches is alluded to. Yet it is not to be doubted, in view of the rest of the book, that there had been martyrs in them all, and that their sufferings, which are mentioned, imply fully developed persecution by the Roman state. The prominent mention of Antipas is probably to be explained by his being the earliest martyr put to death by the Roman state policy; and, according to a common principle, the name of the first is given as in a sense representative of the whole list. While Pergamum was the capital of the province, the governor, before whom the trials would be held, was there more frequently than in any other city (though of course he made occasional progresses through his province); and many Christians from other cities would be condemned and would suffer there, so that Pergamum would be peculiarly associated with the death of the martyrs from Antipas onwards. There is therefore no proof that Antipas belonged to Pergamum, though he is mentioned as having suffered there.*

This position of Pergamum as the place of martyrs did not continue after it ceased to be 'the place where the throne of Satan is.' After the time of Hadrian, doubtless, the proconsul of Asia spent much more of his time at Ephesus than at Pergamum; and we observe in the earliest Martyrologies, the old Syrian and the Hieronymian, that more martyrs are associated with Ephesus, Smyrna, Laodicea, and Synnada than with Pergamum; for very few names of the 1st cent. martyrs at Pergamum were preserved.† The allusion to the new name given to each Christian, secret, written on a white stone (Rev 2^{17}), is perhaps an allusion to the custom of taking secret and new baptismal names: this custom perhaps arose in the stress of persecution, and was intended to ensure greater secrecy during the ages when it was dangerous to be known as a Christian. The secret name is mentioned only in the letter to Pergamum, the place of martyrs, and does not occur in the letters to the other churches. The question also occurs whether the allusion to writing on a white stone is made with reference to the writing material manufactured at Pergamum and deriving its name from the city, charta Pergamena or parchment. In the letter to Philadelphia occurs an allusion to writing: 'I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God': the difference between this expression and the secret name written on the white stone at Pergamum suggests that the language is chosen with reference to the special circumstance of the city: 'the name is written, not on your lasting white parchment, but on an imperishable white tessera'; cf. LAODICEA. The 'white stone' is not an allusion to the white stone (λευκὸς λίθος), i.e. marble, so abundant in the buildings of Pergamum and other great cities: it is called a 'white ψῆφος,' a sort of tessera, a small cube or tablet, on which brief titles or watchwords or signs were engraved, and which was often employed for similar purposes to a ticket in modern times.

That there were Jews in Pergamum may be regarded as certain. In B.C. 139 the Romans wrote to Attalus II. in favour of the Jews, which proves that there were Jews in his dominions (as is of course well known from other sources),‡ and there is a reasonable certainty that some would settle in the capital of the kingdom as the centre for financial operations. About B.C. 130 the Pergamenians, now an autonomous state (as we have seen above), passed a decree (in accordance with the resolution of the Roman Senate) in favour of the Jews and the high priest Hyrcanus.* While this decree does not actually mention Jewish residents in the city, there would be little reason for it unless Pergamum were in close relations with the Jews. Under the Romans, Pergamum was no longer the commercial centre of the province, for it lay far from any of the great trade routes between the East and Rome; and it may be regarded as probable that the Jewish settlers in Pergamum would not increase but rather diminish in numbers. Hence in B.C. 62, when Flaccus, governor of Asia, confiscated the money which the Jews of the provinces were on the point of sending to Jerusalem as their annual contribution, he seized at Apameia of Phrygia nearly 100 lbs. weight of gold,† at Laodicea of Phrygia over 20 lbs. weight, at Adramyttium an amount which has been obliterated in the manuscripts, and at Pergamum a small amount. Adramyttium, as a seaport, was apparently at that time a more important Jewish centre than Pergamum. The inscriptions hitherto discovered in the city never allude to Jews; but, inasmuch as the Jews used pure Greek names (even the envoys mentioned in the Pergamenian decree about 130 have Greek names, and would be unrecognizable as Jews), some of the persons alluded to in the inscriptions may possibly be Jews. On the whole, the failure of the term 'Jew' in the numerous inscriptions points to the very thorough assimilation of Greek manners by the Pergamenian Jews, who had thus become almost undistinguishable from the general population of the city. It is probable that this adoption of Greek manners by the Jews in Pergamum is the cause of the allusion to Balaam and the Nicolaitans in Rev $2^{14.\ 15}$. Some of them had become Christians; and their freedom in following Greek ways of life, and in complying with idolatrous usages in society, had begun to have some effect on the Christian community in the city.

* No independent tradition about Antipas has come down to us: the references to him seem all to depend on Rev 2^{13}. The details of almost all events in the earliest persecutions perished from the memory of history.

Little is known as to the later history of Christianity in Pergamum, or as to the fortunes of the city. It was a bishopric throughout the Byzantine period, being part of the later and smaller Byzantine Asia, under Ephesus; and it has continued to be a place of some consequence, preserving the ancient name Bergama, down to the present day. Much more light will be thrown on the city when the splendid and costly excavations conducted for years at Pergamum by the German Government are completed and their results fully published. Up to the present time the volumes (i.) on the inscriptions (with supplement in Athen. Mittheil. Inst. 1899), (ii.) on the sanctuary of Athena Polias Nikephoros, (iv.) on the theatre-terrace, and (v.) on the temple of Trajan, are the only ones published.

PERIDA (פְּרִידָא, Φαδουρά). — The eponym of a family of 'Solomon's servants,' Neh 7^{57}. In the parallel passage, Ezr 2^{55}, the name appears in the form Peruda (פְּרוּדָא; B Φερειδά, A Φαρειδά), and in 1 Es 5^{33} as Pharida (B Φαρειδά, A Φαριδά, Luc. Φαδουρά).

PERIZZITE (הַפְּרִזִּי).—The name of one of the 'peoples' which were settled in Palestine before and at the period of the Isr. immigration. When the writers of the OT would characterize the country as it was at that period in respect to population, they frequently enumerate a list of six 'peoples,'—the Amorite, the Hittite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite (Ex 3^8 * 17 * 23^{23} * 33^2 * 34^{11} *, Dt 20^{17} *, Jos 9^1 * 11^3 12^8, Jg 3^5), to which is sometimes added the Girgashite [Dt 7^1, Jos 3^{10} 24^{11}, Neh 9^8 (where the Hivite is omitted)]. At a later date it is stated that Solomon reduced to slavery all the people in his kingdom who remained of the Amorite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite (1 K 9^{20}=2 Ch 8^7). A yet longer list is given (Gn 15^{20}) in which, while the Hivite is omitted, the Kenite, the Kenizzite, the Kadmonite, and the Rephaim are added. A very late tradition, on the other hand, speaks of the land as originally inhabited only by the Canaanite, the Perizzite, and the Philistines (2 Es 1^{21}). The Book of Ezra (9^1) represents the Perizzite as still remaining in the country, a snare and danger to the returned exiles. With all these writers, however, the Perizzite is nothing but a shadowy name, accepted by tradition as one of the tribes in pre-Israelite Palestine.

In contrast with this, three passages (Gn 13^7 34^{30}, Jg $1^{4f.}$), all of which come from the South Kingdom historian (J), connect the Perizzites closely with the Canaanites, and represent them as settled more particularly in the district about Bethel and Shechem. When Abraham is parting from Lot at Bethel, it is added that the Canaanite and the Perizzite were then in the land; after the scandal at Shechem, Jacob complains that his sons have made him obnoxious to the same two tribes; and, when Judah marches with Simeon to enter upon its conquest, those clans have to do battle in the neighbourhood of Jerus. with these tribes.†

Some have argued from this collocation that the tribe was one of the aboriginal tribes of Central and South Palestine, which had been dispossessed of its strongholds by the invading Canaanites before Israel appeared upon the scene, and had been reduced to a peasant condition resembling that of the Egyp. fellaḥîn, dependent on the dominant warlike people (cf. Dillmann on Gn 10^{15}; Riehm, HWB[1] p. 1193). The fact that the name does not occur in Gn 10, where the list of the descendants of Canaan is given, is taken to support the suggestion; while the other fact, that in Gn 15^{20} and Jos 17^{15} the clan is coupled with the prehistoric Rephaim, may show what, at the period when those passages were written, was the opinion among the Jews. On the other hand, Moore (Comm. on Judges, at 1^5) questions whether they were a distinct people at all, and were not rather, as the derivation of the word suggests, a class among the Canaanites, i.e. the inhabitants of unwalled villages, devoted to agriculture. It is noteworthy that פָּרְזִי=pĕrāzî is used in Dt 3^5 1 S 6^{18} for such dwellers in open villages, while פְּרָזוֹת occurs Ezk 38^{11} Zec 2^4 for an undefended place. And it is further noteworthy that in the two former quotations the LXX translates פרזי by Φερεζαῖοι (which is its customary translation of Perizzite), while the later Gr. translators render it ἀτείχιστοι—a fact which makes it possible that, at the time when the early tr. was made, no difference of pronunciation yet existed between the two Hebrew words. It is an old suggestion of Redslob (Alttest. Namen des Isr. Staats, p. 103), that ḥavvôth (whence Hivites) designated the villages of those who kept cattle, while pĕrāzôth was employed for villages inhabited by an agricultural class. The question cannot at present be regarded as settled.

PERSECUTE, PERSECUTOR.—Persecute (from Low Lat. persecutare, Lat. persequi) and pursue (fr. Lat. prosequi, through Old Fr. porsuir=poursuivre) are now kept distinct, but were formerly used almost interchangeably. Thus 'pursue' has the mod. meaning of 'persecute' in the Homilies, 'to pray for them that pursue him'; and in AV 'persecute' is often equivalent to mod. 'pursue,' as Jer 29[18] 'And I will persecute them with the sword' (וְרַדַּפְתִּי אַחֲרֵיהֶם, RV 'And I will pursue after them'); Wis 11[20] 'Being persecuted of vengeance' (ὑπὸ τῆς δίκης διωχθέντες, RV 'Being pursued by Justice'). Cf. Jos 8[17] Cov. 'There remayned not one man in Hai and Bethel, which wente not out to folowe upon Israel, and they lefte the cite stondinge open, that they mighte persecute Israel.'

So Persecutor means pursuer in Neh 9[11] 'And thou didst divide the sea before them . . . and their persecutors thou threwest into the deeps' (RV 'their pursuers'); La 4[19] 'Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven; they pursued us upon the mountains' (RV 'Our pursuers . . . they chased us'). As with the verbs, so with 'persecutor' and 'pursuer,' they are used in AV with none of the present sharp distinction between them.

J. HASTINGS.

PERSECUTION (verbs διώκω, ἐκδιώκω, subst. διωγμός, θλίψις).—Our Lord spoke of persecutions (e.g. Mt 5[10-12] 10[21]) to come from both Jews (Mt 23[34], Mk 13[9], Lk 21[12], Jn 15[20]) and Gentiles (Mt 10[18], Mk 13[9], Lk 21[12] [ἐπὶ βασιλεῖς καὶ ἡγεμόνας]). The first attacks came from the Sadducees (Ac 4[1-6] 5[17]), while the people were favourable (Ac 2[46] 5[14]), and the Pharisees moderate (Gamaliel) and sometimes willing (Ac 23[6ff.]) to defend Christians on the doctrine of a resurrection.

Serious persecution began when St. Stephen alienated the Pharisees and the people by preaching (Ac 6[14]) the transitoriness of the law. His lawless execution was followed (Ac 8[1]) by a great persecution in Jerusalem (Saul strove to extend it to Damascus), which involved bonds and probably further executions (Ac 22[4] 26[11]). At all events in A.D. 44 we find James the brother of John slain with the sword by Herod Agrippa, and Peter delivered only by an angel. Henceforth the Jews were St. Paul's most active enemies, as at Antioch in Pisidia (Ac 13[45, 50]), Iconium and Lystra (14[2, 19]), Thessalonica (17[5, 13]), Corinth (18[12]). The growth of national antagonism is marked by the change in the description of our Lord's enemies from the 'scribes,' 'Pharisees,' and 'lawyers' of the Synoptists to the 'Jews' of St. John's Gospel (not Apoc.) and Mt 28[15].

The Church was not much troubled by purely Gentile persecution within the period of the Acts. The only cases not stirred up by the Jews were due to trade jealousy at Philippi and Ephesus (Ac 16. 19). The Roman government protected Christianity as a Jewish sect, though Hebrew Christians may have had much violence to suffer (He 10[34] 12[4]). The Jews might punish offenders according to their own law, though not with death (Jn 18[31], 2 Co 11[24]; so in Jos. Ant. XX. ix. 1 the younger Ananus is removed from the priesthood for the murder of James the Lord's brother in A.D. 62). Pilate (supra) and Gallio (Ac 18[14]) refuse to hear charges of heterodoxy. The only effectual plan was to lay a charge of treason or unlawful worship, and back it up with mob violence. Thus Pilate crucified our Lord for treason in spite of his own decision (Ac 3[14]), and the prætors at Philippi scourged Paul and Silas unheard for unlawful worship (Ac 16[22, 37]); but the politarchs of Thessalonica were content to take security from Jason and others (Ac 17[9]) on a charge of treason, and the recorder at Ephesus warns the crowd (Ac 19[35-40]) that a riot against Christians may be punished. The charge against St. Paul as shaped by Tertullus (Ac 24[5, 6]) was a mixed one: 'We found him a man of Belial—this is only preface—(a) a mover of insurrections among all the Jews throughout the world, (b) a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes, (c) who also essayed to profane the temple.' Festus was puzzled (Ac 25[9, 20]); but Agrippa's decision (Ac 26[32]) must imply that (a) and (c), which were punishable, were not proved, while (b), which was avowed, was not punishable. And this would seem to have been the final sentence at Rome. In any case, the Pastoral Epp. (except 2 Ti) seem to imply (1 Ti 6[1], Tit 2[5]) that Christians were in no danger yet of anything worse than slander. Indeed they were unpopular enough, and needed to walk warily. Ac 28[22] may be diplomatic; but the expression of Tac. Ann. xv. 44. per flagitia invisos (before the fire) is confirmed, e.g., by 1 P 2[12] ὡς κακοποιῶν, and 4[14-17], which seem clearly aimed at the scandalous charges against them; and apparently by 2 Ti 2[9] ὡς κακοῦργος, and repeated exhortations not to be ashamed.

Roman toleration was thrown away by the decision of the apostolic conference; for if Christians needed not to become Jews by circumcision, they were not a Jewish sect. Persecution was certain, as soon as the authorities found this out. Mob hatred (Tac. supra) and perhaps false brethren (ζῆλος five times in Clem. v. 6) made the Christians the scapegoats Nero needed after the fire at Rome in July 64. Three books of NT bear the marks of the Neronian persecution. In 2 Ti 4[6] St. Paul is already being offered, and in 3[12] he expects persecution for all that will live a godly Christian life; the terror of the persecution pervades his letter as in 4[16]. 1 P—may be some years later—comforts the Christians from Asia to Pontus in their fiery trial (4[12], and constant exhortations to patience). In the Apocalypse St. John is in Patmos (relegated) and persecution is rampant in Asia, with (2[2]) patience at Ephesus (2[10]), tribulation at Smyrna (2[13]), and Antipas a martyr at Pergamum. The saints are slain (6[9]), and that with the axe (20[4]), and Rome is drunk with their blood (16[6] 17[6] 18[24] 19[2]); and the abiding impression of the scene is shown by St. John's defiance of the world in his First Epistle, as 2[17] 5[19]. St. Paul's martyrdom is implied in 2 Ti throughout, St. Peter's by Jn 21[19] and by 2 P 1[14] (good evidence, whether genuine or not), but the only other martyr named is Antipas (supra).

PERSEUS (Περσεύς).—Among the achievements of the Romans narrated to Judas Maccabæus was the conquest of Perseus, king of Chittim (1 Mac 8[5]). Chittim, properly denoting Cyprus, was applied more widely to the islands and coasts of Greece, and here (as in 1 Mac 1[1]) is used of Macedonia. The person here referred to is the son of Philip V., and the last king of Macedonia. Perseus came to the throne in B.C. 179. The Romans declared war upon him in 171, and three years later he was completely defeated by Q. Æmilius Paullus at Pydna (B.C. 168). Shortly afterwards he surrendered to his conquerors, and was taken as a captive to Rome, but through the influence of Paullus he was permitted to live in retirement at Alba.

H. A. WHITE.

PERSEVERANCE.—This subject resolves itself into two branches, viz. (a) the doctrine that God's power intervenes to preserve believers in a state of grace to the end, and (b) the virtue of perseverance, which is exhibited on the human side in fighting the fight of faith, and running the Christian race for righteousness till death.

(a) As in general, so in regard to this matter, Scripture is practical and hortatory, uttering the language of faith in reference to particular individuals or groups, and looking to their concrete situations. It refrains from putting the general questions which were afterwards suggested to speculative theology, and from drawing the universal theoretical conclusions which theology formulated. Or the doctrine given forth by the Scripture writers extends no further than the immediate practical needs of faith require. In respect to perseverance, believers, according to the NT, are not alone and unaided in their faith and religious life, but obtain God's effectual support. They are not merely assisted by the works and order of nature and the laws of morality, which God has appointed once for all for their edification and guidance. There is, besides, the present spiritual power of God acting in and upon them (Mt $10^{29ff.}$, Jn $14^{16ff.}$, 1 Co 3^{16} etc.). And as often as faith realizes vividly that this power is almighty as well as wise and good, that God and not man rules upon the earth, it gains the firm conviction that God will succeed in His designs in spite of every adverse agency, and that He will not allow His purposes of grace to be frustrated even by the conceivable wilfulness of believers themselves (Jn $10^{28f.}$, Ro 8^{31-39}, Ph 1^{6}, 2 Ti 1^{12}). That the latter remain free is always understood; God deals with men as with sons—they are treated as moral and responsible (Ph $2^{12f.}$). But the abstract question of the relation of human freedom to unfailing perseverance is neither solved nor proposed. Further, believers even continue to sin, and in them especially all sin is dangerous—in one view increasingly so, as more is ever required of them (Lk 12^{48}). For their good the precise level of attainment, above which there is safety, is hidden in all particular cases, just as one on the edge of a precipice knows the exact line between the positions of safety and ruin only when he begins to fall, or by paying for the knowledge with his life. In either kind of situation, ignorance, not knowledge,—here too nearly related to hurtful curiosity and leading to overweening confidence,—is the stimulus to men to turn their faces in the right way and persevere in it (1 Co 9^{27}, Ph $3^{13f.}$). This divinely appointed arrangement, together with the faith that God will at all hazards bring His purposes to pass, and that His absolute power is put forth for the believer's support, most effectually guarantees perseverance in the latter. Along with Divine, i.e. the greatest, comfort (see the foregoing references) God administers the helps of warning and wholesome fear (He $6^{4ff.}$ $10^{26f.}$, 2 P $2^{20f.}$).

(b) The virtue of perseverance is rendered incumbent by the fact that God works together with men for the restoration of the latter to the fulness of Christ's holiness. They have therefore a lifelong work and duty, and scope for the most strenuous endeavour, in putting on Christ. The Spirit is the Teacher of the whole truth of Christ, and is a Divine Comforter (Jn 14^{26} $16^{13ff.}$). Because the source of help and the object aimed at are alike divinely perfect, man is called to an endless advance in respect to his spiritual life and moral character (2 Co 3^{18}). The consideration of the great cloud of witnesses who, amid sorest hardships, persevered in faith and integrity, should constrain us also to pursue the Christian course without intermission. Especially should the recollection of Christ's endurance banish the sense of weariness and faintness (He $12^{1ff.}$). The inspiring motives of love and hope come to the support of the sense of duty as bearing on perseverance. We are now the sons of God, greatly beloved by Him, and are designed for the highest things, even complete likeness to Christ. Both because of our present standing and the hope of what we shall be, we should strive to be pure as Christ was pure (He 12^{9-13}, 1 Jn 3^{1-3}). Again, what alternative is there to Christian perseverance which would be preferable? At best, there is only a return to the position of those who are under the law, i.e. who are in bondage and under a curse (Gal 3. 5). Or if one throws off all restraint and goes headlong into sin, the last state of the man is worse than the first. He has sinned against light, and is without excuse (He $6^{4ff.}$ etc.).

The line to be followed with perseverance leads, therefore, from the law to Christ, and from obedience to love. There is a common goal for all Christians, but the means to be used for the attainment of it are peculiar to the several individuals. All have to win Christ, and to grow into His perfect image (Ro 8^{29}, 2 Co 3^{18}); all have to seek that love which is the fulfilling of the law (Ro 13^{8-10} etc.), and which is the greatest of the graces, without which, indeed, all other attainments are as nothing (1 Co 13). But for this end each has to run the race specially prescribed for him (He 12^{1}), to fight his personal battle against the temptations which are felt to be such (Mk $9^{43ff.}$); to be transformed by the renewing of his mind, so as to prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God (Ro 12^{2}); to attend to his distinctive calling in the world, applying the particular gifts and grace bestowed upon him while acting with others as those who, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another (Ro $12^{4ff.}$). In such lines of activity the Christian perseveres to the end. He will not be weary in well-doing (Gal 6^{9}), having comfort from fighting a good fight, and exulting with hope as he anticipates a complete victory, having the earnest of the Spirit now (2 Co 5^{5}), and the promise of eternal salvation and a crown of life (Rev 2^{10}).

G. FERRIES.

PERSIA (פָּרַס, Περσίς, Persis).—Persia proper, the modern Fars, lay on the E. side of the Persian Gulf, and was bounded on the N. by Media, on the S. by the Persian Gulf, on the W. by Elam, and on the E. by Karmania (now Kerman). Its earlier capital Pasargada was afterwards superseded by Persepolis. After the conquests of Cyrus and the establishment of the rule of Darius Hystaspis, Persia came to be synonymous with the Persian empire, which extended from the Mediterranean to India. It is in this sense that the name Πέρσαι is used in such passages as Est 1^{3}. In Ezk 38^{5} the reading seems to be corrupt, since Persia, in the time of Ezekiel, had nothing to do with the northern nations on the one hand, or with Ethiopia on the other. See, further, art. PERSIANS.

A. H. SAYCE.

PERSIAN RELIGION.—See ZOROASTRIANISM.

PERSIANS (פָּרְסִי, Πέρσαι, Persæ; in old Persian Pársa).—The Persians were Aryans, speaking a language closely allied to Sanskrit, and were thus kinsmen of the Medes. They boasted of their admiration of the truth, but the 'lie,' which is reprobated by Darius Hystaspis in his inscriptions, seems chiefly to mean revolt against himself. They wore a tunic and trousers, cap, shoes, and upper robe, practised polygamy, and were exceedingly intemperate in drinking. They were followers of Zoroaster (see ZOROASTRIANISM), and believed in a supreme god of good called Ahuramazda (Ormazd), against whom there was ranged a spirit or principle of evil. By the side of Ahuramazda were a number of inferior deities, chief among whom was the sun-god Mithra. According to Herodotus (i. 125) they were divided into 10 tribes, of which 3 were noble, 3 agricultural, and 4 nomadic. One of the nomadic was the tribe of the Dahi, supposed to be the Dehavites of Ezr 4^9. The royal clan of the Achæmenides belonged to the noble tribe of Pasargada.

In the time of Sennacherib the Persians were already settled in Parsuas or Persia, and sent help to the king of Elam against the Assyrians. This Parsuas must be distinguished from another northern Parsuas or Barsuas, on the shores of Lake Urumiyeh, with which the Parthians have been connected by some scholars. The first Persian leader known to us was Hakhámanish or Achæmenes. His son Chaishpish or Teispes (Teuspa in Assyrian) conquered Anzan in Elam in the closing days of the Assyr. empire. His daughter Atossa is said to have married Pharnakes, king of Cappadocia (Diod. ap. Phot. Bibliot. p. 1158). After the death of Teispes his kingdom seems to have been divided—Ariárámna (Ariaramnes), Arsháma (Arsammes), and Vishtáspa (Hystaspes) ruling in Persia, while Cyrus I. (Kuras), Cambyses I. (Kambuziya), and Cyrus II. ruled in Anzan. Cyrus II. conquered Astyages of Ecbatana, his suzerain, in B.C. 549 and the Bab. empire in 538. The rest of W. Asia fell before his arms, and when he died his empire extended from Lydia in the west to the borders of India in the east. His son Cambyses II. (B.C. 529–521) added Egypt to his dominions. Then came the usurpation of the pseudo-Smerdis, Gaumáta (Gomates), for 7 months, followed by his murder and the accession of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, who slowly won back the provinces of the empire which had revolted under various pretenders, and who may be regarded as the real founder of the Persian empire. In B.C. 486 Darius was succeeded by his son Xerxes, the Ahasuerus of the OT, who vainly tried to conquer Greece; then came Artaxerxes Longimanus (B.C. 466–425), Xerxes II. for 2 months, Sogdianos his half-brother for 7 months, and Darius II. Nothos (B.C. 424–405). The last four kings were Artaxerxes Mnemon, who succeeded his father Darius II., B.C. 405, and against whom his brother Cyrus the younger revolted in B.C. 401; Artaxerxes Ochus, called Uvasu in the cuneiform texts, B.C. 362; his son Arses, B.C. 339; and Darius III. Codomannus, B.C. 336 (see Neh 12^{22}), who was conquered by Alexander the Great, B.C. 333. A. H. SAYCE.

PERSIS (Περσίς). — The name of a Christian saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{12}, and described as 'the beloved Persis, which laboured much in the Lord.' The name appears as that of a freedwoman (CIL vi. 23,959), but does not occur apparently among the inscriptions of the imperial household. A. C. HEADLAM.

PERSON OF CHRIST.—See CHRISTOLOGY, INCARNATION, and JESUS CHRIST.

PERSUADE.—To persuade in AV is not always to 'convince,' sometimes only to 'argue with,' 'try to persuade,' as may be seen from 1 K 22^{22} 'Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also' (RV 'Thou shalt entice him'), and Gal 1^{10} 'Do I now persuade men, or God?' See also Ac 19^8 'Disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God,' and 28^{23} 'persuading them concerning Jesus.' Neither the Heb. nor the Gr. words so tr. have the full force of 'persuade' in mod. English. That force is, however, contained in the verb πληροφορεῖν, which is twice (Ro 4^{21} 14^5) rendered 'fully persuade.' For the Eng. word cf. Knox, Hist. 149, 'The Earle of Argyle and Lord James did earnestly perswade the agreement, to the which all men were willing: but some did smell the craft of the adversary'; and Fuller, Pisgah Sight, v. iv. 2, 'Should these quotations be severally examined, many would be found rather to perswade than prove, rather to intimate than perswade the matter in hand.'

The old adj. persuasible is found in 1 Co $2^{4\,m.}$ for text 'enticing,' Gr. πειθός (WH πιθός), RV 'persuasive.' The term. -ible is properly passive, but was often treated as active: so -ive, which is properly active, is often passive, as Shaks. As You Like It, III. ii. 10, 'The fair, the chaste and unexpressive she.' 'Persuasible' here is the Rhemish word.

Persuasions, meaning 'efforts to persuade,' occurs in 1 Es 5^{73} (συστάσεις). Cf. Tindale, Expositions, p. 73, 'When they could not drive the people from him with these persuasions, they accused him to Pilate.' In Gal 5^8 (πεισμονή) 'persuasion' is usually taken to be passive, that which the false teachers have persuaded.

PESTILENCE (דֶּבֶר deber).—A general term used for fatal sickness sent as a Divine judgment, but apparently not employed as the name of a specific disease. It occurs 28 times in Jeremiah and Ezekiel; in all but one instance (Jer 21^6) coupled with other calamities, usually famine and sword, or evil beasts. It is employed in Ex 5^3 9^{15}, Lv 26^{25}, Nu 14^{12}, Dt 28^{21} in the same sense, as also in Solomon's dedication prayer (1 K 8^{37}, 2 Ch 6^{28}), in response to which God promised to hear and answer prayers for the removal of His judgments if offered with repentance in the place in which His name was worshipped (see 2 Ch 7^{13} 20^9). It is used for the epidemic which followed David's numbering the people, 2 S $24^{13\text{-}15}$ (‖ 1 Ch $21^{12\text{-}14}$), here being a synonym of 'plague.' Habakkuk speaks of pestilence as preceding the march of God when He visits the earth in judgment (3^5), and in Am 4^{10} it is used for the plagues, or diseases, of Egypt. The pestilences from which God's people are protected are called 'noisome' and 'walking in darkness' (Ps $91^{3.\,6}$).

Deber is the word which is translated 'murrain in the Egyptian plague (Ex 9^3); and probably it is in this sense that the word is used in Ps 78^{50}, where the context favours the marginal reading 'gave their beasts to the murrain,' rather than that of the text 'gave their life to the pestilence.'

In NT 'pestilences' occurs twice in AV as the tr. of λοιμοί in the parallel passages Mt 24^7, Lk 21^{11}, in both of which it is coupled with 'famine.' This paromoiosis of λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοί is used by classical authors as in Hesiod, Op. et Di. i. 241 (a line which may be an ancient interpolation, as Æschines omits it in Ctesiph. 137); also in Herodotus, vii. 171, viii. 115; Plutarch, Coriol. xiii.; Clement of Alexandria quotes this phrase as it occurs in the Sibylline verses. See Wakefield, Silva Critica, v. 39; Field, ad loc. The fulfilment of the prophecy is recorded in Jos. BJ VI. ix. 3. RV (following Lach., Treg., WH) omits 'pestilence' in Mt. See, further, MEDICINE, p. 324. A. MACALISTER.

I. HISTORY OF ST. PETER TILL THE ASCENSION.—1. Names.—The apostle bears the names Συμεών or Σίμων, Κηφᾶς or Πέτρος; sometimes the names are combined—Σίμων Πέτρος. (a) Συμεών, Σίμων. When the Jews were brought into connexion with Greek life, for the old Hebrew name of the patriarch (Gn 29[33])—שִׁמְעוֹן, Συμεών (LXX)—the true Greek name Σίμων was frequently substituted (Sir 50[1]). In 1 Mac the ancestor of the Maccabees is Συμεών (2[1], cf. Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1); Simon Macc. himself is once called Συμεών (2[65]). Συμεών is found in Jos. BJ IV. iii. 9, and in the NT (of persons other than the apostle) Lk 2[25ff.], Ac 13[1]. Σίμων is often transliterated into Aramaic as שִׁמְעוֹן (see Dalman, Die Worte Jesu p. 41, Gram. Aram. p. 143; cf. Deissmann, Bibelstudien p. 184; it should, however, be noticed, that in the Syriac versions of the NT the old form ܫܡܥܘܢ alone is used). The apostle then bore the Hebrew name Symeon, but was much more often (see below) called by the Greek name Simon, which had become its common equivalent. (b) Κηφᾶς, Πέτρος. The plural of the Hebrew substantive (כֵּפִים= 'rocks') is found in Job 30[6], Jer 4[29] (LXX πέτραι in both passages). 'In the Targums (Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum 1032) [the word] occurs as כֵּיפָא, כֵּיפָה, for a rock or a stone (e.g. gems, hailstones, thunderbolts), or a shore. The same senses recur in the Talmud and Midrashim (Levy-Fleischer, Neuheb. u. Chald. Wörterb. ii. 321 f.), where the word has also the meaning "ring"; apparently the sense "rock" is rare' (Hort, First Ep. of St. Peter p. 152). There seems to be no evidence that the word was in any other case used as a name; it has no connexion with the name Caiaphas (Nestle in Expos. Times x. p. 185). Similarly, with regard to the Greek equivalent Πέτρος, there is little or no evidence of its occurrence as a proper name. Keim (History of Jesus of Nazara iv. p. 265, Eng. tr.) refers to Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 3, where a freedman of Berenice, mother of Agrippa I., is in some texts named Πέτρος; but according to a better supported reading the name is Πρῶτος (see Niese). From Rabbinic literature a very few instances of the occurrence of the name Peter are adduced (see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah i. p. 475 n.; Dalman, Gram. Aram. p. 147).

The usage of NT.—(a) Συμεών. In 2 P 1[1] the reading Συμεὼν Πέτρος (ℵAKLP and the mass of MSS) is perhaps better supported than its rival Σίμων II. (B curs. circ. 20, verss. pler.), and certainly, as a combination which occurs nowhere else in the NT, it is not likely to be due to copyists. In one passage of the NT the name stands above suspicion. St. James begins his speech in Ac 15[14] with the words Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, ἀκούσατέ μου. Συμεὼν ἐξηγήσατο κ.τ.λ. Here the Hebrew name Συμεών completely harmonizes with the intentional antiqueness of the opening appeal (cf. e.g. 2 Ch 20[20] 28[11]). (b) The Greek Σίμων (apart from the combination Σ. Πέτρος) is not found in the narrative of the Gospels after the apostle's call except in connexion with the lists of the apostles (Mt 4[18] 10[2], Mk 1[16. 29f. 36] 3[16], Lk 4[38] 5[3ff. 10] 6[14], Jn 1[41]). On the other hand, Simon is the name by which our Lord addresses him (Mt 17[25], Mk 14[37], Lk 22[31], and, with his father's name added, Mt 16[17], Jn 1[42] 21[15ff.]), the exceptions (see below) being Mt 16[18], Lk 22[34]; and by which the apostles are introduced as speaking of him (Lk 24[34]; but see Mk 16[7]). Thus it would seem that during the months of discipleship the apostle was still commonly known by his name Simon; and this was the case even in much later days among those who, being outside the Church, could not understand the strange Πέτρος as in itself a sufficient designation (Ac 10[5. 18. 32] 11[13]). (c) After St. Peter had taken his place as leader in the earliest stages of the Church's history, that name—Κηφᾶς, Πέτρος—which his Master had given him as prophetic of his special functions, superseded, at least in Christian circles, his original name Simon. So late as the time when St. Paul wrote to the Galatians and to the Corinthians, the great Apostle of the Circumcision was recognized among distant Gentile Churches under his Aramaic name Cephas (Gal 1[18] 2[9. 11. 14],* 1 Co 1[12] 3[22] 9[5] 15[5])—a fact which suggests that at Jerusalem, where St. Paul first knew him, and whence emissaries came to Corinth and to the Churches of Galatia, the name Cephas at least most frequently was used. At the same time, at any rate in Galatia, the Greek equivalent Πέτρος was not unknown (Gal 2[7f.]). At all events, before the time when 1 Peter, the Synoptic Gospels, and the Acts were written, the Greek name Πέτρος was that one by which the apostle was known throughout the Christian Church. As to details, the name Πέτρος predominates in the Synoptic Gospels (narrative)—Mt 19 times, Mk 18 times, Lk 16 times; it is common in Jn (15 times); it is exclusively used in the narrative of the Acts, 51 times. As to the use of Πέτρος in speeches in place of the usual Σίμων (see above)—in Mk 16[7] the evangelist extends his own usage into his report of the angel's message; in Lk 22[34] Πέτρε seems designedly used to bring out the tragic contrast between the typical position of the apostle and his destined failure; in Ac 10[13] 11[7] (the voice from heaven), though it may at first sight seem simplest to suppose that the name was used by which he was then commonly known, yet it must be remembered that this first opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles was one of the occasions in view of which our Lord gave him the name Peter. (d) The combination Σίμων Πέτρος never occurs in Mk. It is found once in Mt (16[16]), once in Lk (5[8])—both passages recording a turning-point of the apostle's life; in St. John it is used no fewer than 17 times; it is at least a well-supported variant in 2 P 1[1]. The combination then appears to be one which naturally suggested itself to two evangelists in connexion with two events closely bearing on St. Peter's life-work, and which, partly perhaps as uniting current Christian usage with a distant past, was a favourite with St. John. In one part of the Church, as might have been expected, the name Cephas survived. In the Syriac versions of the Gospels and of the Acts the common name for the apostle is Simon Cephas.

2. Family, home, education.—(a) The name of the apostle's father appears as Ἰωνᾶς in Mt 16[17], as Ἰωάνης in Jn 1[42] 21[15. 16. 17]. It is generally supposed that Ἰωνᾶς is a contraction of Ἰωάνης. It is, however, possible that we have here an instance of a double name, Jona-Jochanan or Jonas-Johannes, see art. JOHN (FATHER OF SIMON PETER). (b) The brother of Simon Peter, like his fellow-townsman Philip, bears a true Greek name—Ἀνδρέας. It is, perhaps, to be noticed that Andrew, with Philip, appears in connexion with certain Ἕλληνες (the word may mean Gentiles, or, in the stricter sense, Greeks) in Jn 12[20ff.]. It is certainly significant that both brothers were known by Greek names. (c) That the apostle was married in the earliest days of the gospel history appears from Mt 8[14], Mk 1[30], Lk 4[38]. His wife in later years was the companion of his missionary journeys (1 Co 9[5]).

* In each of the four passages in Gal the name Peter is substituted by some inferior authorities.

(d) The Syn optists clearly place 'the house of Simon' (in which it appears that his wife, his brother, and his mother-in-law lived) at Capernaum (Mt $8^{5.\,14}$, Mk $1^{21.\,29}$, Lk $4^{31.\,38}$). With this statement that of St John (1^{44} ἦν δὲ ὁ Φίλιππος ἀπὸ Βηθσαιδά, ἐκ τῆς πόλεως Ἀνδρέου καὶ Πέτρου) is often thought to be at variance. We may, however, suppose that the brothers originally came from Bethsaida, but were now living at Capernaum (so Swete on Mk 1^{16}).

It may be questioned, however, whether St. John does not intend to distinguish Bethsaida from 'the city of Andrew and Peter,' the former being the present home (ἀπό; so 12^{21}), the latter the birthplace (ἐκ), of Philip. A similar question arises as to Jn 11^{1} Λάζαρος ἀπὸ Βηθανίας ἐκ τῆς κώμης Μαρίας κ. Μάρθας. Here it is to be noticed that (1) if the κώμη was Bethany, there seems to be little reason why it should be mentioned at all; (2) Lk 10^{38} says that the κώμη where Mary and Martha lived was visited by our Lord 'as they were journeying' (ἐν τῷ πορεύεσθαι αὐτούς), a notice which appears to distinguish it from Bethany. According to this view Lazarus lived at Bethany (cf. Jn 12^{1}), but was a native of the village where his sisters lived, at some distance from Jerusalem. St. John, it may be added, is fond of using ἐκ and ἀπό side by side; but a study of the passages where they so stand shows that each preposition retains its proper meaning—see Jn $1^{45f.}$ $6^{33.\,38.\,41}$ $7^{17.\,41f.}$ $16^{28.\,30}$ (cf. Rev 21^{2}).

(e) St. Peter is described as 'a fisherman' in Mt 4^{18} ‖ Mk 1^{16} (cf. Lk 5^{2}), and the same thing is implied in Jn 21^{3}. He owned 'a boat' (Lk 5^{3}), which he worked with his brother. The sons of Zebedee were his partners (Lk 5^{10}); and thus the four apostles were friends before—probably long before—they followed Jesus. It is not necessary to draw out at length the traits—vigour, courage, resourcefulness—which the life of a fisherman on the lake would necessarily develop in a naturally healthy character. It is more important to ask what was the apostle's relation to the culture of his time and country. Probably the traditional view of him as a rough, uneducated peasant is a considerable exaggeration of one side of the truth. He was, of course, without such a formal training as fell to the lot of St. Paul. But, on the other hand, the influence of a religious home and of the synagogue must have had a foremost place in forming the apostle. A significant phrase of St. Andrew's (Jn 1^{41}) suggests that both brothers had felt the spell of the Messianic hope. In these early days St. Peter must have gained his close knowledge of the OT, and it is very far from improbable that he was acquainted with the LXX (see art. on 1 PETER). It has been already pointed out as a significant fact that the apostle, like his brother, was commonly known by a Greek name. His home was on the thickly populated shore of the lake, where trade brought together representatives of many nationalities, and where (to say the least) Greek must have been to some extent a medium of communication (see e.g. T. K. Abbott, Essays p. 129 ff.; Zahn, Einl. i. p. 28 f.). But whatever Greek St. Peter learned in Galilee must have been rather of a conversational than of a literary kind; it was nevertheless an important foundation. Two, and (as it would seem) only two, notices are preserved in the Gospels and Acts bearing on this subject: (1) St. Peter was recognized in Jerusalem as a Galilæan by the accent and perhaps the idiom of his Aramaic (see Swete's note on Mk 14^{70} with references). (2) The members of the Sanhedrin regarded St. Peter and his companion St. John as, from their point of view, illiterate men (Ac 4^{13}).

The words are καταλαβόμενοι ὅτι ἄνθρωποι ἀγράμματοί εἰσιν καὶ ἰδιῶται. The term ἀγράμματος looks back to the facts of a man's past early life. To a Greek it meant one who was an ἄμουσος (e.g. Plato, Tim. 23 B), one who has had no part in either side of Greek education; to a Jew it meant one who had had no training in the Rabbinic study of Scripture (cf. Jn 7^{15}). The term ἰδιώτης rather regarded a man's present position. With a Greek it was the antithesis to πολιτικός; in the mouth of a Jew (who transliterated it הֶדְיוֹט) it expressed the contrast between the man who could understand and take part in religion as conceived of by the scribes and one of the ὄχλος (Jn 7^{49}), an 'am hā-'ārez (see especially Weber, Die Lehren des Talmud, § 11, 'Der esoterische Character der jud. Religiosität'). Compare the saying of the Fathers: 'No boor is a sin-fearer, nor is the vulgar ('am hā-'ārez) pious' (Pirqe Aboth, ed. Taylor, p. 30). Thus the words are strictly relative to the point of view of the high priests. They were probably (see below) specially called forth by the apostle's boldness in expounding a passage of Scripture in the presence of, and in application to, the rulers.

3. The calls of St. Peter.—(i.) The apostle's first meeting with the Lord, and the call to friendship.—The history is recorded only in St. John (1^{35-42}). Andrew and John (for he clearly is the unnamed actor in the scene)—one of each of the two pairs of brothers who together were in partnership—are expressly spoken of as belonging to the number (ἐκ) of the Baptist's disciples (vv.$^{35.\,37}$). Since St. Peter and, as the language (πρῶτον, τὸν ἴδιον, v.^{41}) seems to imply, St. James were close at hand, it is a natural inference that St. Peter had become a disciple of the Baptist, and through the gate of this discipleship passed into friendship with Jesus of Nazareth. It is more than probable, then, that St. Peter had been a witness of the Lord's baptism (Ac 1^{22} $10^{37f.}$). On this day—which Edersheim (i. p. 344 f.) gives some reason for supposing to have been a Sabbath—after Andrew had heard the Baptist's witness (v.$^{36f.}$) and had followed Jesus, he went in quest of Simon, and, telling him that he had found the Messiah, brought him to Jesus. Jesus fixes upon him that piercing, scrutinizing gaze (ἐμβλέψας) which was to rest upon him at a later crisis of his life (Lk 22^{61}), and greets him—it does not appear from the narrative whether Jesus had known Simon before or not (cf. v.^{48})—Σὺ εἶ Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωάνου, σὺ κληθήσῃ Κηφᾶς (for the use of the patronymic on solemn occasions cf. Mt 16^{17}, Jn $21^{15ff.}$). Thus the Lord receives him as being just what he was in himself, as the product and heir of a past over which he had had no control, as destined to a peculiar office. In the last clause the Lord does not bestow a new name (see Mt 16^{18}); He rather reveals a character which He already claims for future service. As yet no permanent bond united Jesus and the men whom He had gathered round Him. For, after being His companions in His journey to Galilee and again in His visit to Jerusalem at the Passover, St. Peter and the rest resumed, as they did on a much later occasion (Jn 21), their work as fishermen.

(ii.) The call to discipleship.—This call must be placed some time after, as the earlier call some time before, the first Passover of the ministry. It is not possible to decide what is the precise relation of the history of the call as related in Mt 4^{18-22} Mk 1^{16-20} (clearly based on a common source) to that given in Lk 5^{1-11}. The essential points common to the two accounts are that Jesus calls St. Peter while he is at work (see Plummer on Lk 5^{1-11}), that he makes the apostle's present work a parable of his future work, and that the apostle's obedience is immediate. As to points of difference, Mt and Mk record the Lord's summons δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου; Lk puts the call in another setting—a miracle of blessing leads up to the act of obedience.

It is possible that Mt and Mk on the one hand, and on the other Lk, give the history of two occasions—one when the apostle followed the Lord then and there, but did not finally leave his occupation; the other when the decisive step of renunciation was taken. In support of this view it may be urged (1) that the two narratives seriously differ; (2) that the Lord certainly did repeat on a later occasion the call ἀκολούθει μοι, when added experiences would interpret its deeper meaning (Jn $21^{19.\,22}$). But it is much more probable that Mt and Mk follow a document or a tradition which brought together in a summarized narrative the calling of the four chief apostles, and that thus the story of St. Peter's call is the same as that which Lk, on the strength of fuller information (cf. $4^{16ff.}$), narrates in detail. In either case, it is important to notice the vividness of Lk's narrative as itself a witness to its truthfulness—especially the two sayings of St. Peter: (a) v.^{5} (cf. Jn 2^{5}); (b) v.^{8} ἔξελθε κ.τ.λ. (an undesigned contrast to Jn 6^{68}, and an impulsive cry which has parallels in St. Peter's later history).

In close connexion with this call (assuming that there was but one) to discipleship, on a Sabbath either just before it (Lk 4^{38}) or just after it (Mk $1^{21.\ 29}$),* we must place the miracle which the Lord wrought in His disciple's home—the healing of Peter's mother-in-law. From the phrase διηκόνει αὐτῷ (αὐτοῖς) in each of the three accounts we may infer that our Lord ate there that day; and it is likely enough that the disciple's home was 'the house' where He regularly stayed when at Capernaum (Mt $17^{24ff.}$, Mk 9^{33}).

(iii.) The call to apostleship.—If the call to discipleship must have been somewhat later than the first Passover of the ministry (Jn 2^{13}), the call to apostleship must be placed somewhat earlier than the (presumably) second Passover (see Mk $6^{30.\ 35ff.}$, Jn 6^{4}). The interval therefore separating the two calls cannot have been much more than six months. The history is given in Mt $10^{1ff.}$, Mk $3^{13ff.}$, Lk $6^{12ff.}$ The details must be passed over here. It must suffice to note that the Twelve were chosen from the whole body, and that the Lord's choice constituted them (1) in an especial sense His companions—ἵνα ὦσιν μετ' αὐτοῦ (Mk 3^{14}; cf. Lk 22^{28}, Jn 15^{27}); (2) His envoys, when the occasion came, to Israel, with authority to preach and heal. The primary place in our Lord's purpose was their education for future work. The lists of the Twelve given by the Synoptists vary in many ways, but in each of them St. Peter holds the first place (Mt πρῶτος Σίμων ὁ λεγόμενος Π.; cf. Jn 21^{2}, Ac 1^{13}). Some time after this selection had been made, the Lord sent out the Twelve to execute their double office as heralds of the kingdom and healers of the sick, two by two, marking as the scope of their mission 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt $10^{1.\ 5-42}$, Mk 6^{7-13}, Lk 9^{1-6}; it is clear that Matthew places the mission immediately after the appointment of the Twelve from a characteristic desire to bring together the notices of the selection, the instruction, and the dismissal of the Twelve). As to the use of the name ἀπόστολος in reference to the Twelve in the Gospels (except Lk 17^{5} 22^{14} 24^{10}) only in connexion with this mission, see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 22 ff.

We cannot but ask, Who was St. Peter's companion? The answer is almost certainly St. John. For (1) the Lord sent them together on a peculiarly solemn commission at a later time, Lk 22^{8}; (2) they appear as companions in the gospel history, Jn $18^{15ff.}$ $20^{3ff.}$, and in the apostolic history, Ac 3^{1}–4^{19} 3^{14} (mission to Samaria), Gal 2^{9}; (3) they were closely associated in the upper room (Jn $13^{23f.}$), and on the occasion of the Lord's appearance by the Lake (Jn $21^{20ff.}$), and together formed part of an inner circle of the apostles in Jairus' house (Mk 5^{37}), on the Mt. of Transfiguration (Mk 9^{2}), on the Mt. of Olives (Mk 13^{3}), in Gethsemane (Mk 14^{33}); and in this connexion the order in Lk 8^{51} 9^{28} (Πέτρον καὶ Ἰωάνην καὶ Ἰάκωβον) and Ac 1^{13} is to be specially noticed.

It is impossible at this point to refrain from remarking that a mere notice of the occasions when St. Peter's name is mentioned in the Gospels is apt to make us forget the all-important fact that it was in daily fellowship with the Lord, in the daily contemplation of His acts and words, public and private, that the real significance and power of this period lay. Without some intimation of this obvious truth, a brief review of the specific evidence of the Gospels as to St. Peter's life during this time may become positively misleading.

It has been convenient to consider the mission of the Twelve in close connexion with their selection. But between the two occasions we must, as it appears, place a miracle with which St. Peter was brought into close relation—the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9^{18-26}, Mk 5^{22-43}, Lk 8^{41-56}). It is the first of three occasions when 'Peter and James and John' were chosen from among the Twelve as witnesses of a μυστήριον—here of a revelation of Christ the Life. It may have been designed as a special preparation for some crisis in their mission soon to follow (Mt 10^{8} νεκροὺς ἐγείρετε). It is difficult not to trace the vividness of the narrative in Mk to the influence of St. Peter.

4. St. Peter as the Lord's companion during the (apparently) last year of the ministry.—The Twelve returned to Christ about the time when He received news of the Baptist's murder. The retirement across the Lake and the Feeding of the Five Thousand immediately followed. This whole series of events prepared the way for a period the general character of which is expressed by the words 'the proving of faith' (1 P 1^{7}).

(i.) The storm on the Lake (Mt $14^{22ff.}$, Mk $6^{45ff.}$, Jn $6^{16ff.}$).—It is remarkable that Matthew alone preserves the record of St. Peter's boastful challenge (behind which there lay a deep love for His Master, and impatience of separation from Him), his sudden fear and piteous appeal for help. Christ Himself sums up the meaning of the apostle's failure in the word ὀλιγόπιστε. It would be quite in accordance with the character of St. Peter if, when the boat came to land, he was the spokesman of 'those who were in the ship' in their confession, ἀληθῶς θεοῦ υἱὸς εἶ (Mt).

(ii.) The Lord's hard sayings at Capernaum.—St. John records ($6^{60ff.}$) that the sequel of the Lord's teaching at Capernaum about the bread of life was that many of His disciples left Him. Jesus turns to the Twelve and asks them if they too are intending to go away. Simon Peter at once answers for the rest. His reply brings out the apostle's belief in the Lord (1) as superior to all other teachers (πρὸς τίνα ἀπελ.; cf. Jn 3^{2}); (2) as the source of a life-giving revelation (cf. v.^{63}); (3) as the embodiment of Divine holiness.

This, the last element in the confession, is introduced with the emphatic ἡμεῖς πεπιστεύκαμεν καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν. The apostles (ἡμεῖς) with their sure conviction are placed in contrast to the faithless seceders. Their present assured belief is the outcome of past experience deliberately interpreted. What is the meaning of the title ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ? In a wholly independent context it is put into the mouth of the demoniac (Mk 1^{24}). It would therefore appear to be a recognized title, probably a title of the Messiah. This is confirmed when we turn to Ac 3^{14} (τὸν ἅγιον κ. δίκαιον ἠρνήσασθε), where it is placed beside τὸν . . . δίκαιον (which is certainly used of Messiah; see below, on Theology of St. Peter's Speeches). In this (apparently) Messianic title two lines of thought, as it would seem, converge. (a) Jehovah is 'the Holy One of Israel' (e.g. Is 1^{4}). (b) The messengers of Jehovah, the typical priest (τὸν Ἀαρὼν τὸν ἅγιον κυρίου, Ps 105 (106)^{17}) and the prophet (2 K 4^{9}) are holy; the whole theocratic nation is holy (e.g. Ex 19^{6}, Nu 16^{3}; note in this connexion the mysterious phrase 'the Saints' apparently of the members of the nation, Zec 14^{5}, Dn $7^{18.\ 22.\ 25.\ 27}$). This holiness is conceived of by current Jewish expectation as actually realized in the Messianic people, Ps-Sol 17^{36} (ὅτι πάντες ἅγιοι, κ. βασιλεὺς αὐτῶν χριστὸς κύριος). The Messiah Himself, then, who was regarded at once as the special messenger of Jehovah, and also as the flower and crown of the Messianic nation, was naturally described as 'the Holy One,' 'the Holy One of God.' But just as the Messianic title ὁ δίκαιος was raised to a higher and more absolute meaning by later NT writers (e.g. 1 Jn 2^{1}), so it was in the case of ὁ ἅγιος (Rev 37, 1 Jn 2^{20}). To return to St. Peter's use of the phrase at Capernaum, though the words are an official title, yet their ethical and spiritual meaning is not lost here or in Mk 1^{24}. Messiah's sinlessness and purity were a magnet to faithful disciples (cf. 1 P 2^{22}). And the avowed realization of this, as contrasted with Lk 5^{8}, marks a stage in the apostle's spiritual education.

(iii.) The questions at Cæsarea Philippi.—There are three stages in the history—(A) The Confession (Mt 16^{13-23}, Mk 8^{27-33}, Lk 9^{18-27}).—The account in Mt is the fullest; on the omission of the promise to St. Peter in Mk see Swete on 8^{29}. The Galilæan ministry was drawing to a close (see Swete, p. 166). Our Lord was farther from Jerusalem than at any other time of His ministry, and on the borders of the purely Gentile world. The time and place, then, of themselves suggest the question whether Israel, generally and as represented by His immediate disciples, accepted Him

* Mt 8^{14} introduces the account without any indication of time. It would appear that at this point he is bringing together typical works of healing (8^{1-17}), just as he has brought into a single discourse (5–7; cf. 13) typical utterances of the Lord.

whether the foundation for the great work of the future was being solidly laid. The occasion was felt by the Lord to be a great crisis, and He prepared for it as such by prayer (Lk 9^{18}). The confession of St. Peter at Capernaum was the impulsive response of the disciple to the Master's anxious, foreboding question. But now the stage in the education of the Twelve had been reached when it was well that they should deliberately and definitely face the question of the Lord's Person. In the outskirts (Mk 8^{27}), therefore, of Cæsarea the Lord put two questions to the Twelve —(a) What were men generally saying of Him? Here they all contributed something to the answer. They had seen different sides of Jewish opinion. (b) What was the thought of the Twelve themselves about Him? Here the answer of one is the answer of all, and St. Peter is their natural spokesman. The Twelve regarded Him as the Divine Messiah.

The Gospels vary as to the words—Σὺ εἶ ὁ χριστός (Mk), τὸν χριστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ (Lk), Σὺ εἶ ὁ χρ. ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος (Mt) The important question arises, Was St. Peter commended for confessing the Divinity of Jesus or His Messiahship? It is probably true that 'the Son of God' was not a common designation of the Messiah, but (1) the language of 2 Es $7^{28\ 29}$ ('My Son Messiah') $13^{32\ 37.\ 52}$ 14^{9}; comp. Enoch 105^{2}; (2) the language which the evangelists put into the mouths of persons who can hardly be conceived of as one and all rising to the absolute meaning of the title 'Son of God,' but who would naturally use Messianic language (Mt 8^{29} ‖ Mk Lk, Mt 14^{33} see above, Mt $27^{40.\ 43}$ [27^{54} ‖ Mk], Mk 3^{11}, Lk 22^{70}, Jn $1^{34.\ 49}$ 11^{27} 19^{7}); (3) the language of Lk 4^{41} (σὺ εἶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ . . . ᾔδεισαν τὸν χριστὸν αὐτὸν εἶναι); (4) the language of St. Matthew in the immediate context, v.^{20} ἵνα μηδενὶ εἴπωσιν ὅτι αὐτός ἐστιν ὁ χριστός, seem to make it clear that the title 'Son of God' was used as bearing a Messianic meaning in our Lord's day. Hence it matters little whether we consider ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος as part of the original confession, or as an addition of St. Matthew. In either case it is as Messiah that St. Peter confesses Jesus. See especially Dalman, Die Worte Jesu pp. 219–226. Thus the revelation of suffering which follows in each Gospel is the earliest insistence on that side of the true Messiah's work which became the greatest stumbling-block to the Jew.

(B) Our Lord's welcome of the Confession (Mt 16^{17-19} only).—It is clear that our Lord regarded the deliberate confession of His Messiahship as marking a crisis in His relations with the Twelve, and as a pledge of the growth of the kingdom. He answers it with a solemn beatitude addressed to St. Peter (μακάριος εἶ—the only occasion when the Lord pronounces a beatitude on an individual), and by a declaration that his confession had no lower source than a revelation from the Father Himself (cf. Gal $1^{15f.}$). And then speaking, as it would appear, as King Messiah (κἀγὼ δέ—'The Father has revealed Me as Messiah to the disciple; I in turn reveal My disciples' place in the kingdom'), He opens out the future under four metaphors—

(a) St. Peter as the foundation of the new Israel.—Taking the Syriac versions as our guide, we may conclude that our Lord's words, spoken in Aramaic, run thus: 'Thou art Cepha, and upon this Cepha I will build my congregation.' Here there are three points to be briefly considered—(α) τὴν ἐκκλησίαν μου. The word is used in its ancient theocratic sense, and the meaning is best represented by the paraphrase, 'I will build my Israel.' It must be sufficient to refer to Hort's The Christian Ecclesia pp. 3–18, esp. p. 10 f. (β) οἰκοδομήσω. The metaphor of building, to express the idea of creating and giving unity and permanence to a society of men, is not uncommon in the OT (e.g. Ps 28^{5}, Jer 18^{9}). It is important to notice that the Lord reserves to Himself the prerogative of activity. He alone is the builder. Compare the Messianic parable in Sibyll. Orac. v. 420 ff. (γ) In what sense is Cepha the foundation? Does the word point to the first stone of the building, the foundation-stone, or to the soil, the rock on which the first stones are laid? We may say, in view of our Lord's earlier saying (Mt $7^{24f.}$, Lk 6^{48}), that almost certainly the latter is the true interpretation.* Thus the Rock is, so far as the scope of the parable is concerned, separated from the stones reared thereon. This last point helps us to answer the question as to the interpretation of the Rock. It is the apostle who has just made the confession that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah. The parable itself limits its application. When the foundation has been laid, the apostle's function as described by the metaphor will have ceased. He will support the first stones of the ecclesia. The true comment on the Lord's promise is Ac 1–10.

Other interpretations of these famous words can be only briefly noted. (1) The Rock is Christ. This interpretation is excluded by the fact that in the Aramaic there is no variation (Cepha . . . Cepha) as in the Greek (πέτρος . . . πέτρᾳ), and that Christ Himself speaks of Himself as the builder. (2) The Rock is St. Peter's confession. This interpretation is excluded by the fact that the confession considered in itself was wholly inadequate. It does not include either the Resurrection or the Divinity of the Lord. Its value was strictly relative to the time when it was made. The same consideration excludes the modification of the above view which explains the Rock of St. Peter's faith. That faith was a quality which varied from time to time. (3) St. Peter as the type of, or in combination with, the other apostles, is the Rock. So Hort (Ecclesia p. 16 f., e.g. 'In virtue of this personal faith vivifying their discipleship, the Apostles became themselves the first little Ecclesia, constituting a living rock upon which,' etc.). But our Lord's words, as reported by St. Matthew, could not be more personal. To suppose that the Lord addresses St. Peter here as a type of his fellow-apostles, is in effect to imply that no words could be personal unless a typical reference were explicitly excluded. See also 'Additional Note' on p. 795b.

A clear statement as to the exposition of the words and the lines of patristic interpretation is to be found in Lightfoot, Clement ii. pp. 481–490.

(b) The new Israel as the conqueror.—The ἐκκλησία is an aggressive power. Death—the adversary of Christ—is in possession of his stronghold. But 'his gates' (cf. Ps 9^{13} 107^{18}, Job 38^{17}, Is 38^{10}) cannot withstand the attack. The new Israel is victorious against 'walled cities' like the first Israel (cf. e.g. Dt $3^{4f.}$). Such appears to be the meaning. The clause, however, has no special bearing on St. Peter's functions.

(c) St. Peter as the steward of the kingdom.†—δώσω σοι τὰς κλεῖδας τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν. The words seem to be an intentional reminiscence of the message of Jehovah as to Eliakim (Is 22^{22}): 'The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder.' The words are paraphrased in the LXX text represented by B (καὶ δώσω τὴν δόξαν Δαυεὶδ αὐτῷ), but ℵ* has καὶ δώσω καὶ αὐτῷ τὴν κλεῖδαν οἴκου Δ., and A has a conflate reading.

(d) St. Peter as the scribe who 'binds' and 'looses.'—καὶ ὃ ἐὰν δήσῃς κ.τ.λ. In this use of 'binding' and 'loosing' there cannot be but a close reference to the current technical use of these words to express the authoritative decision of a scribe on a matter of obligation (cf. Mt 5^{19}; cf. Edersheim, Life and Times ii. p. 84 f.). Such decisions on St. Peter's part in the new kingdom shall be the echoes of decisions already promulgated in heaven. On these two verses see especially Dalman, Die Worte Jesu pp. 174–178.

In regard to the essential meaning of this series of metaphors as applied to St. Peter, the following points should be noted: (1) They seem to be all conditioned by the scope of the first of them, the

* It is true that the word cepha is not used by the Syriac versions in these two passages. But that the word cepha does mean 'a rock' as well as 'a stone' is clear from the fact that it is used to render πέτρα in Mt 27^{60} (Pesh.) 27^{51} (Syr^{sin} Pesh.); it may therefore have been used by our Lord in the saying in question. See additional note on the Rabbinical use of Rock in reference to Abraham at end of art. 1 PETER.

† Compare the remarkable legend preserved in Apoc. Baruch 10^{18} and (in a somewhat different form) in the Rest of the Words of Baruch 4, 'Jeremiah took the keys of the sanctuary of God and went out of the city and cast them away before the sun, saying, "To thee I say, O sun, take the keys of the sanctuary of God . . . forasmuch as we were not found worthy to keep them, because we were false stewards."' rock-foundation, i.e. our Lord is dealing with the first stage of the history of the new ecclesia. The relation of St. Peter to the new Israel is in some sense to correspond to the relation of Moses and Joshua to the ancient Israel. (2) The promise as to 'binding' and 'loosing' given here to St. Peter is in Mt 18[18] given to the disciples. It would seem, therefore, if the words in the two places are to be understood in precisely the same sense, that St. Peter is, on the former occasion, singled out from the other disciples because he would be the first to exercise, or would be the leader in the exercise of, a power common to all. At the same time it must be noted that (a) the context in ch. 18 (viz. vv.[15-17. 21ff.]) deals with the forgiveness of sins; (β) Dalman (p. 177) shows that in Jewish Aramaic the word 'to loose' (שְׁרָא), at any rate, is used metaphorically in various senses. It does not then seem certain that the terms must bear the same meaning in both passages. (3) The Bk. of the Acts records the historical fulfilment of the promises to St. Peter. But it must be remembered that in that Book we have not a complete history of the earliest days of the Church, and that the writer is himself familiar rather with somewhat later developments. There may well have been occasions, unnoticed by the author of the Acts, which contributed to the complete fulfilment of the Lord's promises to St. Peter.

(C) The Lord's rebuke of St. Peter.—The confession of St. Peter and our Lord's announcement that He Himself would be the founder of a new Israel form the turning-point in the education of the Twelve. Mt marks the transition by the phrase ἀπὸ τότε ἤρξατο (v.[21]), which in 4[17] stands at the beginning of the ministry, and occurs nowhere else. Henceforth the Lord reveals to the apostles the mystery of the Divine purpose (δεῖ) as to the Messiah —His humiliation in His rejection by the representatives of Israel at Jerusalem (the centre of Israel's life) and His death, His exaltation in the Resurrection. The idea of a suffering Messiah was alien to current Jewish expectations (cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. p. 184 ff.). St. Peter at once protests against his Master's appropriation of it to Himself. His action (προσλαβόμενος) and his words * alike imply a position of kindly patronage towards the Lord. The Lord turns immediately upon him, and the sight of the other disciples (Mk) necessitates a public and severe rebuke—a reversal for the time of the words of commendation just pronounced;—a sentence of rebuff, pronounced as upon an enemy, takes the place of the beatitude; the rock-foundation of Messiah's Israel has become Messiah's stumbling-stone; a temper of mind capable of receiving the revelation of the Father has been succeeded by a temper of mind wholly earthly.

A week after these events at Cæsarea (Mk 9[2ff.], Mt 17[1ff.], Lk 9[28ff.]), the three disciples, who had been witnesses of a previous revelation of Christ as the Life, are allowed, on the Mount of Transfiguration, to learn the 'mystery' of Christ as the Glory of God. The impulsive and inopportune request of St. Peter sprang from a dread of the withdrawal of the outward signs of revelation (cf. 2 Co 3[7. 13]); it was the prayer of a consciously weak and earthly faith. The revelation on the mountain confirmed both elements in the disclosure of the issues of Messiah's life on earth which the Lord gave at Cæsarea. The uniqueness of His Person was brought home to the Three by (a) the glory of the Lord Himself; (b) His mysterious converse with the Founder and the Reformer of Israel's polity, in which He is seen to be the mediator between the living and the departed; (c) the voice from heaven attesting His Sonship.

In the period between the Transfiguration and the Entry into Jerusalem St. Peter is mentioned on four occasions. At Capernaum, his home, the collectors of the temple dues put to him the question whether his Master did not pay the half-shekel, and St. Peter is made by his Master the means of its payment. The Lord uses the incident to lead up His disciple's mind to the conception of His Divine Sonship (Mt 17[24ff.]). On the three remaining occasions St. Peter is represented as questioning the Lord as to the practical and immediate bearing of His words,—asking as to the scope of the parables of the faithful slaves and the sudden coming of the thief (Lk 12[41], cf. Mk 13[37]); asking as to the number of times a brother should be forgiven (Mt 18[21]); asking as to the reward in store for the Twelve in view of their absolute self-renunciation, as contrasted with the refusal of the young ruler to surrender his wealth and follow Christ (Mt 19[27], Mk 10[28], Lk 18[28]). These questions reveal the apostle's impulsiveness, the practical bent of his character, something perhaps of a lack of reverence towards his Master; while the last of them shows an undue sense of the deserts of himself and his fellow-apostles.

5. The week before the Passion.—Nothing is told us of St. Peter in connexion with the Triumphal Entry. Mk preserves two words of his addressed to Christ on the Tuesday. To St. Peter the sight of the withered fig-tree recalls (ἀναμνησθείς) the incident of the previous day, and he points his Master to the effect of His prophecy (Mk 11[21], cf. Mt 21[20]). Again, after the Lord that same day had left the temple and crossed the Kidron on His way to Bethany, He sat down on the Mt. of Olives. The main body of the apostles apparently continued their way. Four of their number—Peter, James, John, and Andrew—possibly deputed by the rest, asked Him privately a question as to the time when His prophecy just spoken should have its fulfilment, and as to the events which should herald it (Mk 13[3]; cf. Mt 24[3], Lk 21[7]). The form of the sentence (ἐπηρώτα αὐτὸν . . . Πέτρος καὶ Ἰάκωβος κ.τ.λ.) suggests that St. Peter was the spokesman. Luke preserves the detail that on the Thursday it was St. Peter and St. John whom the Lord sent to 'prepare the passover' (22[8]; cf. Mt 26[18], Mk 14[13]). In the Upper Room and in the events which followed St. Peter took a prominent part. It appears that at the Paschal meal the Lord took the place of host, St. Peter the second place, reclining on Christ's left, St. John the third, on the Lord's right hand (Westcott on Jn 13[23]). When, then, Christ washed the disciples' feet (Jn 13[4ff.]), St. Peter must have been either the first or the last to whom He came. The former alternative is the more probable, Jn's favourite οὖν here (v.[6]) as elsewhere simply denoting immediate sequence. In the dialogue which follows, different traits of the apostle's character are vividly brought out in his question expressing startled humility (v.[6] Κύριε, σύ μου . . .;), in his emphatic refusal (οὐ μή . . . εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα) to allow Christ to wash his feet, in his sudden change of mind and the eager prayer in which, giving a material meaning to Christ's words, he asks for what he considers a larger blessing. Later on in the meal, when the Lord speaks of the presence of the traitor (v.[21]), St. Peter, assuming that He had whispered the secret to St. John, abruptly asks the latter to tell it openly to the rest. Later still, when the traitor had gone out, St. Peter, taking up Christ's words (v.[33]) about His 'going,' inquires with his old literalness whither He is going; and again, asserting his absolute devotion, why he cannot at once follow his Master in His mysterious journey (v.[36ff.]). At this point Jn inserts the prophecy of the three denials. Lk (22[28ff.]) also puts the warning at this time, though his version of the Lord's words is different from that in Jn. In Lk Christ solemnly addresses Peter and unveils the world of spiritual conflict. Satan had demanded the surrender to himself of all the apostles, as he had demanded Job (Job 1[12] 2[6]), that he might sift them all—the metaphor bringing out their weakness and their separation (cf. e.g. Ps 1[4]). But Peter had been the subject of urgent supplication on his Master's part that his faith might not wholly and finally fail (ἐκλίπῃ). It is implied that the apostle would not pass through the trial unscathed. But beyond the trial a return to former spiritual relationships is promised—a return which would bring with it the duty of 'stablishing his brethren.' In answer to Peter's protestation of absolute fidelity, Christ explicitly foretells that before the cock crowed (twice, Mk) the next morning, Peter would thrice deny Him.* It is remarkable that in Jn, though three other of the Twelve (14[5. 8. 22]) interrupt the Lord's words with questions, St. Peter remains silent, perplexed and saddened, it would seem, by his Master's unexpected doubt of his loyalty. At length Christ and the Eleven go out into the Mount of Olives. It is at this point that, according to Mt (26[31ff.]) and Mk (14[27ff.]), the Lord warned them that they all would 'be made to stumble,' and foretold in detail Peter's faithlessness—a prophecy prefaced and followed by passionate protestations on the apostle's part. Thus it appears that we have three different accounts—Mt ‖ Mk, Lk, Jn—of Christ's words to Peter as to the denial. A not improbable solution of the difficulty is that Christ warned His followers several times that night that their loyalty towards Himself would be sorely tested; that He only once explicitly foretold Peter's fall; but that the several evangelists connected that prophecy with different words of warning. When the Lord and His apostles reached Gethsemane (Mt 26[36ff.], Mk 14[32ff.]), He took Peter and James and John aside from the rest and admitted them to a knowledge of the μυστήριον of His human sorrow and perfected obedience, the last of the three revelations which were crises in their spiritual education. On His return to them the first time, finding them sleeping, He singles out Peter for rebuke, tacitly contrasting his inability to 'watch one hour' with his earlier boast. One other detail is preserved as to Peter's conduct in the garden, at the moment of the Lord's arrest (Mt 26[51ff.], Mk 14[47ff.], Lk 22[50ff.], Jn 18[10f.]). Not waiting for an answer to the question, 'Lord, shall we smite with the sword?' (Lk, cf. 22[38]), and going near to frustrate the Lord's care for His followers' safety (Jn 18[8]), he snatches his sword out of its sheath and, striking at the head of a slave of the high priest who had, as we may suppose, taken hold of Christ, he wounds him. Christ's last miracle secures the safety of the apostles by undoing the misdoing of His impetuous follower. Jn, when all reasons for reticence were over, gives us the names, 'Simon Peter,' 'Malchus'; Lk alone records the healing. When Christ was led away to the high priest's official residence, St. Peter, striking a balance between his fears for himself and his love for his Master, 'followed afar off' (Mt, Mk, Lk). Apparently, as he drew near the high priest's palace, he overtook St. John (Jn 18[15]), and was by him brought into the court. The latter, it would seem, passed on into the audience-chamber. Then follow the three denials, the whole group of incidents taking up about an hour (Lk 22[59]). On the relation to each other of the narratives in the four Gospels see Westcott, Additional Notes to Jn 18. The second cock-crow (Mk) and the sudden piercing gaze of the Lord (ἐνέβλεψεν, Lk) recalled to Peter's mind the prophecy of Christ, 'and he went out and wept bitterly' (Mt, Lk; on Mk's ἐπιβαλών see Field's interesting note in Notes on the Translation of the NT p. 41). There is no further reference to St. Peter in the history of the Passion.

* Syr[sin] in Mk 8[32] reads, 'But Simon Cepha, as if sparing Him, said to Him, (God) spares Thee.' The last words, a formula of deprecation (cf. e.g. Ac 10[14] 11[8]), render the ἵλεώς σοι of Mt 16[22] in Syr[cur] Pesh. From this formula the remarkable paraphrase, 'as if sparing Him,' is derived.

6. The period between the Resurrection and the Ascension. — In the accounts of the day of the Resurrection St. Peter is twice mentioned. From these notices it appears that after his fall he did not separate himself from the other apostles, and that he was still regarded as their natural leader. (i.) Early on that morning Mary Magdalene hurried from the garden to Simon Peter and to John, to tell them that the tomb was empty. The two apostles went together to the tomb, as they had gone together to the high priest's court three days before. They both ran, but St. Peter, the older man, fell behind. St. John came first to the sepulchre, but did not enter. St. Peter, practical and impetuous, went into the sepulchre, and took note (θεωρεῖ) of the orderly arrangement of the cloths and the napkin. Then they returned, still (it would seem*) perplexed, to their own homes (Jn 20[1-10]). (ii.) Later in the day, some time before the evening, the Lord appeared to St. Peter—alone—to seal his repentance with forgiveness (Lk 24[34]; cf. 1 Co 15[5], where the appearance to Cephas has the first place). (iii.) In the third appearance of Christ to the apostles as a body (Jn 21; cf. 20[19. 26]), at the Lake of Tiberias, Peter takes a conspicuous part. The quick intuition of faith is characteristic of John (v.[7]; cf. 20[8]). But when another has discerned the Lord, the rapid act of preparation, the leap into the sea that he may reach his Master the quicker, then, when all have landed, the return to the ship that he may begin the necessary work of bringing the net to land,—all these acts belong to a lifelike portrait of St. Peter. After the meal, provided by Christ, there follows St. Peter's public restoration, corresponding to the private assurance of forgiveness given him on the day of the Resurrection.† To the thrice-repeated denial there answers the thrice-repeated question as to his love towards Christ and the thrice-repeated charge, covering the whole sphere of pastoral activity. So far the official and the personal have been blended together. Now in a solemn 'oracle' (ἀμὴν, ἀμήν) the Lord deals with the personal issue of the apostle's life of service—the helplessness and the devotion of a martyr's death. The last recorded word of St. Peter addressed to Christ is an impulsive, unselfish question (v.[21]). The last word of Christ to St. Peter is an echo of the earliest call interpreted in the light of the cross—ἀκολούθει μοι . . . σύ μοι ἀκολούθει (vv.[19. 22]).

II. HISTORY OF ST. PETER AFTER THE ASCENSION, IN THE NT.—The three periods of the growth of the Church, treated of in the Acts,‡ are clearly

* For the Fayum fragment see Harnack in Texte u. Untersuch. v. 4, p. 483 ff., and especially Hort's letters to the Times (June 25, July 16, 1885).

* To one who hesitates to accept Hort's theory of 'Western non-interpolations' (see the writer's Syro-Latin Text p. 130 n.) the external evidence against the authenticity of Lk 24[12] must seem of very little weight. On the other hand, the linguistic similarity to Jn is curious, and cannot be accidental. It would be rash to assert that we have not here a sign of cross-currents of apostolic tradition, which the available evidence will perhaps never enable us to follow out.

† On the subtle variation of words in Jn 21[15-17] see Westcott's notes.

‡ The theory of Blass, that the common and the 'Western' texts of the Lucan Books represent two editions by St. Luke, is well known. The present writer has criticised it in The Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels p. 133 n. In that book and in The Old Syriac Element in Cod. Bezæ he has given reasons for his belief that the 'Western' text is largely due to (1) assimilation to scriptural passages; (2) the influence of Old Syriac texts. 'Western' readings of exceptional interest in parts of the Acts dealing with St. Peter are to be found in 10[25] 11[2] (a mosaic of phrases used in Ac and Epistles about St. Paul) 12[10] described in 1⁸—the Church of Jerusalem, the Church of Palestine, the Church of the World.

1. The Church of Jerusalem (1¹–8¹).—During this period St. Peter stands alone as the leader and spokesman of the disciples.

(a) In the days which passed between the Ascension and the day of Pentecost, St. Peter in the first apostolic speech urged the appointment of a disciple to fill the apostolate of Judas. Into the problems suggested by Lk's record of the speech (including the insertion, v.[18ff.]) it is unnecessary to enter. It is sufficient to notice (i.) that St. Peter bases his argument on an appeal to the OT, i.e. to two passages of the Psalms (68 (69)[26] 108 (109)[8] LXX), prefiguring respectively the vacancy of the traitor's pastoral office and the duty of appointing a successor; (ii.) that St. Peter defines the essential function of an apostle as being 'a witness of the Resurrection [of the Lord Jesus].'

(b) On the early morning of Pentecost the disciples were all gathered together in one of the many chambers (οἶκοι) of the temple (v.[2]; for this sense of οἶκος cf. e.g. Jer 42 (35)[4] 43 (36)[10. 12]; Jos. Ant. VIII. iii. 2). The chambers and courts of the temple were crowded with worshippers from among 'the dwellers at Jerusalem' (v.[6] τὸ πλῆθος; cf. 21[36], Lk 1[10]), to whom 'immediately after midnight the Temple gates [had been] thrown open' (Edersheim, The Temple p. 228). Such in all probability was the place* and such the audience of St. Peter's speech, after the Spirit had been given and His presence attested by the gift of tongues. A strong case can be made out for the opinion that St. Peter spoke in Greek (T. K. Abbott, Essays p. 129 ff.; Salmon, Introduction[6] p. 172 f.; on the other side see Neubauer in Studia Biblica i. p. 62 ff.).† The speech begins as an apologia (v.[15]); it ends with a proclamation of the crucified Jesus of Nazareth as the Sovereign Messiah (v.[36]).

Ac 2[14-36]. Jesus, the enthroned Messiah.

(1) Vv.[14-21]. The charge of drunkenness is disproved (a) by the circumstances, 'the third hour of the day'; (b) by the fact that the phenomena correspond to Joel's prophecy (Jl 2[28-32] (3[1-5])).

(2) Vv.[22-24]. Jesus of Nazareth was accredited as God's messenger to Israel by Divine miracles; according to God's eternal counsel He was surrendered to the Jews, murdered by them through the instrumentality of Gentiles, raised from death by God Himself—the necessary issue.

The Divine purpose and action are throughout emphasized.

(3) Vv.[25-32]. This necessity was foreshadowed in David's prophecy (Ps 15 (16)[8-11]). His words could not apply to himself. Therefore, as a prophet, in view of the promised dynasty (Ps 131 (132)[11], 2 S 7[12]), he foresaw and spoke of 'the raising up of the anointed one'—a prophecy finally fulfilled in the Resurrection.

(4) Vv.[33-35]. The Resurrection involved the exaltation through the Divine action. The exalted Messiah receives from the Father, and gives, the promised Spirit.

It is impossible that the exaltation should be interpreted of David; for David spoke of 'his lord,' seated at God's right hand (Ps 109 (110)[1]).

(5) V.[36]. The duty, therefore, of all Israel (the 'Dispersion' and the dwellers at Jerusalem alike) is to acknowledge God's action in constituting the victim of their malice the Anointed One and the Sovereign King—Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός.

The result of St. Peter's speech was the conviction of his hearers. In answer to their question, 'What shall we do?' (cf. Lk 3[10. 18f.]), he urges—(1) that they should repent, i.e. of the great national sin of rejecting the Messiah; (2) that each should be baptized in the name of Jesus Messiah; (3) such baptism having as its result forgiveness, (4) and leading on to the bestowal of the special gift of the Spirit.

With the day of Pentecost the life of the Church as a society, quickened and endowed with the gifts of the Spirit, began.

(c) How long a time elapsed between the day of Pentecost and the evening when St. Peter worked the 'notable sign' on the cripple at the Beautiful Gate there is no evidence. The miracle was wrought 'in the name of Jesus Messiah, the Nazarene.' The man healed was a well-known object of pity, and his restoration at once drew 'all the people' round him and Peter and John in the great eastern portico of the temple. To them St. Peter proclaims Jesus as the Restorer.

Ac 3[12-26]. Jesus, the glorified Servant, the Restorer.

(1) Vv.[12-16]. The miracle was not the work of the apostles; it was an incident in the unbroken history of Redemption. For the name of Jesus, the Servant of the God of the Fathers, rejected and slain by Israel, raised and glorified by God, was the source of restoration.

(2) Vv.[17-26]. Israel's present position, duty, and hope. (a) The 'sufferings of the Messiah' were due, on the human side, to the crime of Israel's ignorance, on the Divine side to the action of God in fulfilment of His utterances through the prophets. (b) Consequently (οὖν) there is a present call to national repentance, such repentance issuing in (1) forgiveness; (2) the advent of 'seasons of refreshing'; (3) the final mission of the Messiah as the Restorer of all things. (c) Israel's present opportunity was foretold by Moses and all the prophets. Of this prophetic line and of the first covenant those present are the heirs. To them belongs a priority in the blessings which spring from God's act in raising up and sending His Servant, whose work reaches to the conversion of each Israelite.

The action and the words of St. Peter were a double challenge. The officials in charge of the temple resented the assumption of the position of 'teachers' on the part of men whom they despised as 'am hā-'ārez. The Sadducees were provoked by the proclamation of the Resurrection. The two apostles were therefore put in prison, and the next morning brought before the Sanhedrin. In answer to the formal question as to their authority or commission, St. Peter answered that the cripple was healed 'by the name of Jesus Messiah, the Nazarene,' whom the rulers to whom he speaks had crucified, whom God had raised. He then brings together the three thoughts — Messiah's rejection, the apparent triumph of the rulers, the reversal of their judgment and the exaltation of the rejected One—in the words of Ps 117 (118)[22], and declares that in this Name only is there salvation. It is to be noticed that, the first time that St. Peter appears before the high priests, he appeals to that verse of the Psalms by a reference to which (after the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen) our Lord a few weeks before had roused their vain resentment (Mt 21[42ff.] ‖ Mk, Lk). It was this, doubtless, which led them to recognize the apostles as the companions of Jesus. At length, in spite of their refusal to be silent as to the facts of their experience (4[20]; cf. 1 Jn 1[1ff.]), the apostles are set at liberty by the chief priests.

(d) In the next subsection (4[32]–5[16]) the Acts turns from the external dangers and triumphs to the inner life of the Church. Two contrasted cases of the action of the members of the brotherhood in regard to property are narrated—the case of Barnabas, and the case of Ananias and Sapphira. In dealing with Ananias, St. Peter exercises the χάρισμα of 'discernment of spirits.' When the guilt of Ananias has been proved by his fate, and Sapphira comes before him, St. Peter is represented as foretelling her doom. The apostle is the Joshua of the new Israel (Jos 7[16ff.]; cf. 2 K 5[25ff.]). With this history the words of St. Paul (1 Co 5[5], 1 Ti 1[20]) should be compared.

(the 'seven steps' due to assimilation to Ezk 40[6. 22]). See also 'Western' readings in 3[11. 14] 4[14. 24] 5[29] 8[24] 10[13. 15. 19. 26. 39. 41] 11[17] 12[5. 7. 17] 15[7. 12].

* The supposition that the events described in Ac 2 took place in the temple is in itself natural; it explains several details of the history; and it is in complete harmony, it is believed, with Lk's language.

† The internal evidence of the speeches in the Acts (see below, p. 766) appears to the present writer a complete refutation of the theory which regards them as the simple invention of the author of the book, and a proof that with varying accuracy they represent what was said on the several occasions. That the author of the Acts, however, is responsible for their present literary form and for much of their language is a view quite consistent with a belief in their substantial fidelity. It is quite possible that St. Peter and St. Luke met at Rome—an important point for the criticism of the Gospel and the Acts.

Shortly afterwards there ensued among the apostles a fresh activity of the 'gift of healing.' In particular, St. Peter became an object of almost superstitious regard to the populace at Jerusalem. And the fame of these miracles spread through the neighbouring districts.

(e) This outburst of popular feeling awoke the envy of the Sadducæan faction (5^{17-42}). They now, in order to ensure the destruction of this new insurrection against their materializing views, imprison all the apostles. The latter, delivered from prison, resume in the temple their work of public teaching. Brought by the chief officer of the temple before the Sanhedrin, the apostles by the mouth of St. Peter (1) affirm that they are acting according to a Divine command, which they have no choice but to obey. (2) They affirm the continuity of national redemption. God, who had 'raised up' judges (cf. e.g. Jg $2^{16.\ 18.}$ 3^{9}), had 'raised up Jesus.' The action of the rulers in putting Him to a cruel death, which seemed to mark Him out as cursed of God (cf. Dt 21^{23}), had been reversed by God's action in exalting Him both to rule and to deliver, in order that Israel might receive the gifts of national repentance and national forgiveness. (3) They affirm that their witness to this message was inspired by the Spirit, a Divine gift bestowed, not on Israel's worldly rulers, but on faithful Israelites who obeyed God's revelation. By these words the Sadducæan party was kindled to a frenzy of murderous hatred. But in a private conference the Pharisee Gamaliel persuaded them to follow a more prudent policy. They recall the apostles, scourge them, and dismiss them with a command that they should no more 'speak in the name of Jesus.'

St. Peter's name does not occur in the history either of the appointment of the Seven or of the trial of Stephen. When, after the murder of the latter, 'a great persecution' arose and the brethren 'were scattered,' St. Peter, with the other apostles, remained in Jerusalem.

Thus, during the earliest period of the Church's life at Jerusalem, St. Peter vindicates the primacy with which the Lord entrusted him. He is never, indeed, represented as independent of the other apostles. But he is throughout the history the leader and spokesman of the rest—within the society of the brethren ($1^{15ff.}$ $5^{1ff.}$) itself, before the crowds of listening and inquiring Jews ($2^{14ff.}$ $2^{37ff.}$ $3^{12ff.}$; cf. 5^{15}), before the Sanhedrin ($4^{8ff.}$ $5^{29ff.}$).

2. The Church of Palestine (8^{1}–9^{31}).—(a) After the outbreak of the persecution, the new, like the old, Israel became a διασπορά (διεσπάρησαν, διασπαρέντες, $8^{1.\ 4}$ 11^{19}). The story of what seems to have been the most important of these enforced evangelistic journeys is given in detail. Philip, one of the Seven, instructs and baptizes many converts in 'the city of Samaria.' The step was an important one. It involved the admission that pure Israelitish blood was not a necessary qualification for admission to the Christian society. The apostles, acting together (8^{14}), sent the two most prominent members of their body, Peter and John, to review and to confirm the work of the evangelist. An outpouring of the Holy Spirit in this second stage of the Church's history answers to the day of Pentecost in the first period. But the gift is not spontaneous. It is the Divine response to the prayer of the two apostles, and it is bestowed through their act of ministry. In the sequel St. Peter appears as the sole actor. Simon Magus regards the whole transaction as an exhibition of magical dexterity, and offers to pay liberally for the impartment to himself of the apostles' secret power. He stands out thus early in the history of the Church as the type of the degrading influence on Christianity of paganizing associations. Peter pronounces him to be at present an alien from the gospel, but holds out hope of the purifying influence of repentance and prayer for forgiveness. The apostles, after some further work, returned to Jerusalem, and on their way 'evangelized many villages of the Samaritans.' Thus, in this first effort to extend the gospel beyond its earliest limits, the initiation does not rest with St. Peter. The function which belongs to him, as one of the delegates of the apostolic college, is to set upon the work the seal of authoritative approval, and to deal decisively with a new danger inseparable from the contact of the Church with outside habits of thought and life.

In the earlier chapters of the Acts there is not one clear indication of date. But it is possible to ascertain approximately the time which elapsed between the Ascension and the visit of Peter and John to Samaria. It appears tolerably certain that Damascus was not included in the kingdom of Aretas before the beginning of the reign of Gaius (Schurer, HJP I. ii. p. 357 f.; Turner, art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT in vol. i. pp. 416, 424), and that therefore St. Paul's flight from Damascus ($2\ Co\ 11^{32}$) cannot have been earlier than A.D. 37, nor his conversion earlier than 35 ($Gal\ 1^{18}$; cf. Ac 9^{23}). Some weeks, perhaps months, must have elapsed between the conversion of St. Paul and the martyrdom of St. Stephen (Ac 8^{3} 9^{13} 22^{4f} $26^{10ff.}$ εἰς τὰς ἔξω πόλεις, $Gal\ 1^{13}$). Hence the apostles' visit to Samaria must have taken place about five years after the Ascension (A.D. 29).

3. The Church of the World (9^{32}–end).—After his return from Samaria, it seems that St. Peter continued at Jerusalem during the remainder of the persecution. But the conversion of Saul of Tarsus and the consequent peace of the Church were the signal for an important change in the apostolic policy. St. Peter starts alone on a journey of visitation and evangelization—vaguely described in Ac 9^{32} by the words διερχόμενον διὰ πάντων. It is followed by a more or less protracted sojourn at Lydda and Joppa, where Christian communities had already been founded, and later at Cæsarea. The significance of this notice is appreciated only when it is observed that throughout the earlier period of the history Luke has been at pains to emphasize the solidarity of the apostolic body at Jerusalem ($8^{1.\ 14}$ 6^{2} $5^{18.\ 40ff.}$). We are therefore led to the conclusion that this is the time when the apostolic college at Jerusalem, with St. Peter as its natural leader and spokesman, separated, and when James became the acknowledged head of the Church there. Luke sketches the history only of St. Peter at this important crisis, partly because of his primacy among the apostles, partly because his divinely guided action had an important bearing on the extension of the Church to the Gentiles.

The apostle's journey ended at Lydda, where the miraculous restoration of the cripple Æneas had a wide influence through Lydda and 'the Sharon.' From Lydda St. Peter is summoned to Joppa, and there restores Tabitha to life. Lk in his account of the miracle seems desirous of suggesting that with one significant exception—'he kneeled down and prayed'—St. Peter in action and in words imitated the example of the Lord in the house of Jairus. The miracle was the means of the conversion of many in Joppa. There Peter prolonged his sojourn, in the house of a certain Simon, a tanner, near the shore (10^{6}). The place was doubly significant. On the one hand, since the trade of a tanner was considered among the Jews as almost unclean (see Schoettgen and Wetstein on Ac 9^{43}), the choice of this house as a lodging may indicate that the apostle's Jewish prejudices were becoming weaker. On the other hand, Joppa, looking out over the waters of the Mediterranean, was to a Jew 'an entrance for the isles of the sea' ($1\ Mac\ 14^{5}$), and by its very position suggested the problem of those 'afar off.' Thus the apostle's mind was in a sense prepared for the thrice-repeated vision, and for the divinely given interpretation of it—'What God hath cleansed, make not thou common'—overruling scruples which held him back from 'killing and eating' what to him as a Jew was 'common and unclean'*; and in turn this 'voice from heaven' prepared him to receive the monition of the Spirit that he should go with the messengers of the Roman centurion, 'nothing doubting.' In regard, then, to the evangelization of a Gentile, distinct supernatural direction was given to the Hebrew apostle as it had earlier been vouchsafed to the Hellenistic evangelist (8[29]). St. Peter at once with six brethren (11[12]), whose devotion to Judaism was beyond suspicion (10[45]), went with Cornelius' messengers to Cæsarea. The entrance of the leader of the apostles into the Roman capital of Judæa, the noted seaport, predominantly Gentile in character, was in itself a crisis in the progress of the gospel. The sequel increased the significance of the visit. On his first meeting with Cornelius the apostle refuses the Roman's unexpected act of reverence, and entering the house begins with an emphatic statement as to the position of a religious Jew towards Gentiles, and as to the way in which God had Himself taught him to regard no human being as 'common or unclean.' This was the only explanation of his ready response to Cornelius' invitation. Then, in answer to Cornelius' story of the Divine direction granted to him, St. Peter begins his solemn address to his Gentile hearers.

It is clear that in 10[34-43] we have a summary of a speech which was early interrupted (11[15]; cf. 4[1] 754 22[22]).

(1) V.[34f.]. The apostle declares that now he grasps the truth that God is the moral ruler (not of Israel only, but) of men belonging to every nation.

(2) Vv.[36-41]. There follows a historical statement as to the Divine message through Christ, the sovereign of all men, primarily addressed to Israel, His unction by the Holy Spirit, His ministry of miracles attested by witnesses, His shameful death, His Resurrection and manifestation through God's direct action to witnesses chosen by God, who by clear proofs were convinced that He was alive.

(3) Vv.[42. 43]. He Himself commanded the apostles to proclaim to Israel His appointment by God as Judge of living and dead. The prophets' universal witness to Him implies the truth that every man (Gentile as well as Jew) may have through faith in Him the gift of forgiveness.

Doubtless, the prophets' witness was meant to be the preface to a statement of our Lord's commands as to 'all the nations.' Throughout the speech we notice two contrasted lines of thought—(1) the wider scope of revelation: ἐν παντὶ ἔθνει v.[35], πάντων κύριος v.[36], πάντας τὸν πιστεύοντα v.[43]; (2) the insistence on Israel's being the primary destination of the gospel (vv.[36. 39. 42]). It is significant that in regard to the universality of the Divine gifts an appeal is made to the witness of the prophets (v.[43]). The reference to Israel's priority in blessing and to the prophets is very natural in the Jewish apostle, to whom the reconciliation of the old revelation and this new manifestation of God's purposes was a fresh problem. It probably had also an apologetic meaning in reference to the Jewish companions of St. Peter (v.[45]).

As the apostle was speaking, the Holy Spirit fell upon his hearers, His presence being attested by the gift of tongues. The apostle at once interprets this miraculous endowment as a Divine sign of their admission within the Christian body, and directs their baptism.

Thus the Spirit at Cæsarea, as at Jerusalem at the first, was bestowed apart from any act of human ministry. The occasion is marked as the Gentile Pentecost.† It will be noticed that the three outpourings of the Spirit signalize the commencement of the three stages of the progress of the gospel—Jerusalem, Samaria, the Gentile world—and that with each of them St. Peter is intimately connected.

News of the events at Cæsarea soon reached Jerusalem, and the circumcised Christians complained of St. Peter's conduct in eating with uncircumcised Gentiles. Apparently a formal assembly of those in authority was held, and the apostle answered the charge brought against him by a simple narrative of what had taken place. The gainsayers were convinced. They confessed that 'God had granted to the Gentiles also repentance unto life' (11[18])—a confession clearly falling very far short of an acknowledgment of the equal standing of Jew and Gentile in the Christian society.

These events took place in the months succeeding St. Paul's conversion. At the end of three years (i.e. A.D. 37 or 38 probably), St. Paul went up to Jerusalem (Gal 1[18], cf. Ac 9[26ff.] 22[17ff.] 26[20]). His special object was 'to visit Cephas,' whose guest he was for fifteen days. His reference to this visit seems to show that St. Peter alone of the Twelve was at Jerusalem at this time.

Of St. Peter's life during the next six or seven years no notice is preserved. Shortly, however, before the death of Herod Agrippa, in the spring of 44, that king, whose policy it was to conciliate the Pharisaic party (Jos. Ant. XIX. vii. 3), made an attack on the Church. It would appear that the growth of the Christian body had excited the envy of the Jews (12[3. 11]), and the enthusiasm with which they welcomed the execution of one of the apostles encouraged the king to throw St. Peter into prison. On the night before the great popular spectacle of which the apostle's trial was to be the occasion, he was miraculously freed from his chains and led by an angel out of the prison. At length, roused completely from sleep and conscious of the situation, he goes to the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark. With difficulty gaining admission, he tells those who had gathered there to intercede for him of his wonderful escape, and bidding them inform 'James and the brethren of these things' 'he went to another place.'

In this narrative three points call for a brief notice. (1) The fact that St. Peter so immediately and naturally hastens to 'the house of Mary,' coupled with the fact that he was obviously well known there, and that it was the place where many met together to pray for him, suggests that this house was his home when he was in Jerusalem. The guest had become in a sense the head of the household, and hence his expression of fatherly regard towards John Mark (1 P 5[13]). (2) The reference to James confirms the conjecture (see above) that he was already in a position of official leadership. (3) There is no word added to define the ἕτερος τόπος to which the apostle retired. Conjecture has been busy: Antioch, Cæsarea, Rome have all been named. With the last guess we may connect the belief that St. Peter went to Rome in the reign of Claudius (e.g. Eus. HE II. xiv. 6; see below).

About two years later St. Paul, with Barnabas, visited Jerusalem in connexion with the famine. His stay there was, from the nature of his mission, a short one. The historian's mention simply of 'the elders' (Ac 11[30]) at Jerusalem and St. Paul's silence as to this visit in Gal 1. 2 appear to show that neither St. Peter nor any other of the Twelve was then at Jerusalem.

At the end of the decade—probably A.D. 49—Paul and Barnabas, as the envoys of the Antiochene Church, went up to Jerusalem about the question of the circumcision of Gentile converts (Ac 15[1ff.]). James, the President of the Church there, and (of the Twelve) Peter and John were at Jerusalem. Whether the two latter had been specially summoned, or whether they were for a time living in the Holy City, there is no evidence to show. Even in the calm narrative of the Acts, much more in the broken sentences of the Epistle to the

* The apostle's remonstrance is probably a conscious reminiscence of Ezk 4[14]; cf. also Dn 1[8ff.], 1 Mac 1[62f.], 2 Mac 6[18ff.] 7[1]. The description of the animals in the 'vessel' is taken from Gn 1[24. 26], and carries the mind back to the Divine act of creation (1 Ti 4[3], cf. Mk 7[19]). The command θῦσον κ. φάγε is an echo of Dt 12[15].

† Note the use of the Pentecostal keyword ἐκχέειν (v.[45]), cf. ἐκχῶ 2[17], ἐξέχεεν 2[33] (Tit 3[6]); and the phrase ἡ δωρεὰ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου, cf. 2[38] (11[17], He 6[4]).

Galatians, there are signs that the controversy was not without its bitter and painful side. St. Paul appears to imply, though he does not state, that the older apostles favoured some kind of compromise (cf. Ac 21[20ff.])—the circumcision, perhaps, of Titus, as a qualification for his position as teacher and as the companion of an apostle. In a private conference between the three 'Apostles of the Circumcision' and St. Paul, it was agreed that they should all follow the general lines of their earlier work, the latter aiming primarily at the evangelization of the Gentiles, the three former continuing to work among those of the circumcision. The subsequent history of St. Paul shows how far he was from regarding this understanding as laying down rigid and cramping limits for his activity. As he felt free to teach the Jews at Thessalonica, Athens, Corinth, and Ephesus, so, we may be sure, St. Peter would not consider that he was precluded from teaching Gentiles, whether by word or by letter. Neither side could alter or could wish to alter the terms in which the commission from the Lord had severally come to them. St. Paul had been sent to Israel as well as to the Gentiles (Ac 9[15] 26[17]), the older apostles to the Gentiles as well as to Israel (Mt 28[19] [Mk] 16[15], Lk 24[47], Ac 1[8]). At the same time, St. Paul's language in Gal 2[8], drawing a comparison between his own activity in the Gentile world and St. Peter's among the Jews, implies that the years of St. Peter's life, of which the Acts preserves no record, were marked by successful work among his own people. The private conference prepared the way for the assembly of 'the apostles and the elders,' of which the Acts gives an account. After long discussion, St. Peter addressed those gathered together.

(1) Vv.[7-9]. (a) Those present remembered that, in the early days of the gospel, Peter, a staunch Jew, was fixed upon, not by any human arrangement, but by a Divine choice, as the means whereby the Gentiles should hear and believe. (b) And, further, God confirmed the step itself, taken under His guidance, by giving His Spirit to these Gentiles as He had given it at Pentecost to Jews; and, purifying (not their flesh by circumcision but) their hearts by the gift of faith, He put Jew and Gentile on a level. (2) Vv.[10. 11]. The history of the past points to the duty of the present (νῦν οὖν). Those present had no right to tempt God by putting a yoke on the neck of Gentile disciples, the hopeless weight of which was proved by the experience of generations of Jews. On the contrary, so far from bearing this burden, and so having any justification for imposing it on others, Jewish disciples had put themselves on a level with Gentile disciples by their belief that (not circumcision but) the 'grace of the Lord Jesus' was the means of salvation for Jew and Gentile alike.

St. Peter's words, it appears, calmed the excitement of the whole assembly (ἐσίγησεν δὲ πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος), which had been aroused in the 'long discussion,' so that they listened quietly to the statement of 'Barnabas and Paul.' The reference of St. James' speech to 'Symeon's' narrative, and to the agreement of its drift with the words of the prophets, is the last mention of St. Peter in the Acts.

The Church at Jerusalem decided to send to Antioch with Barnabas and Paul two delegates, viz. Judas Barsabbas and Silas. They in due time returned to Jerusalem, while Paul and Barnabas remained behind. It was natural that the official messengers of the mother Church should in time be followed by the chief of the apostles. St. Paul, under the stress of a later controversy, raises for a moment the veil which hid the history of St. Peter's sojourn at Antioch (Gal 2[11]).* At first, he tells us, St. Peter ate with the Gentile disciples, treating them as on an equality with their Jewish brethren. Afterwards certain members of the Church at Jerusalem came from James. These men had been for the moment silenced by the decision of the conference, but they had not been satisfied with its spirit. Perhaps in Jerusalem under the strong rule of St. James they had hidden their discontent. Perhaps also in Jerusalem it was not necessary for them to be often brought into contact with Gentile Christians. At Antioch they saw what a predominantly Gentile Church was. How far they went in practical disloyalty to the decision of the 'Council' we are not told. But the spirit of these malcontents had a disastrous effect on the conduct of St. Peter.* Under their influence he withdrew from the society of, perhaps even from full fellowship in worship with, the Gentile Christians, not probably receding from his former doctrinal position, but practically treating these Gentiles as on a lower level than Jewish believers. He was guilty, not of false doctrine, but (as once before) of moral cowardice. But the effect of his example was disastrous. All the Jewish Christians at Antioch acted the same part as he did (see art. MARK). St. Paul saw that no less an issue was at stake than the real unity of the Church. He felt it his duty publicly to rebuke St. Peter.

St. Paul, in writing to the Corinthians (prob. A.D. 55), mentions the existence at Corinth of a party who called themselves by the name of Cephas (1 Co 1[12] 3[22]). There is not the least reason, however, why St. Peter should be made responsible for their 'heresy' any more than St. Paul for the folly of those who assumed his name. Nor does the existence of a Cephas party at Corinth imply that St. Peter ever visited Corinth. The statement of Dionysius of Corinth (c. A.D. 170, ap. Eus. HE II. xxv. 8), that St. Peter and St. Paul together planted the Church at Corinth and taught there, seems to be simply a mistaken inference from St. Paul's language in 1 Corinthians. There does not appear to be any other trace of a tradition that St. Peter worked in Greece.

The evidence supplied by 1 Peter as to the history of the apostle will be examined in the art. on that Epistle.

The invitation in Rev 18[20] to 'the saints and the apostles and the prophets' to rejoice over the judgment of Babylon, i.e. Rome, ὅτι ἔκρινεν ὁ θεὸς τὸ κρίμα ὑμῶν ἐξ αὐτῆς (cf. 19[2]), may not unreasonably be considered as an allusion to the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul under Nero. If it is urged that the juxtaposition of 'the apostles' and 'the prophets' points to a wider use of the former term, such as we find in the Didaché, it may be answered that the word 'apostle' is used in its strictest sense in Rev 21[14].

* On St. Paul's journeys to Jerusalem as given in the Acts and in Galatians see art. on CHRONOLOGY OF NT in vol. i. p. 423 f. The present writer, however, is quite unable to accept the interpretation of Gal 2[1ff.] suggested on p. 424, viz. that that passage precedes in time Gal 2[1-10]. In plain narrative the simple ὅτε δέ (with aor.) must surely express sequence; cf. Gal 1[15] 2[12] 4[4]. The paraphrase given to justify the interpretation alters the setting of 2[11] and supplies just the word which must have been expressed in Greek had the passage borne the suggested meaning —'So far from simply submitting to them, I once [sic] publicly rebuked their chief.'

* Hort, Judaistic Christianity p. 80 f., supposes that 'James may have thought it most prudent to send cautions to Peter' (i.e. as to the offending of Jewish susceptibilities), and that the persons mentioned in Gal 2[12] were the bearers of this message.

The present writer would hazard the conjecture that these messengers of James were the bearers of his Epistle. We have in this supposition an adequate explanation of their mission. The date of St. James' Epistle is commonly placed about this time (Mayor, p. cxxiv, gives A.D. 40-50; Zahn, Einl. i. p. 92, gives c. A.D. 50). It would be very natural that, after the Council at Jerusalem, the President of the Church there should address a letter to the Jewish converts in the Dispersion, to whom recent events must have been a trial of faith; not less natural that he should not directly allude to those events. But at least in two points the Epistle may be thought to have an indirect bearing on the temptations and anxieties of the time. (1) It deals especially with sins of temper and of speech—sins which would inevitably characterize a crisis of keen controversy. (2) It condemns a perversion of St. Paul's doctrine of faith. It might be well for St. James (without touching on personal matters) to reassure Jewish converts by showing them that the acceptance of St. Paul's position in regard to the Gentiles did not involve the acceptance of doctrines which they, however mistakenly, were accustomed to associate with St. Paul's name.

4. The doctrinal position of the Petrine speeches in the Acts.—(i.) The historical witness.—(a) The Lord's ministry fills only a little space in St. Peter's speeches at Jerusalem (2^{22}). It was well known to his hearers, and it was overshadowed by more recent events. Its significance, however, is briefly indicated. The Lord's miracles were works of God wrought through Him (e.g. Jn 14^{10}). They therefore not only answered to the general Messianic expectation (cf. Jn 7^{31}), but were proofs of His mission as God's messenger to Israel (ἀποδεδειγμένον ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς ὑμᾶς). At Jerusalem, St. Peter appeals to the knowledge of his hearers; at Cæsarea, speaking before Gentiles, to the witness of himself and his Jewish companions (10^{39}). (b) The crucifixion had its assured place in the Divine counsels (2^{23} 3^{18}; cf. 4^{28}), and was not therefore the chance triumph of the Lord's foes. But on the human side it was the act of Israel ($2^{23.\ 36}$ 3^{17} 4^{11} 5^{30}), though done in ignorance (3^{17}). It involved absolute humiliation (e.g. 2^{23} ἔκδοτον . . . προσπήξαντες), scornful rejection by Israel (e.g. 3^{14} 4^{11}), and to Jewish eyes the curse of God (5^{30} κρεμάσαντες ἐπὶ ξύλου; cf. Dt 21^{23}). The last point is important. It suggests that in the earliest as in later times the Jews urged the words of Dt as a final proof of the Divine rejection of Jesus the Nazarene (hence probably the blasphemous creed ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦς, 1 Co 12^{3}), and that St. Peter directly met the Jewish position. (c) The Resurrection was the immediate act of God the Father ($2^{24.\ 32}$ 3^{15} 4^{10} 5^{31} 10^{40}). It was the Divine refutation of Israel's blasphemy, because it was the Divine reversal of Israel's act of rejection. But a revelation of the risen Messiah had not been given to all (10^{41}). It was therefore the primary duty of the apostles to bear witness to the things which 'they saw and heard' (4^{20} 10^{41}; cf. 1 Jn $1^{1ff.}$) as proof of the fact of the Resurrection (2^{32} 3^{15} 4^{20} 5^{32} 10^{41}). Further, the Resurrection involved the Exaltation—the session of 'Jesus Messiah' at God's right hand as κύριος ($2^{33.\ 36}$ $3^{13.\ 21}$ 5^{31}). Thus the confession Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός (2^{36}; cf. 1 Co 12^{3}, Ro 10^{9}, Ph 2^{11}) is the direct antithesis of the Jewish blasphemy ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦς, and an appeal to Israel to make it their own is the solemn conclusion of St. Peter's first address to the Jews. The activity of the exalted Jesus is manifested in the gift of the Holy Spirit (2^{33}) and in miracles of healing (3^{16} 4^{10}; cf. 4^{30}).

(ii.) The continuity of revelation and redemption.—The doctrine of a Messiah who had suffered, and who by definite acts of God had been raised from the dead and exalted to supreme sovereignty, was new. But in various ways St. Peter insists that these facts of redemption were the development of the whole history of the people. He who thus worked out His purpose is 'the God of our fathers' (3^{13} 5^{30}; cf. Shemoneh Esreh 1,* 'Blessed art Thou, Jehovah, our God and the God of our fathers . . . our shield and the shield of our fathers'). This consummation of the Divine action was the burden of all prophecy ($3^{18.\ 24}$ 10^{43}; cf. 4 Es 9^{4}, and see Weber, Die Lehren des Talmud p. 355). Those to whom St. Peter spoke were 'the sons of the prophets and of the covenant' (3^{25}; cf. υἱοὶ τῆς διαθήκης, Ps-Sol 17^{17}; 'a son of the law,' Apoc. Bar 46^{4}; and see Wetstein in loc.). It should be noticed that Lk, who records St. Peter's applications of prophecy, tells us the source whence he learned them (Lk 24^{44}; cf. v.^{27}).

(iii.) The doctrine of the Messiah.—'Jesus the Nazarene' was declared by God to be Messiah (2^{36}). The person of the Lord is here presented from the point of view of His Messiahship. (a) Messianic titles.—(a) The Messiah (ὁ χριστός, Χριστός). The anointing is specially referred to in 4^{27} 10^{38}; cf. Is 61^{1} (Lk 4^{18}), Ps 44 (45)^{8}. With 10^{38} (ἔχρισεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεὸς πν. ἁγίῳ καὶ δυνάμει) cf. Ps-Sol 17^{42} (ὁ θεὸς κατηργάσατο αὐτὸν δυνατὸν ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ). (β) The Servant (παῖς), $3^{13.\ 26}$, comp. (the prayer of the apostles) $4^{27.\ 30}$. The phrase is derived from a series of passages in Deutero-Isaiah. Its current Messianic application is certified by Apoc. Bar 70^{9} 'My servant Messiah.' On the Rabbinic interpretation of the passages in Isaiah see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah ii. p. 726. When, through the influence of the controversy with the Ebionites, the meaning of Christological phrases was more keenly analyzed by the Church, it became customary, when the ancient phrase was used of our Lord, to indicate, e.g., by the addition of ἠγαπημένος, that παῖς was to be taken as an equivalent of υἱός (e.g. Clem. *59 (thrice), Ep. ad Diog. 8, Mart. Polyc. *14, Acta Theclæ *24; cf. Wis $2^{13.\ 18}$). The phrase, however, is used in its original meaning in Did. *ix. 2 (εὐχαριστοῦμεν . . . ὑπὲρ τῆς ἁγίας ἀμπέλου Δαυεὶδ τοῦ παιδός σου, ἧς ἐγνωρίσας ἡμῖν διὰ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ παιδός σου), *ix. 3, *x. 2. The simple use, therefore, of this pre-Christian Messianic title, which in sub-apostolic times was avoided or guarded, is very primitive.† It should further be noticed that most of the earliest Christian passages where the phrase occurs (marked above with *) are liturgical, and that it twice occurs in the apostles' prayer (Ac 4). Hence it seems probable that it was characteristic of Jewish prayers, that thence it passed into the primitive vocabulary of the Church, and that, having liturgical associations, it long maintained its place in Christian prayers, though now it received a higher doctrinal connotation. Comp. Lock in Expositor, series iv. vol. iv. p. 178 ff.; Dalman, Die Worte Jesu p. 226 ff. (γ) ὁ ἅγιος καὶ δίκαιος, 3^{14}; cf. $4^{27.\ 30}$ 7^{52} 22^{14}. Righteousness and holiness are the characteristics of Messiah's time; see e.g. Ps-Sol 17^{36}, Enoch 38^{2} 'when the righteous One shall appear before the eyes of the elect righteous,' where, as in 53^{6} (cf. 46^{3}), 'the righteous One' is a designation of the Messiah (cf. Weber, Die Lehren d. T. p. 344). For the holiness of Messiah cf. e.g. Ps-Sol $17^{28ff.}$. (δ) There is a group of expressions which may be called archaic, being derived from the record of the earliest period of Israel's history. Such expressions are ἀναστήσας (3^{26}; cf. v.^{22}) and ἤγειρεν (5^{30}) in the sense of 'God raised up, brought upon the scene,' ἀρχηγὸν καὶ σωτῆρα ὕψωσεν (5^{31}; cf. 13^{23}), comp. e.g. Jg $3^{9.\ 15}$. But phraseology of this kind was not simply archaic. It had been adopted into the devotional and liturgical language of the Messianic hope; cf. e.g. Ps-Sol $17^{23.\ 47}$, Apoc. Bar 39^{7} 40^{3}, Shemoneh Esreh 11.

(b) The issues of Messiah's advent.—The horizon is bounded by the limits of the national hope. 'The promise' (2^{39}, cf. Ps-Sol 12^{8}) is primarily for Israel. There are in the speeches at Jerusalem but three hints of a wider blessing — ἐπὶ πᾶσαν σάρκα (2^{17}, from Jl 2^{28}), καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν ὅσους ἂν προσκαλέσηται Κύριος ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν (2^{39}, from Is 57^{19}, Jl 2^{32}), ὑμῖν πρῶτον (3^{26}, cf. Mk 7^{27}). But how through the agency of a restored Israel this extension of Messianic redemption is to be brought about is in no way defined. Thus the forecast, while it insists upon, does not go beyond, the more generous Jewish expectation as to the nations, such as finds expression in, e.g., Ps-Sol 17^{38} (ἐλεήσει πάντα τὰ ἔθνη ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ ἐν φόβῳ). It will be

* The Benedictions (in the original) are given in the Palestinian and Babylonian recensions in Dalman, Die Worte Jesu p. 299 ff. An English rendering will be found in Schürer, HJP II. ii. p. 83 ff.; see also Westcott, Hebrews p. 206 ff.

† It should be remembered that the LXX often represents עֶבֶד in Isaiah and elsewhere by δοῦλος (e.g. Is 42^{19} 48^{20} $49^{3\ 5}$). It is therefore not improbable that St. Paul's words μορφὴν δούλου λαβών in Ph 2^{7} allude to the prophecies in Deutero-Isaiah. But in Ph 2 the preceding and the succeeding context alike guard against any misconception noted that in these speeches the phrase τὰ ἔθνη is conspicuously absent.

To Israel three blessings are offered through the work of Jesus Messiah: (1) national repentance and forgiveness (2^{38} 3^{19} 5^{31}; cf. 3^{26} 13^{38}, Lk 1^{77}), chiefly in reference to the great national sin of rejecting 'the Lord's Anointed'; cf. e.g. Ps-Sol $18^{5f.}$, Shemoneh Esreh 5, 6 (especially in the Babylonian recension, which must be of Palestinian origin, Dalman, Die Worte p. 301 n.); (2) national rest and peace (καιροὶ ἀναψύξεως, 3^{19}); cf. e.g. Enoch 50^{1}, Ps-Sol $10^{6f.}$ ἐν εὐφροσύνῃ Ἰσραήλ, 14^{6} 17^{50} 18^{7}; (3) the mission of Messiah from heaven, and the coming of 'times of the restoration of all things (ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων, 3^{21})'; cf. the Rabbinic passages quoted in Weber (p. 333 f.) as to the necessity of repentance for the coming of Messiah and its attendant blessings; for 'the restoration' see, e.g., Enoch $45^{4f.}$, Apoc. Bar 73 f.*

It must be observed that in 4^{2} the Sadducees are represented as 'sore troubled' because the apostles 'proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from among the dead' (τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν), i.e. a resurrection of the righteous. The reference may be to some words of the apostles unrecorded in Lk's brief summary, or to an interpretation which the Sadducees put on their teaching about the Resurrection of Jesus. On the Jewish doctrine of the Resurrection see e.g. Ps-Sol 3^{16}, Shemoneh Esreh 2; see also Charles, Eschatology p. 302 f.

In reviewing the doctrine of St. Peter's early speeches we note that the new facts of the ministry of Jesus, His death, His Resurrection and Exaltation, are stated with absolute precision and emphasis. But the theological interpretation of these facts is inchoate. The predestination of the Messiah is spoken of (2^{23} 3^{18}, cf. 4^{28}), but His pre-existence is not affirmed, nor is anything said of His unique relation to the Father. The death of Christ is not contemplated in a sacrificial aspect, nor is it brought into connexion with the problem of justification. There is no allusion to the moral and spiritual power of the Resurrection through the union of the believer with the Risen Lord, nor to the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. The convictions and hopes created or quickened in the apostle's mind are expressed in terms of the religion of a devout Israelite. If we compare St. Peter's speeches with any one of the apostolic Epistles (except that of St. James, which deals almost wholly with questions of conduct), we see the difference between an immediate interpretation of the Christian facts in their bearing on Israel, and a matured apprehension and exposition of these facts in their universal and absolute significance.

III. ST. PETER IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION.—1. St. Peter's early life.—Epiphanius, a monk of Jerusalem of the 9th cent., in his 'Acts and end of . . . Andrew,' relates (ed. Dressel p. 45 f.) that 'in the days of Hyrcanus, the priest and king of the Hebrews, there was a certain Jonas of the tribe of Symeon. He was a poor man, and at his death left his two sons, Simon and Andrew, in great poverty. They hired themselves out. Andrew devoted himself to a life of absolute continence. Simon married the daughter of Aristobulus, brother of the Apostle Barnabas, and, as it is said, had a son and a daughter. . . . After the death of his mother-in-law he committed his wife to the Theotokos' (cf. for other authorities Lipsius * p. 7). In the Book of the Bee of Solomon, a writer of the first half of the 13th cent., who, according to Lipsius (Die Apokr. Ap., Ergänzungsheft p. 19), constantly depends on older sources, the apostle belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Oxford Semitic Series, I. pt. ii. p. 104). Clement (Strom. iii. 6, p. 535 ed. Potter, quoted in Eus. HE III. xxx.) says that the apostles Peter and Philip had children;† and Jerome (adv. Jovinian. i. 26) states that the περίοδοι mentions a son and a daughter of St. Peter; while he himself, arguing apparently from the silence of Scripture (Mk $1^{29ff.}$), supposes that his wife had died before his call to follow Christ. Clement in the passage just quoted asserts that the apostles travelled with their wives οὐχ ὡς γαμετὰς ἀλλ' ὡς ἀδελφάς, and employed them in ministrations to women (cf. Clem. Recog. ii. 1, vii. 25, 36; Hom. xiii. 1, 11). Clement further preserves a tradition (Strom. vii. 11, p. 868 ed. Potter, quoted in Eus. HE III. xxx.), to which, it seems, no independent writer alludes, that St. Peter's wife suffered a martyr's death, and that the apostle, when he saw her led away, encouraged her with the words μέμνησο, ὦ αὕτη, τοῦ κυρίου (as Eus. gives the phrase),—words which may imply that she too had known the Lord. There is nothing improbable in the supposition that she was one of the women who suffered in the Neronian persecution (Clem. Rom. vi.).

The story of Petronilla, the supposed daughter of St. Peter, is given in Acta Nerei et Achillei 15 (ed. Achelis p. 14 f.), and in Acta Philippi, in Tischendorf, Apocal. Apocr. pp. 149, 155. Augustine (contr. Adimant. 17; Migne, Pat. Lat. 42, 161) also mentions the fact that the story had a place in the apocryphal books in use among the Manichæans. The beauty of the daughter, so the story runs, was a trouble to the apostle, who therefore prayed that she might be paralyzed. He afterwards, in answer to the challenge of Titus, bade her rise and minister to them. After her restoration she was sought in marriage by 'Flaccus the Count.' She puts him off for three days, and on the third day dies after receiving the Eucharist. The Encratite element in the story connects it with the Gnostic Πράξεις Πέτρου (see below), from which it was doubtless originally derived (see Lipsius pp. 81, 203 ff.). The saint's memorial day is May 31. Over her tomb in the Ardeatine Way pope Siricius, about 390, erected a basilica. The inscription on the tomb was AVR · PETRONILLÆ · FILIÆ · DVLCISSIMÆ. The name Petronilla is to be connected, not with Peter but with Petronius. The founder of the Flavian house bore the name of Petro. The catacomb in which Petronilla was buried was closely connected with the Flavian gens, being the 'Cemetery of Domitilla,' the wife of Flavius Clemens. Doubtless the story arose from a mistaken etymology. Petronilla, an early convert to Christianity and a member of the Flavian family, was in later days assumed to be a daughter of the Apostle Peter (see Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 37 ff., who gives references to de Rossi's articles; Lanciani, Pagan and Christian Rome p. 340 ff.).

As to (late) traditions respecting the personal appearance of the apostle, it must suffice to refer to Lipsius p. 213. As the tonsure was supposed to be due to St. Peter's example, it is of interest to notice that Jerome (Comm. in Gal. i. 18) refers to a statement of the Periodi that he was bald.

For information in regard to early pictures and representations of the apostle, see art. in Dict. Chr.

* Dalman (Die Worte Jesu p. 145 f.), with whom Charles (Eschatology p. 374 n.) agrees, maintains that the words ἀποκαταστάσεις πάντων have nothing to do with the 'renewal of the world,' but refer to the fulfilment of the predictions of the Prophets. He bases his opinion upon the Peshitta—'until the completion of the times of those things which God spoke by the mouth of His holy prophets.' But this is merely a paraphrastic abbreviation characteristic of the Peshitta. The word ἀποκατάστασις cannot refer to the fulfilment of prophecy (cf. e.g. Mt 12^{18} 17^{11}, Ac 16), and when taken in its natural sense is in harmony with Jewish ideas.

Among the sayings of our Lord preserved in extra-canonical authorities a few are addressed to St. Peter. (1) Ignatius, Smyr. 3, 'When [after the Resurrection] He came to Peter and his company, He said to them, Lay hold and handle Me, and see that I am not a demon without body.' Cf. Lk $24^{36ff.}$. On the question whether this saying had a place in 'the Gospel according to the Hebrews,' see Lightfoot in loco. (2) '2 Clem.' 5, 'The Lord saith, Ye shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves. But Peter answered and said unto Him, What then if the wolves should tear the lambs? Jesus said unto Peter, Let not the lambs fear the wolves after they are dead,' etc. Cf. Mt 10^{28}, Lk $12^{4ff.}$. See Lightfoot's note. (3) 'The Gospel according to the Hebrews' (ap. Jerome, adv. Pelag. iii. 2), 'Si peccauerit, inquit, frater tuus in uerbo et satis tibi fecerit, septies in die suscipe eum. Dixit illi Simon discipulus eius, Septies in die? Respondit Dominus et dixit ei, Etiam ego dico tibi, Usque septuagies septies.' Cf. Mt 18^{22}, Lk 17^{4}. See Westcott, Introduction p. 456; Hilgenfeld, NT extra Canon. iv. pp. 16, 23. Cf. Mt 19^{16}. See Westcott p. 463; Hilgenfeld p. 16. 2. St. Peter in connexion with the Syrian Antioch.—According to a very widespread tradition, St. Peter was the founder and organizer of the Church in Antioch. The Clementine Romance, which must date back at least to the beginning of the 3rd cent., makes the apostle's entry into Antioch and his success there the happy conclusion of the story (Hom. xx. 23; Recog. x. 68 ff.). Baseless as most of its details are, in such a matter as this it would be likely to reflect current tradition, especially as it probably originated in Syria (see below). Origen (Hom. vi. in Luc., ed. Lomm. v. p. 104) calls Ignatius 'the second Bishop of Antioch after the blessed Peter.' This statement was not improbably derived from an earlier list of Antiochene bishops. Such a list Lipsius (p. 25, cf. Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 333 f.) thinks can be assigned to the time of Victor of Rome. Other important notices of St. Peter's connexion with the Church of Antioch preserved in Christian literature are: (1) Greek: (a) Apost. Const. vii. 46; (b) Euseb. HE III. xxxvi. 2, Chron. (see below); (c) Chrys. Hom. in Ign. Mart. (Migne, Pat. Gr. l. 591); (d) Theodoret, Dial. Immut. (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxiii. 81); (e) Chron. Paschale (Migne, Pat. Gr. xcii. 557). In the last document we are told that in the fourth year after the Ascension Peter went to Antioch, that at the request of the Jewish Christians he enthroned himself as bishop, that he did not receive or regard any Gentile Christians, and that so leaving them to themselves he departed thence—a story which must be derived from some early Ebionite romance cognate to the Letter of Peter to James prefixed to the Clem. Homilies. (2) Latin: (a) Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. 1; (b) Leo, Epp. 106, 119 (Migne, Pat. Lat. liv. 1007, 1042); (c) Liber Pontificalis (in all the several forms, ed. Duchesne pp. 50 f., 118), see below; (d) Gregory the Great, Ep. vii. 40 (Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 899), 'ipse firmauit sedem [in Antiochia] in qua septem annis, quamuis discessurus, sedit.' The festival of 'Cathedra Petri in Antiochia' was on Feb. 22 (see below, p. 773). (3) Syriac. Doctr. Apost. (Cureton, Anc. Syr. Documents, p. 33).

To pass to the date and length of Peter's sojourn at Antioch. The Lib. Pontificalis, both in the original form as restored by Duchesne (p. 51), and in the later recension (p. 118), gives seven years (so Greg.) as the length of Peter's Antiochene episcopate. This evidence probably represents the Roman tradition of the earlier years of the 6th century. The Felician abridgment (c. A.D. 530), however, has 'annos x.' (p. 50). It would not be difficult in a reconstruction of St. Peter's life to find a place for an Antiochene ministry of seven or ten years' duration. But the evidence is too late to claim serious attention. The dates given in the two chief versions of Eusebius' Chronicon are conflicting (ed. Schoene, p. 150 ff.). The Armenian version places the apostle's departure for Rome, 'when he had first founded the Church of Antioch,' in the third year of Gaius (39–40), and the appointment of Euodius in the second year of Claudius (42–43). Jerome (so also Syriac epitome, ed. Schoene p. 211) gives the departure for Rome in the second year of Claudius, and the appointment of Euodius two years later. The arrangement in Jerome seems artificial, for he places in three consecutive years three important events connected with the three great Churches—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch. Moreover, the Petrine dates in the Chronicon are connected with what appears to be the impossible assumption of a 25 years' episcopate at Rome. The simple tradition, however, which associates St. Peter with the early period of the Church at Antioch, seems to go back to the 2nd cent., and is intrinsically probable.

3. St. Peter in connexion with Pontus and the provinces of Asia Minor.—Origen (ap. Eus. HE III. 1) is the earliest authority—Πέτρος δὲ ἐν Πόντῳ καὶ Γαλατίᾳ καὶ Βιθυνίᾳ Καππαδοκίᾳ τε καὶ Ἀσίᾳ κεκηρυχέναι τοῖς ἐκ διασπορᾶς Ἰουδαίοις ἔοικεν. The last word shows that the statement is an inference; the enumeration of provinces and the reference to the διασπορά make it plain that the source of the inference is the salutation of 1 P. Epiphanius (Hær. xxvii. vi. p. 107 ed. Petav.) goes a step further, and states that the apostle often visited Pontus and Bithynia. Jerome (de Virr. Illustr. 1) places this missionary journey between the apostle's episcopate at Antioch and his journey to Rome in the second year of Claudius. The Syriac Doctrine of the Apostles (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents p. 33) informs us that 'Antioch and Syria and Cilicia and Galatia, even to Pontus, received the apostles' hand of priesthood from Simon Cephas, who himself laid the foundation of the Church there, and was priest and ministered there up to the time when he went from thence to Rome.' In this missionary journey Andrew was traditionally associated with Peter. Thus, in the catholic Acts of Andrew as given by Epiphanius (ed. Dressel pp. 45–82), a monk of Jerusalem of the 9th cent., the story is told how the two brothers journey from the Syrian Antioch to Tyana in Cappadocia, and from thence to Sinope in Pontus. Epiphanius himself visited Sinope, and found there traditions of the apostles' visit. The inhabitants pointed out a spot on a desert island some six miles from the city where the apostles dwelt, and the chairs on which they sat to teach (pp. 47, 50). There are, however, indications that in this tradition there has been a confusion between the obscure Simon Zelotes and his well-known brother-apostle Simon Peter (Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. I. p. 612, II. i. p. 6). Photius (Cod. cxiv.; Migne, Pat. Gr. ciii. 389) among the Leucian Acts mentions Acts of Andrew. We may infer, therefore, that the kernel of the later Acts of Andrew was supplied by this 2nd cent. romance. On the Acts of Andrew in their different forms see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. I. 543–622; James, Apocr. Anecdota ii. p. xxix ff.; Bonnet, Passio Andreæ (Acta Ap. Apoc. ii.). On the tradition as to St. Peter's work in Pontus, etc., see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 4 ff. There is no reason to regard it as anything but an inference from the salutation of the Epistle.

4. St. Peter in connexion with Babylon.—Lipsius adduces two pieces of evidence to show that St. Peter visited Babylon. (1) He refers to two Nestorian writers (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. iii. 2, p. vi) who make this assertion. But, apart from the lateness of their date, their statement is avowedly based on a literal interpretation of 1 P 5[13]. And, again, the earlier Syriac tradition as given in the Doctrine of Addai (p. 44 ed. Phillips) and in the Doctrine of Simon Cephas (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents p. 35) knows nothing of Babylon, and makes the apostle visit Rome. (2) Lipsius argues that, when the Acts of Simon and Jude (Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. NT ii. p. 608 ff.) make Simon the Cananæan go to Babylon, the obscure Simon has taken the place of his famous namesake, and that therefore these Acts supply an argument for Simon Peter's visit to Babylon. It can only be said that such a conclusion rests on an inversion of probability. In short, there is no evidence for the theory that St. Peter worked at Babylon (see Lipsius, Die Apokr. Apostelg. II. ii. pp. 145 f., 175, Ergänzungsheft p. 32; and, on the other side, Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 21).

5. St. Peter in connexion with Rome.—The chief points at issue are, whether St. Peter visited Rome; if he did, how long he worked there; whether he suffered martyrdom there; and if so, at what date. It will be most convenient to arrange the evidence under the several Churches.

(1) Rome.—(a) Clement (c. A.D. 96) v. vi. In the previous chapters Clement has spoken of the evils which have sprung from 'jealousy and envy.' He has taken examples from Scripture in chronological order, ending with David. 'Let us,' he continues, 'come to the athletes who lived but lately (τοὺς ἐγγιστα γενομένους, i.e. as compared with the OT heroes), the noble examples of our own generation. Because of envy the great and righteous pillars (of the Church) were persecuted and contended unto death. Let us set before our eyes the good apostles—Peter, who endured many labours and, having borne his witness (μαρτυρήσας), went to the appointed place of glory; Paul (who suffered much and journeyed far and), having borne his witness before the rulers, departed thus from the world and went to the holy place. . . . To these men . . . there was gathered a great company of the elect, who, being the victims of jealousy, by reason of many outrages and tortures became a noble example among us.' The main points are these: (i.) The most reasonable explanation of the fact that the examples of the other apostles are passed over and Peter and Paul alone mentioned, is that Clement points to those two apostles whose examples of heroism were best known to the Church in whose name he writes (cf. Ignatius, below). (ii.) That St. Paul suffered at Rome is universally allowed. The language is carefully chosen to emphasize the likeness between the experiences of the two apostles. (iii.) If the passage, when naturally interpreted, discloses the place of St. Peter's martyrdom, what of the time? We have seen that in the preceding context Clement followed the order of time. It is unlikely that he would desert that order in regard to events within his own knowledge and that of his readers. Since, then, 'the great company of the elect' who suffered were plainly Nero's victims, it seems to follow that the two apostles perished either before or during the Neronian persecution. The former alternative may be put aside as unsupported by any evidence. Further, a close association of the apostles and 'the great company' seems implied in the phrase τούτοις . . . συνηθροίσθη. Indeed, a strict interpretation of these words appears to justify us in going a step further. They mean 'to these' rather than 'with these' 'there was gathered,'* and thus seem to imply that the apostles were among those 'who were seized first' (Tac. Ann. xv. 44), the first-fruits of a too abundant harvest. Thus the obvious interpretation of Clement's words is that St. Peter and St. Paul were martyred in the Neronian persecution; while the language is not explicit enough to have created the tradition. (b) Caius, a Roman presbyter, a contemporary of Zephyrinus and Hippolytus. Eus. HE II. xxv. quotes the following words from the treatise of Caius against Proclus the Montanist: ἐγὼ δὲ τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ἀποστόλων ἔχω δεῖξαι· ἐὰν γὰρ θελήσῃς ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸν Βατικανὸν ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τὴν Ὡστίαν, εὑρήσεις τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ταύτην ἱδρυσαμένων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. The words of Caius are an explicit statement (1) that both the apostles worked for some time at Rome; (2) that they died a martyr's death at Rome. But the question remains—Did τὰ τρόπαια mark the place of execution (so Lipsius) or of burial (so Zahn)? There are strong reasons for choosing the latter alternative. The ἐγὼ δέ of Caius suggests that he at Rome claims to eclipse what Proclus appealed to in Asia Minor, i.e. the tombs of Philip and his daughters at Hierapolis (Eus. HE III. xxxi. 4). This clearly was the meaning which Eusebius himself put upon the words (cf. III. xxxi. 1). Thus we can draw another inference from Caius' words, viz. that at the beginning of the 3rd cent. the Roman Church thought that it possessed the bodies of the two apostles. No certain answer can be given to the further question—Of what did these τρόπαια consist? The word may imply the erection on the spot of a building of some kind, a memoria such as the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 55, 125) says that Anencletus built. Or it may point to some natural or other object which identified the spot, such as the catholic Acts† speak of (see below, p. 772). (c) Hippolytus. In the Refutatio (vi. 20) this writer speaks of the conflict between Simon Magus and 'the apostles' at Rome, and in particular of Peter's opposition to him. It appears, however, that Hippolytus used the apocryphal Acts (Bonwetsch, Studien zu den Komm. Hippolyts p. 27), and we cannot be sure, therefore, that his statement is independent evidence. Yet the end of Simon as described by him differs from his end according to the extant Acts. (d) The Muratorian Canon. The fragment speaks of the 'passion of Peter' in close connexion with St. Paul's journey to Spain. As these two events are mentioned together in the Acts of Peter, it is probable that the writer (very probably Hippolytus) has these Acts in his mind (James, Apocr. Anecdota ii. p. x f.), and we are not entitled to infer more than that he does not question the truthfulness of the Acts in these matters. (e) The notice in the Depositio Martyrum (see below, p. 772) as to the translation of the apostles' bodies in 258 confirms the evidence of Caius.

(2) Syria.—(a) Ignatius of Antioch (c. 115). He writes to the Romans (c. iv.) thus: οὐχ ὡς Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος διατάσσομαι ὑμῖν. Contrast the similar but studiously general language addressed to the

* Compare Eur. Rhesus 613, ὃδ' ἐγγὺς ἕστασι καὶ συνήθροισται στρατῷ, and (with Zahn, Einl. i. p. 447) 1 K 11[24] (Cod. A) εἰς αὐτόν, 1 Mac 1[52] πρὸς αὐτούς.

† Ed. Lipsius pp. 172, 216: ἔθηκαν [τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ] ὑπὸ τὴν τερέβινθον πλησίον τοῦ ναυμαχίου εἰς τόπον καλούμενον Βατικανόν.

Trallians (c. iii.): ἵνα ὢν κατάκριτος ὡς ἀπόστολος ὑμῖν διατάσσωμαι. In the letter to the Romans St. Peter and St. Paul are mentioned—such is the natural explanation—because they had actually given commandments to the Roman Church (see Lightfoot in loc.). (b) Clementine literature (Recog., Hom.). The Grundschrift had its origin probably in Syria before the close of the 2nd cent. In the documents now extant there are a few allusions to Peter's visit to Rome. But it is not certain that they are not due to later editing (see below, p. 775). (c) Documents of the Syriac-speaking Church: The Doctrine of Addai, 'in its present shape a work of the latter half of the 4th cent.' (Wright, Short Hist. of Syriac Literature p. 9), speaks of 'the Epistles of Paul, which Simon Peter sent us from the city of Rome' (ed. Phillips p. 44); so Doctr. of the Apostles (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents p. 33).

(3) Corinth.—Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (c. 170), addressed a letter to Soter, bishop of Rome, a fragment of which is preserved in Eus. HE II. xxv. 8. After speaking of the common work of St. Peter and St. Paul at Corinth, he continues: ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμόσε διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρόν. The reference to the common work of the two apostles in Corinth is probably a mere inference from 1 Co. But there is nothing in the NT which can account for the assertion of their common activity in Italy. Dionysius must therefore here refer to a tradition, which may have come to him through the medium of the Petrine Acts, but which, however it reached him, he accepted. It matters little whether ὁμόσε is taken loosely to mean 'together,' or more strictly '(going to) the same place,' i.e. in Italy. Dionysius can have only Rome in his mind. The last words of the extract imply that the apostles suffered, not necessarily on the same day, but during the same persecution.

(4) Asia Minor.—(a) Papias (c. 130). It is a reasonable inference from the language of Eusebius (HE II. xv. 2, III. xxxix. 15, 16) that Papias interpreted Babylon in 1 P 5^{13} of Rome, and is therefore a witness for the Roman visit. (b) The Gnostic Acts of Peter were probably the work of Leucius Charinus in the second half of the 2nd cent. As Leucius lived in Asia Minor, it is clear that he did not place the scene of Peter's conflict with Simon Magus at Rome from motives of ecclesiastical patriotism. It is natural to suppose that he built up the romance on a current tradition of Peter's visit to Rome (see below, p. 774).

(5) South Gaul.—Irenæus (c. 190) gained his knowledge of earlier times from many sources. As the pupil of Polycarp in Asia, he was acquainted with the traditions of 'the school of St. John.' He himself visited Rome, probably on more than one occasion, and, it would appear, he resided there for some time (Lightfoot, Essays on 'Supernatural Religion' p. 267). His list of Roman bishops makes it probable that he had had access to the records preserved in the Roman Church. He writes thus (III. i. 1): 'Matthew . . . published his Gospel while Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome and founding the Church there. And after their departure (ἔξοδον) Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, he too handed on to us in writing what Peter preached.' Irenæus, it will be noticed, speaks of the joint work of the apostles at Rome as belonging to a period so well known that it supplies a means of dating another event. Further, it is natural to take the word ἔξοδος as referring to the apostles' death; for (independently of other notices) this interpretation is favoured by (1) the use of the word, cf. Wis 3^{2} 7^{6}, Lk 9^{31}, 2 P 1^{15}; Clem. Alex. pp. 570, 882, ed. Potter, and the frequent use of exitus in Tertullian (Oehler on Scorp. 9); (2) the context—to say that Mark recorded the substance of Peter's preaching after his death defines not only the date but the reason of the composition of the Gospel.

(6) Alexandria.—(a) Clement (c. 200), in a fragment of the Hypotyposeis, preserved by Eusebius (HE VI. xiv.), and in the commentary on 1 Peter contained in the same treatise and now extant in a Latin translation (ed. Potter p. 997), in connexion with the composition of St. Mark's Gospel speaks of St. Peter's preaching at Rome. (b) Origen (c. 250). In the passage quoted above (p. 768), Origen, after speaking of St. Peter's journeys in Asia Minor, adds that 'at last, having arrived in Rome, he was crucified head downwards, having himself requested that he might so suffer.' (c) Peter of Alexandria. The date of the Epistola Canonica is apparently A.D. 306 (Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. p. 331). In it (Can. 9, Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. p. 34) mention is made of St. Peter's crucifixion at Rome.

(7) North Africa.—(a) Tertullian (c. 200). The passages in Tertullian's writings are—Scorp. 15: 'Orientem fidem Romæ primus Nero cruentauit. Tunc Petrus ab altero cingitur, cum cruci adstringitur'; de Bapt. 4: 'quos P. in Tiberi tinxit'; de Præscr. Hæret. 32: 'Romanorum [ecclesia refert] Clementem a Petro ordinatum'; ib. 36: 'Ista quam felix ecclesia [sc. Romæ] . . . ubi Petrus passioni dominicæ adæquatur.' Thus Tertullian is the earliest writer who (1) speaks of the manner of St. Peter's death—by crucifixion; (2) and explicitly states that it took place in Nero's reign. (b) Commodian. This earliest Christian poet, probably of African extraction, writing about A.D. 250 (see Dict. Chr. Biog. i. p. 610), speaks in the Carmen Apologeticum 820 f. of Peter and Paul suffering in Rome under Nero.

(8) This Catena will best be ended with a reference to the two historians of the first part of the 4th cent., Lactantius and Eusebius. Lactantius in Instit. Div. iv. 21 speaks of Peter and Paul preaching in Rome, adding, 'ea prædicatio in memoriam scripta permansit'—which Zahn (Ges. Kan. ii. p. 884) considers to be a reference to the Pauli prædicatio (cf. pseudo-Cyprian, de Rebapt. 17); and in de Mort. Persec. 2 he says of Nero: 'Petrum cruci affixit et Paulum interfecit.' The following passages from Eusebius are to the point:—HE II. xiv. (Peter's conflict at Rome with Simon Magus in Claudius' reign), xv. (Peter and the composition of Mark's Gospel at Rome), xvii. (in the reign of Claudius, Philo became acquainted with Peter at Rome; cf. Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. xi.; Photius, Cod. 105), xxv. (Paul beheaded, Peter crucified at Rome), III. xxi. (Clement third in succession 'after Peter and Paul'), xxxi. 1; Demons. Evang. iii. 5. 65 (St. Peter crucified at Rome head downwards); Theophania iv. 7 (ed. Lee p. 221; Peter's 'honourable sepulchre in the very front of their city,' i.e. Rome), v. 31 (ed. Lee p. 315; Peter crucified at Rome). See just below on the Chronicon. Passages from later writers are collected by Lipsius p. 236 ff. For a summing up of this evidence see below, p. 777.

6. Chronological notices in the Chronicon of Eusebius and in the Liber Pontificalis.—(i.) The Chronicon.—(a) St. Peter's arrival in Rome. The Armenian version assigns St. Peter's arrival at Rome, after founding the Church at Antioch, to the 3rd year of Caius, i.e. 39–40, adding, 'commoratur illic antistes ecclesiæ annis viginti.' The appointment of Euodius as bishop of Antioch is placed in the 2nd year of Claudius, i.e. 42–43. Jerome puts the appointment of Euodius in the 4th year of Claudius, i.e. 44–45, and the arrival of St. Peter at Rome, after founding the Antiochene Church, in the 2nd year of Claudius, i.e. 42–43. He adds:

'xxv annis eiusdem urbis episcopus perseuerat.'* (b) St. Peter's death. The Armenian version puts the Neronian persecution, 'when the apostles Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom at Rome,' in the 13th year of Nero, i.e. 67–68, and perhaps by a pure mistake the beginning of Linus' episcopate 'post Petrum' is assigned to the previous year.† Jerome places the persecution, the martyrdom of the two apostles, and the accession of Linus to the episcopate in the last—the 14th—year of Nero. It may be noticed that the date in the Armenian version for Peter's arrival at Rome seems to be a revision of the Eusebian date, and was perhaps attained thus. It is said in this version that Peter continued at Rome 20 years: this brings us to 59–60—an absurd date for the apostle's death. But if we suppose that in the processes of translation and revision 'twenty' was substituted for 'twenty-five,' then we get a date assigned to Peter's death very shortly after the fire in July 64. It seems likely, then, that the Armenian version, assuming 25 years' episcopate, worked back from the summer or autumn of 64, and so gave the early date for Peter's arrival in Rome. If this be so, we have here indirect evidence of the survival of the tradition that Peter's martyrdom took place in 64. The date, however, of the apostle's death is unrevised, and retains its Eusebian position at the end of Nero's reign. Two other passages dealing with the date of St. Peter's arrival at Rome must be quoted: (1) Eus. HE II. xiv., where, after an account of Simon's mischievous doings at Rome, Eusebius adds that Providence brought Peter also thither ἐπὶ τῆς αὐτῆς Κλαυδίου βασιλείας. (2) Jerome (de Virr. Illustr. 1): 'Romam pergit ibique viginti quinque annis cathedram sacerdotalem tenuit usque ad ultimum annum Neronis, id est, quartum decimum' (cf. v.). Harnack (Die Chronol. p. 124 n.) points out that Eusebius in the History does not refer to a 25 years' episcopate, and puts Peter's arrival at Rome simply in the reign of Claudius, and that it is therefore possible that the reference to the 25 years and the location of the commencement of that period in the 2nd year of Claudius may be due to Jerome. This may be so; but the fact that both the versions of the Chronicon, the Armenian and Jerome, mention the length of Peter's stay at Rome (the original number of years in the Arm. as in Jerome having probably been 25), and that they both place his martyrdom there near the end of Nero's reign, points to the dates and the 25 years' episcopate having been derived from the original statement of the Eusebian Chronicon. It is probable (Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 339; Harnack, Chronol. p. 123) that Eusebius derived his early papal chronology from Julius Africanus; and the latter may in his turn have used earlier documents, e.g. the lists of Hegesippus. But (assuming that it had a place in the Chronicon of Eusebius) there is no evidence to show whether the 25 years' episcopate was the invention of Eusebius or whether he inherited it from one of his predecessors. It will appear in a moment that it is probably the result of an artificial arrangement of dates. We turn to the date of the martyrdom, which is put in the last year of Nero's reign. It is to be noticed that the catholic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius p. 172 f.) connect with the apostle's death a prophecy that 'Nero should be destroyed not many days hence' and relate its speedy fulfilment. Eusebius' words, preserved by Syncellus, are: ἐπὶ πᾶσι δ' αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἀδικήμασι [ἀτυχήμασι Codd.] καὶ τὸν πρῶτον κατὰ Χριστιανῶν ἐνεδείξατο διωγμόν, ἡνίκα Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος κ.τ.λ. It does not appear that Eusebius was acquainted with Tacitus, and, if he did not connect the persecution with the great fire, it was very natural that, whether he followed the catholic Acts or no, he should regard the attack on the Church as the filling up of Nero's iniquities (cf. Ac 12[1-23]). On the other hand, the evidence of Tacitus is decisive that the persecution followed immediately upon the fire; and the Chronicon records under the year 63–64 'many conflagrations at Rome.' We have still to account for the legend of the 25 years' episcopate at Rome. If the terminus ad quem of Peter's sojourn at Rome was determined as suggested above, we may conjecture that (the ministry at Antioch being regarded as a mere offshoot of the ministry at Jerusalem) Peter's departure for Rome was placed at the expiration of the 12 years, after which, according to the tradition which had a place in the Κήρυγμα Πέτρου (ap. Clement, Strom. vi. 5) and the Gnostic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius p. 49; for other references see Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 243), the Lord commanded the apostles to go forth into the world (cf. Ac 12[17]). If the Passion was placed in the year 30, then the sojourn of Peter at Rome would be considered to commence about the year 42, and just about a quarter of a century would elapse between that date and the martyrdom at the end of Nero's reign.*

(ii.) The Liber Pontificalis.—We turn now to the later catalogues of Roman bishops. (1) The Liberian catalogue (Duchesne p. 2) has the notice, 'Petrus ann. xxv mens. uno d. viiii.† Fuit temporibus Tiberii Cæsaris et Gai et Tiberi Claudi et Neronis, a cons. Minuci [lege Vinici] et Longini usque Nerine et Vero [lege Vetere]. Passus autem cum Paulo die iii kl. iulias, cons. ss., imperante Nerone.' The date of this catalogue is 354. It gives the date of Peter's 25 years' Roman episcopate as A.D. 30–55. The notice immediately preceding puts the date of the crucifixion as A.D. 29 ('duobus Geminis cons.'), and then adds: 'et post ascensum eius beatissimus Petrus episcopatum suscepit.' The singular date of Peter's episcopate, therefore, seems based on the assumption that Christ made the apostle a bishop, and that his see must have been Rome. (2) The Liber Pontificalis in the earlier form (as restored from the Felician and Cononian abridgments) puts side by side the following statements:—(a) 'Primum sedit cathedra episcopatus in Antiochia ann. vii.' (b) 'Ingressus in urbe Roma Nerone Cesare ibique sedit cathedra episcopatus ann. xxv mens. ii dies iii.' (c) 'Fuit temporibus Tiberii Cesaris et Gaii et Tiberii Claudi et Neronis.' To these statements (Duchesne p. 50 f.) the later recension (Duchesne p. 118) adds another, 'martyrio cum Paulo coronatur, post passionem Domini anno xxxviii.' According to this statement the date of the martyrdom is 67 (cf. Jer. de Virr. Illustr.). It is unnecessary to examine the different parts of the above mosaic. But however the chronological context varies, the xxv years' episcopate is preserved.

7. The burial-places of St. Peter. — The Ambrosian hymn connects the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul with three spots in Rome—'Trinis celebratur uiis Festum sacrorum martyrum' (Daniel, Thes. Hymn. I. xc.). These viæ are the

* The Syriac Epitome (Schoene p. 211) puts the foundation of the Church at Antioch and St. Peter's arrival at Rome ('et præfuit ecclesiæ illi annos xxv') in Anno Abr. 2058 (=A.D. 42–43), the appointment of Euodius two years later; but under An. Abr. 2064 (=A.D. 48–49) it has the entry, 'Petrus apostolus moderator eccl. Romanæ factus est.'

† It is, however, possible that we should connect this appointment of Linus with what there are some reasons for thinking to be the fact that Peter left Rome for a time about a year before his martyrdom there (see below, p. 778).

* In the Eastern and Oriental lists given in Duchesne, Lib Pontif. p. 34 ff., there are variations from 25 years—(i.) The Short Chronography of 853 gives 22 years; (ii.) Nicephorus 2 years; (iii.) Syncellus leaves a blank; (iv.) Eutychius 22 years; (v.) Elias of Nisibis 28 years.

† For a possible explanation of the variations of the number of months and days see Duchesne, Lib. Pontif. p. xx n.

Ostian, the place of St. Paul's death and burial; the Aurelian, the resting-place of St. Peter; and the Appian, where the bodies of both apostles were laid for a time. The facts are briefly these:

(1) The Vatican.—The belief that the apostle was buried on the Vatican goes back to the time of Caius (see above); so Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. 1: 'Sepultus Romæ in Vaticano iuxta uiam triumphalem' (this via runs N.E. of the Vatican); Acta Petri et Pauli, 84 (ed. Lipsius p. 216, cf. p. 172), ἔθηκαν αὐτὸ ὑπὸ τὴν τερέβινθον [cf. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. 44] πλησίον τοῦ ναυμαχίου [cf. Martyr. a Lino conscr. x., ed. Lipsius p. 11; see above] εἰς τόπον καλούμενον Βατικανόν; Lib. Pontif. (ed. Duchesne pp. 52 f., 118 ff.): 'Sepultus est uia Aurelia, in templum Apollonis, iuxta locum ubi crucifixus est, iuxta palatium Neronianum in Vaticanum, in territurium Triumphale, uia Aurelia, iii K. iul.' In the last notice the temple of Apollo probably refers to a temple of Cybele (Duchesne p. 120; Lipsius p. 401) on this site; by the palatium Neronianum is meant either Nero's gardens or the Circus (probably to be identified with the Naumachia). It was apparently on this spot that Anencletus, according to the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 55, 125), built a memoria beati Petri, where tradition said that all the Roman bishops till the time of Zephyrinus (except Clement and Alexander) were buried. The Church of San Pietro in Montorio is the outcome of another and later tradition that the apostle suffered on the Janiculum—a tradition which possibly arose from a confusion between the via Aurelia on the Vatican and the older via Aurelia with the porta Aurelia on the Janiculum.*

(2) The Ad Catacumbas.—In the Depositio Martyrum, one of the tracts which form the collection called by the general name of the Liberian Catalogue, and which were possibly edited in 354 by Furius Filocalus, who certainly illuminated them and who executed the inscriptions of Damasus in the catacombs (Lightfoot, Clement i. p. 249), we find the notice: 'iii Kal. iul. Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostense Tusco et Basso cons.' There can be no doubt that this is a blundering revision of an original notice running thus: 'iii Kal. iul. Petri et Pauli in Catacumbas Tusco et Basso cons.,' the reviser, whoever he may have been, interpreting the statement as referring to the martyrdom of the apostles. This misinterpretation of the original notice is still more flagrant in the Martyr. Hieronymianum: 'iii Kl. iul. Romæ natale apostolorum Petri et Pauli: Petri in Vaticano uia Aurelia: Pauli uero in uia Ostensi: utrumque in Catacumbas; passi sub Nerone, Basso et Tusco consulibus.' In reality the year indicated is A.D. 258, and the reference is to the transference of the apostles' remains from their respective resting-places on the Ostian and Aurelian roads to the Catacumbas on the Appian road, i.e. the Church of St. Sebastian, during the Valerian persecution, a few weeks before the martyrdom of pope Xystus in August. Damasus, as we learn from the Lib. Pontif. (ed. Duchesne pp. 84 f., 212; cf. p. civ), decorated the chamber, and placed over the locus bisomus the inscription—

> 'Hic habitasse prius sanctos cognoscere debes, > Nomina quisque Petri pariter Paulique requiris.
> Discipulos oriens misit, quod sponte fatemur. . . .
> Roma suos potius meruit defendere ciues.'

A misunderstanding of the common memorial day of the two apostles, which finds definite expression in the blundering notice of the Depositio, gave rise, it appears, to the legend that the two apostles suffered on the same day—a statement which first occurs in Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. 5: [Paulus] 'quarto decimo Neronis anno eodem die quo Petrus Romæ pro Christo capite truncatur, sepultusque est in uia Ostiensi.' The historical fact that the apostles' remains were supposed to have lain at one time near the place of their death and again in the Catacumbas, and then (see below) to have been restored to their original resting-places, gave rise to two stories. (a) The reference to the East in the verses of Damasus suggested the legend found in the Acta Petri et Pauli (ed. Lipsius p. 220) of Eastern Christians attempting to steal the bodies. These Acts assert that the bodies rested in the Catacumbas a year and seven months; a later tradition, found in the Salzburg Itinerary, makes the period 40 years (Duchesne p. cv; Benson, Cyprian p. 482 f.). (b) According to the Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 65 ff., 150 ff.), Cornelius, bishop of Rome 251–253, at the request of a certain matron named Lucina, removed the bodies of the apostles by night from the Catacumbas. The body of Paul Lucina buried in her own grounds on the Ostian road. 'Beati Petri accepit corpus beatus Cornelius episcopus et posuit iuxta locum ubi crucifixus est, inter corpora sanctorum episcoporum, in templum Apollonis, in monte Aureo, in Vaticanum palatii Neroniani, iii Kal. iul.' The epithet aureus has probably arisen from the word Aurelius.

(3) The Vatican.—The Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne pp. 78 f., 176; cf. the addition in one MS of the Passio Sanctorum App., ed. Lipsius p. 176) gives the legend, derived originally from the Acta Silvestri, extant only in later recensions, that Constantine was baptized by Silvester, and thereby cured of leprosy; that at the request of the bishop he built a basilica in honour of St. Peter on the site of a temple of Apollo; that he placed the apostle's body there in a tomb of bronze surmounted by a golden cross. It is likely enough that the basilica was begun at the end of Constantine's reign. But the body of the apostle cannot have been removed there before 354, since that is the date of the Liberian Depositio, where it is implied that the body still rested ad Catacumbas. The translation therefore must have taken place between 354 and the time when Damasus (366–384) placed in the Catacumbas the inscription quoted above. On the whole subject see Duchesne, Lib. Pontificalis pp. civ ff., 119 f., 125, 152, 193 ff., 214; Lipsius, Die Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 391 ff. (with reff. to his earlier works); Lightfoot, Clement ii. p. 499 f.; Benson, Cyprian p. 481 ff.; Erbes, 'Das Alter der Gräber u. Kirchen des Paulus u. Petrus in Rom,' in Brieger's Zeitschr. f. Kirchengesch. vii. p. 1 ff. (1885); Lanciani, Pagan and Christian Rome pp. 122 ff., 345 ff. (1892); de Waal, Die Apostelgruft ad Catacumbas (1894); Erbes, 'Die Todestage der Apostel Paulus u. Petrus,' 1899 (Texte u. Untersuch. NF iv. 1).

There are five memorial days which claim notice. (i.) June 29. The origin of the observance of this day as a festival of St. Peter and St. Paul has been pointed out above, and it has been shown that probably as early as Jerome, certainly before the Mart. Hieronymianum, compiled early in the 7th cent., the day was regarded as the anniversary of the death of the apostles. In the Gelasian Sacramentary there are three sets of 'Orationes et Preces' for the festival: 'In natali S. Petri proprie,' 'In natali apostolorum Petri et Pauli,' 'In natali S. Pauli proprie.' When in the Gregorian Sacramentary a further step was taken, and the 'natalis S. Pauli' was transferred to the next day, June 29 became the memorial day of St. Peter alone. This common festival of the two apostles passed into the Greek Church, though it is uncertain at what date, and has a place also in the Coptic, Ethiopic, Syrian, and Armenian calendars. A Syriac Martyrology of the year 412, published by Wright in the Journal of Sacred Literature for Oct. 1865, Jan. 1866, places this festival on Dec. 28. (ii.) Feb. 22. In the Liberian Depositio Martyrum there is the entry: 'viii Kal. Mart. natale Petri de catedra.' In the Martyr. Hieronymianum the corresponding notice is 'viii Kl. Mart. cathedra Petri in Antiochia.' (iii.) Jan. 18. In the same Martyrologium we have 'xv Kal. Feb. dedicatio cathedræ S. Petri apostoli qui [qua] primo Romæ sedit.' (iv.) Aug. 1. The Roman Martyrologium has 'Kal. Aug. Romæ ad uincula catenas S. Petri osculandas,' or, according to some MSS, 'Kal. Aug. Romæ dedicatio primæ ecclesiæ a b. Petro constructæ [et consecratæ].' Since the church S. Petri ad uincula was probably built under Sixtus III. (432–440), the origin of the festival may be as early as the time of this pope. The original reference of the festival was to the miracle recorded in Ac 12[7]. The corresponding festival in the Greek Church was on Jan. 16, in the Armenian Church on Jan. 22. For further information see Sinker's article in Dict. Chr. Antiq. ii. p. 1623 ff.; Lipsius, Die. Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 404 ff.

* Lanciani (Pagan and Christian Rome p. 127 f.) supposes that the erection of this church on the Janiculum to commemorate the martyrdom is due to a misinterpretation of the tradition that St. Peter suffered inter duas metas.

8. The Acts of Peter.—These Acts are collected and edited by Lipsius (1891) in the first vol. of the Acta Apost. Apocrypha, edited by himself and Bonnet.

(1) The Gnostic Acts.—(i.) The documents. These are: (a) Martyrium b. Petri Ap. a Lino ep. conscriptum. This martyrium is contained in several MSS. The name of Linus is found only in the title. (b) Actus Petri cum Simone. The sole authority for this text is the Codex Vercellensis, a 7th cent. MS. (c) μαρτύριον τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Πέτρου. This document corresponds with the closing portion of the Actus (xxx–end). The authorities for this text are a 9th cent. MS at Patmos, and a MS of later date at Mt. Athos. There exist also a Slavonic and an Æthiopic version (the latter is translated in Malan's Conflicts of the Holy Apostles), and some fragments of a Sahidic version. It appears certain that the two first-named Latin texts are independent, and rest ultimately on a common Greek text. The complicated problem of the relation of these texts is discussed by Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 109 ff.; Zahn, Ges. Kan. ii. p. 834 ff.

(ii.) Substance. The following is a brief summary of the story. (a) Paul in obedience to a vision departs from Rome on his journey to Spain. (b) Simon Magus arrives in Rome and gains adherents. The brethren are distressed that Paul has left them, and that they have no leader to help them against Simon. Just at this time, however, the twelve years after the Ascension being past, Christ appears to Peter in a vision and bids him go to Rome. (c) Peter arrives in Rome. After preaching to the brethren, at their request he goes from the synagogue to the house of Marcellus (formerly a disciple of St. Paul), where Simon is. At this point there ensues the episode of the speaking dog which takes Peter's message to Simon. Marcellus, who had been so much under Simon's influence that he had erected in his honour a statue with the inscription Simoni iuueni deo, repents. In course of time it is arranged that there should be a public encounter between Peter and Simon in the Forum. Peter's power of truly raising the dead proves him to be superior to Simon. [At this stage in the story the Athos MS begins]. Simon undertakes to fly to heaven. This he attempts to do before a great crowd in the Via Sacra.* Under the influence, however, of Peter's prayers he falls and breaks his thigh. He is stoned by the crowd, leaves Rome, and shortly afterwards dies at Terracina. (d) [At this point the Linus-Martyrium and the Patmos MS begin]. The prefect Agrippa [note that the minister of Augustus is transferred to Nero's reign] has four concubines, who are persuaded by Peter to refuse Agrippa any further intercourse. Xanthippe similarly withdraws from her husband Albinus, a friend of the emperor's [in the Acta Xanthippæ (James, Apocr. Anecdota p. 58 ff.) the husband's name is Probus]. Albinus, therefore, and Agrippa make common cause against Peter. (e) At the request of Xanthippe and the brethren, Peter consents to leave Rome. As he is passing through the gate of the city he sees Christ entering. The well-known conversation between the Lord and the apostle takes place (see below), and he returns to the city knowing that the Lord would suffer in him. St. Peter is brought before Agrippa, who condemns him to be crucified. When he is brought near the cross he addresses it in mystic language —ὦ ὄνομα σταυροῦ, μυστήριον ἀπόκρυφον κ.τ.λ. He asks that he may be fixed to it head downwards, and in mystical language he explains the significance of that position.* At the burial, Marcellus acts the part of Joseph of Arimathæa. Peter, however, appears to him in a vision and reminds him of the Lord's saying, 'Let the dead be buried by their own dead.' So Marcellus awaits Paul's return to Rome. The romance ends with a notice of Nero first determining to persecute the converts of Peter and afterwards being restrained by a vision (one text says 'of Peter,' another 'of an angel,' another of 'a certain one') of one who chastised him, and warned him to 'refrain his hands from the servants of Christ.'

(iii.) History and date. At the end of the 4th cent. and onwards apocryphal Acts of Peter are spoken of as being in authoritative use among heretics, especially the Manichæans; cf. Augustine, c. Faust. xxx. 4, adv. Adimant. Manich. 17; and (somewhat earlier) Philaster, Hær. 88. At the same time these Acts were not infrequently alluded to without note of suspicion, and occasionally even definitely cited, by catholic writers. Thus Isidore of Pelusium (Ep. ii. 99; Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxviii. 544) adduces a saying taken from the discourse of Peter in the house of Marcellus (Actus Petri cum Simone xx., ed. Lipsius p. 67)—καθὼς Πέτρος ὁ κορυφαῖος τοῦ χόρου ἐν ταῖς ἑαυτοῦ πράξεσι σαφῶς ἀπεφήνατο Ἀ ἐχωρήσαμεν ἐγράψαμεν. The earliest writer who refers to these Acts by name is Eusebius, HE III. iii. 2. Classing them with the Gospel, the Preaching, and the Apocalypse of Peter, he says 'we do not own these writings as handed down among the catholic (books), because no Church writer, either among the ancients or among our own contemporaries, has ever used the testimonies to be derived from them' (cf. Jerome, de Virr. Illustr. i.). The earliest writer who certainly refers to these Acts—he does not quote them by name—is the African poet Commodian, about A.D. 250, who, in Carmen Apologeticum 615 ff., writes: 'Et canem [fecit] ut Simoni diceret: clamaris a Petro . . . Infantem fecit quinto mense proloqui uolgo.' Commodian, then, supplies a terminus ad quem for the composition of these Petrine Acts. Harnack, indeed (Chronologie p. 552 ff.), argues that they were actually written about the middle of the 3rd century. He lays special stress on the fact that Hippolytus (Refut. Hær. vi. 20) gives an account of Peter's triumph over Simon, and of the latter's death, quite different from that contained in the Acts, and he concludes that Hippolytus did not know our Acts, and that therefore they could not have been then written. To this line of argument it may be replied: (a) that Hippolytus' ignorance of them would not prove their non-existence; (b) that ignorance of them on his part cannot be deduced from the fact that he follows quite another story; for Hippolytus, a malleus hæreticorum, would naturally avoid a story which he found in a heretical book. Harnack further insists that allusions in these Acts to, e.g., the emperor and to details of Church life point to the 3rd cent., while, in opposition to Lipsius and Zahn, he altogether denies that the Acts bear a Gnostic character. It is quite possible that some of the allusions to which Harnack appeals as proving the later date of the Acts as a whole point to interpolations on the part of an editor or a translator. But there are strong reasons for assigning the Grundschrift to the 2nd cent. Lipsius (p. 266) and Zahn (Ges. Kan. ii. p. 861) have both noted the resemblance in ideas and modes of expression between the Acts of Peter and the Leucian Acts of John. The fragment of the last-named Acts printed for the first time in James' Apocr. Anecdota ii. brings to light still further points of likeness. James (p. xxiv ff.) has collected a number of parallels between the fragment of the Johannine Acts and the Actus Petri cum Simone, and is justified in concluding 'that they show as clearly as any evidence of this kind could, that whoever wrote the Acts of John wrote the Acts of Peter' (p. xxiv). 'Acts of Peter' were among 'the Acts' which, according to Photius (Biblioth. Cod. cxiv.), were contained in αἱ λεγόμεναι τῶν ἀποστόλων περίοδοι —the work of Leucius Charinus. This Leucius (see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. i. p. 83 ff.), a somewhat shadowy personage, seems to have belonged to Asia Minor, and to have written during the 2nd cent., about 160 as Zahn thinks (ib. p. 864). Thus the original Gnostic Acts were a 2nd cent. romance, and had their origin in Asia Minor.

* The origin of this tradition is probably to be found in the story told by Suetonius (Nero 12).

* περὶ ὧν ὁ κύριος ἐν μυστηρίῳ λέγει 'Εὰν μὴ ποιήσητε τὰ δεξιὰ ὡς τὰ ἀριστερὰ καὶ τὰ ἀριστερὰ ὡς τὰ δεξιὰ καὶ τὰ ἄνω ὡς τὰ κάτω καὶ τα ὀπίσω ὡς τὰ ἔμπροσθεν, οὐ μὴ ἐπιγνῶτε τὴν βασιλ[illegible] c. (c. ix.).

(2) From the Gnostic we turn to the catholic Acts. These are often distinguished by the name Marcellus, who in some Latin MSS appears (in a superscription) as the author. (i.) Documents. These Acts are found in two chief forms, which Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocr. pp. 1–39) has somewhat disastrously endeavoured to weave into a single whole. The one, which may be designated as A, is found in Latin MSS, and in one Venice Greek MS (which Lipsius represents by the symbol E); the other, which may be designated as B, is found in the majority of Greek MSS. The most important difference between the two forms is that B begins with a long account (§§ 1–21) of the fear caused by Paul's appeal to Cæsar among the Jews at Rome (who had already had trouble enough through Peter's presence there), and of the closing stages of Paul's journey to the city. This section seems to be quite late, and is attributed by Lipsius (Prolegom. p. lxi) 'insipido cuidam sæculi ix monacho qui Siciliæ uel Magnæ Græciæ nescio quod monasterium incolebat.' Of the common Greek text there exists a Slavonic version.

(ii.) Substance. The outline of the story is as follows: (a) Paul arrives in Rome (Cod. E alone adds ἀπὸ τῶν Σπανιῶν). The two apostles meet with great joy. Paul stills a dispute between Gentile and Jewish Christians. The preaching of the apostles converts multitudes, and in particular 'Livia the wife of Nero and Agrippina the wife of Agrippa' [note the confusion] leave their husbands, while not a few soldiers withdraw from military service. (b) Simon Magus now begins to traduce Peter, and performs magical tricks. He is summoned before Nero, and claims to be the Son of God. The two great apostles and Simon hold a disputation and a trial of strength in miracles before Nero. At length Simon requests that a wooden tower may be erected, from which he undertakes to throw himself, that his angels may bear him to heaven. When the day arrives, Simon begins to fly, to the great distress of Paul. Peter, however, adjures the angels of Satan to help him no longer. Simon falls in the Via Sacra and dies. (c) Nero thereupon commands that the apostles should be thrown into prison. At Agrippa's suggestion Paul is beheaded in the Via Ostiensis. Peter, when he is brought to the cross, asks that, being unworthy to hang as his Lord hung, he may be crucified head downwards. He then relates to the people the Quo vadis story, and, after having prayed to the Good Shepherd, he gives up the spirit. (d) Three legends follow: (α) The legend of Perpetua, the three executioners, and Potentiana—in part closely akin to the Veronica legend—is rather Pauline than Petrine (comp. the Plautilla story in the Passio S. Pauli, ed. Lipsius p. 38 ff.). (β) Certain holy men appear, saying that they have come from Jerusalem; they, with Marcellus, bury the apostle's body 'under the terebinth near the Naumachia, at the place called the Vatican.' (γ) Certain men from the East carried off the bodies of the two apostles. They were overtaken at a place called Catacumbas at the third milestone along the Appian Way. There the saints' bodies were kept for a year and a half. Then the body of Peter was transferred to a tomb on the Vatican near the Naumachia, that of Paul to the Ostian Way. At their tombs great benefits were granted to the faithful through their prayers. The day of their martyrdom was June 29.

(iii.) History and date. The story of the men from the East who endeavoured to carry off the apostles' bodies arose, as is now generally agreed (see, e.g. Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelg. p. 312; Lightfoot, Clement ii. p. 500), from a misunderstanding of the inscription of pope Damasus (366–384); see above, p. 772. Thus we must allow time for the circumstances which Damasus commemorates to have been forgotten, and for the meaning of his lines to have become obscure. The Acts, therefore, in their present form can hardly be much earlier than the middle of the 5th cent. On the other hand, many indications (e.g. the relics of early confessions of faith embedded in the Acts, chs. 58. 69) point to the conclusion that the Grundschrift, on which interpolations from other sources have been engrafted, was a document similar to the Prædicatio Petri, and, with it, is to be assigned to the middle of the 2nd cent. (Lipsius p. 333 ff.). The further problem as to the relation of the Grundschrift of the catholic Acts to the Grundschrift of the Gnostic Acts appears to elude criticism.

A Latin Passio Apostolorum Petri et Pauli (Lipsius, Acta pp. 223–234) need not be discussed at any length. It gives an account of the conflict between the apostles and Simon Magus, dealing rather with miracles than with theology. Clement (not Agrippa) appears as the præfectus urbis. The date, according to Lipsius, is the end of the 6th or the beginning of the 7th century.

The Quo vadis legend. The story is found in the Gnostic Acts—in the Linus-text (vi) and in the μαρτύριον (vi); there is a lacuna here in the Cod. Vercellensis. It runs thus in the Linus-text, the important words in the Greek text being added: 'Ut autem portam ciuitatis uoluit egredi, uidit sibi Christum occurrere. Et adorans eum ait: Domine quo uadis? (Κύριε, ποῦ ὑπάγεις). Respondit ei Christus: Romam uenio iterum crucifigi (ἔρχομαι εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην σταυροῦσθαι). Et ait ad eum Petrus: Domine, iterum crucifigeris? (Κύριε, πάλιν σταυροῦσαι;). Et dixit ad eum dominus: Etiam iterum crucifigar. Petrus autem dixit: Domine, reuertar et sequar te. Et his dictis dominus ascendit in cælum.' In the catholic Acts Peter relates the story after he has been nailed to the cross. The Latin (61) is: 'Dixi: Domine, quo uadis? Et dixit mihi: Sequere me, quia uado Romam iterum crucifigi. Et dum sequerer eum, redii Romam. Et dixit mihi: Noli timere, quia ego tecum sum, quousque introducam te in domum patris mei.' In pseudo-Ambrose (Serm. contr. Aux. ii. 867, ed. Bened.) the words are: 'Domine, quo uadis?' 'Venio iterum crucifigi.' It seems probable that the story had its origin in a reminiscence of the conversation recorded in Jn 13[36-38] (Κύριε, ποῦ ὑπάγεις; Latt. Domine, quo uadis?) and an agraphon preserved by Origen (in Joan xx. 12, ed. Brooke ii. p. 51)—'If any one will accept the saying recorded in the Acts of Paul as spoken by the Saviour, ἄνωθεν μέλλω σταυροῦσθαι.' The Acts of Paul is apparently an early 2nd cent. document of orthodox origin, and belongs to a different group of writings from the Gnostic Acts of Peter (Zahn, Ges. Kan. II. ii. p. 865 ff.). It is plain from the context in Origen that in the Acts of Paul the saying had no application to St. Peter. Origen quotes in the context He 6[5f.], Gal 2[19]. Possibly the Acts of Peter and the Acts of Paul alike derived the saying from 'an earlier document, probably the Preaching of Peter' (Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 25). It seems probable, then, that the conversation of our Lord and St. Peter in Jn 13 suggested a scene in which this saying was dramatized. Further, Zahn (ib.) is inclined to think that the ambiguous word ἄνωθεν (=denuo, desuper) suggested the story that Peter was crucified head downwards. The explanation does not seem a natural one. It is far more likely that the mode of death was one of the 'addita ludibria' of which Tacitus speaks.

9. The Clementine Literature.—(i.) Documents. These are three in number. (a) The Homilies in Greek. Two MSS only are known to exist—the one at Paris, the other at the Vatican. (b) The Recognitions. The Greek original has perished. The Latin rendering by Rufinus, preserved in a large number of MSS, a Syriac translation of part of the work, and an Arabic abridgment printed in Studia Sinaitica v., form the extant authorities for the text. Rufinus, in the preface to his translation, notes incidentally that the Greek original was extant in two forms. He further tells us that, while he had deliberately omitted some passages as obscure, he had aimed at a close, if bald, rendering. It may be added that a comparison between his version and the Syriac version generally confirms his statement. (c) Of far less importance than the two documents just mentioned is the Epitome—a late abridgment of the Homilies. The three Clementine works may be conveniently studied in Migne's Patrologia Græca, vols. i., ii.

(ii.) Substance. The romance of Clement's life—his early separation from his family and his ultimate discovery of them—need not detain us. Peter is the great opponent of Simon Magus, and long discourses addressed to his own disciples or to inquirers, or directed against Simon, are put into his mouth. The story in regard to Peter is, in outline, as follows. In the seventh year after the Passion, Clement finds Peter at Cæsarea, where the latter, having been sent thither by James, is about to hold a disputation with Simon Magus. After three days' discussion Simon is driven away by the populace. Peter follows Simon to Tripolis, according to the Recognitions; according to the Homilies, to Tyre, and thence to Sidon, Berytus, Byblus, and so to Tripolis. At Antioch Simon meets with great success, but is at length driven thence by a report that Cornelius the centurion had arrived armed with an imperial commission to destroy all sorcerers. Simon flies to the neighbouring town of Laodicea, where in the Homilies the scene of the great disputation between Peter and Simon is laid. In the Homilies the story ends with Peter's departure for Antioch; in the Recognitions, with his enthusiastic reception by the people there after the expulsion of Simon.

(iii.) Date and character. The documents which we possess exhibit different forms of a religious romance, written in the interests of a philosophical Ebionitism. The anti-Pauline element is strong in the Homilies. Under the character of Simon Magus, St. Paul is attacked (e.g. xvii. 19). The same tone of hostility to the work and teaching of St. Paul dominates the letter of Peter to James, § 2, which is prefixed to the Homilies. In the Recognitions this controversial element is omitted or softened down, the invective dealing only with St. Paul's action before his conversion (i. 70 f.). The doctrine of the Homilies is akin to that of the Elchasaite sect, which, according to Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. ix. 13), established itself at Rome during the episcopate of Callistus. The Recognitions is quoted by Origen (Comm. in Genesim ap. Philoc. xxiii. 21, and Comm. in Matth. xxvi. 6 f., ed. Lommatzsch iv. p. 401). The evidence, though slight, points to the first quarter of the 3rd cent. as the period to which the Clementine literature as we possess it should probably be assigned. From what place did it emanate? The claim of Rome is negatived by the almost entire absence of any reference to a visit of Simon to the city, and his conflict with the apostle there. The allusions to Rome as the final scene of the controversy (Recog. i. 13, 74, iii. 64; Hom. i. 16) are so incidental in character that they may well be the interpolation of a later editor, the writer, for example, who composed the Epistle of Clement to James, prefixed to the Homilies, in which an account of Clement's ordination at Rome as bishop by Peter is given. The scene of the story is confined within the boundaries of Syria, and it is therefore antecedently probable that Syria was the region in which the Clementine literature had its first home. This conclusion is confirmed by the character of the NT quotations, which appear to be derived from a Semitic document, whether an Aramaic Gospel or a Syriac version of the Gospels. One point, however, seems clear, viz. that the Recognitions and the Homilies are independent recastings of a common original, or of (closely related) common original documents. The relation of this document or these documents to the Periodi Clementis, to which Jerome (adv. Jovin. i. 26; in Gal. i. 18) refers for details about Peter which are not found in our Clementines, and to the κήρυγμα Πέτρου (see below), must remain with our present evidence an unsolved problem. The question of primary interest is: What did the original story or document on which the Clementines are based include? Was its subject the conflict between Peter and Simon in Syria only? Or did it relate an earlier conflict in Syria and a final conflict at Rome? In other words, do the Clementines and the Petrine Acts respectively depend on independent documents, the one narrating the conflict between Peter and Simon in the East, the other dealing with their final meeting in the West? or do they severally elaborate two parts of one common history? The former is the opinion of Salmon (Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. p. 685), the latter that to which Lipsius inclines (Apokr. Apostelg. II. i. p. 38 f.). It may be noticed that, while there are in the Clementines (see above) a few references to the Roman episode, on the other hand allusions are to be found in the Petrine Acts (Actus Petr. cum Simone v., Martyr. Petri et Pauli 17) to the Syrian conflict; but all these allusions are too slight to bear the weight of any conclusions. The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 8, 9) contains the whole story of Peter and Simon,—the story of a conflict in Syria with points of contact with the Clementine history, and the story of a conflict in Rome with points of contact with that of the Acts. It seems less unlikely that here we come upon a relic of a complete story than that we have here a piecing together of two stories, which were originally independent. Of the precise doctrinal position of the original document it is vain to speculate. If the original story did follow St. Peter to Rome, there is a doctrinal reason why the Ebionite Clementine writers should refuse to acquiesce in the tradition that St. Paul and St. Peter worked at Rome together. That the original romance was early, there can be no doubt. Bishop Lightfoot held (Clement i. 361) that it 'cannot well be placed later than the middle of the 2nd century.'

10. Non-Canonical writings ascribed to St. Peter.—Eusebius (HE III. iii.), after mentioning the two Epistles which have a place in the Canon (see separate articles), proceeds to speak of other writings connected with Peter's name—the Acts of Peter (see above), the Gospel according to Peter, the Preaching of Peter, and the Apocalypse. These, he adds, 'we do not acknowledge as handed down to us among the Catholic writings, for no Church writer, either in ancient times or in our own, ever made use of the testimonies they supply' (cf. III. xxv.). To this list Jerome (de Virr. Illustr. 1) adds the Judicium.

(1) The Gospel of Peter.—A portion of what is universally agreed to have been the Petrine Gospel mentioned by Eusebius was found among the Akhmîm fragments, and published by M. Bouriant in Nov. 1892. The fragment begins with a reference to our Lord's trial before Pilate and Herod, and then gives an account of the mockery, the crucifixion, the burial, and the resurrection. The author writes in the first person (cc. vii. xii.), and identifies himself with Peter: 'But I Simon Peter and Andrew my brother' (c. xiv.). The Gospel is the subject of a letter written by Serapion, who was bishop of Antioch during the last decade of the 2nd cent., and preserved by Eusebius (HE vi. 12). Serapion had found the Gospel at Rhosus on the Bay of Issus, and had at first approved it. Further knowledge, however, led him to condemn it on the double ground that it owed its origin to the Docetæ, and that it contained additions to 'the true teaching about the Saviour.' The fact that Serapion, a man of literary and controversial activity, did not know of the Gospel before his accidental discovery of it, that no other 2nd cent. writer is proved to have used it, and that few later writers were acquainted with it, and these only men in some way connected with Syria, shows that its circulation and influence were confined within narrow limits. As to its date, Harnack holds that in the fragment the four Gospels are not placed on the same level, Mt probably not being used at all, and that the Petrine Gospel was used by Justin. These considerations seem to him to point to the beginning of the 2nd cent. (cf. Sanday, Inspiration (1893) p. 310, 'hardly later than the end of the first quarter of the 2nd cent.'). On the other hand, it is by no means certain that Justin used the Gospel; their undoubted connexion can be explained in other ways. And, further, the text of the Gospels had already had a history before it was used by the author of the Petrine Gospel; indeed there is strong reason to think that he used a harmony of the Gospels, that of Tatian or some earlier harmony, at least for the portion of the history covered by the extant fragment.* The implied text, then, of the Gospels suggests that the date can hardly be much before 150 (so Swete: Zahn 130), while a limit in the other direction is supplied by the fact that the Gospel had been in existence some time before Serapion discovered it. See the editions of Bouriant, Lods, Robinson (1892), Harnack, Zahn, Swete (1893); also von Schubert, Die Composition des pseudopetrinischen Evangelienfragments, 1893; Salmon, Introduction, Appendix (1894) p. 581 ff.

(2) The Preaching of Peter (κήρυγμα Πέτρου).—It is probable that this document is quoted by Origen (de Princ. Præf. 8) under the title 'Petri doctrina'†; it is possible that it is to be identified with the 'Prædicatio Petri et Pauli,' quoted by Lact. Instit. Div. iv. 21, comp. pseudo-Cyprian de Rebapt. 17. The extant fragments of the Preaching are collected in Hilgenfeld's NT extra Canonem (1884) iv. p. 51 ff., and in von Dobschütz, 'Das Kerygma Petri kritisch untersucht' (1893; Texte u. Unters. xi. 1).* It is clear from what has come down to us that the book gave—not a single discourse, but—the substance of discourses by one speaking in the name of the apostles (the first person plural is always used†). It deals with the τρίτον γένος among Jews and Gentiles, insisting on a pure monotheism as opposed to the errors of Judaism and of heathenism alike, and incorporating directions of our Lord in reference to the evangelization of the Gentiles. Clement of Alexandria (cf. Heracleon ap. Origen, in Ev. Joh. Tom. xiii. 17) regards the spokesman of the apostles throughout as Peter; and further, having the whole book before him, he implies that it claimed to be written by Peter—ὁ Πέτρος γράφει (Strom. vi. 7, p. 769 ed. Potter; comp. Origen's question in the passage just referred to—πότερόν ποτε γνήσιόν ἐστιν ἢ νόθον ἢ μικτόν). The Preaching exercised a wide influence. It was apparently used among others by Apollonius of Asia Minor (ap. Eus. HE v. xviii. 14) at the end of the 2nd cent., Heracleon, the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin, Aristides (Robinson in Texts and Studies i. 1, p. 86 ff.). Its date must therefore be very early. Harnack, holding that Egypt was the birthplace of the book, gives its date as 110–130 (140); Zahn as 90–100. Von Dobschütz suggests that in the first decade of the 2nd cent. a Christian at Alexandria felt that St. Mark's Gospel (ending at 16^8) needed a supplement, and wrote the Preaching as a δεύτερος λόγος, and further that from it the 'shorter ending' of Cod. L (Swete, St. Mark p. xcvii ff.) is derived. For further information see von Dobschütz, 'Das Kerygma Petri' (Texte u. Untersuch. xi. 1, 1893); Harnack, Die Chronologie, 1897, pp. 472–474; Zahn, Geschichte des NT Kanons, 1892, II. ii. pp. 820–832; Salmon, art. 'Preaching of Peter,' in Dict. Chr. Biog. (vol. iv. 1887); Hilgenfeld, NT extra Can. Rec., ed. altera, 1884, iv. pp. 50–65.

(3) The Apocalypse of Peter.—A considerable fragment of the Apocalypse of Peter was discovered and published with the fragment of the Gospel. Before 1892 only some half dozen small fragments were known to exist (see, e.g., Zahn, Ges. Kan. II. ii. p. 818). The Akhmîm fragment begins in the middle of a sentence containing apocalyptic words put into our Lord's mouth. The apostles—'we, the twelve disciples'—then go into the 'mountain' with the Lord to pray, and ask to see one of the righteous who had 'departed from the world,' 'in order that . . . being encouraged we may encourage also the men who hear us.' In answer to Peter's questions the Lord reveals the place of happiness and the place of torment, in which punishments are meted out to various classes of sinners. It appears from the reference to the apostles' hearers that they had received a command to teach; but a time during the Lord's ministry is perhaps less in harmony with the supposed situation than a time after the resurrection. The Apocalypse of Peter is mentioned in the Muratorian fragment (unless the passage is corrupt; see p. 780). Clement of Alexandria quotes it three or four times, once as Scripture (Ecl. ex Scrip. Proph. xli.); and, according to Eusebius, he commented on it. Thus there is good ground for regarding the Apocalypse as a 2nd cent. document, especially if it is allowed that it was used in the

* The present writer has elsewhere (The Old Syriac Element in the Text of Cod. Bezæ p. 121 ff.) given reasons for thinking that 'behind those parts of the fragment which are based on the Canonical Gospels there lie the corresponding sentences of the Syriac Diatessaron.'

† This is to be distinguished from the διδασκαλία Πέτρου referred to by later Greek Fathers. Von Dobschütz (p. 107) identifies this Peter with Peter of Alexandria.

* The 'Preaching of Peter' in an Arabic MS, published by Mrs. Gibson in Studia Sinaitica No. v., has no connexion with the Preaching under discussion.

† The first person singular is used in one fragment (Hilgenfeld p. 57, l. 23); but this fragment is derived ἐκ τῆς διδασκαλίας Πέτρου (von Dobschütz p. 118; cf. Holl, Fragmente vornican Kirchenväter (1899) p. 234).

Acts of Thomas (ed. Bonnet, p. 39) and in the Passion of St. Perpetua (James, p. 60 f.). Zahn, writing before the publication of the Akhmîm fragment, lays stress on the fact that Origen shows no sign of having known the Apocalypse, that Clement may have derived his knowledge of it from his Hebrew teacher, that several notices of it seem to connect it with Palestine, and he therefore thinks that Palestine was its birthplace. On the other hand, the coincidences with the Pistis Sophia, both in vocabulary and matter, seem to make an Egyptian origin more probable. The text has been edited by Bouriant, James, Lods (1892), Harnack (1893); see Zahn, Ges. Kan. II. ii. p. 810 ff.; Salmon, Introduction to NT, Appendix (1894) p. 589 f.

(4) Jerome in de Virr. Illustr. i. 5 mentions the Judicium among the apocryphal books which bear St. Peter's name. Rufinus, in Symb. Apost. 38, gives the Libri Ecclesiastici which belong to the NT as 'libellus qui dicitur Pastoris siue Hermes, qui appellatur Duæ Viæ uel Judicium Petri.' It seems probable that Jerome and Rufinus have the same document in mind. Further, the whole list of books in Rufinus appears to be based upon the list given in the Festal Epistle of Athanasius, who couples together 'the so-called Teaching of the Apostles and the Shepherd.' It is probable that the Judicium Petri was a Latin document, in which Peter alone was represented as the speaker, corresponding to the Greek document αἱ διαταγαὶ αἱ διὰ Κλήμεντος καὶ κανόνες ἐκκλησιαστικοὶ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων. See Hilgenfeld, NT extra Can. Rec. iv. p. 111 ff.; Salmon, Introduction p. 554; Harnack, Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel p. 193 ff.

(5) An 'Epistle of Peter to James' is prefixed to the Clementine Homilies, and is thoroughly Ebionite in its teaching.

IV. Reconstruction of the later History of St. Peter.—Except the testimony of 1 Peter, we have in the NT no clear evidence as to the apostle's movements after St. Paul's notice in Gal 2. What evidence the NT supplies as to later times is negative. But the tradition of the Church and the statements of early writers, together with the evidence of 1 Peter, give a basis for conclusions which reach a very high degree of probability. An endeavour will now be made to interpret the evidence as to the three following points—(1) St. Peter's visit to Rome; (2) the Simonian legend; (3) the period which succeeded the 'Council' at Jerusalem.

1. St. Peter's visit to Rome.—Of those who deny that St. Peter visited Rome, Lipsius may be taken as the type. His interpretation of the evidence is given in his great work, Die Apokr. Apostelgeschichten II. ii. pp. 1–69 (1887), where he embodies the results of his previous investigations—Quellen der römischen Petrussage, arts. in Schenkel's Bibellexikon, arts. in Jarhrb. f. protest. Theologie (1876). His theory is briefly as follows. The tradition of St. Peter's presence at Rome takes two forms. The one brings St. Peter and St. Paul together at Rome; together they found the Church there, and together they suffer. The other represents St. Peter as the opponent of the false apostle, Simon Magus, who is St. Paul under a thin disguise; as pursuing him from land to land and finally in Rome triumphing over him, and then dying a martyr's death. The first form of the legend may be called the Petro-Pauline legend, the second the Simonian. Since the two agree in bringing the apostle to Rome, they cannot be independent; and the question at once arises—Which is the original form? The Petro-Pauline legend corresponds to the Gentile view of the relation of the two apostles: they are friends and fellow-workers. The Simonian legend answers to the Jewish conception, according to which St. Paul is 'the enemy.' Now the latter view is historically prior to the former. It follows, therefore, that the Simonian legend is the earlier, and that it is the parent of the Petro-Pauline tradition. The one historical basis of the whole structure of romance is the visit of St. Paul to Rome. On this is built up the fabric of St. Peter's visit to Rome; and, since the first builders were Ebionites, St. Paul becomes Simon Magus. This anti-Pauline legend is alone responsible for the tradition that Simon Magus taught in Rome, and further fixed the date of his arrival there under Claudius. For St. Peter went there after the twelve years' of preaching at Jerusalem were over, and with his arrival that of his opponent was made to coincide. Such is the theory. It is open to attack from many quarters. It is blind to the many-sidedness and unanimity of early testimony, and in particular it is driven to explain away the evidence of Clement, while it rejects the authenticity of 1 Peter. On the other hand, it accounts for this general concurrence of witnesses by the hypothesis of a romance whose genesis was a complex and highly artificial process. But, in fact, Lipsius' theory is really an offshoot of the Tübingen theory of the apostolic age. The main trunk is now seen to be lifeless. The branch cannot but share its decay.

The strength of the case for St. Peter's visit to, and martyrdom at, Rome lies not only in the absence of any rival tradition, but also in the fact that many streams of evidence converge to this result. We have the evidence of official lists and documents of the Roman Church, which prove the strength of the tradition in later times, and which, at least in some cases, must rest on earlier documents. The notice of the transference of the apostle's body to a new resting-place in 258, and the words of Caius, show that the tradition was definite and unquestioned at Rome in the first half of the 3rd cent. The fact that Caius in the passage referred to is arguing with an Asiatic opponent, the evidence of the (Gnostic) Acts of Peter, the passages quoted from Origen, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, show that at the same period the tradition was accepted in the Churches of Asia, of Alexandria, and of Carthage. The passage of Irenæus carries the evidence backward well within the 2nd cent., and is of special importance as coming from one who had visited Rome, whose list of Roman bishops suggests that he had had access to official documents, and who, through Polycarp, was in contact with the personal knowledge of St. John and his companions. The testimony of Clement of Rome seems clear when his words are examined, while at the same time it is not definite and circumstantial enough to have created a legendary history. This concurrence of apparently independent testimony becomes much more impressive when it is remembered that the NT supplies nothing which could give rise to a legend that St. Peter visited Rome. On the contrary, the narrative of the Acts and the notices in St. Paul's later Epistles seem to make such a visit improbable. Moreover, the one clear statement as to place in 1 P literally interpreted becomes a conclusive argument that the apostle's work in his later years lay in a region far from Rome. It is only when the words of 1 P 5^{13} receive the less obvious, but in reality more natural, interpretation that they are seen to be a strong confirmation of the evidence of early writers. Thus the main pieces of evidence are independent and consistent. When combined they form a solid body of proof which is practically irresistible.

But if St. Peter was martyred at Rome (apart from the indications of date in 1 P, on which see following art.), there is no reason to question the belief that he suffered during the Neronian persecution. This is distinctly asserted by Tertullian; it is presupposed in all forms of the Petrine Acts; it is implied in Caius' notice of the tomb on the Vatican; it is the almost necessary inference from Clement's words.

Again, what was the length of his sojourn at Rome? The tradition of a 25 years' episcopate is unhistorical. But that legend crystallized, while it exaggerated, the widespread belief that the apostle spent time enough at Rome to leave his mark upon the Church there. Such a tradition finds early expression in the language of Irenæus, of Dionysius of Corinth, probably also in the words of Ignatius. It is implied in the early accounts of the composition of St. Mark's Gospel.

To what reconstruction of the history does the evidence point? It seems impossible to suppose that St. Peter had already worked in Rome when St. Paul wrote the Ep. to the Romans (1$^{11ff.}$ 15$^{22ff.}$), or when at a later time he expressed his desire 'to see Rome' (Ac 19^{21}). Moreover, the account of St. Paul's arrival in Rome (Ac 28$^{14ff.}$) seems to exclude the possibility of St. Peter's having been in the city at that time. Thus it seems certain St. Peter had not visited Rome when St. Paul's captivity there began. The evidence of the Epistles of both the Pauline captivities is also negative. If St. Peter had been in the city when St. Paul wrote to the Philippians, and again to the Colossians and Philemon, his description in the one case of the fortunes of the gospel at Rome, and in the other of his own environment, could hardly have been uninfluenced by the fact. We turn to the one Epistle of the second captivity. If we accept the constant tradition of the Church that St. Paul suffered in the Neronian persecution (i.e. shortly after July 64), 2 Ti can hardly be placed in the year 64; for the apostle seems to look forward to a winter not far distant (ταχέως, πρὸ χειμῶνος, 4$^{9.\ 21}$). It appears, therefore, that 2 Ti was written some two or three months before the winter of 63 closed the seas. The language of this Epistle (4$^{10ff.}$) shows that St. Peter was not in Rome when it was written. The supposition that he arrived in Rome for the first time after 2 Ti was written hardly allows the time which the early patristic notices of his work there (see above) postulate. We are led, therefore, to the conclusion that St. Peter's arrival at Rome must in all probability be placed after the last of the Epistles of St. Paul's first captivity, and long enough before 2 Ti to allow St. Peter to have left the city when that Epistle was written, after having worked there some considerable time. Early tradition, however, gives us one further clue to the time. The two apostles worked together. Now it is almost impossible to suppose that, after St. Paul had once taken the apostolic oversight of the Church's work in Rome, St. Peter could, apart from St. Paul, have planned to visit there. But did the suggestion that he should come to Rome reach St. Peter from St. Paul himself? It is abundantly clear (1) that St. Paul's mind was set on averting any rupture between Jewish and Gentile Christians, and on welding them together in the one Church (Hort, Ecclesia p. 281 ff.); (2) that in his view Rome was the key to the evangelization of the empire; (3) that he was keenly alive in his own case to the importance of one who was the unique representative of one side of the Church's work visiting now the Mother Church at Jerusalem, now the Church in the capital of the empire; (4) that the problem of reconciling the two great elements in the Church presented itself in a concrete form in Rome (Ph 1$^{15ff.}$), and that in Rome he grasped, as even he had never done before, the greatness of the issues involved (Eph 2^{11}–4^{16}). His evangelistic policy could find no truer or more practical expression than a request to St. Peter to visit Rome while he himself was still there. Such an invitation would be a fitting corollary of the Ep. to the Ephesians. If the Churches saw the Apostle of the Gentiles and the leader of the Apostles of the Circumcision taking counsel together and working together at Rome, they would learn the lesson of the unity of the Church as they could learn it in no other way. Moreover, St. Paul looked forward to his captivity soon ending. Even if he were set at liberty, he was pledged to undertake distant journeys. Whatever, therefore, the issue might be, the Church in Rome would be deprived of his immediate guidance; and as the far-reaching needs and opportunities of that Church pressed on him, he might well realize how manifold would be the gain resulting from the presence there of St. Peter. It is therefore a conjecture, but a conjecture supported by no inconsiderable amount of indirect evidence, that St. Paul summoned St. Peter to Rome. It is possible that St. Mark, whom we know to have been the companion of St. Peter, was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians as the messenger and the forerunner of St. Peter. If this account of St. Peter's visit to Rome is correct, it will follow that he arrived there towards the end of St. Paul's first captivity, perhaps in the spring of 61. His absence from Rome when St. Paul wrote 2 Ti we may perhaps explain on the supposition that he had been summoned to Jerusalem in connexion with the death of St. James and the appointment of his successor.* He must have returned to Rome before July 64.

2. The Simonian legend.—The most probable account of its genesis is that it grew out of a mistaken identity (Salmon, art. 'Simon Magus,' in Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. p. 682 ff.). With the Simon of Ac 8 another Simon of Samaria was confused. This latter Simon was a Gnostic teacher, who probably lived at the end of the 1st cent. The confusion meets us as early as Justin Martyr, who, expressing probably a general opinion, gave the latter Simon a kind of primacy among heretics. He either himself visited Rome or gained a reputation there through his followers The strange blunder about the statue can hardly have been a private aberration of Justin's, since it is found in the Gnostic Acts of Peter†—a document which seems to be quite independent of Justin's influence. But when once Simon Magus had been promoted to the first place among heretics, it was natural that the conflict between him and the chief of the apostles, related in the Acts, should be prolonged into a drama of controversy, the earlier scenes of which were laid in the towns of Syria, while the final denouement was reserved for Rome, which both combatants were believed to have visited. In the development of the story considerations of time were boldly disregarded. On the one hand, the last scenes of the drama had to be enacted in the reign of Nero in order to connect them with the fact that St. Peter suffered under that emperor. On the other hand, it was natural to bring Simon to Rome not so very long after the events recorded in the Acts—in the reign of Claudius (Justin, Apol. i. 26); and it seemed fitting that St. Peter

* Eus. HE III. xi.: μετὰ τὴν Ἰακώβου μαρτυρίαν καὶ τὴν αὐτίκα γενομένην ἅλωσιν τῆς Ἱερουσαλὴμ λόγος κατέχει τῶν ἀποστόλων κ. τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν τοὺς εἰσέτι τῷ βίῳ λειπομένους ἐπὶ ταὐτὸ πανταχόθεν συνελθεῖν κ.τ.λ. Eusebius places the death of St. James immediately before the siege of Jerusalem, according to the statement of Hegesippus (ap. HE II. xxiii. 18). Josephus (Ant. xx. ix. 1), however, puts it between the death of Festus and the arrival of Albinus. It seems that the latest date which can be assigned to Albinus' entrance on his office is the summer of 62 (Schürer, HJP I. ii. p. 188 n.).

† Actus Petri x.: [Simon] me tantum suasit ut statuam illi ponerem, suscribtioni tali: 'Simoni iuueni deo.'

should go to Rome when the expiration of the twelve appointed years set him free to leave Jerusalem (Actus Petri v. ed. Lipsius p. 49). Somewhat thus does it seem probable that the legend grew, and, as was natural, assumed somewhat different forms—e.g. Simon in the Clementines is rather the heretic, in the Petrine Acts the magician. The final stage in the evolution of the story was reached when Simon was utilized by the Ebionites for a covert attack on St. Paul.

3. The period which succeeded the Council at Jerusalem.—Setting aside, then, the Simonian legend as historically worthless, we are brought to the question—What is the probable account of St. Peter's life after the events at Antioch related by St. Paul in Gal 2 (i.e. probably A.D. 50) and St. Peter's arrival in Rome (i.e. probably A.D. 61). The absence of any trace of personal knowledge of the Churches in Asia Minor in the letter which the apostle addressed to them is a strong argument that he had not visited those districts. Though the tradition which connects St. Peter with the Syrian Antioch, and makes him the organizer of the Church there, does not (apart from the Clementine literature) meet us before the time of Origen, yet in itself it is probable. St. Paul's narrative in Gal 2 is too incidental and too little to St. Peter's credit to have originated a legend. On the other hand, it is natural to suppose that the Clementine literature, especially if its birthplace was Syria, located the apostle's conflict with Simon in towns in which a still living tradition preserved the memory of St. Peter's activity. We are most faithful to the suggestions of the somewhat scanty evidence if we suppose that, after he ceased to make Jerusalem his home, St Peter laboured in the towns of Syria, and not improbably made the Syrian Antioch the centre of his work.

It may be useful to state probable results in a tabular form—

A.D.
29–35	Ministry at Jerusalem: towards the close of the period a visit to Samaria (Ac $8^{14ff.}$).
35–44	Close of the ministry at Jerusalem: a missionary journey in which periods of somewhat protracted residence at Lydda, Joppa, Cæsarea, and probably other Syrian towns, had a place: somewhat frequent visits to Jerusalem (Ac 11^{2}, Gal 1^{18}, Ac $12^{25ff.}$).
44–61	Work in Syrian towns with Antioch as its centre: at least one visit to Jerusalem in 49 (Ac 15^{7}), but such visits few.
61–64	Work at Rome, interrupted probably by a visit to Jerusalem (Eus. HE III. xi.): martyrdom shortly after the fire at Rome in July 64.

I. TRANSMISSION OF THE TEXT.—Little need be said on this subject. For the authorities—MSS and Versions—see art. JUDE (EPISTLE OF) in vol. ii. p. 799. Two statements, however, with special reference to 1 P must be added. (1) The Epistle is contained in the Syriac Vulgate (Peshiṭta); but there does not seem to be evidence as to any Old Syriac text. (2) Fragments of the Epistle are contained in the following Old Latin MSS—the Fleury palimpsest=h (1 P 4^{17}–5^{14}); the Munich fragments edited by Ziegler=q (1^{8-19} 2^{20}–3^{7} 4^{10}–5^{14}); Cod. Bobiensis=s (1^{1-12} 2^{4-10}; see Old Latin Biblical Texts, No. iv. pp. xx f., 46 ff.). As to Patristic evidence, citations from the Epistle are abundant, in Greek writers from the time of Polycarp onwards; in Latin writers from that of Tertullian. No serious critical problems are presented by the text.

II. RECEPTION IN THE CHURCH.—It will be convenient to trace the stream of evidence backwards. In all those catalogues of Canonical Books which belong to the 4th cent. and onwards, whether put forth by conciliar authority or found in the works of individual theologians, 1 P has a place. The only writer as to the favourableness of whose verdict there is any doubt is Theodore of Mopsuestia. In reference to him, Leontius of Byzantium (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 1365) states—αὐτήν τε τοῦ μεγάλου Ἰακώβου τὴν ἐπιστολὴν καὶ τὰς ἑξῆς τῶν ἄλλων ἀποκηρύττει καθολικάς. It seems probable (see Kihn, Theodor von Mopsuestia pp. 65 ff., 374 f.) that the language of Leontius is loose, and that nothing more is meant than that Theodore rejected James as well as the four Catholic Epistles—2 P, Jude, 1 and 2 Jn—which were not accepted by the Antiochene and the Syrian Churches. Of the grounds for this conclusion two may be mentioned. If Theodore had really rejected 1 P and 1 Jn, the general Council of Constantinople (553) would not have failed to reckon this among the reasons for their condemnation of him. On the other hand, Junilius (Instit. regularia i. 6, 7), whose statements as to the Canon reflect the views of Theodore (Kihn, p. 358 ff.), reckons beati Petri ad gentes prima among the books perfectæ auctoritatis. In the earlier half of the 4th cent. Eusebius includes this Epistle among the books 'generally received' (ἐν ὁμολογουμένοις, HE III. xxv. 2). In the earlier passage of the History (III. iii. 1) which deals with the Canon he makes the important statement—'this epistle the Fathers also of former days (οἱ πάλαι πρεσβύτεροι) have quoted in their writings as indisputably authentic.' The evidence of Eusebius as to the general acceptance of the Epistle is carried back something like a century in a passage from Origen's Commentary on St. John, quoted by Eusebius (HE VI. xxv. 8)—Πέτρος . . . μίαν ἐπιστολὴν ὁμολογουμένην καταλέλοιπεν. So far there has been no sign of divergence.

We are now brought to the writers who represent the great Churches of Christendom at the beginning of the 3rd and at the close of the 2nd cent. (1) Alexandria. Clement again and again quotes words from the Epistle as those of St. Peter. Thus Strom. iii. p. 562 ed. Potter, καὶ ὁ Πέτρος ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ τὰ ὅμοια λέγει "Ὥστε τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν καὶ ἐλπίδα εἶναι εἰς θεόν"; ib. iv. p. 622, ὁ Π. ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ φησὶν "Ὀλίγον ἄρτι, εἰ δέον, λυπηθέντες"; so with other formulæ of citation, Pæd. i. p. 124, iii. pp. 296, 303; Strom. iii. p. 544, iv. p. 584 f. Moreover, Clement's Hypotyposeis contained 'short expositions' of this as well as of the other Catholic Epistles and of the Epistle of Barnabas and the Apocalypse of Peter (Eus. HE VI. xiv. 1; Photius, Biblioth. 109); and some at any rate of his comments on 1 P remain translated and possibly edited by Cassiodorus (cf. Zahn, Forschungen iii. 133 ff.). (2) Carthage. Tertullian quotes and refers to the Epistle as the work of St. Peter. Thus de Orat. xx., 'De modestia quidem cultus et ornatus aperta præscriptio est etiam Petri, cohibentis eodem ore, quia eodem spiritu, quo Paulus' (1 P 3^{3}, 1 Ti 2^{9}); Scorpiace, xii., 'Petrus quidem ad Ponticos, Quanta enim, inquit, gloria,' etc. For other quotations and references see Rönsch, Das NT Tertullian's pp. 556–563. (3) South Gaul. Irenæus, a witness to the traditions of Asia Minor, Rome, and South

Gaul, quotes the Epistle by name, iv. 9. 2 (ed. Massuet), 'Et Petrus ait in epistola sua Quem non uidentes' . . .; iv. 16. 4 f., 'Propter hoc ait Dominus (Mt 12^{36} $5^{28.22}$) . . . Et propter hoc Petrus ait Non uelamentum' . . .; v. 7. 2 [after 1 Co $13^{9.12}$ has been quoted, Iren. continues], 'Hoc est quod et a Petro dictum est Quem cum non uideritis diligitis.' For anonymous references see Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons i. 1, p. 303 f. (4) Rome. When we turn to the Church of Rome we find the evidence very slight. Hippolytus on Dan. iv. 59 (p. 336 ed. Bonwetsch) uses language derived from 1 Co 2^9 and 1 P 1^{12} (εἰς ἃ καὶ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν τότε ἄγγελοι παρακύψαι). The reference is clear, and the juxtaposition with Pauline words shows that the phrase is regarded as scriptural. But it is not a case of definite quotation. In the Muratorian Canon there is no mention of 1 P. It seems, however, inconceivable that a document in which, e.g., the Epistle of Jude and a (supposed) letter of St. Paul to the Laodiceans find a place, should know nothing of an Epistle so widely accepted as 1 P, especially if Zahn's view is correct that the African Church received its NT from Rome (Ges. Kan. i. 1, p. 25 f.). The character of the fragment makes it quite possible that the apparent omission is due to the carelessness of a translator or of a scribe. But two other suggestions deserve consideration. (a) There is no formal mention of 1 Jn; but the opening words of the Epistle are cited in the passage of the fragment which deals with St. John's Gospel. It is probable, therefore, that the author of the Canon considered it unnecessary separately to mention an Epistle to which he had already incidentally referred. It is likely enough that 1 P 5^{13} was quoted in connexion with St. Mark's Gospel and its relation to St. Peter's preaching, with which the first sentence of the extant fragment appears to deal (see art. MARK). (b) Zahn (Ges. Kan. ii. 1, p. 110 n.) conjectures that a word and a line have fallen out in a later passage of the fragment, which he would restore thus: 'Apocalypsi(n) etiam Johannis et Petri [unam] tantum recipimus [epistulam; fertur etiam altera,] quam quidam ex nostris legi in ecclesia nolunt.' In any case, the Muratorian fragment being what it is, it is unreasonable to deduce rejection or ignorance of 1 P from its apparent silence.

The remains of the literature of the 2nd cent. supply abundant evidence of the influence of the language of the Epistle on persons widely separated from each other. (i.) Martyrdoms. In the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs (Robinson, The Passion of St. Perpetua p. 106 ff.) who suffered at Carthage in A.D. 180, we find the words, 'Donata dixit: Honorem Cæsari quasi Cæsari; timorem autem Deo,'—words which are closer to 1 P 2^{17} than to Ro 13^7. Again, in the Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (A.D. 177), preserved in Eus. HE v. i. f., there is an echo of 1 P 5^6 in the words ἐταπείνουν ἑαυτοὺς ὑπὸ τὴν κραταιὰν χεῖρα, ὑφ' ἧς ἱκανῶς νῦν εἰσιν ὑψώμενοι (ii. 5); of 1 P 5^8 in ἤδη δοκῶν ὁ διάβολος καταπεπωκέναι (i. 25), and in οὓς πρότερον ᾤετο [ὁ θὴρ] καταπεπωκέναι (ii. 6). (ii.) Apologists. The language of Theophilus, ad Autolycum ii. 34, τὸν δὲ ποιητὴν . . . τῶν ὅλων . . . ἀθετοῦσιν, πειθόμενοι δόγμασιν ματαίοις διὰ πλάνης πατροπαραδότου . . . οἱ [οἱ προφῆται] καὶ ἐδίδαξαν ἀπέχεσθαι ἀπὸ τῆς ἀθεμίτου εἰδωλολατρείας, recalls 1 P 2^{11} 1^{18} 4^3. When Justin Martyr, Dial. 103, dealing with Ps 22^{13}, suggests the alternative interpretation—ἢ λέοντα τὸν ὠρυόμενον ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἔλεγε τὸν διάβολον—he probably has in mind 1 P 5^8. (iii.) Heretics. There is some evidence that the Gnostic sects, who early broke away from the Catholic Church, were familiar with the Epistle—(a) the Marcosians (representatives of the Western school of the Valentinians), whose actual words Irenæus (I. 18. 3) seems to be reproducing, τὴν τῆς κιβωτοῦ δὲ οἰκονομίαν . . . ἐν ᾗ ὀκτὼ ἄνθρωποι διεσώθησαν, φανερώτατά φασι τὴν σωτήριον ὀγδοάδα μηνύειν (1 P 3^{20}); (β) the Eastern Valentinians, according to Clem. Alex., Excerpta ex Scriptis Theodoti lxxxvi., οὐ συνεισῆλθον εἰς τὰ ἡτοιμασμένα ἀγαθὰ, εἰς ἃ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἄγγελοι παρακύψαι (1 P 1^{12}); (γ) Basilides, according to Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 600, μηδὲ λοιδορούμενοι ὡς ὁ μοιχὸς ἢ ὁ φονεὺς, ἀλλὰ ὅτι χριστιανοί πεφυκότες (1 P $4^{14f.}$). (iv.) Ep. to Diognetus ix., αὐτὸς τὰς ἡμετέρας ἁμαρτίας ἀνεδέξατο, αὐτὸς τὸν ἴδιον υἱὸν ἀπέδοτο λύτρον ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν . . . τὸν δίκαιον ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδίκων; cf. 1 P 2^{24} 3^{18}. (v.) Hermas, Vis. iv. iii. 4, ὥσπερ γὰρ τὸ χρυσίον δοκιμάζεται διὰ τοῦ πυρὸς κ. εὔχρηστον γίνεται, οὕτως καὶ ὑμεῖς κ.τ.λ.; cf. 1 P 1^7, but see also Pr 17^3, Sir 2^5. Again, Vis. III. xi. 3, IV. ii. 4, 5 (ἐπιρίψατε τὰς μερίμνας ὑμῶν ἐπὶ τὸν κύριον); cf. 1 P 5^7, but more probably Ps 54 (55) ^{22} is the source. Thus the references to 1 P in Hermas are very doubtful. (vi.) Barnabas, xvi. 10, τοῦτό ἐστιν πνευματικὸς ναὸς οἰκοδομούμενος τῷ κυρίῳ; cf. 1 P 2^5. (vii.) Didaché i. 4, ἀπέχου τῶν σαρκικῶν καὶ σωματικῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν; cf. 1 P 2^{11}. (viii.) Papias. Eusebius, HE III. xxxix. 16, tells us of Papias—κέχρηται δ' αὐτὸς μαρτυρίαις ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Πέτρου ὁμοίως. Since Eusebius (HE IV. xiv. 9) uses similar language as to Polycarp (see below), we cannot infer from this notice that Papias did more than silently adopt Petrine expressions. It must, however, be remembered that the character of Papias' Expositions differed widely from that of Polycarp's Epistle. The latter is hortatory. The former dealt largely with matters of history and tradition. Thus Papias' use of 1 P is likely to have been of such a kind as to necessitate an explicit reference to the Epistle. These a priori considerations are confirmed by an examination of Eusebius' words elsewhere. In HE II. xv. 2, Eusebius, giving an account of the composition of St. Mark's Gospel, mentions a story (φασί) that St. Peter approved of the evangelist's action, and gave his authority to the Gospel. He then parenthetically gives his authorities—'Clement in the sixth book of the Hypotyposeis has recorded the story; and, further, the bishop of Hierapolis, by name Papias, confirms his testimony'—and at once proceeds (in the oratio obliqua): τοῦ δὲ Μάρκου μνημονεύειν τὸν Πέτρον ἐν τῇ προτέρᾳ ἐπιστολῇ, ἣν καὶ συντάξαι φασὶν ἐπ' αὐτῆς Ῥώμης, σημαίνειν τε τοῦτ' αὐτὸν τὴν πόλιν τροπικώτερον Βαβυλῶνα προσειπόντα διὰ τούτων Ἀσπάζεται κ.τ.λ. (1 P 5^{13}). From this somewhat confused passage we learn that Eusebius found three points noted in the writings either of Clement or of Papias or of both—(1) the reference to Mark in 1 P; (2) the composition of 1 P at Rome; (3) the allegorical use of the name Babylon in 1 P. Now, when we turn to the extant fragments of Clement's Hypotyposeis (ed. Potter p. 1007), we find that of these three points Clement mentions the former two and is silent as to the last. It appears, therefore, to be a just inference that in regard to this last Papias was Eusebius' authority. Moreover, that Papias' Expositions did contain a passage in which 1 P 5^{13} would naturally be appealed to, is certain from the words of Papias himself (ap. Eus. HE III. xxxix. 15)—οὔτε γὰρ ἤκουσε τοῦ κυρίου [Μᾶρκος] οὔτε παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὕστερον δὲ, ὡς ἔφην, Πέτρῳ—a passage which makes it clear that in the now lost portion of his work Papias gave a detailed account of Mark's connexion with St. Peter. If, then, 1 P 5^{13} was referred to in that earlier section of the Expositions in regard to Mark's presence with St. Peter at Rome, it follows that Papias must have appealed to the Epistle, and therefore have recognized it, as the work of St. Peter. (ix.) Polycarp (c. A.D. 115). There is a long series of coincidences between Polycarp's Epistle and 1 P—Ep. Polyc. i. εἰς ὃν οὐκ ἰδόντες πιστεύετε χαρᾷ ἀνεκλαλήτῳ καὶ δεδοξασμένῃ εἰς ἦν πολλοὶ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν εἰσελθεῖν ‖ 1 P 1[8. 12]; ii. διὸ ἀναζωσαμένοι τὰς ὀσφύας ‖ 1[13]; ii. πιστεύσαντες εἰς τὸν ἐγείραντα τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν καὶ δόντα αὐτῷ δόξαν ‖ 1[21]; ii. μὴ ἀποδιδόντες κακὸν ἀντὶ κακοῦ ἢ λοιδορίαν ἀντὶ λοιδορίας ‖ 3[9]; v. πᾶσα ἐπιθυμία κατὰ τοῦ πνεύματος στρατεύεται ‖ 2[11] (cf. Gal 5[17]); vii. νήφοντες πρὸς τὰς εὐχάς ‖ 4[7]; viii. ὃς ἀνήνεγκεν ἡμῶν τὰς ἁμαρτίας τῷ ἰδίῳ σώματι ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον, ὃς ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὑρέθη δόλος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ . . . τοῦτον γὰρ ἡμῖν τὸν ὑπογραμμὸν [sc. τῆς ὑπομονῆς] ἔθηκε δι' ἑαυτοῦ ‖ 2[24. 22. 21]; x. fraternitatis amatores diligentes inuicem . . . omnes uobis inuicem subiecti estote, conuersationem uestram irreprehensibilem habentes in gentibus, ut ex bonis operibus uestris, etc. ‖ 2[17] 1[22] 5[5] 2[12]. That Polycarp was thoroughly familiar with 1 P cannot be doubted. He does not, however, preface any of its words and phrases which he weaves into his letter with any formula of citation, nor does he ever mention St. Peter's name. Harnack (Die Chronologie, p. 463) therefore concludes that Polycarp did not regard the Epistle as the work of St. Peter, alleging that this Father deals differently with St. Paul, to whom he several times refers by name, and more than one of whose sayings he introduces with an εἰδότες ὅτι, clearly marking it thereby as a quotation. But, on the other hand, it may be urged—(1) that Polycarp uses, without any note of quotation, phrases derived from Clement's Epistle and from the Epistles of his master St. John (ch. vii., cf. 1 Jn 4[2ff.], 2 Jn [7]), as Harnack admits, and we must add phrases from the OT, the Acts, and from the Gospels; (2) that the phrase εἰδότες ὅτι in each case (chs. i. iv. v.; cf. ch. vi. εἰδότες ὅτι πάντες ὀφειλέται ἐσμὲν ἁμαρτίας) introduces an epigrammatic, axiomatic statement (cf. Ro 5[3] 6[9], 1 Co 15[58], 2 Co 1[7] 4[14] 5[6], Gal 2[16], Eph 6[8f.], Ph 1[16], Col 3[24] 4[1]), while the phrases quoted from 1 P are rather of a hortatory type; (3) that Polycarp is writing to a Church which St. Paul founded and to which he addressed an Epistle, and that it is in reference to these facts that he mentions St. Paul's name (chs. iii. ix. xi.); that on the one occasion when he appeals directly to the authority of St. Paul's writings (ch. xi., 'sicut Paulus docet'), it is for a statement which is of the nature of a revelation—Sancti mundum iudicabunt (1 Co 6[2]). Further, Polycarp's love for and familiarity with 1 P are a proof that he regarded the Epistle as a document of supreme interest and authority—a document which he had by heart; they must be interpreted in the light of the fact that Irenæus, his spiritual son, habitually refers to it as the letter of St. Peter. (x.) Clement of Rome, vii. ἀτενίσωμεν εἰς τὸ αἷμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ γνῶμεν ὡς ἔστιν τίμιον τῷ πατρὶ αὐτοῦ ‖ 1 P 1[19]; xxxvi. ἀναθάλλει εἰς τὸ θαυμαστὸν αὐτοῦ φῶς [so Codd. A C (om. αὐτοῦ), τὸ φῶς Syr., Clem. Alex.]; lix. δι' οὗ ἐκάλεσεν ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ σκότους εἰς φῶς, ἀπὸ ἀγνωσίας εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν κ.τ.λ. ‖ 1 P 2[9. 15]. Again, Clement uses the Petrine word ὑπογραμμός in reference to ὑπομονή (v.) and, after quoting Is 53, Ps 22, to Christ's humility (xvi.), cf. 1 P 2[21]. Further, in 1 P 4[8] we have Pr 10[12] quoted in the form ἀγάπη καλύπτει πλῆθος ἁμαρτιῶν, a form approximating to the Hebrew but widely different from the LXX. The Petrine rendering is found in Clem. xlix. and in 'the Ancient Homily' (2 Clem.) xvi. Again, Pr 3[34] (κύριος ὑπερηφάνοις ἀντιτάσσεται LXX, Heb. 'He') is quoted in Ja 4[6], 1 P 5[5], in the form ὁ θεὸς ὑπερηφάνοις κ.τ.λ. In this latter form the words are cited in Clem. xxx. (θεός), Ign. Eph. v. (ὑπερηφ. ὁ θεὸς ἀντιτάσσεται).

To sum up: 1 P is, with the single exception of 1 Jn, the only one among the Catholic Epistles 'of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church.' No sooner did a theological literature (properly so called) spring up in the Church than this Epistle is quoted by name as the work of St. Peter. In the earliest Christian literature outside the NT (i.e. A.D. 90–190) it is second only to the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles in the extent of the influence which it exercised on the language and thoughts of writers widely separated from each other in place and in circumstances. The testimony which these writers bear to the Epistle is indirect, with one probable exception. There is good reason for thinking that Papias referred to it explicitly as the Epistle of St. Peter. The only natural interpretation of the facts—the early and wide influence of the Epistle on the one hand, on the other the consistent and unwavering attribution of it to St. Peter on the part of all writers from Irenæus' time onward—is that from the first it was regarded as the work of that apostle.

III. USE OF THE LXX, VOCABULARY, LITERARY STYLE.—(i.) The thought and language of 1 P are deeply influenced by the OT, and the writer uses the OT in the LXX version. It is not possible to draw an absolute line between direct quotations and instances of mere appropriation of LXX language. In the former category the following passages may be conveniently classed—1[16] (Lv 11[44] 19[2] 20[7]), 1[24] (Is 40[6ff.]), 2[6-8] (Is 28[16], Ps 117 [118][22], Is 8[14]), 2[9f.] (Is 43[20f.], Ex 19[5f.] ‖ 23[22] [cf. Mal 3[17]], Hos 1[6. 8f.] 2[1 (3). 23 (25)]), 2[22. 24f.] (Is 53[9. 12. 5]), 3[10ff.] (Ps 33 [34][12ff.]), 4[8] (Pr 10[12]), 4[18] (Pr 11[31]), 5[5] (Pr 3[34]). When these quotations are examined textually, it appears that (1) the writer quotes from memory, this conclusion being suggested by the number of small variations and adaptations (see especially 3[10ff.]); (2) in one passage (2[6]) his reminiscence of the LXX is influenced by his remembrance of Ro 9[33]; (3) there is some slight evidence for the conclusion that the LXX text familiar to him resembled that found in ℵAQ rather than that given by B (cf. von Soden, Hand-Comm. p. 113); see 2[6] (+ ἐπ' αὐτῷ; but the addition may be due to Ro 9[33]), 2[22] (εὑρέθη δόλος); but note, on the other hand, 3[12] (+ ὅτι); (4) that in one passage (4[8]) he either himself formulates, or (in view of Ja 5[20]) more probably adopts, a revised translation of the Hebrew.

Apart from quotations, however, the writer continually weaves into his own language words and phrases which are (possibly unconscious) reminiscences of the LXX.

Most phrases of this kind are indicated by the use of uncial type in WH. To these may be added—1[2] εἰρήνη πληθυνθείη (Dn 3[98]), 1[13] ἀναζωσάμενοι . . . τὰς ὀσφύας (Pr 29[35]), 1[19] ἀμνὸς ἄμωμος (e.g. Ex 29[38]), 2[4] προσερχόμενοι (Ps 33 [34][6], see Hort's note), 2[24] τῷ σώματι αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον (Dt 21[23]), 3[13] τίς ὁ κακώσων (Is 50[9]), 5[6] ταπεινώθητε . . . ὑπὸ τὴν κραταιὰν χεῖρα (Gn 16[9] and e.g. Job 30[21]), λέων ὠρυόμενος (e.g. Ezk 22[25]). Moreover, the following words are probably derived from the LXX—ἀντίδικος, γυναικεῖος, ἐπίλοιπος, ἱεράτευμα, καταχαυνιεύειν, κατασπίνειν, κλῆροι, παραικία, πότος, πύρωσις, ῥαντισμός, ῥύπος, συντρέχειν (Ps 49 [50][18]). Again, not a few expressions suggest that the writer of the Epistle was acquainted with some books of the Apocrypha—ἀδελφότης (1 Mac twice, 4 Mac four times, in abstract sense), ἀθέμιτος (2 Mac thrice, 3 Mac once), ἐπίσκοπος ψυχῶν (cf. Wis 1[6] 3[13]), κτίστης (Jth once, Sir once, 2 Mac thrice, 4 Mac twice), πρόγνωσις (Jth twice), ὑπογραμμός (2 Mac once). The three epithets ἄφθαρτος, ἀμίαντος, ἀμάραντος (1[4]) occur in Wisdom; the combination ἐπιζητεῖν κ. ἐξερευνᾶν (1[10]) in 1 Mac 9[23].

(ii.) A rough analysis of the vocabulary of the Epistle seems to reveal four main elements—(a) With one of these, that derived from the LXX, we have already dealt. (b) There is the obvious Christian element, examples of which are φιλαδελφία (φιλάδελφος), χάρισμα. It is important to remember that, though St. Paul's Epistles are the earliest evidence for the use of such words as these in a specifically Christian sense, it does not follow that their currency was due to him, or that a writer who so uses them is proved thereby to be a literary debtor to him. (c) There is a considerable number of words and expressions in the Epistle which do not occur elsewhere in the NT, and which may be briefly described as classical.*

* For instances of verbal affinity with Philo see Salmon, Introduction[6] p. 505 f.

They are—ἀναγκαστῶς (Plato), ἀνάχυσις (Philo, Plut., Strabo), ἀντιλοιδορεῖν (Lucian., Plut.), ἀπέχεσθαι ἐπιθυμιῶν (Plato), ἀπογενέσθαι (Herod.), ἀπόθεσις (Plato, Arist. = 'laying up'), βιοῦν (Hom.), ἐμπλοκή (Strabo), ἐπικάλυμμα (Menand.), οἰνοφλυγία (Xen., Arist.; verb LXX twice), ὁμόφρων (Hom., Hes., Pind.), ὀκλίζειν (Herod., Thuc.), ὁ παριληλυθὼς χρόνος, πατροπαράδοτος (Dion H., Diod., Inscriptions; cf. Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien p. 94), προθύμως (Herod., Aesch.); cf. also ἔννοια (Plato, Arist., Polyb.) also in LXX, He 4[12], ἐπηρεάζειν (Xen., Dem., Arist.) found also in Lk 6[28].

(d) We notice in this Epistle a remarkable series of words for which there seems to be no earlier or contemporary authority—ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, ἀμαράντινος, ἀναγεννᾶν, ἀνεκλάλητος, ἀπροσωπολήμπτως, ἀρτιγέννητος (found, however, in Lucian), ἀρχιτοίμην (found, however, in 4 K 3[4] (Symm.) Test. xii. Patri. Jud. 8), ἐγκομβοῦσθαι, περιέχει ἐν γραφῇ, περίθεσις, προμαρτύρεσθαι, σθενοῦν, συνπρεσβύτερος, ὑπολιμπάνειν (but in Dion. H. = 'to fail').

The vocabulary, then, of the writer is a full one, including as it does words representing the several strata of the language. The proportion of classical words is large; so, too, is the list of words of which there is little or no independent attestation. None, however, of those which come under the last head strikes the reader as affected or odd. Each is correctly formed. The meaning of all but a very few words (e.g. ἐπερώτημα, ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος) is at once clear.

(iii.) The general style, like the vocabulary, shows that the writer within certain limits had a very considerable appreciation of, and power over, the characteristic usages of Greek.

The sentences are naturally linked to each other, and are impeded, as a rule, by no special difficulties of construction. They rise at times into a simple grandeur (e.g. 1[3-9. 17-21] 2[21-25] 5[6-10]). Passing to matters of detail, we note a keen sense of the significance of order, rhythm, and balance in the arrangement of words—e.g. 1[17-21] 2[11f.] 2[21] (ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, ὑμᾶς) 4[2. 12] 5[5]. Again, the letter is marked by a fulness and deliberateness of expression shown in (1) the writer's love of putting a fact or a duty first negatively and then positively, see 1[14. 18] 2[3] 2[16] 3[3. 9. 21] 4[2] 5[2f.]; (2) the skilful use of epithets and adverbial expressions, e.g. 1[3. 18. 22] 2[2]; (3) the expansion of a single idea by means of synonyms—1[4. 10f. 19] 2[8. 11. 25] 3[4. 8. 15. 22] 4[18] 5[8. 10]. Passages where the use of allied but contrasted words adds force or delicacy to the language are 1[5] (τετηρημένην . . . φρουρουμένους), 2[1] 3[7] (συναοῦντες . . . συνκληρονόμοι), 4[8-10] (ἑαυτοῖς . . ἀλλήλοις . . . ἑαυτούς), 5[7] (τὴν μέριμναν ὑμῶν . . . αὐτῷ μέλει). The tenses are used with marked exactness, and their force is often brought out by contrast, 1[5] (τετηρημένην, φρουρουμένους), 1[8] (ἰδόντες, ὁρῶντες), 1[11f.] (ἐδήλου, ἀπεκαλύφθη), 1[13] (ἀναζωσάμενοι, νήφοντες), 2[10] (ἠλεημένοι, ἐλεηθέντες), 2[17] (τιμῶσατε (the abstract rule), ἀγαπᾶτε, φοβεῖσθε, τιμᾶτε (the detailed fulfilment)), so also 2[13] (ὑποτάγητε), 2[18] 3[1] (ὑποτασσόμενοι), 4[10] (ἔλαβον, διακονοῦντες), 4[13] (χαίρετε, χαρῆτε). Again, the use of contrasted prepositions is often full of meaning, 1[2] (κατά, ἐν, εἰς), 1[3] (κατά, εἰς, διά), 1[5] (ἐν, εἰς; ἐν, διά), 1[21] (δι᾽, εἰς), 2[4] (ὑπό, παρά), 3[18] (περί, ὑπέρ). The meaning of the opening paragraph—the fulfilment of the Divine purpose in relation to Messiah and the Gentiles—largely depends on the pregnant use of the preposition εἰς ('reserved for,' 'destined for') in 1[5. 10. 11]. Again, it will be felt how much is involved in the double contrast between the plural and the singular in 4[2] ἀνθρώπων ἐπιθυμίαις, θελήματι θεοῦ (cf. Heracleon ap. Origen in Joan. tom. xx. 24, τὸν διάβολον μὴ ἔχειν βίλημα ἀλλ᾽ ἐπιθυμίας; cf. also 5[3] (τῶν κλήρων . . . τοῦ ποιμνίου)).

It is interesting to contrast this Epistle with the Pauline Epistles in regard to the imagery used. The figures are drawn from the associations of birth, childhood, and family life (1[3. 14. 17. 22f.] 2[2]), nomadic life (1[1. 17] 2[11]), temple and worship (2[5] 3[15]), building (2[4]), the fields and pastoral life (1[4 (24)] 5[2. 3]), military life (1[5] 2[11] 4[1]), painting (2[21]), working of metals (1[7] 4[12]). The writer differs from St. Paul in the lack of originality which his imagery shows—it is almost entirely derived from the OT: in the narrowness of its range: in its simplicity and brevity; no metaphor is expanded or permitted to lead on to side issues.

To sum up: the writer of the Epistle must have been a diligent student of the LXX, and was saturated with its language. In particular, it may be noted that his mind is constantly recurring to the Bk. of Proverbs. There is also reason for thinking that he was acquainted with some books of the Apocrypha. The nature and range of his vocabulary shows that he had considerable knowledge of, and power over, the resources of the Greek language; and this conclusion is confirmed when we note the delicacy and accuracy of his perception in regard to the rhythmical arrangement of words, the use of synonyms, and the management of tenses prepositions, etc. At the same time, there is no sign of any conscious effort after effect. We do not find here the trained rhetoric of the writer to the Hebrews, the impetuous, unstudied, eloquence of St. Paul, or the epigrammatic conciseness of St. James. Viewing the Epistle from a purely literary standpoint, we find its merit in the exact correspondence between its spirit and its form. The simple impressive language is the spontaneous expression of the writer's tender persuasiveness and calm logic.

IV. THE READERS TO WHOM THE EPISTLE WAS PRIMARILY ADDRESSED, AND THEIR CIRCUMSTANCES.—The Epistle is addressed to the Christians in the four Roman provinces which together coincided with the region which bears the modern name of Asia Minor. It has, indeed, been lately urged (Deissmann, Bibelstudien p. 244) that no letter, properly so called, could be addressed to communities scattered over so vast a district; the circulation of such an Epistle, it is said, would have taken up many years of the life of the messenger. Such a position, however, leaves out of sight the wonderful facilities for travel which Rome had created throughout the empire, as well as the fact that in St. Paul we have an instance of a Christian missionary who did plan and execute rapid tours of visitation over large districts (cf. e.g. Ac 15[41]–16[5] 18[22f.] (cf. 19[1]) 19[21]). Moreover, since the letter does not deal, as many of St. Paul's Epistles do, with controversy or business, or with matters of pressing local or personal importance, there would be no need for the messenger to deliver it immediately to all those to whom it was addressed. It would be sufficient if he communicated it to the several Churches in the provinces, as in the course of time he reached them. See also below, § 6.

From the question of their home we turn to the problem of their past. Is the letter addressed to those who had been converted to Christ from Judaism or from heathenism? The opinion that its readers were Jews by birth was held (as we infer from his language about St. Peter's travels) by Origen (quoted by Eus. HE III. i.), by Didymus of Alexandria, by Eusebius (HE III. iv. 2), and by the Greek Fathers generally. This consensus of ancient opinion was followed by many scholars between the Revival of Learning and the present century—Erasmus, Calvin, Grotius, and Bengel. Among critics of the last half century it has won the constant and earnest support of B. Weiss (e.g. Der petrinische Lehrbegriff, 1855, p. 99 ff.; Introd. to NT, 1888, vol. ii. p. 137 ff., Eng. tr.), and recently of Kühl in his commentary in the Weiss-Meyer series. The two last mentioned scholars, it should be added, maintain their view as to the readers of the Epistle in close connexion with their conclusion as to the early date of the Epistle (see below). On the other hand, in ancient times Augustine (c. Faust. xxii. 89; Enarr. in Ps. 146 (147) 9) and Jerome (adv. Jovinian. 1[39]) held that the Epistle was addressed to Gentile Christians, though in de Virr. Illust. 1 the latter follows Origen in speaking of the apostle's 'prædicationem dispersionis eorum qui de circumcisione crediderant in Ponto'; and for this view recent critics of all schools have given a practically unanimous vote.

A brief examination of Kühl's arguments will serve to bring into prominence some important points. (1) The word διασπορᾶς in the salutation, it is said, is decisive; it must point to 'Jewish settlements' (cf. Ja 1[1])—an argument which convinced ancient opinion. As against this interpretation no stress can be laid on the absence of the article before διασπορᾶς; for in such a formula as a salutation prefixed to a letter the article is frequently omitted. The following considerations, however, seem to have decisive force on the other side. (a) In the clause itself the words παρεπίδημοι and διασπορά are kindred to each other, both dealing primarily with the manner of man's life on earth. Since the former is here used in a metaphorical sense (cf. 1^{17} 2^{11}), it would be harsh to take the latter literally. (b) The opening and the close of the Epistle cannot be interpreted independently of each other. There is an intentional correspondence between them. The phrase ἐκλεκτοῖς παρεπιδήμοις διασπορᾶς in 1^{1} answers to ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή in 5^{13}. The word διασπορά and the name Βαβυλών (=Rome, see art. BABYLON IN NT and, both published since that art. was written, Hort, 1 Peter pp. 6, 167 ff., and Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 19 ff.) are both expressions taken from the vocabulary created by Jewish history and afterwards transferred to the Christian Church. (c) Elsewhere in the Epistle language primarily applied to Israel is used of the Christian Church, see especially 2^{9}. (d) The Epistle itself supplies a comment on διασπορά used metaphorically in 5^{9} τῇ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ὑμῶν ἀδελφότητι; compare Jn 11^{52}, Didaché x. 5. These considerations further exclude Salmon's suggestion (Introd.[6] p. 442), that 'the Epistle was written to members of the Roman Church whom Nero's persecution had dispersed to seek safety in the provinces'—a suggestion which is also open to the objection that, while it is natural and intelligible to use a recognized term in a metaphorical sense, it cannot be said to be either natural or intelligible to give it a special application unless that application is explained or in some way indicated by the context. (2) The use of the OT without note of quotation in cases where the force of the words as proof depends on their recognition as derived from the OT, presupposes a familiarity with the OT which converts from heathenism would not possess. To this it may be replied—(a) that the Epistle contains no argumentative passage, and that a writer might well enforce an exhortation by an appeal to OT language which his readers would not fully appreciate; moreover, it is not denied that in the Churches of Asia Minor there was an element of Jewish converts; (b) that the force of Kühl's argument depends almost entirely on his further supposition that the Epistle is addressed to recent converts (see below). (3) Kühl adduces certain passages as proving the Jewish descent of those addressed. The words of Hosea quoted in 2^{10} were originally spoken to Jews; it is natural, therefore, it is said, that St. Peter should re-apply them to the Jews. In 2^{25} Kühl pleads that the correlative terms ἦτε πλανώμενοι and ἐπεστράφητε imply that those addressed had lapsed—an assertion not true of Gentiles. But Kühl's interpretation of both these passages assumes a general apostasy on the part of the Jews of the Dispersion, for which, in fact, we have not the slightest evidence. In regard to 2^{25}, even if the idea of a return is pressed (but see Ac 14^{15} $15^{3.\ 19}$, 1 Th 1^{9}), the original relation of man to God may well have been in the apostle's mind here as in 4^{19} (πιστῷ κτίστῃ; cf. e.g. Ac $17^{26ff.}$, Col 1^{20} ἀποκαταλλάξαι). Again, in reference to 3^{6}, Kühl argues that Gentile women would become Sarah's children by conversion to Christ, and that therefore of none but Jewish women could it be said that they became so 'by well-doing.' But, even if the common punctuation of the passage is adopted, the words may very well mean, 'whose children you (Gentile) women proved yourselves by well-doing' (see Hort on 1^{15}, p. 71). There is, however, much to be said for making the clause ὡς Σάρρα . . . τέκνα a parenthesis, and taking ἀγαθοποιοῦσαι κ.τ.λ. as co-ordinate with ὑποτασσόμεναι.

On the other hand, there are passages of two kinds which only by repeated acts of exegetical violence can be construed as applicable to Jews. (1) Passages scattered throughout the Epistle dealing with the past moral condition of those addressed, 1^{14} (cf. Ac 17^{30}, Gal 4^{8}, Eph 4^{18}), 1^{18} (cf. Ro 1^{21}, Eph 4^{17}; on πατροπαράδοτον see Hort's note), 4^{2-4} (for τὰ ἔθνη in an ethical sense see 1 Th 4^{5}, Eph 2^{11} 4^{17}; note also ξενίζονται—heathen neighbours would not wonder if Jews did not join in their idolatrous immoralities). (2) The opening paragraph (1^{3-12}), where the contrast between 'us' (writer and readers alike, 1^{3}) and 'you' (cf. Eph $1^{12f.}$), and still more the emphatic and remarkable language used about 'you' as persons for whom the blessings of the gospel were destined in God's purpose, and whom they had at length reached ($1^{5.\ 10.\ 12}$, cf. 1^{25}), seem to imply the fundamental conception of the admission into the family of God of the long-excluded Gentiles (see Hort's notes on 1^{3-12}).

Further, the negative argument in this case is of considerable weight. The writer is silent on many topics on which almost inevitably he would have dwelt had he been speaking as a Jew to Jews. Then he does not, like St. James, draw out the moral teaching of the Law; nor, like the writer to the Hebrews, does he concern himself with the spiritual interpretation of the ancient histories, and of the ritual of the old covenant. He never takes occasion by a reference to 'the Fathers' to allude to the glories of Israelitish ancestry and its manifold significance for a Christian Jew (see Ac $3^{13.\ 25}$ 5^{30} $7^{2.\ 38}$ $13^{17.\ 32}$ 22^{14}, He 1^{1}, cf. Ro $9^{3ff.}$). In short, the contrast between our Epistle (both in matter and manner) and those apostolic speeches and Epistles which are addressed to Jews, and, we may add, those parts of St. Paul's Epistles in which he turns to the Jewish element in the Churches to which he writes, is by itself a cogent reason for rejecting the theory that the Epistle was primarily addressed to Jewish Christians.

To sum up: the Acts supplies evidence that in many churches within the provinces enumerated in 1 P 1^{1} there was a considerable Jewish element, and there is no reason for supposing that the other churches comprehended in the salutation differed from these in character. Such converts from Judaism would be especially alive to the meaning of the allusions to OT language so frequent in the Epistle. All considerations, however, point decisively to the conclusion that St. Peter had in his mind predominantly, though probably not exclusively, Gentile readers.

We pass to the evidence supplied by the Epistle as to the more recent history and the present condition of its readers. They owed their conversion to more than one evangelist (1^{12}). That they were newly-made converts is certainly not implied by the injunction ὡς ἀρτιγέννητα βρέφη τὸ λογικὸν ἄδολον γάλα ἐπιποθήσατε (2^{2}; cf. 1 Co 14^{20}; Hermas, Sim. ix. 29); the habit of responding to their true spiritual instincts was a lifelong duty. And, on the contrary, there are indications that they had been Christians for some considerable time. St. Peter assumes that there were Christian presbyters in the communities addressed, and, moreover, that these elders were exposed to temptations arising from official routine, and from motives of sordid greed and of ambition—temptations which would hardly assail men watching over the first stages of the growth of infant churches. Further, the apostle implies that sufficient time has elapsed since his readers became Christians for them to have become a marked body among their heathen neighbours, and to have had experience of the difficulties and dangers inseparable from such a position.

What was the nature of these perils? On our answer to this question depends our view as to the date of the Epistle, and consequently, to a large extent, as to its general character and meaning. Does the letter presuppose that its readers were the victims of a persecution organized or authorized by the State? And, if so, is there evidence that this persecution was of a kind unknown in the year A.D. 64?

It will be convenient to consider the second of these two questions first. The passage on which the answer depends is $4^{15f.}$, and three points in regard to it claim attention. (a) In view of the evidence now available, it seems unreasonable to question St. Luke's statement that 'the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch' shortly before the year A.D. 44, still more unreasonable to doubt its currency at Rome at least some little time before the Neronian persecution* (see Lightfoot, Ignatius i. p. 400 ff.; Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 40 ff.; also art. CHRISTIAN in vol. i. p. 384 ff.). The name Christian, then, does not in itself suggest a date later than 64. (b) But 'the Epistle seems to refer directly to the edict of Trajan, which has a place in Pliny's correspondence, if the difficult word ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος points to the delator' (Jülicher, Einl. p. 135; cf. Holtzmann, Einl. p. 494). But, even if the essential idea of delator were not absent from the word ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, the passage itself refutes this view. For, since the first three offences are mentioned in the inverse order of their heinousness—murder, theft, ill-doing (on the last see Hort, p. 135 f.)—the fourth place in the series could not be assigned to so vile an offence as that of the delator. Moreover, the ἢ ὡς before ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, contrasted with the previous ἢ . . . ἤ, marks the transition to a different kind of offence. All the requirements of the passage are satisfied if we suppose that three legal offences are spoken of, then a social fault. The word itself, when examined, confirms this view. It is best illustrated by Epictetus, Encheir. iii. 22 (quoted by Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 39), οὐ γὰρ τὰ ἀλλότρια πολυπραγμονεῖ [i.e. the Cynic] ὅταν τὰ ἀνθρώπινα ἐπισκοπῇ, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἴδια, and Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 19, 'aliena negotia curo Excussus propriis'—the former passage being a protest against, the latter a playful pleading guilty to, the charge often brought against the philosophers of busying themselves with their neighbours' concerns. The Christians, in their first zeal for the Divine law of purity and love, would be apt to be betrayed into an exasperating officiousness, into making a vain attempt to set the world around them to rights. Such a social indiscretion would not bring them within the law, but it would most surely involve them in much suffering—hence such apostolic precepts as Col 4^5, Eph 5^{15} (cf. 1 Th 4^{11}, 2 Th 3^{11}). The word ἀλλοτριεπίσκοπος, then, appears to show that the word πασχέτω has a wider reference than to punishments inflicted by a magistrate (cf. $2^{19f.}$). (c) A distinction is drawn between the proceedings against Christians under Nero in A.D. 64 and those which took place at a later time. In the earlier period, it is said, Christians suffered not as Christians but as those who were proved guilty of crime. In the later period the name Christian itself ensured condemnation. No evidence, it is allowed, is extant as to the time when the earlier procedure gave place to the later. The transition had taken place before the correspondence of Trajan and Pliny; it possibly took place as early as Vespasian's reign. The language of 1 P $4^{15f.}$, it is urged, presupposes the circumstances of the later period, when a Christian suffered as a Christian. But surely this conclusion is due to a confusion of thought. It is obviously true that such language could be used by a Christian teacher after, but it by no means follows that it could not be used before, the alleged change in the attitude of the State towards the Church. For even if it be granted that in the eyes of the law each Christian who suffered in Nero's gardens suffered as a convicted incendiary, yet in the eyes of his fellow-believers he suffered for Christ; and when once the nickname Christian had become a current term, the phrase 'to suffer as a Christian' would become a natural synonym of the older phrases 'to suffer for Christ' or 'for the name of Christ' (Mt 24^9, Lk 21^{12}, Ac 5^{41} 9^{16} 15^{26} 21^{13}, Ph 1^{29}).

* Two possibilities must be borne in mind. (a) Luke does not say that the name Christian was first invented at this time, but that it was now first used of 'the disciples.' It may have been applied to the Jews at Antioch earlier, and thus it may be a part of the inheritance which passed to Christianity from Judaism. (b) It may have been used of 'the disciples' independently at different places, especially if it was already applied to Jews. There is, however, nothing strange in a speedy importation of the nickname from the Syrian Antioch to Rome (cf. Juv. iii. 62).

It is, moreover, open to serious question whether the evidence implies any essential difference between the proceedings under Nero and those under, e.g., Trajan. All that we know of the Neronian persecution is derived from the somewhat rhetorical account in Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44), one brief sentence of Suetonius (Nero 16), and the allusion in Clement's Epistle. To the present writer, the evidence seems to point clearly to the conclusion that in A.D. 64 at Rome the Christians suffered legally for their religion. The reasons for this view are briefly these: (1) It would have ill-suited Nero's position to throw the blame of the great fire on persons who would have to be proved guilty of incendiarism before they were punished. We must surely conclude that he adopted the simple and sensible plan of slaking the public thirst for vengeance by the dramatic punishment of an unpopular class of people on whom he could shift the odium of being the authors of the fire, but who could be legally condemned without more ado as the votaries of a religio illicita. 'The legal grounds for interference were in existence from the first, and no special edict was needful' (Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 454 n.; cf. Lightfoot, Ignatius i. p. 11; Westcott's Essay on 'The Church and the World' (in Epistles of St. John)). (2) The language of Tacitus is quite consistent with, even if it does not require, this interpretation of the situation. Thus, in regard to the clause 'Primum correpti qui fatebantur,' the whole context refutes the idea that the confession was of incendiarism. The meaning can only be 'fatebantur se esse Christianos.' The admission of Christianity was the turning-point of their case. Again, in the following clause ('Multitudo ingens haud perinde in crimine incendii quam odio humani generis conuicti sunt') the word conuicti, which appears to imply judicial investigation of detailed criminal charges, is a conjecture for the MS reading coniuncti—a word which may justly be thought to be more in Tacitus' manner than the prosaic conuicti. Nor can the phrase 'odium humani generis' be taken as naturally pointing to illegal actions or conduct. It has a close parallel in the phrase which Tacitus uses in his description of the Jews (Hist. v. 5), aduersus omnes alios hostile odium. Jews and Christians would alike hold aloof from the social life of pagans; they would alike rebuke by their conduct, if not by their words, the idolatries and the profligacies of their neighbours. If the Roman Christians used such words as we find in St. Paul's Roman Epistle (e.g. Ro 1^{18} $2^{9f.}$), they might easily be represented as 'haters of the human race.' (3) The words of Suetonius ('afflicti suppliciis Christiani, genus hominum superstitionis nouæ ac maleficæ') are most naturally interpreted as asserting that Christians suffered as Christians. Moreover, if Nero was the first to act on the essential illegality of their position, and so stamped Christianity as illegal, the historian had a good reason for placing his notice of the fact among various police regulations. If, on the other hand, they were condemned not for their Christianity but for their criminal actions (real or supposed), there would be nothing new about the procedure—nothing to differentiate their case from that of criminals generally. (4) It is difficult to suppose that the ingens multitudo (cf. πολὺ πλῆθος, Clem.), including, according to Clement, matrons and girls and slaves, were one and all convicted of criminal actions. Their condemnation as votaries of an illegal religion, especially in a time of excitement and panic, would be an easy and expeditious matter (cf. Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Suet. Claud. 25).

So far, then, it appears (a) that the somewhat scanty evidence as to the Neronian persecution does not support the theory, that it differed essentially from later persecutions in regard to the method of procedure against the Christians; (b) that, if such a difference were proved to exist, the language of 1 P would be as natural from the pen of a Christian teacher in the earlier as in the later period.

We are thus brought to the question—What was the nature of the sufferings to which those to whom the Epistle was addressed, like their fellow-Christians throughout the world (5^9), were exposed? Were they the victims of a persecution directed by the State? 'The clearest point,' writes Dr. Hort (p. 1), 'is that [the Epistle] was written during a time of rising persecution to men suffering under it'; and he suggests that this was either 'the persecution begun by Nero, or a secondary persecution arising from that,' or a persecution peculiar to Asia Minor, 'independent of any known persecution bearing an emperor's name, and perhaps even a little earlier than Nero's persecution' (p. 3 f.), adding that the language about the emperor and his officers ($2^{13ff.}$) is in favour of the second of these two alternatives. 'The Christian congregations,' says Jülicher (Einl. p. 135; cf. Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 453), 'and that throughout the whole world, have now to endure bitter suffering, to bear the fiery proving of their faith (4[12])—a trial so bitter that now the end of all things cannot be far off (4[7 17]) . . . The period of systematic persecutions has begun.' On the other hand, Zahn (Einl. ii. p. 34) finds it hard to comprehend how a 'persecution of the Christian confession, regulated by the imperial power or by the magistracy, can be discovered in the Epistle.' A decision between views so diametrically opposed can be arrived at only by an examination of the Epistle itself. The passages bearing on the question may be conveniently considered under the following heads:—

(1) 4[7] ('the end of all things is at hand'). This phrase is a commonplace with those (e.g. Jülicher, Harnack) who insist that the Christians of Asia Minor were enduring the extreme bitterness of persecution. The context, however, gives no countenance at all to the supposition that the expectation of the end was connected in the writer's mind with the cruelty of the Church's sufferings. He draws from the expectation the lesson, not of patience but of devout sobriety—a duty dealt with also in the preceding context.

(2) 1[6f.] 4[12f.] (two very kindred passages speaking of 'the proving of faith'). The language in the former of these passages, an echo of Ja 1[2f.], is quite general (ἐν ποικίλοις πειρασμοῖς). In the other passage the word πύρωσις, derived from Pr 27[21] (where it is parallel to δοκίμιον), emphasizes, not the intensity of the suffering but its testing and proving nature, and thus the English equivalent 'the fiery trial' (AV, RV), as commonly understood, suggests misleading associations.* It should be remembered that the locus classicus on παιδεία in the NT (He 12[7ff.]) is addressed to men who had 'not yet resisted unto blood.' The words which follow about participation in 'the sufferings of the Christ,' while they imply the idea of trials endured for His sake, do not go beyond such passages as 2 Co 1[5] 4[10], Ph 1[29], Col 1[24] (cf. Ro 8[18], 2 Co 4[17]). With these two passages may be associated 5[8f.], where the devil is regarded as the author of suffering to the faithful, but where the point of the reference lies, not in the greatness of those sufferings but in the possibilities of spiritual declension which they involve.

(3) 2[19f.] 3[14. 17] 4[15. 19] 5[10]. In this group of passages 'suffering' for Christ's sake is undoubtedly spoken of. But πάσχειν (cf. 1 Th 2[14], 2 Th 1[5], Gal 3[4]) is an inclusive word; in 2[20] it is a synonym of κολαφίζεσθαι.

(4) 2[12] 3[9. 16] 4[4. 14]. From these passages it appears that slanders and insults had a prominent place among these 'sufferings.'

(5) 3[13f. 17]. The form of these hypothetical sentences (τίς ὁ κακώσων . . . ; ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ πάσχοιτε [not εἰ πάσχετε], and εἰ θέλοι [not θέλει]; cf. εἰ δέον 1[6]) makes it clear that the writer regards suffering for Christ as no more than a possibility for at least some of those whom he is addressing. Such language is inconsistent with the hypothesis that a general persecution, organized by the government, was raging fiercely.

(6) 3[15] 4[15f.]. Both these passages are very frequently supposed to deal with the relation of Christians and Roman magistrates. But in neither case can this reference be sustained. On 4[15f] see above. In 3[15] (ἕτοιμοι ἀεὶ πρὸς ἀπολογίαν παντὶ τῷ αἰτοῦντι κ.τ.λ.) the word παντί as well as the expression μετὰ πραΰτητος καὶ φόβου show that the injunction deals with the general intercourse of the Christians with their pagan neighbours (cf. Col 4[6] πῶς δεῖ ὑμᾶς ἑνὶ ἑκάστῳ ἀποκρίνεσθαι).

(7) 2[13ff.]. The passage is an echo of St. Paul's words in Ro 13[1ff.]. But in place of the general language of Ro (ἐξουσίαις ὑπερεχούσαις . . . αἱ οὖσαι ἐξουσίαι . . . οἱ ἄρχοντες) we have in 1 P a clear and detailed reference to the imperial government—'the emperor (βασιλεύς),' 'provincial governors sent by him (ἡγεμόνες δι' αὐτοῦ πεμπόμενοι).' Moreover, St. Peter's description of the purpose of the existing central government as being (on one side) the 'commendation' of 'well-doers' goes considerably beyond the earlier dictum of St. Paul (τὸ ἀγαθὸν ποίει, καὶ ἕξεις ἔπαινον ἐξ αὐτῆς); and this description he still further emphasizes by the explanation—'thus (i.e. in accordance with His κτίσις—the Divine institution of civil government) it is the will of God, that by well-doing men silence the ignorance of those who are senseless.' To this passage must be added the other passages in the Epistle where the writer speaks in a tone of unwavering hopefulness as to the effect of ἀναβαπτίζω on the heathen world (2[12] 3[1. 16]). St. Paul wrote Ro 13 when he still regarded the Roman State as 'the restraining power,' and still looked to the Empire as the protector of the Church. That a Christian teacher, writing from Rome after Nero's attack on the Church to fellow-Christians in the provinces, should adopt St. Paul's language, only making it more explicit and emphasizing its hopefulness, seems inconceivable. How impossible such a position at that time would have been, is clear when with the paragraph in 1 P we compare the symbolism of the Apocalypse—the beast and the harlot seated on the seven hills, 'drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus' (Rev 17[6. 9]).

To sum up: the passage last considered affords strong reason for thinking that the storm of the Neronian persecution had not as yet swept over the Church at Rome, and that no persecuting policy against the Church had been adopted by the Roman magistrates in Asia Minor. Not a word is found in the Epistle about men shedding their blood or laying down their lives for the gospel. None of the passages in any of the above groups, as we have seen, contains any reference to, or hint of, an organized persecution. But it needs only a little reflexion in the light of actual history to convince us how much of the keenest suffering the confession of Christ must have cost these Asiatic Christians, though the State had not as yet become their enemy. They were called upon to face violence, slander, the severance of social and family ties, worldly ruin. In the earliest days of their missionary activity St. Paul and Barnabas frankly told their converts—διὰ πολλῶν θλίψεων δεῖ ἡμᾶς εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ (Ac 14[22]). Such tribulations were not confined to the Churches of Asia Minor. It was well that St. Peter, out of his wider experience at Rome* and elsewhere, should remind them that these sufferings were the lot of the Christian brotherhood everywhere (5[9]).

V. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—It will be convenient to preface the discussion of these questions with a tabular statement (founded on that given by Holtzmann, Einl. p. 318 ff.) of the different views held by representative critics.

I. On the Assumption of the Authenticity of the Epistle: (1) c. 54 A.D. (before St. Paul's sojourn at Ephesus)—B. Weiss, Kühl. (2) During the later period of St. Paul's activity before his imprisonment—B. Bruckner. (3) 59 or 60—Gloag. (4) c. 62 (during St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome)—Steiger, Guericke, Bleek, Wieseler. (5) Shortly before the Neronian persecution—Hofmann, Renan, F. C. Cook, Zahn. (6) c. 65 (or a little later)—e.g. Eichhorn, de Wette, Neander, Grimm, Huther, Sieffert, Ewald, Wiesinger, Usteri; probably the majority of English scholars, e.g. Plumptre, Salmon, Farrar, Sanday (apparently; Expositor, June 1893, p. 411), Hort (not earlier than 62, probably after Neronian persecution), Lightfoot ('probably written not earlier than the summer of 64,' Clement ii. p. 499). (7) 70–80, Ramsay (who would assign 80 as the probable date, The Ch. and the Empire p. 279 ff.), Swete (preferring apparently the first half of the decade, St. Mark p. xvii f.).

II. On the Assumption of the Spuriousness of the Epistle: (1) Under Domitian (81–96)—Scholten, von Soden (92–96), Harnack (83–93, but possibly one or even two decades earlier than 83, Die Chronol. p. 454), McGiffert (about 90) (2) Under Trajan (98–117)—Schwegler, Baur, Keim, Lipsius, Pfleiderer, Hausrath, W. Bruckner, Hilgenfeld, S. Davidson, Julicher (about 100). (3) Under Hadrian (117–138)—Zeller. (4) 140–147—Volkmar.

The difficulties involved in the theory that the Epistle is spurious may be conveniently considered first. They are many, and of various kinds. A close study of the document itself reveals no motive, theological, controversial, or historical, which explains it as a forgery (cf. Harnack, Die Chronol. p. 456 f.). It denounces no heresy. It supports no special system of doctrine. It contains no rules as to Church life or organization. Its references to the words and the life of Christ are unobtrusive. It presents no picture of any scene in St. Peter's earlier life, and does not connect itself with any of the stories current in the early Church about his later years. Why, moreover, should a forger, with all the world to choose from, select so strangely wide a district, four provinces, as the supposed destination of the letter, and why should he mention them in an order (on this supposition) so chaotic and so inexplicable? Why should he represent Silvanus as the amanuensis or the bearer of St. Peter's letter, though in the Acts he nowhere appears as in any way connected with that apostle, but both in the Acts and in three Epistles

* Cf. Didaché xvi. 5, τότε ἥξει ἡ κτίσις τῶν ἀνθρώπων εἰς τὴν πύρωσιν τῆς δοκιμασίας, καὶ σκανδαλισθήσονται πολλοὶ κ.τ.λ. The previous context speaks of the advent of the 'world-deceiver.'

* When St. Paul first arrived at Rome, the Jews at Rome tell him that they know that 'everywhere this sect is spoken against' (Ac 28[22]). The language of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) clearly implies that before the Neronian persecution Christians were regarded at Rome with feelings of hatred and horror—'quos per flagitia inuisos uolgus Christianos appellabat . . aduersus sontes et nouissima exempla meritos.'

(1 and 2 Th, 2 Co) as the companion of St. Paul? Why, above all, should a forger give to Pauline thoughts and to Pauline language a prominent place in an Epistle bearing the name of St. Peter? These difficulties do not appear less formidable when we review the theories of those critics who have attempted to meet them. The Tübingen school, indeed, had a clear and concise answer to the question why a Pauline element is found in a Petrine Epistle. The letter, in their view, is a Unionsschrift (see Holtzmann, Einl. p. 316), celebrating the agreement of the two parties in the Church which bore the names of the two great apostles. 'But that theory,' to quote Harnack's verdict (Die Chronol. p. 456, cf. p. vii ff.), 'is admittedly profoundly shaken in general, and in particular it is refuted in its application to 1 Peter.' We turn at once to three recent theories.

(a) Von Soden (Hand-Commentar zum NT iii. 2, p. 117), putting the letter in the last four years of Domitian's reign, suggests that Silvanus was the author of the Epistle (5^{12}): that, however, instead of speaking in his own name, he makes St. Peter, the glorious martyr (5^{1}), utter words of encouragement to Churches among which the apostle had himself once worked; that, conscious what judgment the apostle had formed of him, he ventures to add the testimony to himself πιστοῦ ἀδελφοῦ ὡς λογίζομαι; that he perhaps derived his right to speak in the apostle's name from his own position as an ἀπόστολος (1 Th 2^{6}) and a prophet (Ac 15^{32}). A theory burdened with such complicated improbabilities hardly merits serious discussion.

(b) Jülicher (Einl. p. 134 ff.) holds that the letter was written about the year 100. In view of 5^{13} and of the author's familiarity with St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, he conjectures that he was a Roman Christian. In spite of its obvious 'catholic' character, the letter is addressed to the five provinces of Asia Minor; and Jülicher finds an explanation of this fact in the supposition that the writer was a native of Asia Minor, and thus had a natural interest in the brethren of that region. He had, it is clear, an intimate knowledge of St. Paul's writings; but, when he wanted to give an apostolic authority to his own words, he refrained from using the name of that apostle, partly from motives of reverence and partly that he might not tear open again wounds which were now half healed. It is clear that this special view of the composition of the Epistle is open to all, or to nearly all, the objections mentioned above as generally valid against the supposition of its spuriousness.

(c) Harnack (Chronol. p. 457 ff.) draws a distinction between the opening and closing sentences (1$^{1f.}$ 5$^{12ff.}$) and, on the other hand, the main body of the Epistle (1^{3}–5^{11}). The latter—whether originally a letter or not, there is no evidence to determine—is the work of 'some prominent teacher and confessor, who, possibly writing from Rome, and, it may be, a prisoner there, was certainly so familiar with Pauline Christianity that he could move about within its area with perfect freedom.'* The date of this document, which to us is a fragment, lies between 83–93, but may conceivably be some 20 years earlier. The opening and closing sentences, on the other hand, Harnack, modifying a suggestion first put forward by him in his edition of the Didaché (p. 106 n.), considers to have been added between A.D. 150 and 175. He further discovers resemblances in style between these sentences and 2 Peter, the earliest document in which our Epistle is quoted as the work of St. Peter, and indulges the suspicion that the clauses which now begin and end 1 Peter are the work of the same author as 2 Peter.

Harnack (p. 458 ff.) urges that his view as to 1^{1f} 5$^{12ff.}$ is confirmed by four arguments. (1) These sentences can without loss be removed from the document. But, on this principle, all Epistles might profitably be curtailed at both ends. (2) These sentences are poor in style, and present various difficulties. But it is only natural that the beginning and the close of a letter should be simple and plain in style, and Harnack's objection to the phrase εἰς ὑπακοὴν καὶ ῥαντισμὸν αἵματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (1^{2}) is due to a want of appreciation of the words (see below, p. 791). Further, the existence of ambiguities in those parts of a letter which deal with personal matters is often a strong proof of its authenticity. The writer of a letter assumes on the part of his correspondents a knowledge of personal facts, obvious enough at the time, but soon forgotten. Moreover, any gaps in such knowledge the bearer of a letter would be trusted to fill up. (3) The motive of such additions lay in a sense of the instructiveness of the document, and the feeling that words so full of edification must be apostolic. Phenomena not wholly dissimilar are found in connexion with other documents—'Ephesians,' Ep. Barnabas, the so-called Second Ep. of Clement. But the first assertion suggests no answer to the question why the fragment should be assigned to St. Peter and not rather to St. Paul, with whose writings it has obvious points of contact. In regard to the second assertion, the reply is obvious. The documents adduced fail as parallels, both in other respects and especially just in the crucial point, viz. the addition to a document of sentences containing details geographical and personal, which are, as they stand, obscure, and are altogether lacking in picturesque precision. (4) Tradition favours the hypothesis. No writer before Irenæus quotes the letter as that of St. Peter. On the reception of the Epistle in the Church see above.

Harnack's hypothesis is open to serious objections, based on the internal evidence of the document itself and on external evidence. In the first place, what was the character of the document (i.e. 1^{3}–5^{10})? It was not a treatise, for it is hortatory throughout. Was it, then, like the so-called Second Epistle of Clement, a homily? This is in the highest degree improbable, partly because of its close resemblances to St. Paul's Epistles, especially of the opening paragraph—εὐλογητὸς ὁ θεὸς καὶ πατὴρ κ.τ.λ. (1^{3})—to the opening paragraph of 2 Co and 'Ephesians'; partly because of the great variety of topics dealt with—a procedure natural in a letter, but ill-suited to a sermon; partly because the language is general, and there is an absolute lack of any such reference to the immediate surroundings or the special circumstances of his hearers as we should expect in the words of a preacher; partly because the whole tone of the document produces the impression that the teacher is not face to face with those whom he is addressing—note especially the phrase πρεσβυτέρους οὖν ἐν ὑμῖν παρακαλῶ (5^{1}). If, then, the document was neither a treatise nor a homily, it must have been a letter; and, if a letter, it must originally have included, if not some personal message, at least some form of salutation. We must therefore suppose either that the interpolator deliberately excised the original beginning or ending or both, or that the document came into his hands in a mutilated form. This last hypothesis, so far as the initial salutation is concerned, is highly improbable; for the first leaf of the MS must have contained much more of the letter than the customary brief words of salutation, and the paragraph which must have immediately followed the salutation (1^{3ff}) is extant. In the second place, the difficulties arising from the consideration of internal evidence are increased when external evidence is taken into account. The main body of the Epistle, as Harnack admits (p. 461 f.), was known to Clement (probably), Polycarp, and Papias. The Epistle therefore must have been widely circulated before the time of the supposed interpolator. How are we to account, then, for these widely-circulated (uninterpolated) copies having disappeared, leaving no posterity; while all known MSS and versions, all MSS used by Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Irenæus, and all other early writers who quote the Epistle as the work of St. Peter, must have descended from a single ancestor—the copy, that is, in which the additions at the beginning and the end were made about the middle of the 2nd cent.?* The improbabilities involved in Harnack's hypothesis are many and great. It is important, because it essentially belongs to a period of transition. It is the product, on the one hand, of the lingering influence of an older criticism, too thoroughly bent upon negative results to retain much delicacy of perception; and, on the other hand, of a keen literary and spiritual sense of the significance of a writer's matter and manner. His own words (p. 464 f.) are remarkable, and appropriately conclude this section: 'If the hypothesis here brought forward should prove erroneous, I should more readily prevail upon myself to regard the improbable as possible and to claim the Epistle for Peter himself, than to suppose that a Pseudo-Petrus wrote our fragment as it now stands, from the first verse to the last, soon after A.D. 90, or even from ten to thirty years earlier. Such an

* McGiffert (History of Christianity in the Apost. Age p. 599) conjectures that the writer of the Epistle was Barnabas. He accepts Harnack's theory of interpolation.

* Harnack supposes interpolations not only in 1 P, but also in Jude, the Pastoral Epistles, Mt, Jn (Die Chronologie pp. 468, 485, 700, 679). The improbability of such a hypothesis in the case of a single document, as pointed out above, is very great. The improbability of the same improbable series of events having taken place in the case of six separate documents is infinite. The argument is well put by Dom Butler in the Dublin Review for Jan. 1899, p. 13 ff.

assumption is, in my opinion, weighed down by insuperable difficulties.'

We proceed, then, to examine the objections urged against the view that the salutation is original and veracious, and that the Epistle was written by St. Peter. The chief of these are five in number—

(1) The references to persecution are of such a kind as to imply a date which lies outside the probable, if not the possible, limits of St. Peter's life. This objection has been (p. 783 ff.) considered.

(2) St. Peter was a Jew of lowly origin, and Papias speaks of Mark as his ἑρμηνευτής. The Epistle, on the other hand, is written in good Greek, and the writer was thoroughly familiar with the LXX (so, e.g., Jülicher, Einl. p. 132 f.). The facts alleged as to the Epistle are undisputed (see above, p. 781 f.). Are they incompatible with St. Peter's authorship? In Galilee, with its Greek towns such as Gadara (Jos. Ant. XVII. xi. 4, BJ II. vi. 3), there was so considerable an element of Greek life that, even when St. Peter became a follower of Christ, it is unlikely (to say the least) that he was wholly ignorant of colloquial Greek (Mayor, St. James pp. xli, ccix; Abbott, Essays on the Original Texts of the Old and New Testaments p. 162 ff.; Zahn, Einl. i. p. 28 f.). We may reverently suppose that our Lord, when He chose the apostle as 'the rock on which He would build His Church,' discerned in him intellectual as well as spiritual gifts which fitted him for his destined work. In Jerusalem, after the Ascension, St. Peter had much intercourse with Hellenistic Jews. His departure from Palestine can have been no sudden step; and it would be strange if he did not prepare himself for the work which lay before him by using opportunities, which certainly were within his reach, of increasing whatever knowledge he already had of the lingua franca of the Roman world. Mark was known in the early Church as 'the interpreter of Peter,' probably because he assisted the apostle in his first attempts to address Greek-speaking people. Greek must have been the vehicle of communication with Cornelius, and not improbably with the Jews of the Dispersion on the Day of Pentecost. We may conjecture that Mark was one of 'the brethren' who accompanied St. Peter from Joppa (Ac 10^{23}), and that he helped him in speaking to the Roman centurion and his household. It may well be that Mark 'the interpreter' read with the apostle some Greek literature, and especially the LXX, of which it is not impossible that he had gained some knowledge in his home at Bethsaida. At any rate the years which St. Peter spent in missionary work outside the borders of the Holy Land, specially, we may add with great probability, in the Syrian Antioch and its neighbourhood (see above), cannot but have given him a familiarity with Greek sufficient to enable him to write a letter in Greek, even if he still had to trust Mark 'the interpreter' to prune away in it any solecism of which he might still be guilty. The Epistle of St. Peter, it must be remembered, is no isolated phenomenon in the apostolic age. One who accepts the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude as genuine is entitled to point to them as a proof that even Jews who, so far as it appears, did not extend their labours beyond Jerusalem, could acquire a good Greek style.

(3) If the Epistle was written from Rome, its silence about the death of St. Paul, if his martyrdom was recent, or, if St. Paul was then at Rome, the absence of any message from him or news about him, is said to be inexplicable (cf. von Soden p. 115). The subject will come before us again. For the present, it is sufficient to say that the bearer of the letter—such as Silvanus appears to have been—might well be entrusted with personal news (Hort p. 6).

(4) It is alleged that we do not find in the Epistle much which we should expect to find in a letter of St. Peter, the chief of the Lord's personal followers; that it shows no sign of a vivid remembrance either of Christ's life or of His teaching (von Soden p. 115; Jülicher p. 134; Harnack p. 451). We cannot, then, place the Epistle after St. Paul's Epistles and suppose it to be the work of St. Peter, unless we admit, according to Jülicher's view, that 'Paul had exercised on Peter a greater influence than Jesus.' The discussion of this objection falls under two heads. (a) The Lord's life. Silence as to the facts of the Lord's life and ministry, strange to us in the case of one who remembered details the knowledge of which would have been of priceless value to later generations, is not a phenomenon peculiar to 1 Peter. From the Books of the NT other than the Gospels hardly a hint as to the events of our Lord's earthly life can be gathered. In the speeches recorded in the Acts, if we may assume that they represent with substantial accuracy the apostle's earlier teaching, St. Peter refers once to the Lord's baptism (10^{38}, cf. 1^{22} 4^{27}) and twice to His miracles (2^{22} 10^{38}), but to nothing else before the Passion. The facts of the NT then point to the conclusion that in their public teaching, whether oral or written, the apostles concentrated attention on the great momenta of the Lord's 'manifestation'—His sufferings and death, His resurrection and exaltation. While, however, there is in the Epistle nothing biographical or autobiographical, there are unobtrusive indications that its author was an eye-witness of the Lord's life. In 1^{8} (ὃν οὐκ ἰδόντες ἀγαπᾶτε) a return to the first person plural (v.^{3}) would have been quite natural had the writer been one who had not seen the Lord. The words gain greatly in force and tenderness if they are the words of a disciple who loved One whom he had seen (Jn $21^{15ff.}$), and who welcomes to a fellowship in his love for Christ those who had not seen. Again, when in 5^{1} the writer speaks of himself as ὁ συνπρεσβύτερος κ. μάρτυς τῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ παθημάτων, the description is almost pointless unless it implies that he bears witness to what he himself had seen (contrast 4^{13}). The whole clause is clearly intended to justify the authority with which the writer addresses 'the elders.' He shared their position as elders, and therefore knows their difficulties. He is a witness to the very events which form their Gospel, and therefore has a unique claim to be heard. The full significance of the clause is seen only when it is compared with (i.) the commands addressed to the eleven, Jn 15^{26}, Lk 24^{47}, Ac 1^{8}; (ii.) St. John's words in Jn 19^{35} (cf. 21^{24}), 1 Jn $1^{1ff.}$ 4^{14}; (iii.) St. Peter's words as recorded in Ac $1^{21f.}$ 2^{32} 3^{15} 4^{20} 5^{32} 10^{39}; and when, on the other hand, we mark the entire absence in St. Paul's Epistles of any similar expression, and that in passages where he is insisting on his apostolic authority (e.g. 2 Co 10^{1}–12^{13}, Gal 1). The nearest parallels in St. Paul—1 Co 9^{1} $15^{8.\,15}$, cf. Ac 22^{15} 26^{16}—serve to bring out into sharper relief the distinctiveness of the Petrine phrase (cf. Ac $13^{31f.}$). An instance of this μαρτυρία is found in 2^{23}—a reminiscence of the arrest, and of what St. Peter saw as he lingered in the high priest's vestibule. In this connexion the force of the imperfects is not to be overlooked. They give not the summary statement of the historian, but the vivid remembrance of the eye-witness. Again, in the phrase ἀλλήλοις τὴν ταπεινοφροσύνην ἐγκομβώσασθε (5^{5}), the picturesque word ἐγκομβώσασθε gathers up the details of the scene related in Jn $13^{4ff.}$ and its lessons. (b) The Lord's teaching. The following are the chief coincidences between 1 P and sayings of our Lord: (a) recorded in the Synoptic Gospels—1 P 1^{4} ‖ Mt 5^{5} 25^{34} 6^{20}; $1^{6.\,8}$ 4^{13} ‖ Mt 5^{12}; 1^{10} ‖ Lk 10^{24}; 1^{11} ‖ Lk $24^{26.\,44}$; 1^{13} ‖ Lk 12^{35} 21^{34}; 1^{17} ‖ Mt 6^{9} Lk 11^{2};

2^2 ‖ Mt $18^{2f.}$ 19^{14} Lk 18^{17}; 2^4 (προσερχ.) ‖ Mt 11^{28} (cf. Jn 6^{37} 7^{37}); 2^5 ‖ Mt 16^{18}; 2^7 (Ps 118^{22}) ‖ Mt 21^{42}; 2^{12} (cf. 3^{16}) ‖ Mt 5^{16}; $2^{13.\ 17}$ ‖ Mt 22^{21}; 2^{21} (ἐπακολ.) ‖ e.g. Mt 10^{38} *; 2^{23} (cf. 4^{19}) ‖ Lk 23^{46}; 2^{25} ‖ e.g. Mt 9^{36} Lk 15^4; 3^9 ‖ Lk 6^{28}; 3^{13} ‖ Lk 10^{19} 21^{18}; 3^{14} ‖ Mt 5^{10}; 3^{14} ‖ Mt $10^{26ff.}$; 3^{16} ‖ Lk 6^{28}; 4^7 (cf. 5^8) ‖ Mt 24^{42} 25^{13} 26^{41} Lk 12^{37} 21^{34}; 4^{14} ‖ Mt 5^{11}; 4^{19} (π. κτίστῃ) ‖ Mt $6^{25ff.}$; 5^1 ‖ Lk 24^{47} (Ac 1^8) Mt 19^{28} Lk $22^{28ff.}$; 5^3 ‖ Mt $20^{25f.}$; 5^6 ‖ Mt 23^{12}; (β) recorded in St. John—1 P $1^{3.\ 23}$ ‖ Jn 3^3; 1^8 ‖ 20^{29}; 1^{19} 2^{24} ‖ $1^{29.\ 36}$; 1^{22} ‖ $13^{34f.}$ 15^{12}; 2^9 ‖ 8^{12} 12^{46}; 2^{25} (Gentiles) ‖ $10^{11.\ 14.\ 16}$; $5^{2.\ 4}$ ‖ $21^{16.\ 17}$ (note τὰ ἀρνία μου). It has been already noticed that St. Peter's imagery differs from that of St. Paul (see above, p. 782). It may further be remarked that all his metaphors (except those of painting and working in metals) find parallels in the Lord's sayings. In estimating the force of the list of parallels given above, two points must be borne in mind: (1) We are not here dealing with a question of literary indebtedness. For us the sayings of Christ are preserved in the literature of the Greek Gospels. One who heard them uttered in the original Aramaic would reproduce them, when writing in Greek, in a form peculiar to himself. Hence verbal similarity to the Gospels is not a measure of real coincidence. (2) The Gospels do not give us an exhaustive collection of our Lord's sayings. Hence, in the case of a document which claims to be the work of an apostle, the Gospels are an imperfect criterion of indebtedness to the Lord's teaching. Yet, judging the influence of our Lord's sayings on the writer of 1 P by the admittedly imperfect standard of the written Gospels, it is not too much to say that his mind is saturated with the words of Christ, and that, in dealing with questions and circumstances very different from those which called forth the Lord's teaching, he instinctively turns to the substance and to the words of that teaching as bearing upon the actual needs of the present. St. Paul was certainly acquainted with the Lord's teaching (see, e.g., 1 Co 7^{10}), whether in an oral or in some written form; but the whole literature of his Epistles supplies a list of coincidences with the Gospels fewer in number and far less close than this one Epistle. Apart from the Johannine Epistles, the only parallel in this respect to 1 P is the Epistle of James.

(5) The objection against the Petrine authorship of our Epistle on which recent critics have laid most stress is its affinity in doctrine, thought, and language with the Pauline Epistles. Jülicher (p. 133) brings out three points as to the relation of 1 P to the Pauline literature. (i.) There is nothing un-Pauline in it. (ii.) In regard to his conception of Christ, of the saving efficacy of His death, of faith and regeneration, the writer of 1 P breathes the Pauline spirit even as he uses the Pauline formulas (e.g. ἐν Χριστῷ 3^{16} $5^{10.\ 14}$, ζωοποιεῖν 3^{18}, ἀποκάλυψις and ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι six times, his favourite word ἀναστροφή). (iii.) There are many similarities between 1 P and the Pauline Epistles, especially Ro and Eph, which cannot be accidental; the ascription of Eph and 1 P to the same author is a proposition which has been seriously maintained.† This whole position has the approval of Harnack (Die Chronol. p. 451 ff.). But the words of the latter in maintaining it give expression to significant admissions. 'The author,' he writes (p. 452), 'is completely determined by the spirit of Pauline Christianity. But this determination is united with such independence and freedom in regard to religious thought and teaching within the limits of this Paulinism, that the assumption is an obvious one that Paul himself is the author of the document.' And again (p. 364 n.), 'Were it not for the dependence [of 1 P] on the Pauline Epistles, I might perhaps allow myself to maintain its genuineness: that dependence, however, is not accidental, but is of the essence of the Epistle.'

It will be best to clear the ground by indicating the affinities between 1 P and the Epistles of the NT. — (i.) Romans, (ii.) Ephesians, (iii.) other Pauline Epistles, (iv.) James. (i.) Romans, 1 P 1^{14} ‖ 12^2; 1^{17} ‖ $2^{6\ 11}$; $1^{20f.}$ ‖ $16^{25f.}$; 1^{21} ‖ 4^{24}; 1^{22} ‖ $12^{9f.}$; 2^5 ‖ 12^1; 2^8 ‖ $9^{32f.}$; $2^{13ff.}$ ‖ $13^{1\text{-}7}$; 2^{24} ‖ $6^{2\text{-}11}$; $3^{8f.}$ ‖ $12^{9\text{-}18}$ (cf. 1 Th 5^{15}); 3^{18} ‖ 6^{10}; 3^{21} ‖ 6^4 (cf. It should further be noted that (a) a phrase from Pr 10^{12} is introduced in 1 P 4^8 and apparently alluded to in Ja 5^{20}, both Epistles using a rendering other than that of LXX; (b) Is 40^6 is alluded to in Ja $1^{10f.}$ and quoted in 1 P 1^{24}; (c) Pr 3^{34} is quoted in Ja 4^6, 1 P 5^5—both having ὁ θεός, LXX Κύριος.*

To take first the case of James, the coincidences in this Ep. with 1 Peter can hardly be accounted for on the ground of personal intercourse between the two writers. They seem to imply literary indebtedness. The relative dates of the two documents (apart from other considerations) supply a decisive argument that the borrowing is on the side of 1 P (see, e.g., Zahn, Einl. i. p. 95). Mayor (p. cxxiv) gives 40 as the earliest, 50 as the latest, year in which James can have been written. Zahn (Einl. i. p. 92) gives 50 as its approximate date. The Epistle would therefore be well known among the Jewish Christians in the Syrian towns, and certainly among those in the Syrian Antioch, in the sixth decade A.D. (see above, note on p. 765). There are reasons for thinking that in this decade St. Peter was working in this district, and that he made Antioch his headquarters (p. 779). It is, then, a natural conclusion that St. Peter studied the Epistle of James soon after it was written, and that some 12 years later many of its graphic phrases were fresh in his memory. In any case, the fact that 1 P is influenced in thought and language by James is an important indication that the mind of the writer was one which received and retained such impressions.

The coincidences between 1 P and the Pauline Epp. other than Romans and Ephesians are not very close, and are to be accounted for as the outcome of a common evolution of Christian phrases and conceptions rather than as instances of direct borrowing. The most striking of them, ἐν ἁγιασμῷ πνεύματος (2 Th 2^{13}, 1 P 1^2), would, in fact, naturally suggest itself when the practical meaning of the term πνεῦμα ἅγιον became realized in the Church.

The case of Romans is widely different. There is no doubt that the author of 1 P was acquainted with this Epistle. Nor is this surprising, if the writer is St. Peter. For as St. Paul was familiar with James, so Romans could hardly escape the notice of the Apostles of the Circumcision. Though addressed to a particular Church, it dealt with fundamental questions respecting both Judaistic Christianity and the relation of 'all Israel' to the gospel. It is not therefore an extravagant supposition that, giving as it did the apostle's mature views on matters about which he must on more than one occasion have conferred with them (cf. Gal 2^2), he himself communicated it to the leaders of the Jewish Churches. At any rate it could hardly fail to become known, soon after it was written, at the Syrian Antioch, the great meeting-point of Jewish and Gentile Christianity in the East as Rome was in the West, and so to be brought under St. Peter's notice.

* Outside the Gospels, Rev 14^4 is the only passage in NT, except 1 P 2^{21}, where 'to follow' is used in this connexion.

† This is the conclusion of Sieffert (Zeitschrift f. wissensch. Theol. 1881, pp. 178 ff., 332 ff.).

* The supposed coincidences between 1 P and (a) Hebrews (see, e.g., von Soden, Hand-Commentar iii. 2, p. 2), (b) Apocalypse (see Spitta, Apokal. p. 511 ff.) will be found in either case to be such as would naturally appear in independent Christian writers of the same period who were well acquainted with the LXX.

In regard to the relation of Ephesians to 1 P the case is less simple. Critics of different schools agree in holding that 1 P is profoundly influenced by Ephesians. The nature of some of the coincidences noted above seems to put it beyond doubt that the writer of 1 P was familiar with the language of Ephesians. A list of coincidences, however, inadequately represents the indebtedness of 1 P to that Epistle. 'The connexion, though very close, does not lie on the surface. It is shown more by identities of thought and similarity in the structure of the two Epistles as wholes than by identities of phrase' (Hort p. 5). Salmon (Introd. pp. 443, 445), noting independently the same facts, suggests two interpretations of them. (a) 'We might conjecturally explain this difference by supposing the Epistle to the Romans to have been so long known to St. Peter that he had had time to become familiar with its language, while his acquaintance with the Ephesian Epistle was more recent.' (b) 'Peter may have arrived at Rome before Paul quitted it, in which case there would be a good deal of viva voce intercourse between the apostles, as there had been in former times. The doctrines taught by Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians would also naturally be the subject of his discourses to the Christians at Rome; and these discourses may have been heard by Peter.' Looking only, however, at the broad facts of the case, we may say that, if Ephesians was written by St. Paul during his first captivity, and if St. Peter visited Rome not long afterwards, the acquaintance of the writer of 1 P with Ephesians need cause no difficulty on the supposition that that writer was St. Peter.

From the question of literary we pass to that of doctrinal indebtedness. The writer of 1 P, it is urged (see above), in his theology takes St. Paul as his master. There is nothing, it is added, un-Pauline in the Epistle. The inference drawn is that St. Peter cannot be the author of the Epistle. Two observations cover a large part of the ground occupied by such criticisms. (1) Behind the argument there lies the tacit assumption that the two apostles stood in regard to each other in a position analogous to that taken by the leaders of two factions—a progressive and a reactionary party—leaders who alike by essential differences of principle and by the necessities of party-strife are prevented from learning from each other. Such a view of the mutual relation of the apostles is, it is believed, wholly unsupported by the evidence of the NT and of early Christian literature. (2) The Epistles of St. Paul form for us so large a part of the apostolic literature of the first age, i.e. the period prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, that insensibly we assume that ideas and doctrines emphasized in these Epistles must be of Pauline origin. That St. Paul had a predominant share in the moulding of Christian theology, there can be no doubt. But a body of Christian doctrine was growing up apart from the immediate sphere of his influence. St. Paul must have been a recipient as well as a source of spiritual intuitions. Estimating early writings by our imperfect criteria, we are probably in danger of exaggerating the Pauline element. Thus, to take as an example the crucial phrase ἐν Χριστῷ, which Jülicher regards as borrowed by St. Peter (3^{16} $5^{10.\ 14}$) from the Pauline Epistles, there is no question that St. Paul dwelt upon the phrase and placed it in many different lights. But did he create it? The evidence points to a negative answer. For (a) the phrase is in fact the echo of OT phrases—'in God,' e.g., Ps 56^4 60^{12} 62^7, 'in Jehovah,' e.g., Is $45^{17.\ 25}$, the Christian adaptation of these OT expressions being natural as the bearing of the Incarnation upon the doctrine of God was fully realized; (b) the idea is implied in Mt 18^{20}, and less distinctly in such references to 'the name' of Christ as Mk $9^{37ff.}$; (c) the conception finds repeated and emphatic expression in St. John's record of our Lord's sayings (e.g. 6^{56} $15^{4ff.}$); and if we accept these reports, which are clearly independent of Pauline influence, as in any degree historical, we can hardly doubt that the use of the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ must be traced back to Christ's own teaching. At any rate, an argument can hardly be founded on the assumption that the phrase was originated by St. Paul. On the other hand, the ideas expressed in 1 P 2^{24} $4^{1f.}$ may reasonably be considered to bear the stamp of an individual mind, and to have been learned from St. Paul's writings or from his spoken words. Further, when the doctrine of the Epistle comes to be examined, it will appear that it differs both negatively and positively from that of St. Paul's Epistles (cf. Hort p. 4).

To sum up: all that we learn of St. Peter from the NT gives us the picture of a man prompt and enthusiastic in action rather than fertile in ideas. His borrowing from St. James' Epistle shows that his mind was receptive and retentive of the thoughts of others. The Epistle undoubtedly owes much to St. Paul. But it is only when the Pauline element is isolated and exaggerated that it becomes a serious argument against the Petrine authorship of the Epistle.

Jülicher (p. 132) implies that, had not the name Peter been prefixed to the Epistle, no one would have supposed that St. Peter was the author. This position is so far true that, had the Epistle been anonymous, to assign the Epistle to St. Peter would have been an unverifiable hypothesis. We do not possess any document sufficiently authenticated as the work of St. Peter to be a standard by which the Petrine claims of such an Epistle could have been judged. The evidence of the speeches in the Acts, though worth consideration as confirmatory, is too indirect, and their date (assuming that they are substantially historical) too far removed from any date which can with any probability be given to the Epistle, for a reliable criterion to be supplied by them. But these considerations have a double application. If, on the one hand, they forbid the rash assertion that an anonymous document is Petrine, so, on the other hand, they are a warning against the hasty rejection of a document which bears St. Peter's name on the ground of its alleged un-Petrine character. The arguments urged to prove that 1 P is un-Petrine have been examined, and they have been shown to be unsubstantial, resting largely on unsupported presumptions. On the other hand, the serious difficulties involved in the hypothesis that the name Peter is a later addition have been pointed out, and it has been shown that the acceptance by the Church of the Epistle as the work of St. Peter was early in date, wide in extent, and unvarying.

But is the Petrine authorship to be accepted indeed, but accepted with certain qualifications? Zahn, following out the suggestions of earlier writers (Ewald, Grimm, Spitta), maintains (Einl.

ii. pp. 10, 16) that, while the Epistle originally bore the name of Peter, the apostle entrusted the actual composition of it to Silvanus, as one peculiarly fitted, certainly more fitted than himself, to put his thoughts into such a form as would appeal to the Gentile Christians of Asia Minor, —one, moreover, who was known to many of the readers of the letter, and whom they would therefore credit with accurately reproducing for them St. Peter's ideas. The question turns on the interpretation of 5^{12} διὰ Σιλουανοῦ ὑμῖν τοῦ πιστοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, ὡς λογίζομαι, δι' ὀλίγων ἔγραψα. The words τοῦ πιστοῦ ἀδ., Zahn argues, imply that the part taken by Silvanus was a responsible one, and therefore cannot have been that of a mere amanuensis. He must therefore have been either a messenger who conveyed the letter, or a friend who put St. Peter's thoughts into the form of a letter. The former alternative, it is argued, is excluded, because in that case the commendation would have been meaningless—painfully useless, if Silvanus proved untrue and the Epistle never came into the hands of its intended recipients; superfluous, if he delivered the letter to them. Against this theory the following considerations together seem decisive:— (1) If Silvanus were the real writer of the Epistle, especially if he is to be identified (see below) with the Silas of the Acts and the Silvanus of St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians and Corinthians (2 Co), we should expect some salutation from him to his readers. In Ro 16^{22} Tertius, who was simply the scribe, sends a greeting in the first person (ἀσπάζομαι ὑμᾶς ἐγὼ Τέρτιος ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν ἐν κυρίῳ). (2) Such a divided authorship —the main ideas being supplied by one man, their manipulation and expression being the work of another—could not result in a letter so natural and so easy in its passage from thought to thought, the transition to a fresh and important idea (e.g. 1^{10}) being sometimes due to an incidental phrase. (3) The tone of authority in 5^{1}, where the address is strictly personal, is explicable only on a theory either of deliberate personation or of real apostolic authorship. (4) The language of 5^{12} is absolutely natural if Silvanus was, what his position in the early Church (see below) fitted him to be, an apostolic delegate, who could, out of his own knowledge, speak of all personal matters and of the progress of the Church in Rome, and whose experience and special gifts (Ac 15^{32}) qualified him to give direction and instruction in questions of faith and of conduct. Compare especially Ac 15^{27}, Col $4^{7ff.}$, Eph $6^{21f.}$. The language in the context confirms this view: (a) the order of the words διὰ Σ. ὑμῖν τοῦ π. ἀδ. is remarkable, and seems designed to picture St. Peter's messenger and his friends face to face; (b) δι' ὀλίγων ἔγραψα implies that the apostle's written words were few, because he knew that they would be enforced and supplemented by the living voice of Silvanus.

For διά of the bearer of a letter compare διὰ βιβλαφόρων, Est 3^{13} 8^{10}; the subscriptions added in many MSS to the Pauline Epistles, e.g. Romans—ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Κορίνθου διὰ Φοίβης, curspl.; ἐπεμφθη δὲ διὰ Φοίβης, 133; the 'verso' of a letter in the Berlin Papyr. 385—ἀσπίδες Σακράτη Σωφᾶ ἀπὸ Σερηνίλλα θυγατρὸς διὰ Ζαραπαμμῶνος ἀδελφοῦ αὐτῆς. Further, γράφειν (γράψαι) διά τινος is used in reference to the bearer. In Ac 15^{23} the determination of the Church at Jerusalem to send delegates to Antioch is mentioned, in v.^{23} the additional fact that the delegates conveyed a letter. To the phrase in v.^{23} (γράψαντες διὰ χειρὸς αὐτῶν) there corresponds the phrase in v.^{30} ἐπέδωκαν τὴν ἐπιστολήν. So Polyc. ad Phil. xiv. 'Hæc uobis scripsi per Crescentem, quem in præsenti commendaui uobis et nunc commendo.' Three passages in the Ignatian Epistles are, at first sight, ambiguous, and may refer either to the scribes or to the bearers of the letters. (a) From Smyrna Ignatius wrote to three Churches near at hand (Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles) and to the distant Church of Rome. In ch. 10 of the Epistle to the last named Church he says, γράφω δὲ ὑμῖν ταῦτα ἀπὸ Σμύρνης δι' Ἐφεσίων τῶν ἀξιομακαρίστων. Several reasons make it probable that the Ephesians were the bearers and not the amanuenses of the letter—(1) The plural: it would be natural to dictate a short letter to one person; (2) the context: after a parenthetical sentence Ign continues: περὶ τῶν προελθόντων με ἀπὸ Συρίας ἕως Ῥώμης, the probability being that the mention of those who had gone before him from Syria to Rome is suggested by the mention of those who are even now going before him from Smyrna to Rome; (3) the sequel: at the next stage of the journey (Troas) only one of the Ephesians was still with Ignatius, viz. Burrhus. (b) From Troas Ignatius writes to the Philadelphians, the Smyrnæans, and to Polycarp. In the closing salutations of the two former Epistles the words occur—ἐν Τρωάδι ὅθεν καὶ γράφω ὑμῖν διὰ Βούρρου. Here the context gives no help towards the interpretation of διά. But other considerations seem decisive. If διά points to the scribe, then there seems to be no reason why the amanuensis should be mentioned in three letters (Rom., Philad., Smyr.), but passed over in silence in the remaining four letters. If, however, in each case διά designates the bearer, then the facts admit of an easy explanation. There would be no need to mention the messenger in the case of the letter to Polycarp; for the same person would be in charge of it who was entrusted with the letter to the Smyrnæans. Again, the distance from Smyrna to Ephesus, Magnesia, and Tralles was small, and there must have been constant means of communication, of which Ignatius would naturally avail himself. In the case of all the letters which had to travel far, the name of the bearer (or bearers) is consistently given. Further, the elaborate care bestowed by Ignatius (Smyr. xi., Polyc. vii. f.) and by Polycarp (ad Phil. xiii.) on the appointment of delegates to the Church of Syria, and the conveyance of letters by their means, is important as confirming the interpretation of the Ignatian phrase γράφειν διά τινος given above, and also as illustrating the employment in apostolic and sub-apostolic times of men of recognized position in communications between Churches.

VI. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF COMPOSITION.—The restoration of a history must be conjectural. The test of probability in such a case is the extent to which the scheme as a whole offers a natural explanation of the details which have a claim to be taken into account. In the preceding art. it was pointed out that a good deal of indirect evidence points to the supposition that St. Paul during his imprisonment himself summoned St. Peter to Rome, chiefly in order that the sight of the two apostles—the one commonly regarded as the Apostle of the Gentiles, the other as the Apostle of the Circumcision—planning and working together might bring home to the Roman Christians the great lesson of unity. St. Peter, we may suppose, arrived in Rome shortly before St. Paul's release. St. Paul had not very long before written the Epistle to the Ephesians, setting forth in it his mature views on fundamental questions, many of which could not but engage St. Peter's attention in Rome. It would therefore be almost inevitable that St. Peter should study, or, if he had read it before, should study afresh, that Epistle. Moreover—what is of more importance—he would be brought into close and unrestrained intercourse with the mind of the writer. Such intercourse might well recall to his memory the thoughts and words of the Epistle to the Romans, and perhaps suggest its re-perusal. It makes no great demand on the imagination to see how an Epistle written by St. Peter under such circumstances would be full of Pauline thought and Pauline language, and, in particular, would be likely not seldom to echo the words of the Epistles to the Romans and to the Ephesians.

Is it possible to arrive at any probable conclusion as to the point of time when the Epistle was written? (i.) The language of that important section of the Epistle which deals with obedience to the civil power (2^{13-17}), gains greatly in point and reality if it was used in view of St. Paul's appeal to the emperor having recently issued in his acquittal. It would be natural for one writing at such a time to recall what St. Paul had himself said on this subject (Ro $13^{1ff.}$), and, while using his expressions, to sharpen them and give them greater definiteness. Then it might well seem that 'the praise of them that do well' was an end of the magistrate's functions. If the decision of the Imperial Court had lately frustrated the endeavour of the Jews to secure the condemnation of the apostle of the true Messiah, the event would appear as a revelation of 'the will of God' in respect to His use of the power of the civil magistrate—ἀγαθοποιοῦντας φιμοῦν τὴν τῶν ἀφρόνων ἀνθρώπων ἀγνωσίαν. (ii.) Critics from many points of view have laid stress on the absence in the Epistle of any reference to St. Paul. It is one of the problems of the Epistle. But does not the difficulty vanish at once if we suppose that St. Peter wrote while St. Paul was still in Rome, and that Silvanus was undertaking as St. Paul's messenger a journey to the Churches of Asia Minor? In that case it would have been unnatural for the Epistle to convey a message from St. Paul; while news about St. Paul would be needless, since Silvanus would himself explain the position of affairs at Rome.

It is commonly taken for granted that the Silvanus of 1 P is the same person as the Silas of Acts and the Silvanus of St. Paul's Epistles. This is an assumption, though a highly probable one. Four persons bearing the name in the shortened form (Silas) meet us in the pages of Josephus. The name Silvanus is found in the form Σιλβανός in CIG 1816, 7256, in the form Σιλουανός in CIG 4039, 4071. The name, then, is not so common as to make it very likely that more than one Silvanus was closely connected with the apostles. And, further, what we know of the Silvanus of the earlier apostolic history corresponds so strikingly with the facts and probabilities involved in the mention of Silvanus in 1 P, that the identification is advanced many stages of probability. The points important for our present purpose are as follows. Silvanus appears suddenly at the time of the 'Council' at Jerusalem as an ἀνὴρ ἡγούμενος ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς (Ac 15^{22}). He is chosen by the Church at Jerusalem to undertake a mission of extreme delicacy as delegate to the Church of Antioch. There his prophetic gifts made a deep impression. After a time he returned to Jerusalem. That he had left Antioch before the painful controversy alluded to in Gal 2, and that he was not therefore one of οἱ λαοῦ Ἰουδαῖοι who proved faithless to St. Paul's teaching, seems clear from the fact that St. Paul deliberately selected him as his companion after the rupture with Barnabas and Mark (see art. MARK). As St. Paul's companion, he visited Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium. With him he traversed τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, and, having shared his journey along the borders of Mysia, with him entered Europe. When St. Paul was constrained by 'the brethren' to hasten from Berœa, he left behind him Silas and Timothy—Silas, doubtless, as his representative, and Timothy as Silas' companion and assistant—to carry out the important work of building up the recently planted Church. When the apostle arrived at Athens, he seems to have felt keenly the need of the support of Silas' and Timothy's presence (Ac 17^{15}). It seems probable that Timothy joined St. Paul at Athens, and was sent back by him thence to Thessalonica (1 Th 3^{1}), and that Silas remained in Macedonia and continued the work in other cities besides Berœa, till he at length, with Timothy, left Macedonia, and met St. Paul at Corinth (Ac 18^{5}). It is important to notice that, whatever the exact details of the history may have been, Silas was entrusted by St. Paul with the task of developing his own initial work in the Churches of Macedonia, to which the apostle himself, as time went on, became bound with unusually strong and tender ties of affection. After his arrival at Corinth, Silvanus disappears from the narrative of the Acts (cf 2 Co 1^{19}). Some ten years elapse, and we find a Silvanus at Rome, probably, as we have seen, while St. Paul was still in the city. (a) It would have been very natural for St. Paul's old companion to join him at Rome, where others among the apostle's former fellow-workers had gathered round him (Col 4$^{7\text{-}14}$, Philem 23^{f}). St. Paul clearly had special need of the sympathy and faithful co-operation of 'those who were of the circumcision' (Col 4^{11}). (b) On the other hand, the fact that Silvanus is not mentioned in any of the Epistles of the Captivity, and that he appears in the city, apparently not long after the last of these was written, in connexion with St. Peter, suggests the probability that he came to Rome with St. Peter. Silvanus was in early days closely connected with the Churches of Jerusalem and Antioch (Ac 15$^{22.\ 32.\ 33}$), and it may well be that after he ceased to travel with St. Paul he resumed work in Syria. St. Peter, as we saw, probably came to Rome from Syria, possibly from Antioch. The two men may thus have been much thrown together in later as in earlier years. If St. Peter was summoned to Rome by St. Paul himself with the express purpose of deepening the unity of the Church, he would naturally choose as the companion of his journey to the capital one of St. Paul's old associates. For such a mission Silvanus was peculiarly fitted. He was a Jewish Christian who had long possessed the confidence of the leaders of the Church at Jerusalem (Ac 15$^{22ff.}$). He had been closely associated with St. Paul. He was a Roman citizen (Ac 16^{37}). St. Paul was in the habit of sending his most trusted friends as his delegates to distant places to consolidate or to extend his work. It would be very natural that he should send Silvanus on such a mission to districts in some of which were Churches in planting which they had worked together, while in others were Christian communities which must have been to some extent the indirect outcome of their common work. On the assumption, then, that we have to deal with only one Silvanus in the apostolic history, we are able to weave the probabilities into a natural and consistent narrative; and, so far as is possible in such cases, the assumption is justified.

But why does St. Peter seize the opportunity of Silvanus' journey to write an Epistle to the Churches of Asia Minor? There is no indication that he had any personal knowledge of his readers in any of the districts to which he writes. It does not appear that he wished to bring before them and the Church generally any characteristic convictions of his as to the interpretation of the Christian faith, as St. Paul desired to do in the Epistles to the Romans and to the 'Ephesians.' No controversy is touched upon by him. The Epistle bears no trace of having been called forth by the difficulties or needs of any particular Church. Is not the motive which led St. Peter to write a letter to the Christians scattered over the vast districts of Asia Minor the same which we saw reason for thinking brought him to Rome? It is plain that if Silvanus, who long before had been known to some of these Churches as a companion of St. Paul, and who now was travelling as St. Paul's delegate, brought with him a letter from St. Peter, the effect on the minds of the Asiatic Christians would be only less powerful than that produced on the Roman Christians by the sight of the two apostles working and planning together in the Capital. The fact that the letter was written and received under such circumstances, would be the strongest enforcement of the lesson of the Church's unity. The Epistle may even have been written at St. Paul's request. But however that may be, the motive suggested seems adequate and simple. It harmonizes with the phenomena of the Epistle, and indeed throws fresh light on some of them. Thus it is no longer surprising that there is no great thought or purpose, doctrinal or personal, which dominates the whole Epistle. Its scope is truly summed up in the very general words — ἔγραψα παρακαλῶν καὶ ἐπιμαρτυρῶν ταύτην εἶναι ἀληθῆ χάριν τοῦ θεοῦ (5^{12}). Again, the Pauline tone of the Epistle is seen to correspond with all the circumstances of its composition. If these were what we have found reason to think them to have been, the letter could not but be Pauline. Once more, have we not here a final explanation of the fact that, though the mind of St. Peter constantly recurs to the words of Christ, he makes only indirect allusions to the privilege which he once had of watching the life of the Incarnate Lord? To have dwelt on this would have been to appear to disparage the apostolate of St. Paul.

To sum up: all the conditions of the problem seem to be satisfied if we assign the Epistle to a time shortly after St. Paul's trial had ended in his acquittal. The power of the Roman State seemed to be on the side of the Church. But the hatred of the Jews was an enemy 'scotched, not killed,' nay, perhaps it was intensified because deprived of its expected prey. Nor would the social trials of the Christians among their heathen neighbours be lessened by the Imperial decision. The daily experience of a Christian at Rome might well suggest serious warnings as to the proving of faith through suffering. The situation was as follows. St. Paul had himself summoned St. Peter to Rome, with the supreme object of showing to the Christians at Rome and to 'the brotherhood in the world' the unity of the Body and of the Spirit. St. Peter had arrived in Rome, and with him St. Paul's old companion Silvanus. After St. Paul's release Silvanus consents to become his delegate, as he had been years before, and on his behalf to undertake a long journey in Asia Minor. Silvanus would explain to these Churches the situation at Rome. He would enforce the spiritual and doctrinal lessons which were uppermost in St. Paul's mind. But the work of consolidating the Churches, and in them the Church, would be greatly advanced if Silvanus, the messenger of St. Paul, brought with him a letter from St. Peter. The letter itself might deal with general topics, as indeed was inevitable when it was addressed to readers spread over so vast an area. But the fact that it was written by St. Peter, now a fellow-worker with St. Paul at Rome, and transmitted by the common friend of both apostles, now executing St. Paul's commission, was itself the revelation of the mind of the apostles, and a call to deepen the common life of 'the brotherhood,' the significance of which cannot be exaggerated.

It is right to notice two other recent reconstructions of the apostolic history in connexion with the composition of 1 P. The points in which they are open to criticism have been sufficiently indicated in the preceding sections and in art. PETER. (1) Zahn's theory (Einl. ii. p. 18 f.) is as follows:—It is almost impossible to explain the silence of the Epistle as to St. Paul if St. Peter wrote either at a time when the two apostles were together in Rome or after St. Paul's death. It is probable that Mark went from Rome to Asia Minor (Col 4^{10}) in the autumn of 62, or early in 63, and afterwards visited Jerusalem. From him St. Peter learned the difficulties which the Jewish Christian teachers had created for St. Paul, and also the intention of the latter after his expected release to undertake a journey to the far West. St. Peter felt these tidings to be a call to himself to visit Rome. Such a visit was no violation of the compact recorded in Gal 2, since the Roman Church had not been founded by St. Paul, and was composed of Jewish Christians, many of whom were Palestinian Jews. St. Peter arrived in Rome in the autumn of 63 or early in 64. St. Paul had already left the city. Since the duration of St. Paul's missionary journey to Spain could not be foreseen, it was natural that St. Peter should tread in St. Paul's footsteps in other ways, and in particular in caring for the Churches of Asia. The fact that Silvanus assisted him in writing the Epistle, enabled him to strike a note in the letter which would find an echo in the hearts of men who directly or indirectly owed their Christianity to St. Paul. As nothing in the Epistle implies that he had recently arrived in Rome, and as his correspondents appear to be already aware of the fact that he was in the city, St. Peter probably wrote the Epistle in the course of the year 64, a few months before his martyrdom. (2) Swete (St. Mark p. xvii f.) follows Lightfoot in dissociating the martyrdom of St. Peter from that of St. Paul, but argues that 'it is open to consideration whether St. Paul's was not the earlier.' He thinks that 'an examination of 1 Peter supplies more than one reason for believing the Epistle to have been written subsequently to St. Paul's death.' Over and above the references to persecution which, he thinks, point to 70–75 as the limit of date, he notices that the letter is addressed to Christian communities some of which were Pauline Churches; that its bearer is 'a well-known colleague of St. Paul'; that it contains reminiscences of two of St. Paul's writings (Eph, Ro). 'The conclusion can scarcely be avoided that at the time when it was written St. Paul had finished his course. The care of the Churches had devolved on St. Peter; the two oldest associates of St. Paul had transferred their services to the surviving Apostle; both had originally been members of the Church at Jerusalem, and, when the attraction of the stronger personality had been withdrawn, both had returned to their earlier leader. St. Peter on his part is careful to show by the character of his letter and by his selection of colleagues that he has no other end than to take up and carry on the work of St. Paul.'

It remains to notice the evidence supplied by the Epistle as to the intended journey of Silvanus. On the questions suggested by $1\,P\ 1^1$ see especially Hort's dissertation, 'The Provinces of Asia Minor included in St. Peter's address' (1 Peter pp. 157–184; cf. p. 17). Hort shows that (1) the position of Asia neither first nor last in the list, (2) the fact 'that Pontus and Bithynia stand at opposite ends of the list, though they together formed but a single province, the title of which combined both names,' indicate that in that list we have presented the projected course of the journey. Silvanus 'was to enter Asia Minor by a seaport of Pontus, and thence to make a circuit till [he] reached the neighbourhood of the Euxine once more.' Why he purposed to land in Pontus it is vain to conjecture. The condition of the Christian communities, or some special call to evangelistic work in that district or in the districts to which he would thus best gain access, may have been the determining motive. It is probable that Silvanus was to land at Sinope, the most important of the towns on the seaboard of Pontus. Thence he would visit the northern portion of the vast province of Galatia, probably making its capital Ancyra his headquarters. At Ancyra he would find more than one road by which he could reach Cæsarea, the one town of considerable importance in Cappadocia. Taking at this point the great road running westward to Ephesus, he would be able to visit the Churches in South Galatia, and so to enter the province of Asia. Northwards there lay Christian communities through which he would pass on his way to Bithynia, where it seems to have been the intention that he should again take ship. 'In thus following by natural and simple routes the order of provinces which stands in the first sentence of the Epistle, Silvanus would be brought into contact with every considerable district north of the Taurus in which there is reason to suppose that Christian communities would be found' (Hort p. 184).

VII. SUMMARY OF THE EPISTLE.—The opening of a new section in the Epistle is marked in 2^{11} 4^{12} by the appeal conveyed by the word ἀγαπητοί. Thus the letter has three main divisions of which the several topics may be thus approximately represented—(I.) 1^1–2^{10} the privileges belonging to the redeemed family of God; (II.) 2^{11}–4^{11} the duties of 'the brethren'; (III.) 4^{12}–5^{14} the trials of 'the brethren.' The different sections, however, overlap in regard to their subjects, and the thought of the Epistle is too spontaneous and (in a literary sense) too unpremeditated to admit of any formal analysis. The following paraphrase is an attempt to bring out the sequence and general treatment of ideas:—

I. 1^1–2^{10}. The privileges belonging to the redeemed family of God.—(1) $1^{1ff.}$. Salutation. (2) 1^{3-12}. The joy of σωτηρία. (a) Vv.3-5. Benediction of the Father for the new birth and the heavenly inheritance. (b) Vv.6-9. This joy in Christ is maintained by you in the midst of present sorrows, the issue of which will be seen at 'the revelation of Jesus Christ.' Faith in an unseen Lord is the spring whence comes this joy of σωτηρία. (c) Vv.10-12. This σωτηρία was the subject of the prophets' search, as they foretold the facts which evangelists proclaimed to you, and which angels desire to discern. (3) 1^{13}–2^{10}. The fruits of this σωτηρία in life. (a) Vv. 13-21. Seriousness. Such being your position, do you, with minds alert and passions in control, set your hope on the Divine grace ever supplied to you, as Jesus Christ is gradually revealed to you. Not your sinful past, but the holiness of God must be the standard of your life. You must be solemnized by (α) the remembrance that your 'Father in heaven' is a strict Judge; (β) the thought of the greatness of the price paid for your redemption from an inheritance of vanity. (b) Vv.22-25. Love towards the members of the spiritual family. The self-purification involved in redemption leads on to the cultivation of love towards the members of the spiritual family—genuine, deep, active. This is a duty which flows from the fact of ἀναγέννησις. (c) $2^{1ff.}$. Growth. If (on the negative side) you have stripped off from yourselves malice and such unchildlike vices, you must (on the positive side) surrender yourselves to your true spiritual instincts and live by the spiritual milk, the spiritual sustenance which is the direct gift of God. So you will grow up unto σωτηρία. (d) 2-10. Privilege. Christ is the living stone, rejected by the act of men but in God's sight ἔντιμος. He is the foundation on which you are being built up as a spiritual house for spiritual acts of worship. This view of Christ (i.e. as the foundation stone) finds expression in the very letter of Scripture (Is 28^{16}). It has a double aspect. On the one hand, it is for you who believe that He is ἔντιμος. On the other hand, for those who disbelieve, the Psalmist's words about the stone of stumbling are true, their very stumbling being within the limits of the Divine purpose. But you are the true Israel, with all the privileges of the λαὸς θεοῦ.

II. 2^{11}–4^{11}. The brotherhood which is in the world, and its duties.—(1) $2^{11ff.}$. General introductory counsels. Be like mere sojourners in the world. Let the moral beauty of your conduct make your very detractors watch you, so that in the day of decision they may glorify God. (2) 2^{13}–3^{12}. Duty of submission to every Divine institution among men. (a) 2-17. Subjects and civil magistrates. For Christian freedom must not be a cloak for (social or political) disaffection. 'Honour the king' is one practical application of the universal rule 'Honour all men.' (b) 2-25. Slaves and masters. Obey even unreasonable masters. He who does right and patiently suffers wrong, pleases God. To nothing less than this were you called. For Christ suffered for us; and in all His sufferings left us the pattern-sketch of a life of sinless endurance and constant trust (c) 3-6. Wives and husbands. To watch the wife's serious and pure life may win the husband who has been deaf to the spoken message. Her adornment must be within—a spirit placid in itself, gentle towards others. Such is the example of the wives of ancient story. (d) 3-7. Husbands. Husbands have a corresponding duty—to pay their wives the reverence due to their weakness. Those who share an earthly home (συνοικοῦντες) must behave to each other as those who share (συγκληρόνομοι) the heavenly inheritance. (e) 3$^{8-12}$. A summary of mutual duties (cf. 5^{5}). In a word, let kindness rule. Do not return evil for evil, but bless your revilers; for the inheritance of blessing is the end of the Christian calling (Ps 34$^{12-16}$). (f) 3$^{13-22}$. Suffering and its reward. I spoke of evil. Who shall do you evil, if you be champions of good? But even should you suffer for righteousness' sake, you are happy. Do not fear, but make your hearts a sanctuary for the Christ. Towards others, be always ready to explain and defend your faith to any questioner. In yourselves, maintain a good conscience, that your conduct may shame your detractors. For, should this be God's will, it is better that you, like Christ, should suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing. For Christ once for all, i.e. dealing decisively with sins, died, the just on behalf of the unjust, that He might bring you (then afar off) to God. But these sufferings had (as yours will have) their issue in blessing. (i.) On the one hand, His being put to death in regard to His flesh was His quickening in regard to His (human) spirit. Clothed in that human spirit He extended (καί) His sphere of ministry. He journeyed and made proclamation to the spirits in prison, spirits who slighted God's long-suffering in the days when the ark was being built. In the ark only eight souls were saved, the water (which to others was the instrument of judgment) bearing up the ark and so becoming an instrument of σωτηρία. The reality, of which the water of the Flood was a type, even baptism, saves (σάζει) you; not the external cleansing of the flesh, but the inquiry of a good conscience after God,* the final source of its efficacy being the resurrection of Jesus Christ. (ii.) The patient suffering of Christ had a second issue—His triumph. He journeyed (as before into Hades 3^{19}, so now) into heaven and is at God's right hand, the victorious sovereign over all spiritual powers. (g) 4$^{1-6}$. The ideal of Christian life. Christ then suffered in relation to the flesh. Hence the true conception of life. Let it be your armour. To have suffered in regard to the flesh means to have ceased to exist in regard to sins. Realize your spiritual position by living no longer by the rule of the manifold lusts of men, but by the one will of God. It is enough to have given the past to the heathen vices of debauchery, drunkenness, idolatry. The heathen wonder that you hold aloof from their vile riot, and traduce your motives. But the injustice is not for ever. They will have to give an account to Him with whom the judgment of living and dead is 'as a very little thing' (ἐτοίμως). Such judgment of the dead is just. For the proclamation of the gospel to the dead had this for its object, that, while the dead must be judged after the pattern of men in reference to the flesh (the earthly life), they may nevertheless be enabled to live after the pattern of God (cf. 1^{15}) in reference to the spirit. (h) 4$^{7-11}$. Christian life in view of the approaching end. The end of all things is near. Therefore be serious and devout. Most of all, cultivate mutual love. Let each man use his peculiar endowment for the good of the whole body—his gift of utterance, relying on Divine inspiration; his gift of ministry, resting on Divine strength. So God will be glorified.

III. 4^{12}–5^{14}. The trials of the brethren.—(1) 4$^{12-19}$. Trust in the midst of suffering. Let not God's process of testing and refining you seem to you strange, as if some strange chance were befalling you. Rather rejoice at your participation in the sufferings of the Christ, that when His glory is revealed your joy may be intensified. To bear Christ's reproach is an outward sign of a spiritual grace resting on you. I say Christ's reproach, for I would not have any of you suffer for any criminal act or for any social indiscretion. But to suffer as a Christian is a reason not for shame but for thanksgiving. You must expect suffering. For the set time has come for the judgment to begin with God's household. What, then, shall be the end of those who wilfully reject the gospel? Hence let those who have even to suffer in fulfilment of the Divine purpose do right and commend themselves to a Creator who will not 'forsake the work of his own hands.' (2) 5$^{1-5}$. Pastors and people. I who share their office (and so can sympathize with them), and am a witness to the sufferings of the Christ (and so speak with authority), charge your elders to shepherd God's flock, not in the spirit of slaves or hirelings or tyrants. Then when the Chief Shepherd is manifested they will have their reward. You younger men have a corresponding duty, to be subject to elders. All of you—your duty is humility and mutual service. (3) 5$^{6-11}$. Final counsels. Humble yourselves under God's dealings that He may exalt you. Cast your anxiety on Him, knowing His providential care for you. Watch; for the devil ravins for you as a prey. Firm through your faith resist him, conscious that for your brethren throughout the world the same sufferings are being fulfilled. God who called you, He, after your brief space of suffering, will strengthen you. (4) 5$^{12-14}$. Commendation of the bearer of the letter. Salutations.

VIII. Doctrine of the Epistle.—In this section an attempt will be made to indicate in outline the doctrinal teaching contained in the Epistle. The letter is a λόγος παρακλήσεως, and contains no systematic exposition of any part of the Christian faith. But in the mind of the writer there is a consistent and comprehensive theology which finds incidental and instinctive expression.

* The history of Cornelius (Ac 10$^{22.\ 31.\ 47}$) is the best commentary on the phrase ἐπερώτημα εἰς θεόν in this connexion.

The Petrine speeches in the Acts were called forth by special circumstances, and (except the speeches recorded in Ac 10$^{30-43}$ 15$^{7-11}$) were all addressed to non-Christian Jews at Jerusalem. We have no right, therefore, to look to them for the full cycle of Christian doctrine which even 'in the beginning of the Gospel' St. Peter had apprehended. The following coincidences, however, between 1 P and the Petrine speeches recorded in the Acts are noteworthy:—1 P 1^{10} (προφῆται) ‖ Ac 3$^{18.\ 21.\ 24}$ 10^{43}, cf. 2$^{16ff.}$ 25ff 3$^{22\ 25}$; 1$^{11.\ 21}$ ‖ 2^{24} 3$^{2f.}$ 3^{13ff} 4^{10} 5$^{30f.}$ 10^{40}; 1^{21} ‖ 3^{16}; 2^{7} ‖ 4^{11} (Ps); 2^{24} (ξύλον) ‖ 5^{30} 10^{39}; 4^{5} ‖ 10^{42} (see also 2 Ti 4^{1}); 5^{1} ‖ 1^{22} 2^{32} 3^{15} 10$^{39\ 41}$. Of these coincidences, the parallel between 1 P 1^{21} (τοὺς δι' αὐτοῦ πιστοὺς) and Ac 3^{16} (ἡ πίστις ἡ δι' αὐτοῦ) is very remarkable. It is the kind of coincidence which suggests direct connexion of some kind. Mere literary dependence on the one side or the other is not supported by coincidences between 1 P and portions of the Acts other than the Petrine speeches. The suggestion made on other grounds (see above, p. 762 n.), that St. Peter and St. Luke may well have met in Rome, should in this connexion be kept in mind.

(1) The doctrine of God.—(a) The Holy Trinity. —As elsewhere in the NT (2 Th 2^{13}, 1 Co 12$^{4ff.}$, 2 Co 13^{14}, Eph 3$^{14ff.}$ 4$^{3ff.}$, Jude 20$^{f.}$, cf. Rev 1^{4}), the Three Persons are revealed in their several relations to the complete redemption of man (1^{2}). The fact that the Three Names are not given in the order of historical manifestation is an indication that the Persons are regarded as 'coequal' (cf. 2 Co 13^{14}). The mystery of the essential relation of the Three Persons is not otherwise touched upon. In regard to their relation κατ' οἰκονομίαν, the Father is spoken of as 'the God and Father' of the incarnate Lord ('Jesus Christ,' 1^{3}), and as the object of His unfailing trust in the extremity of humiliation (2^{23}), while the temporal mission of the Spirit is referred to (1^{12}). (b) The Father. The unique phrase πιστὸς κτίστης (4^{19}) implies that the relation of God to man as Creator is the final basis of trust (cf. Mt 6$^{25ff.}$, He 12^{9}). The spiritual Fatherhood of God, i.e. the regeneration of men through the revelation in Christ and the Divine act of the resurrection, is a root-thought in the Epistle (1$^{3.\ 23}$), and from it springs the social teaching as to φιλαδελφία. (c) The Son. Is the pre-existence of Christ asserted or postulated in the Epistle? In the phrase τὸ ἐν αὐτοῖς [sc. τοῖς προφήταις] πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ (1^{11}), the reference in Χριστοῦ is not primarily personal; the word rather alludes to the conception of the Messiah progressively revealed and apprehended (see Hort's note). Again, in 1^{20} φανερωθέντος is placed in antithesis to προεγνωσμένου, and therefore does not necessarily imply personal pre-existence. The words, however, in 3$^{18f.}$ appear to be decisive. The personality of Him whose actions are described resided neither in the σάρξ (cf. 4^{1}) nor in the πνεῦμα. Clothed in that human spirit (ἐν ᾧ), when the flesh had been laid aside in death, He carried out His ministry among the dead. Thus the passage distinctly implies that He who worked on earth and in Hades was a superhuman Person, assuming all the elements of human nature, and therefore existing before the beginning of the human life. (d) The Spirit. The Spirit is mentioned in 1$^{2.\ 11f.}$ 4^{14}. In 4^{14} the words, an echo of Is 11^{2}, are a Christian adaptation of the thought and language of the OT. The Spirit of God which rested on Messiah is the portion of those also who suffer for Messiah's sake. The earlier passage (1^{11}) is, as was seen above, closely connected with the ancient Messianic hope. 'The Spirit of Messiah' was 'in the Prophets.' But the mention of the Spirit in v.^{11} cannot be disconnected from the mention of the Spirit in v.^{12}. The Spirit was the power through which the witness of the ancient prophets and the witness of Christian evangelists were rendered. Thus the two verses together emphasize the continuity of revelation (cf. the 'Constantinopolitan' Creed). For in v.^{12} (διὰ τῶν εὐαγγ. ὑμᾶς πνεύματι ἁγίῳ ἀποσταλέντι ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ) the reference is definite, not to a but to the Holy Spirit. The absence of the article simply brings out the character of the power—'through no less a power than the Holy Spirit'; compare, e.g., Ro 8[14-16] and the anarthrous but definite use of θεός, Χριστός, κύριος, υἱός (He 1[2]). The addition of ἀποστ. ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ can hardly be taken otherwise than as an allusion to the historical gift of the Spirit at Pentecost.

(2) Redemption.—Everything in regard both to the Redeemer (1[20], cf. Ac 2[23]) and the redeemed (1[1f.]) is conditioned by the πρόγνωσις of the Father. Even disobedience to the gospel does not lie outside the sphere of His purpose (2[8]). The preparation is dwelt on in 1[10-12]. The prophetic witness was twofold—(α) to the sufferings destined for Messiah (εἰς Χρ.) and the different elements in His subsequent glory; (b) to the Divine grace destined for the Gentiles (εἰς ὑμᾶς, cf. Ac 10[45]). It should be noted that in this Epistle there is no allusion to the Law either in its ceremonial or in its moral aspect, nor again (except the passing reference to the 'holy women,' 3[5f.]) to the ancient story of Israel; contrast St. Paul's Epistles. The Divine Person took human nature in its completeness—σάρξ and πνεῦμα (3[18]); in 2[24] the Lord's σῶμα is spoken of, but St. Peter has no occasion to refer to the Lord's ψυχή, in St. Paul's psychology the σῶμα and the ψυχή together making up the σάρξ. Christ was sinless (2[22f.], the language being derived from Is 53[9]; cf. 1[19]). He endured the last issue of the life of sinful man in the separation of 'flesh' and 'spirit,' and 'in His spirit' passed into the unseen world of waiting human spirits (3[19], cf. Ac 2[27. 31]). His death is presented in a twofold aspect. On the one hand, it consummated the example of the typical human life (2[21]). On the other hand, in His death He met the needs of sinful men. He 'died' to help them—δίκαιος ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων (3[18]). And His help to them consisted in this, that He finally and effectually dealt with sins (ἅπαξ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, 3[18]). The mode in which He dealt with sins is developed in 2[24]. Adopting the language of Is 53[12], the apostle says that the Sinless One 'took our sins' (not sin as a principle, but the concrete sins of men) to Himself, i.e. by virtue of His representative humanity. His human 'body' was, as it were, the vessel in which the sins of men were gathered (ἐν τῷ σώματι αὐτοῦ) and borne to the last extreme of humiliation—the ξύλον involving to the mind of Jews the Divine curse (Dt 21[23]). By His death (so the context implies) His relation to the flesh and to sins finally ended (2[24] 4[1], cf. Ro 6[10]), so that the true life of humanity is henceforth ideally set free from the dominion of sin. This freedom the redeemed have to work out in their several lives. In 1[18f.] a different line of thought is followed. Gentiles (for it is to Gentile Christians that the Epistle is addressed, see above) were ransomed (ἐλυτρώθητε—the word is taken from Is 52[3]; cf. especially Mt 20[28], 1 Ti 2[6]) from bondage to an inheritance of vanity, and the ransom was no less a price than the 'precious blood' (cf. Ps 72[14] Heb., 115 (116)[6 (15)] LXX) of Christ. Christ Himself is likened to a lamb free from intrinsic blemish and from accidental stain (ἀμώμου καὶ ἀσπίλου). The whole cycle of ideas is probably derived from the history of the first Passover and of Israel's redemption from Egypt. The reserve of the passage is remarkable. Nothing is said in regard to the question to whom the λύτρον was paid. The sacrificial language is metaphorical (ὡς ἀμνοῦ); it is simple and is not developed. The αἷμ of the Lord's sufferings is twofold. It has a heavenly and an earthly side. On the one hand, ἀπέθανεν . . . ἵνα ὑμᾶς προσαγάγῃ τῷ θεῷ (3[18]). There is a slight emphasis on ὑμᾶς—'you Gentiles who were afar off' (Eph 2[13]). Christ dealt with the sins of men, and remained Himself δίκαιος. His work and His abiding character fitted Him to bring those whom He had freed from sin into the presence of God. The ideas of mediatorship and reconciliation lie in the background. On the other hand, Christ bore our sins ἵνα ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις ἀπογενόμενοι τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ ζήσωμεν (2[24]). Here and in 4[1f.] Christ's death is described as involving the Christian's death to sin (cf. St. Paul, e.g., Ro 6[2ff.]). The correlative idea of 'the life to righteousness' leads naturally to the teaching of the Epistle in regard to the resurrection. The resurrection in regard to Christ Himself is described as the reversal (1[11] 3[22]; cf. 4[13] 5[1]) through the act of the Father (1[21]) of the humiliation involved in suffering and death—a conception which is prominent in the Petrine speeches in the Acts (see above, p. 766), but which in the Epistle falls into the background. In regard to men, it is δι' ἀναστάσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (α) that the Father 'begat anew' (ἀναγεννήσας) all Christian men (ἡμᾶς, 1[3], cf. 1[23]); (b) that Baptism becomes in the gospel dispensation (νῦν) the crisis of salvation to each (ὑμᾶς . . . σώζει, 3[21]; cf. Tit 3[5] ἔσωσεν). Further, the effect of redemption is not limited to the initiation of the Christian life. If 'sanctification by the Spirit' is represented (1[2]) as the influence which surrounds (ἐν) the working out of the Divine purpose in the case of the ἐκλεκτοί, that ἐκλογή has for its immediate end (εἰς) the twofold issue ὑπακοὴ καὶ ῥαντισμὸς αἵματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ—a life lived in accordance with the Divine will and pattern (1[14. 22], cf. e.g. 1[16] 2[15]), and continually cleansed from the defilement of sin by the application of the quickening blood of Christ. The thought and the language are derived from the OT. The phrase ῥαντισμὸς αἵματος recalls at once the ὕδωρ ῥαντισμοῦ of Nu 19[9. 13. 20f.] (cf. He 12[24], Barn. v. 1 ἐν τῷ αἵματι τοῦ ῥαντίσματος αὐτοῦ). In ancient Israel provision was made whereby the faithful Israelite, defiled by contact with the dead, should be sprinkled with 'the water of separation.' In the true Israel not water poured on the ashes of the victim, but the blood of Jesus Christ (cf. He 9[13f.]), is ever ready for the cleansing of those who are obedient, but who from time to time are defiled through contact with evil. Thus the sequence of thought is precisely that in 1 Jn 1[7] (ἐὰν ἐν τῷ φωτὶ περιπατῶμεν . . . τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ κ.τ.λ.).* The end of the divinely sustained growth (2[2]) and of the discipline of the Christian man (1[5]) is 'salvation' (εἰς σωτηρίαν)—that 'perfect soundness' which answers to God's purpose in creation.

(3) The Church.—The two aspects in which the Christian Church is prominently presented in this Epistle are closely related to OT language and Jewish thought. (α) The Church is regarded 'as first and foremost the true Israel of God, the one legitimate heir of the promises made to Israel' (Hort p. 7). Hence in 2[9f.] the remarkable transference to Christians in their corporate aspect of the prerogatives which belonged to Israel. The Christian Society is represented as a priestly body (2[9]) chosen to do priestly service (2[5]), but the spiritual character of this worship (as opposed to the material and merely ceremonial worship of ancient Israel) is insisted on (πνευματικὰς θυσίας, 2[5]; cf. Ro 12[1], Jn 4[23]). The idea of the new Israel is not foreign to St. Paul (e.g. Gal 6[16]) or other writers of the NT, but nowhere is it insisted on with such emphasis as here. (b) The Church is a universal brotherhood (2[17] 5[9]). In the OT Israelites are constantly described as 'brethren' (e.g. Ex 4[18], Dt

* Hort, basing the interpretation of the phrase on Ex 24[3-8] concludes that the reference is to an initial pledge of obedience and an initial 'sprinkling with blood'—the admission to the Christian covenant. The preposition εἰς (emphasized by juxtaposition with ἐν), pointing to a goal, and the position of the clause seem to the present writer strong arguments against this interpretation.

18^{15}, Neh 5^{8}); for the usage of later times comp. e.g. 2 Mac 1^{1}, Ac 22^{5} 28^{21}. In the true Israel the tie is not natural, but spiritual. It grows out of the fundamental fact of the Divine ἀναγέννησις (1^{3}). The duties involved in this brotherhood are distinctly described as flowing from the spiritual relation of Christians to God as their Father—ἀλλήλους ἀγαπήσατε . . . ἀναγεγεννημένοι (1^{23}). Hence the repeated insistence on ἀγάπη and φιλαδελφία (1^{22} 2^{17} 4^{8}). If the very term ἀδελφότης (2^{17} 5^{9}) emphasizes the notion of unity, the qualifying words ἡ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ (5^{9}; cf. διασπορᾶς, 1^{1}) suggest the idea of universality: the 'brotherhood' is catholic. Little is said of the organization of the Church. The spirit in which elders are to work is enforced in $5^{1ff.}$. In $4^{10f.}$ there is an allusion to the due exercise of χαρίσματα in the Christian Society, and particular reference is made to those who teach and those who minister. The term ἐκκλησία, however, does not occur in the Epistle. The allusions to the Church suggest that, while the writer had a deep realization of the broad facts, he had not been led specially to ponder on their inner significance and promise, as the 'Ephesians' shows that St. Paul had done.

(4) Eschatology.—The Epistle holds an important position in the NT in respect to eschatological teaching. St. Peter (4^{7}) regards the 'end of all things,' i.e. the great consummation, when the present order will pass away, as near at hand. In this point there is an important contrast between the teaching of this Epistle and that of the later Epistles of St. Paul (Hort, Romans and Ephesians p. 141 f.). The time of the end is regarded under two chief aspects. (1) It will be a time of ἀποκάλυψις. Then the progressive 'revelation of Jesus Christ' (1^{13}) will culminate in a final 'revelation of Jesus Christ' (1^{7} 5^{4}; cf. Lk 17^{30}), a 'revelation of his glory' (4^{13}; cf. $1^{11.\ 21}$). Then will be the καιρὸς ἔσχατος when the 'inheritance' of Christians will be 'revealed,'* their participation in the glory 'which shall be revealed' (5^{1}), God's αἰώνιος δόξα which was the goal of their 'calling' (5^{10}). (2) It will be a time of judgment. God, indeed, is essentially ὁ κρίνων—ἀπροσωπολήμπτως (negatively, without partiality; 1^{17}), δικαίως (positively, with absolute justice; 2^{23}), ἑτοίμως (with the unerring precision of perfect knowledge; 4^{5}). His judgment is individual, and is determined by each man's action (1^{17}). It will then comprehend 'quick and dead' (4^{5}; cf. Ac 10^{42}, 2 Ti 4^{1}). It will be observed that, throughout, the judgment is ascribed to the final authority of the Father (cf. e.g. Ro 14^{10}), and that nothing is said in the Epistle of the mediatorship of the Son in the judgment (Ro 2^{16}, 2 Co 5^{10}; cf. Jn $5^{22.\ 27}$).

But the question inevitably arises, How will perfect justice in judging the dead deal with those who died before the proclamation of the gospel? To this question St. Peter gives an answer in 4^{6}, in close connexion with which we must take $3^{19f.}$. The difficulty of the two passages lies not so much in any obscurity of language as in the mysterious nature both of the subject with which they deal and of the problems which they suggest. The earlier of the two passages ($3^{19f.}$) is limited in scope, dealing only with the case of those who, being disobedient, perished in the great typical judgment of the ancient world. The interpretations which explain the words as referring either (1) to an antediluvian mission of Christ, or (2) to an evangelization of the angels who fell (Jude ^{6}, 2 P 2^{4}), appear (in view of the context, the grammatical construction, and the parallel in 4^{6}) to be quite untenable. What appears to be the simple and natural view of the passages is given in the paraphrase above. It may further be observed (α) that the apostle necessarily uses the language of human experience (πορευθείς; cf. v.^{22}), though narrating events transcending human experience; (b) that the phrase τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν in reference to Hades is quite natural language for a Jew; comp. Apoc. Bar xxiii. 4 'a place was prepared where the living might dwell and the dead might be guarded,' 2 Es $7^{85.\ 95}$; (c) that it is not impossible that the apostle's language (ἐκήρυξε . . . φυλακῇ) was suggested by Is $61^{1f.}$ 42^{7} 49^{9}. The emphasis of the passage rests on the Person of the κῆρυξ. The later passage (4^{6}) differs from the earlier in three important respects: (a) the reference is not limited to the dead belonging to one generation. The anarthrous καὶ νεκροῖς is not in itself necessarily universal in scope, but here it must be interpreted in the light of the preceding words (τῷ . . . κρίνοντι ζῶντας καὶ νεκρούς); (β) the main point here (according to the requirements of the context) is the simple fact that the gospel was preached to the dead, not (as in 3^{19}) the agent in its proclamation; hence the difference of wording (ἐκήρυξεν, εὐηγγελίσθη) is no argument that the two passages have not a common reference to a single occasion; (γ) while in 3^{19} nothing is said as to the aim or effect of the proclamation, here its object is distinctly stated. It is important to notice that this sentence, in which the purpose is described, is one in which μέν and δέ oppose two clauses, whereof one is really subordinate to the other' (Liddell and Scott sub voce μέν ii. 5). The purpose of the preaching was not that the dead should be judged, but that though judged . . . they yet might live. . . . The aorist (κριθῶσι) points to the one season of the judgment; the contrasted present (ζῶσι), to the continuous life κατὰ θεόν (cf. 1^{15}). The two passages taken together appear unquestionably to assert that at the supreme crisis of redemption the Redeemer Himself proclaimed the gospel to the dead, those who perished in the Flood being particularly specified, and that therefore such blessings of the gospel as are not confined to this earthly order were offered to them.

Apart from possible allusions to the subject in three passages of St. Paul (Ro 10^{7} 14^{9}, Eph 4^{9}), no writer in the NT refers to the descensus ad inferos, with the significant exception of St. Peter (cf. Ac $2^{27.\ 31}$), who may well have learned the mysterious facts of which he speaks from the lips of the Risen Lord Himself. The simplicity and reticence of St. Peter's disclosure are remarkable. On references to the descensus in early Christian literature see Lightfoot on Ign. Magn. ix. (add to the passages collected Gospel of Peter ix.). It appears certain that these early references are not based upon the passages in 1 P. 'No direct appeal is made to St. Peter in any of the numerous references to the Descent; the earliest quotation of 1 P 4^{6} we have been able to find is in Cyprian's Testimonia' (Swete, Apostles' Creed p. 58). Hence in these passages we have expansions of a primitive Christian tradition, independent of St. Peter's written words.

Additional note on the name 'Peter.'—Dr. Schechter, in the Jewish Quarterly Review for April 1900, p. 428 f., writes thus: 'Besides the epithets "the God-fearing" Abraham or Abraham "the friend of God," Abraham also bears in Rabbinic literature the title of "the Rock." . . . The Rabbinic passage forms an illustration of Nu 23^{9} "For from the top of the rocks I see him," and runs

* Hort takes the words ἑτοίμην ἀποκαλυφθῆναι (1^{5}) to refer to the immediately preceding εἰς σωτηρίαν, and interprets ἐν καιρῷ ἐσχάτῳ as meaning 'in a season of extremity.' But (1) it is difficult to disconnect ἐσχάτῳ here from ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν χρόνων in 1^{20}; and καιρός is common in eschatological phrases in Daniel and NT, e.g. 4^{17}, Rev 1^{3}; (2) the 'inheritance' is the main subject of the passage, and for εἰς σωτηρίαν (standing alone) comp. the same phrase in 2^{2}; (3) ἑτοίμην ἀποκαλυφθῆναι (cf. 5^{1}) is correlative to τετηρημένην ἐν οὐρανοῖς.

thus: There was a king who desired to build, and to lay foundations; he dug constantly deeper, but found only a swamp. At last he dug and found a petra (this is the very word the Rabbi uses). He said, "On this spot I shall build and lay the foundations." So the Holy One, blessed be he, desired to create the world, but meditating upon the generations of Enoch and the Deluge, he said, "How shall I create the world whilst those wicked men will only provoke me?" But as soon as God perceived that there would rise an Abraham, he said, "Behold I have found the petra upon which to build and to lay foundations." Therefore he called Abraham Rock [צוּר], as it is said, "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn. Look unto Abraham your father" (Is 51[1. 2]). Yalkut i. 766. I. THE EPISTLE CONSIDERED APART FROM THE QUESTION OF ITS GENUINENESS. — 1. TRANSMISSION OF TEXT. For the authorities—MSS and Versions—see art. JUDE (EPISTLE OF) in vol. ii. p. 799. Some further points must be noted. (1) 2 P is not contained in the Peshitta. The text given in the printed editions of that version is, it appears, part of the Philoxenian version of the NT made in the early years of the 6th cent. (see below, p. 805). (2) Portions of pre-Hieronymic texts are found in the Fleury palimpsest=h (edited by Berger, 1889), in the Munich fragments edited by Ziegler=q (only 1[1-4]), and in the Speculum commonly known by the symbol m (ed. Weihrich). The text represented in h q, according to Berger, is one based on a late 'Italian' text, kindred to that revised by Jerome, transplanted to Africa and there greatly altered—'an African text of a late period.' Some remarkable fragments of an old Latin text are contained in Priscillian (ed. Schepss)—1[20] (omnis profetia uel scribtura interpretationem indiget, p. 87), 2[2. 10] (p. 29), 2[5] (p. 46). Ambrose (de Fide iii. 12) quotes 1[10]. (3) Patristic evidence for the text is found chiefly in (a) Greek writers—Didymus, Ephraem (not Syriac works), Cyril Alex., John of Damascus, the commentators Œcumenius and Theophylact, the fragments in Cramer's Catena (some being ascribed to Athanasius, Eusebius of Emesa, and Chrysostom; on the last see below, p. 805 n.); (b) Latin writers—Ambrose, Priscillian, Jerome, Augustine, Fulgentius, Vigilius, Bede. Difficulties of interpretation give a sense of insecurity in regard to the text (e.g. 2[11. 14]). Hort supposes that there are primitive errors in 3[10. 12]. On 3[2], see below p. 811; and on 3[10] see Vansittart in the Journal of Philology iii. p. 357 ff., where he suggests that the 'existence' of this Epistle, as of that to the Hebrews, 'depended for many years on a single copy.'

2. SUMMARY OF THE EPISTLE.—The Epistle (after the salutation) seems to fall into three sections—(1) 1[3-11]; (2) 1[12]–2[22]; (3) 3[1-18]. Each of the two latter sections begins with a reference to the writer's personal relation to those whom he addresses, and in both cases he goes on to speak of the dangers which will soon overtake them from false teachers.

(1) (i.) 1[1f.] Salutation; (ii.) 1[3f.] Divine gifts.—The Divine power has given us all needful endowments, endowments through which He has given us* His promises, that through these promises you, having escaped from the world's corruption, may become sharers in the Divine nature. (iii.) 1[5-7] The duty of diligence. Such gifts imply duties. Use diligence on your part that one excellence in you may grow out of another. (iv.) 1[8-11] The hope of diligence. Such excellences, where they exist, cause fruitfulness. For he who has them not is blind, and forgets that he was cleansed from the sins of his old life. Therefore with the greater diligence see that you make God's calling and choice of you an abiding blessing. For so acting, you will not stumble; and the gift of entrance into the eternal kingdom will without stint be yours.

(2) (i.) 1[12-15] The writer's care for his friends.—Hence, though ye know these truths, I will ever keep them fresh in your memory, so long as I am in this tabernacle, for I know from the Lord's disclosure of the future to me that my putting it off will come suddenly. Further, I will take diligent care that, as during my life so also after my departure, you shall be reminded of these truths. (ii.) 1[16-21] The teachers' warrant. For we did not follow fables skilfully elaborated when we told you of the power of the Lord and His coming (i.e. in the flesh). Our warrant was that we had been initiated into the mystery of His majesty. We beheld the glory which He received from the Father, when the voice of God addressed Him as My Son, when we were His companions in the Holy Mount. And what is more abiding than a fleeting voice we possess in the prophetic word. Give heed to it as a lamp shining in a foul place till the perfect dawn comes. But remember that the interpretation of a prophecy in Scripture does not lie within a man's unaided power†; for prophecy came not by the will of man, but men spake from God as they were controlled by the Spirit. (iii.) 2[1-11] False teachers; their sure punishment. As there were false prophets in Israel, so there will be false teachers among you, denying even the Master who purchased them. Many will follow them, their life and their teaching being marked by lasciviousness, greed, insincerity. But their judgment has long been actively working. For God ever punishes the evil. He punished angels when they sinned, committing them to dens of darkness to be kept for judgment; the ancient world, while He delivered Noah; the Cities of the Plain, their overthrow being an example of what shall happen to ungodly men, while He delivered Lot, ever wearied out by the lascivious life of the lawless. Yes, the Lord can deliver the godly from temptation, and keep the unrighteous in punishment for the day of judgment. And this is chiefly so with those whose sins are uncleanness, proud insubordination, and slandering; whereas angels, greater in power than they, bring no slanderous accusation against them (i.e. these sinners) before the Lord. (iv.) 2[12-22] Marks of such false teachers. Such men may be easily discerned. In their sins, and therefore in their punishment, they are like irrational animals. They blazon their profligacy in broad daylight. They are spots and flaws in your company. Their glances are ceaselessly unchaste. They entice restless souls. They sin from motives of covetousness like Balaam, who was miraculously rebuked for his madness. They are as purposeless as waterless springs or tempest-driven mists: their end will be thick darkness. With empty vauntings they entice into lusts those who are just escaping from evil companionship. Themselves the slaves of corruption, they promise a spurious liberty. They are indeed slaves. For if they were rescued from the defilements of the world and are now again ensnared therein, their last state has become worse than their first. For ignorance of righteousness is better than deliberate rebellion against the holy commandment. Their degradation is set forth in common proverbs.

(3) (i.) 3[1f.] The writer's Epistles.—In this, as in my former letter, I remind you of the words spoken long ago by the prophets, and of the Lord's commandment brought to you by those of the apostles who were your teachers. (ii.) 3[3-7] Mockers at the promise of the Return. Remember before all else that in the last days mockers will come, men of lustful life, scornfully asking what has become of the promise of His return. For the Fathers passed away, and the world's course is unchanged. Such mockers are self-condemned. For they wilfully forget that by the word of God the heavens were made and the earth compacted of water and by means of water, waters which became the instrument of judgment. And by the same word the heavens and the earth are being kept for the fire of the final judgment. (iii.) 3[8-13] The Lord's delay and His coming. Forget not that God reckons not time as men reckon. His seeming slowness in fulfilling His promise is in truth His long-suffering towards you, that all may come to repentance. Howbeit the day of the Lord will come suddenly, the day when the vault of heaven shall pass away, and the stars shall melt

* Spitta (Der zweite Brief des Petrus p. 41 ff.) would read ὑμῖν in v.[4] with A 36, 38 syr-bod syr-hl-mg, and would take the ἡμῶν of v.[3] and the δι' ὧν of v.[4] to refer to the apostles.

† Spitta (p. 115) takes the words to mean, 'Keine Prophezeiung der Schrift ist der Art dass sie vernichtet werden könnte.'

with heat, and the earth and men's works therein shall be discovered. The certainty of this dissolution of material things is a call to holiness of life and to an earnest expectation of His coming. Then—because the day of God has come—the whole fabric of the universe shall be burned up. But we expect, according to His promise, new heavens and a new earth—the home of righteousness. (iv.) 3[14-18] The steadfastness of believers in the strength of this hope. Wherefore having these hopes, be diligent that you may be found of the Lord at His coming blameless. And regard the Lord's long-suffering as salvation, as Paul said to you, and as he says in all his letters, dealing in them with these matters—letters in which are many difficult sayings which those who lack learning and stability twist and wrench, as they do all the other Scriptures. But do you be on your guard against the evil influence of the lawless, and grow in grace and knowledge.

3. DOCTRINE OF THE EPISTLE.—(1) The doctrine of God. (a) The Father. The term πατήρ is used only in relation to the Incarnate Son (1[17]). God by His word (command) was the Creator and is the Sustainer of the universe (3[5. 7]). He is above the limitations of time (3[8]). He inflicts punishment on angels and men (2[4ff.]), and thus the ἡμέρα κρίσεως (3[7]) is described as ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμέρα (3[12]). But He is long-suffering, and delays judgment (3[9], cf. 3[15]). He gave His witness to the Incarnate Son (1[17]). Men can know God (1[2]) and can partake of the Divine nature (1[4]). The phrase θεία φύσις (1[4]) refers rather to what God essentially is; the phrase ἡ μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα (1[17]) to God as revealing Himself by outward signs. (b) The Son. Nothing is said of the pre-existence of the Lord. The term θεός is, however, applied to Him in 1[1] τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν κ. σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χρ.; contrast the order in 1[2] τοῦ θεοῦ κ. Ἰησοῦ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν, and compare 1[11] 3[18] τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν κ. σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Compare the phrase ἡ θεία δύναμις αὐτοῦ (1[3]), and note how He is closely joined with the Father as the object of man's knowledge (1[2]). In 1[16] it seems the preferable, if not the necessary, interpretation to take παρουσία of the First rather than of the Second Coming, for (α) the context speaks of history and not prophecy; (β) the word itself, though as a fact elsewhere in the NT and in this Epistle (3[4. 12]) it is used of the Second Coming, naturally bears this meaning* (cf. ἔλευσις, Ac 7[52]). If this interpretation of 1[16] be the true one, then the message of the Incarnation is described as dealing with τὴν τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ δύναμιν καὶ παρουσίαν—the Lord's essential power and His coming to the world. His μεγαλειότης was revealed on the Mount of Transfiguration. He purchased men (i.e. by His blood, cf. Rev 5[9]), and so became their absolute Master (δεσπότης, 2[1]; cf. δοῦλος . . . Ἰ. Χρ., 1[1]). The term σωτήρ, as applied to Him, is characteristic of this Epistle (1[1. 11] 2[20] 3[2. 18]). His kingdom is described in the words of Daniel (3[10] [4[3]] 7[27], cf. 1 Mac 2[57]) as an αἰώνιος βασιλεία (cf. Lk 1[33], Rev 11[15]). He will fulfil His promise to return (3[4]). (c) The Holy Spirit. The only mention of the Holy Spirit is in reference to His controlling inspiration of the ancient prophets (1[21]).

(2) Redemption.—In regard to our Lord, it was wrought out by Him in His act whereby He purchased men (2[1]); in regard to Christians, it is brought into contact with each one in the καθαρισμός which parts the new from the old life (1[9]). The Divine 'calling' and 'choice' of men are regarded as closely related (τὴν κλῆσιν κ. ἐκλογήν, 1[10]; note the vinculum of the common article). Human effort is needed to give them an abiding validity (βεβαίαν). In 1[3] (τοῦ καλέσαντος ἡμᾶς) it is uncertain (α) whether the ἡμᾶς refers to Christians generally or to the apostles in particular; (β) whether the ὁ καλέσας refers to the Father or to Christ. Much stress is laid on conduct and on the cultivation of Christian virtues (1[5ff.]). Knowledge (ἐπίγνωσις, 1[2. 3. 8] 2[20]; γνῶσις, 1[5] 3[18]) has a pre-eminent position assigned to it. The object of knowledge is the Father (1[2. 3 (?)]) and Christ (1[8] 2[20] 3[18]); in 1[5] γνῶσις appears without further definition. The knowledge of God and of Christ is the means whereby men escape the evil of the world (2[20]) and receive grace and peace (1[2]) and spiritual endowments (1[3]). The cultivation of Christian excellences leads to fruitfulness in regard to this knowledge (1[8]), which is not a final but a progressive knowledge (3[18]). Since it is closely allied to χάρις (3[18]), it is clearly a spiritual and not an intellectual attainment. On the other hand, the γνῶσις of 1[5] (without a definition of its object) is apparently 'knowledge' generally; it is described as the link between ἀρετή and ἐγκράτεια. The end of the Divine promises is that men should become θείας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως (1[4]). The goal of Christian diligence is the entrance into the Lord's 'eternal kingdom' (1[11]).

(3) Creation.—The cause of creation was 'the word (command) of God' (3[5]). But at least in regard to the earth further (physical) details are given—γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ δι' ὕδατος συνεστῶσα. Probably the interpretation given by Œcumenius (quoted by Field, Notes on Translation of the NT p. 242) is the true one—ἡ γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος μέν, ὡς ἐξ ὑλικοῦ αἰτίου· δι' ὕδατος δέ, ὡς διὰ τελικοῦ (sic lege pro διατελικοῦ)· ὕδωρ γὰρ τὸ συνέχον τὴν γῆν, οἷον κόλλα τις ὑπάρχον αὐτῇ. In v.[10] the universe is described as consisting of 'the heavens' (the vault of heaven), the stars (στοιχεῖα), the earth.

(4) Angelology.—It is clearly laid down that there once was 'a fall' of certain angels (ἀγγέλων ἁμαρτησάντων, 2[4]), and that their sin was followed by Divine vengeance. God committed them to 'pits of darkness,' there to be kept for (final) judgment. In a later passage of the Epistle (2[11]) there is an obscure reference to the ministry of angels. The false teachers (it is there said) δόξας οὐ τρέμουσιν, βλασφημοῦντες, ὅπου ἄγγελοι ἰσχύϊ κ. δυνάμει μείζονες ὄντες οὐ φέρουσιν κατ' αὐτῶν παρὰ Κυρίῳ βλάσφημον κρίσιν. It must remain doubtful if κατ' αὐτῶν refers to the false teachers or (as the parallel in Jude[8f.] suggests) to the δόξαι just mentioned. In either case, angels appear to be represented as bringing before the Lord tidings as to the conduct of created beings, whether angels or men.

(5) Eschatology.—Fallen angels and unrighteous men alike undergo temporary punishment until the time of their final doom (2[4. 9]). The day, when 'the promise of his coming' is fulfilled, variously described as ἡμέρα κρίσεως (2[9] 3[7]), ἡμέρα κυρίου (3[10]), ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμέρα (3[12]), has three aspects—(α) In regard to the sinful: To the ungodly it will be a ἡμέρα . . . ἀπωλείας (3[7], cf. 2[1] 3[16]); and of this 'destruction' the overthrow of the Cities of the Plain is the type (2[6]). The disclosure as to the angels who sinned does not go beyond the simple idea of κρίσις (2[4]); (β) In regard to the universe: 'Dissolution' (τούτων . . . πάντων λυομένων, 3[11]) is the destiny of all parts of the material universe. The means of this dissolution will be fire (πυρὶ τηρούμενοι 3[7], καυσούμενα 3[10], πυρούμενοι, καυσούμενα 3[12]). (γ) In regard to the righteous: The dissolution of 'the heavens and earth that now are' will usher in the fulfilment of the Divine promise of 'new heavens and a new earth.' The spiritual character of the new universe is insisted on—ἐν οἷς δικαιοσύνη κατοικεῖ (3[13]). In an earlier passage of the Epistle (1[19]), where the meaning and the construction are doubtful, it seems to be implied that that day will be the dawn of such full daylight 'in the hearts' of the faithful that the 'lamp' of prophecy will be no more needed.

4. THE WRITER OF THE EPISTLE, ITS READERS, THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF ITS COMPOSITION, AS REPRESENTED IN THE EPISTLE ITSELF.—(1) The Writer. The writer speaks as 'Simon (Symeon) Peter, bond-servant and apostle of Jesus Christ.'

* Compare, e.g., Ign. Philad. 9, τὴν παρουσίαν τοῦ σωτῆρος . . . τὰ πάθη αὐτοῦ, τὴν ἀνάστασιν; Apol. Aristidis, 15; Justin, Apol. i. 52; see Lightfoot on Ign. l.c.

He refers to two, possibly to three, occasions in his discipleship—(a) his presence on the Mount of Transfiguration ($1^{16ff.}$); (b) the Lord's revelation to him in regard to his death (1^{14}); (c) the Lord's call of himself and of other disciples (1^{3}). The last reference is doubtful (see above, p. 809). The Epistle does not assert that he had visited those to whom he writes; though it is not unnatural to suppose that this is implied in $1^{12ff.}$ 3^{2}. But he had written to them one earlier letter (3^{1}), the object of which had been, what the object of the present letter was, viz. to kindle their minds to remember the teachings of the ancient prophets and of the apostles who had instructed them. He calls St. Paul 'our beloved brother,' and he was acquainted with several of his Epistles, and especially with one which that apostle had written to those whom he is now addressing. He himself now writes under a sense that his death is imminent (1^{14}); and he promises that, so long as he lives, he will still remind them of his teaching, and that he will make provision that after his decease they should always be able to call it to mind. Nothing in the letter, it should be added, reveals the place where he writes, his companions, or his plans. (2) The recipients of the letter. Unless we assume that the former Epistle referred to in 3^{1} is 1 P, nothing is said in the Epistle to show where its intended recipients dwelt. The two phrases, τοῖς ἰσότιμον ἡμῖν λαχοῦσιν πίστιν (1^{1}, cf. Jude ^{3}), and ἀποφυγόντες τῆς ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἐν ἐπιθυμίᾳ φθορᾶς (1^{4}), make it probable that they were Gentile rather than Jewish converts. But the language is too general to warrant a certain inference. Some at least of the apostles had been among their teachers (3^{2}), and it appears from 1^{12} that they were not recent converts. From their past we turn to their future. The Epistle warns them of the advent among them of certain false teachers. It is an assumption—though it is a probable assumption—that the three passages of the Epistle which speak of false teachers—2^{1-22}, 3^{3-7}, 3^{16}—refer to the same persons. Taking this identification for granted, we note the following points in the description of these enemies of the truth: (1) Their life and teaching are such that in effect they deny the rule of Christ and His law (2^{1}); (2) they are themselves immoral, and by life and teaching they infect others ($2^{2.\ 10.\ 12ff.\ 18f.}$); (3) they are insubordinate to authority (2^{10}); (4) they are influenced as teachers by greed of gain ($2^{3.\ 12.\ 14}$); (5) as teachers they are plausible and crafty ($2^{3.\ 14.\ 19}$); (6) their teaching is empty rhetoric (2^{18}); (7) they ridicule the idea of Christ's return ($3^{3ff.}$); (8) they support their false teaching by an unscrupulous appeal to Scripture (3^{16}). Such are the notes of the false teaching which will arise ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν (3^{3}).

To this statement of the details as to the writer and recipients of the Epistle, which seem to be implied in the document itself, it will be well to append the views as to the occasion of the Epistle and the circumstances of its composition, which have been put forward of late years by two critics who have defended its authenticity.

(i.) The chief points which Spitta emphasizes in his elaborate work, Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas, 1885, are as follows:—St. Peter wrote the Epistle late in his life to Jewish Christians, to whom both he (3^{1}) and St. Paul (3^{15}) had addressed letters which have not been preserved. He promises to make provision that after his death his friends shall be reminded of his teaching. The Epistle of Jude was accordingly written at a later time for the express purpose of carrying out St. Peter's intention; and in that Epistle there are several direct references (vv.$^{4.\ 5.\ 12}$) to 2 P, while in Jn 17 f. we find words from 2 P 3^{3} quoted as apostolic words. The destination of the Epistle explains its subsequent history. The 'paulinische Einseitigkeit' of our NT Canon is one of many proofs that the early Church was not wont to welcome documents which had Jewish associations.

(ii.) Zahn, Einleitung ii. 42–110, 1899, takes the same general line as Spitta, but is somewhat more precise and circumstantial in his reconstruction of the history. St. Peter addressed the Epistle to Churches, mainly Jewish, in Palestine and in the adjacent districts, but not N. or N.W. of the Syrian Antioch. The apostle had long before taken a leading part in their evangelization, and had subsequently written to them a letter now lost. St. Paul also, not improbably during his imprisonment at Cæsarea, had sent them a letter; but this letter, like the letter of St. Peter just mentioned, has not been preserved. One of the chief reasons why St. Peter wrote them this second letter was to warn them against false teachers, whose evil influence he had himself seen at work in Gentile Churches. He feared lest the plague should spread to Jewish converts. The apostle then, over and above the exhortations and warnings of the Epistle itself, promises that he will, as long as he lives, remind them of the truths on which he insists, and further, that he will write for them an instruction in doctrine (Lehrschrift), that after his death they may have these things ever brought to mind. The time of the Epistle must be placed late in St. Peter's life; for (a) he writes as one now growing old; (β) many letters of St. Paul are in existence; (γ) there is a feeling of disappointment abroad that the promise of the Return is unfulfilled; (δ) the first generation of Christians is now dying off. As to the place where the Epistle was written, it contains no indication that St. Peter had as yet been in Rome. On the other hand, it is natural to suppose that, when he wrote to them, he was not living in the immediate neighbourhood of his correspondents. Thus it is an obvious conjecture (a) that the place where the Epistle was written was Antioch; (b) that the time of its composition was shortly before St. Peter left the East for Rome, where he probably arrived in the autumn of 63; i.e. the date falls within the years 60–63. About a dozen years later (circ. 75) St. Jude wrote to the same Churches, and (vv.$^{4.\ 17}$) formally quoted 2 P as an apostolic document. As to the later history of 2 P, it is important to emphasize the fact that 1 P and 2 P were written to wholly different groups of Churches. It is quite natural, therefore, that their fate should be different. For a long time Gentile Christians would trouble themselves but little as to an Epistle addressed to Jewish Christians. Hence the comparative obscurity into which 2 P fell.

There is little room for difference of opinion as to the date of 2 P among critics who maintain the genuineness of the Epistle, and hold the almost universal opinion that it was written as a sequel to 1 P, the latter Epistle being placed near the end of St. Peter's life. The case, however, is somewhat altered for any who follow B. Weiss and Kühl (see above, p. 782 f.) in their view that 1 P was written about the year 54. Yet these critics do not diverge from the conclusion as to the date of 2 P mentioned just above. On the one hand, Kühl urges that the silence of the Epistle as to the destruction of Jerusalem is a proof that it was written before the year 70. On the other, the fact that St. Peter holds himself henceforth alone responsible for the instruction of those to whom he writes, though he is aware that St. Paul had written to them, points to a time after the death of the latter apostle. The most probable date, therefore, is (according to Kühl) about the middle of the 6th decade.

II. THE QUESTION OF THE GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.—1. INTEGRITY OF THE EPISTLE. Before discussing the problem of the genuineness of the Epistle we must clear out of the way the question of its integrity. Are we bound to consider the Epistle as a whole? May not some of the difficulties in regard to its genuineness arise from the fact that the Epistle as it stands has been interpolated? In this matter Kühl has inherited the suspicions of two earlier critics—Bertholdt and Lange. It will be sufficient to examine the case as stated by Kühl. He supposes (1) that the whole of ch. 2 is an interpolation; (2) that in $3^{1f.}$ words have been inserted to facilitate the dovetailing of the interpolated passage into the original letter. In this original document, according to Kühl's theory, the passage about prophecy was succeeded immediately by an exhortation—ὑμεῖς δέ, ἀγαπητοί, ωνήσθητε τῶν προειρημένων ῥημάτων ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν, τοῦτο πρῶτον γινώσκοντες κ.τ.λ. He is thus enabled to maintain that the Epistle in its original form is older, in its present interpolated form more recent, than Jude. It should be added that the reference in 3^{1} to an earlier Epistle, addressed by the same writer to the same readers, likewise disappears. Suspicions as to the integrity of a document, when they are interested, are themselves suspicious. In this case they claim no external support. And the internal evidence of the Epistle is against them. The transition from 1^{21} to $2^{1f.}$ is natural. The thought of ancient prophecy leads to a reference to its parody in the false prophets of old days. If the writer goes on to draw a parallel between the dangers of the past and the dangers which he foresees in the future, the sequence of his thought is quite simple. Again, there cannot be said to be any difference in style between ch. 2 and the rest of the Epistle. Again, if affinities with Jude are most conspicuous in ch. 2, they are not confined to that chapter, and, when examined, they appear to be borrowings from Jude as clearly in ch. 1 as in ch. 2 (see art. on JUDE, § 4). Lastly, it will be shown later that the coincidences between 2 P and the Apocalypse of Peter are found both in ch. 1 and in ch. 2 of 2 P. Their diffusion cannot but be a weighty argument for the integrity of the Epistle. The suspicions, then, of Kühl and his predecessors in this view must be dismissed as arbitrary and unsupported by external or internal evidence.

2. RECEPTION IN THE CHURCH.—The investigation falls under three heads—(1) the alleged use of the language and characteristic thoughts of 2 P in documents (other than Books of NT) belonging to 1st and 2nd centuries; (2) such alleged use of, and references to, 2 P in documents belonging to the period between the beginning of the 3rd century and the time of Eusebius; (3) the evidence of Eusebius and of other writers of the 4th and 5th centuries; the reception of 2 P in the Canon of the Eastern (Greek) and Western Churches, and its rejection in the Syrian Church.

(1) Some of the alleged coincidences will be examined in detail. The rest are dealt with in the general remarks at the end of this section.

(a) Clement of Rome.—(i.) 'We have Noah and Lot adduced in vii. 5 and xi. 1 similarly to what is done in 2 Peter ii. 5–9' (Warfield in the January number of the Southern Presbyterian Review, 1882, p. 53). But in Clement the examples of Noah and Lot do not stand side by side as in 2 P, but are widely separated in a whole series of OT worthies. (ii.) Clem. vii. ταῦτα, ἀγαπητοί, οὐ μόνον ὑμᾶς νουθετοῦντες ἐπιστέλλομεν, ἀλλὰ κ. ἑαυτοὺς ὑπομνήσκοντες || 2 P 1^{12} 3^{1}. Beyond the fact that the common Greek word meaning 'remind' occurs in both passages in reference to a letter, there is no resemblance in phraseology or idea. (iii.) Clem. vii. Νῶε ἐκήρυξεν μετάνοιαν || 2 P 2^{5}. Lightfoot, however, shows that Clement probably derived this conception of Noah from the Sibylline Oracles. (iv.) Clem. ix. τοὺς τελείως λειτουργήσαντας τῇ μεγαλοπρεπεῖ δόξῃ αὐτοῦ || 2 P 1^{17}. It must, however, be observed that in the LXX the noun (μεγαλοπρέπεια) is (especially in the Psalms) a very favourite word, and that the adjective occurs in reference to God, e.g. 2 Mac 8^{15} (τὸ μ. ὄνομα). The special phrase in question is an echo of the language of the Psalms—20 (21)^{6} δόξαν κ. μεγαλοπρέπειαν, 144 (145)$^{5.\ 12}$ τὴν μεγαλοπρέπειαν τῆς δόξης τῆς ἁγιωσύνης σου . . . τὴν δόξαν τῆς μεγαλοπρεπείας τῆς βασιλείας σου. In Clement the adj. is common, being used in reference to the Divine will, gifts, worship, strength, name (ix. xix. xlv. lxi. lxiv.). The impression that in Clement the phrase in question and similar expressions have a liturgical origin (i.e. that they are derived from [Greek] synagogue prayers) is confirmed by a reference to the Greek Liturgies, e.g. Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, ἅγιος εἶ καὶ πανάγιος, καὶ μεγαλοπρεπὴς ἡ δόξα σου (Swainson p. 129), Liturgy of St. James (Swainson p. 268). (v.) Clem. xxiii. A passage is quoted as Scripture containing the words, 'These things we did hear in the days of our fathers also; and behold we have grown old, and none of these things hath befallen us.' The thought is not dissimilar to 2 P 3^{4}, but there is no coincidence of expression. Clement probably took the quotation (cf. '2 Clem.' xi.) 'from some spurious prophetic book'; see Lightfoot, in loc. (vi.) Clem. xxxv. ἀκολουθήσωμεν τῇ ὁδῷ τῆς ἀληθείας || 2 P 2^{2}. But it must be remembered that the use of ἡ ὁδός (e.g. τῆς ζωῆς, διδαχῆς, see Harnack on Did. 1^{1}) and the use of ἡ ἀλήθεια (e.g. ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας) are very common; the combination of the two words therefore is in no way remarkable. (vii.) Clem. xxxiv. εἰς τὸ μετόχους ἡμᾶς γενέσθαι τῶν μεγάλων κ. ἐνδόξων ἐπαγγελιῶν αὐτοῦ || 2 P 1^{4}. But it must be noticed that the phrase has a parallel in an earlier chapter (xix.), μεγάλων καὶ ἐνδόξων μετειληφότες πράξεων. Compare also xxvi. τὸ μεγαλεῖον τῆς ἐπαγγελίας αὐτοῦ.

(b) The Ancient Homily ('2 Clement') xvi. ἔρχεται ἤδη ἡ ἡμέρα τῆς κρίσεως ὡς κλίβανος καιόμενος καὶ τακήσονταί τινες [lege αἱ δυνάμεις] τῶν οὐρανῶν, καὶ πᾶσα ἡ γῆ ὡς μόλιβος ἐπὶ πυρὶ τηκόμενος, καὶ τότε φανήσεται τὰ κρύφια καὶ φανερὰ ἔργα τῶν ἀνθρώπων || 2 P $3^{7.\ 10.\ 12}$. The language of the earlier part of the extract is largely derived from Mal 4^{1}, Is 34^{4}. The idea of the conflagration of the world at the judgment was somewhat widely current in the 2nd cent. In the last clause there is in language, idea, and context a certain coincidence with 2 P 3^{10} (γῆ καὶ τὰ ἐν αὐτῇ ἔργα εὑρεθήσεται), where, however, the reading (see above, p. 796) is very doubtful. The notion, however, of a disclosure of secret things is inseparable from the notion of the judgment; and the language and thought of the Homily are in reality nearer to Ro 2^{16} 1 Co 3^{13} 4^{5} than to 2 P 3^{10}. Spitta, Der Zweite Brief p. 534 n., notices some other coincidences, of which the most striking are Hom. v. (ἡ δὲ ἐπαγγελία τοῦ Χριστοῦ μεγάλη καὶ θαυμαστή ἐστιν) || 2 P 1^{4}; Hom. ix. (ἐξ εἰλικρινοῦς καρδίας) || 2 P 3^{1} (but cf. Is 38^{3}, He 10^{22}*); Hom. xiv. (ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν) || 2 P 3^{3} (a phrase unique in NT but not uncommon in LXX).

(c) Didaché.—'The passage 3, 6–8,' writes Spitta (p. 534 n.), 'shows a very remarkable kinship with Jude and 2 Peter. We notice the rare expression γόγγυσος (cf. Jude ^{16}), and especially the twice repeated βλασφημία, ἀνθάδης and τρέμων, and we compare 2 P 2^{10}.' In Did., however, the τρέμων is part of a phrase which clearly comes from Is 66^{2}. For ἀνθάδης cf. Pr 21^{24}, Tit 1^{7}. When the whole chapter of the Didaché is read, the idea that we have here a literary link with 2 P vanishes.

(d) Ignatius.—Spitta points out coincidences between Ignatius and 2 P—Eph xi. 1, xii. 2 ‖ 2 P 3[15]; xiv. 1 ‖ 2 P 1[15]; Trall. xiii. 3 (ἐν ᾧ εὑρεθείημεν ἄμωμοι) ‖ 2 P 3[14]. The last is the only one in the series which deserves consideration, and about it Spitta himself allows that the phrase of Ign. may very well be 'stereotyp gewordene Wunschformel.'

(e) Barnabas xv. συνετέλεσεν ἐν ἓξ ἡμέραις. τοῦτο λέγει ὅτι ἐν ἑξακισχιλίοις ἔτεσιν συντελέσει Κύριος τὰ σύνπαντα. ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα παρ' αὐτῷ [σημαίνει] χίλια ἔτη. αὐτὸς δέ μοι μαρτυρεῖ λέγων· Ἰδοὺ ἡμέρα Κυρίου ἔσται ὡς χίλια ἔτη ‖ 2 P 3[8]. In connexion with this passage of Barnabas it will be convenient to bring together and to discuss the whole group of passages which are alleged to be reminiscences of 2 P 3[8].

(i.) Justin, Dial. 81, τὸ οὖν εἰρημένον ἐν τοῖς λόγοις τούτοις, ἔφην· κατὰ γὰρ τὰς ἡμέρας τοῦ ξύλου αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ λαοῦ μου ἔσονται, τὰ ἔργα τῶν πόνων αὐτῶν παλαιώσουσι· (Is 65[22]) νενοήκαμεν ὅτι χίλια ἔτη ἐν μυστηρίῳ μηνύει. ὡς γὰρ τῷ Ἀδὰμ εἴρητο, ὅτι ᾗ δ' ἂν ἡμέρᾳ φάγῃ ἀπὸ τοῦ ξύλου, ἐν ἐκείνῃ ἀποθανεῖται, ἔγνωμεν αὐτὸν μὴ ἀναπληρώσαντα χίλια ἔτη. συνήκαμεν καὶ τὸ εἰρημένον ὅτι Ἡμέρα Κυρίου ὡς χίλια ἔτη εἰς τοῦτο συνάγειν. There then follows a reference to Rev 20[4ff.].

(ii.) Iren. v. 23. 2 (Iren. has given one interpretation of Gn 2[17] and then proceeds), 'Quidam autem rursus in millesimum annum reuocant mortem Adæ: quoniam enim dies Domini sicut mille anni, non superposuit autem mille annos sed intra eos mortuus est.'

(iii.) In v. 28. 3 Irenæus is discussing Gn 2[1f.]—'a narrative of the past and a prophecy of the future'—ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα Κυρίου ὡς χίλια ἔτη· ἐν ἓξ οὖν ἡμέραις συντετέλεσται τὰ γεγονότα.

(iv.) In Hipp. in Dan. 23. 24 the words—ἡμέρα δὲ (γὰρ) Κυρίου (ὡς) χίλια ἔτη—are adduced in reference to creation.*

There is no doubt that the final source of the saying is Ps 89 (90)[4]. But the question remains whether the writers just cited take the phrase directly from 2 P or whether they borrow it from some source independent of 2 P, to which indeed 2 P may well itself be a debtor for it. Three points must be noticed. (1) In all the writers cited above (except 2 P) the form of the phrase consistently is ἡμέρα Κυρίου. (2) In all of them the saying is used in regard to the mystical interpretation of a passage in Gn 2—in Barn., Iren. (v. 28. 3), Hipp. in reference to Gn 2[1f.]; in Justin, Iren. (v. 23. 2) in reference to Gn 2[17]. Thus the context in all these passages is very similar and quite alien from the context in 2 P. (3) That speculations similar to the idea expressed in this saying were current in Rabbinical literature is clear from Schöttgen and Wetstein on 2 P 3[8], and from Schöttgen, Horæ Heb. ii. p. 497. And this evidence as to Jewish thought on the matter is carried back into the 1st cent. A.D. (Schürer, HJP II. iii. p. 138 f.) by a passage in the Book of Jubilees (sometimes called the 'Little Genesis'), referred to by Hilgenfeld on Barn. xv., which (see Jahrb. f. bibl. Wiss. ii. p. 241) runs as follows: 'And [Adam] lived 70 years less than 1000 years; for a thousand years are as one day according to the heavenly testimony. Therefore it is written concerning the tree of knowledge, "On the day when ye eat thereof, ye shall die." Wherefore he fulfilled not the years of that day, but died therein.' The subject, it will be observed, is the same as that in relation to which Justin and Iren. (v. 23. 2) adduce the saying. The evidence, then, seems clearly to point to the conclusion that the source of the interpretation of a thousand years as 'a day of the Lord' was Jewish, probably a Haggada concerned with Gn 2. The saying became something of a commonplace in the Christian literature of the 2nd cent., and was used by the Fathers, cited above, in a sense more cognate to its Jewish origin than that in which it is found in 2 Peter.

(f) The Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs.—The parallels in this book 'render it probable,' says Warfield p. 52, 'that the author had and used 2 Peter.' 'They are such,' he continues, 'as the very rare phrase μιασμοῖς [Oxford MS—μιάσμασι] τῆς γῆς in Benj. 8, cf. 2 P 2[20]—a phrase found in 2 Peter only in the NT, and in the Test. XII. Patt. only in its age; the rare phrase τοῦ πλάττειν λόγους in Reuben 3, which seems to have been suggested by 2 P 2[3]; the use of τηρεῖν in Reuben 5, just as it is used in 2 P 2[9].' As to the first of these alleged coincidences it must be noticed (1) that the word μιασμός is found in Wis 14[26], 1 Mac 4[43], and occurs elsewhere in the Testaments, viz. in Levi 17; (2) that it has been already used in the immediately preceding context (οὐ γὰρ ἔχει μ. ἐν καρδίᾳ); (3) that the special phrase (τῆς γῆς) is suggested by the metaphor of the sentence (ὥσπερ γὰρ ὁ ἥλιος οὐ μιαίνεται προσέχων ἐπὶ κόπρον . . . οὕτω καὶ ὁ καθαρὸς νοῦς ἐν τοῖς μιασμοῖς τῆς γῆς συνεχόμενος κ.τ.λ.). The phrase πλάττειν λόγους is used in Demosthenes and other classical writers. In regard to the last of the three coincidences it must be sufficient to refer to Jude[6], Book of the Secrets of Enoch 7[1] 18[4]; similar phrases are common in the Enochian literature (see art. on JUDE, vol. ii. p. 801).

(g) The Shepherd of Hermas.—Zahn (der Hirt des Hermas p. 431) and Warfield (p. 51) have collected a number of passages in the Shepherd which they suppose to contain reminiscences of 2 P. It must be sufficient to examine three of the passages on which special stress is laid. (i.) Vis. i. 3. 4, τῷ ἰσχυρῷ ῥήματι πήξας τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ θεμελιώσας τὴν γῆν ἐπὶ ὑδάτων ‖ 2 P 3[5]. In reality, however, the passage is an echo of passages in the OT, Ps 23 (24)[2] 103 (104)[5t.] 135 (136)[6] (N[c.a] AT), Is 40[22], and has no points of contact with the language of 2 P. (ii.) Sim. viii. 11, ὁ Κύριος ἐπεμψέ με σπλαγχνισθεὶς πᾶσι δοῦναι τὴν μετάνοιαν καίπερ τινῶν μὴ ὄντων ἀξίων διὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτῶν· ἀλλὰ μακρόθυμος ὢν ὁ Κύριος θέλει κ.τ.λ. ‖ 2 P 3[9]. Zahn urges that of the many passages in Hermas which deal with repentance, this alone connects it with the Divine μακροθυμία and emphasizes the universality of the gift. But it must be observed (α) that the πᾶσιν is taken up from the immediately preceding context, ὕπαγε καὶ πᾶσι λέγε ἵνα μετανοήσωσι; (β) that the passage has quite as much affinity with Ac 17[30f.] Ro 2[4] as with 2 P 3[9]. (iii.) Sim. vi. 4. 4, τῆς τρυφῆς καὶ ἀπάτης ὁ χρόνος ὥρα ἐστὶ μία . . . ἐὰν οὖν μίαν ἡμέραν τρυφήσῃ τις καὶ ἀπατηθῇ κ.τ.λ. ‖ 2 P 2[13]. But it will be noticed (α) that the μίαν ἡμέραν of Hermas points to the riot as shortlived, the ἐν ἡμέρᾳ of 2 P points to it as shameless—'in broad daylight'; (β) that both τρυφή and ἀπάτη are favourite words with Hermas. As to the former, the desire ποικίλων τρυφῶν is a sign of the presence of 'the angel of evil' in a man (Mand. vi. 2. 5). Again, ἀπάτη in Mand. viii. 5 has a place among the 'evil works' from which 'the bondservant of God must abstain.' Having been thus spoken of separately, they are joined together in a long description of 'the man who thinks that he has the spirit' (Mand. xi. 12), and they reappear separately and side by side throughout the Sixth Parable. Their occurrence, therefore, in Hermas appears to be quite independent of 2 P. Other coincidences are Vis. iii. 7. 1 ‖ 2 P 2[15]; Vis. iv. 3. 4 ‖ 2 P 2[20]; Sim. v. 6. 8, 7. 1 viii. 11. 1, ix. 13. 9 ‖ 2 P 1[20] (but the use of ἐπίλυσις in regard to the parables is quite obvious); Sim. vi. 2. 2 ‖ 2 P 2[13]

* Compare Hippolytus, 'Heads against Caius,' in Hermathena vii. p. 403 f. (cf. pp. 406, 418), 'The number of the years is not the number of days, but it represents the space of one day . . . according to the saying, One day in the world of the righteous is as a thousand years.'

(but καταφθορά is common in the LXX); Sim. vi. 2. 6 ‖ 2 P 2^{20} (but in Hermas ἐμπλέξαι is the natural word to use of sheep entangled in thorns, etc.); Sim. ix. 17. 5, 18. 1 ‖ 2 P 2^{21} (but cf. Gal $4^{8f.}$). When, then, the passages in Hermas are examined, the conclusion is that they are interesting as illustrations of the passages in 2 P, but give no probability to a theory of literary dependence.

(h) Justin, Dial. 82, 'For with us even until now are there prophetic gifts, whereby you also yourselves [i.e. you Jews] should know that the things which of old belonged to your nation have now been transferred to us. But as there were withal false prophets in the time of the holy prophets who arose among you, so also in the present day are there many false teachers (ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι) also, of whom our Lord forewarned us to beware.' 'But where,' Warfield asks (p. 51 f.), 'can this forewarning be found? Does it exist anywhere but in 2 P 2^{1} (cf. 1^{21}). . . . It is exceedingly difficult to see how there can be any reasonable doubt but that these passages are drawn from 2 Peter. And if so, it is noticeable that Justin refers to 2 Peter with respect, as Scripture, as, practically, the words of our Lord—in a word, as an authoritative book giving the Lord's teaching.' To Warfield's question as to the source of this warning Justin himself supplies a decisive answer. After a few words on our Lord's foreknowledge, Justin continues, 'For He said that we should be murdered and hated for His name's sake, and that many false prophets and false Christs should come (παρελεύσονται) in His name and lead many astray; and this is the case.' The reference, therefore, plainly is to Mt $24^{5.\ 9.\ 11.\ 24}$. There are apparently only two reasons which can be pleaded as grounds for hesitation. (1) The word ψευδοδιδάσκαλος does not occur in the report of our Lord's words in Mt, or indeed anywhere in the NT except in 2 P. But in Christian circles, where the words ψευδάδελφος, ψευδαπόστολος, ψευδολόγος, ψευδομάρτυς, ψευδοπροφήτης, ψευδόχριστος were all current (all occurring in NT), and where a διδάσκαλος was closely allied to a προφήτης, the word ψευδοδιδάσκαλος was sure to arise, and its occurrence in two writers cannot be taken to imply literary obligation. In Ep. Polyc. 7 we find τὰς ψευδοδιδασκαλίας, and in Didaché $13^{1.\ 2}$ διδάσκαλος ἀληθινός appears as well as προφήτης ἀληθινός—a phrase which implies ψευδοδιδάσκαλος. (2) A parallel is drawn in Justin, as in 2 P, between the false teachers in the Christian Church and the false prophets in Israel. But it will be observed (α) that the comparison is very natural in a discussion of the presence of prophetic gifts in the Church; (β) that Justin does not speak of it as part of the warning for which he quotes the Lord's authority. There is a similarity between the passage in 2 P and that in Justin, but it justifies no other conclusion in the case of Justin than that which we reached in the case of Hermas.

(i) Melito.—A passage is quoted from a fragment of Melito's Apology, which has been preserved in a Syriac translation (Cureton, Spicilegium Syriacum, p. 50 f.), of which the principal clauses are as follows: 'There was once a flood and wind, and the chosen men were destroyed by a mighty north wind . . . but, again, at another time there was a flood of waters, and all men and living creatures were destroyed by the multitude of waters, and the just were preserved in an ark of wood, by the ordinance of God. So also it will be at the last time; there shall be a flood of fire, and the earth shall be burnt up together with its mountains, and men shall be burnt up together with the idols which they have made . . . and the sea, together with its isles, shall be burnt; and the just shall be delivered from the fury, like their fellows in the ark from the waters of the Deluge.' It should be noticed that earlier in the fragment (p. 50) there had been an allusion to the judgment of fire: 'Fear Him who shaketh the earth . . . and removeth the mountains from their place; Him who can make Himself like fire, and burn up everything.' Further, it will be observed (α) that Melito refers not only to the Flood and the great judgment by fire, but also to the destruction of the Tower of Babel; and (β) that the destruction of the Tower has a place in the Sibylline Oracles iii. 97 ff., while in the immediately preceding context (iii. 82 ff.) there is a prophecy of the destruction of the world by fire. In line 109 there is an incidental allusion to the Flood, a subject which is treated at length in bk. i., the early date, however, of this book not being so fully established as that of bk. iii. (Schürer, HJP II. iii. p. 287). There are no links of phraseology or of characteristic ideas which connect Melito with 2 P. The verdict, therefore, of Westcott (Canon p. 223 n.) seems to be the only reasonable one: 'It is impossible therefore to affirm that the reference in Melito is to 2 Peter, and not rather to the Sibyllines or to the widespread tradition on which they rested.'

(k) Theophilus of Antioch.—Two passages have been pointed out in Theophilus ad Autolychum, which, it is urged, have all the appearance of being reminiscences of 2 P. (i.) ii. 9, οἱ δὲ τοῦ θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι, πνευματοφόροι * πνεύματος ἁγίου καὶ προφῆται γενόμενοι κ.τ.λ. Compare 2 P 1^{21} ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι ἐλάλησαν ἀπὸ θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι (οἱ ἅγιοι θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι, ℵA, etc.). But it must be noticed that the key-word of the passage (πνευματοφόρος) is derived from the LXX of Hos 9^{7} (ὁ προφήτης . . . ὁ πνευματοφόρος), Zeph 3^{4}; that Theophilus uses the word in the sense of 'an inspired speaker' in ii. 22 (αἱ ἅγιαι γραφαὶ καὶ πάντες οἱ πνευματοφόροι), iii. 12 (διὰ τὸ τοὺς πάντας πνευματοφόρους ἑνὶ πνεύματι θεοῦ λελαληκέναι); that language similar to that under discussion is habitual in Theophilus; see ii. 33, 35, iii. 17, cf. Justin, Apol. i. 33; and, lastly, that the phrase 'man of God' is very common in the OT (occurring some 50 times) in reference to a prophet. Thus a reference to other passages in Theophilus shows that here he is using LXX language in reference to the Prophets. (ii.) ii. 13. In his treatment of the Divine command, 'Let there be light,' Theophilus observes, ἡ διάταξις οὖν τοῦ θεοῦ, τοῦτό ἐστιν ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ, φαίνων ὥσπερ λύχνος ἐν οἰκήματι συνεχομένῳ, ἐφώτισεν τὴν ὑπ' οὐρανόν. The metaphor is thought to be derived from 2 P 1^{19}. But the word οἴκημα is suggested by the previous context—ἄνθρωπος γὰρ κάτω ὢν ἄρχεται ἐκ τῆς γῆς οἰκοδομεῖν—the human building is contrasted with the Divine. The metaphor of the λύχνος is obviously suggested by the subject under discussion—the light kindled by man is contrasted with the light kindled by God. If it is thought necessary to find a 'source' for a metaphor so obvious in the context, 2 Es 12^{42} ('Tu enim nobis superasti ex omnibus prophetis, sicut lucerna in loco obscuro') is as near to Theoph. as is 2 P.

(l) Irenæus.—We have already dealt with two passages in this writer (p. 800). In two other passages he has been supposed to be relying on 2 P. (i.) iii. 1. 1, μετὰ δὲ τὴν τούτων [sc. Petri et Pauli] ἔξοδον ‖ 2 P 1^{15}. But that ἔξοδος (exitus) was not an uncommon word in this sense in early Christian literature has been pointed out on p. 770. (ii.) 'We come in the fourth book' (xxxvi. 4), Warfield writes (p. 49), 'to another passage in which [Irenæus] adduces Noah, then Sodom and Gomorrah, and Lot, to show that God will punish the wicked and save the holy. Our minds go immediately to 2 Peter ii. 4–7, whence the framing of this passage seems to have been derived.' Here, too, it is important to look at the previous context. The object of the chapter is to show that Christ came from the Father, who had sent the prophets in earlier days. Irenæus proves, therefore, from Christ's sayings the unity of God's character in the old and in the new dispensation. In the course of the argument he quotes Lk $21^{34f.}$ $12^{35f.}$ 17^{26-31} (Noah, Lot, Sodom), Mt 24^{42}. He then draws the inference, 'Unum et eundem annuntians Dominum, qui in temporibus Noe propter inobedientiam hominum superduxit diluuium, et in temporibus Lot propter multitudinem peccatorum Sodomitarum pluit ignem a cœlo; et in nouissimo . . . superducet diem iudicii.' There then follows the passage to which Warfield refers, the 'framing' and the ideas of which are clearly drawn from the passage just quoted from the Gospels.

* The word is printed here as it appears in Otto's ed. of Theophilus and in the Cambridge LXX. But it is possible that it should be accented as a passive, πνευματόφορος. See Lightfoot's note on Ignatius Eph. i.

(m) There are one or two passages from heretical documents belonging (in their original form) probably to the 2nd cent. which must be examined. The first of these is a phrase of Ptolemæus, a follower of Valentinus, still living when Irenæus wrote. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. i. p. 759) compares a phrase of this writer's, preserved by Epiphanius (Hær. xxxiii. 6)—παρούσης δὲ τῆς ἀληθείας, with 2 P 1^{12}. But the context in Ptolemæus (i.) shows that the word ἀλήθεια is used in different senses in the two passages, and (ii.) itself naturally accounts for the use of the phrase. It runs thus: αἱ γὰρ εἰκόνες . . . καλῶς ἐγίνοντο μέχρι μὴ παρῆν ἀλήθεια. παρούσης δὲ τῆς ἀληθείας τὰ τῆς ἀληθείας δεῖ ποιεῖν.

(n) The Clementine Literature.—(i.) Recog. v. 12, 'Unusquisque illius fit seruus cui se ipse subjecerit' ‖ 2 P 2^{19}. Salmon (Introd. p. 488) compares Origen, In Exod. Hom. 12, 'Unusquisque a quo uincitur huic et seruus addicitur.' Both passages occur in a translation by Rufinus, and may therefore be interpolations. Salmon, however, points out that 'the difference of the Latin makes it likely that in both cases Rufinus is translating, not interpolating.' But it is equally possible that Rufinus, translating two different books at two different times, interpolated different free renderings of 2 P 2^{19}. The question whether Rufinus did interpolate when he was translating will come before us again in connexion with Origen. (ii.) Hom. xvi. 20. Salmon (p. 488 n.) calls attention to the words ἀλλὰ τοὐναντίον μακροθυμεῖ, εἰς μετάνοιαν καλεῖ. In these words, 'taken in connexion with the whole context, there is very probably a use of 2 Pet. iii. 9.' In the context Peter speaks of the blasphemies of Simon Magus and of 'the boundless long-suffering of God.' The earth had not opened; fire had not come down from heaven; rain was not poured out; beasts were not sent forth from the thicket to avenge this spiritual adultery. 'But, on the contrary, He is long-suffering; He calls to repentance.' It is difficult to see what there is in the context which specially recalls 2 P, while the particular phrase is nearer to Ro 2^4 (τῆς μακροθυμίας καταφρονεῖς . . . τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς μετάνοιάν σε ἄγει) than to 2 P 3^9, though, in fact, it is too natural and obvious to require any literary source.

(o) Actus Petri cum Simone xx. (ed. Lipsius p. 67) 'Unusquisque enim nostrum sicut capiebat uidere, prout poterat uidebat. Nunc quod uobis lectum est iam uobis exponam. Dominus noster uolens me maiestatem suam uidere in monte sancto, uidens autem luminis splendorem eius cum filiis Zebedei, cæcidi tamquam mortuus et oculos meos conclusi et uocem eius audiui talem qualem referre non possum, qui me putaui exorbatum ab splendore eius . . . et exurgens iterum talem eum uidi qualem capere potui.' A phrase in the next chapter (ed. Lipsius pp. 68, 32) must be compared, 'tale lumen . . . quod enarrare nemo hominum possit.' The Gnostic Acts of Peter, of which this document forms part, belong in all probability to the 2nd cent. (see above, p. 774). The only authority, however, for this particular document is a 7th cent. MS, presenting a Latin version of the original Greek. Can we be certain, then, that the whole passage quoted above is not interpolated by some editor or translator? It was shown above (p. 774) that the Gnostic Acts of Peter probably formed part of the series of Leucian Acts, to which the Acts of John also belong. Now in the Acts of John (James, Apocr. Anecdota ii. p. 7) there is a long account of the Transfiguration, and this account contains a phrase (as James, p. xxvi, notes) of the same type as phrases which occur several times in the Petrine Acts at this point—φῶς τοιοῦτον ὁποῖον οὐκ ἐστὶν δυνατὸν ἀνθρώπῳ χρώμενον (lege χρωμένῳ) λόγῳ φθαρτῷ ἐκφέρειν οἷον ἦν. It seems to be a legitimate inference that there is every probability that the Leucian Acts of Peter, like the Leucian Acts of John, contained (i.e. in their original form) a reference to the Transfiguration, and that the Latin version reproduces characteristic phrases of the original. Now there are three coincidences with 2 P in the Latin passage of the Petrine Acts quoted above—(i.) 'maiestatem suam uidere'; (ii.) 'in monte sancto'; (iii.) 'uocem eius talem.' Of these the last has strong claims to be considered a phrase of the original Leucian Acts; it seems at first sight a complete parallel to the φωνῆς τοιᾶσδε of 2 P 1^{17}; but in 2 P the 'voice' is the Father's 'voice,' in the Acts it is the utterance of the Son; and again, in 2 P the τοιᾶσδε introduces the actual words, while in the Acts the 'talem' is followed by a 'qualem.' Thus the parallel, when examined, is less striking than on the surface it appears. Of (i.) (ii.) it can only be said, that if we could be certain that these phrases represented corresponding expressions in the original Leucian Acts, the conclusion would be irresistible that there is some direct connexion between the Petrine Acts and 2 P. But we have no right to assume that these phrases are not due to an editor or translator, and consequently it would be lost labour to speculate on the kind of connexion between the two documents which, if original, they would imply. Clearly this is an important point in relation to the problem of 2 P on which fresh light would be very welcome.

We have now reviewed the passages in the sub-Apostolic writings and in the Christian literature of the 2nd century, which, it is alleged, contain reminiscences of 2 P. If we put aside the passage from the Clementine Recognitions and that from the Acts of Peter as open to the suspicion of not accurately representing the original texts, there does not remain, it is believed, a single passage in which the coincidence with 2 P can with anything approaching confidence be said to imply literary obligation to that Epistle. The resemblances in thought or phrase are such as are constantly found in quite independent specimens of literature, when they belong to the same general period and deal with the same general subject.

(2) It will be convenient to range the authorities which claim discussion in the next period under the several Churches.

(i.) Alexandria.—(a) Clement. Did Clement in the Hypotyposeis comment on 2 P? The statement of Eusebius, HE vi. xiv. 1, runs thus: 'In the Hypotyposeis, to speak briefly, he has composed concise expositions of all Canonical (ἐνδιαθήκου) Scripture, not omitting even the disputed (Epistles), I mean that of Jude and the remaining Catholic Epistles, as well as (τε) Barnabas and the so-called Apocalypse of Peter.' This evidence is confirmed by that of Photius (Biblioth.

109), who speaks of the Hypotyposeis as 'giving interpretations of Genesis, Exodus, the Psalms, the Epistles of St. Paul, the Catholic Epistles, and Ecclesiasticus (τοῦ ἐκκλησιαστικοῦ).' The last phrase is probably a scribe's blunder for τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν; compare Rufinus, in Symb. Apost. 38, 'alii libri sunt, qui non canonici sed ecclesiastici a maioribus appellati sunt.' If this be so, Photius has in mind the non-Canonical books mentioned by Eusebius. On the other side must be set two pieces of evidence. (α) Cassiodorus (de Instit. Div.) in a passage of the Preface asserts that 'it is said (ferunt) that Clement expounded the Divine Scriptures of the Old and of the New Testament from the beginning to the end.' But in a later passage (c. 8) of the same book he limits the scope of Clement's work, 'In epistolis autem canonicis Clemens Alexandrinus . . . id est in epistola S. Petri prima, S. Joannis prima et secunda, et Jacobi, quædam Attico sermone declarauit.' (β) Cassiodorus goes on to speak of a translation which he had made of Clement's expositions, but in which he omitted doctrinal statements which offended him. It is probable, on the whole, that the Latin version of Clement's expositions which we now possess is that of Cassiodorus. This Latin version includes expositions of 1 P, Jude, 1 Jn, 2 Jn. It will be seen that this series of Epistles corresponds with the list given by Cassiodorus, if in the latter we suppose that James was substituted by a mistake for Jude. We have, then, two conflicting views—one (based on the evidence of Eus., Photius, and the Preface of Cassiodorus) to the effect that Clement commented on all the Catholic Epistles; the other (supported by Cassiodorus' statement in the body of his work, and by the extant Latin version of Clement's commentaries) to the effect that Clement commented on four of the Catholic Epistles, 2 P not having a place among those four. The reconciliation of these two contradictory conclusions, so far as 2 P at least is concerned, may be found in the supposition that Clement did comment on 2 P, but that in his work it had a place by the side, not of 1 P but of the Apocalypse of Peter,* which Clement quotes as the work of Peter and as Scripture (Eclogæ ex Scriptt. Proph. xli. xlviii. xlix.). In that case Cassiodorus might well exclude Clement's comments on 2 P from his avowedly eclectic version; or they may have had no place in his copy of Clement. It is an important fact that no passage can be adduced from Clement's works in which 2 P is referred to, still less any in which it is quoted by name. Thus the evidence, which cannot be considered as altogether free from doubt, points to the conclusion that Clement regarded 2 P as a book hovering, like the Apocalypse of Peter, on the borders of the number of the books definitely recognized as Apostolic, but that he did not place it on a level with 1 P. (b) Origen. The first absolutely incontrovertible reference in Christian literature to 2 P is found in the words of Origen reported by Eus. HE VI. xxv. 8, Πέτρος δέ . . . μίαν ἐπιστολὴν ὁμολογουμένην καταλέλοιπεν, ἔστω δὲ καὶ δευτέραν· ἀμφιβάλλεται γάρ. No other passage is quoted from any of Origen's works now extant in the original Greek in which he quotes from, or alludes to, 2 P. There are, however, several passages in Rufinus' translation of certain works of Origen, not extant in Greek, where 2 P is used. They are as follows. In Ep. ad Rom. iv. 9 (ed. Lomm. vi. p. 302), 'ad participationem capiendam diuinæ naturæ, sicut Petrus Apostolus edocuit' (2 P 1[4]); ib. viii. 6 (vii. p. 234), 'Petrus in epistola sua dicit Gratia uobis et pax multiplicetur in recognitione Dei; et iterum alibi Ut boni dispensatores multiplicis gratiæ Dei' (2 P 1[2], 1 P 4[10]); in Exod. xii. 4 (ix. p. 149), 'Scio enim scriptum esse, quia unusquisque a quo uincitur huic et seruus addicitur' (2 P 2[19]); in Levit. iv. 4 (ix. p. 221), 'Et iterum Petrus dicit Consortes, inquit, facti estis diuinæ naturæ' (2 P 1[4]); in Num. xiii. 8 (x. p. 157), 'Et ut ait quodam in loco Scriptura Mutum animal humana voce respondens arguit prophetæ dementiam' (2 P 2[16]); in Lib. Jesu Naue vii. 1 (xi. p. 63), 'Petrus etiam duabus epistolarum suarum personat tubis.' Compare the allusions in the two following passages—in Num. xviii. 4 (x. p. 228), 'Consuetudinem propheticam . . . de qua dicitur Omnis prophetia non potest propria absolutione constare' (2 P 1[20]); in Ezech. v. 3 (xiv. p. 74), 'Multo nobis utilius fuerat diuino non credidisse sermoni, quam post credulitatem adhuc rursum ad peccata conuerti, quæ ante commisimus' (2 P 2[21]). The question remains—Are these references to, and quotations from, 2 P part of the original text of Origen, or insertions by Rufinus? (1) It is a fact worth noticing, that while it would have been consonant with Eusebius' plan (HE III. iii. τίνες τῶν κατὰ χρόνους ἐκκλησιαστικῶν συγγραφέων ὁποίαις κέχρηνται τῶν ἀντιλεγομένων) to record the use which Origen made of the Epistle, had he found in the Greek text of Origen the passages given above from the Latin translation, he does not notice their existence. (2) It would not have been against the probabilities of the case if no reference to 2 P had occurred in the extant Greek works of Origen, and yet a single allusion or so had been made to that Epistle in a work which chanced to survive only in a Latin translation. But it is certainly strange that not one reference is to be found in the works of Origen extant in Greek, but that half a dozen present themselves in those works of Origen which exist only in Rufinus' Latin. The idea of θεοποίησις, for example, is a characteristic thought with Origen (as indeed it is with Clement). We are surprised that twice in the works which are preserved to us in Rufinus' translation Origen illustrates the idea from 2 P, while in his other works he never does so. Thus the number of references to 2 P in Rufinus' translation creates a suspicion as to their genuineness. (3) Each of these references to, or quotations from, 2 P can, it is believed, be cut out without injury to the context.* But whatever be the truth as to the references to 2 P found in those works of Origen which have reached us only through the medium of Rufinus' translation, the deliberate statement of Origen as to 2 P remains. The phrase ἀμφιβάλλεται γάρ clearly conveys, not an opinion of Origen's, but information as to the division of opinion in his time; it may further be thought to suggest that 2 P had already secured a position, which was assailed. The words of the previous clause—ἔστω δὲ καὶ δευτέραν—leave us in little doubt that Origen's judgment was unfavourable to the Epistle.

(ii.) Egypt.—The two great Egyptian versions, the Sahidic and the Bohairic, contain all the seven Catholic Epistles. The date of these versions, however, has not been put beyond doubt. Lightfoot placed 'the completion or codification of the Memphitic [i.e. Bohairic] version' at the middle of the 3rd cent. (Scrivener, Plain Introduction[2] p. 343). Headlam, in his completion of Lightfoot's article

* Zahn (Forsch. iii. p. 154) suggests that in view of its prophetic contents Clement connected 2 P with the Petrine Apocalypse.

* In one passage referred to above—'Petrus in epistola sua dicit Gratia uobis et pax multiplicetur in recognitione Dei: et iterum alibi Ut boni dispensatores multiplicis gratiæ Dei' (Lomm. vii. p. 234)—there seems to be some positive evidence for the theory of interpolation. It would be most unnatural for Origen to refer to 2 P with the words in epistola sua; to quote the salutation of 2 P, which only differs from that of 1 P by an immaterial addition (in recognitione Dei); and then to add a quotation from 1 P, introducing it with the phrase et iterum alibi.

(in the fourth edition of Scrivener, ii. p. 104 f.), holds that 'it has been sufficiently proved that translations into Coptic existed in the 3rd cent., very probably in the 2nd.' F. Robinson (art. on EGYPTIAN VERSIONS in vol. i. p. 670 ff.) urges that such conclusions are in danger of outrunning the evidence, and that 'historical evidence, on the whole, points to the 3rd cent. as the period when the first Coptic translation was made.' The investigation desiderated by Westcott (Canon p. 370), i.e. 'how far an older work underlies the printed text, and whether that can be attributed to one author,' has not yet been accomplished. We must therefore acquiesce in his verdict as to the Bohairic version, a verdict which is even more applicable to the Sahidic—'till this has been determined, no stress can be laid upon the evidence which the version affords for the disputed Cath. Epp.'

(iii.) Carthage.—There is no evidence that Tertullian or Cyprian was acquainted with 2 P.

(iv.) Asia Minor.—(a) In a letter to Cyprian (Cyprian, Ep. lxxv. 6), Firmilian, bp. of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, writes: 'Stephanus . . . adhuc etiam infamans Petrum et Paulum beatos apostolos . . . qui in epistolis suis hæreticos execrati sunt et ut eos euitemus monuerunt.' The reference, it would seem, must be to 2 P, since 1 P contains no indictment of heretics. (b) Methodius, bp. of Olympus and afterwards of Patara, who appears to have suffered in the Diocletian persecution. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. I. i. p. 313) points out some passages in the treatise de Resurrectione, in which he thinks that this writer alludes to 2 P 3^{10-13}. They are as follows:—ἐκπυρωθήσεται μὲν γὰρ πρὸς κάθαρσιν καὶ ἀνακαινισμὸν καταβασίῳ πᾶς κατακλυζόμενος ὁ κόσμος πυρί, οὐ μὴν εἰς ἀπώλειαν ἐλεύσεται παντελῆ καὶ φθοράν . . . διὸ ἀνάγκη δὴ καὶ τὴν γῆν αὖθις καὶ τὸν οὐρανὸν μετὰ τὴν ἐκφλόγωσιν ἔσεσθαι πάντων καὶ τὸν βρασμόν (ed. Jahn p. 78); and again, ἵνα γινώσκωμεν εὐδηλότερον ὅτι πάντων πυρὶ καταβασίῳ κατομβρουμένων τὰ ἐν ἀγνείᾳ σώματα καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ διαπρέψαντα καθάπερ ψυχρῷ ὕδατι τῷ πυρί, οὐδὲν ἀλγυνόμενα πρὸς αὐτοῦ, ἐπιβήσονται (p. 94). But the words of Methodius do not contain any phrases borrowed from 2 P, and may well be speculations on the ἐκπύρωσις independent of that Epistle. There is, however, a fragment from the same treatise (Pitra, Anal. Sacra iii. p. 611) which explicitly quotes 2 P 3^{8}—χίλια δὲ ἔτη τῆς βασιλείας ὠνόμασεν τὸν ἀπέραντον αἰῶνα διὰ τῆς χιλιάδος δηλῶν· γέγραφεν γὰρ ὁ ἀπόστολος Πέτρος ὅτι μία ἡμέρα παρὰ Κυρίῳ ὡς χίλια ἔτη καὶ χίλια ἔτη ὡς ἡμέρα μία. In this connexion the evidence of the Dialogue which passes under the name of Adamantius should be noticed. In this work, which was probably written in the later years of Constantine, large use is made of the works of Methodius (Hort in Dict. Christ. Biog. i. p. 39 f.), and 2 P is quoted in it. In one passage (§ 2, p. 58 ed. Wetstein) the orthodox interlocutor helps his Marcionite opponent out of a difficulty as to St. Paul's authority by adducing Ac $9^{15f.}$ and 2 P 3^{15} (πῇ δὲ ὑπὸ Πέτρου τοῦ ἀποστόλου γεγραμμένον). In another passage (§ 1, p. 41), it should be added, words (ἕκαστος ᾧ ἥττηται τούτῳ καὶ δεδούλωται) very near to those of 2 P 2^{19} are appealed to as 'the common proverb' (ὁ ἔξωθεν λόγος).

(v.) Rome.—(a) Murat. Canon. 2 P is not mentioned in the text of the fragment as it stands. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. II. i. p. 110 n.), however, conjectures that in one passage some words have slipped out, and he would restore it thus: 'Apocalypsin etiam Johannis et Petri [unam] tantum recipimus [epistulam; fertur etiam altera], quam quidam ex nostris legi in ecclesia nolunt.' For the language cf. Eus. HE III. iii. 4. The suggestion appears a probable one, but without further evidence it must remain a conjecture. (b) Hippolytus. The following passages claim attention: —Refut. Hær. ix. 7, οἱ πρὸς μὲν ὥραν αἰδούμενοι καὶ ὑπὸ τῆς ἀληθείας συναγόμενοι ὡμολόγουν μετ' οὐ πολὺ δὲ ἐπὶ τὸν αὐτὸν βόρβορον ἀνεκυλίοντο (2 P 2^{22}); in Dan. iii. 22, ᾧ γὰρ ἄν τις ὑποταγῇ τούτῳ καὶ δεδούλωται (2 P 2^{19}); ib. iv. 10, εἰ γὰρ καὶ νῦν βραδύνει πρὸ καιροῦ, μὴ θέλων τὴν κρίσιν τῷ κόσμῳ ἐπενεγκεῖν (2 P 3^{8} 2^{5}); ib. iv. 16, μήποτε . . . ἀπονυστάξαντες οἱ ἄνθρωποι ἐκπέσωσιν τῆς ἐπουρανίου ζωῆς; ib. iv. 60, ἵνα μὴ . . . ἀπονυστάξαντες ἐκπέσωμεν τῆς αἰδίου ζωῆς (2 P 3^{17}). These coincidences are not such as to produce conviction.* The first two, which are not the least striking of the series, are of the nature of proverbs, and it is rash to infer literary indebtedness from the common use of such expressions. The use of ἐκπεσεῖν in the last two passages is not in itself specially remarkable (cf. e.g. Gal 5^{4}, Epist. ap. Eus. HE VII. xxx. 13; Can. Petri Alex. 8, 10, 11 (Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. p. 31 ff.)). Taken together, however, these passages in Hippolytus give the impression that he was acquainted with 2 P.

(vi.) The division of sections in Codex B.—In this MS there are two divisions of sections, one older than the other. This double division is carried on through the Catholic Epistles with the exception of one Epistle. In 2 P (standing between 1 P and 1 Jn) the older divisions are wanting (Gregory, Proleg. i. pp. 156, 359). The conclusion is inevitable that the ancestor of Codex B, to which these divisions were first attached, did not contain 2 P.

(vii.) Old Latin Texts.—That there were pre-Hieronymian Latin translations of 2 P (see above, p. 796) is clear. But the fragments which remain indicate that these translations belonged to the later 'Italian' type of text; nor is there any evidence that others of earlier date ever existed. This view, in regard to the absence of 2 P from older Latin translations of the Catholic Epistles, is confirmed by the fact to which Westcott (Canon p. 263 ff.) calls attention, 'It appears that the Latin text of the Epistle [in the Vulgate] not only exhibits constant and remarkable differences from the text of other parts of the Vulgate, but also differs from the first Epistle in the rendering of words common to both; . . . it further appears that it differs not less clearly from the Epistle of St. Jude (which was received in the African Church) in those parts which are almost identical in the Greek.' 'The supposition,' he adds, 'that it was admitted into the Canon at the same time with them becomes at once unnatural.'

To sum up the evidence of the 3rd cent.: 2 P was probably commented on by Clement, but regarded as the companion, not of 1 P but of the Apocalypse of Peter; it is not, however, quoted in his extant works. Origen certainly knew of the Epistle as accepted by some, but rejected by others; it is probable that he himself did not use it. It was received into the Canon by the Egyptian Churches, but the time of its reception we do not know. It was accepted in Asia Minor by Firmilian and Methodius, the latter of whom regards the Apocalypse of Peter as 'inspired' (Conviv. Virg. ii. 6). It is probable, but not certain, that it was known at Rome in the time of Hippolytus. Neither Tertullian nor Cyprian refers to it, and it does not appear to have been included among the Catholic Epistles in any but the late pre-Hieronymian Latin texts. There is no Western attestation of the Epistle during this period.

(3) We now pass to the 4th cent., when the place which, as will appear, 2 P had already secured among the Apostolic books became assured everywhere except in the Syrian Church. (a) Eusebius. It appears from HE II. xxiii. 25 (τῆς λεγομένης Ἰούδα,

* Zahn (Gesch. Kan. I. i. p. 316 n.) also compares with 2 P 1^{20} Hipp. de Antichr. 2, οὐ γὰρ ἐξ ἰδίας δυνάμεως ἐφθέγγοντο . . . ἅθεν καὶ ἡμεῖς τὰ ὑπ' αὐτῶν προειρημένα καλῶς μαθητευθέντες λέγομεν οὐκ ἐξ ἰδίας ἡμῶν ἐπινοίας. But there is no close resemblance in language.

μιᾶς καὶ αὐτῆς οὔσης τῶν ἑπτὰ λεγομένων καθολικῶν) that the phrase 'Catholic Epistles' (cf. VI. xiv. 1) was already a recognized term, and that they were already commonly regarded as seven in number. We turn to the two great passages in which Eus. deals with the books of the NT. In HE III. iii., after mentioning 1 P as 'certainly genuine,' he continues, τὴν δὲ φερομένην δευτέραν οὐκ ἐνδιάθηκον μὲν εἶναι παρειλήφαμεν· ὅμως δὲ πολλοῖς χρήσιμος φανεῖσα, μετὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἐσπουδάσθη γραφῶν. He then refers to the Acts of Peter, the Gospel, the Preaching, and the Apocalypse, and, after stating the plan and purpose of his references to the books of the NT, he gives his own judgment in regard to 2 P—τὰ μὲν ὀνομαζόμενα Πέτρου, ὧν μόνην μίαν γνησίαν ἔγνων ἐπιστολὴν καὶ παρὰ τοῖς πάλαι πρεσβυτέροις ὡμολογημένην, τοσαῦτα. In the later passage (III. xxv.) Eus. divides the books into two main classes—the accepted books (ὁμολογούμενα) and the disputed books (ἀντιλεγόμενα). The latter class is again subdivided. There are within it (a) 'disputed books which are yet recognized by most (γνώριμα τοῖς πολλοῖς),' and (β) 'disputed books which are spurious (νόθα).' To the latter subdivision belongs (among other books) the Apocalypse of Peter; to the former, 'the so-called Epistle of James, that of Jude, the Second Epistle of Peter, and the so-named Second and Third of John.' From these passages of Eus. we learn some important points about 2 P. (i.) The Catholic Epistles were, at the time Eus. wrote, regarded (at least in some quarters) as seven in number'*; (ii.) the judgment of the past, as Eus. had received it, was against 2 P—οὐκ ἐνδιάθηκον μὲν εἶναι παρειλήφαμεν. (iii.) The reason why 2 P had been 'studied (ἐσπουδάσθη) in company with the other Scriptures' was, according to Eus., that it was regarded very commonly as answering the purposes of practical edification (πολλοῖς χρήσιμος φανεῖσα). (iv.) Eus. did not himself receive 2 P as γνησία ἐπιστολή. When he speaks of 1 P, which he accepted without a doubt, as παρὰ τοῖς πάλαι πρεσβυτέροις ὡμολογημένη (cf. § 1), he clearly implies that 2 P was deficient in such recognition. The opinion of Eus. is significant. His knowledge of early Christian literature was wide. He was acquainted with many works which are lost to us. When, then, the modern critic fails to discover in early writings any certain trace of 2 P, his experience is only a repetition of that of Eusebius. And further, the evidence of Eus. indicates that the recovery of such lost books as those of Papias and Hegesippus, which were known to him, would in all probability supply us with no fresh evidence as to 2 P.

We turn now to the great Churches of the East, and to the great writers whose influence dominated Western Christendom in the 4th century and onwards.

(i.) The Churches of Syria.—(a) The Syriac-speaking Churches. The Syriac Vulgate (Peshiṭta) contained only three of the Catholic Epistles, viz. James, 1 P, 1 Jn. There do not appear to be any quotations from or references to 2 P in Aphraat or in the Syriac works of Ephraem.† At a much later time (i.e. the 13th cent.) Ebed Jesu, a Nestorian bishop of Nisibis, writes, 'Tres autem Epistolæ quæ inscribuntur Apostolis in omni codice et lingua, Jacobo scilicet et Petro et Joanni; et Catholicæ nuncupantur' (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. Pars i. p. 9 f.). On the other hand, the discoveries and investigations of Dr. Gwynn of Dublin (Royal Irish Acad. Transactions, xxvii. p. 269 ff., xxx. p. 347 ff.) show that the Harklensian version of 2 P, Jude, and 2, 3 Jn is a revision of the text of these Epistles published by Pococke in 1630, which is given in the printed editions of the Peshiṭta; and further, that the Pococke text of these Epistles was a part of the Philoxenian version made by Polycarp for Xenaias or Philoxenus, the Monophysite bishop of Mabug about the year A.D. 500. It appears, therefore, that 2 P was rejected by the early Syrian Church, but that early in the 6th cent. it was accepted at least in the Monophysite branch of that Church. (β) The Greek School of Antioch. Among the innumerable quotations from and allusions to Scripture found in the writings of Chrysostom,* Theodore, and Theodoret, there does not appear to be one reference to 2 P. In the Synopsis commonly ascribed to Chrysostom (Migne, Pat. Gr. lvi. 314 ff.) the phrase used—τῶν καθολικῶν ἐπιστολαὶ τρεῖς—implies not only the acceptance of three Epistles, but the rejection of others. The views of Theodore are preserved (see arts. on JUDE and 1 PETER) in Junilius' treatise, Instituta Regularia. Of the Catholic Epistles only 1 P and 1 Jn are accepted. 'Adiungunt quam plurimi quinque alias, quæ apostolorum canonicæ nuncupantur.' These five Epistles, among which is 2 P, are described as being mediæ auctoritatis (Kihn, Theodore p. 478 ff.). Thus 2 P had no place in the Syriac NT. The great Antiochene school of exegetes joined their Syriac-speaking neighbours in its rejection. Moreover, since Chrysostom's expositions at any rate were addressed to popular audiences, the rejection of the Epistle by the great teachers in question must have reflected the usage of the Antiochene Church generally in the matter. (ii.) Asia Minor. 2 P has a place in the list of Gregory Nazianzen; yet neither he nor Gregory of Nyssa nor Basil appears to quote or to refer to the Epistle (Westcott, Canon p. 446). An expression of doubt is found in the list of Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium (c. 380 A.D.)—καθολικῶν ἐπιστολῶν | τινὲς μὲν ἑπτά φασιν, οἱ δὲ τρεῖς μόνας | χρῆναι δέχεσθαι. (iii.) Jerusalem. Cyril includes 2 P in his list of books, as does his contemporary and fellow-countryman Epiphanius (cf. Zahn, Gesch. Kan. II. i. p. 226 n.). (iv.) Alexandria. The list of NT books given by Athanasius in one of his Festal Epistles includes 2 P. Towards the end of the century, however, the doubt as to 2 P finds expression in the commentary on the Epistle by Didymus. His words, as they are preserved in the Latin translation, are as follows: 'Non est igitur ignorandum præsentem epistolam esse falsatam, quæ licet publicetur non tamen in canone est' (Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxix. 1774). The Latin phrase printed above in italics probably represents the Greek words ὡς νοθεύεται αὕτη ἡ ἐπιστολή. If this be so, the passage conveys not the writer's own view, but a report of the opinion of others. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. I. i. p. 312) urges that Didymus is here recording a judgment which is a relic of the 2nd or 3rd cent., though expressed in the language of later times. The similarity of the terms used to those employed by Eusebius in reference to James (Eus. II. xxiii. 25) suggests rather that Didymus here preserves an opinion more or less contemporary with himself,—the view probably of scholars who conceded a

* The fact that seven Catholic Epistles appear for the first time, so far as the present writer knows, in Eusebius of Cæsarea, confirms the suggestion of Sanday (Studia Bibl. et Eccles. iii. pp. 253, 259), that 'it is possible that the collection of seven Epistles may have originated [at Jerusalem]; or if brought in the first instance from Egypt, it would seem to have been at Jerusalem that it first became established.'

† F. H. Woods in Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica iii. p. 138. In v. 342 B. Eph. has the words 'the day of the Lord is a thief.' The phrase has been thought to be derived from 2 P 3^{10}, for, when it is compared with the Pesh. of 1 Th 5^{2}, it will be noticed that (1) 'in the night' is omitted, (2) 'the Lord' takes the place of 'our Lord.' But such slight differences and coincidences are hardly worth consideration in the case of a common proverbial expression.

* Some of the comments on 2 P in Cramer's Catena are there ascribed to Chrysostom. The present writer (Chrysostom p. 79 n.) has pointed out that these fragments bear some resemblance to Chrysostom's work. They are, however, too brief to warrant a positive opinion.

public use of the book—'it seemed useful to many' (Eus. HE III. iii. 1),—but protested against its being placed on the same level as books whose authenticity was not questioned. (v.) Constantinople. The Church in New Rome was in many respects the daughter of the Church at Antioch. But she did not inherit any doubts as to the full Canon of the NT. Constantinople was the centre and the type of Imperial influence on matters ecclesiastical and religious. The preparation, which Constantine entrusted to Eusebius, of 'fifty copies of the Divine Scriptures' for use in the new capital, had important results. It was natural that these copies should contain all the books of the NT which had gained general recognition. A quasi-official standard was thus set up; and the distinction between 'acknowledged' and 'disputed' books soon became little more than a matter of antiquarian interest (Westcott, Canon p. 427).

We turn to the West. There appears to be no ante-Nicene evidence for 2 P in the West. It is quoted in the last quarter of the 4th century by Ambrose of Milan (de Fide iii. 12, 'Petrus sanctus adseruit dicens Quapropter satagite,' etc. (1^{10})), and by Priscillian in Spain (see above, p. 796). It has a place in the list of Philastrius of Brescia (c. 385), and later in that of Rufinus (c. 410). On the other hand, in the Canon Mommsenianus, which appears to be an African list of the middle of the 4th cent., it is inserted, but inserted with a protest—

eplae Iohannis III $\overline{\text{ur}}$ CCCCL una sola
eplae Petri II $\overline{\text{uer}}$ CCC
una sola.

The author of the list, transcribing an older catalogue, added an expression of his own doubt.* The decisive influences, however, in Western Christendom were those of Jerome and Augustine. The latter, though not insensible to the effect on the authority of a book caused by its rejection in some quarters (de Doctr. Chr. ii. 12, 13), yet in practice appealed without distinction to all the books of our NT. Jerome was acquainted with the widespread doubts as to the genuineness of 2 P. In the section in the de Virr. Illustr. which deals with St. Peter, he says, 'Scripsit duas epistolas quæ catholicæ nominantur; quarum secunda a plerisque eius esse negatur propter stili cum priore dissonantiam.' The kind of objection which they are alleged to have urged limits the reference of a plerisque: Jerome has in mind the doubts of the learned. This dissonantia he thus accounts for (Quæst. ad Hedib., Migne, Pat. Lat. xxii. 1002), 'Duæ epistolæ quæ feruntur Petri stilo inter se et charactere discrepant structuraque uerborum. Ex quo intelligimus pro necessitate rerum diuersis eum usum interpretibus.' These doubts, however, Jerome himself puts on one side, and in his letter to Paulinus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 548) he speaks of the books which make up our NT without any sign of differentiating between them—'Paulus Apostolus ad septem ecclesias scribit . . . Iacobus Petrus Joannes Judas Apostoli septem epistolas ediderunt.' This view, which doubtless represents that of the Church of Rome, found expression in the Canon of the Vulgate. The recognition in this version of the Seven Catholic Epistles practically closed the question in the West. Thus during the course of the 4th cent. the Epistle was finally received into the NT of Greek-speaking and Latin-speaking Christendom, though the Syriac-speaking Churches still refused to it entrance into their Canon.

To sum up: The evidence as to the reception of 2 P in the Church has now been given and sifted. It becomes necessary to interpret it as a whole. We do not find any certain trace of 2 P in the extant literature of the 2nd cent. Coincidences, which have been adduced to prove literary indebtedness, turn out on examination to be nothing more than illustrations, literary or doctrinal. Further, the words of Eusebius, as was pointed out above, seem to exclude the possibility that books now lost contained clear references to 2 P. Spitta and Zahn (see above, p. 798) agree in finding an explanation of the obscurity in which the Epistle remained in the supposition that it was addressed by St. Peter to Jewish Christians, and that Gentile Christians would not be likely to take much interest in a document written for Jewish fellow-believers. The theory is open to criticism in several directions. (i.) It cannot be said that there is anything in the Epistle itself which suggests that it was addressed by a Jew to Jews. The negative argument urged against the supposition that 1 P was sent to Jewish Churches is valid here; see above, p. 783. (ii.) But let it be granted that internal evidence favours the supposition that it was addressed to Jewish converts. Would such a destination be likely to be a bar to its recognition in other Churches? The Epistle of St. James and that to the Hebrews were both addressed to Jewish communities; and though they were by no means universally accepted in ancient times, yet their history stands in marked contrast to that of 2 P. (iii.) The argument for the authenticity of 2 P, as urged by these critics, depends largely on the witness of the Ep. of St. Jude, which in their view was sent to the same Church or Churches as 2 P. Why, then, was the brief Epistle of one who was not an apostle circulated widely, while a longer Epistle of the chief of the Lord's personal followers was permitted to remain in absolute obscurity?

The want of allusions to the Ep. and of reminiscences of its language is more significant when two further considerations are taken into account. In the first place, the style of the Epistle is so remarkable that its phrases, if known, could hardly fail to be remembered, and, if regarded as apostolic, to be appealed to; and it must be added that, if appealed to, they could not but be reproduced in a form which would make recognition easy and obvious. In the second place, the Epistle would have been a controversial armoury for the assailants of the Gnostics. Had it been known and looked on as authoritative, it could not but have been used, as 1 John and 2 John are used by Irenæus (i. 16. 3, iii. 16. 5, 8). The first piece of certain evidence is the passage from Origen quoted by Eusebius, though it hardly admits of doubt that the Epistle was known to Clement of Alexandria. It is certain that during the 3rd cent. the Epistle gained acceptance in certain Churches, though the evidence is too scanty and (e.g. as to the date of the Egyptian and of the Old Latin texts) too uncertain for us to define with any exactness what those Churches were. It is clear also that by the time of Eusebius the recognition of Seven Catholic Epistles had (at least in Churches which he knew best) become usual. On the other hand, the evidence of Origen, Eusebius, Didymus, and Jerome shows that those teachers whose knowledge of Christian literature prior to their own days was widest, were conscious of the doubt which attached to 2 P.

How, then, was 2 P received into the Canon? The history is very obscure, but the evidence suggests that there were three stages. (a) The information which we possess as to the Hypotyposeis of Clement leads us to think (see above, p. 803) that at Alexandria, at the beginning of the 3rd cent., 2 P was regarded as the companion of the Apocalypse of Peter rather than of 1 P. This is to some extent

* Harnack (Theol. Ltzg. 1886, col. 173) suggests that in the repeated una sola there is in one case a reference to James, in the other a reference to Jude. The word sola, however, would remain unexplained (see Zahn, Gesch. Kan. II. i. p. 155 n.; Sanday in Studia Bibl. et Eccles. iii. p. 243 ff.).

confirmed by the position of Methodius, who used 2 P (see above, p. 804), but who also counted the Apocalypse of Peter among 'divinely inspired writings' (Conviv. Virg. ii. 6; Migne, Pat. Gr. xviii. 57). (b) If this be so, yet before the time of Eusebius the two documents had parted company. Eusebius, who did not himself accept 2 P, gives us his view of the way in which before his time 2 P had secured a place among the Catholic Epistles—πολλοῖς χρήσιμος φανεῖσα μετὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἐσπουδάσθη γραφῶν. When once it was 'studied with the other Scriptures,' it could not fail to attach itself to 1 P, for it proclaimed itself as a 'second Epistle' of that apostle (3[1]). This juxtaposition would necessarily confirm the respect already paid to it, and would, for most readers, decide at once its apostolic authorship. Further, we may conjecture that, when other Epistles besides the three—1 P, 1 Jn, Ja—were reckoned as Catholic Epistles, there would be a natural tendency to make that group seven in number. So the collection would seem to have a sacred completeness, and also to be brought into relation with the Pauline collection. For St. Paul wrote to Seven Churches (Canon Murat.; Jerome, ad Paul. Ep. liii. 8, Migne, Pat. Lat. xxii. 548), and his Epistles were regarded as fourteen in number. Again, the Apocalypse was addressed to Seven Churches. (c) We have already seen how, notwithstanding the doubts of the learned, the fuller Canon of the Catholic Epistles gained final recognition in the Greek Churches of the East and in the Western Churches. Reviewing the whole history, we remark that the case of 2 P is unlike that of Jude. We find no trace of the Epistle in the period when the tradition of apostolic days was still living. This lack of early evidence, even when taken in conjunction with the paucity of 3rd cent. evidence, the doubts expressed by, e.g., Origen and Eusebius, and the absence of the Epistle from the NT of the Syriac-speaking Church, does not prove its spuriousness. But the absolute insufficiency of external evidence creates a presumption against its genuineness, and throws the whole burden of proof on the internal evidence of the Epistle itself.

3. VOCABULARY AND STYLE.—(a) Vocabulary. A full examination of the remarkable vocabulary of 2 P is beyond the limits of this article. The following are the main points:—

(i.) The influence of the LXX.—The Epistle contains no formal quotation from the OT. WH use uncial type only in five places—2^{22} (Is 52^{5}) 2^{22} (Pr 26^{11}) 3^{8} (Ps 90 (89) 4) 3^{12} (Is 34^{4}) 3^{13} (Is 65^{17} 66^{22}). But in none of these passages is the resemblance of language so close as to make the reference to the LXX certain. In 2^{2} (δι' οὓς . . . βλασφημηθήσεται) the writer perhaps does but adopt a type of phrase common in early Christian literature; see Lightfoot on Clement, 1. The only word common to 2^{22} and Pr 26^{11} is κύων, and we may have a current proverb based on the words of Proverbs. Much the same may be said of 3^{8} (see above, p. 800). In 3^{12}ᶠ. the writer is perhaps adopting the phraseology of Christian apocalyptic writings based on Is (cf. Rev 21^{1}, Apoc. Petr. apud Macarius Magn. iv. 7; see Lightfoot on '2 Clem.' xvi.). Other LXX phrases are εἰρήνη πληθυνθείη 1^{2} (Dn 3^{98}, but see 1 P 1^{2}, Jude 2), ἡ αἰώνιος βασιλεία 1^{11} (Dn 3^{100}), κατακλυσμὸν ἐπάγειν 2^{5} (Gn 6^{17}), ἐπ' ἰσχάτων τῶν ἡμερῶν 3^{3} (e.g. Jos 24^{27}). For ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ ὄρει (1^{18}) compare Ps 2⁶, Is 11^{9} 27^{13} 63^{18}, Ezk 28^{14} (where, however, 'my,' 'thy,' or the like, is always added). The phrase ἡμέραν ἐξ ἡμέρας 2^{8} (LXX[3]) is also classical (Eur. Rhesus 445). Words used in this Epistle which are characteristic of the LXX are ἄλογος (Job 2), ἐντρυφᾶν (LXX[5]), καθαρισμός (common in LXX), κατακλύζειν (LXX[6], Wis 2), κατασπατᾶσθαι (2 Mac[1], 3 Mac 2), καταστροφή (Gn 19^{29}), μεγαλειότης (LXX[4]), μεγαλοπρεπής (Dt[1], 2 Mac 2, 3 Mac[1]; see above, p. 799), μῶμος (common in LXX), νυστάζειν (LXX[11]), σκήνωμα (common in LXX), ὑποζύγιον (common in LXX = 'ass'). Some of these words, however, such as καθαρισμός, μῶμος, were at an early period adopted into the vocabulary of the Church, and so, without any borrowing from the LXX, would naturally be used by a Christian writer. That the author of 2 P derived some of his words and phrases from the LXX is clear. But it is no less clear that he was not steeped in its language. It was not a book which he was wont 'nocturna uersare manu, uersare diurna.'

(ii.) Classical words.—A large element in the vocabulary consists of what may be roughly described as classical words. Care, however, must be taken not to set up a delusive standard. In his articles on 2 P in Expos. (Ser. II. vol. iii.) E. A. Abbott writes thus (p. 206): 'In order to appreciate the resemblance between this Indian-English [i.e. a passage quoted from the Madras Mail] and the style of the Second Epistle, we must bear in mind that some of the words employed by the author of the latter are very rare in Greek literature; and others, though good classical Greek in themselves, are rare or non-existent in the New Testament.' A modern scholar, with his apparatus of NT lexicons and concordances, is apt unconsciously to isolate the vocabulary of the NT writers or of a certain section of them, and, forgetting that the limits of this vocabulary are accidental, to make it something of an absolute rule by which to judge a document whose authenticity is doubtful. With this caution the following list of words is given which do not occur in the NT except in 2 P*—ἄθεσμος (3 Mac[2], Diod., Philo, Joseph., Plut.), ἀκατάπαυστος (v.l. in 2^{14}; Polyb., Diod., Joseph., Plut.), ἄλωσις (LXX[1]; Pind., Herod., Æsch.), ἀμαθής (Symm. (Ps); Herod. and onwards), ἀμώμητος (Hom., inscr.; adv. Herod.; v.l. in Ph 2^{15}), ἀποφεύγειν (common Herod. and onwards; Sir[1]), ἀργεῖν (Soph., Eur., and onwards; LXX[6]), ἀστήρικτος (Anthol., Longin.), αὐχμηρός (Eur., Plato, etc.; Apoc. Petri), βλέμμα (Æsch. and onwards; on meaning see below), βόρβορος (LXX[1]; Æsch. and onwards; comp. ἐν βορβόρῳ κυλίεσθαι Epict. Diss. 4. 11. 29), βραδυτής (Hom. and onwards), διαυγάζειν (Polyb., Plut., Aq. (Job)), δυσνόητος (Lucian, Diog. Laert.), ἐγκαταλείπειν (Herod., Eur., Polyb.), ἑκάστοτε (Herod. and onwards common), ἑκούσιος (Philo, Joseph., Plut., Arrian), ἐξακολουθεῖν (LXX[6]; Polyb., Joseph., Plut., Dion. Hal., Epict.), ἐπάγγελμα (Dem., Isocr., Aristot.), ἐπίλυσις (Aq. (Gn), Sym. (Hos); Hermas, Iren., Clem., Sext. Emp., Heliod.; verb Mk), ἐπόπτης (Æsch., Dem. 'spectator'; Plut., Inscr. in reference to mysteries), ἰσότιμος (Philo, Joseph., Plut., Lucian, Æl.), λήθην λαβεῖν (Jos. Ant. II. ix. 1), μίασμα (LXX[8]; Tragg. and onwards common), μιασμός (Wis[1], 1 Mac[1]; Aq. (Dt), Symm. (K), Plut., Test. xii. Patr., Hermas), ἀλόγως (Aq. (Is); Anthol.), ὁμίχλη (LXX[10]; Hom. (Il.), Æsch., Ar., Xen., Aristot.), παρανομία (LXX[9]; Thuc., Plato, Polyb., Dion. Hal.), παρισάγειν (Isocr., Polyb., Plut., Diod.), παρισφέρειν (Dem. 'to bring in a law'), πλαστός (Herod., Eur., Xen., Lucian), στηριγμός (Aristot., Diod., Plut.), στρεβλοῦν (LXX[1], 3 Mac[1], 4 Mac[4]; Herod. and onwards common in literal sense), ταχινός (LXX[6]; Theocr., Callim., Aratus), τεφροῦν (Theophr., Lycophro, Philo, Dion. Cass., Antonin., Anthol.), τοιόσδε (LXX[3]; Hom. and onwards common), τολμητής (Thuc., Philo., Joseph., Plut., Lucian), ὗς (LXX[7]; Hom. and onwards common), φωσφόρος (Tim. Locr., Philo).

(iii.) Very rare or unique words.—They are ἀκατάπαστος (v.l. in 2^{14}; on the possible origin and meaning of the word see Hort's Introduction [Notes p. 170]), ἐμπαιγμονή (KL and other authorities omit ἐν ἐμπ. in 3^{3}), ἑξέραμα, κυλισμός (so BC* curs[4]; κύλισμα ℵAKLP, etc.), παραφρονία, ῥοιζηδόν, ταρταροῦν. Of these, two (ἑξέραμα and κυλισμός) occur in the two proverbs cited in 2^{22}, and we cannot be sure therefore that they are due to the writer himself. In the case of three of the words the matter is one of form. The word ἐμπαιγμονή does not seem to occur elsewhere; but ἐμπαιγμός, which does not occur in profane writers, is found in LXX[6], in Theodot.[1], in an anonymous Greek version[2], and in He 11^{36}. Again, there does not seem to be anything to choose in point of rarity between κυλισμός and κύλισμα. For both, a reference is given in the lexicons to a work on farriery (Hippiatrica) of late date. The former is found in Theod. (Pr 21^{8}), the latter in Symm. (Ezk 10^{13}). The former expresses the act of rolling, the kindred Aristotelian word κύλισις being inadmissible since it has a technical athletic sense; the latter properly the thing rolled, and so perhaps the place of rolling—the word κυλίστρα, which is used in Xen. Eq. 5. 3, is apparently a technical term in the training of horses. Again, if παραφροσύνη is found in Plato and Hippocrates, the παραφρονία of 2 P shares the opprobrium of being a ἅπαξ λεγόμενον with παραφρόνησις, which is used by the LXX in Zec 12^{4}. Again, for ῥοιζηδόν (as for ῥοιζηδά) Nicander, a poet who wrote about 150 B.C., is quoted, the verb (ῥοιζεῖν) and the noun (ῥοῖζος) both being recognized Greek words. Again, the verb ἐξεράω is used of vomiting (metaphorically) in classical Greek (Aristoph.) and in Aquila (Lv 18^{28}), and 'vomit' is a natural meaning of ἐξέραμα. Lastly, though ταρταροῦν is found apparently only in 2 P and in a scholium on Homer, the compound καταταρταροῦν is used by Apollodorus and Sextus Empiricus. The words which have been examined are, it cannot be denied, strange and unusual terms; but something can be said in defence of each of them. The papyri which have been discovered of late years have brought home to us our ignorance of colloquial Greek, and suggest caution in peremptorily condemning a word found only in a particular writer as the barbarism of an individual.

(iv.) Solecisms.—There are certain expressions in the Epistle which, so far as our knowledge of the language goes, appear to be contrary to usage. They are as follows:—

(a) βλεμμα (βλέμματι καὶ ἀκοῇ, 2^{8}). Field (Notes on Trans. of NT p. 241) writes thus: 'In seeing and hearing. This seems to be the only admissible interpretation, though quite at variance with the use of βλέμμα in good writers. . . . St. Peter should have written either ὁράσει καὶ ἀκοῇ or βλέπων καὶ ἀκούων.'

(b) νεκροῦσθαι ($3^{10.12}$). It is pointed out that Dioscorides (c. 100 A.D.) and Galen (c. 160 A.D.), both medical writers, use the word in the sense of 'to suffer from καῦσος, i.e. a remittent fever.' The word does not appear to occur elsewhere. On the other hand, it must be noticed that Athenæus (see Sophocles, Lexicon) uses the cognate noun καῦσος of 'burnt soil,' and that Hesychius assigns to it the meaning of 'a volcanic country.'

* In this list the LXX includes the Apocrypha. Words are not included which are given under the next (iii.) section.

(c) μελλήσω (1^{12}; so ℵABCP curs^{4} Ægyptt (boh sah), οὐκ ἀμελήσω KL, etc., Syr-hkl). Field (ib. p. 240) writes thus: 'RV renders [μελλήσω] "I shall be ready," and Alford "I will be sure"; but no example of any such use of μελλήσω is forthcoming. . . . I think it not improbable that St. Peter wrote διὸ μελήσω, "I will take care," a rare but not unexampled construction for διὸ μελήσει μοι.'

(d) μνήμην ποιεῖσθαι (1^{15}). The phrase is used from Herodotus onwards with the sense 'to make mention of.' In the passage quoted from Thucydides ii. 54 (πρὸς ἃ ἔπασχον τὴν μνήμην ἐποιοῦντο), the expression signifies 'they shaped their recollections' (cf. i. 140, πρὸς τὰς συμφορὰς καὶ τὰς γνώμας τρεπομένους). In Arist. Rhet. iii. 12. 4, μνήμην πεποίηκεν means 'he has made him famous' (see Cope's note). But no instance of the phrase in the sense of 'to remember' is forthcoming.

(e) μυωπάζειν (τυφλός ἐστιν μυωπάζων, 1^{9}). The passage quoted for the verb from Arist. Probl. 31. 16. 25 (μυωπάζειν λέγονται οἱ ἐκ γενετῆς τὰ μὲν ἐγγὺς βλέποντες, τὰ δὲ ἐξ ἀποστάσεως οὐχ ὁρῶντες) is not found in Bekker's text. The adjective μύωψ, however, occurs several times in the passage, as in Rhet. iii. 11. 12, in the technical sense 'shortsighted,' nor is it found with any other meaning. There seems to be no justification at all from usage for the opinion of those who, like Spitta (p. 73 ff.), take μυωπάζων in 2 P to imply 'wilful blindness,' and so explain its position after τυφλός ἐστιν; nor is such a meaning natural. There can be little doubt that the writer of 2 P is here guilty of a rhetorical bathos.

(f) παρεισφέρειν (σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παρεισενέγκαντες, 1^{5}). Wetstein quotes Jos. and Diod. for the phrase σπουδὴν πᾶσαν εἰσφέρειν. It must, however, be confessed that the RV 'adding on your part' is rather a benevolent paraphrase than a translation (παρα- in παραδοῦναι and similar words having the idea of transmission), and that it is difficult to assign any meaning which can be justified by usage to the double compound. In 2^{1} the similarly formed verb παρεισάγειν is correctly and pertinently used (cf. Gal 2^{4}, Jude 4).

(g) σιρός (σιροῖς ζόφου, 2^{4}; so ℵABC Aug. al, σειραῖς KL, etc., boh Syr-hkl). Field (ib. p. 241) writes thus: 'σειρός, σιρός, or σιρρός, "a pit," or "excavation," properly for the storage of grain, as Demosth. p. 100, 28. . . . Philo, de Tel. Constr. p. 86. . . . And J. Pollux joins κατάγειοι οἰκήσεις, καὶ σειροί, καὶ φρέατα, καὶ λάκκοι. Alford wrongly translates "dens," and says: "The word is used for a wolf's den by Longus i. 11"; but he can never have read the passage, in which the method of trapping a she-wolf is thus described: συναθόντες οὖν οἱ κομῆται νύκτωρ, σιρροὺς ὀρύττουσι τὸ εὖρος ὀργυιᾶς. . . .' Here too, then, it seems probable that the author of 2 P has in the midst of a somewhat magnificent phrase interpolated a word with which a technical sense was commonly, if not exclusively, associated.*

(v.) We pass on to note a remarkable characteristic of the vocabulary of 2 P, viz. its iteration. There are some words which must be repeated, whenever it is necessary to express distinctly and briefly the idea which they connote (e.g. πίστις); and to this class some of the words in the following list may justly be thought to belong. But it is obvious that in the majority of cases there is no such justification. And it is best to give the list in full that this peculiarity of the Epistle may be clearly seen. It will be remarked (1) that some of the words and phrases repeated are in themselves unusual; (2) that they sometimes occur more than once within a very short space.

Words (or kindred words) and phrases repeated are—ἄθεσμος 2^{7} 3^{13}; ἀποφεύγειν 1^{4} 2$^{18.20}$; ἀσπίλους 2^{1} bis. 3 3$^{7.16}$; ἀσέλγειαι 2^{7}, ἀσέλγειαι 2$^{2.18}$; βέβαιος 1$^{10.19}$; δεδωρημένης 1^{3}, δεδώρηται 1^{4}; δελεάζειν 2$^{14.18}$; ἐκπαλαι 2^{3} 3^{5}; ἐξακολουθεῖν 1^{16} 2$^{2.15}$; ἐπαγγελία 3$^{4.9}$, ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι 2^{19}, ἐπάγγελμα 1^{4} 3^{13}; ἐπάγειν 2$^{1.5}$; ἐπιχορηγεῖν 1$^{5.11}$; εὐσέβειαι 1$^{3.6}$ 3^{11}, εὐσεβής 2^{9}, ἀσεβῶν 2^{5} 3^{7}; ζόφος 2^{4} 17; ἡττᾶσθαι 2$^{19f.}$; ἴδιος 1$^{3.20}$ 2$^{16.22}$ 3$^{3.16.17}$; καυσοῦσθαι 3$^{10.12}$; λανθάνειν 3$^{5.8}$; λύεσθαι 3$^{10.11.12}$; μισθὸς ἀδικίας 2$^{13.15}$; μίασμα 2^{20}, μιασμός 2^{10}; πάρεστιν 1^{9}, παρούσην 1^{12}; βεβαίαν . . . ποιεῖσθαι· ταῦτα γὰρ ποιοῦντες 1^{10}; προσδοκᾶν 3$^{12.13.14}$; σπουδάζειν 1$^{10.15}$, 3^{14}, σπουδὴ 1^{5}; στηριγμός 3^{17}, ἐστηριγμένους 1^{12}, ἀστήρικτος 2^{14} 3^{16}; ταχινός 1^{14} 2^{1}; τηρεῖν (for future judgment) 2$^{4.9.17}$ 3^{7}; τοῦτο πρῶτον γινώσκοντες 1^{20} 3^{3}; ὑπομιμνήσκειν 1^{12}, διεγείρειν ἐν ὑπομνήσει 1^{13} 3^{1}; οὐκ ἐφείσατο 2$^{4f.}$; φωνὴ ἐνεχθεῖσα 1$^{17.18}$, ἠνέχθη προφητεία 1^{21}, φερόμενοι 1^{21}; φθείρειν 2^{12}, φθορά 1^{4} 2^{12} (bis); φθέγγεσθαι 2$^{16.18}$.

(vi.) There are some interesting pairs of synonyms found in the Epistle. (a) ἀγάπη, φιλαδελφία (1^{7}), the thought apparently being that 'love of the brethren' must lead on to 'love' in the widest sense (contrast 1 P 1$^{22f.}$ 4^{8}; see Westcott on 1 John 2^{10}). (b) ἄσπιλοι καὶ ἀμώμητοι (3^{14}), cf. σπίλοι καὶ μῶμοι (2^{13}). In 1 P 1^{19} we have ἀμώμου καὶ ἀσπίλου. The word μῶμος (=blame, disgrace, in classical Greek) is common in the LXX as representing in sound and approximately in sense the Hebr. מוּם ('blemish,' in the case of sacrificial victims); hence also frequently in the LXX the word ἄμωμος (of a victim 'without blemish'). Thus the two words ἄμωμος and ἄσπιλος can with propriety stand side by side. The writer of 2 P, however, connects together ἄσπιλος and ἀμώμητος (cf. v.s. in Ph 2^{15}), apparently transferring to the latter word the special sense which had become attached to ἄμωμος, though it should be noticed that μωμητός is once used in the LXX (Dt 32^{5}) in translating מוּם. (c) κλῆσιν καὶ ἐκλογήν (1^{10}), see Lightfoot on Col 3^{12}. (d) λόγος, φωνή (1$^{18f.}$). There is 'a recognized distinction between λόγος and φωνή, as denoting respectively "an intelligible utterance" and an "irrational cry"' (Lightfoot on Ignatius, Rom. 2); cf. Jn 1$^{1.14.23}$. Here the distinction between the two words lies in the transitoriness of the φωνή (cf. Lk 9^{36}) and the permanence of 'the prophetic λόγος.' But it is remarkable that the term of inferior dignity is here used of the direct utterance of God Himself. (e) τυφλός ἐστιν μυωπάζων (see above).

The vocabulary, then, of the Epistle is a singular one. The writer affects unusual, striking, poetical words. He is apt to amplify or decorate a current phrase in a way which makes its appropriateness at least questionable (e.g. σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παρεισφέρειν, ἄσπιλοι καὶ ἀμώμητοι). Briefly, his vocabulary is to a remarkable degree an ambitious one. On the other hand, the extraordinary list of repetitions stamps it as poor and inadequate. The reader is constantly tempted to think that the author intentionally dwells upon a sonorous word, which pleases his fancy, unconscious that the unnecessary recurrence of a word spoils the literary effect. Further, the writer can hardly be defended against the charge of using words and phrases incorrectly There is little doubt that this indictment has been exaggerated, and that our ignorance of colloquial Greek is apt to betray us into condemning words which with fuller knowledge we should accept without question. But, as a matter of fact, we do not find that good Greek writers hit upon expressions which seem to us uncouth in themselves, and which lack authority, with anything like the same frequency as the writer of 2 Peter.

(b) From the Vocabulary we turn to more general characteristics of Style. The writer, fond as he is of unusual words, has but a poor supply of connecting particles (e.g. μέν . . . δέ is not found in the Epistle). Thus it is remarkable how sentence after sentence is linked to the preceding words by means of γάρ—1$^{8-11}$ (4 times), 2$^{18-21}$ (4 times); and how relatives (sometimes involving an awkward ambiguity) are employed for the same purpose—1^{4} 2$^{2.3}$ 3$^{1.6.12}$. Closely connected with this poverty of connecting particles is the fact that we have in the Epistle involved and cumbrous sentences, e.g. 1$^{3ff.}$ (where, if the reading διὰ δόξης be adopted, διά is used four times), 2$^{12-16}$. The following points claim notice under this general heading—In 2$^{4ff.}$ we have the phrase οὐκ ἐφείσατο ἀλλά twice used, and the repetition is made the more unpleasing by the fact that the first ἀλλά introduces a contrast differing in kind from that introduced by the second (ἀλλὰ . . . παρέδωκεν, ἀλλὰ . . . ἐφύλαξεν). In 2^{18} there is an awkward involution of one participial clause in another (τοὺς . . . ἀποφεύγοντας τοὺς ἐν πλάνῃ ἀναστρεφομένους), while in v.^{20} ἀποφυγόντες is used of a set of persons other than those referred to in the τοὺς ἀποφεύγοντας of v.^{18}. Again, the piled-up genitives of 3^{2} are very cumbrous, and not free from ambiguity (but on the possibility of a 'primitive' error see below, p. 811). Again, the double ἀπό and the οὕτως of 3^{4} (ἀφ' ἧς οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν, πάντα οὕτως διαμένει ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως) confuse the meaning. Again, while in Jude ^{10} the φυσικῶς (ὅσα δὲ φυσικῶς ὡς τὰ ἄλογα ζῷα ἐπίστανται) is natural and forcible, the corresponding phrase in 2 P 2^{12} (ὡς ἄλογα ζῷα γεγεννημένα φυσικὰ εἰς ἅλωσιν) wants both simplicity and clearness. In the sentences which follow, the artificial elaboration of the writer's style is very conspicuous,—v.^{12} γεγεννημένα . . . εἰς φθοράν . . . ἐν τῇ φθορᾷ αὐτῶν καὶ φθαρήσονται, ἀδικούμενοι μισθὸν ἀδικίας, — while in the next verse we have the strained and eccentric phrase ὀφθαλμοὺς ἔχοντες μεστοὺς μοιχαλίδος. There are, indeed, passages in the Epistle in which an earnestness of exhortation or of hope moulds the language, and in which we recognize a certain grandeur and power of diction, e.g. 1$^{10f.\ 19-21}$ 3$^{11-13.\ 17f.}$. But this is not the impression which we gain from the Epistle as a whole. The student probably has to confess that not seldom in reading the Epistle he has paused in perplexity over some startling or strange phrase. The experience which he has gained from time spent on the writings of St. Paul or St. John encourages him to hope that if he patiently ponders on the words they will at length reveal their meaning; that the reason why an unusual expression was chosen will in time become plain to him. But his hope is disappointed. The sense of the artificiality of the expression does not wear off, and, as he dwells on it, he cannot honestly say that its significance grows upon him. This Epistle is the one book of the NT which, it may be thought, gains by translation. The reader of the dignified and sober English of the AV, in which the ambiguities and eccentricities of the original are to a great extent obliterated, has probably a far higher idea of the literary style of the Epistle than the student of the Greek.

* It seems, however, not improbable that we have here a 'primitive' error. The writer of 2 P almost certainly had in mind Jude ^{6} (δεσμοῖς ἀϊδίοις ὑπὸ ζόφον τετήρηκεν). If he wished instead of the common word δεσμοῖς to substitute the much rarer word σειραῖς,—which, however, means 'cords or ropes' rather than 'heavy chains,'—it would be very likely that, with the sound of the twice-repeated -ις (δεσμοις ἀϊδίοις) in his mind, he would write σιροῖς for σειραῖς.

The question has still to be faced how far the style and diction of 2 P assist us in arriving at a verdict as to its genuineness. We have no right to assume that an Epistle of St. Peter would be written in good Greek, or even that it would be free from offences against literary propriety and good taste. But style is an index of character. The Epistle does produce the impression of being a somewhat artificial piece of rhetoric. It shows throughout signs of self-conscious effort. The author appears to be ambitious of writing in a style which is beyond his literary power. We may hesitate to affirm that the literary style of the Epistle in itself absolutely disproves the Petrine authorship. But it must be allowed that it is hard to reconcile the literary character of the Epistle with the supposition that St. Peter wrote it.

4. INTERNAL EVIDENCE.—(α) References to the Gospel history. (i.) Spitta (p. 37 ff.) and Zahn (p. 60 f.) take the words τοῦ καλέσαντος ἡμᾶς (1[3]) to refer to the Lord's call of the apostles (cf. ἡμῖν 1[1]). This interpretation of the passage would be less improbable if the reading ὑμῖν in place of ἡμῖν (1[4]) had satisfactory critical support. The natural, if not necessary, view of the whole context is to take the whole series ἡμῶν (1[2]), ἡμῖν, ἡμᾶς (1[3]), ἡμῖν (1[4]) as referring to the writer and the readers alike, joined together in their common faith. In that case 1[3] speaks of the fact that those addressed had been 'called,' while 1[10] takes up the thought and emphasizes the duty involved in that 'call.' There is therefore in all probability no reference to the Gospel history in 1[3].

(ii.) In 1[16ff.] there is the reference to the Transfiguration. Spitta (pp. 101 ff. 493 ff.) and Zahn (p. 58) urge that this reference is independent of the accounts of that event in the Synoptic Gospels. Thus the former lays stress on the fact that in 2 P it is said that the Lord 'received honour and glory' from the Father. This points, he thinks, to what the parallel in the history of Moses (Ex 34[29ff.], 2 Co 3[7ff.]) would lead us to expect, viz. that the glory of Jesus was the reflexion of the glory of God—a communication of glory which preceded the attestation of the heavenly voice. This account of the glorification of Jesus on the Mountain is different from, and (as being more natural) earlier in date than, that given by the Synoptists. But, on the other hand, it must be noted (α) that the phrase is λαβὼν τιμὴν καὶ δόξαν (not λαβὼν . . . δόξαν), and that τιμή points rather to an attesting voice than to a reflected glory; (β) the obvious and almost necessary interpretation of the two participles λαβὼν . . . ἐνεχθείσης is that the latter defines and explains the former—'He received honour and glory when there came to Him,' etc. Omission of details of the history (e.g. the presence of Moses and Elias) in an allusion contained in a letter cannot reasonably be taken to show that the writer is giving an account independent of, or more primitive than, that of the Synoptists. To pass to another point, the form of the words spoken by the heavenly voice in 2 P is nearer to that in Mt than to that in either of the two other Synoptists. The words as read in Cod. B (followed by WH)—ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός μου οὗτός ἐστιν, εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησα—differ from those in Mt in (α) order; (β) insertion of the second μου (cf. Mt 12[18] (Is 42[1])); (γ) substitution of εἰς ὅν (a construction not found elsewhere in LXX and NT *) for ἐν ᾧ; (δ) omission of ἀκούετε αὐτοῦ. The bulk of authorities (ℵACKL, etc.), however, give the words in a form which differs from that of Mt in two points only, (γ) (δ). Again, it is often suggested that the words τοῦ σκηνώματός μου (v.[14]) and τὴν ἐμὴν ἔξοδον (v.[15]), occurring in the immediately preceding context, contain references to the history of the Transfiguration (Mt 17[4] ‖ Lk 9[31]). If this is so, then, since the term ἔξοδος is used by Luke, not in words which he reports, but in his own brief summary of the conversation between the Lord and Moses and Elias, it follows that the writer of 2 P was acquainted with Lk. The word ἔξοδος, however, is not uncommon in such a connexion (see p. 770).

(iii.) In 2[20] (γέγονεν αὐτοῖς τὰ ἔσχατα χείρονα τῶν πρώτων) there is a clear reminiscence of the saying recorded in Mt 12[45] ‖ Lk 11[26] (γίνεται τὰ ἔσχατα τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐκείνου χείρονα τῶν πρώτων).

(iv.) In 1[14] (ταχινή ἐστιν ἡ ἀπόθεσις . . . καθὼς καὶ ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χ. ἐδήλωσέν μοι) we have a reference to a disclosure made to St. Peter by our Lord as to his death. Spitta (pp. 88 ff., 491 f.) lays it down peremptorily that 'there is absolutely no connexion between 2 P 1 and Jn 21'; that the allusion is to some other prophecy of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels, but on which the Quo Vadis story is based. It is true that the words used in 2 P do not necessarily imply that the writer is indebted to the Gospel of St. John: they are quite compatible with the supposition that St. Peter is (independently of any written document) recalling and reproducing in his own words the substance of the Lord's revelation to him. But it is unreasonable to postulate an occasion other than that recorded in Jn 21, when the Lord revealed something of the circumstances of the apostle's death. The Lord's prophecy as given in Jn 21[18] contains all that is required in 2 P. If the word ταχινή be taken to mean 'coming soon' (as Spitta interprets it), then the reference is rather to the ὅταν γηράσῃς; if it is understood to mean 'sudden,' then the allusion is to the violence plainly foreshadowed in the Lord's words.

The alleged references to the Gospel history contained in the Epistle have now been examined. The first of them has been put aside. The remaining three, when taken together, will probably produce on many minds the impression that the writer of 2 P was acquainted with Mt and Jn and (if the allusion which some have found in ἔξοδος be pressed) with Lk also. But such an impression, however strong it may be, does not amount to a well-founded conviction. The verdict on the non-genuineness of the Epistle, as far as this piece of evidence goes, is a non liquet.

The case, however, is different when we turn to another aspect of the reference to the Transfiguration and to the Lord's prophecy as to St. Peter's death. Do these allusions reveal a too keen anxiety on the writer's part to identify himself with St. Peter? Have we here some one personating the apostle, and therefore, in order to support his assumed character, unduly emphasizing two scenes in the Lord's life, each of which was closely connected with St. Peter?

* This construction, however, occurs in the version of the heavenly words given in Clem. Hom. iii. 53.

The answer to the question, when so put, is, it is believed, that in themselves these allusions do not supply any valid argument against the genuineness of the Epistle. It cannot be considered strange or unnatural that the writer, if he were indeed the great apostle, should recall either of these incidents.

But there is a characteristic of the Epistle on the negative side which must be taken into account. (a) We should have expected that a personal follower of the Lord, who had heard our Lord's discourses, would instinctively reproduce much of his Master's teaching. It is true that, as was pointed out above (p. 788), our knowledge of our Lord's sayings is imperfect. The Gospels do not record all our Lord's words. But they certainly preserve a wide representative cycle of His teaching. And we should expect a letter of St. Peter to contain some reminiscences of Christ's words, which, with the Gospels in our hands, we could identify as such. 2 P does not fulfil that expectation. There is but one of the sayings of the Lord recorded in the Gospels alluded to in 2 P (2^{20} ‖ Mt 12^{45}, Lk 11^{26}). (β) Again, the Epistle does not refer to the great momenta of the Lord's life on earth—the Passion, the Resurrection, and the Exaltation. Here then we have, as it appears to the present writer, two weighty arguments against the genuineness of the Epistle—a negative argument and a positive argument. On the one hand, the Epistle does not contain what we should have confidently expected an Epistle of St. Peter to contain—allusions to the Lord's sayings and allusions to the great events of the Lord's life. The force of this argument is greatly increased when with 2 P we compare 1 P. On the other hand, the fact that the only allusions to incidents in the Lord's life found in the Epistle are such as would support the character of one writing as St. Peter, does become, in view of the silence of the Epistle as to the Passion, the Resurrection, the Ascension, and of the absence from it of allusions to the Lord's teaching as recorded in the Gospels, a serious ground for questioning the Petrine authorship of the Epistle.

(b) Absence of personal messages and greetings.—No companion of the apostle is mentioned. The apostle himself sends no personal message or greeting. On the former of these two points no stress can be laid. The latter has some weight as against the theory of Spitta and Zahn, that the Epistle was addressed by St. Peter to a Palestinian Church (or Palestinian Churches) with which the apostle had had personal dealings; it has none as against the common view that St. Peter sends a second letter to Churches throughout the provinces of Asia Minor, which he had never visited. Apart from these two special points there is, it must be allowed, a certain indefiniteness in the Epistle as to the circumstances and surroundings of those to whom the letter was sent, and more especially of the writer. Nothing is said, for example, of the place whence the letter was written. But it would be easy to draw on the imagination for reasons which might naturally and fully explain the reticence of the letter on personal matters. The result therefore is a purely negative one. The genuineness of the Epistle does not receive the support which it would have gained, had it contained personal messages and personal news which harmonized with known facts. On the other hand, no substantial argument adverse to its genuineness can fairly be deduced from their absence.

(c) Anachronisms.—(i.) $3^{15f.}$ Does the passage imply that in the writer's time a collection of St. Paul's Epistles existed, and that they were regarded as Scripture? The first point to be considered is the meaning of the phrase τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς. Spitta (p. 294) holds that 'only writings of St. Paul's associates can be intended, addressed to the Gentile Christians who belonged to the sphere of his apostolic work.' According to this view, it would appear that the term αἱ γραφαί is used not in the sense of 'Scriptures,' but with a general non-technical meaning. Zahn (Einl. pp. 98 f., 108) follows the same general line of interpretation, but enters more into detail. In his opinion, the reference is to 'writings of a religious character—writings which could claim respect in Christian circles either because of the persons who composed them, or because the Christian congregations made use of them in public worship.' 'We do not know,' he adds, 'how much Christian literature already existed in the years 60–64.'* He urges that, as the allusion to these writings is altogether incidental, and as no distinguishing epithet, e.g. 'holy,' 'prophetic,' is added, the special sense of αἱ γραφαί, as applied to a collection of the Holy Scriptures, is here excluded. He further points out that, as the technical sense of the term הספרים did not prevent the Jews from using the word ספר of any book whatever, so the narrower use of αἱ γραφαί and τὰ γράμματα did not as a matter of fact debar Greek-speaking Christians from employing the words γραφή, γραφαί, and γράμματα in a wide and general sense; if no instance of this sense of γραφή is found in the NT, that is a mere matter of chance. To substantiate his position as regards γραφή he refers to 2 Ch 2^{11} (εἶπεν Χειρὰμ . . . ἐν γραφῇ), Neh 7^{64} (ἐζήτησαν γραφὴν αὐτῶν τῆς συνοδίας), Dn 5^{5} (τὴν γρ. ἐκείνην, i.e. the writing on the wall), 1 Mac $14^{27.\ 48}$ (the writing on tables of brass), Iren. iii. 6. 4, xvii. 4, v. Prol. (in each case hæc scriptura of Irenæus' own work), Clem. Strom. vi. 3 (p. 755, ed. Potter; προϊούσης τῆς γραφῆς, i.e. the treatise itself), Eus. HE II. xi. 1 (τὴν περὶ τούτου . . . τοῦ Ἰωσήπου γραφήν). Similar uses of the word might be quoted from classical Greek (where it commonly has a formal sense ['document'], often a legal sense ['indictment']), e.g. Thuc. i. 129, τοσαῦτα μὲν ἡ γραφὴ ἐδήλου, Ξέρξης δὲ ἤσθη τε τῇ ἐπιστολῇ κ.τ.λ. In all these passages, it will be noticed, it is clear, either from the phrase itself or from the context, what the γραφή in question is. They present no parallel to the absolute use of the word in the plural. The phrase αἱ γραφαί used absolutely points to a definite and recognized collection of 'writings,' i.e. the Scriptures. If any further assurance of this is needed, it is given (a) by the context—the word στρεβλοῦσιν shows that the writings were authoritative, and that their support had at all costs to be secured, and (β) by the added word λοιπάς—τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς; compare Sir. Prol. ὁ νόμος καὶ αἱ προφητεῖαι καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων; Iren. ii. 28. 7, 'Dominus manifeste dixit et reliquæ demonstrant Scripturæ.' From the καί and the τὰς λοιπάς—ὡς καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς—we are obliged to infer that the Epistles of St. Paul are regarded as Scripture. Again, the fact that St. Paul's Epistles are regarded as Scripture, together with the phrase ἐν πάσαις ἐπιστολαῖς, leads to the further conclusion that the writer of 2 P possessed not merely isolated letters of St. Paul, but a collection of his Epistles, to which, as authoritative documents of the faith, appeal was made.† It is impossible to suppose that a collection of St. Paul's Epistles had been made and that they were treated as Scripture during the lifetime of St. Peter.

* Zahn's theory as to 2 P, it should be observed, leads him to assume an (earlier) Ep. of St. Peter now lost (3^{1}), an Ep. of St. Paul now lost (3^{15}), the promise on St. Peter's part of a Lehrschrift otherwise unknown to us (1^{15}), 'other writings' now lost (3^{16}).

† Compare the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs, Libri et epistulæ Pauli uiri iusti (Robinson, The Passion of S. Perpetua p. 114, in 'Texts and Studies' I. ii.).

(ii.) 3^2 μνησθῆναι τῶν προειρημένων ῥημάτων ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν καὶ τῆς τῶν ἀποστόλων ὑμῶν ἐντολῆς τοῦ κυρίου καὶ σωτῆρος. It is possible that there is a primitive error in the text, and that διά should be inserted after τῆς—'the commandment of the Lord and Saviour given through your apostles'* (cf. the title of the Didaché—διδαχὴ Κυρίου διὰ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, and also 2^{21} τῆς παραδοθείσης αὐτοῖς ἁγίας ἐντολῆς). But this suggestion does not affect the matter with which we are at present concerned. It is true that the phrase 'your apostles' admits of the explanation that the writer is referring to those apostles who had taught the readers of the Epistle, and that, so interpreted, the phrase cannot be said to be an impossible one in a letter written by St. Peter. But, on the supposition that St. Peter is writing to Christians whom he had himself taught, it must be admitted that it is strange that he should use an expression so cold and so general. Two other considerations must be taken into account. In the first place, it seems certain (see art. JUDE, EPISTLE OF, vol. ii. p. 802 f.) that the whole phrase is an expansion of the corresponding words in Jude [17], where there is a simple and natural reference to the oral teaching of the apostles (ἔλεγον). Secondly, the addition of a reference to the prophets changes the kind of remembrance. The idea of keeping in mind the teaching of Scripture is introduced. Now in the 2nd cent. it was customary to speak of Scripture either under the two divisions —the Prophets and the Apostles—(e.g. Murat. Canon, 'neque inter prophetas completum numero neque inter apostolos'), or under the three divisions —the Prophets, the Lord (the Gospel), and the Apostles—(e.g. Iren. i. 8. 1, ἣν [ὑπόθεσιν] οὔτε προφῆται ἐκήρυξαν οὔτε ὁ Κύριος ἐδίδαξεν οὔτε ἀπόστολοι παρέδωκαν); see Lightfoot on Ign. Philad. v. The impression produced by 2 P 3^2 is that we have here a post-apostolic writer elaborating the simple phrase of Jude [17] and instinctively reproducing phraseology current in his own days, while the ὑμῶν is introduced as being in character with the style of a letter. This impression is strengthened when the passage under discussion is taken in connexion with 3^{15} (see just above).

(iii). Closely connected with the points just dealt with is the problem suggested by the controversial element in the Epistle.

It has often been noticed that the writer speaks of the rise of certain false teachers as future ($2^{1f.}$ 3^3), and then, using the present tense ($2^{11.\ 12.\ 17f.\ 20}$ 3^5, cf. 3^{16}), describes them as already active. It might be argued that he projects himself into the future, and then, from the point of view of a spectator, regards future events as actually happening. But it must be remarked that (1) this change from the future to the present takes place twice ($2^{10ff.}$ 3^5); (2) in ch. 2 perfects are used (γέγονεν 2^{20}, συμβέβηκεν 2^{22}). The most natural interpretation of these phenomena is that the writer first speaks in his assumed character of a prophet, and that then, forgetting that assumed character, he depicts the false teaching actually rife around him.

Does the language used betray any sign of being aimed against the Gnostics? It is clear that those against whom the writer warns his readers not only practised, but taught, immorality. Their error was not only a matter of life (as appears to be the case with the libertines of St. Jude's Epistle), but also of doctrine. They are ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι (2^1). In this connexion the language of $1^{5f.}$ is remarkable—ἐπιχορηγήσατε . . . ἐν τῇ ἀρετῇ τὴν γνῶσιν, ἐν δὲ τῇ γνώσει τὴν ἐγκράτειαν. Here γνῶσις is used absolutely, and it is linked with ἀρετή and ἐγκράτεια. It would seem as if the writer emphasizes the bearing of a true γνῶσις on conduct because he has in mind those whom a false γνῶσις betrayed into ἀκρασία. It will be remembered that the name 'Gnostic' was, as far as our knowledge goes, first claimed by sects whose teaching justified profligacy of life (Iren. i. 25. 6; Hippolytus, Hær. v. 6). Again, it may be thought that the words ἐλευθερίαν αὐτοῖς ἐπαγγελλόμενοι αὐτοὶ δοῦλοι ὑπάρχοντες τῆς φθορᾶς (2^{19}) exactly express the theory of certain Gnostic teachers as to the 'spiritual' man's independence of matter, and the practical results of that doctrine (cf. e.g. Iren. i. 25. 4). Again, the writer of 2 P charges the false teachers with perverting Scripture (3^{16}). It is clear that, when St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans, there were those who depraved the doctrine of grace (Ro $6^{1.\ 15}$; cf. Jude [4]). But there is no trace in apostolic times of false teachers supporting their views by a reckless or dishonest interpretation of the Old Testament, which alone could then be known under the name of Scripture. Nor, indeed, is it easy to see how the controversies of that age could give occasion to a forced exegesis of the OT; the arguments which the Judaistic opponents of St. Paul may well have drawn from the OT would be of a different kind. But such violent wresting of Scripture (i.e. the OT and the NT) as is described by the word στρεβλοῦσιν was the characteristic method by which the Gnostics of the 2nd century endeavoured to support their doctrines. Irenæus charges them with such a dishonest procedure again and again (i. Præf.; 3. 6, παραπρέποντες τὰς ἁρμηνείας καὶ ῥᾳδιουργοῦντες τὰς ἐξηγήσεις; 8. 1; 9. 1, καταχρησάμενοι τοῖς ὀνόμασιν εἰς τὴν ἰδίαν ὑπόθεσιν μετήνεγκαν). This indictment, then, of the false teachers does not appear to harmonize with what we know, or with what we can with reasonable probability conjecture, of the apostolic age. It does fit in with the characteristics of a later time.

(iv.) $3^{3f.}$ ἐλεύσονται . . . ἐμπαῖκται . . . λέγοντες Ποῦ ἐστὶν ἡ ἐπαγγελία τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ; ἀφ' ἧς γὰρ οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν, πάντα οὕτως διαμένει ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως. It is sometimes urged that the question of the scoffers points to a time later than the days of the apostles; and even more stress is laid on the reply—not an assurance of the nearness of the advent, but an explanation of delay (v.[8] μία ἡμέρα παρὰ Κυρίῳ κ.τ.λ.). It is, however, difficult to feel the force of these arguments considered in themselves. The fact that 'the immediate imminence of the coming of the Lord . . . faded out of view' in St. Paul's mind, as the Epistle to the Ephesians seems to indicate, 'when year after year passed away, and still there was no sign of the Lord's coming' (Hort, Rom. and Eph. p. 141 f.), is a sufficient proof that towards the end of St. Peter's life men would not be unlikely to ask the question put into the mockers' mouths, nor a Christian teacher unlikely to give some such answer as we find in 2 P 3^8. The passage will come before us again when we come to compare 2 P with 1 P. But the phrase ἀφ' ἧς οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν gives rise to much more serious misgivings. Who are 'the fathers'? They are, says Spitta (p. 234 ff.), the actual fathers of those who are introduced as speaking.* This interpretation is open to several grave objections. (a) Since to St. Peter the phrase οἱ πατέρες would have a quasi-technical sense (cf. e.g. Jn 6^{58}, Ac 7^{19}, Ro 9^5, He 1^1), the meaning

* So the Syriac (Harklean) version, 'the commandment of our Lord and Saviour which (was) by the hand of the apostles.'

* Spitta gets over the difficulty that ἀφ' ἧς implies a considerable interval by supposing that the relative ἧς refers back to τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ. He takes ἀπό in a pregnant sense with ἐκοιμήθησαν—'Die Väter sind entschlafen von der Parusie weg, ihr Tod hat sie der Parusie entzogen.' For this use of ἀπό he compares Ro 9^3, Col 2^{20}, 2 Co 11^3. It is strange that he does not see that the γάρ (ἀφ' ἧς γάρ) makes such an interpretation absolutely impossible suggested would require the addition of ἡμῶν.* (β) The words 'since our fathers died,' put into the mouth of a number of persons, fix no definite limit of time. (γ) The context seems to imply that 'the fathers' had embraced the Christian hope, and so early in the history of the Church as St. Peter's lifetime it would be quite unnatural to introduce a group of persons speaking of their fathers as Christians (see Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 72). Zahn (ib. pp. 67, 73) urges that the term οἱ πατέρες could be used of the first generation of Christians — the ἀρχαῖοι μαθηταί (Ac 21[16]) — before it had died off to the last man, and that, in fact, a whole generation separated the years 60–63, in which he places the Epistle, from the day when the promise to return was given. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the use of the term οἱ πατέρες in itself implies a considerable lapse of time. The founders of a movement are not called 'the fathers' till a later age looks back upon their work. Further, the clause as a whole implies a distant retrospect; the words ἀφ' ἧς . . . ἐκοιμήθησαν πάντα οὕτως διαμένει could not have been used unless a considerable interval had elapsed since the passing away of 'the fathers.' The words might conceivably be justified on the hypothesis that St. Peter is here foretelling the future, and that he dramatically puts into the mouth of the mockers, who should 'come in the last days,' words appropriate only from their supposed point of view. But such an interpretation is too artificial. And it must be confessed that here again we seem to be carried far beyond the limits of the apostolic age.

(d) Doctrine.—The doctrine of the Epistle is chiefly remarkable, so far at least as our present purpose is concerned, on the negative side. We should not, indeed, have expected St. Peter to dwell with such detail (3[10ff.]) on the physical accompaniments of 'the day of the Lord,' and on its relation to the several parts of the material universe, as contrasted with its human and spiritual issues. We might feel it strange that what we should elsewhere describe as physical speculations on the process of creation, should find a place in a letter written by St. Peter (3[5]). But these are matters of taste and feeling, or at least of opinion; and on such considerations no decisive judgment can be based. But it is otherwise with the silence of the Epistle as to doctrines of primary importance. St. Peter was an eye-witness of the human life of the Incarnate Word, of His sufferings, of the manifestations of the Risen Lord, and of His Ascension. He heard Christ's words about the Paraclete, and partook of the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost. But the Epistle says nothing of the example of Christ, or of His sufferings and death, or, except the allusion in 2[1] (τὸν ἀγοράσαντα αὐτοὺς δεσπότην), of Redemption. It is silent as to the Resurrection and the Ascension. It makes no reference to the Holy Spirit except as the source of inspiration to the ancient prophets (1[21]). It does not allude to prayer. We have no right, it may be urged most truly, to expect an apostolic Epistle to treat of every Christian doctrine, even the most vital. But is it conceivable that St. Peter, with his history and his experience, would pass over all these matters, essential to the Christian faith, as though they were not? The silence as to the Resurrection is the crucial point. The apostles were essentially witnesses to the Resurrection. The Resurrection was the final proof of the Divine mission of the Lord, the foundation of the Christian faith. As such it holds a unique place in the writings of the apostles, and in their teaching as reported in the Acts. But in this Epistle, when the writer (1[16]) has occasion to appeal to the guarantee of the truth of his teaching as to 'the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ,' the Resurrection is ignored, and the apostolic witness to Christ is made to rest on the Transfiguration. The Transfiguration was doubtless an event of deep meaning; but its meaning was relative to the time when it took place, and to the circumstances of those who were present on the mountain. Its glory was in the days of the Lord's humiliation a transitory anticipation of the Resurrection. It belongs to an order of events different from that to which the Resurrection belongs. It would be difficult to exaggerate the significance of the fact that in the Epistle generally, and especially at this particular point in it, the Resurrection is unnoticed. A subordinate but not unimportant matter is the language used by the writer of 2 P in this reference to the Transfiguration—ἐπόπται γενηθέντες τῆς ἐκείνου μεγαλειότητος (1[16]). The word ἐπόπτης is borrowed from the Greek mysteries, where it denoted one who was admitted to the third and highest stage. For the word itself cf. Plut. Alcib. 22, τοὺς ἄλλους ἑταίρους μύστας προσαγορεύοντα καὶ ἐπόπτας; CIG 71*b*, 2158 (in both of which places it is closely associated with μύστης); Clement of Alexandria is fond of using words of this group in reference to the spiritual vision of God (e.g. Pæd. i. 6 (p. 113), 7 (p. 129); Strom. i. 28 (p. 424), ii. 2 (p. 431). The metaphor is not one which we should have expected St. Peter to use. It is artificial, and savours of a later time when the Church borrowed such terms, often probably through the medium of the Gnostics, from the language of the Greek mysteries.*

5. Relation to 1 Peter.—Under this head little more has to be done than to bring together results which have been already reached as to the two Epistles separately.

(a) Vocabulary and literary style.—As to the former point, Warfield (p. 67) writes thus: 'These resemblances are seen not only in peculiar phrases, such as the form of salutation, "Grace and peace be multiplied," found in these two Epistles and nowhere else, but also in the recurrence in both of rare combinations, such as ἀμώμου καὶ ἀσπίλου, 1 P 1[19] repeated 2 P 2[13] and 3[14] and nowhere else, and also the common possession of a very peculiar vocabulary such as is represented by the occurrence in both of ἐπoπτεύσαντες (1 P 2[12], 2 P 1[16]), ἰσότιμος (1 P 1[7. 19], 2 P 1[1. 4]), reinforced by the like community in such as φιλαδελφία (1 P 1[22], 2 P 1[7]); χορηγεῖν (1 P 4[11], 2 P 1[5. 11]); ἀπόθεσις (1 P 3[21], 2 P 1[14]); ἀρετή (1 P 2[9], 2 P 1[3]); ἀνασταροφή (1 P 1[15], 2 P 2[7]); ἀλήθεια in a peculiar sense (1 P 1[22], 2 P 1[12]); κομίζεσθαι (1 P 1[9], 2 P 2[13]), etc., all of which are rare words in the New Testament.' It seemed best to quote this passage at length. A glance reveals how this list needs careful sifting. Thus Warfield's mode of statement is confusing; the word ἰσότιμος, for example, does not occur in 1 P, but πολύτιμος (1[7]) and τίμιος (1[19]). Again, the plural αἱ ἀρεταί in 1 P 2[9] (a reminiscence of Is 43[21]) is clearly far from being a parallel to the singular ἀρετή, 2 P 1[3], though in both passages the reference is to God. But in fact verbal coincidences, however abundant, between 2 P on the one hand and on the other 1 P and the Petrine speeches in the Acts (Speaker's Com. iv. p. 226), would be of but little weight in support of the genuineness of 2 P; for if that Epistle is not genuine, but was written in the 2nd cent., it is clear that both 1 P and the Acts must have been accessible to its author, and that therefore he may have derived words or phrases

* Cursives 4, Ægyptt (boh sah), Syr-hkl add ἡμῶν. But, in the case of an addition of this nature, the evidence of versions is of little value.

* The habit of using language derived from the mysteries, in reference to communications supposed to be made by our Lord to His disciples, runs riot in the Gnostic Pistis Sophia.

from them. The real question is whether a comparison of the two Epistles reveals that kind of similarity which suggests that they are the product of the same mind. It must be said briefly that the two documents are in complete contrast in reference to literary style. This contrast is obvious whether we regard smaller points of expression (e.g. the connexion of sentences and clauses) or the broader literary characteristics of the two Epistles. The style of 1 P is simple and natural, without a trace of self-conscious effort. The style of 2 P is rhetorical and laboured, marked by a love for striking and startling expressions.

(b) Use of the OT.—The writer of 1 P formally quotes the OT; he deliberately adopts its language (e.g. $2^{9f.\ 22}$); he instinctively, and apparently unconsciously, falls into its phraseology. The writer of 2 P, on the other hand, as we have seen, never formally quotes the OT, and uses but few distinctively OT expressions. This is precisely the reverse of what we should have expected to be the case if the theory of Spitta and Zahn were true, namely, that St. Peter wrote the First Epistle to Gentile, the Second Epistle to Jewish, Christians.

(c) Reminiscences of the Lord's teaching.—The writer of 1 P constantly shows that he has the Lord's sayings in his mind. It is doubtful if the writer of 2 P refers to more than two of them.

(d) Use of St. Paul's Epistles.—The writer of 1 P is deeply influenced, both in thought and in language, by two of St. Paul's Epistles (Ro, Eph). The writer of 2 P, while he mentions St. Paul's Epistles generally, owes no debt, literary or doctrinal, to them. This argument, however, cannot be said to carry so much weight as it appears to do at first sight. For we saw cause to believe that there were special reasons why the words and thoughts of these two Epistles of St. Paul should be in St. Peter's mind when he wrote the First Epistle.

(e) Doctrine.—It has often been remarked that while in 1 P 'the end' is regarded as near (4^7), the writer of 2 P seems to contemplate delay as part of the Divine counsel. It might be a not unfair reply that in the one case the writer sets forth his own personal hope, in the other case he has to meet the jibes of enemies of the truth, and to account for the unquestionable fact of delay which gave point to their mocking question. But, indeed, the difference between the two Epistles in regard to doctrine is deeper and more far-reaching than a contrast of view as to the hope of the Lord's speedy return. Any one who has endeavoured to draw out the doctrinal teaching of the two Epistles must feel that they are widely separated from each other. There is a richness of devout thought, a vital apprehension of the great facts and truths which are characteristic of Christianity, in 1 P, for which we search in vain in 2 P. The thought of Christ's sufferings, considered as the supreme example and as redeeming acts dealing with all the needs of men, the thought of Christ raised and exalted by the Father, the thought of the present personal relation of Christians to Christ's work and to Christ Himself, dominate the one Epistle; they are, as we have seen (see above, p. 812), passed over in the other.

Such are the differences between the two Epistles. It remains to examine certain considerations which have been suggested with a view to explain or to mitigate the difficulty.

(1) Difference of date.—If St. Peter wrote the two Epistles, they could not be widely separated in point of time. The examination of all the evidence points to the year 61 as the probable date of 1 P (see above, p. 791 f.). 2 P, if the work of St. Peter, could not be placed more than a year or two later, or, if we accept the view of Spitta and Zahn that the former Epistle alluded to in 2 P 3^1 is not 1 P, a year or two earlier. Even if we put aside ancient evidence, and, accepting the theory which finds in 1 P indications of a later date (see above, p. 783 f.), suppose that St. Peter's life was prolonged beyond the year 70, the interval between the two documents cannot have been much more than ten years. It may well be doubted whether ten years at the end of a long life can reasonably be supposed to have so completely changed a man's literary style and the tone and range of his thoughts.

(2) Difference of subject.—The object of 1 P, it is urged, was to comfort and encourage the suffering; that of 2 P to warn against a shameful perversion of the truth. It must, however, be remembered that ch. 1 of 2 P is not denunciatory. Such a difference of subject might well account for a difference of tone, and a difference in the relative position and emphasis given to Christian doctrines. It would modify; it would hardly revolutionize.

(3) Difference of circumstances.—The strongest presentation of the case in this respect is probably the theory of Zahn (Einl. ii. p. 96). 'So long,' he says, 'as men started with the assumption that 1 P is a document actually composed by the apostle ('ein eigenhändiges Schreiben des Apostels'), and that 2 P purports to be intended for a circle of readers similar to that addressed in 1 P, then the great diversity of the two Epistles in thought and language could not but be strong evidence against the genuineness of 2 P. But this evidence is destroyed, since both the above-mentioned assumptions have been shown to be erroneous. It is obviously intelligible that Peter, in a letter addressed to the Gentile Churches of Asia Minor, which Silvanus wrote by his commission and in his name, should speak in a way different from that in which he speaks in a letter of his own composition ('in einem eigenhändigen Brief') addressed to Churches of Jewish Christians, who owed their Christianity to him and his associates.'

In this position three points must be noticed. (a) It is remarkable that both Spitta (p. 530 ff.)* and Zahn, in defending the Petrine authorship of 2 P, are obliged to give up the real Petrine authorship of 1 P. It has, however, been shown in the article on 1 PETER (p. 789 f.) that (α) the language about Silvanus in 1 P 5^{12}, though it does not exclude, yet certainly does not support, the hypothesis that the composition of the letter was left to him; (β) the phenomena of the Epistle itself are decisive against this theory. (b) It has been pointed out (see above, pp. 798, 806) that 2 P contains no indication of being addressed to Jewish Christians, and that the internal evidence, both negative and positive, points decisively in the opposite direction. (c) But if these two points are conceded, it is clear that everything depends on the sense given to 'speaking in a different way'—'anders redet.' The supposed variation of circumstances would account for a difference, perhaps a great difference, between the two letters. But, on the one hand, it must be observed that the characteristic of tender and sympathetic affection is conspicuous in the letter which was addressed to those with whom St. Peter had had no personal dealings, while it is absent from the letter which (in Spitta's and Zahn's view) was sent to persons who owed their Christianity to the apostle—a reversal of what would have been naturally anticipated. And, on the other, the differences between the two Epistles in literary style and tone and teaching are, as it appears to the present writer, so numerous and so fundamental that no difference of amanuenses or 'interpreters' can account for them unless we are prepared to admit that, in the case of either one or both of these letters, the substance and the language alike were left absolutely in the hands of the apostle's companion.

6. *LITERARY AFFINITIES.—(a) The Epistle of Jude. That there is a close literary connexion between Jude and 2 P is certain. Which of the two writers is the borrower? It must be here sufficient to refer to the article on the EPISTLE OF JUDE (vol. ii. p. 802 f.), where the question is discussed. Further study confirms the present writer in the conclusion there reached, that the 'various lines of argument converge, and, as far as demonstration is possible in literary questions, demonstrate the priority of Jude.'† What is the bearing of this result on the question of the genuineness of 2 P? It is obvious that the fact that 2 P borrows from Jude is no more prejudicial to the genuineness of the former than the fact that 1 P borrows from Ro and Eph tells against the authenticity of 1 P. The difficulties in regard to date, if we prolong the apostle's life beyond 64, are not insuperable. The result is therefore a negative one. 2 P is deprived of a witness on whose evidence recent defenders of the apostolic authorship of 2 P (Spitta and Zahn) have greatly relied.

(b) Josephus.—In an article in the Expositor (2nd series, vol. iii. p. 49 ff.) E. A. Abbott maintained that there is a remarkable series of coincidences in language between 2 P and the Antiquities of Josephus (Præf. 3, 4; IV. viii. 2 [the last words of Moses]). 'Taken as a whole,' Abbott concludes (p. 62), 'the evidence in favour of the theory that the author of the Second Epistle imitated Josephus can hardly fail to appear striking, if not convincing.' The theory was examined by Salmon in his Introduction, p. 638 ff. (ed. 1; the discussion is curtailed in later editions). He points out (1) that 'the alleged coincidences relate entirely to words, and not at all to thoughts'; (2) that 'they do not occur in passages of [what he himself would call] "brief compass"'; (3) that 'they are not in the same sequence and connexion'; (4) that 'the words common are not "unusual or startling," or such as can fairly be called hapax legomena.' It will probably be now generally admitted that the theory broached by Abbott has broken down on examination. There is a curious series of coincidences between the Preface of St. Luke's Gospel and Josephus Contra Apionem i. 10. The same account is probably to be given of the resemblances between Josephus and Lk and of those between Josephus and 2 P. They are most likely due to the diffusion of 'commonplaces' of rhetorical study, set prefatory phrases, and the like.

(c) The Apocalypse of Peter.—When the fragment of this Apocalypse was published, it was at once noticed (e.g. by James, A Lecture on the Apocalypse of Peter p. 52) that between it and 2 P there is a remarkable series of coincidences. The following table includes one or two coincidences between 2 P and fragments of the Apocalypse preserved by Patristic writers (the numbering of these fragments being that given by James, p. 94 f., who, on p. 52, pointed out most of these resemblances):—

* An inscription from Stratonicea in Caria, given by Deissmann (Bibelstudien i. p. 277 f.), contains the phrases, τῆς τῶν Ῥωμαίων αἰωνίου ἀρχῆς, πᾶσαν σκοτόδη ἰσφέρεσθαι ἐς τὴν πρός [αὐτοὺς εὐσέβ]ειαν, τῆς θείας δυνάμεως ἀρετάς; cf. 2 P 1^{11} 1^{5} 1^{3}. But these coincidences do not, as Deissmann thinks, indicate any connexion between the inscription and the Epistle.

† 'The Assumption of Moses' was used by Jude (see art. EPISTLE OF JUDE, vol. ii. p. 802). But the question arises whether 2 P does not show an acquaintance with the Assumption independent of the knowledge of it which he might have gained from the passage of Jude. The apparent resemblance alluded to is between 2 P 2^{13} ἡδονὴν ἡγούμενοι τὴν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ τρυφήν, and the Assumption vii. 4, 'omni hora diei amantes conuiuia deuoratores gulæ.' But the resemblance is seen to be a merely superficial one, when the force of omni hora is noticed. The Assumption rebukes gluttons who would feast at any hour of the day; the Epistle, shameless profligates who riot in broad daylight.

James (p. 53ff.) draws attention to several documents which appear to borrow from the Apocalypse of Peter. It is worth while to note coincidences between 2 P and some of these documents.

(a) 'The First Book of Clement, which is called the Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ: the words which He spake to His holy apostles after He had risen from the dead.' The book seems to have been originally written in Greek. Lagarde (Reliquiæ Juris Ecclesiastici Antiquissimi Græce p. 80ff.) has retranslated the extant Syriac version into Greek. James (p. 54) holds that at least the first fourteen sections of this document 'give us a very fair idea of the lost first part of the Apocalypse of Peter.'

Testament.	2 Peter.
§ 8 There shall rise up shepherds, lawless men, unjust, despisers, covetous, lovers of pleasure, lovers of gain, lovers of money, chatterers, exalting themselves . . . opposing the ways of the gospel . . . dishonouring all the way of piety. . . . They shall lay commandments upon men not according to the Scripture and the commandment as the Father willed.	2[1ff. 10. 14. 18. 21].
[The faithful] shall teach men that, if they prove their spirit, they are upright and fit for the kingdom, and they shall tell them of knowledge and virtue and prudence [γνῶσιν καὶ ἀρετὴν καὶ σύνεσιν, Lagarde].	2[8] 1[11. 5].

(b) 'The Apocalypse of Paul.' 'This book we have in a rather shortened text of the original Greek [Tischendorf, Apocalypses Apocryphæ pp. 34–69], in a fuller Syriac version, and in a Latin version which is the fullest of all [Texts and Studies ii. 3, pp. 11–42]' (James p. 65). It is 'to a large extent a compilation from earlier works' (see Texts and Studies ii. 2, p. 21).

Apocalypse of Paul.	2 Peter.

18 παραδοθήτω ἡ ψυχὴ αὕτη ταρταρεύχῳ ἀγγέλῳ καὶ φυλαττέσθω ἕως τῆς μεγάλης ἡμέρας τῆς κρίσεως.	2[4] σειροῖς ζόφου ταρταρώσας παρέδωκεν εἰς κρίσιν τηρουμένους.
25 ὅστις ἐλύτρωσε τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, μὴ ποιήσας τὸ θέλημα αὐτῆς διὰ τὸν θεόν.	2[3]
33 ἅγιος γὰρ ὢν ὁ θεὸς μετανοοῦν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ἀναμένει αὐτῶν τὴν ἐπιστροφὴν καὶ μετάνοιαν.	3[9] μακροθυμεῖ εἰς ὑμᾶς, μὴ βουλόμενός τινας ἀπολέσθαι ἀλλὰ πάντας εἰς μετάνοιαν χωρῆσαι.
In the earlier part of the Apocalypse (4ff.) there is a striking passage, in which the Sun asks from God permission to burn up men because of their sins; καὶ ἐγένετο φωνὴ πρὸς αὐτὸν Ἡ μακροθυμία μου πάντων τούτων ἀνίσχεται, ὅπως μετανοήσωσιν. The same answer is given to similar petitions made by the Moon and Stars and by the Sea. Compare a similar passage in another document, which seems to be connected with the Apocalypse of Paul, The Testament of Abraham x. (ed. James p. 87 f.).
39 γυναικὸς . . . ἀπαγομένας ἐν τόπῳ σκοτεινῷ, 42 τὸ φρέαρ ἐκεῖνο σκότους καὶ ζόφους πεπληρωμένον.	1[19] ἐν αὐχμηρῷ τόπῳ, 2[4] σειροῖς ζόφου.

To what conclusion does a study of the coincidences between 2 P and the Apocalypse of Peter lead us? There are five possible views which may be taken. (1) The coincidences may be boldly put aside as mere chance resemblances without significance. This view hardly needs discussion. It can scarcely be held by a serious critic, who considers the coincidences as a series, and appreciates the nature of the most striking of them. Few will hesitate as to the correctness of Salmon's view, that 'the agreements of our fragment [i.e. the Apocalypse of Peter] with the second Epistle of Peter . . . are more than accidental' (Appendix to Introduction p. 591). So Sanday (Inspiration p. 347), 'The resemblances are so marked as I think to prove that the two writings are nearly connected.' (2) Did the writer of the Apocalypse borrow from 2 P? This view seems to be impossible in view of (a) the naturalness of the words and phrases as they stand in their several contexts in the Apocalypse; (β) the fact that some of them are repeated in the Apoc. (sometimes with the form varied), and are found also in kindred documents; (γ) the fact that we find in the Apocalypse none of the strange and remarkable phrases of 2 P which would fix themselves in the mind of a reader who remembered enough constantly to borrow. (3) Did the writer of 2 P borrow from the Apocalypse? This view appears to be a quite possible one. (4) Are the two documents the work of one writer? This is the view to which Sanday (Inspiration p. 347) seems to incline. 'It is no doubt possible,' he writes, 'that the writer of the Apocalypse may have imitated the Epistle, or that both may have been affected by some common influence. If there had been on the whole better reason than not for believing the Epistle to be the genuine work of St. Peter, it would be natural to fall back upon some such assumption. But, as the balance of argument is really the other way, the question is forced upon us whether it is not on the whole more probable that the two writings are both by the same hand. This is at least the simplest of the different hypotheses which are open to us.' The present writer ventures to think that this explanation is excluded by a consideration of the literary style of the two documents. The Apocalypse is simple and natural in style. There is nothing remarkable in its vocabulary. It is, in a word, wholly free from the literary peculiarities which are so strongly marked in 2 P. (5) Are the two documents the work of two writers who belonged to the same school, whose thoughts moved in the same directions, and

* The word τάρταρος occurs in three passages of the LXX (in none of which is there anything answering to it in the Hebrew)—Job 40[15 (20)] 41[22 (23)], Pr 24[51] (30[16]); also in Enoch 20[2] Οὐριὴλ . . . ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ κόσμου καὶ τοῦ ταρτάρου. Thus the word is found in Jewish writings, which it is quite possible that St. Peter may have read. On the other hand, we should not have expected that the apostle would have applied to the judgment of God a derivative of a word so characteristic of heathen mythology. Further, the use of the derived verb ταρταροῦν implies that the word τάρταρος was a recognized term, in connexion with a Christian representation of Divine punishments, with the writer of 2 P and those for whom he wrote. We find the ideas essentially connected with the conception of Tartarus, emphasized in the Apocalypse of Peter; we find the word Tartarus itself in one kindred document (Apoc. of Esdras) and the derivative ταρταροῦχος in another (Apoc. of Paul). It is exceedingly probable that Hippolytus knew, and borrowed from, the Apoc. of Peter (James p. 67 f.). Now in Hippolytus' Refutatio (x. 34) we read, δι' ἧς ἐπιγνώσεως ἐκφεύξεσθε . . . ταράρου ζοφερὸν ὄμμα ἀφώτιστον . . . καὶ ταρταρούχων ἀγγέλων κολαστῶν ὄμμα κ.τ.λ.; and in a fragment of the same writer on the Song of 'the three Children,' preserved by Theodoret (Migne, Pat. Gr. x. 868), the words occur, ἔπειτα τὰ καταχθόνια ἀνώμασεν πνεύματα ταρταρούχων ἀγγέλων. The use then of the word ταρταροῦν is in itself a distinct argument for the view which regards 2 P as a document closely connected with the Apocalypse of Peter to whom the same expressions and words had grown familiar? Among these five possible explanations the choice seems to lie between (3) and (5). The fact that there is a similarity between the two writings, not only in words or in definitely marked ideas, but also in general conceptions—e.g. in both there is the picture drawn of Christ on a mountain with His apostles, the latter being admitted to a secret revelation which they should afterwards use for the confirmation of their disciples—seems to be an argument of some strength in favour of the view that the two documents are the product of the same school.

7. CONCLUSION. — The task remains of interpreting, as a whole, the evidence bearing on the question of the genuineness of 2 Peter. The external evidence is, as was pointed out, wholly insufficient. No evidence exists at all till the time of Clement of Alexandria, or (if we would speak with absolute certainty) till the time of Origen. Thus the burden of proof is thrown on the Epistle itself. It is conceivable that, through some accident or series of accidents, a genuine Epistle of St. Peter might lie hid till the end of the 2nd or the beginning of the 3rd cent. and then suddenly come to light. But an Epistle claiming to be such must bear unmistakable testimony to its own genuineness. The internal evidence of 2 P has been examined. The literary style of the Epistle is artificial; it shows little command over or appreciation of the language, and yet it is extraordinarily ambitious. It is not easy to think that St. Peter can have cultivated such a style, and the Epistle itself gives no support whatever to the idea that an amanuensis was employed in its composition. Again, the only events in the gospel history to which allusion is made are incidents which had a conspicuous place in St. Peter's life. About all other events in the Lord's life, even the most momentous, the Epistle is absolutely silent. It hardly alludes to any of the Lord's sayings which are recorded in the Gospels. The suspicion, therefore, cannot fail to arise, that the references which are made to the gospel history are selected as being in harmony with the supposed authorship. From history we turn to doctrine. Nothing is said in the Epistle of the Passion or the Resurrection or the exaltation of Christ, or of the Holy Spirit in the Christian Church, or of Prayer. Not only is the Resurrection passed over, but the Transfiguration takes its place as the guarantee of the truth of the gospel. The difficulties, therefore, in the way of holding that the Epistle is the work of a personal disciple of Christ, called to be a witness of the Resurrection, which a study of the Epistle itself reveals, are very serious. They become much more serious when it is compared with what we have every reason to believe to be the genuine words of St. Peter. The First Epistle is wholly different from the Second in literary style, in its use of OT language, in its allusions to the Lord's life and teaching. It dwells with reiterated emphasis on those primary Christian facts and doctrines which have no place in the Second Epistle. The internal evidence, then, reviewed so far, is adverse to the Petrine authorship. But there is another element in the internal evidence, of which, at this point, account must be taken. There are in the Epistle what appear to be clear signs of a date much later than the apostolic age. It is only by unnatural interpretations that 3^{4} and $3^{15f.}$ can be made to harmonize with a time within the possible limits of St. Peter's life. The anachronisms of the Epistle seem clearly to point to the 2nd cent. as the time of its composition. This conclusion, based on internal evidence, is confirmed when external evidence is taken into account. On the one hand, it is in accordance with the absence of any trace of the Epistle till the beginning of the 3rd cent. On the other hand, it is at one with what is the natural, if not necessary, inference from the resemblances between the Epistle and the Apocalypse of Peter, viz. that these two documents are the work of the same school and belong (approximately) to the same date.

The evidence is obviously cumulative. Different minds will vary in the interpretation of this or that piece of evidence, and in the weight which they allow to evidence the interpretation of which is unquestioned. To the present writer it appears that too many independent lines of evidence converge towards one result to allow of hesitation. The only conclusion, it is believed, which is in accordance with the evidence, external and internal, is that 2 P is not the work of the apostle, but is a document which must be assigned to the 2nd century.

Two subjects remain for consideration—

(1) Is it possible to ascertain with any degree of probability the place where, and the time when, the Epistle was written? It has been shown to be probable on literary grounds that the Apocalypse of Peter and the Second Epistle of Peter belong to the same school. This conclusion is confirmed by what seems to be the natural interpretation of the evidence as to Clement of Alexandria. It appears likely that he, in his Hypotyposeis, placed the two documents side by side, and commented on them as closely related writings. It seems probable that the birthplace of the Apocalypse was Egypt (see above, p. 777), and we therefore infer that it is also probable that 2 P was written in Egypt (cf. Jülicher, Einl. p. 151; Harnack, Die Chronologie p. 469). This conclusion is further supported by the fact that the Epistle has pcints of contact in language and thought with two great writers of Alexandria—Philo and Clement.

(1) Philo. Salmon (Introduction p. 502 ff.) notes that 'there is a whole host of 2 Peter's rare words in Philo.' Thus, to take a single example, the word ἰσότιμος (2 P 1^{1}) occurs in Philo, Leg. Alleg. ii. 6 (ed. Mangey i. 70, ἰσότιμον αὐτὸ ἡγησάμενος ψυχῇ); de Sacr. Abelis et Caini 3 (i. 165, τὸν σοφὸν ἰσότιμον κόσμῳ *); and ἰσοτιμία is found in de Cherub. 34 (i. 160), Vita Mosis 7 (ii. 86). But more important than resemblance in mere vocabulary is kinship in modes of thought. Thus, if 2 P speaks of God's ἀρετή, in Philo we have the phrases τὴν ἀρετὴν καὶ σοφίαν τοῦ θεοῦ (Leg. Alleg. ii. 14, i. 75), τὰ περὶ θεοῦ καὶ τῶν ἀρετῶν αὐτοῦ (Quis Rerum Div. Her. 22, i. 488), τῆς θείας ἀρετῆς (ib. 23, i. 489). τῆς ἀρετῆς τοῦ πάντα μεγάλου θεοῦ (de Somniis i. 16, i. 635). Again, Philo supplies parallels to the phrase θείας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως, 2 P 1^{4}—e.g. Vita Mosis ii. 11 (ii. 143), ἥδει γὰρ τὴν φύσιν τοῦ θεοῦ ὅλως; de Spec. Leg. iv. 8 (ii. 343), τῆς μακαρίας καὶ εὐδαίμονος θεοῦ φύσεως; de Abram. 28 (ii. 22), οἱ μεμοιρασμένοι τὴν θείαν φύσιν; de Somniis i. 22 (i. 647), ὅσοι λογικῆς κεκοινωνήκασι φύσεως. Again, with the phrase τὸν προφητικὸν λόγον in 2 P 1^{19} and with the words of the Epistle as to prophecy, 1^{20} (πᾶσα προφητεία γραφῆς ἰδίας ἐπιλύσεως οὐ γίνεται, οὐ γὰρ θελήματι ἀνθρώπου κ.τ.λ.), we compare the use of the same phrase ὁ προφητικὸς λόγος in, e.g., Leg. Alleg. iii. 14 (i. 95), de Plant. Noe 28 (i. 347); and similar expressions, such as ὁ προφήτης λόγος (de Congr. Erud. Grat. 30, i. 543), στόματι προφητικῷ (de Mut. Nom. 24, i. 599), ἐν προφητικαῖς ῥήσεσιν (ib. 31, i. 604), ὁ ἱερὸς λόγος (Leg. Alleg. iii. 4, i. 89; ib. 56, i. 119); and Philo's language about prophecy in, e.g., Quis Rer. Div. Heres 52 (i. 510, προφήτης γὰρ ἴδιον μὲν οὐδὲν ἀποφθέγγεται, ἀλλότρια δὲ πάντα ὑπηχοῦντος ἑτέρου); Vita Mosis i 51 f. (ii. 125 f., λέγω γὰρ οὐδὲν ἴδιον ἀλλ' ἅτ' ἂν ὑπηχήσῃ τὸ θεῖον . . ἐξαίφνης θειοφορεῖται); de Monarch. i. 9 (ii. 222, προφήτης θειοφόρητος θεοπτεῖ καὶ προφητεύει, λέγων μὲν οἰκεῖον οὐδέν . . . ἁρμηνεῖς γάρ εἰσιν οἱ προφῆται θεοῦ καταχρωμένου τοῖς ἐκείνων ὀργάνοις πρὸς δήλωσιν ἣν ἂν ἐθελήσῃ); de Spec. Leg. iv. 8 (ii. 343, προφήτης τε μὲν γὰρ οὐδὲν ἴδιον ἀποφαίνεται τὸ παράπαν ἀλλ' ἔστιν ἑρμηνεὺς ὑποβάλλοντος ἑτέρου πάνθ' ὅσα προφέρει . . . ἐπιπεφοιτηκότος δὲ καὶ ἐνῳκηκότος τοῦ θείου πνεύματος κ.τ.λ.).

(2) Clement. 2 P 2^{22} (ὗς λουσαμένη εἰς κυλισμὸν βορβόρου) has a close parallel in the proverb quoted by Clement, ὗες ἥδονται βορβόρῳ μᾶλλον ἢ καθαρῷ ὕδατι (Cohort. 10, p. 75, ed. Potter; Strom. i. 1, p. 317), in the earlier passage a saying of Democritus being added, ἐπὶ φορυτῷ μαργαίνουσι. With the phrase τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ τῶν πάλαι αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν (2 P 1^{9}) compare Quis Dives salv. 40 (p. 957), τῶν μὲν οὖν προγεγενημένων θεὸς δίδωσιν ἄφεσιν, τῶν δὲ ἐπιόντων αὐτὸς ἕκαστος ἑαυτῷ; Strom. iv. 24 (p. 633), ἀφίενται γοῦν πρὸς τοῦ Κυρίου αἱ πρὸ τῆς πίστεως. Again, with 2 P 2^{19} (ἐλευθερίαν αὐτοῖς ἐπαγγελλόμενοι, αὐτοὶ δοῦλοι ὑπάρχοντες τῆς φθορᾶς) compare Strom. iv. 5 (p. 580), οὐκ ἔτι ἀδιαφόρως βιωτέον οὐδὲ ἀναίδην δουλευτέον τοῖς ἀτιμοτάτοις μέρεσιν ἡμῶν, γαστρὶ καὶ αἰδοίοις, δι' ἐπιθυμίαν κολακευόντων τὸν ἡμέτερον νεκρόν. — The similarity of two other passages in 2 Peter to characteristic passages in Clement is much more important. (i.) In Clement's system faith is the foundation; on this is built a superstructure of good living; 'knowledge,' with the higher virtues which spring from it (ἀπάθεια taking a prominent place among them), is a later stage of growth. See, e.g., the passage at the beginning of Strom. vi. where he refers to the purpose of his Pædagogus—ὁ παιδαγωγὸς . . . τὴν ἐκ παίδων ἀγωγήν τε καὶ τροφὴν παρέσεσθαι, τουτέστιν, ἐκ κατηχήσεως συναύξουσαν τῇ πίστει πολιτείαν καὶ προπαρασκευάζουσαν τοῖς εἰς ἄνδρας ἐγγραφομένοις ἐνάρετον τὴν ψυχήν, εἰς ἐπιστήμης γνωστικῆς παραδοχήν. He bitterly complains of those who divorce faith from conduct, e.g. Strom. i. 9 (p. 341), μόνην καὶ ψιλὴν τὴν πίστιν ἀπαιτοῦσιν. The ascending series of virtues in 2 P 1[5f.] (πίστις, ἀρετή, γνῶσις, ἐγκράτεια, ὑπομονή, εὐσέβεια, φιλαδελφία, ἀγάπη) is seen at once to have points of contact with that type of Alexandrian thought which finds expression in Clement's writings. With the words of 2 P compare especially Clement, Strom. ii. 6 (p. 445), ἡ πρώτη πρὸς σωτηρίαν νεῦσις ἡ πίστις ἡμῖν ἀναφαίνεται, μεθ' ἣν φόβος τε καὶ ἐλπὶς καὶ μετάνοια, σὺν τε ἐγκρατείᾳ καὶ ὑπομονῇ προκόπτουσαι, ἄγουσιν ἡμᾶς ἐπί τε ἀγάπην ἐπί τε γνῶσιν; Strom. vii. 10 (p. 865), τῷ ἔχοντι προστεθήσεται· τῇ μὲν πίστει ἡ γνῶσις· τῇ τε γνώσει ἡ ἀγάπη· τῇ ἀγάπῃ δὲ ἡ κληρονομία. (ii.) It would be easy to adduce a very large number of passages from Clement illustrating the essential idea of the phrase θείας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως (2 P 1[4]). In the first place, he constantly dwells on man's relation to God by creation (e.g. Cohort. 10, p. 78); man cannot be ἄμοιρος θείας ἐννοίας (Strom. v. 13, p. 698). In the second place, he raises to the highest place of Christian hope the Platonic idea that 'the end of happiness is ὁμοίωσις θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν' (Strom. ii. 19, p. 482; cf. e.g. Strom. vii. 3, p. 835). Lastly, he finds the consummation of man's being in θεοποίησις (e.g. Cohort. 11, p. 89; Strom. vi. 14, p. 797, δύναμιν λαβοῦσα κυριακὴν ἡ ψυχὴ μελετᾷ εἶναι θεός; ib. 15, p. 803). Clement was a debtor to those who had gone before for much of his characteristic teaching. It is a reasonable conclusion from the parallels with Philo and Clement that the writer of 2 P was influenced in some of his conceptions and in his phraseology by the Christian school of Alexandria as it existed before Clement's time.

* The words which follow—τῷ αὐτῷ λόγῳ καὶ τὰ πᾶν ἐργαζόμενα κ.τ.λ.—illustrate 2 P 3^{7} (τῷ αὐτῷ λόγῳ τεθησαυρισμένοι εἰσὶν κ.τ.λ.)

In regard to date, the superior limit is approximately fixed by the fact that the Epistle was known to Origen, probably to Clement, and that it was already accepted by some in the time of the latter as the work of St. Peter. It can hardly, therefore, have been composed quite recently in Clement's, certainly not quite recently in Origen's, time. The latest possible date, therefore, would be about the year A.D. 175. As to the inferior limit, the following considerations are pertinent. (1) A literature is growing up, connecting itself with the name of St. Peter. (2) The immoral Gnostic sects are active. (3) St. Paul's Epistles have been collected: they are regarded as Scripture, and, with other Scriptures, they are violently misinterpreted by the heretics. These indications point to a date later than the first quarter of the 2nd cent. We may conclude provisionally that the Epistle was written a few years before, or a few years after, the middle of the 2nd cent., in Egypt, perhaps in Alexandria.

It must be added that a first rate commentary on 2 P is a great want of English theological literature. Such a commentary would have for its primary object the examination in detail of the relation of the language and ideas of 2 P to early Christian literature, and especially to pseudepigraphic and apocryphal documents. Till this work has been accomplished, conclusions as to the place of writing and as to the exact date within the 2nd cent. to which 2 P is to be assigned, must be regarded as tentative.

(2) In what sense is 2 P to be viewed as a forgery? When we regard the Epistle from the point of view of those who possess in the NT a fixed and definite collection of apostolic writings, our natural impulse, when we find ourselves unable to maintain its genuineness, is to condemn it as a shameless forgery, composed with the express purpose of gaining, by means of false statements, a place by the side of the genuine Epistle of St. Peter. But it may well be doubted if this verdict is not wholly vitiated by our ignorance of the circumstances of its composition, and by our natural transference of the ideas of a later time to an earlier and different age. The Epistle is closely related to the Apocalypse of Peter. It seems itself to refer (1[15]) to some other related document or documents. If, then, it was part of a literature which connected itself with the name of St. Peter, the Epistle with similar writings may well have been put forward without any sinister motive. The very number of such documents may well have been at the time a sufficient bar to misconception. Their real character may have been perfectly well known to the readers for whom they were primarily intended. In other words, the personation of the apostle, which appears so wicked when 2 P is viewed as an isolated document, may well have been an obvious literary device rather than a religious or controversial fraud.

The religious and theological aspect of the conclusion that the genuineness of the Epistle cannot be maintained, lies outside the scope of this article. The present writer, however, may be allowed to say, that in his opinion the adoption of such a critical verdict can cause perplexity only when the Lord's promise of guidance to His Church is regarded as a charter of infallibility.

F. H. CHASE.

PETHAHIAH (פְּתַחְיָה).—1. The head of the nineteenth [LXX eighteenth] priestly course, 1 Ch 24¹⁶ (B Φεταιά, A Ἀφεσσή). 2. A Levite who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10²³ (B Φαδαιά, A Φεθειά); introduced by a later hand in Neh 9⁵ (LXX om.). 3. A Judahite officer, who 'was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people,' Neh 11²⁴ (B Παθαιά, A Φαθαιά).

PETHOR (פְּתוֹר; B Φαθουρα, A Βαθουρα).—The home of Balaam (Nu 22⁵, Dt 23⁴ (5)), said (Nu) to be 'on the River' (i.e. the Euphrates), and (Dt) to belong to Aram-naharaim (cf. Nu 23⁷), i.e. the region between the Euphrates in its upper course (by and below Carchemish) and the Khabour, some 400 miles N.N.E. of Palestine. It is no doubt the Pitru, mentioned by Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 860–825): 'I crossed the Euphrates, and took the city Ana-Ašur-utîr-aṣbat on the other side of the Euphrates, on the Sagur, which the Hittites call Pitru' (KIB i. 133, l. 37–40; cf. 163, l. 36; 173, l. 85–6); and the Pedru, named long before among his conquests by Thothmes III. (W. M. Müller, As. u. Eur. 291; *RP*², v. 38, No. 280). The Sagur is the modern Sajur, which flows into the Euphrates from the N.W. at a point about 60 miles N.E. of Aleppo: Pitru or Pethor, if 'on' both the Euphrates (Nu 22⁵) and the Sajur, must thus have been on the W. bank of the former river at its junction with the Sajur, and therefore, speaking strictly, just beyond the W. border of Aram-naharaim (Dt 23⁴).* It was, of course, much more nearly N. of Moab than 'east' (Nu 23⁷); but it must be remembered that the term 'east' is used broadly (see Gn 29¹, of Ḥaran, in the same neighbourhood). For 'mountains' (ib.) between the Sajur and the Euphrates, Dillm. refers pertinently to Sachau, Reise in Syr. u. Mesop. 1883, pp. 159 ff., 165 ff. (cf. also the map). PETHUEL (פְּתוּאֵל; perhaps, by a copyist's slip, for בְּתוּאֵל Bethuel, so LXX [Βαθουήλ] and other VSS, but Vulg. Phatuel).—The father of the prophet Joel, Jl 1¹.

PETITION.—1. שְׁאֵלָה from שָׁאַל to ask, is tr. 'petition' in 1 S 1¹⁷·²⁷, 1 K 2¹⁶·²⁰, Est 5⁶·⁷·⁸ 7²·³ 9¹². In Jg 8²⁴ we find the subst. and vb. together, literally 'ask an asking,' EV 'desire a request.' So 1 K 2¹⁶ (EV 'ask a petition'), 2²⁰ (EV 'desire a petition'). In Est 5⁷ 'petition' and 'request' appear as synonyms (Heb. שְׁאֵלָה and בַּקָּשָׁה). 2. מִשְׁאָלָה from the same vb., Ps 20⁵. 3. The Aram. בְּעָא, from בָּעָא 'to inquire into,' Dn 6⁷·¹³: in v.¹² the subst. is not expressed in Heb. 4. δέησις, 1 Mac 7³⁷ 'a house of prayer and petition' (οἶκος προσευχῆς καὶ δεήσεως; RV 'prayer and supplication'). 5. αἴτημα, 1 Jn 5¹⁵ 'We have the petitions which we desired' (τὰ αἰτήματα ἃ ᾐτήκαμεν, RV 'which we have asked'). 6. Oratio, 2 Es 8²⁴.

PETRA.—See SELA.

PHACARETH (Φακαρέθ), 1 Es 5³⁴ = Pochereth-hazzebaim, Ezr 2⁵⁷.—The succeeding word belongs to this name as in Cod. B Φ. Σαβειή, and is not a separate name as it is taken by Cod. A and RV 'the sons of Sabie.'

PHAISUR (B Φαισούρ, A Φαισού), 1 Es 9²² = Pashhur, the head of a priestly house, elsewhere called Phassurus, 1 Es 5²⁵.

PHALDEUS (B Φαλδαῖος, A Φαλδαῖος, AV Phaldaius, 1 Es 9⁴⁴ = Pedaiah, Neh 8⁴.

PHALEAS (Φαλαλας), 1 Es 5²⁹ = Padon, Ezr 2⁴⁴.

PHALIAS (B Φαλίας, A Φιάθας, AV Biatas), 1 Es 9⁴⁸ = Pelaiah, Neh 8⁷.

PHALTIEL (Phalthiel, i.e. פַּלְטִיאֵל, cf. 2 S 3[15]; D Salatiel, Syr. Psaltiel). — The 'captain of the people,' who had an interview with Esdras at the close of his first vision, 2 Es 5[16].

PHARAKIM (B Φαρακέμ, A -κείμ, AV Pharacim), 1 Es 5[31].—His sons were among the temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel. The name is omitted in the parallel lists of Ezr and Neh.

PHARAOH (פַּרְעֹה, Φαραώ).—The term does not occur in the Tel el-Amarna letters, nor perhaps anywhere else in cuneiform literature. In fact, so far as we know, in ancient times it was the Hebrews alone who adopted the term; from Hebrew it passed into Greek, and from Greek into Arabic. In face of these facts it is almost superfluous to mention that Renouf has noted that פַּרְעֹה can, if necessary, be connected with an Arabic and even with a Hebrew root (PSBA xv. 421). The word existed in full use in Egyptian, with a purely Egyptian etymology, and there is no need to seek it further. The earliest instance of the title in Hebrew is probably in Ex 15[4], generally assigned by critics to about B.C. 950.

In inscriptions of the Old Kingdom an expression Pr-ʿo, 'great house,' is found, and signifies the royal house or estate, especially in titles such as 'superintendent of the gardens of Pr-ʿo'; but there is nothing to show that it was then applied to the person of Pharaoh. In the Middle Kingdom, from dynasty 12–16 it still designated strictly the palace and royal establishment rather than the king, yet it is already often followed in writing by the Vivat! 'Life, Prosperity, Health.' In the New Kingdom it became at once personal, and was soon a common term for the king: e.g. a letter is addressed to Amenhotep IV. (18th dynasty) as 'Pharaoh the Lord.' In the 19th dynasty it is the usual expression for the king in unarchaistic narrative and in the stories, and is followed by the royal personal determinative. Certain hieratic documents show that in the 22nd dynasty it preceded the personal name of the king in dates, thus: 'the Stn (king) Pr-ʿo (Pharaoh), Shashaqa.' In formal inscriptions the older royal titles persisted to the end, but in demotic the new style alone was used (at least from the 25th dynasty, the period of the Assyrian invasion), and documents exist naming the Pr-ʿo Nkʾw, the exact equivalent of 'Pharaoh-Necho.' At the same time the king is always referred to in narrative as Pr-ʿo. Probably not much later than this the ʿAyin was lost. In Old Coptic (of the 2nd cent. A.D.) the descendant of Pr-ʿo is simply ⲡⲉⲣⲟ, 'the king,' and the ⲡ being misinterpreted as the def. article, left only ⲉⲣⲟ as the word for king in Coptic. Φερώ*ν*, given as the name of an Egyptian king in Hdt. II. cxi., is evidently only the royal title Pr-ʿo.

The phrase 'Pharaoh king of Egypt,' so common in the OT, is not taken from the Egyptian. In Assyrian, 'Pir'u king of Musri,' named in an inscription of Sargon, seems at first the precise equivalent to it, but Winckler (Mitth. d. vorderas. Ges. 1898, i. 3) distinguishes Musri, a north-Arabian land, from Misri, Egypt; so this equation is at least very doubtful.

Shishak is the first king of Egypt whom the Bible definitely names; and it is a guarantee of comparatively early date and a non-Egyptian source for the record in 1 K 14[25ff.], that his name is not there preceded by the title 'Pharaoh.' The Saite kings Pharaoh-Necho and Pharaoh-Hophra are accurately entitled as in contemporary Egyptian. The Ethiopian conqueror Tirhakah is regularly called 'Pharaoh Tirhakah' in Egyptian documents, but in the Hebrew (2 K 19[9]) his true position is more accurately defined as 'king of Cush.'

1. The first appearance of the title according to the canonical scheme of the biblical books is in Gn 12[10-20]. As Abram is to be placed long before the 18th dynasty, the title here seems an anachronism such as is met with in the late Egyptian stories. Another difficulty in the narrative is the mention of Abram's having camels in Egypt. Herodotus refers to camels on the borders of Egypt in the time of Cambyses, which at least testifies to their presence in the writer's own day (5th cent. B.C.), and this, except for the passage in Genesis, is the earliest mention of the animal in connexion with Egypt; it would, however, be easy to believe that camels were known throughout the Persian period and as far back at least as the Assyrian invasions in the 7th cent. (25th dynasty). As the narrative presents no clear feature—famines being frequent — by which Abram's Pharaoh may be distinguished from others, and since Egyptian, as well as Hebrew, chronology is at present exceedingly obscure for the earlier periods, it is obviously useless to attempt his identification.

2. The Pharaoh of Joseph. The long and elaborate story of Joseph presents some very interesting data for consideration, but they are not favourable to the view that it is historically true. Its use of the title 'Pharaoh,' and of Yĕʾōr, the late Egyptian name of the Nile, which is derived from the old form Ytr, alike preclude an early date for its redaction. Far weightier is the evidence of the names Potiphera (P-ti-p-Rʿ, 'the gift of the Sun'), Asenath ([N]es-Neith, 'belonging to Neith'), Zaphenath-paʿaneah (Zt-p-ntr-e-f-ʿnkh, 'Saith the god, "he liveth"!'), which are of forms common after the 21st dynasty, and not occurring at all before it. The name Asenath strongly suggests the times of the Saite dynasties, when the worship of Neith was prominent and all these types of names were in full currency. A genuine Egyptian name of the type of Zaphenath-paʿaneah would have included the name of a specific deity, but at any rate the Hebrew author was so familiar with the formation of Egyptian names that he could introduce appropriately into the formula a new element p-ntr, 'the god,' instead of a god's name, without committing a solecism. The relations of Egypt with Palestine from the 10th cent. B.C. onward, and especially in and after the period of the Assyrian invasions, may explain this.

In a priestly inscription of the latest period, at the Cataracts, there is a record, that can scarcely be historical, of a 7 years' famine under one of the earliest kings, perhaps B.C. 3000, but we have no other record of any famine of like duration until Arab times. Our knowledge of Egypt is still very limited. Of the tenure of land in Egypt we know little; of the buying up of the people and their land, and the ultimate arrangement for paying ⅕th of the produce as a tax to Pharaoh, nothing is known. To seek the prototype of the Pharaoh of Joseph seems a rather thankless task. The chariot may or may not be an anachronism; its employment probably began under the Hyksos. It is usually conjectured that the Pharaoh who raised Joseph to the highest place in the realm and treated his shepherd brethren so well was a Hyksos, 'Shepherd,' king of the 15th or 16th dynasty. But of the Hyksos kings we know practically nothing except that some of them ruled the whole of Egypt, that they worshipped particularly or exclusively the god Set, and that their principal residences were On (Heliopolis) and Avaris (most likely Zaru) in the N.E. of Lower Egypt. Probably other events than those recounted in Genesis brought about the disappearance of the feudal system of the Middle Empire before the New Kingdom. See, further, article JOSEPH.

3. 4. The Pharaohs of the Oppression and the Exodus. On the supposition that these events took place in the 18th or 19th dynasty, 'Pharaoh' is a term which might well be employed by a contemporary historian of them. But Yĕ'ōr for the Nile seems to lower the date, and, had the great occurrences been still fresh in the remembrance of the emigrants or of their immediate descendants at the time of writing down the story, the distinctive names of the Egyptian kings concerned, and other definite information, would hardly have been omitted from the narrative. If the account is literally true, or almost so, it presents us with a considerable historical sequence to fit into the Egyptian history of the New Kingdom, a period for which our information is much fuller than usual. Ramses II. of the 19th dynasty is generally (see Driver's discussion in Hogarth's Authority and Archæology, 52 ff.) accounted the Pharaoh of the Oppression, and his son and successor, Merenptah, is considered to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus, which some, however (e.g. Lieblein, PSBA, 1899, 66), would place in the reign of Amenhotep III. or IV. of the 18th dynasty, supporting their argument by the movements of the 'Ḫabiri' (Hebrews?) in Palestine as disclosed by the Tel el-Amarna letters. The name of Raamses given (Ex 1^{11}) to a store city built by the Hebrews clearly refers to some city built for one of the kings named Ramses. Of these Ramses II. was the greatest; he was also pre-eminent as a builder. Several cities were called after his name, and one in the Eastern Delta, in the region of Goshen, retained it till a late date. He was also active at Pithom, as is shown by M. Naville's excavation there; but it is by no means clear that he was the founder of it: probably the site was already ancient in his day. The Oppression evidently lasted many years. Ramses II. reigned 67 years, and thus the Exodus may have taken place in the short reign of Merenptah, the son and successor of that aged king. The remarkable fact that the Israelites are named on a monument of Merenptah (see Petrie, Six Temples, pls. xiii., xiv.) as destroyed or harried by him, apparently in Palestine, does not disprove this theory, as detachments from the main body might have left Egypt from time to time, and settled and multiplied at Hebron, round the tombs of the patriarchs. Nor is it disproved by the recent discovery of the mummy of Merenptah in the tomb of Amenhotep II., for the biblical narrative does not distinctly state that Pharaoh himself was drowned in the Red Sea. The Israelites are said to have passed through the desert of Sinai, and wandered 40 years in its neighbourhood; and it happens that there are no records extant of Egyptian expeditions to the quarries of Sinai during the reigns of Merenptah and his successor. On the other hand, there is no trace in the Hebrew records of any Egyptian invasion of Palestine before Shishak of the 22nd dynasty; unless indeed, as some think, 'the hornet' of Jos 24^{12}, Ex $23^{27.\ 28}$, Dt 7^{20} refers to the inroad of Ramses III. This king of the 20th dynasty certainly harried the country, and, had the Israelites previously entered it in force, it is hardly probable that his invasion would not be mentioned in the Book of Judges. But it is possible to reconcile the chronology of Judges with a theory that would make the entry of the Israelites into Palestine subsequent to the last campaign of Ramses III. (Petrie, PSBA, 1896, p. 243). Also, even on the usual theory, the passage of the Egyptian armies along the coast roads into Syria would leave untouched the highlands of Palestine and the Valley of the Jordan, from which the spread of the Hebrews must, as a matter of fact, have been only gradual. To sum up, the monuments of Egypt give us no record either of the Oppression or of the Exodus. As the story stands, there are passages in it which are difficult to credit, but some modifications would enable us to place it in the time of Ramses II. and Merenptah. See, further, art. MOSES.

5. In 1 Ch 4^{18} there is mention of a 'daughter of Pharaoh' in a genealogy; but not only is her chronological position doubtful, it is even uncertain whether a royal title or a personal name is intended by the expression.

6. In David's lifetime Hadad the Edomite fled to Egypt and was well received by Pharaoh, who gave him the sister of his queen Tahpenes to wife (1 K $11^{14ff.}$). Here the queen's name offers a clue, but at present no such name has been recognized from Egypt. At the end of the 11th cent. B.C. Egypt was ruled by two contemporaneous dynasties, one ruling at Thebes and the other at Tanis (Zoan) in the Eastern Delta, the latter, however, having the suzerainty over the whole country. The power of Egypt must have been small, and no large monuments were raised in that period,

7. Solomon's Egyptian father-in-law (1 K 2^{46} 3^{1}) should likewise be a Tanite king (21st dynasty); according to 1 K 9^{16} he took Gezer and gave it to Solomon.

It is noticeable that Shishak king of Egypt (the founder of the 22nd dynasty) is never called Pharaoh. This is the first occasion in the Bible on which a distinctive name is given to an Egyptian king. It seems as if the vague traditions in the earlier stories were now succeeded by more positive knowledge as to later events. As noted above, Shishak was called by the Egyptians 'Pharaoh Shishak' (Rec. de Trav. xxi. 13, l. 1), but the fashion was a new one, and would be little known to foreigners.

8. 'Pharaoh king of Egypt' of the time of Sennacherib and Hezekiah. In both versions (2 K 18^{21} and Is 36^{6}) the Rabshakeh addresses Hezekiah with the words, 'Behold thou trustest on the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt to all that trust on him.' Here 'Pharaoh king of Egypt' is a vague way of designating the king, who appears at that time to have been Tirhakah, in 2 K 19^{9} rightly called 'king of Ethiopia.' In Egyptian documents this conqueror of Egypt is regularly designated 'Pharaoh Tahraqa.' It may be questioned whether there is not in the biblical account a confusion between two distinct campaigns of Sennacherib, and whether 'Pharaoh king of Egypt' does not refer to another king reigning in B.C. 701; cf. art. HEZEKIAH in vol. ii. p. 378^{b}. Tirhakah probably did not begin to reign before B.C. 685. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

PHARATHON (Φαραθών). — A place in Judæa, fortified by Bacchides against Jonathan, 1 Mac 9^{50}. The EV separate Pharathon from the preceding name, reading 'Timnath, Pharathon,' whereas LXX seems to combine the two—τὴν Θαμνάθα Φαραθών. G. A. Smith agrees with the latter, holding that 'evidently one place' is referred to (but see Buhl, GAP 206 f.). Pharathon is probably the village Fer'on in the low hills west of Shechem, guarding the approach to the main route on the Plain of Sharon,

i. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE PHARISEES AND THE SADDUCEES.—Though the Pharisees and the Sadducees make their first appearance as distinct parties during the latter half of the 2nd cent. B.C., they represent tendencies which can be traced much further back in Jewish history. When Ezra returned from Babylon (B.C. 458), he found the Jews living in and around Jerusalem divided into two parties on the question of intercourse with foreigners. Those who returned first from exile (B.C. 537) had been more scrupulous in this matter. They seem to have held aloof at first not only from the heathen inhabitants of the land, but also from the descendants of those Jews that had been left in Palestine by Nebuchadnezzar, and to have admitted into the new community only those whose ancestors had been in exile, or who were otherwise able to prove that they were of pure stock (Ezr 2, Neh 7^{6-73}). Gradually, however, they fell away from this strictness; they received into their fellowship their Palestinian brethren and such of the heathen as acknowledged J" and His commandments; and many of them even entered into alliances of various kinds with those of their heathen neighbours who remained heathen.

That such was the case we learn especially from the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Immediately upon his arrival in Jerusalem, Ezra was informed that many of the people had intermarried with the people of the land, the chiefs of the people being most guilty ($9^{1f.}$).* A commission appointed to inquire into the matter took three months to perform its task ($10^{16f.}$). The number of those who had contracted such marriages was very great; the list that was drawn up (10^{18-44}) contains the names of four members of the high priest's family (v.^{18}). Ezra perceived that a grave crisis had arisen in the history of the Jewish community in Palestine; the holy seed was being profaned (9^2); the heathen element might soon become dominant; the danger could be averted only by the adoption of measures that would secure that only such could belong to the community as were of pure Jewish blood. He accordingly demanded that they put away their foreign wives and children, without giving them the opportunity of becoming Jews ($10^{1-5.\ 11}$). Though they pledged themselves to do so ($10^{5.\ 19}$), this measure was not, at least permanently, carried out.† For when Nehemiah first visited Jerusalem (B.C. 444) he found matters exactly as Ezra had found them. The 'nobles of Judah' were in close alliance with the foreign element (Neh 6^{17-19} 3^5); the Sabbath was not strictly kept (10^{31}, cf. $13^{15ff.}$); and mixed marriages were exceedingly common. After taking the precautionary measure of building the wall of Jerusalem, he held an assembly of the people, at which they resolved to separate themselves entirely from all foreigners, and to observe all the LORD'S commandments (9^2 $10^{28ff.}$). He did not, however, compel them to put away their foreign wives and children, but only to pledge themselves to abstain from all mixed marriages in future (10^{30}). But he had not yet gained a complete victory. When he revisited Jerusalem in 432, he found that the high priest Eliashib had renewed his close fellowship with Tobiah ($13^{4ff.}$), that the Sabbath was still desecrated (v.$^{15ff.}$), that many of the people were still marrying foreign wives (v.$^{23ff.}$), and that a grandson of the high priest was son-in-law to Sanballat (v.^{28}). Against these abuses he took active measures. He cast out all Tobiah's household stuff, and had the chambers of the temple purified (v.^{8f}); he renewed his injunctions against Sabbath desecration and the contracting of fresh mixed marriages, and expelled the high priest's grandson from the Jewish community (v.^{28}).* 'Thus,' he adds, 'cleansed I them from all strangers' (v.^{30}). Complete separation from all foreign elements became henceforth the principle of Judaism.

In connexion with these proceedings it is important to notice that the natural leaders of the people, including the members of the high priest's family, who had become a sort of temple nobility, were among the chief offenders, and that it was from them that Nehemiah experienced the greatest active opposition. Backed up by the authority of the Persian king, he was able to crush their opposition, and to establish in Judæa the strict separation which from the first had ruled among the pious exiles in Babylonia. 'The aftertime shows plainly that he accomplished the work of his life. He impressed the stamp of his spirit upon Judaism for all time, and forced it to follow the course he had marked out' (Cornill, History of the People of Israel, p. 168; see also Wellhausen, Isr. und Jüd. Geschichte[3], p. 173). We must not, however, make Nehemiah a Pharisee and Eliashib a Sadducee. In them and their respective adherents we have only, at the most, a preparation for the parties that formed much later. The victory of Nehemiah was the victory of Judaism generally, not of Judaism in its specific Pharisaic form.

Regarding the latter half of the Persian period we have hardly any authentic information. The high priest was probably, under the Persian governor of Syria, the civil as well as religious head of the Jewish community; he and his priestly brethren of higher office along with their families would doubtless form a kind of aristocracy, even as compared with the rest of the priests. Judging from the conduct of some of their successors towards the close of the Greek period, it is very unlikely that their influence was always of an ideal character (cf. the story of Johanan and Bagoses, Ant. XI. vii. 1). In spite of the triumph of the exclusive party under Ezra and Nehemiah, there still remained an Israel after the flesh, and a deep gulf between it and the Israel after the spirit.†

* We learn from Mal $2^{14f.}$ that some of the Jews had put away their Jewish wives in order to marry foreign women.

† According to the LXX of 10^{44} they put away their foreign wives along with their children.

* According to Josephus (Ant. XI. viii. 2ff.) this expelled priest was Manasseh, for whom Sanballat built the Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerizim.

† For detailed proof drawn from the Psalms see Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden, p. 184ff. We need not suppose that only wicked people were opposed to the rigorism of Ezra. Cheyne (Jewish Religious Life after the Exile, p. 220) makes the Book of Ruth 'an idyllic story to justify admitting into the community any foreign women who heartily adopted the nationality and religion of their Jewish husbands. . . . It shows that Ezra did not gain an at all complete victory over the friends of mixed marriages.'

The conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great and the setting up of the Greek kingdoms of Egypt and Syria under his successors brought the Jews into close contact with a new and highly developed civilization. During the first half of the Greek period Judæa belonged to Egypt, and the Palestinian Jews, with whom we are mainly concerned, though surrounded by Greek cities, with which they had constant intercourse, do not seem to have been much harmed by such intercourse. It was otherwise when Syria (B.C. 198) became the paramount power. Antiochus III., it is true, favoured the Jews in many ways, and allowed them the enjoyment of unconditional religious freedom (Ant. XII. iii. 3. 4). A crisis came, however, when Antiochus Epiphanes ascended the throne (B.C. 175). He resolved to suppress the Jewish religion, and he found a party among the Jews themselves ready to play into his hands. This party contained leading members of the priesthood, several of whom had adopted Greek names, and who, in order to further their own ambitious designs, were prepared to go almost any length in Hellenizing the people. During the reign of Seleucus IV., one Simon, who was 'guardian' of the temple, and who was evidently one of the chiefs of this Hellenizing party, had caused serious trouble to the high priest Onias III. (2 Mac 3–4[6]). On the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes to the throne, Jason, whose name was originally Jesus (Ant. XII. v. 1), supplanted his brother Onias in the high priesthood (B.C. 175) by promising the king a large sum of money; in return for another large sum he also received permission to erect a gymnasium in Jerusalem and to register its inhabitants as citizens of Antioch (2 Mac 4[7-9]). And now the work of Hellenization began. Jason 'forthwith brought over them of his own race to the Greek fashion.... Seeking to overthrow the lawful modes of life, he brought in new customs forbidden by the law; he established a Greek place of exercise under the citadel itself, and caused the noblest of the young men to wear the Greek cap. And thus there was an extreme of Greek fashions, and an advance of an alien religion . . . ; the priests had no more any zeal for the services of the altar; but despising the sanctuary, and neglecting the sacrifices, they hastened to enjoy that which was unlawfully provided in the palæstra, after the summons of the discus; making of no account the honours of their fathers, and thinking the glories of the Greeks best of all' (2 Mac 4[10-22]; cf. 1 Mac 1[14ff.]). He even sent money to Tyre to provide a sacrifice for Hercules. After three years Jason was supplanted in the high priesthood by Menelaus, brother of the above-mentioned Simon,* who is described in 2 Mac 4[25] as 'bringing nothing worthy the high priesthood, but having the passion of a cruel tyrant and the rage of a savage beast.' In order to secure his position with the king by means of bribery, Menelaus spoiled the temple of its vessels of gold (4[32]); the aged high priest Onias, who protested against this sacrilege, was treacherously murdered (4[33ff.]), and a deputation from Jerusalem, which appeared before Antiochus to accuse Menelaus of these and other outrages, was put to death (4[39-50]). On a false rumour of the death of Antiochus, Jason endeavoured to recover the high priesthood. Thinking that Judæa was in revolt, Antiochus returned from Egypt (B.C. 170), took Jerusalem by storm and gave it up to pillage for three days. He also entered 'the most holy temple of all the earth,' having Menelaus for his guide; he took the holy vessels with his 'polluted hands' and spoiled the temple treasury (5[11-21]; cf. 1 Mac 1[20ff.]). Two years afterwards an even worse fate befell Jerusalem. Returning from a campaign in Egypt, Antiochus sent an officer with a large army to Jerusalem, with orders to slay all that were of full age, and to sell the women and the younger men. These orders were executed most relentlessly. The city was plundered and set on fire; its walls were torn down; such of its inhabitants as had not been put to the sword or made captive fled; only apostates and heathen strangers remained; and the city of David was rebuilt into a strong citadel, the Akra, which was held by a Syrian garrison till B.C. 142 (2 Mac 5[22ff.]; cf. 1 Mac 1[29ff.]). Soon thereafter a decree was issued by Antiochus suppressing the Jewish religion. The sacrifices in the sanctuary at Jerusalem were forbidden; the Sabbaths and feasts were to be profaned and the sanctuary polluted; their sons were no longer to be circumcised; the sacred books had to be delivered up; altars and temples and shrines for idols were to be built in the cities of Judah, and swine's flesh and unclean beasts were to be offered in sacrifice. These injunctions were rigidly carried out by overseers appointed for the purpose. On the 15th of Chislev (i.e. December) B.C. 168 an altar was erected to Zeus Olympius on the altar of J", and on the 25th a sacrifice was offered on it to the heathen deity. Whether Menelaus officiated as high priest, we cannot tell. Such of the Jews as remained loyal to the law were barbarously put to death, no respect being paid to age or sex (1 Mac 1[41ff.]).

Hellenism had evidently made considerable progress not only among the priestly aristocracy and the inferior priests (2 Mac 4[14f.]), but also among the people generally (1 Mac 1[11ff.]), more especially in Jerusalem and among the young men (cf. Ant. XII. v. 1 with 1 Mac 1[15]). At first there was probably no intention, even on the part of the leading Hellenizers, to apostatize from the national religion; what they desired was to remove from Judaism its narrowness and exclusiveness, to give up the intolerable and, as it seemed to them, barbarous customs of the fathers, so that they might freely participate in the advantages of Greek culture and in the joys of Greek life. But even after Antiochus had taken his extreme measures, many of the Hellenizing party still adhered to him.* 'Many of Israel consented to his worship, and sacrificed to the idols, and profaned the Sabbath' (1 Mac 1[43]; cf. what is said of the 'lawless' and 'ungodly' 3[5. 8] 6[21] 9[23] 10[14]; also Dn 8[23] 11[30. 32]). After the outbreak of the Maccabæan rising we find them among the 'Macedonian' garrison of the citadel (Ant. XII. v. 4, ix. 3) and in the armies of Seron, Ptolemæus, Nicanor, and Gorgias (XII. vii. 1. 3). But, as the Maccabæan rising proves, these measures of Antiochus had shown the mass of the people to what Hellenism was tending and had awakened a powerful reaction.

Apart, however, from this national reaction, the radical Hellenism of the priestly aristocracy had called forth another extreme party, the Hasidæans (see art. HASIDÆANS). This party is, in principle, as ancient as Judaism, but it was opposition to extreme Hellenization that brought them close together into a separate company (συναγωγή, 1 Mac 2[42]), shortly before the Maccabæan rising, and made them all the more resolved to stand by the threatened law. They were the party of those who had laid most to heart the teaching of the scribes (cf. 1 Mac 7[12. 13]); they were so devoted to the law (2[42]) as not even to defend themselves when attacked by the Syrians on the Sabbath (v.[32ff.]); they observed strictly the laws as to purification (1 Mac 1[62f.],

* According to Josephus (Ant. XII. v. 1), Menelaus, whose name was originally Onias, was the brother of Jason. According to Wellhausen his Hebrew name was M'nahem or Manasseh.

* According to Josephus (Ant. XII. ix. 7) it was Menelaus that persuaded him to compel the Jews to renounce their religion; cf. 2 Mac 5[15].

2 Mac $6^{18ff.}$), and insisted upon complete separation from the Gentiles (2 Mac 14^{38}). Though they were not the first to raise the standard of revolt against the Syrians, they soon associated themselves with Mattathias and his friends in the common cause (1 Mac 2^{42}); but they withdrew from the struggle, when religious freedom was granted and Alcimus, a descendant of Aaron, was made high priest instead of Menelaus ($7^{12ff.}$), and do not seem, at least as a party, to have taken any further share in the war, in spite of the perfidy of Alcimus in putting many of them to death. They were an exclusively religious party, supremely interested, not in the political independence of the nation, but in the strict observance in every respect of the laws and customs handed down from the fathers.

We have dwelt at considerable length on the Hellenizers and the Hasidæans, because these were the progenitors respectively of the Sadducean and Pharisaic parties.

It is during the reign of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135–105) that we first hear of these as two opposed parties.* According to Josephus (Ant. XIII. x. 5. 6), Hyrcanus on one occasion invited the Pharisees to a feast, and having entertained them well and put them in good humour, reminded them that they knew he was desirous to be a righteous man and to do all things whereby he might please God, after their manner. If they observed him erring in any way, he requested them to correct him. They all expressed entire satisfaction with him, except one, Eleazar by name, who informed him that, if he would be really righteous, he must lay down the high priesthood and be content with the civil government of the people, and stated, as the reason for making this demand, that they had heard from old men that his mother had been a captive in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. Not only Hyrcanus, but also all the rest of the Pharisees were indignant at Eleazar for repeating this story, which of course insinuated a suspicion as to the purity of Hyrcanus' descent. But one, Jonathan, a Sadducee, and a great friend of Hyrcanus, assured the latter that Eleazar had simply expressed the sentiments common to all the Pharisees, and advised him to test them by putting to them the question, what punishment Eleazar deserved. On their answering that he deserved stripes and bonds, Hyrcanus was very angry, and concluded that Eleazar had reproached him with their approbation. He accordingly left the party of the Pharisees, abolished the decrees they had imposed upon the people, and punished those that observed them with death.

Though the form of the story as told by Josephus is certainly unhistorical,† there is every reason to believe that in the time of Hyrcanus the Pharisees had become a well-defined party and broke decisively with the Hasmonæan princes. The Maccabæan rising, which was originally in defence of religion (1 Mac $2^{27.\ 50}$), had developed in a way that was little to the mind of 'the pious,' who, as we have seen, had withdrawn from the contest, when religious freedom was granted in the year 163. It gradually became a war, not for the law, but against the ancient aristocracy for the ethnarchy under the Syrians, and ended in the founding of a worldly dynasty. In the course of their struggles, Judas and his brothers were compelled by the necessity of their position to make use of 'profane' means; they entered into alliances with Gentile nations (1 Mac 8^{17} $12^{1ff.}$ 14^{24}), and took the side, now of one, now of another pretender to the Syrian throne; they accepted from the kings of Syria military titles and commands and even the office of high priest ($10^{26ff.\ 65}$ $11^{27f.\ 57ff.}$ 14^{38}), and acted generally in accordance with the dictates of worldly prudence. The result was the establishment under Simon of a thoroughly secular State, the civil ruler being at the same time high priest (14^{41-47}). Hyrcanus, whom Josephus calls a disciple of the Pharisees, walked in the footsteps of his predecessors. He renewed the alliance with Rome (Ant. XIII. ix. 2, XIV. x. 22) and kept a standing army of foreign troops, with which he accompanied Antiochus Sidetes against the Parthians (XIII. viii. 4). It is true, he destroyed the Samaritan sanctuary upon Mt. Gerizim, and forcibly converted the Idumæans and razed Samaria to the ground; but these were purely political measures, undertaken for the purpose of extending his dominion beyond the narrow limits of Judæa. His high priesthood was a secondary matter. 'For Hyrcanus the tiara had fallen to the rank of a mere decoration; he was a secular prince like the neighbouring heathen kings; his State was a purely secular realm, which was no longer able to pursue spiritual aims, no longer had spiritual concerns' (Cornill, p. 212).

The majority of the people were meanwhile satisfied with this turn of affairs. They were proud not only to enjoy religious freedom, but also to be once more an independent nation, and honoured the valiant princes who had led them to victory (1 Mac 13^{26} $14^{4.\ 11.\ 40ff.}$). The ancient aristocracy also, the extreme Hellenizers of the time of Epiphanes, who at first had held out against Judas and his brothers, had either been swept away or had recognized the futility of carrying on the struggle, and along with their adherents came over to the new rulers, to whom they were able, from their birth and attainments, to render considerable service. Taught by experience, they had given up all thought of overthrowing the national religion, and accommodated themselves to the new order of things, which imposed upon them no harsh restrictions, and allowed them the full enjoyment of the good things of this life (cf. 1 Mac 15^{32}). Along with the leading men of the new regime,* they became the chief supporters of the Maccabæan princes, with whose political aims they were in full sympathy. It is this party, consisting of members of the ancient and the new aristocracy and their adherents, that went by the name of Sadducees. They were primarily a purely political party. They were supremely interested in the maintenance and prosperity of the State as a secular State; religion was with them an altogether secondary concern; and they held very lax views on the subject of exclusiveness.

To 'the pious,' on the other hand, the Hasmonæan rule must have become ever more and more obnoxious. Since the outbreak of the Maccabæan rising they had doubtless grown both in numbers and exclusiveness, and were now known by the name, Pharisees. These were essentially a purely religious party, although we shall find them occasionally using political means for the attainment of their religious ends. Their fundamental principle was complete separation from everything non-Jewish. In order to secure this separation the law must be scrupulously kept; there must be no adoption of foreign ideas or ways of living; there must be no alliances with other nations; Israel, as the chosen people of J", must live an altogether separated life. The whole tendency of the new dynasty was against this exclusiveness. Hence the opposition to it of the Pharisees. Josephus may be right in making the ostensible ground of their quarrel with Hyrcanus the possession by him of the high priesthood. But the real ground of their opposition to him was much deeper. The Hasmonæans were orthodox worshippers of J", and even compelled neighbouring peoples to become Jews. But the dynasty they had founded was a worldly dynasty; and the Pharisees felt instinctively that in a national State with national politics their ideal was less likely to be realized than even under the rule of the Gentiles. The success of the Maccabæan rising had thus led to the formation of the two parties which played so important a part in the after history of the Jews.*

* According to Ant. XIII. v. 9, they existed as parties as early as the time of Jonathan.

† Montet, Essai sur les origines des partis saducéen et pharisien, 205 ff.; Wellhausen, op. cit. 290.

* The frequent occurrence of foreign names at this time among the Jews shows the progress that Hellenism had made among them. The Hasmonæan princes themselves bore foreign, in addition to their Hebrew names: Hyrcanus, Antigonus, Aristobulus, Alexander, Alexandra. For other Greek names at this time see 1 Mac $14^{22.\ 24}$ 15^{15} $16^{11f.}$; Ant. XIII. ix. 2. 'That which was surprising in the case of the first Hellenizing high priests, had, it would seem, become the fashion in the national party, at least among those of higher rank. They had learned to do what the foreigners did, and did not scruple to bear foreign names' (Bertholet, op. cit. 230 f.).

Under Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 104–78) the opposition between the Hasmonæans and the Pharisees broke out into open conflict. Jannæus was a man of such an utterly worthless character that he very soon alienated the people from him and made them sympathize with the Pharisees. On one occasion, when, at a Feast of Tabernacles, he was officiating as high priest, the people pelted him with the lemons they were carrying for the celebration, and reviled him as the son of a captive and as being therefore unworthy of his priestly office. At his command his troops cut down 6000 of the people (Ant. XIII. xiii. 5). When he returned to Jerusalem from his war with Obâdas, defeated and without an army, there broke out an open rebellion, which lasted for six years, during which 50,000 Jews perished. When, wearied of the contest, he asked the conditions of peace, they demanded his death and called in the aid of the Syrian king, Demetrius III. (Eucairus). Jannæus was totally defeated and fled to the mountains. Moved by sympathy with him in his sore need, and perhaps dreading lest their country should once more become subject to Syria, many of the Jews deserted to him; Demetrius was compelled to retire, and Jannæus took fearful revenge upon his adversaries:—upon his return in triumph to Jerusalem he caused 800 of their chiefs to be crucified (Ant. XIII. xiii. 5, xiv. 1. 2). That the leaders in this rebellion were Pharisees, is evident from the fact that they afterwards avenged the execution of the 800 (Ant. XIII. xvi. 2), and that Jannæus, when dying, counselled his wife Alexandra Salome to make peace with them and be guided by them (XIII. xv. 5).

Alexandra Salome (B.C. 78–69), during whose reign Hyrcanus II., her eldest son, was high priest, followed entirely her dying husband's advice. She recalled the exiled Pharisees, admitted them to a large share in the government, and reintroduced the Pharisaic practices which John Hyrcanus is said to have abolished (Ant. XIII. xvi. 1 ff.; BJ I. v. 1 ff.). She also gave to the heads of the scribes a seat in the Sanhedrin along with the priestly aristocracy and the elders. According to later tradition, this was the golden age of Judaism.† But the Pharisees, who, according to Josephus, governed the queen, made a bad use of their authority. They took such fearful vengeance upon the Sadducees that a deputation of the latter, led by Aristobulus, Salome's younger son, presented themselves before her, protesting against the cruel treatment to which they were subjected. They reminded her of the assistance they had rendered her husband, hinted at the readiness with which neighbouring monarchs would receive them into their service, and insisted upon being at least placed in her fortresses. They not only succeeded in having an end put to the reign of terror, but also obtained command of all the fortresses, except three, where, along with Aristobulus, who soon joined them, they awaited the death of the queen to snatch the power out of the hands of the Pharisees (Ant. XIII. xvi. 2. 3. 5; BJ I. v. 3. 4).

On the death of Alexandra, Aristobulus (B.C. 69–63) soon dispossessed Hyrcanus II. of both the kingship and the high priesthood (Ant. XIV. i. 2, XV. vi. 4, XX. x.). He befriended the Sadducees, who were his chief supporters. In the course of the struggle that ensued, both the brothers appealed to the Romans, and presented themselves before Pompey in Damascus, in order to plead their cause. A third party (whom most take to have been Pharisees) also appeared before him, desiring the abolition of the sovereignty altogether, and the restoration of the old sacerdotal constitution (Ant. XIV. iii. 2). When at last he was compelled to take the temple-mount by storm (B.C. 63), Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, but left the treasures of the temple untouched. Many of the leaders of the Sadducees were executed; Aristobulus and his children were taken to Rome; and Hyrcanus was restored to his much-curtailed inheritance, not as king, but as high priest and ethnarch, with the nominal control of the civil administration of the country. How the Pharisees regarded this terrible catastrophe we learn from the Psalms of Solomon.* They looked upon it as a Divine punishment of the Sadducean aristocracy and priests, who had called the Romans into the land ($8^{12\text{-}19}$), but were at the same time bitterly enraged against the heathen, who had so impiously defiled the temple and the holy city (Ps-Sol 1, 2, 8, and 17, which seem to refer to Pompey's capture of Jerusalem; cf. Ryle and James, op. cit. xliii).

After the loss of national independence, the opposition between the Pharisees and the Sadducees naturally soon lost its political character, and became more and more distinctly religious. The Sadducees, who still formed the majority of the Sanhedrin, attempted, during the ethnarchy of Hyrcanus, to call Herod to account for his lawless proceedings in Galilee, but this attempt only proved their powerlessness (Ant. XIV. ix. 1 ff.). When Herod captured Jerusalem (B.C. 37), he put to death 45 of these Sadducean Sanhedrists (Ant. XV. i. 2 calls them leaders of the party of Antigonus, cf. BJ I. xviii. 4; Ant. XIV. ix. 4 says 'all the members of the Sanhedrin' except Sameas); and he still further diminished their power by deposing and appointing high priests according to his own pleasure, and by introducing among the high priestly families his own relations and creatures. When he purged the Sanhedrin in the manner just described, he spared the leaders of the Pharisees, who had advised the citizens to throw open the gates of the city to him (Ant. XIV. ix. 4, XV. i. 1); and although they refused to take the oath of allegiance, he merely punished them with a fine (XV. x. 4; XVII. ii. 4). Recognizing their influence with the people, he at first would fain have gained them over to his side, and

* See Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judenthum, p. 29 ff. The Psalms of Solomon complain bitterly of the Hasmonæans having assumed the office of high priest and the title of king; see Ryle and James, Ps. of Sol. on 8^{12} 17$^{5ff.}$. Hyrcanus, however, did not call himself king, but 'high priest and head of the commonwealth of the Judæans.'

† Montet, op. cit. 277 ff. 'Under Simon ben Shatach [a leading Pharisee and brother of the queen] and queen Salome, rain fell on the eve of the Sabbath, so that the corns of wheat were large as kidneys, the barley corns as large as olives, and the lentils like golden denarii; the scribes gathered such corns and preserved specimens of them in order to show future generations what sin entails' (Talm. Bab. Ta'anith 23*a*, in Streane, The Age of the Maccabees, p. 72).

* These are of Pharisaic origin, and date, according to Ryle and James, from between B.C. 70 and 40, according to Cheyne between 63 and 45.

therefore took pains in several ways to respect their religious feelings (cf. XV. xi. 5. 6); but they simply acquiesced in his rule, as being a Divine judgment upon the people for their sins. Towards the end of his reign, their attitude towards him became one of hostility. They conspired with members of his household to secure his overthrow (XVII. ii. 4), and (B.C. 4) instigated their pupils to cut down the golden eagle, which he had placed over the chief entrance to the temple as a sign of Roman sovereignty. For this offence he caused a number of them to be burned alive (XVII. vi. 2–4; BJ I. xxxiii. 1–4).

When, after the deposition of Archelaus, Judæa passed under the direct rule of the Romans, the latter left internal matters largely in the hands of the Sanhedrin, under the presidency of the high priest, who belonged to the Sadducean party (Ant. XX. ix. 1; Ac 5^{17}). The Sadducean aristocrats, with whom the new families raised by Herod to the high priestly dignity had soon mixed, thus regained a considerable measure of power; but in order to stand well with the people, they were compelled to act in respect of all legal questions in accordance with the principles of the Pharisees (Ant. XVIII. i. 4). The latter, many of whom sat in the Sanhedrin (Ac 5^{34} 23^{6}), were the real leaders of the people. Under Agrippa I. (A.D. 41–44), who, at least within Palestine, lived the life of a pious Jew, observing strictly the ancient laws and offering daily sacrifices, they had matters very much after their own mind. To please them, Agrippa persecuted the Christians, put James, the brother of John, to death, and cast Peter into prison (Ac 12). When Judæa passed again under the direct rule of the Romans, the Sadducees once more became the nominal possessors of authority. But their doom was sealed. With the destruction of Jerusalem, the high priesthood and the Sanhedrin vanished, and the Sadducees, as a party, disappeared from history.

It was otherwise with the Pharisees.* They survived the Temple and the State. They had not, strictly speaking, been a political party within the old commonwealth, and for that very reason, when the latter perished, their influence was not lessened. Their leading Rabbis formed a body, which regarded itself as a continuation of the ancient Sanhedrin. At first it had its seat at Jamnia; it afterwards removed to Galilee, and remained for a long time at Tiberias. The office of president was hereditary in the family of Hillel. The president's authority grew rapidly. He bore the title of the old high priests, Nasi or Ethnarch, and, later, Patriarch; in course of time he was recognized by the imperial government as the head of the Palestinian Jews; from Jews in foreign lands he received gifts of money, which were collected annually by his representatives. These Rabbis separated themselves more and more completely from the Gentiles. The LXX, which had become the Christian's Bible, was supplanted by a more literal translation, that of Aquila. They also became more strict among themselves; the old tendency of the scribes to regulate the whole of life by the law was accentuated. The result was a spiritual slavery such as had never before existed. The communities voluntarily submitted to the new hierarchy; they willed the end, viz. the maintenance of Judaism, and therefore accommodated themselves to the means. As result we have the preservation of Judaism as an international fellowship even after the downfall of the theocracy.

ii. LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PHARISEES.—(1) Their scrupulous observance of the law. According to Josephus they were noted for their accuracy in interpreting the laws (BJ I. v. 2, II. viii. 14, Vita 38, Ant. XVII. ii. 4), and for the scrupulousness with which they kept them (Ant. XVIII. i. 3). They held as binding not only the written, but the oral law, the 'traditions of the fathers' (XIII. x. 6, xvi. 2). Like their progenitors, the Hasidæans, they were, speaking generally, the party of the scribes, whose precepts they carried into practice, and whose leaders, latterly, proceeded from their ranks (XV. i. 1, x. 4). The account given of them in the NT is substantially the same as that of Josephus. In the Gospels the Pharisees and the scribes are constantly mentioned in the same connexion, and in such a way as to imply that they practically formed the same party, e.g. Mt 5^{20} 12^{38} 15^{1}, Mk 2^{16} $7^{1.\ 5}$, Lk $5^{17.\ 21.\ 30}$ 6^{7} 7^{30} 11^{53} 14^{3} 15^{2}, Jn 8^{3}.* The great discourse in Mt 23 (cf. Lk $11^{37\text{-}52}$) is directed against both the Pharisees and the scribes. Gamaliel is both a Pharisee and a doctor of the law (Ac 5^{34}); the Pharisees form the straitest sect of the Jewish religion (26^{5}), and Saul, a Pharisee (Ph 3^{6}), had been brought up according to the strict manner of the law of the fathers (Ac 22^{3}). Attention is called to their holding the traditions of the elders, especially in regard to the washing of hands and vessels (Mk $7^{1\text{-}5}$=Mt 15^{2}, Mt $23^{25f.}$, Lk $11^{38f.}$), to their tithing (Lk 18^{12}, etc.), fasting (Mk 2^{18}=Mt 9^{14}, etc.), and strict observance of the Sabbath (Mk $2^{23ff.}$=Mt $12^{1ff.}$, Lk $13^{10ff.}$ $14^{1ff.}$, Jn $5^{1\text{-}16}$ $9^{14ff.}$). The traditions of the elders were even more binding than the commandments of the written law (Mk 7^{8}). In later Jewish writings we find similar statements. The written law had to be explained in accordance with tradition. 'The sword comes upon the world for suppression of judgment; and for perversion of judgment; and for explaining Torah not according to canon (tradition).'† 'Words of Soferim are akin to words of Torah and more beloved than words of Torah, for (Ca 1^{2}) Thy Love is better than Wine.' It is added that whereas the Torah contains both light and weighty precepts, the words of the Soferim are all of the latter class (Rabbi Jochanan in Taylor, op. cit. 105). 'It is a greater crime to teach contrary to the precepts of the scribes than contrary to the Torah itself' (Sanhedrin xi. 3 in Schürer, GJV^{3} ii. 390 [HJP II. ii. 12]). No contradiction was allowed to anything that had once been introduced and laid down by the fathers (Ant. XVIII. i. 3).

The Pharisees were thus the strictly legal party among the Jews. Their piety was strictly legal; the essence of religion consisted in the accurate knowledge and scrupulous observance of the law and tradition, which were the norm of all life, national, social, and individual. The Sadducees, while they had a tradition of their own, utterly rejected the traditions to which the Pharisees were so much attached.

(2) Immortality of the soul, resurrection of the body, and future retribution. According to Josephus, the Pharisees taught that every soul is incorruptible, but that only those of good men pass over into another body, while those of the wicked are punished with eternal suffering (BJ II. viii. 14). They held that there is an immortal vigour in souls, and that under the earth there are rewards and punishments for those that have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; that for the latter there has been appointed an everlasting prison, but the former have the power to return to life (Ant. XVIII. i. 3 f.). In the above passages Josephus does not represent the Pharisees as

* Such expressions as 'the scribes of the Pharisees' (Mk 2^{16}), 'the Pharisees and their scribes' (Lk 5^{30}), 'the scribes of the Pharisees' part' (Ac 23^{9}), show that there were also non-Pharisaic scribes.

† Pirke Aboth v. 13; see Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers believing in the transmigration of souls, but as holding the doctrines, common to Judaism since Dn 12², of a resurrection of the body and of a future retribution. The Psalms of Solomon also speak only of a resurrection of the righteous. The sinner 'falleth; verily grievous is his fall, and he shall not rise again; the destruction of the sinner is for ever. But they that fear the LORD shall rise again unto life eternal, and their life shall be in the light of the LORD, and it shall fail no more' (3[13.16]). 'The life of the righteous is for ever. But sinners shall be taken away unto destruction' (13[9f.]). 'Therefore is their inheritance hell and darkness and destruction. . . . But the saints of the LORD shall inherit life in gladness' (14[6ff.]; cf. 15[11-15]). The Sadducees denied the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body.

(3) Messianic expectations. The doctrine of the resurrection was a cardinal doctrine with the Pharisees, because of its close connexion with their Messianic hopes. They looked for a literal reign of God upon earth, when the power, of which they were meanwhile deprived, would be in their hands; for the Messianic kingdom was to be the kingdom of the saints, and they were the saints. In the Psalms of Solomon we have a good account of these hopes as cherished by them shortly before our Saviour's birth. The Messiah, who is not Divine, is the son of David, and is raised up by God, whose vicegerent he is upon earth. He delivers Israel from the supremacy of the Gentiles (i.e. the Romans), whom he destroys with the word of his mouth, and thrusts out the sinners (i.e. the Sadducees) from the inheritance of God. He reigns over Israel, evidently in Jerusalem, which he purges and makes holy as in the days of old; the Gentiles also become subject to him. Pure from sin himself, there is no iniquity in his day in the people's midst; they are all holy and the sons of their God. Though his kingdom is really an earthly kingdom, nothing is said of material blessings.* But that their hopes were occasionally of a very materialistic nature, is evident from the prospect which, according to Josephus, they held out to Bagoas, the eunuch (Ant. XVII. ii. 4). Naturally the Sadducees were wholly indifferent to such Messianic expectations.

(4) Angels and Spirits. The Sadducees denied that there was either angel or spirit; the Pharisees confessed both (Ac 23[8]).

(5) Divine providence and freedom of man's will. According to Josephus, the Pharisees, while making everything dependent on fate and God, taught that the doing of what is right or wrong is for the most part in man's own power, but that fate also co-operates in every action (BJ II. viii. 14). They maintained that all things are done by fate, and yet admitted a measure of freedom to man, so that he contributes to the divinely willed result (Ant. XVIII. i. 3); or, as it is put in another passage (XIII. v. 9), they taught that some things, but not all, are the work of fate; with regard to some events, it is in man's power whether they happen or not. It is altogether improbable that the Pharisees spoke of 'fate'; but the Psalms of Solomon bear witness to the substantial accuracy of Josephus' statements. 'Verily as for man—his portion is laid in the balance before Thee—he addeth not thereto nor increaseth contrary to Thy judgment, O God' (5[6]). 'O God, our works are in our choice, yea, in the power of our own soul: to do either righteousness or iniquity in the works of our hands. Whoso doeth righteousness layeth up for himself life at the LORD'S hand: and whoso doeth wickedness is guilty of his own soul to destroy it' (9[7.9]).* The Pharisees believed in the omnipotence and providence of God, and therefore held that in human actions, good or bad, a co operation of God must be assumed. At the same time they insisted upon the freedom of man's power of choice, and upon man's responsibility. The Sadducees denied 'fate' altogether, and made man the absolute master of his own destiny.

(6) Their separation from the mass of the people, their distinctive 'Pharisaism.' On all the above-mentioned points the Pharisees simply held what was common to later orthodox Judaism. But all our sources present them to us as a distinct party within the people, an ecclesiola in ecclesia.† This is implied also in the name that they bore. The name, Φαρισαῖοι, is derived from the Aramaic פְּרִישַׁיָּא, stat. emphat. פְּרִישַׁיָּא, and denotes 'the separated ones.' Whether this name was given them by their adversaries (Schürer, Montet, Edersheim) or adopted by themselves,‡ it connoted something more specific than the separation from the Gentiles, which, since the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, was characteristic of all who would be genuine Jews. It referred to their separation from the great mass of even their orthodox fellow-countrymen. The latter, however willing, were unable to observe strictly the minute prescriptions of the law as to foods and levitical purity; they were consequently unclean in the eyes of the Pharisees, who, in order to avoid all risk of being defiled, held aloof, as far as possible, from all intercourse with them. 'Parush is one who separates himself from all uncleanness and from unclean food and from the people of the land, who are not scrupulous in the matter of food' (Nathan ben Jechiel). The Pharisees were thus the Separatists or Purists. The name, however, that they gave themselves was ḥăbērîm (חֲבֵרִים 'associates'), a name which also shows that they formed among themselves a close fellowship. A ḥābēr is one who, whether learned or unlearned, scrupulously observes the law, written and oral, more especially in respect of levitical purity, tithes, and all other religious dues. According to the OT view each Israelite was the ḥābēr (רֵעַ) of the other; the Pharisee acknowledged as his ḥābēr only him who scrupulously observed the law. These scrupulous observers of the law, and these alone, were the ḥăbērîm, the genuine Israelites. The rest of the people were simply the 'am hā-'ārez, the people of the land, common persons, the vulgar herd. In the Books of Ezr (9[1f.] 10[2.11]) and Neh (10[28-31]) this name was given to the heathen and half-heathen inhabitants of Palestine as distinguished from the Jews; as used by the Pharisees, it designated the mass of the people as distinguished from themselves, the real Israelites, the Israel according to the spirit.§

They were naturally unable to separate themselves entirely from 'the people of the land,' and had therefore to draw up precise rules regulating their intercourse with them. 'The full ḥābēr

* See Sir 11[14]: 'Good things and evil, life and death, poverty and riches are from the Lord' (cf. 33[7-15]); 15[11ff.]: 'Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell . . ., it is He that caused me to err . . . (The Lord) left man in the hand of his own counsel. If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments; and to perform faithfulness is of thine own good pleasure. He hath set fire and water before thee; thou shalt stretch forth thy hand unto whichsoever thou wilt. Before man is life and death; and whichsoever he liketh, it shall be given him.'

† According to Josephus (Ant. XVII. ii. 4) they numbered above 6000 in the time of Herod.

‡ Wellhausen (op. cit. 289) says it was a title of honour and called attention, not so much to their separation, as to their eminent piety.

§ The above paragraph summarizes Schürer, *GJV*³ ii. 396–403, a very full and lucid account of the matter; cf. also Weber, Jüdische Theologie, etc., 42–46; Edersheim, i. 311 f. Schürer remarks that the question, Who is my neighbour? (Lk 10[29]), was a very important question to a Jew. The ḥābēr of a Rabbi was a Rabbi; the ḥābēr of a priest was a priest; the ḥābēr of an Israelite was an Israelite.

undertook not to sell to an 'am hā-'āreẓ any fluid or dry substance (nutriment or fruit), not to buy from him any such fluid, nor to entertain him as a guest in his own clothes (on account of their possible impurity)' (Edersheim, i. 312). Hillel 'used to say, No boor is a sinfearer; nor is the vulgar [an 'am hā-'āreẓ] pious' (Aboth, ii. 6); cf. Jn 7^{49}: 'this multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed'; also the fault found with our Saviour on account of His free intercourse with publicans and 'sinners,' Mt 9^{9-13}, Mk 2^{14-17}, Lk 5^{27-32} 7^{36-50}.

Notwithstanding the fact that they thus separated themselves from the mass of the people, they were not a religious 'sect' (Ac 15^{5} 26^{5}) in the strict sense of the term. Neither in worship nor doctrine did they separate themselves from the Jewish community at large. 'Hillel said, Separate not thyself from the congregation' (Aboth, ii. 5). They worshipped in the temple and the synagogue along with their fellow-countrymen, and the views they held as to the law, the resurrection of the body, etc., were by no means peculiar to themselves. They were, indeed, in all respects 'the classical representatives of post-exilic Judaism, (Schürer, *GJV*³ ii. 403 [HJP II. ii. 25]).

While their separation from the 'am hā-'āreẓ shows that the Pharisees were far from being democrats, they were nevertheless, at least ultimately, the popular and most influential party. They had more influence with the multitude than even the king and the high priest (XIII. x. 5, XVII. ii. 4); they had the multitude on their side (XIII. x. 6), so that the Sadducee officials had to act according to their principles (XVIII. i. 4). Even in Roman times, when the high priest was still the head of the Sanhedrin, and the Sadducees had probably the most votes, the Pharisees were the real rulers in respect of legal matters. They had influence especially with women, e.g. Alexandra Salome and the female members of Herod's household (XVII. ii. 4). They were also, according to the Gospels, the real leaders of the opposition to our Lord. Several reasons contributed to their popularity. They had more regard to the public than the Sadducees (BJ II. viii. 14); they were milder as judges (Ant. XIII. x. 6, XX. ix. 1); they shared, and indeed nourished, the national hatred against the Romans; the doctrines they held and taught, their scrupulous observance of the law, and their outwardly strict and severe manner of life caused them to be revered as pattern Israelites (XVIII. i. 3). That they courted this popularity, we learn, not only from the Gospels, but also from such sayings in the Pirke Aboth as 'Let thy house be opened wide; and let the needy be thy household' (i. 5); 'Receive every man with a pleasant expression of countenance' (i. 16); and Hillel's saying (quoted above), 'Separate not thyself from the congregation' (ii. 5).

(7) The Pharisees and the supremacy of the Gentiles. Though the Pharisees were not a political party, it is unjust to represent them as unpatriotic. Their patriotism, however, was 'religious patriotism' (Cheyne). Their ideal was the kingdom of David. What they desired was not the setting up of a merely independent secular kingdom of Israel, but an Israel reconstituted by means of the law, an Israel over which God reigned in the person of His vicegerent, and from which all 'sinners' were excluded. For the setting up of this Jewish nationality they looked, not to the adoption of political methods, but to a direct interposition of God; the great means whereby they could prepare the way for this Divine interposition was the strict carrying out of the law. So long as this was permitted, they could tolerate even a foreign yoke, as being a Divine punishment for the people's sins; only when this was not permitted, or when their principles were flagrantly outraged, did they resist with force, as in the time of Alexander Jannæus and towards the close of Herod's reign (cf. the Hasidæans in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes). Their use of political means to further their religious ends during the reign of Alexandra Salome shows that they were by no means consistent in the application of their religious principle.

A fairly correct idea of their attitude to the foreign domination may be formed from the Psalms of Solomon. The LORD, who is 'King over the heavens and judgeth kings and rulers' ($2^{34.\,36}$), is 'our King' (5^{22}), He is 'our King henceforth and even for evermore' ($17^{1.\,51}$); He is the King of the expected Messiah (v.^{38}). Because of the people's sins, He has meanwhile given them up to a foreign yoke. In $17^{5.\,6}$ ('Thou, O LORD, didst choose David to be king over Israel, and didst swear unto him touching his seed for ever, that his kingdom should not fail before Thee. But when we sinned, sinners rose up against us; they fell upon us and thrust us out: even they, to whom Thou madest no promise, took away our place with violence'), the allusion is probably to the usurpation of the high priesthood and kingship by the Hasmonæans; but the psalmist writes in the same strain of the overthrow of Jerusalem by the Romans. God not only did not prevent Pompey from casting down fenced walls with a battering-ram (2^{1}), but it was He that brought the Gentiles upon Jerusalem (2^{24} 8^{16}). God's righteousness was manifest in these judgments (2^{16} $8^{7.\,21}$); they were a judging of Israel with chastening (8^{32}; 18^{4} 'Thy chastening is upon us as upon a firstborn son only-begotten'). Still the psalmist does not conceive this foreign domination as lasting. He looks forward with confidence to a restoration of Israel under the divinely raised up, but human, Messiah ($17^{35f.}$), who puts no confidence in any carnal weapon (v.^{37}), suffers no wicked person or stranger to dwell any more among the people (vv.$^{29.\,31}$), nor any iniquity to be in their midst (vv.$^{29.\,36}$), and judges the nations and the peoples with the wisdom of his righteousness (v.^{31}). 'Blessed are they that shall be born in those days' (17^{50} 18^{7}); but the present generation must wait God's appointed time (7^{9}); they must pray for its speedy advent ($17^{23-25.\,51}$), and be prepared for it by a Divine cleansing (18^{6}: 'The LORD cleanse Israel for the day, when He shall have mercy upon them and shall bless them; even for the day of His appointing, when He shall bring back His anointed').

This was undoubtedly the attitude of the Pharisees generally to the Gentile rule. Such rule was meanwhile to be tolerated, as being a Divine chastisement (the standpoint of Pollio and Sameas, Ant. XIV. ix. 4, XV. i. 1); but it was nevertheless a violation of God's sovereignty over the elect people. God alone was king of Israel; there could be no lawful king of Israel, save God's vicegerent, the 'son of David.' In accordance with this principle they were opposed to the Hasmonæan princes (who were neither descendants of David nor of the legitimate high priestly family) and abhorred the rule of Herod and the Romans. To the former the majority of them refused the oath of allegiance (Ant. XV. x. 4, XVII. ii. 4); and they questioned the lawfulness of paying taxes to the latter (Mt $22^{17ff.}$, Mk $12^{14ff.}$, Lk $20^{22ff.}$). They thus by their teaching and practice fanned the flame of national hostility to the Romans, and were indirectly responsible for the rebellion against Rome. Josephus is anxious to separate the Zealots entirely from the Pharisees (in Ant. XVIII. i. 1. 6 he calls them a fourth philosophic sect), and draws attention to the fact that some leading Pharisees did not approve of their excesses (BJ IV. iii. 9); but he is forced to admit that it was a Pharisee, named Zadok, who along with Judas Galilæus formed that party, and that the notions they held were those of the Pharisees (Ant. XVIII. i. 1. 6, cf. BJ II. viii. 1). The Zealots were the party of political action, and simply carried out the Pharisaic principles to their logical conclusion.

iii. THE PHARISEES AND JESUS. — (1) Their opposition to our Lord. The Pharisees and scribes were the first to assume an attitude of hostility and criticism to Jesus. They maintained this attitude all through His public ministry down to the very close; for although in the last days of His life the Sadducees were most prominent, the Pharisaic scribes also took part in His trial and condemnation. They had many reasons to find fault with Him. He claimed authority to forgive sins (Mt 9^3, Mk $2^{6f.}$, Lk 5^{21}), and associated freely with publicans and 'sinners' (Mt 9^{11}, Mk 2^{16}, Lk 5^{30} 7^{39} $15^{1f.}$ 19^7); He and His disciples were indifferent to ascetic practices (Mt 9^{14}, Mk 2^{18}, Lk 5^{33}), and to levitical purity (Mt $15^{1ff.}$, Mk $7^{1ff.}$, Lk $11^{37f.}$), and were not careful to observe the Sabbath in the orthodox fashion (Mt $12^{1-8.\ 9-14}$, Mk $2^{23ff.}$ $3^{1ff.}$, Lk $6^{1ff.\ 6ff.}$ 13^{14} $14^{1ff.}$, Jn $5^{10ff.}$ $9^{13ff.}$). They accused Him of being in league with Beelzebub (Mt $12^{24ff.}$, Mk $3^{22ff.}$, Lk $11^{14ff.}$, cf. Mt 9^{34} 11^{19}), demanded a sign from Him (Mt $12^{38f.}$ 16^1, Mk 8^{11}), and attempted to frighten Him from Galilee into Judæa, where He would be more in the power of the Sanhedrin (Lk 13^{31}, cf. Plummer, St. Luke, 348). They put testing questions to Him, e.g. as to the way of inheriting eternal life (Lk $10^{25ff.}$), as to the greatest commandment (Mt $22^{34ff.}$, Mk $12^{28ff.}$), and as to the law of divorce (Mt 19^3, Mk 10^2). These were leading questions meant to test His orthodoxy, and to discredit Him, if possible, with the people (see Swete, The Gospel according to St. Mark, p. 202 on Mk 10^2: 'probably their intention was simply to place Him in apparent opposition to Moses, who had permitted divorce'). Their most skilful testing question was that as to the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar (Mt $22^{15ff.}$, Mk $12^{13ff.}$, Lk $20^{19ff.}$): whatever answer He gave, He could hardly avoid offending either the Roman authorities or the people. For their alliance with the Herodians in this matter (Mt 22^{16}, Mk 12^{13}), cf. Mk 3^6. From their standpoint their opposition to Him was inevitable. They felt instinctively that the whole spirit of His life was in flat contradiction with their most cherished convictions.

(2) Our Lord's criticism of the Pharisees. Jesus recognized that the opposition between Himself and the Pharisees was essential, and not only defended Himself against their attacks, but also criticised them keenly. He frequently denounced them as hypocrites (e.g. Mt $6^{2.\ 5.\ 16}$ 15^7 $23^{13.\ 15.\ 23.\ 25.\ 27.\ 29}$, Mk 7^6), whited sepulchres (Mt 23^{27}, cf. Lk 11^{44}), the offspring of vipers and serpents (Mt 12^{34} 23^{33}), an evil and adulterous generation (Mt 12^{39} 16^4), and blind guides (Mt 15^{14} $23^{16.\ 19.\ 24.\ 26}$); He warned His disciples against their leaven (Mt $16^{6.\ 11f.}$, Mk 8^{15}, Lk 12^1), denied that their righteousness qualified for admission into the kingdom of heaven (Mt 5^{20}), and declared that, while the publicans and harlots were entering the kingdom, they were remaining outside (Mt $21^{31f.}$). He recognized their official character, and the duty of the people towards them as authorized teachers, but He warned against following their example (Mt $23^{2f.}$). He also charged them with a great many specific vices, most of which were inherent in Pharisaic Judaism.

The fundamental principle of Pharisaic Judaism was complete separation from everything non-Jewish; hence their separation from the mass of their fellow-countrymen; hence also their devotion to the minute study and scrupulous fulfilment of the law. The law was God's great gift to Israel; their possession of the law was the most signal proof that they were God's chosen people; it separated Israel as a 'holy' people from all other peoples. It was also the only, and the absolutely perfect, means of attaining the Messianic salvation both for the individual and the nation. Life had therefore no other aim and meaning than the study and fulfilment of the law. One evil consequence of this 'idolatry of the law' was the externalizing of religion. God was conceived of mainly as Lawgiver and Judge. The religious relation between God and Israel was purely legal; it was founded on a purely legal compact. Religion was not a fellowship with God, but a strictly legal walk before God. Their zeal for the law was consequently a serving of God for the sake of reward; more especially for the supreme reward of sharing in the glory and bliss of the Messianic age. It was possible to satisfy God's demands perfectly in a legal way; and by doing so they hoped to enjoy the commanding God, whom they obeyed, as a a gracious God. This doctrine of merit led almost of necessity to a great multiplication of precepts, to a hedging or fencing of the law, so as to make its violation almost impossible. They also sought to acquire merit by doing more than was commanded. Moreover, in their keeping of the law, they considered mainly whether a particular action was commanded or forbidden. Their attitude to their almost deified law was external, formal, mechanical. They laid stress not upon the rightness of an action, or upon the disposition from which it was done, but upon its being commanded and upon its formal correctness. They applied this principle even to such matters as fasting and prayer. They attached excessive importance to the precepts relating to foods and levitical purity, because the strict observance of these precepts kept them from defilement. They made the law 'only a manual of religious etiquette.' Their righteousness was thus mere formalism; their righteous man was one who kept the law, written and oral, in an external, but formally correct manner.

Our Lord's whole teaching regarding God as the Father was a criticism of Pharisaic legalism. God is not primarily Lawgiver and Judge, but the heavenly Father. Religion is fellowship with God. The religious bond uniting God and man is grace on God's part, trust and love and heartfelt obedience on the part of man. In the relation between God and man there is no room for the idea of merit (Lk 17^{7-10}). God cares for individual sinners quâ sinners, and throws the kingdom of heaven wide open to all who are willing to enter in. He sends His Son to seek and to save the lost, and rejoices greatly when any lost one comes back. He rewards men, not according to the quantity of work they have done, but in accordance with His own sovereign grace (Mt 20^{1-16}). Our Lord explicitly criticises the externalism of the Pharisees. According to Him, the basis of the ethical life is not an external authority, but the personal relation of an individual to God (cf. Mt $5^{45.\ 48}$ $18^{32f.}$, Lk 7^{47}). What He demands is not outward correctness, but inner moral life (Mt 23^{25-28}, Lk 11^{39-41}), the surrender of the whole personality (Mt 22^{37-40}), not the mere performance of a number of externally good deeds. That which 'defiles' a man is the evil condition of his own heart (Mt $15^{11ff.}$, Mk $7^{14ff.}$). No action is of any moral worth, unless it is the expression of the inward disposition (cf. what is said of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting Mt $6^{2.\ 5.\ 16}$ $9^{14f.}$). The righteousness of the kingdom of heaven is inward and spiritual; it is the fruit of a renewed heart and of a filial relation to God.

The purely formal ethics of the Pharisees led to a great many other evils. They paid no attention to the ethical content of a law. Ethically indifferent precepts were as important as those bearing on really moral duties, simply because they were contained in the law or tradition. They accordingly busied themselves with minute trifles, to which they even attached greater importance than to the discharge of duties to their fellowmen. They divorced morality and religion (Mt $15^{1ff.}$, Mk $7^{1ff.}$, Mt $23^{23f.}$, Lk 11^{42} 18^{12}, cf. Mt $5^{23f.}$ 9^{13} $12^{10ff.}$: justice and mercy, etc., are opposed by our Lord to a false way of serving God; mercy is better than sacrifice; duty to parents takes precedence of so-called religious duty; to be reconciled to one's brother is more necessary than coming to the altar; the Sabbath is 'sanctified' by doing good; 'the programme of genuine religion': 'genuinely ethical deeds are more important than the observance of ceremonial prescriptions'—Jülicher). Their externalism did not deliver them from the impulses of the natural man, such as covetousness and rapacity (Mt 23^{25}, Mk 12^{40}, Lk 20^{47}, cf. 16^{14}) and the desire of receiving honour from men (Mt $23^{6ff.}$, Mk $12^{38ff.}$, Lk 11^{43} $14^{7ff.}$ 20^{46}); while it led inevitably to casuistry (e.g. in respect of the Sabbath;* oaths, Mt 23^{16-22}; duty to God outweighing duty to man, Mt $15^{3ff.}$, Mk $7^{9ff.}$; inventing statutes virtually cancelling more irksome ones, Mt 23^{4}, Lk 11^{46}), ostentation and self-righteousness (Mt 6^{1-18} 23^{5}, Mk 12^{40}, Lk 16^{15} $18^{9ff.}$ 20^{47}), censoriousness (Lk $18^{9ff.}$), and hypocrisy (Mt 23^{25-28}, Mk 12^{40}, Lk $11^{39.\ 44}$ 16^{15} 20^{47}). They paid external homage to the great men of the past, but were altogether void of their spirit (Mt $23^{29ff.}$, Lk $11^{47ff.}$). By means of their false interpretations of scripture and their legal conception of religion they shut the kingdom of heaven both against themselves and others (Mt 23^{13}, Lk 11^{52}); while by means of their fencing of the law, they turned the commandments of God (e.g. as to the Sabbath), which were given to help men to live a true life (Mk 2^{27}), into heavy burdens, grievous to be borne (Mt 23^{4}, Lk 11^{46}). There were doubtless in our Lord's time many good men among the Pharisees, but the tendency of the whole system was to produce hypocrisy (cf. what is said of proselytes Mt 23^{15}), or, in the case of earnest and sincere souls, self-torture and a sense of estrangement from God (cf. Mt $11^{28ff.}$; see Weber, 320 f.).

PHARPAR (פַּרְפַּר, B Ἀφαρφά, A Φαρφαρά) is named by Naaman, along with the ABANAH (2 K 5^{12}), as one of the rivers of Damascus. Much has been written on the subject, but its identity is still in doubt. The Arab. Version gives Taurâ for Pharpar, but the modern Beirût revision simply transliterates Farfar. There is a local belief, for which some antiquity is claimed, that Abanah and Pharpar are represented by Nahr Baniâs or Abaniâs, and Nahr Taurâ, respectively. In favour of this, Dr. Wm. Wright argues in Nelson's Bible Treasury (p. 250), quoting the late Dr. Meshaka, one of the most learned of modern Damascenes. The old Arab geographers, however, are unaware of the pre-eminent charms of any two rivers of Damascus. Dimashki (c. A.D. 1300) speaks of seven streams into which the waters of el-Barada are divided, and mentions among the others, with no special commendation, Nahr Thaurah and Nahr Balniyas (or Bānās). So also Idrisi (A.D. 1154). But even these names are unknown to Istakhri and Ibn Haukal (A.D. 951–978), who refer to only three canals as branching off from the main stream. It is hard to see why Naaman should have ignored the river itself, flowing towards the city with full refreshing current, to extol two of the canals supplied by its waters.

The identity of Pharpar with el-A'waj is maintained by Thomson (Land and Book, iii. 359, 398, 429). The two main sources of this stream rise on the eastern slopes of Hermon, just under Ḳaṣr 'Antâr; the 'Arny to the north, and the Jennâny to the south. Below Sa'sa' the latter takes the name Sabirâny, which it retains after confluence with the 'Arny, as far as el-Kisweh, on the great hajj road. Thence to the lake it is called el-A'waj ('the crooked'). In the season of melting snows the volume of water it carries is very great; but later in the year the stream is much attenuated. Escaping from the valley, el-A'waj waters the south-eastern part of the plain of Damascus, and, splitting up into several streams, falls at last into Bahret el-Hijâneh. In the Wâdy Barbar it is natural to detect an echo of the ancient 'Pharpar'; but Thomson errs in making this Wâdy tributary to the Sabirâny. Such waters as it supplies are carried into the plain north of Jebel el-Aswad, while the Sabirâny flows to the south. The proposed identification, therefore, loses what support might be derived from similarity of name. It is, however, adopted by G. A. Smith as probable (*HGHL*¹ 642), and by Baedeker as certain (*Pal.*³ 268, 312). Dr. Wright quotes Dr. Meshaka to the effect that el-A'waj 'is not a river of Damascus at all. It is distant a ride of 3 hours from the city at the nearest point.' Against this we have the statement of Dimashki (c. 1300), 'another river (of Damascus) is called el-A'waj,' and the distance from Bawwabet Ullah to the nearest point is only 6 miles.

It is futile to seek for the Pharpar in the short stream from 'Ain Fijeh.

Beside el-Barada, with its copious and never-failing supplies, el-A'waj may seem hardly worthy of mention. But during the greater part of the year it carries down no mean volume of water; and there is no other stream near the city at all deserving the name of river. It should also be remembered that whatever ministered to the fruitfulness and beauty of any part of the famous plain would be an object of grateful pride to the Damascene soldier.

PHASELIS (Φάσηλις)*.—A city on the eastern extremity of the coast of Lycia near the Pamphylian frontier, standing apart, not only geographically,

* See Schürer, ii. 470 ff., 491 f.; Edersheim, ii. 774 ff.

* Φασηλίς wrongly in edd. of 1 Mac 15^{23}, and in some classical authors; but Φάσηλις is right, and is now printed in Strabo, p. 666, Paus. iii. 3. 8 (where older edd. have oxytone), etc. Φασηλίς was the name of a kind of vase or utensil in Alexandria.

but generally even politically, from the rest of the country. Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 36) and Stephanus Byz. actually assign it to Pamphylia; but this is erroneous. It was said to be a Dorian colony; and it became a city of great importance at a very early time, being one of those which shared in the trade with Egypt under Amasis, B.C. 570–526. It struck a series of coins in the 6th and early 5th cent. with a variety of types, among which the most noteworthy are the prow and the stern of a war galley.

These coins, which were struck on the Persian standard, cease about B.C. 466, when the Athenian confederacy became powerful on these coasts; but Thucydides (ii. 69) mentions that Phaselis was a place of consequence in the Athenian trade with Phœnicia and the Levant coasts generally. Its coinage began again about B.C. 400, and during the 4th and 3rd cents. the same types were characteristic. During that period it was a more or less independent city; but while Lycia was under the power of the Ptolemies, B.C. 276–204, Phaselis was probably under the same influence; and at the end of that time a radiated head, which is conjecturally taken as representing Ptolemy IV., appears on the prow in the reverse type.

When Seleucid power ended in B.C. 190, Phaselis commenced to use the type of Pallas. About B.C. 168 it began to strike coins with the types of the Lycian confederacy (Κοινὸν Λυκίων), founded in that year (see LYCIA); and in the 1st cent. it also struck coins which are of a different style. There can therefore be no doubt that at least in the period later than B.C. 77 (when it was captured by Servilius Isauricus), it ceased to be a member of the Lycian confederacy; and Strabo mentions that it was not a member in his time (B.C. 64–A.D. 19). But Mr. G. F. Hill, in his Catalogue of Coins in the Brit. Museum, Lycia, p. lxvii, thinks there is no reason to deny its membership during the period before B.C. 77. But the mention of Phaselis among the States to which the Roman consul sent letters in B.C. 139 in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15^{23}), proves that it was at that time a free city, distinct from the Lycian confederacy (which is also mentioned as a recipient of similar letters); and Mr. Hill admits that there is some reason to think that it was not a member of the confederacy about B.C. 100, for it must have been one of the greatest cities of Lycia, yet Artemidorus does not mention it when enumerating the six members of the first class at that period. Now, even its coins with confederacy types do not mention the name ΛΥΚΙΩΝ, as is the case with those of most cities; there are, however, occasional examples of the same omission on the coins of other Lycian cities, even during the early period of the confederacy. But, on the whole, it would appear that Phaselis either never belonged to the confederacy (but merely from alliance and common interest adopted the types), or ceased before 138 to belong to it; and the words of Cicero (Verr. ii. 4. 10, 21) suggest that it had originally been a Lycian city, but that it soon allied itself with the Cilician pirates (which led to its capture by Servilius) and separated from the Lycians.

Phaselis stood on a promontory with a very conspicuous mountain behind it. Livy (xxxvii. 23) describes this in vague and hardly accurate terms. He is evidently alluding to the vast ridge of Taurus, which rises from the coast all along the eastern part of Lycia, and is seen by sailors for a great distance out at sea; but he is hardly correct in saying that Phaselis is the first land descried by sailors on the voyage from Cilicia to Rhodes.

No coins of Phaselis are known with certainty under the Roman empire except in the time of Gordian III. (others are probably forged), which shows that it hardly maintained its ancient importance in the post-Christian period. It was a bishopric in the Byzantine time.

PHASIRON (A Φασιρών, ℵ Φασειρών, V Φαρισών).—Name of a Nabatæan tribe (1 Mac 9^{66}). Since most Nabatæan names find easy etymologies in Arabic, it ought to be possible to explain this from that language; the roots, however, which this name recalls, seem rarely used for forming proper names, except, indeed, fazara, which gives Fazūrah, a well-known tribal name. The form Pashīrōn of the Peshiṭta version makes it no easier. The name may be corrupt. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

PHASSURUS (B Φάσσορος, A Φάσσουρος, AV Phassaron), 1 Es 5^{25}=Pashhur.

PHEREZITE occurs in AV and RV of 2 Es 1^{21} and in AV of Jth 5^{16} for the more usual PERIZZITE, which is the reading of RV in the latter passage.

PHICOL (פִיכֹל, Φικόλ).—The captain of the host of Abimelech, who accompanied his master upon the occasion of the latter's entering into treaty with Abraham, Gn $21^{22.\ 32}$ (E), or Isaac, 26^{26} (J). See ABIMELECH, No. 1.

PHILADELPHIA (Φιλαδέλφεια, WH -ία).—A city in the E. part of Lydia, in the valley of the Cogamis* (an important tributary of the Hermus), on the extreme outermost slopes of Mount Tmolus. It is now a station on the railway, 28¼ miles from Sardis, 64 from Magnesia, 105 from Smyrna (by the detour which the railway makes round Mount Sipylos). It is situated only 650 feet above the sea near the upper end of the low coast valley which runs up from the gulf of Smyrna; and around it on all sides, except the road to Sardis, rise the mountains which form the rim of the great central plateau, or extend out from it towards the sea like fingers. Thus the Cogamis valley is a sort of funnel (like the Lycus valley, with its cities, see LAODICEA) in the flank of the lofty main plateau of Asia Minor. A few miles farther up the course of the river was the old city of Kallatebos, mentioned by Herodotus on the march of Xerxes, whose rank and power were probably transferred to Philadelphia, when it was founded. The name Philadelphia shows that it commemorates Attalus II. Philadelphus (so named from his affectionate and loyal conduct to his elder brother and predecessor, Eumenes II.); and it must have been founded between B.C. 189 (when Eumenes came into possession of this country) and Attalus's death in 138.

The importance of the new city lay in its relation to the cities of the upper plateau. The direct waggon and carriage road from the cities of northern Phrygia to the Ægean ran past Philadelphia to Smyrna; and a considerable part of the fertile district called the Katakekaumene, or Burnt Land, also sent its abundant vintages, fine wines, and other produce by Philadelphia to the same port (though the western Katakekaumene would send direct by Sardis to Smyrna). Strabo seems perhaps to describe Philadelphia as part of the Katakekaumene, but this is hardly accurate geographically; and his expression, on p. 579, that it was on the side of that district, must be taken strictly as denoting the outer side. That district was a broken, irregular country forming part of the great plateau, but on a lower level, like a step leading up to it. The Katakekaumene lay north and north-east from Philadelphia. It derived its name from the extraordinarily fresh and impressive traces of volcanic action which appear in it: great streams of lava, and vast heaps of cinders, looking as if they had just cooled yesterday, surround the three 'funnels' (as Strabo calls them, Devitt, or Ink-pots,* as the Turks now call them), which are the craters of volcanoes that were active down to a comparatively recent time. These blackened and bare rocks and cinder heaps encroach in irregular outline on the rich, green, fertile glens and slopes of the luxuriant country, with its ten cities, from which it derived its other name, Decapolis. Strabo (xiii. p. 628) describes Philadelphia as being constantly subject to earthquakes, so that the walls and houses could hardly stand firm; but modern experience tends to show that there is considerable exaggeration in his picture. He also says that few people lived in the city, but that most lived in the open country, and were engaged in cultivating the very fertile land. This account would suggest a somewhat simple and rustic settlement; but that is hardly the impression that one gets from other facts. Philadelphia was evidently a place of importance in the imperial organization of the province of Asia. It took the name Neokaisareia for a time in the 1st cent., being so styled on coins of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, and the name was evidently given to it under Tiberius, who aided it to recover from a great earthquake in A.D. 17. Under Vespasian it was honoured with the title Flavia. In the reign of Caracalla it received the honour of the Neokorate (see PERGAMUM).† Meetings of the Council of the province Asia, with the games called Κοινὰ Ἀσίας, were held in it, at least in later time.

* So spelt on a coin. Pliny has Cogamus.

Philadelphia was the seat of one of the seven Churches to which were sent special messages through the mouth of John, in the opening of the Apocalypse. In all probability each of the seven is to be understood as the centre and head of a district; and it would be quite a mistake to understand that there were only these seven Churches in the province. Laodicea is certainly to be taken as representative at least of the whole Lycus valley (where the Churches of Colossæ and Hierapolis had long existed), and probably also of southern Phrygia (see LAODICEA). Similarly Philadelphia stands as representative of a district; and there can be no doubt that its district consisted of the neighbouring regions of the plateau, including parts of eastern Lydia and western Phrygia. None of the valley west of it could be in its district, for the Hermus cities would fall either under Sardis or under Thyatira.

These facts, and its abundant coinage, reveal to us rather a rich and powerful city, connected by trade with a large district towards the east and north, for which it formed a centre, and thus well suited to be one of the central Churches of Christianized Asia. It is said that there has been 'set before it a door opened' (Rev 3^8), and the 'open door' doubtless refers to its position on the threshold of the eastern country, and to the rapidity with which the new religion was spreading to the plateau through the cities connected with Philadelphia. On this sense of the 'open door' compare 2 Co 2^{12}.

But it is hardly possible, in our almost complete ignorance of the inner history and circumstances of Philadelphia, to find an intimate connexion between them and the language of the address to the Church. It may, however, be noticed that in the seven letters to these Churches, it is chiefly the faults which are associated with the local circumstances, and which derive light therefrom. In so far as a Church attained Christian purity, its character rises to a higher plane; in so far as it degenerates from that high level, it becomes affected by its earthly surroundings. Now the two Churches which are addressed in terms of almost unmingled praise are Smyrna and Philadelphia; and in those two addresses we find least reference to local history and situation. Philadelphia had kept the word, and not denied the name of God. It is described in Rev 3^8 as having 'a little power'; and this is considered by some commentators to be explained and illustrated by Strabo's description of the actual city as being small. But the allusion to its 'little power' seems rather to point to the Church being a recent foundation, which had not yet acquired great strength in the city, though there is a brilliant opening before it. As a newly founded and small Church it was more likely to escape notice and persecution; and hence it is to be 'kept from the hour of trial,' 3^{10}. It is stated in 3^9 that there was a synagogue in Philadelphia. The Jews of this synagogue had degenerated greatly from the strictness of Hebrew morality and religion, had complied with the pagan customs and ways of living, and had become 'the synagogue of Satan.' Yet this synagogue was to recognize the love that God had bestowed on this Church, and to bow down before it. This apparently implies that the Jews of Philadelphia were in process of rallying to the Christian side. The Church on the whole is rebuked for no faults or weakness; but is exhorted to continue strong and energetic, as it has hitherto been; and to 'hold fast what it has.'* Great rewards are promised to those who are steadfast and win the victory. The name of God, and the name of His city, the new Jerusalem, and the new name of the writer who addresses them, are to be written on all who overcome (on this see PERGAMUM).

Philadelphia was a bishopric under the metropolitan see of Sardis, in the Byzantine period, mentioned in all the lists immediately after Sardis. It grew steadily as the Ægean coast cities tended to dwindle, and the central regions of Asia Minor to grow more important in the Byzantine period. In the last centuries of the empire it rose to a lofty pitch of heroism. It was long the bulwark of the Christians against the encroachments of the Turkish power, whose centre was at Konia or Iconium. Frederick Barbarossa was permitted to enter the city alone by its inhabitants, though they fought for two days against his army, as he was marching across Asia Minor on the fourth crusade in 1190. Andronicus Palæologus (1283-1328) recognized its importance by raising it to the rank of a metropolitan archbishopric, and making it tenth in 'the order of dignity.'† This probably implies that it now became practically the Christian centre of Lydia (in place of Sardis), although the official lists (Notitiæ Episcopatuum), with their usual conservatism (see PERGA), continue to mention it, as before, in the list of bishoprics subject to Sardis (sometimes with the added note, 'which was promoted to the rank of a metropolis,' as in Not. xiii.). In 1306 it stood a long siege by the Seljuk Turks; but, after suffering terribly from hunger, it was relieved by Roger de Flor with his Catalan troops. Again in 1324 it suffered a similar siege, and even greater extreme of hunger; but again was relieved by the Byzantine general, Alexius Philanthropenus. As the Turkish power spread westward, Philadelphia was entirely isolated, but still maintained its proud independence as a free Christian city in a Turkish land, until it was conquered by a combined army of Ottoman Turks and Byzantine imperial troops sent by the submissive emperor, in a year which is given variously between 1379 and 1390.* In 1403 it is said to have been captured by Tamerlane, who built a wall with corpses (the situation of which is still pointed out).

† See Buresch, Aus Lydien, p. 103 ff. Marquardt (Röm. Staatsverw. i. p. 341) is mistaken in saying that it was the seat of a conventus; but it was one of the places in the conventus Sardianus where the court of the conventus might be held by the proconsul.

It is remarkable that the city whose noble Christian career is intimated in the message Rev 3^{8-14} should have had the most glorious history of all the cities of Asia Minor in the long struggle against the Turks. Perhaps the only city that could vie with it was Smyrna (also highly praised in Rev); but the resistance of Smyrna was due in part to European aid, while Philadelphia maintained itself with native steadfastness and vigour. It is still to a large extent Christian. 'He that overcometh, I will make him a pillar in the sanctuary of my God, and he shall go out thence no more,' Rev 3^{12}.

The modern name of Philadelphia is Ala-Sheher, the 'reddish city' (or rather parti-coloured, with a reddish-brown tinge), so called from the colour of the hillside that slopes away backwards and upwards behind the city. It was by a mere error, due to a smattering of Turkish, that older travellers reported its name as Allah-Sheher, the City of God, which has led to a good deal of mistaken moralizing.

PHILEMON (Φιλήμων).—The correspondent to whom St. Paul addressed the charming letter which bears his name (see the following article). The name occurs with considerable frequency in inscriptions, and is found twice in literature in connexion with Phrygia, viz. in the beautiful legend of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid, Metam. viii. 631), and in Aristoph. Aves, 762. St. Paul's correspondent was most probably a native of Colossæ (cf. Philem[1] with Col 4^{17}); and in Theodoret's time his house was pointed out in that city. Tradition speaks of him as bishop of Colossæ (Apost. Const. vii. 46), and the Menæa of Nov. 22 record his martyrdom there, by stoning, in company with Apphia, Archippus, and Onesimus, in the reign of Nero. In the case of such facts as these, local tradition may generally be regarded as trustworthy, and here it falls in with the documentary evidence, for the idea that Philemon was of Laodicea is a mere guess.

Philemon was a dear and intimate friend of St. Paul (vv.[1. 22]), and probably one of his converts (v.[19]). Of the circumstances of his conversion to the Christian faith we have no record, but it may well have taken place during St. Paul's stay at Ephesus (Ac 19^{26}; but cf. also Ac 16^{6}). From the facts that he owned slaves (see ONESIMUS), and that he was noted for his hospitality and charity to his fellow-Christians (vv.[2. 5-7]), it is plain that he was a rich man. St. Paul speaks of 'the church in his house' (v.[2]), and does not scruple to bid him prepare a lodging for him against the time he should arrive in Colossæ (v.[22]). It only remains to be added that Philemon was so earnest in his work for the gospel, that St. Paul can call him a συνεργός (was this at Ephesus?), and that the tone of the apostle's appeal on behalf of Onesimus would lead us to conclude that he was a man of high and generous character, who might be expected to rise superior to the prejudices of heathendom as to the relations between master and slave. APPHIA may have been his wife, and ARCHIPPUS his son.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.—

i. External tradition.
ii. Transmission of text.
iii. Purport and analysis of the Epistle.
iv. Its internal evidence and genuineness.
v. Its place in St. Paul's life.
vi. Its attitude to slavery.

i. The earliest certain quotations from this Epistle are found in Origen (cf. Hom. xix. in Jer. 2, Comm. Series in Matt. §§ 66, 72), who expressly ascribes it to St. Paul. That Marcion accepted it is explained by Tertullian (adv. Marc. v. 21) as due to its extreme brevity. The Muratorian Canon names among the Pauline Epp. 'ad filemonem unam.' Eusebius counts it among the ὁμολογούμενα (HE iii. 25). It must have been included, if we are to judge from the extant documentary evidence, in the earliest collection of Pauline letters. The play upon words (εὔχρηστος . . . ἄχρηστος) of v.[11] is found again in Theophilus (ad Autol. i. 1), and Ignatius (Eph. ii., Magn. ii.) uses ὀναίμην as it is used in Philem [20]; but these last coincidences do not necessarily betray literary connexion, though they suggest it.

ii. The text of the Epistle is attested by the uncials ℵ A C D L P ב (this last unpublished) and F G (these omit v.[21]-end); and by the Egyptian, Syriac, and Latin VSS (of the OL we have d e f g m). Of the cursives it is sufficient to mention 17, 47, 67, 137 as specially valuable.

iii. This Epistle differs from all the other Pauline Epp. which have reached us, in that it is a strictly private letter written to an individual friend. It is possible, though not certain, that the words ἐγὼ Παῦλος ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρί (v.[19]) apply to the whole letter, which would thus have been an autograph, and not written by an amanuensis, as was St. Paul's usual habit. The Pastoral Epp., although addressed to individuals, are semi-official in character, and deal with the affairs of the whole Christian society; the nearest parallel in the NT to Philemon is 3 Jn, addressed to 'Gaius the beloved.' This characteristic of Philemon provoked prejudice against it in early times, and Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia found it necessary to defend the Epistle against the charge of secular triviality, unworthy of St. Paul, and unbefitting, as was argued, a work to be included in the sacred Canon of the NT. But modern critics from Luther to Renan have shown a keener insight, and have found in the contents of the Epistle matter for admiration rather than for depreciation.

The body of the letter is an appeal made by St. Paul to PHILEMON, a citizen of Colossæ, on behalf of ONESIMUS, a runaway slave who had come under the apostle's influence and had embraced the Christian faith. Onesimus seems (v.[18]) to have been a thief, and would in the ordinary course of things have been subjected to very severe punishment had he come again into the power of his former master Philemon. The apostle, with rare tact and delicacy, which only bring his strong sense of justice into fuller relief, asks pardon for the offender, not only as a personal favour to himself (vv.[9. 11. 14]), but on the ground of the brotherhood in Christ of master and slave (v.[16]). He does not ask directly that Onesimus shall be freed, although he indirectly suggests it (v.[21]); 'the word emancipation seems to be trembling on his lips' (Lightfoot).

An analysis of the letter may be drawn up as follows:—Salutation (vv.[1-3]); thanksgiving for Philemon's love and faith (vv.[4-7]); request that he will receive Onesimus, the bearer of the letter, with kindness (vv.[8-17]); adding the assurance that, so doing, he will gratify the writer, who hopes soon to visit Colossæ (vv.[18-22]); salutations and final benediction (vv.[23-25]).

The whole Epistle has frequently been compared to a beautiful letter written by the younger Pliny on a similar occasion (Plin. Ep. ix. 21), of which a translation is given by Lightfoot (Col. and Philem. p. 316).

iv. Considerable as is the external testimony (see i.) to the Pauline authorship of this Ep., the strongest argument for its genuineness is based on its internal evidence of truth, its witness to itself. 'Peu de pages,' says Renan, 'ont un accent de sincérité aussi prononcé. Paul seul a pu écrire ce petit chef d'œuvre.' The vocabulary of the Ep. has indeed been challenged in refutation of this general impression which it leaves upon the mind, and has been described, e.g. by Baur, as un-Pauline. As a matter of fact, the only words which do not occur again in St. Paul are ἀναπέμπειν, ἀποτίνειν, ἄχρηστος, ἐπιτάσσειν, ξενία, ὀνίνασθαι, and προσοφείλειν; and of these all but the last occur elsewhere in the NT or in the LXX.* No serious argument can be based on such a meagre list; and, on the other hand, many phrases in the letter are unmistakably Pauline. Not to lay overmuch stress on the form of salutation (v.[3]), and farewell (v.[25]), and the opening thanksgiving (vv.[4ff.]), which are in St. Paul's undoubted style, for these might be imitated by a falsarius, the diction all through is that with which we are familiar in the Pauline Epistles. We have the metaphor ὃν ἐγέννησα ἐν τοῖς δεσμοῖς which recalls 1 Co 4[15]; we have words like ἐπίγνωσις, παῤῥησία, παράκλησις; we have τάχα which only occurs again Ro 5[7]; and we have quite a number of coincidences with Eph, Col, Ph; e.g. cf. δέσμιος Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ (vv.[1] and [9]) with Eph 3[1], συνεργός and συστρατιώτης (vv.[1. 2]) with Ph 2[25], ἀνῆκον (v.[8]) with Eph 5[4] Col 3[18], συναιχμάλωτος (v.[23]) with Col 4[10], and ἀδελφὸς ἀγαπητός (v.[16]) with Eph 6[21] Col 4[7]. On the whole, not only does the artless style of the letter powerfully support its claim to be genuine, but the phraseology is strikingly like that of the other Pauline Epp., and especially Eph, Col, Ph, the Epp. of the first Roman captivity.

v. An obvious link connecting the letter with Colossians is supplied by the proper names which occur in both Epistles. Both purport to come from 'Paul and Timothy'; while writing both Paul is in captivity; in both Archippus is greeted (v.[1], Col 4[17]); Aristarchus, Mark, Epaphras, Luke, Demas join in the salutations with which the letters conclude; Onesimus a 'beloved brother' is to be the bearer of both letters, accompanied as it would seem by Tychicus (v.[16], Col 4[7]). With this agrees the fact that no greeting to Philemon is found in Colossians, because to him a separate letter had been addressed. And as Ephesians and Colossians were intrusted to the same messenger, viz. Tychicus (Eph 6[21]; Col 4[7]), we are led to the conclusion that the three Epistles, Eph, Col, Philem, were written at the same time and under the same circumstances. (See EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO).

A determination of the place of writing will help us to determine the time. As St. Paul was in captivity, the letter must have been written either from Cæsarea (Ac 24–26) or from Rome (Ac 28[30]). Tradition is all in favour of Rome, and the a priori arguments which have been alleged on the side of Cæsarea are untrustworthy.

Thus (α) it has been urged that Cæsarea being nearer to Colossæ than Rome, it would be more natural that Onesimus should fly there. But, on the contrary, a fugitive could more easily hide himself in the great metropolis. (b) If Eph, Col, Philem were carried by the same messenger from Rome, he would arrive first at Ephesus, and yet in Eph we find no commendation of Onesimus. This is explicable only, it has been supposed, on the hypothesis that Onesimus was no longer with Tychicus, having arrived at his destination (Colossæ) before the messengers reached Ephesus. But this would involve an approach from Cæsarea rather than Rome. It is a sufficient answer to this that arguments e silentio are very untrustworthy, and that no reason has been assigned why a slave like Onesimus should be singled out for mention in a letter to a Church where he was not known. (c) Philem [22] suggests that St. Paul intended to go direct to Colossæ, while Ph 2[24] speaks of his intention of going to Macedonia. This would suggest a starting-point south of Colossæ, so that that place might be visited en route to Macedonia.

But we do not know how far the apostle's plans were modified in the interval between the composition of Philemon and Philippians, nor is there any reason why he should not have proceeded from Rome to Colossæ viâ Philippi.

The positive arguments, independent of tradition, in favour of Rome are slight. E.g. from Eph 6[19] it appears that St. Paul had a certain amount of freedom while in captivity, which is hardly consistent with what we know of his imprisonment at Cæsarea and of the dangers to which he was there exposed (Ac 23[21]; but cf. 24[23]). But leaving that aside, there is at least nothing to forbid us to acquiesce in the traditional belief that it was in Rome that the apostle wrote the three letters Eph, Col, Philem, as it is evidently the place from which he wrote the kindred Epistle to the Philippians (Ph 1[13] 4[22]; cf. PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO).

The question as to the priority of Philippians to the group Eph, Col, Philem, is difficult, and there is not a great deal of evidence available. Lightfoot, Sanday (see Smith's DB[2] i. 627), and Hort (Rom. and Eph. p. 102) support the view that Philippians was written earlier than Eph, Col, Philem; but the opposite opinion, that it is the latest of the Epp. of the first Roman captivity, has also many defenders, e.g. Zahn (Einleit. i. 386, 392), Gwynn (Speaker's Comm.), and Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 358), and on the whole it seems to the present writer the more probable.

The reasons for this opinion are the following: (α) It seems from a comparison of Eph with Ph that the conditions of the apostle's imprisonment are represented as more rigorous in the latter Ep. than in the former, which contemplates a state of things like that portrayed in Ac 28[30. 31]. On the other hand, when Ph was written, he has been put on his trial, and forced to make his ἀπολογία (cf. Ph 1[16f.] 2[17. 23]). (β) Again, a comparison of Philem [22] (ἐλπίζω γὰρ ὅτι διὰ τῶν προσευχῶν ὑμῶν χαρισθήσομαι ὑμῖν) with Ph 2[24] (πέποιθα ἐν κυρίῳ ὅτι καὶ αὐτὸς ταχέως ἐλεύσομαι) taken in connexion with the joyful tone of Ph, despite the trials which the writer has endured, points to the fact that he was much more confident of his release when Ph was written than at the period of writing Philem, and this would naturally arise from the fact that his trial, which had not come on before the group of letters Eph, Col, Philem was despatched, was in progress and was already so far advanced that he could predict the issue with some confidence. (γ) Too much has been made of the fact that Luke and Aristarchus who join in the salutation to the Colossians and to Philemon are not named in Ph, for they are not named in Eph either. Yet still it falls in with the hypothesis that they had departed before Ph was written; and indeed Ph 2[20] ('I have no man likeminded [sc. with Timothy] who will care truly for your state') seems to make it certain that when Ph was despatched the companions who are named in Col, Eph, Philem had departed from the side of the apostle. The only positive argument of any weight which has been urged on the other side is that the similarities between Ro and Ph are much closer than between Ro and Eph, Col, Philemon. Lightfoot, in particular, urges that Philippians resembles the earlier rather than the later group of Pauline letters, and that therefore it must be placed before Eph, Col, Philemon. Such an argument has little force, for on any hypothesis the interval which separates Eph, Col, Philem from Ph is too brief to account for any marked change in style, supposing such to exist. And, on the other side, the undoubted parallels between Ph and the Pastoral Epp. may be brought forward (cf. e.g. 1[23] and 2[17] with 2 Ti 4[6], 4[8] with 1 Ti 3[8], 1[21] with Tit 1[11], 1[12. 25] with 1 Ti 4[15]).

We thus are inclined to place Philemon before Philippians, and therefore it will fall not quite as late in St. Paul's first captivity as that Epistle. The determination of the year of writing will depend on the system of Pauline chronology which is adopted (see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 420). It is perhaps most probable that it was written in the year A.D. 61.

vi. The conditions of social life which form the background of the Ep. are deeply interesting to

* ἰλλογεῖν (WH) occurs again in Ro 5[13] (TR in both ἰλλογεῖν).

the student of history, and the letter derives a peculiar importance from the light which it throws on the attitude of the early preachers of the gospel to the institution of slavery. It is not condemned, nor (as has been said already, § iii.) does St. Paul even advocate directly the emancipation of Onesimus. Christianity did not attempt all at once to abolish an institution which was so deep rooted in Roman social life, however inconsistent it was with the religion of the Incarnation. Indeed the revelation of the brotherhood of men in Christ made it especially necessary to emphasize (as the apostles did) the fact that social differences were not thereby obliterated. Even if (which is doubtful) St. Paul was so much in advance of his age as to have grasped the idea that no man has a right to own another, to have proclaimed the iniquity of slavery to a world which was not prepared for it would have exposed society to the frightful dangers of a bellum servile, on the one hand, and would, on the other, have done more to arouse the hostility of the Roman imperial authorities than any other proclamation could have effected. Christians had to show at the very outset that Christianity was not inconsistent with good citizenship, and that the reforms which it hoped to promote in social life would not be imposed violently from without, but that they would be the outcome of the development of the national conscience, in which the seed of the gospel was to grow and fructify, secretly but surely, as the leaven spreads in the meal. And the event has justified the policy. Slowly and steadily, as Christianity spread, did the condition of the slave improve in imperial Rome; until at last the time came when it was possible for the Church, with a fuller recognition of the implications of the creed, and without danger to her own corporate life, to preach emancipation. And the letter to Philemon is the first indication in Christian literature that the problem of the relation of master to slave must be seriously affected by the new conception of the brotherhood of man, which Christ's apostles had set themselves to proclaim.

LITERATURE.—Lightfoot on Colossians and Philemon is the best; von Soden (Hand-Commentar) and Vincent (Internat. Crit. Comm.) are also valuable; and Abp. Alexander's comm. in the Speaker's Comm. is picturesque and full of matter.

PHILETUS (Φίλητος) is mentioned along with Hymenæus in 2 Ti 2^{17} as sharing in the same heresy regarding the resurrection. The nature of that heresy has been already explained in the article on Hymenæus (which see), and it is sufficient to state here that it consisted in doing away with anything in the nature of a bodily resurrection, and resolving all Scripture references to such a state into figure or metaphor. For full particulars regarding the men and their heresy, reference may be made to J. G. Walch, Miscell. Sacra, p. 81 ff.; and to F. R. Walch, Hist. der Ketzereien, i. 125 ff. See also Ellicott on The Pastoral Epp. in loc., and Burton, Bampton Lect., Note 59, p. 428.

The names of Philetus and Hymenæus occur separately among those of Cæsar's household whose relics have been found in the Columbaria at Rome.

PHILIP (Φίλιππος).—1. King of Macedonia, B.C. 359–336, and father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac 1^1 6^2). 2. A Phrygian, who was left by Antiochus Epiphanes as governor of Jerusalem, after he had plundered the temple in B.C. 170 (2 Mac 5^{22}). Philip is described as being 'in character more barbarous than him that set him there,' and he showed his cruelty by burning certain fugitive Jews, who had taken refuge in caves, and scrupled to defend themselves on the Sabbath (ib. 6^{11}). He was the first to take measures against Judas Maccabæus (ib. 8^8), and is often identified with—3. A 'friend' and foster-brother (σύντροφος) of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 8^{2a}). This view is supported by Zöckler, but the grounds of the identification are somewhat precarious (cf. Rawlinson in Speaker's Comm.). Epiphanes on his deathbed gave his ring to Philip, and appointed him chancellor and guardian of his son, Antiochus V. (1 Mac $6^{14f.}$). Lysias, however, gained possession of the young king, and seized the supreme power. Philip, returning with the army from Persia, occupied Antioch, whereupon Lysias, who with Antiochus Eupator was prosecuting the war in Palestine, hastily made terms with Judas Maccabæus and returned to Syria (ib. 6^{55-63}). Lysias took Antioch, and according to Josephus (Ant. XII. ix. 7) put Philip to death. The statement that, on the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Philip took refuge in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor (2 Mac 9^{29}), cannot be reconciled with our other authorities; and 2 Mac alludes elsewhere (13^{23}) to Philip's attempt to establish his authority as regent. 4. Philip V., king of Macedonia, B.C. 220–179. His overthrow in battle is mentioned as one of the great achievements of the Romans (1 Mac 8^5). An able and energetic monarch, he extended his power in Greece and Epirus, and in B.C. 215 made an alliance with Hannibal. The war with Rome, however, was not carried on with much energy, and after some years a hollow peace was made. In the year 200 the Romans again declared war, but gained little advantage till the supreme command was entrusted to T. Quinctius Flaminius, by whom Philip was completely defeated at Cynoscephalæ in Thessaly (B.C. 197), and forced to accept humiliating terms. During the remaining years of his life he attempted to recover something of his former power, but his cruel and suspicious conduct alienated his subjects, while he was continually troubled by disputes between his two sons. He was at last induced to put his younger son Demetrius to death, and dying shortly afterwards was succeeded by Perseus (which see).

PHILIP (Φίλιππος, Philippus).—1. THE APOSTLE. One of the Twelve, belonging to Bethsaida of Galilee (Jn 12^{21}), the fourth of those who attached themselves to Christ as followers, and the first whom our Lord directly called (1^{43}). He had probably been, like his fellow-townsmen Andrew and Peter, a disciple of John the Baptist; for his call took place near 'Bethany beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing,' on the day after Christ's interview with Simon Peter, when Jesus purposed (ἐθέλησεν) to leave the district for Galilee ($1^{28.43}$).

Himself 'masterfast,' Philip, either at Bethany or on his arrival, along with Jesus, at Cana, communicates his discovery of the Messiah foretold in the OT to his friend Nathanael, describing Jesus (in accordance with his defective information at the time) as the son of Joseph (1^{45}). Unable to meet directly Nathanael's objection to an alleged Messiah sprung from Nazareth (see NATHANAEL), Philip wisely falls back on experimental evidence, invites Nathanael to 'come and see,' and is the means of his friend's coming, not only into the Master's presence, but under His saving power ($1^{46ff.}$). When the Twelve are chosen, Philip becomes one of the second quartette, at whose head, in each list, his name stands (Mt 10^3, Mk 3^{18}, Lk 6^{14}). He appears thrice otherwise in the Gospel history; and all the references to him (except the bare statement that he was one of the Twelve) are made by his fellow-townsman John, who, writing probably after all his fellow-apostles were dead, appears anxious, in the case of Philip and Andrew, to rescue from oblivion or obscurity, through a few significant reminiscences, some characteristics of those two friends of his youth.

Philip's prompt reply to our Lord's inquiry in Jn $6^{5ff.}$ suggests that he had anticipated his Master's compassionate desire to feed the multitude in the wilderness, and had reckoned up (privately, but not unobserved by Jesus) the minimum sum required for the purpose,* without any thought, seemingly, of miraculous intervention. Philip's Greek name, given to him, perhaps, in honour of Philip the tetrarch (Lk 3^{1}), led probably to the 'Greeks who came up to worship at the feast' selecting him as a medium of introduction to Christ; but it was an appropriate coincidence that those who wished to 'see Jesus' should have applied to one who had said to Nathanael, 'Come and see.' Philip's application to Andrew (who also bore a Greek name, and, like Philip, had brought another into Christ's presence), to take part, as principal (Jn 12^{22} RV), in the desired introduction, arose probably not from any doubt as to our Lord's willingness (Jn 10^{16}), but from modesty and a sense of the importance of the occasion. The request of Philip, on the occasion of Christ's address on the night before the Passion (14^{8}), for some such revelation, presumably, of God the Father as Moses had enjoyed (Ex $33^{18ff.}$), indicates the union of earnest religious aspiration with somewhat dull spiritual apprehension. He was seeking after the shadow of a theophany, when the substance of the incarnation was already given to him; just as he had formerly concerned himself about the need of 200 pence, when the riches of Christ's miraculous power were available. Philip's motto appears to have been 'Seeing is Believing,' both in the signification of undue dependence upon testimony addressed to the senses, and in the worthier meaning of an appreciation of the value of experimental evidence. The main lesson to be learned from the incidents of Philip's history as related in the Gospel is this, that while a sincere believer needs to be thoroughly 'proved' (Jn 6^{6}) and instructed before he is fit to 'go forth' as a leader and pastor of the Church; on the other hand, if the portion of truth already apprehended be faithfully held, he may, amid defective knowledge (Jn 1^{45} 'son of Joseph') and imperfect spiritual insight, possess the genuinely missionary spirit, be instrumental in leading others to Christ, and advance the kingdom of heaven.†

Philip's life and work after the Ascension are obscured by the widely prevalent confusion in early times between this apostle and the evangelist Philip, who was one of the 'Seven.'‡ The confusion arose, doubtless, from the wider use, after Pentecost, of the word 'apostle,' as including others besides the Twelve (see APOSTLE). It seems best to accept as reliable the earliest distinct testimony regarding Philip's later career furnished by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus in the latter part of the 2nd cent., who was likely to have been well-informed. Polycrates (quoted by Eusebius, iii. 31) states that Philip, 'one of the Twelve,' lived as one of the 'great lights of Asia,' and is 'buried at Hierapolis along with his two aged virgin daughters'; and he adds that another daughter, who 'lived in (fellowship with) the Holy Spirit,' was buried at Ephesus.* The statement of Polycrates is supported by the apocryphal Journeyings of Philip the Apostle (3rd cent.), which represent Hierapolis as the chief scene of his labours, and associate him significantly with Bartholomew (who is described, however, as one of the Seventy); by Theodoret, the historian, who records in his Commentary on Ps 116 [Eng. 117] that 'the apostle Philip controverted the error of the Phrygians' (to whose country Hierapolis belonged); by pseudo-Dorotheus, who states in his Synopsis that Philip of Bethsaida preached in Phrygia, and is buried with his daughters in Hierapolis; and by pseudo-Epiphanius, who makes a similar declaration (Lipsius, Apokr. Apost. i. pp. 211–213, iii. 25, 26).† In substantial harmony, so far, with Polycrates is his contemporary Clement of Alexandria, who states (Strom. iii. 6) that the 'apostles Peter and Philip begat children,' and that the latter apostle 'gave his daughters in marriage' (which would account for the burial of one daughter in Ephesus and not in Hierapolis). The fact of Philip the Evangelist having had four virgin daughters who prophesied, does not invalidate the early testimony to Philip the Apostle having also had notable daughters, although it may have led to confusion on the part of later or less well-informed writers; and the apostle's settlement and labours in Asia Minor harmonize with the introduction of his name on three occasions into the Gospel written at Ephesus by St. John.‡

Regarding Philip's labours prior to his settlement in Hierapolis, the traditions are divergent. The Journeyings represent him as travelling through Lydia and Asia; in the apocryphal Acts of Philip, Upper Hellas, particularly Athens (where he is said to have abode for two years, and to have founded a Church, appointing presbyters and deacons), and afterwards Parthia, are the scenes of his ministry; while later Latin documents attribute to him the evangelization of the Gauls (Galatians?) and Scythians (Lipsius, iii. 26, 50, E. 19; Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. ii. 736). Similarly conflicting are the traditions regarding the manner of Philip's death. A natural decease appears to be indicated by Clement of Alex. (Strom. iv. 9), pseudo-Doroth., pseudo-Epiphan., and the Latin Passio Philippi (according to the last-mentioned, at the age of

* A denarius or 'penny' (about 9½d.) purchased 12 wheat or 36 barley 'loaves' (Mishna, Peah, viii. 7 and Rev 6^{6})—round cakes an inch thick and a span in diameter. 200 'pence' would thus procure a scant meal (Jer 37^{21}, Lk 11^{6}) for 5000 men and 2200 women and children.

† Clement of Alex. (Strom. iii. 4) records a tradition that Philip was the disciple referred to in Mt 8^{21} as asking Christ for permission 'first to go and bury my father.' If so, the incident belongs to Philip's call, not to discipleship, but to apostleship, when permanent departure from home was involved.

‡ Thus Tertullian (de Bapt. 18) speaks of the Apostle Philip being 'snatched away from the eunuch'; the Philip of Ac 6 is referred to in the Apost. Const. vi. 7 as συναπόστολος; and in Calendars of the Coptic and Armenian Churches there is a commemoration of Philip as 'Deacon and Apostle' (Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. 645; cf. Wright, Apoc. Acts of Ap. ii. p. 69 ff., where the history is given of Philip, 'Apostle and Evangelist'). Even Eusebius shares in the confusion (HE iii. 31).

* Eus. (HE iii. 39) refers to a still earlier testimony in the same direction by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis (first half of 2nd cent.), to the effect that the daughters of Philip the apostle had told him (Papias) about a man raised from the dead in their father's time. As Eus., however, does not quote the exact words of Papias, and as the historian himself confused the two Philips, this reference must be regarded as uncertain.

† In a recently discovered ancient Christian inscription at Hierapolis reference is made to a Church τοῦ ἐνδόξου ἀποστόλου καὶ θεολόγου Φιλίππου (Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, p. 552). Although Philip the Evangelist is sometimes called ἀπόστολος in the wide sense (see above), so formal an ascription of apostleship is not likely to have been made except to one of the Twelve.

‡ The earliest and strongest testimony in favour of the Philip who settled in Hierapolis being the evangelist, is the statement in Eusebius (HE iii. 31), that in a dialogue held at Rome early in the 3rd cent. between Caius and Proclus a Montanist, the latter is represented as referring to 'four prophetesses, daughters of Philip, whose tomb, as well as that of their father, was at Hierapolis.' It is, of course, not absolutely impossible that both Philips were buried with their respective daughters in the same city; but, assuming the improbability of such a coincidence, it is a tenable supposition that either Eus. (through his own ideas being confused) misunderstood, so far, Proclus, or that Proclus himself, knowing about 'daughters of Philip' buried at Hierapolis, assumed mistakenly that these belonged to Philip the Evangelist. The tradition, moreover, which identifies the Philip of Hierapolis with the evangelist is neutralized by the counter-tradition, according to which the latter became bishop of Tralles (see next article).

87). Other ancient authorities ascribe martyrdom to the apostle. Pseudo-Hippol., the Journeyings, and the Æthiopian Acts represent him as crucified head downwards (according to the first document, under Domitian; according to the second, in the reign of Trajan); while several Latin martyrologies and an ancient Irish Passio relate that he was first stoned, then crucified (Lipsius, iii. 25, 26, 48, 50, E. 73; Atkinson, Passions and Homilies from Leabhar Breac, pp. 112, 358).

2. PHILIP THE EVANGELIST.—One of the Seven chosen by the primitive Church at Jerusalem, and ordained by the apostles (Ac 6) to take charge of the daily ministration of charity to the Christian widows and other poor (see DEACON). If not a Hellenist Jew, he was a Hebrew with conspicuously liberal sympathies. After the outbreak of persecution, inaugurated with the martyrdom of his colleague Stephen, Philip, hindered in the fulfilment of one office, straightway entered on the work of another. He was one of those who departed from Jerusalem for missionary ministry (8[4. 5]). As Stephen was the forerunner of Paul in unfolding the relation of Christianity to Judaism and in repudiating the Jewish claim to a monopoly of Divine favour, so Philip was the precursor of the Apostle of the Gentiles in missionary zeal, and particularly in opening the door of the Church's fellowship to non-Jewish believers. (1) He selected as his first missionary field the (chief) city of Samaria (Ac 8[5] RV), i.e. either Sebaste (Samaria) or Neapolis (Sychem). The Samaritans, notwithstanding their partial Hebrew descent and partial acceptance of Judaism (including circumcision), were rigidly excluded from the Jewish Church, and were denied even the privilege, accorded to heathens, of becoming proselytes. To this people Philip, mindful doubtless of our Lord's own Samaritan ministry (Jn 4), proclaimed the Gospel and administered baptism. The inhabitants of the city had long been under the influence of SIMON MAGUS (which see), whom his sorceries had induced them to regard as 'the Power of God which is called Great' (Ac 8[10]). Philip's preaching, supported by miracles of healing and of dispossession, was successful in transferring Samaritan allegiance from Simon to Christ. The population as a whole were baptized; and Simon himself (although with divided heart, as the issue proved) believed and received baptism. Philip's success in Samaria led to the despatch thither of Peter and John, who completed the work which the evangelist had begun. The first stage was thus reached in the development of the Christian Brotherhood out of a Jewish sect into the Catholic Church. (2) A further service in the same direction was rendered by Philip through his baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, whom he met, by Divine suggestion and providential arrangement, on the road between Jerusalem and Gaza (Ac 8[26ff.]).* This eunuch, who held the high office of treasurer to CANDACE (which see), queen of the Ethiopians, had apparently become, in his native land, a 'proselyte of the gate'† to Judaism, and was returning home, after worship in the temple, on the occasion, presumably, of one of the great annual festivals. Philip's conduct in relation to the eunuch notably exemplifies trustful obedience to Divine leadings (Ac 8[27]), alertness in availing himself of missionary opportunity (8[30]), and broad-minded disregard of national and religious prejudice (8[38]). The Ethiopian, as a descendant of Ham, belonged to a despised race (Nu 12[1], Am 9[7]), and, if literally a eunuch, was inadmissible into the full membership of the Jewish Church (Dt 23[1]). Philip by the reception of this man into the Christian Church, virtually declared that disabilities of race and outward condition have no place there, but that all who believe in Christ are eligible for membership and baptism.* It was probably Philip's signal service to the cause of Church extension on these two occasions which led, at least in part, to the designation of him as the evangelist (Ac 21[8]).

After the baptism of the Ethiopian, Philip evangelized the country between Azotus (Ashdod) and Cæsarea, which, according to tradition, was his birthplace (see documents quoted by Lipsius, Apokr. Apos. iii. 2, 40), and where eventually he took up his abode (Ac 21[8]). There, along with four virgin daughters who were prophetesses,† he was found residing, more than 20 years later, by St. Paul and his friends, who remained for some days as guests in his house, on their way to Jerusalem. During the apostle's protracted imprisonment at Cæsarea we may assume there would be much intercourse (Ac 24[23]) between Philip and one with whose missionary zeal and broad ecclesiastical views the evangelist would be in full sympathy. Among those who were in Cæsarea along with St. Paul (at least during part of the time) was St. Luke (Ac 27[2]); and the details of Philip's early evangelistic ministry, recorded in Ac, were doubtless, at this time, communicated to Luke by Philip himself. The historical credibility, therefore, of the narrative in Ac 8 can be questioned only by those who dogmatically reject all records of what is supernatural (Ac 8[7. 26. 39]).‡

In 65 A.D. the revolt which developed into the great Jewish war broke out at Cæsarea; and Philip, like other Jewish Christians, would probably leave Palestine before the fatal issue. We are prepared, accordingly, for traditions which indicate his ultimate settlement elsewhere. These traditions are divergent. (1) The earlier connects the evangelist and his daughters with Hierapolis (see note ‡ on p. 835[b]), but is rendered doubtful by the manifest confusion which existed as to the two Philips. It appears to the present writer much less worthy of acceptance than (2) the tradition which represents Philip, with his daughters, as settling at Tralles§ in Asia Minor, as performing

* According to Jerome (Epist. 103) and a Roman martyrology (quoted by Lipsius, iii. 3), the baptism took place at Bethsoron, near Hebron.

† The word εὐνοῦχος is sometimes applied to a high court-official, without implying castration (Gn 39[1] LXX); but this treasurer, owing to his employment in a confidential capacity under a queen, would most probably be a eunuch literally (see ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH). Such a condition would prevent him from becoming a 'proselyte of righteousness,' but was not incompatible with his admission to worship in the temple as a 'proselyte of the gate' (Is 56[4. 5]). The supposition that he was a Jew, born in Ethiopia, is hardly consistent with the natural interpretation of the passage. The one argument in its favour, viz. that no such objection seems to have been raised to Philip's procedure as was made in the case of Peter and Cornelius (Stokes, Acts of the Apostles, i. p. 412), is met by the fact that the baptism of Cornelius and his household was notorious, having been, in a manner, publicly administered (Ac 10[24 33]); whereas the Ethiopian was baptized without witnesses and the circumstances would probably, at the time, become known only to a limited and sympathetic circle.

* According to an old Ethiopic tradition, the eunuch is represented as having evangelized the subjects of Candace or Hendake (Ludolf, Hist. Æthiop. iii. 1, 2; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Ecc. ii. 6).

† Jerome (Epist. 108) states that the chambers of the four daughters were still shown at Cæsarea in his day. An ancient Greek menologium (quoted by Lipsius, iii. 3) records their names as Hermione, Charitine, Irais, and Eutychiane. Hermione is stated by the same authority to have practised medicine, and to have been thrown, without injury, into a caldron of boiling water in the reign of Hadrian.

‡ It is open for us, however, although not necessary, to regard the interventions referred to in 8[26. 39] as made through natural means; in the former case through a dream, in the latter through a divinely produced impulse of Philip's own mind (Stokes and Holtzmann, in locis).

§ This city is usually understood to be the more celebrated Tralles in Caria; but, if we suppose it to be the other Tralles there many miracles, and as becoming ἐπίσκοπος or ἐπίτροπος of the Church which he was mainly instrumental in building up in that city (pseudo-Doroth. Synopsis; Martyr. Basilii; Joseph. Hymnographus; and other authorities quoted in Acta Sanctorum, xxi. p. 608 ff., and by Lips. iii. 2, 3). In favour of the latter tradition is the fact of its being associated, not like the former, with both Philips, but with the evangelist alone. According to most forms of the tradition, he died a natural death at Tralles; but one authority (a Greek menologium, quoted by Lips. l.c.) represents him as suffering martyrdom there.

PHILIPPI (Φίλιπποι).—Philippi, in Turkish Felibedjik or Little Philippi, to distinguish it from Philippopolis in Bulgaria, was founded (or rather re-founded, for an earlier town had existed on the site) by Philip of Macedon in the middle of the 4th cent. and called after his name. It was situated in eastern Macedonia—so near Thrace that it is sometimes spoken of as Thracian—on a steep hill rising at the edge of a great plain which stretches far inland to the north and north-west. In the opposite direction stood its port of Neapolis (the modern Kavala), 8 or 9 miles distant, at the nearest point of the coast: the road connecting the two, part of the great Egnatian road which ran across from the Ægean to the Adriatic, passed through a depression in a line of hills which stretch east and south-east of Philippi and cut it off from the sea. An immense marsh lay directly south of the town, fed by the springs which gave it its older name of Crenides. At the present time two streams pass one on each side of Philippi, but at some short distance from it,—the larger rising on the east and flowing to the south of the town,—and fall into this lake or marsh, which in turn is itself a source, though not the main one, of the river Dramenica, a tributary of the Strymon. If ancient authorities, however, are to be trusted, this river, known as Angitas or Gangites or Gangas, derived its name from the Philippi branch. Where the country is so marshy, the configuration of the streams may have altered since St. Paul's day.

Philippi, with the rest of the dominions of Perseus, king of Macedonia, fell under Roman domination by the victory of the consul Æmilius Paullus in 168 B.C., whose reorganization of the conquered territory, while it preserved municipal freedom and self-government and diminished taxes, aimed at destroying the political unity of Macedonia by a division into four regions; a division so strictly carried out that an inhabitant of one region could neither intermarry with nor hold property in another. Of these regions the first, which had Amphipolis for its capital, included the whole district east of the Strymon, and therewith Philippi. It is, however, doubtful to what extent this system of tetrarchies survived the formal establishment of Macedonia as a province (A.D. 146).

The event which differentiated the fate of Philippi from that of Macedonia at large was of much later date. In the autumn of B.C. 42 the party which had brought about Cæsar's death in the hope of restoring the republic was finally extinguished in the defeat of Brutus and Cassius by Antony and Octavian (afterwards Augustus) outside the walls of Philippi. The colony of Philippi, Colonia Augusta Julia [Victrix]* Philippensium, was founded, as the name Julia implies, in honour of the victory of the cause of Julius Cæsar (cf. Strabo, vii. fr. 41, κατοικία μικρά, ηὐξήθη δὲ μετὰ τὴν περὶ Βροῦτον καὶ Κάσσιον ἥτταν): and the first citizens, if we may judge from the phrase cohors praet. Phil. upon the coins, were soldiers of the bodyguard of Antony and Octavian. A second foundation by Augustus after the battle of Actium eleven years later, when many of the dispossessed partisans of Antony in Italy were transplanted to Dyrrhachium and Philippi (Dio, li. 4, § 6), is commemorated by the other title Augusta. The territory of the colony included Neapolis.

Each Roman colony was a fresh representation of the Roman people in miniature. The magistrates, elected by the citizens, or rather by the senate of the colony, fulfilled on a small scale the functions of their prototypes in Rome, and like them were attended by lictors bearing fasces or bundles of rods: their authority, within their district and over its inhabitants, excluded even that of the governor of the province. And Philippi, besides the normal privileges of all colonies, possessed as well the ius Italicum, or exemption for its territory from the rent ordinarily reserved for the Roman state over conquered countries.

About a hundred Latin inscriptions survive from Philippi: the most interesting, CIL III. i. 633, records the names of a collegium or burial guild recruited from the lower classes (including out of a total of 69, 4 slaves of the colonia and 3 of private persons), and entitled cultores or sodales Silvani. The guild had its sacerdos, its junior [sacerdos], and its aedilis, and had erected a temple (the gifts for which are recorded) to its tutelary deity.

Christianity first made its way to Philippi, as far as we know, in the person of St. Paul. Somewhere about A.D. 50, perhaps most probably in the spring of that year (see CHRONOLOGY OF NEW TESTAMENT, vol. i. p. 422), the apostle in the course of his second missionary journey crossed for the first time from Asia, and having set foot on European ground at the seaport of Neapolis, pushed on without delay to the mother city of Philippi, where sufficient stay was made to preach and found a Church. His companions were, from Antioch Silas (Ac 15[40]), from Lystra Timothy (16[1]), from Troas Luke (16[10], where the first person plural commences in the narrative).

St. Luke describes Philippi as πρώτη τῆς μερίδος Μακεδονίας πόλις κολωνία, a phrase which, as it stands, must mean either 'the first city in rank,' or 'the first city they came to,' in (that) district of Macedonia. The objections to either interpretation are serious. (1) Philippi was not the first city in rank, for Thessalonica was the capital of Macedonia as a whole, while in S.E. Macedonia, Amphipolis, distant only 30 miles from Philippi, was not only the capital of the region in the original Roman tetrarchy (see above), but was still in St. Luke's day much more than its equal in importance: Amphipolis had a separate issue of coins for the reign of each of the emperors from Augustus to Nero, while for the same period Philippi was apparently content with two, one under Augustus and one under Claudius. (2) Nor is the translation 'first city to come to' any more satisfactory. As a matter of fact the apostle first set foot in Neapolis; and in so far as Neapolis was Thracian (so Bp. Lightfoot, Philippians[4], p. 50, n. 1), Philippi must have been the same, since Neapolis was in the territory of Philippi (CIL III. i. p. 120). And if the geography of this interpretation is doubtful, its grammar is impossible: πρώτη is never used in this sense without qualifying words (Field, Notes on the Translation of the New Test. ad loc., quoting πρώτη μετὰ τὴν Γαλατίαν, πρώτη . . . πρὸς μεσημβρίαν, πρώτη . . . ἰόντι ἀπ' Ἀχαΐης). Moreover, in either translation the τῆς before μερίδος is intolerably awkward, and so the older scribes felt: B drops the article, and the Bezan reviser (D) substitutes for πρώτη τῆς μερίδος the single word κεφαλή.

in Lydia, which was also the seat of a bishopric (Hierocles, Notitiæ Episc. p. 168), and was distant from Hierapolis only fifteen miles, the proximity of the two cities would account the more easily for Philip the Evangelist, as well as Philip the Apostle, being associated with Hierapolis.

* Ramsay, Journal of Theological Studies, Oct. 1899, p. 116, follows Head, Historia Numorum, p. 192, in adding Victrix: but Mommsen, CIL III. i. 660, denies the title; and it does not seem to be sufficiently proved from the coins.

Hort (New Testament in Greek, Appendix, ad loc.) attempted to escape these difficulties by reading Πιερίδος for μερίδος, 'a chief city of Pierian Macedonia.' But if we are to emend, it is better to read πρώτης for πρώτη τῆς, 'a city of the first region of Macedonia and a colony.' This simple emendation—it may have arisen either by the accidental reduplication of the letters τη, or from a misunderstanding of the correction if by mistake πρώτη was written originally, and -της written over it to correct it—occurred first to Joannes Clericus (according to Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 68, but we have not been able to verify the statement) and to the unnamed friend of an English divine, James Peirce (see Peirce's Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians, ed. 1, A.D. 1725, ed. 2, A.D. 1733, p. 3, and L. M. Artemonius, Initium Evangelii S. Johannis, A.D. 1726, pt. i. p. 211); and in our own day has occurred independently to Field, op. cit. p. 124, Blass, loc. cit. and Acta Apostolorum, ad loc., and to the present writer. The only possible objections appear to be (i.) that μερίς does not mean a district or region (Hort, loc. cit.); and (ii.) that though Philippi had belonged to the 'first region,' the whole division into tetrarchies had fallen out of memory long before. But as to (i.) μερίς is in fact found as a term for subdivisions of the Egyptian 'nomes' (Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, p. 158, note); as to (ii.) there is nothing in our present knowledge to justify so sweeping an assertion (Ramsay, ib.).

St. Paul was always accustomed to commence his mission within the sphere of the religious organization of Judaism. But Philippi—unlike the Cypriot towns, Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Thessalonica, Berœa, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus (Ac $13^{5.14}$ 14^{1} $17^{1.10.17}$ 18^{4} 19^{8})—possessed apparently no synagogue, so small was the number and importance of the Jews there, and on the Sabbath St. Paul found the few Jewish worshippers at prayers beyond the gates of the city by the riverside. If we ask ourselves why under such circumstances St. Paul stopped at Philippi, the most probable answer is that what attracted him was exactly the feature which accounted for the paucity of Jews, namely, that it was not an ordinary Greek town but a Roman colony: Rome and things Roman were uppermost in the mind of St. Paul.

The reading of the Textus Receptus is οὗ ἐνομίζετο προσευχὴ εἶναι, 'where there was accustomed to be prayer'; and Blass's conjecture, ad loc., ἐνόμιζον ἐν προσευχῇ εἶναι, gives a similar sense. The Western authorities, however (ἐδόκει προσευχὴ εἶναι, D; oratio esse uidebatur, latt.), as well as Westcott and Hort (ἐνομίζομεν προσευχὴν εἶναι, but no single uncial gives exactly this reading), say nothing about the habitual character of the worship there; and it would be possible, if St. Paul's visit could coincide with one of the great Jewish fasts (those of the 4th, 5th, 7th, and 10th months, Zec 8^{19}), to suppose that the riverside worship was due only to the solemnities of the day. Compare Tertullian, de ieiunio 16, 'Iudaicum certe ieiunium ubique celebratur, cum omissis templis per omne littus quocumque in aperto aliquando iam precem ad cælum mittunt'; by which we ought perhaps to interpret the more general words of the Decree of the Halicarnassians (Josephus, Antiquities, XIV. x. 23), τὰ σάββατα ἄγειν καὶ τὰ ἱερὰ συντελεῖν . . . καὶ τὰς προσευχὰς ποιεῖσθαι πρὸς τῇ θαλάττῃ κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος. Where no seashore was available, any open place, quocumque in aperto, appears to have answered the purpose. It will be noted that both authorities specially mention 'prayer' or 'prayers' as the distinguishing mark of this open-air service, just as St. Luke does for Philippi.* On the whole it is more probable that we are to understand that the open space by the river was the normal scene of what Jewish worship there was at Philippi.

That St. Paul 'sat' and so spoke 'to the women who had gathered' there, appears to imply both a contrast to the more formal procedure of a synagogue (St. Paul stands to preach at Pisidian Antioch, Ac 13^{16}, yet see Lk $4^{20.21}$), and also the non-existence of many worshippers beyond the (Gentile) women who here as elsewhere, especially in Macedonia (Ac 13^{50} $17^{4.12}$), were attracted to Judaism. From this class, at any rate, was drawn the first convert, Lydia the purple seller of Thyatira, who was followed by the whole familia of which she was the mistress; her house became the home of the apostle and the centre of the Philippian Church (see LYDIA, and cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Roman Traveller, p. 214).

Among the women influenced by St. Paul, either as an attendant at the preaching by the riverside, or simply from the general spread of interest in the strangers and in the novel faith they were propagating in Philippi, was a slave girl, who performed in a small way the functions of an oracle, and gave answers like one under inspiration to whatever questions might be asked of her, her owners, of course, reaping the benefit of the fees paid for the privilege of inquiry.

* There appears to be little or no evidence for any technical use of προσευχή in the sense of an informal 'place of prayer' as opposed to 'synagogue.' See art. SYNAGOGUE.

As the pagan prophetess (like the prophetesses of the Montanists) was conceived of as the passive instrument of the spirit which inspired her, she would speak with its voice, not with her own, and so might be called (as Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 215) ventriloqua or ἐγγαστρίμυθος (thus the Witch of Endor in the Fathers is called both πυθόνισσα and ἐγγαστρίμυθος). For several points in the story, compare the description of a false prophet in the Shepherd of Hermas, Mand. xi. § 12, μισθοὺς λαμβάνει τῆς προφητείας αὐτοῦ, ἐὰν δὲ μὴ λάβῃ οὐ προφητεύει: § 2, ὡς ἐπὶ μάντιν ἔρχονται καὶ ἐπερωτῶσιν αὐτὸν τί ἄρα ἔσται αὐτοῖς: § 6, ὅλως οὐ λαλεῖ ἐὰν μὴ ἐπερωτηθῇ: § 13, κατὰ γωνίαν αὐτοῖς προφητεύει

Daily as St. Paul passed to 'the (place of) prayer,' the girl, perhaps from some fixed station at a street corner, annoyed him by following and crying out that he and his companions were, like herself, 'slaves of (the) God,' divinely inspired to preach to the Philippians a 'way of salvation,'—a form of recommendation not at all after the mind of St. Paul,—till at last one day he turned and made use of those powers of exorcism which the early Christians never for a moment doubted that they could wield, 'in the name of Jesus Christ,' over the spirits that 'possessed' such pagan devotees. The girl, whose belief in him was no doubt very real, lost from that day forward her supposed gift; and her owners (the injury to their gains making them keenly susceptible to the injury to their religion) seized Paul and his chief companion, Silas, dragged them to the forum,—the great open space in a Roman city on to which the law-courts would look,—and brought them before the magistrates on the double charge of violating public order (ἐκταράσσουσιν τὴν πόλιν) and of preaching rites which for Romans at least, whatever might be the case with others, it would be illegal to accept or carry out (καταγγέλλουσιν ἔθη ἃ οὐκ ἔξεστιν ἡμῖν παραδέχεσθαι οὐδὲ ποιεῖν Ῥωμαίοις οὖσιν).

The magistrates are called ἄρχοντες in Ac 16^{19}, στρατηγοί in $16^{20.22.35.36.38}$; and Prof. Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 217, Journal of Theological Studies, Oct. 1899, p. 115) sees in St. Luke's employment of the two terms in $16^{19.20}$ a proof that the book never received its finishing touches. ἄρχοντες was the normal Greek word for a supreme board of magistrates. στρατηγός was, in later times at least, used interchangeably with ἄρχων; but it was also the technical rendering of the Latin prætor (so ἀντιστράτηγος=proprætor); and in some colonies the highest grade of magistrates were actually called after the Roman model prætores, so that it has been questioned whether this may not have been the case at Philippi. But it would seem that this usage was confined to the period B.C. and to the oldest group of Roman colonies outside Italy, those in Gallia Narbonensis. It must be taken, then, as fairly certain that the official title of the superior magistrates was not prætor but as in other colonies duumvir. [The inscription CIL III. Suppl. No. 7339, which speaks of one who was Quæstor in Bithynia-Pontus, Cerial Ædile, Prætor-designate, Decurion or Senator, at Philippi and in Thrace, refers to the Roman Prætorship]. Duumvir, Duoviri, can be represented literally in Greek by δυανδρικός, δύο ἄνδρες; but it is beyond question that a writer like St. Luke would avoid, if possible, such awkward literalism. He could only fall back on the rough equivalent στρατηγός: and his use of this Greek phrase in no way proves either that the magistrates at Philippi were prætores, or even that they were called so by courtesy.

The trial was never carried to an end (ἀκατακρίτους, Ac 16^{37}); popular feeling had been roused, and the magistrates, in the exercise of their general power to detain and punish suspicious characters (Mommsen, Römisches Strafrecht, 1899, p. 309, n. 1), summarily ordered their lictors to scourge the prisoners. A Roman citizen was by law exempt from a form of punishment which was looked upon as degrading (ὑβρισθέντες ἐν Φιλίπποις, 1 Th 2^{2}); and since on one other occasion at least St. Paul claimed his rights (Ac 22^{25}), it is possible that at Philippi too he made a protest which passed unheard or unheeded; but as he suffered scourging altogether not less than three times (τρὶς ἐραβδίσθην, 2 Co 11[25]), it is also possible that for the moment he was silent of set purpose about his citizenship. [If it could be supposed, in face of 16[37. 38], that Silas was not a citizen, the motive of his silence would be obvious]. The prisoners were then remanded with special instructions as to their safe custody; and the gaoler, no doubt rightly interpreting this as a warning against too lenient a treatment, threw them into the inner prison and made their feet fast in the stocks.

The ἐσωτέρα φυλακή was surrounded entirely by the outer prison, and appears to have had no light and no air except through the door: for illustrations of the inner prison and stocks, cf. (1) Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (A.D. 177: Eusebius, HE v. 1), τὰς κατὰ τὴν εἱρκτὴν ἐν τῷ σκότει καὶ τῷ χαλεπωτάτῳ χωρίῳ συγκλείστους καὶ τὰς ἐν τῷ ξύλῳ διατάσεις τῶν ποδῶν ἐπὶ πέμπτον διατεινομένων τρύπημα; (2) Acts of Perpetua (A.D. 202) § 3, post paucos dies recipimur in carcerem et expaui quia numquam experta eram tales tenebras, ib. paucis horis emissi in meliorem locum carceris; § 8, die quo in neruo mansimus; (3) Acts of Pionius (A.D. 250) § 11, αἱ δεσμοφύλακες . . . ἔβαλον αὐτοὺς εἰς τὸ ἐσώτερον, but afterwards they were allowed out εἰς τὸ ἔμπροσθεν; (4) Eus. HE vi. 39, cf. Origen (c. A.D. 250), τάς τε ὑπὸ σιδηρᾷ κλοιῷ καὶ μυχοῖς εἱρκτῆς τιμωρίας καὶ ὡς . . . τοὺς πόδας ὑπὸ τέσσαρα τοῦ κολαστηρίου ξύλου παραταθεὶς διαστήματα κατασπώμενος κ.τ.λ.; (5) Cyprian, Ep. xxxvii. 3, squalorem carceris ac receptaculi poenalis horrorem; xxxix. 2, per decem nouem dies custodia carceris sæptus in neruo ac ferro fuit. Cf. Mommsen, Römisches Strafrecht, p. 302.

At midnight Paul and Silas were singing at their prayers (προσευχόμενοι ὕμνουν: Jewish liturgiology is too obscure a subject for us to say whether it formally included prayers for midnight, but Ps 119[62. 164] should not be overlooked; in any case, the 'hymns' may probably have been from the Psalter), when an earthquake shook the prison so violently that the bars of all the doors and the fetters of the prisoners gave way. The gaoler, supposing naturally that his prisoners had taken the opportunity to escape, and knowing that he would be held responsible for them, would have committed suicide if St. Paul had not been able to reassure him, and so turn him from his purpose. From that moment, if not before, it is clear that he attributed the convulsion of nature to the prayers and powers of his two prisoners; and he at once professed himself their convert. From the inner prison he removed them to his own house,—a violation of the spirit rather than of the letter of the magistrates' injunctions,—ministered to their temporal wants, and received from them spiritual instruction and baptism. As in Lydia's case, the whole household came over to Christianity with its head.

As soon as day broke, the duoviri, doubtless thinking to avoid all further complications by seeing that the objects of the riot left Philippi before the excitement should burst out afresh, sent their lictors to the prison with an order terminating all further proceedings, which, as Roman prisons were used only as places of detention before or during trial, was equivalent to a direct order of release. St. Paul refused to leave in this undignified fashion; he advertised the fact that he and Silas were citizens; and he demanded a personal acknowledgment of their error by the magistrates. This was willingly accorded as the price of the departure of the unwelcome strangers, whose citizenship not only rendered illegal the previous proceedings, but would complicate any future proceedings that the owners or the populace might choose to press against them. St. Paul, though he would not forego a formal farewell to his hostess and his converts, did not further contest the demand that he should leave Philippi, where, indeed, his presence might for the moment hinder rather than further the work of the gospel. But the foundations of a flourishing Church had been laid; and Luke, the writer of the Acts, was (to judge from the dropping of the first person plural between 16[17] and 20[5]) left in charge of it.

Five years later (perhaps in A.D. 55) St Paul, on his way to Corinth in the course of the third missionary journey, passed again through Macedonia and exhorted at length the Christians of 'those parts' (παρακαλέσας αὐτοὺς λόγῳ πολλῷ, Ac 20[2]). We may be certain that a visit to Philippi was included, for the time occupied in travelling from Ephesus to Corinth was apparently as much as six months (cf. 1 Co 16[8] with Ac 20[2. 6]). On his return from Corinth in the early spring he paid another and unintended visit (Ac 20[3]), the last of which we have a definite record; and though it delayed the journey to Jerusalem, which he was so anxious to accomplish by Pentecost (Ac 20[16]), he spent with the Philippian Church the last pascha which he was to enjoy in freedom for many years, while his (mostly Gentile?) companions went on and awaited him at Troas. At Philippi the 'we-passages' commence again (20[5]): St. Luke appears to have joined St. Paul again at this point, and probably stayed by him during the rest of the period of the Acts.

The bonds of peculiar affection which united St. Paul to his Philippian converts are impressed on every line of the letter (see PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE) which he wrote to them from Rome, probably at the beginning of his first captivity there (c. A.D. 59–60).

That St. Paul again visited Philippi during the eastern travels implied in the Pastoral Epistles, is not recorded, but may almost be assumed. The apostle journeyed to Macedonia from Ephesus (1 Ti 1[3]), and the journey would naturally be made viâ Troas and Philippi. And if the recorded visit to Troas (2 Ti 4[13]) belongs, as is probable, to a different and later occasion, the indications of the Pastoral Epistles suggest two visits to Philippi rather than one.

At the beginning of the 2nd cent. the Church of Philippi emerges once more for a moment into the light of history, when it received a visit from one apostolic father and a letter from another. Some time in the reign of Trajan (i.e. before A.D. 117), Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, was condemned to death as a Christian, and sent in charge of a guard of soldiers to be thrown to the beasts at Rome. His route, as we know from his Epistles, lay through Philadelphia, Smyrna, and Troas. Thence, like St. Paul, he must have crossed to Neapolis and so reached Philippi (his guards were probably making for one of the Adriatic ports by way of the Egnatian road), since the Church of Philippi 'welcomed' and 'escorted' him, and on his departure wrote two letters, one to the Church at Antioch consoling them for the loss of their bishop, and one to Polycarp of Smyrna asking for copies of as many as possible of the letters which Ignatius had written in Asia Minor.* St. Polycarp's answer is his Epistle to the Philippians, the sole source of our knowledge of this episode of Philippian history. We learn from it, further, that scandal had been caused at Philippi by the conduct of the presbyter Valens (the name is singularly frequent in Philippian inscriptions), and his wife, who had apparently, like Ananias and Sapphira, combined to carry out some dishonest financial transaction. Avarice would seem specially reprehensible to a Church which had distinguished itself for liberality as the Philippian Church had done in St. Paul's day (Ph 4[10-18]; and of Macedonia generally, 2 Co 11[8. 9] 8[1-5]).

Of the subsequent history of the Philippian Church nothing seems to be known till we meet

* It is not impossible that this request of the Philippians was the origin of the collection of a corpus of the Ignatian letters, and therewith of their preservation for later ages.

the names of a few of its bishops among the subscriptions to 4th and 5th cent. councils: 'Porphyrius a Macedonia de Philippis' at Sardica in A.D. 344 (the Church of Philippi was therefore Athanasian, not Arian); 'Flaviano Philippensium qui Rufi quoque reuerendissimi Thessalonicensium episcopi locum gerebat' (he signed next after the bishops of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Ephesus) at the œcumenical Council of Ephesus in A.D. 431; 'Sozon Philippi' at the Latrocinium of Ephesus in A.D. 449, and the same bishop, 'Sozon Philippensis,' at the Council of Chalcedon, which undid the work of the Latrocinium, in A.D. 451.

v. Genuineness and Integrity of the Epistle.
Literature.

i. THE CHURCH OF PHILIPPI.—On the town see preceding article. The Church of Philippi was founded by St. Paul during his Second Missionary Journey, about the year A.D. 52 [Turner, 50]; it was the first Church which he founded on the soil of Europe (Ac 16[12ff.]). On his arrival in the city, according to his custom, he sought out the Jews, who do not appear to have been numerous, for they had no synagogue within the city, only a 'place of prayer' (προσευχή) outside the gates, on the banks of the river Gangites. Paul, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, and possibly by Luke (the use of 'we' in Ac 16[13], and the graphic character of the whole narrative, betray the hand of an eye-witness), repaired to this place on the Sabbath day and spoke to some women whom they found there. A certain God-fearing proselyte named Lydia [or this may be simply an ethnic name='the Lydian'; see above, p. 177[b]], from the city of Thyatira, received the word, and was baptized with her household. Paul and his companions remained for some time in Philippi, continuing to frequent the Jewish place of prayer; there does not appear to have taken place any breach between him and the Jews on this occasion. The incident of the maid with the 'spirit of divination,' and the subsequent arrest of Paul and Silas, led to their abrupt departure, but not until the nucleus of a Christian Church had been formed. The author of the Book of Acts says (16[40]) that before leaving Philippi, Paul and Silas entered the house of Lydia and comforted 'the brethren.'

Two features in the narrative deserve special notice, for they were not without influence on the subsequent history of the Philippian Church. The first is that the Jews were few in number; the second, that the earliest converts were women. To the first we may ascribe the failure of the Judaizers to gain a footing within this Church; and perhaps the second explains the specially kindly interest taken by the Philippian Church in the personal comfort of the apostle. It may also account for the circumstance that the disputes in the Philippian Church were about personal rather than doctrinal questions. It has been said that the narratives in Ac 16[13] 17[4. 12] indicate—there is some corroborative evidence in the inscriptions—that in Macedonia women held a higher position than elsewhere. Female influence certainly continued strong in the Church of Philippi, for Paul regarded a personal quarrel between two of his female converts as a serious danger to the Church (Ph 4[2. 3]).

The Church founded by Paul and his companions continued to prosper. It suffered persecution (2 Co 8[2]), but remained conspicuously faithful to the gospel of Paul and to Paul himself. If we are to understand 'bishops,' 'deacons' (Ph 1[1]) as names of ecclesiastical officers, it appears to have made more rapid progress in organization than other Churches (see on this point below, iv. n. 2). The Churches of Macedonia, and we may be sure Philippi was not an exception, manifested their attachment to Paul by the alacrity with which they collected money for the poor saints of Jerusalem, although they were themselves in deep poverty (2 Co 8[3]). The Philippians also sent repeated personal gifts to Paul when he was in Thessalonica and in Corinth (2 Co 8[9], Ph 4[15. 16]); and, lastly, when he was in Rome their care for him again revived, and they sent a gift through Epaphroditus, who was instructed to remain in Rome and minister to the apostle (Ph 4[18]).

It is probable that the friendship between Paul and the Philippians was cemented by more frequent intercourse than we know of. Polycarp (Philip. iii. 2) speaks of the 'letters' written by Paul to the Philippians; and, although this may be a mere inaccuracy on the part of Polycarp, or even if the plur. ἐπιστολαί may be used to denote a single letter (see Lightfoot, ad loc.), it is most improbable that Paul made no written acknowledgment of the repeated gifts. As Philippi lay on the Via Egnatia, he must have frequently received tidings of its Church from friends and messengers (Ac 19[21]). In the year 57 [Turner, 55] Philippi had two visits from the apostle in person; and it was in Macedonia, and almost certainly in Philippi, that he spent the anxious days of waiting for Titus (2 Co 2[12] 7[5. 6]). There also he wrote, in all probability, the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Co 2[13] 7[5] 8[1] 9[2-4]). If that was the case, Paul passed one of the most critical seasons in his life, when his entire life-work seemed in danger, among the Philippians; and at such seasons friendships are deepened. A second visit was paid to Philippi when Paul kept the Paschal feast with his converts before leaving for Jerusalem; and the language in Acts suggests that it was with difficulty that he tore himself away from them (Ac 20[5. 6]).

In his Epistle, Paul expresses a hope that he would again visit the Philippians after his release from his Roman captivity (Ph 2[24]). Whether this hope was fulfilled we cannot say. If he was released,—as seems more probable,—and the Pastoral Epistles are to be accepted as a genuine record of his subsequent labours, he certainly paid one visit to Philippi after his release (1 Ti 1[3]), and probably more than one.

ii. THE TIME, PLACE, AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF WRITING.—When St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Philippians, he was a prisoner (Ph 1[7. 13. 14. 17]), and the place of his captivity was almost certainly Rome. He sends greetings from those of Cæsar's household (4[22]). A large and active Christian Church is in his neighbourhood, of whose doings he is fully cognizant (1[14-17]). A number of friends, old and new, are beside him, and appear to have free access to him (4[21. 22]); he sends letters and messengers to distant Churches, and messengers come from other lands to visit him (4[18]). All this is in harmony with his Roman life as described in Acts (28^{30}): it is improbable that he enjoyed the same liberty in Cæsarea, where, moreover, as far as we know, there was no Christian Church. One expression only in the Epistle suggests Cæsarea. In 1^{13} the apostle writes that his bonds had become manifest in Christ ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ. When in Cæsarea, Paul was confined in the prætorium of Herod (Ac 23^{35}). Usage forbids us to understand prætorium as the imperial palace on the Palatine; nor does it seem to have been used (as is held by Ellicott, Meyer, etc.) as a name for the barracks of the imperial guard (see Lightfoot, Philip. p. 99). It is a designation, however, frequently given by Latin writers (e.g. Tac. Hist. ii. 11) and by Josephus (Ant. XIX. iii. 1) to the prætorian or imperial guard; and in this sense most modern commentators understand it here. Mommsen (Berlin. Akadem. Sitzungsberichte, 1895, p. 495 ff.), who is followed by Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 357), maintains that it is here a name for the supreme imperial court, before which Paul appeared. This explanation relieves Paul's words of that note of exaggeration which they contain according to the former interpretation; for it is not possible that the knowledge of Paul as a bondsman of Christ should have pervaded the ranks of the immense imperial guard. See, further, art. PRÆTORIUM.

If Paul wrote the Epistle in Rome, it was written between 62 and 64 [Turner, 59 and 61]; or if Harnack's chronology be adopted, between 57 and 59. The probability is that it is the last of the Epistles of the captivity, and that it belongs to its closing period. (Bleek, Lightfoot, Sanday, Hort, et al. would place it first among the Epistles of the captivity; the view advocated in this art. is that of Zahn, Gwynn, Ramsay, et al.). A good deal had happened in Rome since Paul's arrival. If we accept Mommsen's view (see above), he had already appeared before his judges; and he was looking forward to a speedy settlement of his case (2^{24}). The assumption of Zahn (Einl. in d. NT), that when the apostle wrote, the period of libera custodia had ended, and that he was in strict durance, rests upon a slender foundation, and is hardly consistent with the free intercourse with his friends implied in 2^{19}.

St. Paul's Roman life, as mirrored in the Epistle to the Philippians, presents that blending of joy and sorrow, of unexpected triumphs and baffled hopes so familiar to the reader of the Book of Acts and of the Pauline Epistles. For years he had longed to see Rome that he might preach the gospel in that great gathering-place of the nations, and communicate some spiritual gift to the Church of the metropolis of the world. He entered Rome, however, in a guise that seemed to mock all his hopes of fruitful apostolic labour; but he was able to assure the Philippians that the frustration was only in appearance; for his bonds in Christ had become manifest in a manner which had spread to wide circles the knowledge of Christ (1^{13}); and his presence as a captive for Christ's sake had quickened evangelistic zeal within the Roman Church (1^{14}). But an element of personal bitterness mingled with his joy at the success of the preaching of the gospel. Some of the preachers whom his inspiring presence had sent forth to preach were animated by feelings of animosity towards himself, and preached Christ 'of faction,' hoping, as the apostle expresses it, to add affliction to his bonds (1^{17}). This can hardly mean that they hoped to increase the rigour of his captivity, for if they had irritated the authorities by their preaching, they would themselves have been the first sufferers; they rather wished to make him feel more acutely the limitations of his captive condition as compared with the unfettered freedom enjoyed by his rivals. It is the opinion of some critics (e.g. E. Haupt) that the cause of the hostility of those preachers was simply jealousy of the masterful alien who had become the leader of the Christian community in Rome. Had they been Judaizers, it is urged, Paul could not have rejoiced in their preaching, after his emphatic condemnation of different gospels in the Ep. to the Galatians (1^{6} 5^{2}). It is true that there do not seem to have been in Rome, when Paul wrote to the Romans, Judaizers of the extreme Galatian type. The Roman Church appears to have contained a majority of Gentile Christians, but there must have been in it a considerable minority of Jewish Christians, some of whom were anxious to preserve certain Jewish rites and customs. These may have taken alarm at the immense accession to the strength of the other party by the arrival in their midst of the great representative of anti-legal Christianity. It seems therefore not improbable, and it is certainly more charitable to assume it, that those who preached Christ 'of faction' were under the influence of a more respectable motive than personal jealousy of the apostle. St. Paul might rejoice in their preaching, because through it men heard of Christ who would otherwise not have heard the gospel at all. It was otherwise when, as in the case of the Galatian Judaizers, an attempt was made to substitute a gospel trammelled by legal conditions for the free gospel of the grace of God, which the Galatians had already received.

During his Roman captivity St. Paul was solaced by the society of a number of friends. Timothy, Luke, Epaphroditus, Aristarchus, Epaphras, Tychicus, John Mark, Demas, Jesus Justus, and Onesimus [see separate articles on these names] were all more or less frequent visitors in the hired house (μίσθωμα, Ac 28^{30}) in Rome, and not improbably often lodged under its roof. To a man like Paul, who possessed a genius for friendship, the presence of his friends must have been a source of unfailing joy and comfort; and he owed to their ministrations not only the personal comfort which he enjoyed, but his opportunities of missionary effort in Rome and elsewhere; for he frequently sent them out on apostolic missions. But one expression in the Ep. to the Philippians shows that the element of disappointment was not altogether absent even when he was in the society of his chosen friends, and that they did not always come up to the apostle's high standard of self-forgetfulness in the service of Christ. He writes ($2^{19.\ 20}$), 'I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy shortly. For I have no man likeminded who will care genuinely for your state. For they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ.' It has been said that if these words are to be taken seriously, they show that Paul, like Luther in his old age, fell into a mood of morose complaining, which made him unjust towards his fellow-workers. But we need not apply them to all the friends of whom mention has been made above, only to those, and perhaps few, who happened to be present with him at the time he was writing; some of these appear to have pleaded private business, and to have excited Paul's easily roused indignation by their apparent indifference to a mission which was dear to his heart. '"All,"' writes Jülicher (Einl. in d. NT), 'is without doubt hyperbolical. Paul was a man; and he had a right to give expression in his letters to his passing moods.'

It is generally supposed that Epaphroditus was the bearer of the letter to Philippi, and that he was also the amanuensis. Lightfoot's judgment is that 'on the whole it seems most probable' that 4^{3} is an appeal to Epaphroditus, who was by Paul's side and writing down his words, to use his best endeavour to heal the grievous quarrel between Euodia and Syntyche. Others consider this unnatural, and prefer to take Σύνζυγος as a proper name, and to explain γνήσιος as 'truly called.' The return of Epaphroditus and the fitness of sending thanks for the gifts received, through the person who had brought them, was probably the immediate occasion of the Epistle.

iii. THE CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE. — The Epistle begins in St. Paul's usual manner, with this exception, that the bishops and deacons are singled out for special greeting ($1^{1.2}$). The apostle goes on to say that the remembrance of the Philippians always awakens in his heart thankfulness to God, and that his prayers for them are accompanied with joy, because of their fellowship in the furtherance of the gospel from the day they first heard it (vv.$^{3-8}$). A prayer follows, that their love may abound more and more, and that it may be accompanied with knowledge and discernment so that they shall be able to prove things that differ, and be found free of offence unto the day of Christ (vv.$^{9-11}$).

The apostle then turns to his own affairs, which are likewise those of the gospel. His captivity, instead of proving a calamity to the cause of Christ, as might have been feared, had contributed to the spread of the glad tidings, his bonds having become manifest in Christ throughout the whole prætorium and to the rest. His captivity had likewise emboldened many brethren to speak the word of God without fear; and although some of the preachers had been animated by unworthy feelings towards himself, he was able to rejoice that they had proclaimed Christ. For himself, he cherished the confident expectation and hope that Christ would be magnified in him, whether by his life or by his death. Death was to him a more attractive prospect than life, for after death he should be with Christ; but his life was more needful for the Philippians and his other converts, and he felt confident that he would be spared for their sakes. Only one thing could damp the joyful confidence of the apostle, evil tidings of his converts, and he therefore exhorts them to live in a manner worthy of the gospel, and not to be intimidated by adversaries (vv.$^{12-30}$).

An appeal to the Philippians follows, to fulfil the apostle's joy by living lives of brotherly love. They are warned to shun the spirit of faction and vainglory, and to cultivate lowliness of mind. In their Lord Christ, who exchanged the form of God for the form of a servant (Bruce, Humil. of Christ, p. 28; see Gifford, Incarnation, p. 22 ff., and below, iv. n. 2), they had before them an example of lowliness of mind, and in His subsequent exaltation, a proof of God's approval of the lowly mind (2^{1-11}).

The apostle then repeats certain warnings already given against disputings and murmurings, and entreats the Philippians to live as children of God. His absence ought to act as an additional incentive to more strenuous efforts on their part to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling (vv.$^{12-18}$).

The apostle intimates his intention to send Timothy to visit Philippi, that he may comfort them, and bring tidings of them to himself. Timothy is one who will truly care for their welfare; and such men were at the time rare among the apostle's companions, for they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ. The apostle explains that he has sent back Epaphroditus whom the Philippians had sent to minister to him, because Epaphroditus, after a dangerous illness, had been seized with a longing for his home. He had, however, done noble service to the apostle, and deserved the best reception from his fellow-Christians in Philippi on his home-coming. The passage ends with the words, 'Finally, my brethren rejoice in the Lord' (2^{19}–3^{1a}).

The last words of the former paragraph seemed to indicate that the apostle was about to close his letter. But a new paragraph begins with 3^{1b}, in which he goes on to state that he does not hesitate to repeat warnings formerly given, as he knows that they are a means of safety for his converts. An impassioned invective follows against the 'dogs' of the concision who were always barking at him. Their worship, which they were so eager to introduce among all Christians, was a worship in the flesh, and not by the Spirit of God. Paul had himself possessed, in all their fulness, the fleshly privileges of which the Judaizers boasted, and had renounced them that he might gain Christ in their stead, and experience the power of His resurrection, and that fellowship in Christ's sufferings through which lies the path to a joyful resurrection. The apostle adds that he is aware that his own apprehension of the blessings of the Christian calling is as yet incomplete, but he describes himself as one who is forgetting the things that are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before. A warning reference follows to some who are spoken of as the enemies of the cross of Christ, not apparently because of their opposition to the gospel, but because of their worldly and licentious lives. These men mind earthly things; but the citizenship of the Christian is in heaven. The passage concludes with a general exhortation to Christian steadfastness (3^{1b}–4^{1}). An entreaty follows to two women, Euodia and Syntyche, who had been formerly fellow-labourers with Paul, to be of one mind in the Lord; and an unnamed true yoke-fellow (or perhaps [see above] a friend named Synzygus) is exhorted to labour to bring about the desired reconciliation. All are exhorted to rejoice in the Lord, and to show by their gentle and forbearing behaviour towards all men that they believed their Lord to be at hand. Their needs should be laid before the Lord in prayer, and the peace of God—a better defence than all the devices of men—would stand sentinel over their hearts and thoughts. After another 'finally,' a passage follows which seems to breathe the spirit of the philosophic moralist rather than of the Christian apostle. Let them open their minds and hearts to the contemplation of all true and beautiful thoughts, of all fair deeds wherever they are to be seen (4^{2-9}).

St. Paul then gives thanks for the gift the Philippians had sent through Epaphroditus, which he valued because of the spirit of which it was the manifestation, rather than for itself, for he was not in need. The Epistle closes with salutations and the Pauline benediction (vv.$^{10\text{-end}}$).

iv. THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE EPISTLE. — In the Ep. to the Philippians and in the Second Ep. to the Corinthians, St. Paul's personal character is more clearly revealed than in any of his other writings. But the two Epistles disclose different sides of his character. In 2 Co he is writing to adversaries and to lukewarm or suspicious friends, and we mark how acutely he felt personal slights and unworthy accusations. He pleads his own merits and services in a manner which shows that self-esteem was by no means dead within him, and he verges on what appears to the modern reader boastfulness. In writing to the Philippians, he is addressing some of the most trusted friends he had in the world. This trust in his readers gives a pleasing sense of repose to the Epistle. It accounts for the epistolary undress of the language, for the want of plan, for the repetitions, and for the obvious reluctance to leave off. There were some things amiss even in Philippi, and Paul had to administer certain reproofs, but he is less fearful than on other occasions, having a full conviction that God would perfect His good work among them, and reveal His will to them in those matters which were as yet obscure to them. Chapter 3 forms an exception to the general restfulness of tone observable in the Epistle (see Note 3 below). Critics, however, have discovered that there existed a soreness in the mind of the Philippians about Paul's reception of their pecuniary gifts. Zahn (Einl. in d. NT) maintains that they had written a remonstrance to him complaining that he had not suitably acknowledged it. Another critic (Holsten) finds in St. Paul's words $4^{10\text{-}19}$ 'thankless thanks.' A third (E. Haupt), however, regards his acknowledgment as a veritable masterpiece of delicate and considerate courtesy. The practice of lauding the courtesy of the apostle has been somewhat overdone. St. Paul could be very courteous, but his courtesy was always kept in strict subordination to his duties as a counsellor and as a reprover. To say not only that he did not desire, but that he did not require the gift, was not precisely the courtesy of the courtier; and was likely enough to bring a shade of disappointment to the countenances of the poor people who had sent it. But the apostle evidently recognized that they were in some danger of exaggerating the value of the money gift. He said, therefore, with all plainness of speech, that to him its value consisted solely in the evidence it gave of their personal affection, and of their willingness to make sacrifices for the cause of God.

NOTE 1.—Ph 1^{1} σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις. This is the first (unless we take into account the words attributed to Paul in Ac 20^{28}) mention in the NT of bishops. Its presence in a letter purporting to be written by St. Paul has excited suspicion of the genuineness of the letter, as the episcopal office (at least in its monarchical form) is generally admitted to have originated at a later period. It is very doubtful, however, if St. Paul here refers to the holders of a definite ecclesiastical office. When writing to the Thessalonians, he spoke of their leaders as οἱ προϊστάμενοι (1 Th 5^{12}). In the Ep. to the Ephesians those exercising episcopal functions are named ποιμένες καὶ διδάσκαλοι (Eph 4^{11}). In the Ep. to the Hebrews they are termed ἡγούμενοι (He 13^{17}). The apostle here names those 'bishops' who were elsewhere called by other names, but who exercised the same functions. Whether this was the first occasion on which the word was uttered in the Christian Church, we cannot say; probably it had been already given by Paul or by others to Philippian Church rulers; but it was a name, once given, that was likely soon to supersede all others on the principle of the survival of the fittest. It was well known and understood by Greeks; and not less so by the Jews, for it is common in the Septuagint; and it expresses by a single word at once the dignity and the duties of the rulers of the Church.

E. Haupt suggests that the bishops and deacons are here selected for special greeting because they had taken a leading part in arranging for and collecting the gift sent by Epaphroditus. With regard to the two classes of persons named, Haupt writes: 'It is possible that there is no reference here to the offices. In 1 Th 5^{12} the same persons are certainly designated by the expressions οἱ κοπιῶντες and οἱ προϊστάμενοι; and it is at least probable that the same is the case with regard to the ποιμένες and διδάσκαλοι of Eph 4^{11}. Clement (1 Ep. xlii. 5) ascribes presidency to ἐπίσκοποι and διάκονοι alike. It is, therefore, possible that here ἐπίσκοποι and διάκονοι are to be understood as applying to the same persons; and that here as in the other Pauline Epistles, there was as yet no fixed terminology for the office of president' (Die Gefangenschaftsbriefe, p. 3). See, further, on the subject of this note, Hort, Ecclesia, 111 f.

NOTE 2.—Ph $2^{5\text{-}11}$. This passage has been pressed into the service of speculative theology, and many attempts have been made to extract from it an apostolic doctrine of the relations of the Divine and human natures of our Lord. It is very doubtful, however, if the apostle had any intention of formulating, or even of hinting at the meaning which his words are supposed to bear. In v.^{4} he had uttered a warning against factiousness and vain glory, and a counsel follows to cultivate lowliness of mind. Of this voluntary choice of lowliness, Christ was their great example, for He had exchanged His heavenly glory for the life of humanity,—for a life which ended in a death of shame.

According to some commentators the words ὃς ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ refer to the lowliness of spirit exhibited by the Son during His pre-existent life. Although in the form of God, He did not ambitiously snatch at equality with the Father. If this be the meaning, it is a thought strangely foreign to the ordinary thought of St. Paul to hint even at a possible rivalry between the Father and the Son. Nor do the words force us to adopt this interpretation. The word μορφή as distinguished from σχῆμα denotes that which is essential to the subject, that which properly belongs to its nature; and the words τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ need not express a different, but the same idea. Christ being in the form of God, therefore possessed equality with God. The only word which creates difficulty is ἁρπαγμός, which, according to its termination, signifies 'a snatching,' not 'the thing snatched.' But substantives in -μος are frequently used to describe the concrete thing (e.g. πειρασμός, πορισμός, δεσμός). Ἁρπαγμός occurs only once in classical writers in a passage in Plutarch (Mor. p. 12 A). So we cannot say with certainty whether or not it was ever employed in the passive sense. It was certainly so used by the Greek Fathers, who were writing in their native tongue. In a number of passages the Fathers employ the expression ἁρπαγμόν τι ποιεῖσθαι as synonymous with the more ordinary expression ἅρπαγμά τι τοιεῖσθαι. If we may so translate ἁρπαγμός here, the meaning is that Christ did not regard the equality with God which He possessed, as a prize to be eagerly grasped and retained, but of His own will surrendered it for the condition of lowliness. The verb κενοῦν (Ro 4^{14}, 1 Co 1^{17} 9^{15}) refers to this surrender by Christ of His heavenly glory and dignity, and the manner of surrender is explained in the expression that follows—μορφὴν δούλου λαβών. To answer the questions of speculative theology as to the exact relation which continued to exist between the 'two natures' of Christ, was entirely foreign to the purpose of St. Paul's exhortation. 'It contains,' writes Zahn (Einl. in d. NT), 'hardly more dogmatical teaching than the sentence in 2 Co 8^{9}.'

NOTE 3.—Ph $3^{1b\text{-}20}$. This passage does not harmonize either in substance or in tone, with the rest of the Epistle. It almost looks as if it had been torn out of its connexion in the Ep. to the Galatians, or in the 2nd Ep. to the Corinthians. It has certainly more kinship with those Epistles than with the Epistle in which it stands. It consists of a passionate invective against the Judaizers, reminding us of Galatians, followed by a vindication of St. Paul's own position as the possessor of all the privileges of which the Judaizers were fond of boasting.

It is extremely difficult to discover a fitting connexion between it and the preceding paragraph, which concludes with the words, 'Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord.' Some commentators (e.g. Bengel, B. Weiss, Klöpper) have seen a link of connexion in the circumstance that Christian joy was obscured by the practice of Judaic rites which diverted the gaze from Christ: 'Gaudium spirituale optimam affert certitudinem contra errores, Judaicos præsertim' (Bengel). But a connexion so delicately hinted, when the Judaizers were in question, is unlike St. Paul. Lightfoot gives up the attempt to establish an inner connexion of the passage with what goes before. He conjectures that the apostle was interrupted when writing the letter. In the interval something occurred in Rome which reminded him of the restless propagandism of the Judaizing missionaries. 'What if they should interfere at Philippi as they were doing at Rome, and tamper with the faith and loyalty of his converts? With this thought weighing upon his spirit he resumes his letter.' But a device of this character rather suggests the interpreter in despair. We prefer the explanation of E. Haupt, who remarks that the fragmentary character of Paul's closing exhortations makes it unnecessary to look for a connexion with the foregoing passage, if a possible danger to the Philippians from the Judaizers was present to his mind. That he is speaking of the Judaizers sufficiently explains the sudden change of tone to severity and solemn warning; for the mention of those plotters against the peace of his Churches always excited the indignation of the apostle. It also accounts for the introduction of the vindication of his own ancestral privileges as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and as one who had always been found blameless as touching the righteousness which is of the law; for the apostle was aware that it was the invariable practice of the Judaizers to indulge in detraction of himself, whom they regarded as the chief obstacle to their designs upon the freedom of the Church.

v. THE GENUINENESS AND INTEGRITY OF THE EPISTLE.—The genuineness of Philippians was denied by Baur and his scholars Schwegler, Volkmar, etc., and by Hitzig. The mention of bishops and deacons in the greeting betrayed, they maintained, a later date than the lifetime of St. Paul. They found in it, moreover, evident traces of the Gnosticism of the 2nd century. Its teaching regarding the Kenosis of Christ (2^{6}) was a reflexion of the Valentinian myth of the fall of Sophia from the Pleroma to the Kenoma. In 2^{8} they found the Gnostic Docetic teaching about the body of Christ; and in 2^{10} Marcion's doctrine of a Descensus ad Inferos. In Clement, who is mentioned in 4^{3}, they perceived a reference to the Clement of the Clementine Romances. The design of the Epistle, according to Baur, was to repel Ebionite assaults, and to promote unity between the two sections of the Church. The views of Baur with regard to this Epistle possess at present only a historical interest. The Epistle to the Philippians is accepted, if not by all, at least by a great majority of NT critics. Many who reject Ephesians and are doubtful of Colossians (e.g. Jülicher, Hilgenfeld, Pfleiderer, Lipsius), accept Philippians as the genuine work of the apostle. Holsten in his latest work (Paulinische Theologie, 1898), although he continued to place it among the Epistles wrongly ascribed to Paul, admitted that its teaching is wholly Pauline. A theory was broached recently by Voelter (ThT, 1892) that the Epistle is in part the work of Paul, in part by another hand. The genuine parts are, according to Voelter, $1^{1-7.\ 12-14.\ 18-26}$ 2^{17-29} $4^{10-21.\ 23}$. The remaining parts are not genuine. Spitta (Zur Geschichte u. Lit. d. Urchristenthums, 1893) also denies the integrity of the Epistle. C. Clemen (Die Einheit d. paulin. Briefe, 1894), while rejecting the theory of Voelter and defending the genuineness of the whole of the Epistle, maintains that it consists of two letters of the apostle, written at different times, and made into one by an editor. 2^{19-24} 3^{2}–4^{3} $4^{8.\ 9}$ he holds to belong to the second letter. The expression of Polycarp, that Paul wrote 'letters' to the Philippians, is relied upon as giving a certain traditional authority to this theory. Did the portions which are considered as belonging to different letters follow one another consecutively, the theory might deserve some consideration; for two letters by the same author might easily have got fastened together, and would in time have been regarded as one letter. But it is hard to see what motives could have induced an editor to transform two connected letters into a document of artificial piecework. Chapter 3 alone gives some colour to the idea that foreign matter may have found its way into the Epistle, but is not sufficient to lead us to accept Clemen's theory.

PHILISTIA.—See next article, and PALESTINE.

PHILISTINES (פְּלִשְׁתִּים, in Am 9^{7} and 1 Ch 14^{10} [Kethîbh] פְּלִשְׁתִּיִּים; LXX Φυλιστιείμ in the Hexateuch, and ἀλλόφυλοι elsewhere; in Josephus and other Greek writers Φυλιστῖνοι or Παλαιστῖνοι).—'Philistines' is the gentilic plural of פְּלֶשֶׁת, in AV 'Palestina,' 'Palestine,' 'the Philistines,' but in RV always 'Philistia'; in Assyr. 'Palastu,' 'Pilistu'; in Gr. Παλαιστίνη, but in LXX always transmuted into the word for 'Philistines' (Ex 15^{14}, Is $14^{29.\ 31}$, Ps 60^{8} 83^{7} 87^{4} 108^{9}, Jl 3^{4}). The Hebrew name as well as the Greek has been explained, though with very doubtful warrant, as by derivation denoting 'immigrants.'

1. The Name.—It is probably Semitic. It has a peculiar grammatical use. The Hebrew has two usual ways of designating a people as such. One way is by the use of the primitive noun without modification, just as proper names of persons are used. For example, 'Asshur,' 'Assyrian,' 'the Assyrian,' 'the Assyrians' are in Hebrew all alike Asshur, this noun denoting either the founder, the country, the nation, or the people, and in each meaning used in the masculine singular, and without the article. But no such use is ever made of any primitive from which Pĕlishtîm might be derived. The other way is by the use of the gentilic adjective in the masculine singular, with the article. We have, for example, 'the Moabite,' 'the Jebusite,' 'the Ekronite,' 'the Gittite,' in the singular, alike for an individual and for the people as a whole, though the English versions pluralize words of this class when they denote peoples. In contrast with this, the word Pĕlishtî is used in the singular only of individuals, the instances being Goliath (1 S $17^{8.\ 10}$ and often) and the Philistine of 2 S 21^{17}, and is always plural when it denotes the Philistine people. Further, it is regularly used without the article, though there are some exceptions, e.g. Jos 13^{2}, 1 S 4^{7} 7^{13} 13^{20} $17^{51f.}$, 2 S 5^{19b} 21^{12} (Keth.), 1 Ch 11^{13a}, 2 Ch 21^{16}. These facts differentiate this name, in a very marked way, from most other biblical names of peoples.

This differentiation becomes the more marked when we note that it serves to affiliate the Philistine name in certain directions, as well as to sever it in other directions. Perhaps the name Caphtōrîm and the six other unusual names mentioned with Pĕlishtîm in Gn $10^{13.\ 14}$ follow completely the same usage, though the number of instances is too small to be decisive. The word Rĕphāîm, when used as a gentilic name, follows the same usage; and the other proper names of the giant peoples follow it in that they are used in the plural (see GIANT, etc.). The name מִצְרַי, denoting the Egyptian people, is plural except in Ezr 9^{1}. The words כּוּשִׁי, 'Ethiopian,' לוּבִי, 'Lybian,' פֻּטִי, 'Chaldæan,' denoting peoples, are always plural, and are regularly definite without the article. All this is certainly significant of facts in Philistine history. Whether the facts thus signified are recoverable is another question.

2. Characteristics of the Philistines in the times when they are best known.—The usage attending the name is not more remarkable than are many of the facts concerning the Philistines themselves, as they appear in the OT.

Their territory extended 'from the Shihor* which is before Egypt, even unto the border of Ekron northward' (Jos $13^{2.\ 3}$). Its eastern limit was at Beth-shemesh (1 S 6^{18}). It included possibly 2000 square miles of land, much of it remarkably fertile. Within this territory there were, according to the biblical writers, in the times when the Philistines were prominent, four kinds of inhabitants. First, there were the Philistines proper. Second, there were remnants of the Anakim and the Avvim in Gaza, Gath, Ashdod, etc. (Jos 11^{22} 13^{3}, Dt 2^{23}). These were politically Philistine, as the Anakim at Hebron were politically Amorite. Third, the accounts of the conquest under Joshua and of the subsequent events seem to imply that there were Canaanites living among the Philistines, some of whom were conquered and superseded by Israel (see 3 below). Fourth, some of the southern Geshurites (Jos 13^{2}, 1 S 27^{8}), and perhaps other like tribes, lived within the Philistine territory, near the Egyptian border. It is noteworthy that the Philistines seem to have confined themselves to their own narrow region, even when for decade after decade they held dominion over the wider territories of Israel. It is recorded as an exceptional fact that, after the overthrow of Saul at Gilboa, some of them became resident among the Israelites in the regions beyond Jezreel and Jordan (1 S 31^{7}, 1 Ch 10^{7}).

The Philistines were proficient in agriculture

* That is, either an arm of the Nile (Dillm.) or the Wâdy el 'Arish, 'river (נַחַל) of Egypt.'

(Jg 15[4. 5], 1 S 6, 2 K 8[2] etc.). They were skilful in architecture, in sculpture, in the working of iron and of the precious metals, and in other arts (e.g. Jg 16[25-30], 1 S 5. 13[19. 20] 17[5. 6] etc.). At a relatively early date they seem to have had monetary usages peculiar to themselves, witness the 'eleven hundred of silver' (Jg 16[5. 18]; cf. 17[2]). In fine, they are presented to us as relatively a wealthy and highly civilized people. So far as appears, it was only in later times that they engaged largely in commerce and maritime pursuits.

Politically, they had five principal centres, the cities of Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (wh. see, severally, and see also 1 S 6[17], Jos 13[3], Zeph 2[4-7] etc.). It has been inferred that Ashdod possessed a right of hegemony over the others; but the order of mention differs in different places; and, judging by the history, the claim of Gath to the hegemony is much stronger than that of Ashdod. Besides the five, the Philistines had many other cities, the following (which see) being familiar examples: Gerar, Gezer, Timnah, Ziklag, Gob, Gibbethon, Jabneh (2 Ch 26[6]); and many of them dwelt in unwalled towns (1 S 6[18], Dt 2[23]); but the five principal centres representatively included them all (1 S 6[13]).

Their political organization was unique. The people of each centre are currently spoken of in the ordinary way in which other nationalities are mentioned, as 'the Ashdodite,' 'the Ashkelonite,' etc. But the centres themselves and their political heads are alike designated by the altogether peculiar word סְרָנִים, ṣĕrānîm, tr. 'lords' in AV and RV (Jos 13[3], Jg 16[5] etc.). This word is used only in the plural. It is doubtless the native term, and has no near cognates in the Hebrew, save that a word of the same spelling is used (1 K 7[30]) of some accessory to the wheels of the laver-bases of Solomon's temple. Here the RV, following Vulg. and many lexicons, tr. by 'axles,' though the word is different from the one rendered 'axletrees' in the same context. Half a dozen opposing derivations have been conjectured for ṣĕrānîm, none of them more plausible than the natural suggestion that these five cities and their chiefs were regarded as the centres or representatives of national power; or that ṣeren is the Greek τύραννος.

The ṣĕrānîm, 'lords,' are distinguished from the sārîm, שָׂרִים, 'captains' (1 S 18[30] 29[2-9], where AV and RV misleadingly translate 'princes' instead of 'captains'). The former are the depositaries of national authority, and the latter the men in actual military command. In particular cases, both offices may or may not have been combined in one person. The LXX prevailingly tr. ṣeren by σατράπης or σατραπία, 'satrap' or 'satrapy,' and sar by στρατηγός, 'captain,' but sometimes interchange the two, and sometimes tr. ṣĕrānîm by ἄρχοντες, 'rulers.'

The functions of the ṣĕrānîm were both civil and military. We have no account of any one ṣeren acting by himself, but only of acts in which the whole body of ṣĕrānîm participated. The accounts speak sometimes of the 'armies' and sometimes of the 'army' of the Philistines (1 S 23[3] 28[1] 29). Apparently each of the five centres had its independent force, but all were combined, in time of war, under one command. In David's time Gath was especially prominent, and perhaps held the hegemony (1 Ch 20[6], RV of 2 S 8[1]; cf. 1 Ch 18[1]). King Achish of Gath may have been the Philistine commander-in-chief, though the narrative does not explicitly say so (1 S 29).

We have no information as to whether the office of ṣeren was hereditary or elective or perpetuated in some other way, nor as to the relation between this office and that of king. None of the Philistine kings who are mentioned reigned over all Philistia (Gn 20[2] 26[1. 8], Jer 25[20], Zec 9[5]); they were all local. We are not told whether the ṣĕrānîm existed from the earliest times, or whether they continued to exist after the conquest by David. But in the one instance we have of a Philistine king in relations with the ṣĕrānîm, the instance of Achish (1 S 28. 29), the king is compelled to submit to the ṣĕrānîm. Achish may himself have been ṣeren of Gath, as well as king of Gath.

The religion of the Philistines was in some respects unique (see DAGON and BAAL-ZEBUB). They were a very religious people. Their priests and diviners (1 S 6[2]) had great influence. Their cloud-observing (?) soothsayers (Is 2[6]) were famous. Their being an uncircumcised people is much emphasized in the biblical records (Jg 14[3] 15[18], 1 S 14[6] 17[26. 36] 31[4], 2 S 1[20], Jer 9[25. 26]).

They were distinguished especially for military prowess. Pretty full details of their system might be gathered from various parts of the Bible, including mention of their archers, their equipment for heavy armed infantry, their organization into hundreds and thousands, etc. (1 S 31[3], 1 Ch 10[3], 1 S 29[2]). The accounts make the impression that they usually fought as infantry, though chariots and cavalry are mentioned (1 S 13[5], 2 S 1[6], and perhaps Jg 1[19]). We have descriptions of their savage treatment of the bodies of their fallen enemies (1 S 31, 1 Ch 10), and of the honours with which their women welcomed their warriors returning from victory. But more significant than all matters of detail is the fact that this little nation, with its few hundred square miles of territory, was able again and again to conquer Israel, and to hold Israel in subjection for generations.

In their military operations they seem to have pursued a very definite policy. In the earlier stages of any movement of conquest they practised effective and systematic pillage, as, for instance, in the case of Keilah (1 S 23[1]), or earlier, after their first great defeat of Saul (1 S 13[17. 18]). The indications are, however, that the Israelites increased in population and wealth during the long periods of Philistine oppression, provided they were submissive. From this we may infer that it was the policy of the conquerors, whenever resistance ceased, to abstain from pillage, doubtless exacting tribute instead, and finding it for their own interest to have the tributary people as prosperous as possible.

To secure submission, the Philistines practised the disarmament of the subjected people. We have an instance in the time of Saul (1 S 13[19-23]), and what seems to be an allusion to an earlier instance of the time of Shamgar (Jg 3[31] 5[8]). According to the LXX in the first of these passages, the Philistines used this as a method of exacting tribute, suppressing the working of metals in Israel, and then compelling the Israelites to pay an exorbitant price for their tools.

It was the Philistine policy to prevent the existence of a united Israel. As long as David is king of Judah, and has a rival king farther north, they seem to be content. When Israel is divided, the Philistine supremacy is not imperilled. But when it is proposed that David reign over all the twelve tribes, the Philistine armies march at once (2 S 5[17]). A similar situation had arisen previously, when Samuel became judge (1 S 7[7]).

Presumably, the Philistines did not achieve all their successes single-handed. It is a familiar fact that in cases of Egyptian invasion, in earlier times, or, later, of Assyrian invasion, it was the custom of the multitudinous little peoples between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean to band together against the common foe. Judging by the numbers of the Israelites, as mentioned in the Hexateuch, the invasion under Joshua was sufficiently formidable to call for similar confederations of the threatened peoples. As a matter of fact, the Bible represents the resistance made to Joshua and, later, to David as being of this character. We shall presently find evidence that in some of the wars of subjugation the Philistine success was due in part to the ability to array many allies against Israel.

3. The History of the Philistines.—Beyond dispute, they were immigrants into Palestine. The passages presently to be cited affirm this explicitly. It has been thought to be implied in the etymology of the Hebrew name Pĕlishtîm as well as of the Greek Ἀλλόφυλοι. So far, the problem is easy. But the questions whence they migrated, and when and how the migrating stock was modified in its new seats, are questions not so readily answered.

The Philistine language was probably Semitic, although the data whence this conclusion is drawn are restricted. So were certain important elements in their religion and their civilization. This proves either that the Philistines were originally Semitic, or that they changed their language, and to some extent their institutions, under the influence of the Semitic region to which they came.

We are told that they came from Caphtor, as Israel from Egypt, or Aram from Kir (Am 9^{7}, Dt 2^{23}); that they were Caphtorim (Dt 2^{23}). They are called 'the remnant of the coast of Caphtor' (Jer $47^{4.5}$). The Caphtorim are said to be one of the seven nationalities begotten by Mizraim (Egypt), and the Philistines are said to have 'come out' from the locality where one or more of the other six were (Gn $10^{13.14}$). The text has the adverb of place 'from where,' not the pronoun 'from whom,' and the two expressions are not in Hebrew convertible. It is not said that the Philistines are descendants of the Casluhim and the others, and there is no need to transpose the clauses or otherwise change the text (but see Dillm. ad loc.). The net result from this part of the testimony is that the nucleus of the Philistine people consisted of Caphtorim, who migrated, within known historic times, from regions inhabited by Caphtorim and kindred peoples.

But where was Caphtor? The LXX uniformly either transliterate the name or make it Cappadocia. Some have identified Caphtor with Cyprus. This finds some support in the fact that the Egyptian monuments associate the Philistines with the Zakkal, a people from Cyprus, and portray the two as scarcely distinguishable. Ebers, Halévy, and others have strongly held that Caphtor was a region in or near the Egyptian Delta. There is a strong recent trend toward the opinion that Caphtor was Crete. See CAPHTOR, CARITES, CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES, CRETE.

The argument for identifying Caphtor with Crete connects itself closely with the phenomena presented by another biblical name. In two relatively late places (Zeph 2^{5}, Ezk $25^{15.16}$) the Philistines are identified, wholly or in part, with the Chĕrēthîm, whom the LXX, in these places, make to be the Cretans. In both passages the word Chĕrēthîm is used in a punning way, effecting a play on words. The name does not occur elsewhere in the plural, but, in the singular, 'the Cherethite' is once mentioned (1 S 30^{14}) as living in or near the Philistine country, and six or seven times in connexion with 'the Pelethite,' as forming a part of king David's military force (1 Ch 18^{17}, 2 S 8^{18} 15^{18} 20^{7} and Kerê of ^{23}, 1 K $1^{38.44}$). On the basis of these facts it is affirmed that Cherethite is another and earlier name for the Philistines, that they were Cretans, that Pelethite is merely a variant form of Philistine, and that David's successes were largely due to his having Philistine troops. These conclusions are plausible, though they lack something of being sufficiently proved.

The evidence, however, amounts to a strong probability in favour of the more general fact that the Philistines were originally Aryan pirates, whether from Crete or Cyprus or elsewhere, who forced a settlement for themselves among the Semites and Rephaim of the Mediterranean lowland, and adopted the language, and in part the religion and civilization, of the Semites whom they conquered. Of this we shall find many confirmations as we proceed to consider the evidence as to the date when the migration took place.

Ramses III. of Egypt, contemporary, in part, with Joshua, says that in his eighth year he repulsed an invasion made by six or seven hostile nations. Most or all of these nations have Greek names. They are kin to other Greek peoples, settled on the African coast west of the Delta, who made trouble for Ramses in his fifth and his eleventh years, and who had previously made trouble for his predecessors. The invaders who came in his eighth year came by land and by sea. Those who came by land plundered the Syrian regions, 'beginning with the people of Kheta, of Kadi (Galilee), and Carchemish, Aradus, and Alus,' established a rendezvous 'in the land of the Amorites,' and were defeated by Ramses on the frontier between Egypt and the land of Zahi, that is, the region that we know as the land of the Philistines (Insc. in the Ramesseum at Luxor, as cited by Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 329). Those who came by sea entered the mouths of the Nile, and were there defeated, large numbers of them being captured.

Of these six or seven peoples, two are many times mentioned together, to the extent of being somewhat distinguished from the others. In the sculptures they closely resemble one another. They are, of course, Greek in features and equipment. These two are the Zakkal and the Pulusata, Pulsata, Pulista, Purusata, Purosatha, as the name is variously transliterated. Scholars seem to agree that the Zakkal came from Cyprus. The Pulsata have been identified with the Pelasgi, with the Prosoditæ of Cyprus, and with the Philistines. Some of those who believe that they were the Philistines hold that they came at this time from Crete or Cyprus, and were settled by Ramses, after their defeat, in the cities of Zahi. But it is more in accord with the whole of the evidence to hold that the Pulsata and the Zakkal had then been on this coast for some generations, keeping in communication with their kindred in the various Greek regions, and now making themselves leaders in the movement of the hordes that sought the spoils of Egypt. If the Pulsata of Ramses had then just come from Crete, he would surely have designated them by their Greek name, and not by a Semitic descriptive word. If they had just come from Crete, it is difficult to account for the resemblance which the Egyptians found between them and the Cypriote Zakkal, while this is easily accounted for if the two had long been dwelling among Semitic neighbours on the coast. Other Greek invaders Ramses describes as 'kings,' or as 'peoples of the sea,' but he speaks of the 'leaders of the hostile bands' of the Pulsata and the Zakkal, just as he does in the case of the Edomites ('Effigies at Medînet-abu,' as cited in Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 332). Sayce (EHH p. 291) cites Hommel as having found a mention of the Zakkal on the coast near Dor, in a Babylonian document (WAI iv. 34, No. 2, lines 2, 6) of the 15th cent. B.C. The writers of the history in the OT certainly thought of the Philistines as well established in their country before the Exodus (Ex 13[17] 15[14] 23[31], Jos 13[2. 3] etc.). Whether they believed that the Philistines were in the land in the time of Abraham and Isaac is not so certain. They designate as Philistine both the land and the people of that date (Gn 21[32. 34] 26[1. 8. 14. 15. 18]), but it is easy to understand this as a mere geographical use of the term, or as proleptical. On the other hand, however, these Philistines are described as a military people (Gn 21[22. 32] 26[26]), and as having other resemblances to the Philistines of later times; and the proofs that the Philistine migration had not begun as early as the time of Abraham are not so decisive as many imagine.

Whenever the Philistine settlements began, they probably began on a relatively small scale. The immigrants came in successive expeditions, and not all at once. In certain matters they accepted the conditions of life which they found on the soil. They became owners of cattle if the people whom they conquered were owners of cattle, and raisers of crops if the conquered were agricultural people. If they conquered Egyptian tributaries, they accepted the suzerainty without which Egypt would have forthwith expelled them. They seem to have accepted the Semitic names of the cities they conquered. At all events, Gaza, Gath, Ashkelon, and several other cities of the region were known by the names still familiar to us, as early as the time of Amenhotep III. of Egypt (Tel el-Amarna letters). There were of them more men than women, and the marrying of native wives began at once. Their peculiar political organization, that of the ṣĕrānîm, presumably grew up upon the soil. From the time of Ramses III. they were probably driven from the sea, isolated from their Greek kindred, and compelled to become a non-maritime people. Through these various changes of blood, institutions, government, and external relations, they became at length differentiated as a people by themselves.

The accounts of the conquest by Joshua make the impression that the Philistines were then in their five central cities, but that there were also in the region several independent petty Canaanitish kingdoms; that Israel at that time conquered most of the Canaanite kingdoms, although it failed to permanently hold some of them (Jos 10[33. 41] 11[2. 3. 16] 12[12] 15[33-47] 16[3. 10] etc.); but did not conquer the Philistine cities (Jos 13[2. 3]), though Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza are by the tenure of promise included in the inheritance of Judah (Jos 15[45-47] 13[6]). It is said that Judah, after Joshua's death, conquered Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron (Jg 1[18]), but that the Philistine cities were independent when the struggle of the conquest came to an end (Jg 3[3]).

The biblical records signalize four periods of oppression of Israel by the Philistines. The first is that in which Shamgar was the deliverer (Jg 3[31] 10[11]). This was in the time of the twenty years' oppression by Jabin and Sisera (Jg 4[2-4] 5[6. 7]). Presumably, a generation or two of prosperity had raised Israel to a position where he was formidable to his neighbours, and so a coalition was formed against him by the Philistines and the many peoples of the north. The Philistine pressure was mainly felt by Judah and Simeon, and it may account for the absence of these two from Deborah's roll-call of the tribes that marched against Jabin. We have no details of the Philistine operations, but there is a suggestion of a disarmament of their enemies, like that which was practised afterwards in the time of Saul (Jg 3[31] 5[8]).*

The second Philistine oppression of Israel is that mentioned in Jg 10[6. 7] as occurring before the eighteen years of oppression by the Ammonites. Contrary to common opinion, the writer of this article holds that this was the oppression in which Samson distinguished himself (Jg 13[2]–16). It began, apparently, before Samson's birth (Jg 13[5]), while Tola was judge. In the time of Samson's wild youth it was so thoroughly a recognized fact (14[4] 15[11]) that it did not prevent relations between Israelite and Philistine families. It ceased when Samson was made judge, after the battle of Lehi (15[14-20]). During the twenty years of his public life, the Philistines kept on their own side of the border (16), even when plotting against him.

The third Philistine oppression was the one that lasted through the forty years that Eli was judge (1 S 4[18], here regarded as corresponding to Jg 13[1]) and the twenty years that followed (1 S 7[2]). After the first horrors of conquest were over, the Israelites seem to have prospered under the yoke, if we may judge of the population by the size of the armies (1 S 4[2. 10] 11[8] 15[4]). This oppression ceased after Samuel became judge (1 S 7[7-14]). He defeated the Philistines in a decisive battle. He compelled them to surrender the cities in their country that belonged to Israel, that is, apparently, those that had formerly been Canaanite, and had been conquered by Israel. 'And the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coasts of Israel; and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines' as long as Samuel remained chief magistrate of Israel, a statement not inconsistent with 10[5] 13[3. 19ff.].

The fourth oppression was that of the time of Saul. It began when Saul had been long enough on the throne for his son Jonathan to have grown to military age (1 S 13[3]). The account says that they invaded Israel with an army extraordinarily large (1 S 13[5]). Deal as we may with the numbers given, it appears that they had at that time great respect for the strength of Israel, and had gathered an immense body of allies to assist them. It turned out that their precaution was needless. Saul quarrelled with Samuel. His army melted away from him. With no resistance worthy of the name, the Philistines became masters, and plundered and disarmed Israel at will. Later, however, Israel rallied. During the remainder of his reign Saul waged a series of fierce battles with the oppressors. He perished in the battle of Gilboa, and the Philistine power over Israel became supreme (1 S 31).

Presumably both David and his northern competitor paid tribute to Philistia during the seven and a half years that he reigned over Judah (2 S 5[5]). Naturally, they interfered to prevent his becoming king over a united Israel. He defeated them in two desperate defensive campaigns (2 S 5[17-25]), and then, in four or more aggressive expeditions (2 S 8[1] 21[15-22]), reduced them to subjection.

In consequence of the disruption of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, the Philistines became independent, but they never re-established their earlier glory. We hear no more of their ṣĕrānîm. Later, in the Assyrian times, they have a king for each of their cities (Zec 9[5], Jer 25[20], and many passages in the records of Sargon and his successors). In the same later times they seem to be engaged in commerce, dealing especially in Israelitish spoils and slaves (Am 1[6-8], Jl 3[4-8], cf. Ob[13. 14. 19], depending, however, on the date one assigns to Joel and Obadiah). Perhaps there are signs of a Greek revival among them (Jl 3[6], and the Yavan of Sargon).

However their institutions changed, we have frequent mention of the Philistines themselves. Among the cities fortified by Rehoboam were Gath and Mareshah, etc. (2 Ch 11[8]). The Philistines warred with Israel for Gibbethon (1 K 15[27] 16[15]). They were celebrated for their oracles (2 K 1[2]) and their soothsayers (Is 2^6). Some of them paid tribute to Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17^{11}), after whose death they raided Judah ($21^{16.\ 17}$). Philistia was a refuge for fugitives when the invasions of Shalmaneser II., warring with Benhadad and his allies, caused famine in northern Israel (2 K $8^{2.\ 3}$). Hazael of Damascus captured Gath (2 K 12^{17}). Ramman-nirârî III. of Assyria conquered Damascus and took tribute from the Philistines. At this point there is a wide gap in the Assyrian records. When they again become available, the Philistines, with a multitude of other nations between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean, have become independent of the Assyrian, and are again being reduced to subjection. Uzziah of Judah is especially prominent among the rebel kings. Later, by intrigue and by arms, Tiglath-pileser, to whom Ahaz of Judah was tributary, reduced Gaza and Ashkelon to tribute (B.C. 734). Under Sargon and Sennacherib there were two parties in the Philistine cities, the one favouring Assyria and the other favouring Hezekiah of Judah, and the latter was crushed. From Sargon to Assurbanipal the Assyrians have much to say concerning their Philistine conquests and subjects. The Philistine military operations of Uzziah and Hezekiah were doubtless connected with Assyrian politics (2 Ch $26^{6.\ 7}$, 2 K $18^{7.\ 8}$). Their mutual relations to the Assyrians account for the fact that the Israelite historians and prophets, from Amos to Ezekiel, speak of the Philistines sometimes with denunciation, as enemies, but also often as having a common interest (2 Ch 28^{18}, Is 9^{12} 11^{14}, Am 1^{6-8}, Mic 1^{10-15}, Zeph 2^{4-7}, Jer 47^{4-7}, Ezk $16^{27.\ 57}$ $25^{15.\ 16}$, Am 3^9 6^2 9^7, Zec 9^{5-8}, Jer 25^{18-20}). Gath vanishes from the biblical records (except Mic 1^{10}) from the time of its capture by Uzziah (2 Ch 26^6), and is similarly absent from the Assyrian monuments.

* Moore (Judges, pp. 80, 105) argues that Shamgar appears too early as a champion against the Philistines.

The Philistines suffered greatly in the struggle between Egypt and Assyria, in the decades when the Assyrian power went down. Herodotus says that Psammitichus I. of Egypt, the contemporary of Manasseh and Josiah of Judah, took Ashdod after a siege of 29 years (ii. 157); that in the later part of his reign Scythian hordes plundered the temple of Venus at Ashkelon (i. 105); that his successor Necho, returning from the battle of Megiddo (when Josiah was slain, B.C. 608), captured Gaza (ii. 159); that when Cambyses invaded Egypt, about B.C. 625, Gaza and the whole coast belonged to the king of the Arabians (iii. 5).

This is practically the close of Philistine history, though the cities and some of the institutions long survived, and the region has been the scene of many interesting events. The Ashdodites came into collision with Nehemiah (Neh 4^7 13^{23}). Alexander the Great took Gaza from the Persians. Ptolemy Lagi did notable fighting there. In the Greek accounts of the Maccabæan times the Allophuloi and the land of the Allophuloi figure prominently, and the land thus described is the Philistine country; but the persons called Allophuloi are any heathen in arms against Israel (e.g. 1 Mac 3–4). Sketches of the later history are given under the names of the respective cities.

PHILOLOGUS (Φιλόλογος).—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{15} along with Julia, Nereus, Olympas, and others. The name is common among slaves and freedmen, and in inscriptions of the Imperial household (CIL vi. 4116). Philologus was commemorated with Patrobas (which see) on Nov. 4. Later legends about him will be found in Acta Sanctorum, Nov., ii. 1, p. 222.

The Place and Function of Philosophy.—Man lives, and man thinks about the life he lives. This is the essence of his constitution as man. He is under the constraint of his nature to re-think the life he lives. This is his distinction from the lower animals, who live, but do not think of their life. Admit that man is an animal, and has been produced by evolution. Admit even that there are traces of several mental faculties in the lower animals. Yet the fact remains that for man alone does life present itself as an object of reflexion. For man alone is experience a problem. Philosophy, speaking broadly, is the activity of thought brought to bear on experience as a whole. It is, in Schwegler's phrase, 'the thinking consideration of things.' It is implied in the very fact of experience being a problem that, throughout its manifold and diverse elements, there is a unity of thought, reason, or spirit. If it were not so, experience would not be a problem, for it would never have arisen as a whole out of the succession of separate sensations. It is the task of Philosophy to make explicit this unity which is implicit in human experience. We can see, therefore, in broad outline, the course which the history of Philosophy must take. It is a progress towards unity, towards a synthesis of elements, towards a view of human experience, with its varied contents, from one central standpoint.

The stages of this progress will be marked by the unifying principles which they severally employ. Such a principle, let us suppose, is reached. It serves to explain a number of the particular elements of experience, and to bring them into a harmony which shall be for the time satisfactory to thought and stimulating to action. Soon, however, it is found that this synthetic principle is not adequate to the complexity of life. Elements of experience come into view which refuse to be explained by the alleged universal principle. The harmony which was temporarily reached is broken. Tragic discord appears. The quest for unity has to be resumed with a deeper, sadder, insight, and a larger, more patient wisdom. As we review the history of Philosophy, accordingly, we see that no speculative system is final. Each system, in turn, has failed. We see, moreover, that Philosophy, if we choose to speak paradoxically, must always end in failure. It is the last result of thought to raise questions which thought alone cannot answer, to penetrate to discords which the energy of thought alone cannot reconcile. This very failure of Philosophy, however, is, in the highest sense, its success. Want of finality in Philosophy, inability to comprehend the variety of experience in one formula, is not a mark of weakness, but of strength. It means that thought is not content with abstractions, but is resolute to face the facts of life in their fulness and their mystery. It is essentially the quest for a synthesis of life. The success of the quest consists in so deepening the problem that it is seen that no merely intellectual synthesis is possible. The problem of Philosophy merges into the problem of Religion; and Philosophy points beyond itself.

Religion and Philosophy thus present many features of resemblance and contrast, and have close and intricate mutual relations. Religion provides the solution which Philosophy seeks. That which is the quest of Philosophy is the realized experience of Religion, a unity in which the profoundest differences in life are actually reconciled, which leaves nothing beyond itself to confound the human spirit, but brings all elements of experience into a perfect spiritual harmony.

Towards religious experience, Philosophy renders a service which is at once apologetic and critical, and is in both aspects helpful and indeed indispensable. Philosophy vindicates the validity and reasonableness of religion. In the words of the Master of Balliol, it provides 'a vindication of the religious consciousness—the consciousness of the infinite—as presupposed in that very consciousness of the finite which at present often claims to exclude it altogether, or to reduce it to an empty apotheosis of the unknown and unknowable' (E. Caird, Essays on Literature and Philosophy, vol. i. p. 224). Philosophy at the same time has to consider the form in which this religious experience at any particular epoch clothes itself. And if it shall appear that the form contradicts the universality and comprehensiveness of the experience of which it is the expression, and is, therefore, falsifying and imperilling that experience, Philosophy must ruthlessly assail that form, and break it up, in name of that principle of reconciliation which is the inspiration and the goal both of thought and action. Religion holds an analogous position toward Philosophy, and has a work to do in its behalf, both constructive and critical. Religion discovers the principle for which Philosophy has been seeking, and exhibits it, not as a theory, but as a power, in the freshness and originality of actual life, transforming character and inspiring service. Philosophy, sinking into exhaustion through the inadequacy of the synthesis which it has reached, is rejuvenated at the fountain of religious experience, and is enabled to meet the deepening complexity of its problem with a more comprehensive and more detailed explanation. Religion at the same time has to consider the intellectual synthesis to which its own inspiration has given birth. And if it shall appear that this synthesis has omitted some element in the problem, and has obtained an appearance of harmony by neglecting some source of discord, and is thus stopping the progress of thought short of its goal, Religion must resist the claim of this Philosophy to be absolute, must emphasize the neglected elements of the problem, and must proclaim again the harmony which triumphs over the discords of life,—a harmony found not in intellectual formulæ, but in the verifiable realities of spiritual experience. It follows that Philosophy and Religion can never in their inner meaning be opposed to one another. They are both necessities of the human spirit. Both alike presuppose the spiritual unity which pervades experience, and makes possible both thought and life. Each has its special function in apprehending and realizing this unity; and in their respective functions each is essential to the other. Those periods in which they come into close and conspicuous contact are peculiarly interesting in the history of each. The most important of these occurred in the beginning of the Christian era. In that period, Greek philosophy reached the goal of its long development. In this article we desire to show what that goal was, and how, in reaching it, Greek philosophy asked a question to which Christianity brought the only adequate answer.

I. The Problem of Greek Philosophy.—The movement of Greek thought falls into three well-marked stages. In the first of these, the principle of explanation is sought beyond consciousness. In the second, a spiritual principle has been won, and is used for the comprehension of all existence, and the erection of a system of encyclopædic knowledge. In the third, thought retreats to the standpoint of the individual; the problem of knowledge is raised in its acutest form; the exhaustion of Philosophy overtakes it, and an intense demand is made for a religious solution.

1. First Stage.—The early Greek thinker looks out upon nature with joyous curiosity, and asks, 'What is the principle which underlies these multitudinous phenomena?' The earliest philosophies contain brief dogmatic answers to this question. They are not valuable in themselves; but they are interesting as stating the problem of Philosophy, and indicating the goal of thought. They are divided into four schools. The Ionic School identified the explanation of all things with one element in nature, saying with Thales (B.C. 640–550), 'all is water'; or with Anaximander (B.C. 611–547), 'all is matter,' τὸ ἄπειρον; or with Anaximenes (B.C. 588–524), 'all is air.' The Pythagorean School passed from substance to the proportion which all things bear to one another, and taught that 'all is number.' The Eleatic School passed still further on the path of abstraction, from 'substance' and 'number' to 'being,' saying with Xenophanes (B.C. 576–480), 'all is one.' The Physicists, in reaction from this abstractness, sought to analyze existence into its material elements. This period closes with Anaxagoras (B.C. 500–428). His great distinction as a thinker is that he relies on the principle of reason, νοῦς, as the principle of explanation. Νοῦς is a world-forming intelligence, acting on the primitive constituents of matter. Thus the first stage in the great movement of Greek philosophy has brought us to a spiritual principle. This is its great achievement, the splendid heritage it hands on to succeeding generations of thinkers. But along with this it also hands on another and less satisfactory heritage, viz. dualism, the opposition of the spiritual and the material, Thought and Extension.

2. Second Stage.—At the period of Greek history at which we have now arrived, about the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., we notice that the interest of thought is turning from the outer world of nature to the inner world of the human spirit. Thought, accordingly, becomes anthropological, and seeks the ultimate principles of truth, not beyond, but within man's consciousness of himself.

(a) The Sophists.—By these men this new departure in the development of Philosophy is inaugurated. One of the most famous of them is Protagoras of Abdera (c. 440 B.C.), a pure subjectivist, who taught that there is no absolute standard either of truth or right. Nothing is good or bad by nature (φύσει), but merely by statute (νόμῳ). Another is Gorgias (c. 427 B.C.), who taught a rigorous individualism, summed up in a series of paradoxes. Nothing exists; or, if something exists, it cannot be known; or, if it can be known, it cannot be communicated. The work of the Sophists was destructive, and often ethically mischievous.

but it was necessary, as a preparation for the great forward movement which Greek philosophy was now to take. Their merit is that they have claimed on behalf of man that the principle which is to explain experience must be in harmony with his self-consciousness. Their defect is that they have construed man too poorly, and have regarded self-consciousness as little more than individual opinion or feeling.

(b) Socrates (B.C. 469–399).—In one sense Socrates is a Sophist. He occupies the position of subjectivity, and is a keen critic of conventional customs, institutions, and dogmas. His aim, however, is always positive. He desires to break through mere opinion in order that he may reach universal principles of thought and action. His method accordingly has a double aspect. It is destructive, an 'irony' by which he destroys the conceit of knowledge and convinces of ignorance, which is the 'original' sin of the Socratic theology; but it is also constructive, an obstetric process, whereby universal truth is brought to the birth, and instinct is raised to the rank of clear self-consciousness. In a word, his method is induction, the process whereby is discerned in a mass of particulars what is universal, and therefore fundamental and true. The last result of this method is condensed into the famous Socratic phrase, 'Virtue is knowledge,' knowledge of universal principles of thought and action. In Socrates the problem of Greek philosophy has deepened so as to include the element of man's conscious life. It has become a moral, even a religious problem, how to live life whole, and reach a complete synthesis of experience. Socrates finds the answer in Thought or the Universal. His gospel is 'Salvation by Wisdom.' Defective as it was, the teaching of Socrates declared the supreme worth of man as a spiritual being. It gave direction to the whole subsequent course of Greek thought, till at length the problem became too complex for the Socratic solution.

(c) Plato (B.C. 427–347) and Aristotle (B.C. 385–322).—Socrates attempted no systematization of thought. He was content with enunciating and illustrating a principle. It was the work of Plato and Aristotle to take the Socratic primacy of thought, and from this standpoint to frame systems of knowledge. Their systems have been called 'splendid digressions.' This would be incorrect if it meant that they were not in the main current of Greek thought. It is true, however, that one element prominent in Socrates is lost in them, to reappear with yet stronger emphasis in the post-Aristotelian thinkers, viz. subjectivity. They treat thought as a universal organ. Man as an individual falls into the background. Their problem is that of all Philosophy, to find a unity that shall reconcile all differences; but among these the self-assertion of the individual and the claim of the particular have not found their place.

The Socratic universal principles are in Plato 'ideas,' which are reached by 'reminiscence,' and form the archetypes of all things. Supreme among the ideas is the Good, the ultimate reality, the common ground of all thought and being. The Good is God; but for Plato the question of the personality of God has not arisen. He is moving in the pure ether of speculation, high above the strife and tragedy which make men so eagerly demand or so passionately deny a personal God. Aristotle occupies the same ground as Plato in holding that the universal is the real. But he has a deeper interest than Plato in the phenomenal and the particular. His aim is to bring the universal and particular together, and to exhibit them in their true relations. The formula he uses is that of Form and Matter, εἶδος and ὕλη. Form acts as a plastic artist, taking up the rude amorphous matter, and transforming or rather forming it into actuality. Not only so, but this relation has stages: that which is Form to what is beneath it, being Matter to what is above it. Thus there is a chain of being with mere Matter at one end and pure Form at the other. Pure Form originates the whole movement of existence, but is itself unmoved. It is Thought, in its pure activity, having no object but itself, Very Thought of Very Thought, νόησις νοήσεως. Thus the high level of Greek speculation is theism, not that of the Hebrews with its ethical content, but a theism of thought, in which God abides by Himself in the bliss of perfect knowledge.

Both in Plato and in Aristotle the Unity is magnificent, but it is incomplete. The dualism of Anaxagoras is not yet exorcized. The phenomenal and the individual still fall apart from this sublime transcendental Thought. They must receive their proper place before a true unity can be reached, and when it is, it will not be merely intellectual.

3. Third Stage.—In this, the closing period of Greek philosophy, a great change has come over the ancient world. It is the age of world-wide empire, crushing out the earlier civic life. It is therefore also the age of individualism.

In Plato and Aristotle we are aware of an aloofness from the problems that most interest us; but in the post-Aristotelian philosophies we find an affinity with our modes of thought and our general attitude toward life which make them interesting and valuable, though speculatively they are beneath the level of the great encyclopædic systems which immediately preceded them. The Philosophy of this period is intensely and increasingly occupied with the needs of man. To begin with, it is essentially Ethic, and this Ethic is meant to suffice man for religion. As it advances, it becomes more and more religious, till in the end, in Neoplatonism it is avowedly Religion. The systems of this period all logically connect themselves with elements to be found in Aristotle. In Aristotle we have still the Greek dualism unreconciled. Form and Matter, Reason and Sense, are still in opposition. Accordingly we find: (a) one system which makes Reason its ruling principle; (b) another which chooses Sense for its keynote; (c) a third which chooses either element to contradict and destroy the other; (d) finally, a system which strives to rise above the antagonism of elements, and makes a leap for unity.

(a) The first is Stoicism, which regards the soul of the universe as rational, and gives to it the significant title of the Logos. Of this rational whole of things, man is part. He finds salvation, accordingly, in living according to nature, taking his place at the standpoint of all governing Reason. Thus all things work together for his good. Stoicism, to its eternal honour, lays hold of human personality, and attributes to it absolute independence and infinite worth. In this aspect it approximates to Christianity, and formed a mental and moral discipline which prepared the Roman world for the preaching of the gospel. At the same time, Stoicism failed as a redemptive power in the fast-growing corruption of the Roman world. It is 'Salvation by Wisdom,' limited, therefore, to the few, and precarious even in them. Reason fails as a reconciling, unifying principle. See STOICS.

(b) The second is Epicureanism, which frankly makes matter the ground of all things, sense the ultimate principle of knowledge and action. The Epicurean, like the Stoic, said, 'Live according to nature'; but nature, as he conceived it, was material only, and the end of a life within its limits is no more than pleasure. Such a principle does not necessarily lead to vice; but it may lead to this as well as to virtue; and in any case it fails to organize life into a whole, or quicken it with sustained energy. Epicureanism is the intellectual expression of the decay of moral life in the Roman world. See EPICUREANS.

(c) The third is Scepticism, which, by keeping rigidly to the individualism which was common alike to Stoicism and Epicureanism, showed that no absolute truth of knowledge, no authoritative rule of action, is possible. Thought and life are reduced to the mere play of opinion and impulse. The only possible attitude toward reality is mere suspense of judgment. Such a position is paralysis both mental and spiritual. Scepticism makes articulate the despair which was brooding over the hearts of men. It is the last utterance of Philosophy, and it is the demand for Religion.

(d) The fourth is Neoplatonism. The life of man had become hopeless. The demand of the age, therefore, is not now Wisdom for the conduct of life, but Salvation, σωτηρία, escape from the dissatisfaction of this life, emergence into a higher sphere. To this demand Neoplatonism makes response. It is at once the climax and the destruction of Greek philosophy. In it Thought, the mighty force which had led the human spirit in its quest for unity, breaks down, and gives up the reins of government. After Neoplatonism barbarism followed, and would have followed more disastrously than it did, had not Christianity succeeded to the place vacated by Greek philosophy. The real advance of Neoplatonism on all preceding systems consists in its conception of the speculative and practical problem. The old Greek dualism of Form and Matter is deepened, and is transformed into that of God and the World, the Infinite and the Finite, Good and Evil. It is thus specifically a religious problem; and Neoplatonism is avowedly a religious solution, a Philosophy which takes up all religions into itself, and claims to be the Absolute Religion. The great precursor of Neoplatonism is Philo Judæus. Its chief exponent is Plotinus (A.D. 204–270).

It is impossible here to give any adequate account of the systems of these men, or of the many systems elaborated through the opening centuries of the Christian era. They all occupy the same standpoint, and exhibit many resemblances in their treatment of the problem which they all alike are designed to solve.

It is important, however, to note the three great doctrines into which all Neoplatonic systems may be condensed.

(i.) The Doctrine of God.—God is transcendent, the Absolute, the Original (τὸ πρῶτον), the Unlimited (ἄπειρον). To Him no finite predicates are applicable. He is beyond all determination by human thought. If we attribute to Him power or goodness, it must be remembered that these designations cannot express His real nature.

(ii.) The Doctrine of the World.—Between God and the World, the Infinite and the Finite, there is a great gulf, which Neoplatonism proceeds to fill up with variously conceived schemes of emanation. From the Infinite height there is a descent through less and less perfect beings, till at length crass matter is reached. Only by some such machinery would Neoplatonism allow that God could possibly be the source of material existence.

(iii.) The Doctrine of Man.—Man has in him a spark of the divine. He lies, however, immersed in the sensuous sphere. Salvation for him, therefore, consists in escaping from this sphere and rising into that supersensuous sphere to which he truly belongs. This escape is accomplished in a process of purification (κάθαρσις) by means of ascetic discipline.

To such a system had the long evolution of Greek thought arrived, when Christianity went forth on its mission. With this system Christianity was confronted as its chief antagonist.

II. THE CONTACT OF CHRISTIANITY WITH GREEK PHILOSOPHY.—1. THE CHRISTIAN UNITY. Into the Hellenic world, torn as it was with divisions, hysterically eager for intellectual and moral satisfaction, Christianity entered with the claim to be the unity which men of Hellenic culture, and human hearts everywhere, required and sought for. It differed profoundly, however, from Neoplatonism or any such system, both in the interpretation which it put on the problem and in the nature of the solution it proposed.

(a) The Christian interpretation of the intellectual problem and of the moral need of men. Beneath the opposition of elements, Form and Matter, Infinite and Finite, which was the deepest conception Greek thought had formed of the problem of life, Christianity pierces to antagonism of wills, the personal will of man in revolt from, and out of harmony with, the personal will of God. This is the hurt of the human soul; this is the secret also of the world's pain and unrest. Greek thought never did justice to personality. Pantheism drew the Hellenic mind like a magnet. Its goal was ever absorption of personal life in the wide sea of impersonal being. The hindrance to such a consummation always lay outside the constitution of man, in the material environment of his soul. Christianity boldly grasped the fact of personality; had for its goal the fulness of personal life in communion with a personal God; and saw the hindrance to this consummation within the personal life itself. Evil, the barrier to unity of God and man, is not outside of man, in the material framework in which he finds himself, but within man, in the determination of his will against the divine will.

(b) The nature of the Christian solution. In one word, it was Christ. Christianity, whose keynote, like that of Neoplatonism, is unity, whose phraseology often resembles that of Neoplatonism, differs from it by the whole diameter of mental culture and spiritual experience. It approaches the human spirit, not with a theory, scheme, or process, but with a gospel, a declaration whose sum and substance is Christ Jesus, incarnate, crucified, risen. Holding stedfastly before the eyes of men, as the ultimate problem of life, the reconciliation of wills, human and divine, it proclaims the problem solved, the reconciliation achieved through Christ. Christ is God Incarnate, not a man who has reached the highest point in a process of κάθαρσις, but God, who, in order to effect the reconciliation of man, has entered into humanity, and taken it into union with Himself. The long quest of man for God had ended on the verge of an impassable gulf, across which he vainly sought to cast a rainbow bridge of fair images. In the Incarnation, God of His own proper motion crosses the gulf, and by His own act annihilates the distance. Christ has died for men. That which holds God and man apart is not the frailty of man, as though that could be any real hindrance to spiritual and personal fellowship, or as though the removal of it could secure that fellowship. On this rock Neoplatonism wrecked itself as a redemptive power. The root and secret of man's inability to reach God is sin. He does not need to make himself divine in order to hold communion with God. He does need to be delivered from the burden of guilt. This deliverance has come through the sacrificial death of Christ. Guilt is not a feeling of uneasiness at the division man finds in his own nature. It is the consciousness of alienation from God. Sin is not an element in man's subjectivity, a moment in the process whereby he rises out of individualism. It is an objective reality of the spiritual world, which must be taken out of the way before the human spirit can be at one with God. Christ has done this in the deed of sin-bearing. Christ is risen. His life, while lifted above time and space, is continued in organic union with those who occupy time and space. He raises them through personal union with Himself into union with God. He in them is the source of a life whose spirit is sonship, whose privilege is communion, whose goal is likeness. The occasional ecstasy, which was the highest privilege possible under Neoplatonism, is replaced by a daily fellowship, without ecstasy but with true and abiding intimacy, open not to a few accomplished spirits, but to all who come to God through Christ.

With this the Christian solution is complete. The problem, constituted by antagonism of the human will to the divine, is solved at length.

2. Christianity and the Greek Dualism. — Greek Philosophy, as we have seen in the foregoing sketch, was haunted by a dualism which it sought in vain to overcome. The secret of the failure lay in not conceiving the dualism profoundly enough. Christianity penetrates beneath the dualism of elements to antagonism of wills. The Greek problem lies within the Christian problem. The Christian solution is at the same time also the solution of the Greek problem. This does not mean that Christianity is a philosophy, or has its truth bound up with any special metaphysical system. It is a Religion. But it is a religion which provides the unity sought for by Philosophy.* It contains, therefore, implicitly the answer to the question raised by Philosophy.

(i.) The speculative problem. The Greek mind presupposed the irreconcilability of form and matter. The utmost effort in the direction of reconciliation was that made by Neoplatonism, the filling up of the gulf by a series of emanations. The Christian teachers, surveying the long toil of the Greeks after wisdom, said in effect, 'The ultimate dualism is not that of form and matter; it is that of the divine and human wills. What hinders man from reaching God is not his material environment, but his sin. Christ has taken away the sin of man. The Incarnate Christ may be reached by any human soul, immediately, at a step, a touch, a look. And when Christ is reached, God is reached.' They found, however, that the Greek mind was hag-ridden by phrases and formulæ, Pleroma, Logos, and what not, all implying the impossibility of getting to God except by a clumsy machinery of emanations. They therefore boldly adopted this nomenclature and baptized it into Christ.

What was supposed to be done by emanations, etc., and never really was done, has been done by Christ. He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father. Do they speak of the Pleroma? He is the Pleroma (so in Colossians). Do they speak of the Logos? He is the Logos (so in the Fourth Gospel). These Greek philosophic terms do not indicate that the Christian leaders who use them are sitting at the feet of Greek metaphysicians. The NT conveys a thought which had another origin than the speculations of a Philo; but, entering the Greek world at the time it did, it uses the terms which expressed the endeavour of the Greek mind, to carry the truth which the Greek mind despaired of reaching. In other words, Christianity, not by emanations or by hypostatized abstractions, but by the living Christ, lifts men to a central standpoint, and enables them to look out on experience as a unity, and to see even in its most material elements no remote antithesis to God, but the manifestation of His mind, the instrument of His purpose. God is self-revealing Spirit. The universe is spiritual to its core. Christ has abolished dualism. Christianity, it cannot be too much insisted on, is not a philosophy; but it is the inspiration and the goal of all philosophy.

(ii.) The practical problem. The Greek dualism haunts Greek ethic, and sets Reason and Sense in eternal opposition. The senses, seated in man's material frame, form the great hindrance to virtue. Greek ethic, accordingly, resolves itself very much into various plans for the disposal of the sensual element in man's nature. Neoplatonism preaches the elimination of sense by an ascetic discipline, which shall gradually set the spiritual nature of man free from all perturbation by the senses. Stoicism proclaims the dominion of reason over the passions. Man is to be a despot in the domain of his nature, crushing every uprising of sense with the proud might of reason. Aristotelianism, breathing the classic spirit of Hellenism, teaches that reason is to use sense as an artist uses the material with which he works, and by means of which he elaborates an artistic product.

Tracing evil to the senses as a given element in man's constitution, Greek ethic never deepens toward conviction of sin, has no need or room for redemption, and remains always proud and self-sufficient. Christianity by a deeper analysis traces evil, not to sense as an element in man's constitution, but to will, i.e. to the man himself in revolt from God. It therefore accumulates upon man responsibility for moral evil, and deeply humbles him before God. Christian morality, accordingly has the note of humility and contrition which is absent from Greek ethic. It also exalts man, and holds out to him hope of an attainment far higher than was possible under Greek ethic. Let his will be yielded to God and made one with the divine will. He is then at once placed in a position which is central and supreme. His whole nature, including his material frame, is now a domain wherein the will of God is being progressively realized. The painful and precarious treatment of sense as an alien element is replaced by a process by which every element in man's complex nature is brought into harmony. This process has its human side, requiring strength of will and strenuousness of purpose. It is conducted, however, in the might of a divine energy, and its product, the Christian character, is not a manufactured article in which man may pride himself, but a creation, the work of the Divine Spirit operating immediately upon the surrendered spirit of man.

3. The Relation of Christian Experience to Greek Forms of Thought.—The after-relations of Christian faith to Greek forms of thought have been made a subject of close and prolonged investigation by the modern school of historical criticism of which Harnack is the great representative, and of which Hatch and McGiffert are leading English examples. The work of this school is of priceless value in respect of its pure historical research. But in so far as it is dominated by certain presuppositions, and is determined by a certain preconceived idea, it seems to the present writer to be mistaken in its results. That dogma is 'in its conception and development a product of the Greek spirit on the soil of the gospel' (Harnack) may in a sense be admitted. At the same time, care must be taken in the application of such a principle to do justice to the original content of the gospel with which later reflections had to deal. In the hands of certain members of the school it may be doubted whether this is secured. In the Hibbert Lecture of the late Dr. Hatch, the problem, as conceived by these writers, is expressed with a clearness which leaves nothing to be desired, viz. 'Why an ethical sermon stood in the forefront of the teaching of Jesus, and a metaphysical creed in the forefront of the Christianity of the 4th cent.?' The conclusion to which the brilliant ability and ripe scholarship of the author are devoted is, that this change, being 'coincident with the transference of Christianity from a Semitic to a Greek soil,' is 'the result of Greek influence.' In plain words, primitive Christianity was simple ethical teaching regarding God and duty, undisturbed by intellectual problems, and absolutely free from speculative elements. Theology, as embodied in the great creeds, is a superstructure of mischievous metaphysic reared by the fruitless subtlety of the Greek intellect, which must be swept away before genuine Christianity can be revealed in pristine beauty and power.

* The reference in Col 2^{8} is not to be regarded as a condemnation by the apostle of Philosophy in itself. It has in view a definite form of teaching, easily recognizable by the first readers of the Epistle, though affording matter of inquiry and discussion in later times. This teaching was probably of a theosophic Jewish Christian character, not without relation, as Lightfoot and others have shown, to the Gnostic Judaism of the Essenes (see art. Colossians). Bengel's remark is apposite. 'Philosophia in se est medium quiddam: sed tamen facilior abusus ad fraudem, in ea præsertim philosophia Judaica, quam tum jactabant et puritati fidei attemperare conabantur' (Gnomon N.T. in loc.).

Obviously, then, the question is as to the nature of primitive Christianity. Is it true that it was ethical merely? Is it true that its essence is summed up in the Sermon on the Mount? Is it permissible to lay aside every element in the NT that is not rigidly and exclusively 'ethical'? Is it fair to state the problem as being the transition from the Sermon on the Mount to the Nicene Creed? If the problem be misleading, the conclusions cannot fail to be erroneous. In order to reduce the problem to the simplicity and narrowness of the above statement, the following positions must be maintained. (1) Jesus Christ cannot have been more than a unique religious personality, with deep and true moral instincts, and a high degree of spiritual-mindedness. He cannot have made Himself the centre of His message. His declarations regarding His second coming must have been an afterthought, due to the discovery on His part that His mission was to end in His being rejected and put to death. Here we have to ask: (a) Is this a fair account of the Jesus of the Gospels? Can the personality of Christ as presented in those narratives be reduced to the outlines of such a sketch? Take the picture of Jesus drawn by the historical school and place it beside that given in the Gospels, and say if they are duplicates. If that of the historical school be correct, then that of the Gospels is not merely incorrect in certain features, but is a sheer monstrosity, which invalidates the whole Gospel narrative, and makes it valueless for purposes of sober history. (b) Is it fair to ignore the self-consciousness of Jesus as gathered into His most pregnant sayings? On what principles of historic research is it permissible to discount the self-assertion of Jesus? Has the Self of Jesus not such a place even in that very Sermon on the Mount as to give an entirely different view of the sermon itself, and an entirely different reading of the problem 'from the Sermon on the Mount to the Nicene Creed'? (2) The religion of the primitive disciples must have been simply Jewish Unitarianism and Jewish Legalism, modified in some of their elements by the teaching of Jesus regarding God and duty. Here again the question is as to matter of fact. Is this the whole truth regarding the first generation of Christians? Is this account a fair interpretation of the narrative in the Acts? Can the life and work of the early Church, its worship, its preaching, its missionary impulse, its labours and martyrdoms, be made intelligible on such a supposition? In particular, is it fair to discount the place which the Risen Christ had in the faith of the early Church? Why was He worshipped, prayed to, trusted, served, and that long before Hellenic influence had touched the Church's creed? Give due weight to the self-consciousness of Jesus, estimate aright the place of the Risen Christ in the life of the early Christians; and the positions of Hatch and McGiffert must be profoundly modified. (3) The conceptions of Christ to be found in the NT writings must be due to peculiarities in the intellectual history of their authors, and cannot express anything in the general belief of Christians. On the face of it, such a proposition is utterly improbable. The NT writings are chiefly letters between correspondents. Whatever may have been the intellectual idiosyncrasies of the writers, it is inconceivable that they do not express a consciousness common to writers and recipients. Indeed, this is expressly claimed by the writers, and Paul insists that his teaching is simply the faith of Christian people as such. The existence of a Pauline or Johannine Christianity which was not that of the Church at large, and, in particular, was not the Christianity of Christ, is an unproved hypothesis, not warranted by the known facts of the NT period, and not required for their interpretation.

If, then, the NT as a whole is substantially correct, both in its narratives of events and in its interpretation of them, the problem for the historian is not 'from the Sermon on the Mount to the Nicene Creed,' but 'from the NT as a whole to the Nicene Creed.' The question at issue is, 'Is there anything in the Nicene Creed which, in respect of the truth sought to be expressed, is not already in the New Testament?'

Go back now to the moral and intellectual situation of the age in which Christianity appeared. Greek philosophy has led men to a fundamental dualism, and has uttered the demand of the human spirit for union with God. Neoplatonism, the last despairing effort of Greek thought, fails to meet the demand. Christianity enters the Hellenic world with the proclamation of that for which Hellenic thought had sought in vain, union with God. This, accomplished in Christ, is its message to the Hellenic world, and to the heart of man as such. A mere amended Judaism would have had no point of contact with the Greek mind, or with the spirit of man anywhere. The personal Christ, Son of God and Son of Man, is the centre of the primitive gospel.

Conceive now Christianity entering the Hellenic world; it will bear a twofold relation to Hellenic culture and to Greek forms of thought. (a) It will be influenced by them. It is implicitly the solution of the problem of Greek philosophy. It will thus naturally use the terminology of Greek philosophy, and fill the formulæ of unsuccessful thought with the meanings of a divine revelation. (b) It will stiffly refuse to be coerced by them. The Christian idea of union with God, viz. reconciliation through a Person, utterly transcended Greek thought. Again and again, in the centuries preceding Nicæa, the attempt was made to reduce Christianity to a phase of Greek Philosophy. Sabellianism on the one hand, Arianism on the other, were more logically consistent as speculative systems than the fulness of the gospel. Yet Christianity declined to surrender its independence. In the end the Christian experience was gathered into the Nicene Creed, which, in effect, is this: Christianity, stating, in terms borrowed from Greek Philosophy, that which is too great for any system of philosophy, a truth distinctive, unique, a revelation, not a discovery.

PHINEES (Φινεές, Finees).—1. Phinehas, the son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron. 1 Es 5^{5} $8^{2.29}$ (B Φορός, A Φινεές), 2 Es 1^{2b}. 2. The son of Heli and father of Achias. These three names are mentioned among the progenitors of Ezra only in 2 Es 1^{2a} (cf. the lists in Ezr 7, 1 Es 8): their insertion here is probably an error, since Ezra belonged to the line of Eleazar, and Phinehas son of Eli to the younger branch of the line of Ithamar. 3. A priest of the time of Ezra, and father of Eleazar, 1 Es 8^{63} (LXX ^{62}). H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

PHINEHAS (פִּינְחָס, LXX Φινεές). —1. Son of Eleazar, and his successor in the high priesthood, Ex 6^{25}, 1 Ch 6^{4-50}, Ezr 7^{5}, 1 Es 8^{2}, 2 Es 1^{2}. The circumstance by which Phinehas is chiefly remembered (Nu 25) bears a striking analogy to the most decisive crisis in the life of St. Peter. The great confession at Cæsarea-Philippi was scarcely more significant and epoch-making in the growth of Christian discipleship than was that act of fiery zeal at Shittim in the history of the Old Covenant, when for the first time the Mosaic religion came into collision with Baal worship, its future rival. In both cases we have, 'in the fulness of the time,' a great moral decision to be made of world importance, 'Jehovah or Baal,' 'but whom say ye that I am?' Alike at Shittim and at Cæsarea, amidst a general hesitancy and failure to grasp the situation, there is a prompt response on the part of one alone, followed by the pronouncement on that one of a signal blessing of far-reaching import. When 'Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor' it was no ordinary revolt or murmuring. Something more was needed 'to make atonement' than the official execution by man of 'all the chiefs of the people,' or even than the visitation of a plague by God. The Divine want was satisfied by the personal devotion of the young priest who, while others wept helplessly, identified himself with 'the Lord whose name is Jealous' ('He was jealous with my jealousy among them'), and determined for ever the rightful attitude of a whole-hearted servant of J" towards any encroachments of the abominable idolatries of the heathen. Accordingly we find that the slaying of Zimri and Cozbi was ever after one of the proud and stimulating memories of Israel's past history. In the psalmist's retrospect (Ps $106^{30.31}$) Phinehas, it is implied, was a second Abraham. His deed of faith 'was counted unto him for righteousness, unto all generations for evermore.' The son of Sirach in his 'praise of famous men' stamps Phinehas as 'the third in glory' after Moses and Aaron, 'in that he was zealous in the fear of the Lord, and stood fast in the good forwardness of his soul when the people turned away, and he made reconciliation for Israel' (Sir 45^{23-25}). The slaughter of the apostate Jew and of the king's commissioner at the hands of Mattathias, which initiated the Maccabæan revolt, recalls to the historian the example of Phinehas, and, in his dying exhortation to his sons, Mattathias reminds them how 'Phinehas our father, for that he was zealous exceedingly, obtained the covenant of an everlasting priesthood' (1 Mac $2^{26.54}$). With respect to this covenant, reasons have been given under the article ABIATHAR for believing that the promise to Phinehas of an everlasting priesthood was conditional, as are all the promises of God, and that, in fact, Abiathar was his last direct representative. The other notices of Phinehas in the Bible history are of lesser importance. Nu 31^{6} (P) states that he accompanied the punitive expedition against Midian, not as commander (Jos. Ant. IV. vii. 1), but in his priestly capacity, 'with the vessels of the sanctuary and the trumpets for the alarm in his hand,' in accordance with the law (Nu $10^{8.9}$; cf. 2 Ch 13^{12}). He was leader and spokesman of the deputation from the western tribes to the eastern concerning the erection of the altar Ed (Jos $22^{13.30-32}$); and in Jg 20^{28} the civil war between Benjamin and the other tribes is incidentally stated to have occurred during his high priesthood, and that the ark was then at Bethel (so also Jos. Ant. V. ii. 10), not at Shiloh as previously and subsequently (Jos 18^{1}, 1 S 4^{3}). Ewald (HI iii. 313) notes that the estate given to Eleazar (Jos 24^{33}), being called Gibeath-phinehas, is 'a proof that in popular estimation he ranked even higher than his father.' For this place see art. GIBEAH, 3. According to 1 Ch 9^{20} Phinehas at one time had been superintendent of the Korahite gate-keepers. 'The sons of Phinehas' (Ezr 8^{2}, 1 Es 8^{29}, 1 Es 5^{5}) seems to mean the clan of priests who elsewhere are called sons of Eleazar.

It remains that a brief mention should be made of the legends that gather round Phinehas in Rabbinical literature. His grandfather Putiel (Ex 6^{25}) was identified with Jethro by an absurd etymology, and Phinehas, before his great exploit, had been constantly reproached with his Midianite origin (Sota, Gemara, viii. 6, ed. Wagenseil and Targ. of Jonathan). In the Targ. of Jonathan on Nu 25, twelve signs testify to a Divine interposition in the death of Zimri and Cozbi, and the promise of God receives this remarkable addition: 'I will make him the angel of the covenant, that he may live for ever to proclaim redemption at the end of the days.' A combination of this legend with Mal 4^{5} is the probable origin of the widespread belief in the identity of Phinehas with Elijah (Fabricius, Cod. pseudepig. Vet. Test. ch. 170; Seder Olam, ed. Meyer, pp. 261, 845). He was also identified with the anonymous prophet of Jg 6^{8} (Seder Olam, ch. xx.) and with the prophet who denounced Eli (Jerome, Qu. Heb. on I S 2^{27}). Eusebius (Chron. An. 860) blunderingly identifies Phinehas with Eli. Phinehas was also said to have been the author of the last verse of the Book of Joshua, and of an explanation of sacred names (Fabricius, l.c.).

2. Younger son of Eli, 1 S 1^{3}. Jos. (Ant. V. xi. 2) says that his father had resigned the office of high priesthood to him on account of his old age. It is true that the biblical narrative implies throughout that Hophni and Phinehas performed the active functions of the priesthood, but there seems no other ground for this supposed abdication in favour of the younger son than the fact that the succeeding high priests were descended from him. Hophni was probably childless. Two sons of Phinehas are mentioned, Ahitub (1 S 14^{3}) and Ichabod (1 S 4^{21}). On the other hand, it is almost certain that in 2 Es 1^{2} this Phinehas is reckoned among the high priests. That list alone inserts Heli, Phinees, and Achias (i.e. Ahijah) between Amariah and Ahitub. This is evidently an attempt to make a complete list by adding Eli and his successors, who are ignored in Ch, Ezr, and 1 Es. This is not the place to moralize on the excesses of Phinehas and his brother, or on their indulgent father's dignified but feeble remonstrances, or on their miserable death. Their ritual irregularity, however, demands an explanation. They committed two distinct breaches of the law. (a) It seems clear that 'the memorial,' which in animal peace-offerings was the inner fat (Lv 3), was always burnt on the altar first; that is, the Lord received His portion before either priest or offerer took theirs. (b) The portion of the animal due to the priest was strictly defined, although neither the law of Lv 7^{34} ('the wave breast and the heave thigh have I taken . . . and given unto Aaron the priest and unto his sons as a due for ever from the children of Israel') nor that of Dt 18^{3} ('they shall give unto the priest the shoulder and the two cheeks and the maw') may have been then in force. The worshippers, however, seem to have resented the impiety more than the greed of the priests. The sin of the young men is graphically summed up in the statement that 'they contemned (נאץ) the offering of the Lord' (1 S 2^{17}, on which see Driver or H. P. Smith).

3. Ezr 8^{33}, 1 Es 8^{63}. Father of Eleazar, one of the two priests who received at Jerusalem the offerings brought by Ezra from Babylon.

PHINOE (Φινόε, AV Phinees), 1 Es 5^{31}=Pasea'h (Φισόν), Ezr 2^{49}, Neh 7^{51}.

PHLEGON (Φλέγων).—The name of a Christian greeted with others by St. Paul in Ro 16^{14}. He is commemorated with Herodion and Asyncritus (which see) on April 8 (Acta Sanctorum, April, i. p. 741). The name was borne by a Greek writer of the 2nd cent. who is stated by Origen to have given some information concerning Christ.

PHŒBE (Φοίβη).—In Ro 16^{1} St. Paul commends Phœbe to the Roman Christians. He describes her as (1) 'our sister,' (2) 'a servant (διάκονος) of the Church that is at Cenchreæ'—the port of Corinth. (3) He asks that they 'receive her in the Lord, worthily of the saints, and 'assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need of them.' (4) He says that she has been 'a succourer (προστάτις) of many,' and of himself in particular. It is generally assumed that Phœbe was the bearer of the Epistle, and the words by which she is introduced (συνίστημι ὑμῖν) imply a formal introduction to the Roman community.

Two points demand a short discussion: (1) How far is διάκονος technical? This is the only place where the office is referred to by name in the NT (for 1 Ti 3^{11} $5^{3ff.}$ cannot be quoted), but the younger Pliny (Ep. X. xcvi. 8) speaks of ministræ in the Christian Church, and there are constant references to them under the names of διάκονος (ii. 26) and διακόνισσα (viii. 19, 20, 18) in the Apostolic Constitutions. Moreover, the circumstances of Oriental life must have made it necessary that there should be female attendants to perform for women what the deacons did for men, in baptism, in visiting the women's part of the house, and in introducing women to the bishop or deacons (Apost. Const. iii. 15, etc.). There is no occasion, therefore, for thinking that the word has not, at any rate to a certain extent, a technical meaning, but we have not sufficient grounds for assuming an order of deaconesses in the later sense. The translation 'servant,' however, is inadequate.

(2) The description of her as προστάτις suggests that she was a person of some wealth and position. This word again is probably technical. It implies the legal representative or wealthy 'patroness.' Her residence at Cenchreæ — the port towards Ephesus—would enable her to exercise the duties of hospitality, and to give other forms of assistance to Christians on their first landing in the country, and to help what must have been a small and struggling Church. She is commemorated on Sept. 3. See Acta Sanctorum, Sept., vol. i. p. 602.

i. Sources.—The sources of our knowledge of Phœnician history and civilization are contained in—(a) Inscriptions in the Phœnician language. These are very numerous, amounting to some thousands. They have been found in Phœnicia itself and in Cyprus, Egypt, Greece, the islands of Melita, Gaulos, Sicily, Cossura, Sardinia, and Corsica, as well as in Africa, Italy, France, and Spain. Whilst these are invaluable for the restoration of the language (especially such as have Greek transliterations and translations appended), unfortunately very few are of historical interest, few are of any length, few have been found in Phœnicia itself, and, with one exception, none are earlier than the Persian period. The oldest known is CIS No. 5. This is on the fragments of a bowl discovered in Cyprus ('in insula Cypro, casu [ut putamus] reperta') but belonging to a temple of Ba'al not far from Sidon, and on palæographical grounds is assigned to the 9th cent. B.C. It mentions a 'Hiram, king of the Sidonians,' but it remains uncertain to which of the kings of this name it refers. The remaining inscriptions consist mostly of dedications and memorials on tombs, with two or three pertaining to sacrifices. Their chief value lies in the names of kings they contain, and in the proper names containing names of gods.*

(b) The Egyptian hieroglyphic and Babylono-Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions contain many references to the land of Phœnicia, and give some idea of its relation to foreign powers from the 16th cent. B.C. to the Persian period. The Tel el-Amarna tablets give a glimpse into contemporary history which is valuable and probably characteristic. Much, however, remains to be done in the classification and identification of the geographical names in the cuneiform inscriptions. For the Egyptian much has been done by W. Max Müller.†

(c) References to the Phœnicians, and especially to Tyre and Sidon with their dependencies, in the Old Testament.—These occur in writings extending over a period of about four centuries (9th to 5th cent. B.C.). They consist partly of short notes ethnographical (more properly geographical) as in Gn 10; archæological or geographical, as in Dt 3^{9}, Jos 13^{4}; historical, as in 1 K 5 and 16; or relating to religion, as in 1 K 11^{5}. In addition to these the longer passages in the books of Isaiah (ch. 23), Jeremiah (chs. 25. 27. 47), and Ezekiel (chs. 26–32) give a striking picture of the commerce and civilization of the chief Phœnician

* The Phœnician inscriptions are collected in the Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum, pt. i. vols. i. and ii., Paris, 1881–99. Further details as to some of them, and two or three new and recently discovered inscriptions, will be found in the Oriental Journals of Germany, Vienna, Paris; in the Revue d'Assyriologie, vol. v. No. 1, and other journals.

† The references to Phœnicia in the Egyptian inscriptions will be best found in Flinders Petrie's History of Egypt, Brugsch's Egypt under the Pharaohs, and W. Max Muller's Asien und Europa. The Tel el-Amarna tablets are edited by Winckler, The Tell el-Amarna Letters. A very useful compendium with much valuable comment is contained in Flinders Petrie's Syria and Egypt from the Tell el-Amarna Letters, London, 1898. The best collection of Babylonian and Assyrian inscriptions is in Schrader's Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek vols. i.–iv.

(d) Greek writings.—For fragments of two of the most important writings on Phœnician history we are indebted to Josephus, Eusebius, and others whose writings we have, who may have taken them from the encyclopædic writer Alexander Polyhistor. Menandros of Ephesus, who seems to have flourished about the 2nd cent. B.C., wrote a history or chronicle of some at least of the Phœnician cities. The first fragment (in Josephus, c. Ap. i. 18 and in part also in Ant. VIII. v. 3) contains Tyrian annals, with a list of kings from the early part of the 10th cent. B.C. to the founding of Carthage at the close of the 9th century. A second fragment (Ant. IX. xiv. 2) tells of a siege of Tyre under Shalmaneser, and a third (c. Ap. i. 21), usually ascribed to Menandros, though he is not explicitly mentioned as the author, gives further chronology and list of kings from a siege of Tyre under Nebuchadnezzar to the accession of Cyrus to the throne of Persia. Three other smaller pieces are of minor importance.

Dios, an otherwise unknown writer, is quoted in Jos. c. Ap. i. 17 as having written an accurate history of Phœnicia. The extract given tells of Hiram the contemporary of Solomon. Two or three other authors are mentioned in Greek literature as writers on Phœnician history, but their works have perished.—Quite different in character from the works mentioned seems to have been the Phœnician history of Philo Byblios, a writer of the end of the 1st cent. A.D. His work professed to be a translation of the writing of a Phœnician named Sanchuniathon who lived in the period before the Trojan war. The portions of his work preserved for us by Eusebius show him to have been a euhemerist, who in his description of the gods and his cosmogony has used Phœnician material, but has so adapted it to suit his own views that his work can be used only after most searching criticism. — Besides the above works, there are references in Greek writings too numerous to be mentioned here. The Iliad mentions 'Sidon,' 'Sidonians,' and 'Phœnicians,' and the Odyssey the same, with the addition of 'Phœnicia.' Herodotus tells of Phœnician legends and commerce, and many writers after him have incidental notices of this land and people.—Of Roman writers, one deserves mention. In the prologue to the 18th book of Justin's epitome of the history of Pompeius Trogus (about the beginning of the Christian era) occur the words, 'Inde (continentur) origines Phœnicum et Sidonis et Veliæ Carthaginisque res gestæ in excessu dictæ.' The only section that remains is in Justin, xviii. 3 ff., and was probably taken from a work of Timagenes (1st cent. B.C.).†

(e) Archæological remains.—Underground Phœnicia is still almost entirely unexplored, though a beginning has now been made at Sidon. Scattered about, however, on the surface of the ancient Phœnician land are remains of walls, fortifications, temples, and tombs, which help to tell the story of bygone days. Of the colonies, Cyprus and Carthage have yielded a large number of articles (vases, statuettes, etc. etc.), which throw light on the arts and daily life of the people. Coins also, and seals, though not in large numbers, are now to be found in museums (see below under 'Civilization and Commerce').

ii. THE COUNTRY.—(a) Extent and natural features. Although the Phœnicians inhabited cities as far north as Myriandos (in the Gulf of Alexandretta) and as far south as Jaffa (see below) in the Persian period, the earlier Phœnician territory may be said roughly to have been bounded on the north by the river Orontes or Mt. Casius, and on the south by Mt. Carmel. On the east the limits are entirely unknown, but the Bargylos and Lebanon ranges seem to form natural boundaries on that side. Colonists from Sidon, however, appear to have pushed their way as far inland as the neighbourhood of the sources of the Jordan (Jg 18). The land thus consisted of two distinct regions: (1) The hill-country, i.e. the slopes of Bargylos (Nusaireyah) and Lebanon. Both these ranges extend from N. to S.: the former from Antioch to the river Eleutheros, the latter from this point to the mountains of N. Galilee and Hermon. They are of limestone, with many other formations, and in some parts reach a height of over 10,000 ft. The scenery is magnificent, especially in the great gorges where the rivers pass down into the plains. The vegetation is luxuriant for a long distance up the slopes, and the many flourishing villages on the side of the Lebanon facing the sea to-day, tell us of one part of Phœnician life which has vanished almost entirely from its history. The chief rivers are the Eleutheros, which separates Bargylos from Lebanon; the Adonis, famous in history; and the Lycos, at the mouth of which still remain the well-known Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions. But besides these there are many small streams which pour down from every mountain slope, full in the rainy season, empty in the dry, and for this very reason affecting both commercial and military movements. (2) The plains are best known as containing nearly all the cities that have left their mark in Phœnician history. The extreme north is a mere strip of land between the mountains and the sea, and the first great plain is that extending for about 60 miles south from Gabala, with a width varying from 2 to 10 miles, and containing the cities of Arvad and Simyra. The next piece of open country is that from the Lycos river to a few miles below Beyrût, then follow the plains of Sidon, about 10 miles long and 2 broad, Tyre about 20 miles long and from 1 mile to 5 miles broad, and Acre about 8 miles long and 6 broad. These plains as well as the hilly slopes were famous for their cultivation, and there are traces to-day, in the remains that are found, of the industries that were carried on in them. But they owe their fame mostly to the fact that they are the highways along which the trade of the East came to the West. The inscriptions at the mouth of the Lycos, the annals of Egypt and Assyria, and the descriptions of the OT prophets, all bear witness to the constant traffic and frequent invasions that were made possible by this low-lying coast-land of Phœnicia.*

* For a complete list of OT passages referring to Phœnicia, see the Concordances s. 'Sidon,' 'Sidonians,' 'Tyre,' 'Arvad,' 'Gebal,' and consult the table in Gn 10; see also CANAAN in vol. i. p. 347. Tyre and Sidon are mentioned in the NT by the Synoptists, Mt 11$^{21.22}$ 15^{21}, Mk 3^{8} 7$^{24.31}$, Lk 4^{26} 6^{17} 10$^{13.14}$, and in Ac 12^{20} 21$^{3.7}$ 27^{3}. In Mk 7^{26} the adjective Συροφοινίκισσα occurs.

† The fragments of Menandros are collected in Müller's Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, vol. iv. p. 445 ff., but to Müller's list must be added the paragraph contained in Jos. Ant. IX. xiv. 2, and it should be noticed that a part of the first piece is repeated in Ant. VIII. v. 3. It will be observed that Josephus says that Menandros wrote of the 'kings of the Greeks and the Barbarians.' The fragment of Dios is contained in the same volume (Fragm. Hist. Gr. iv. 393), where the author is identified with Ailios Dios; but this is very doubtful. The remains of Philo Byblios are collected, ib. iii. 560 ff. The value of his work has been much discussed by scholars. A good essay on the subject is that of W. Baudissin in his Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 1–46. His conclusion is that Philo has taken his material from various sources—some Semitic—and given to it the name of a man of antiquity. Sanchuniathon is a genuine Phœnician name. In any case the work as a whole represents Phœnician religion in its decline, not in its origin.

* A description of the old Phœnician territory at the present time may be read in Renan, Mission de Phénicie; Walpole, The Ansayrii; Réclus, l'Asie Antérieure; and Baedeker's Palestine and Syria.

(b) History of the country.—The earliest historical mention of the Phœnician land is in the older Egyptian inscriptions, where it appears under the name of Dahe (or Zahi).* Between B.C. 1587 and 1562 Aahmes reached it in his northern conquests. He also mentions a people called the Fenkhu as workers in his quarries. Thothmes I. (1541–16) overran the whole length of Syria as far as the Euphrates. Thothmes III. (1503–1449) in his 23rd year records a victory over the Fenkhu and other Syrians; in his 29th year another campaign to Retennu, Tunep, Arvad, and Zahi, with much Phœnician spoil; in his 30th year a campaign to Kedesh, Simyra, and Arvad; and in his 34th year a campaign which brought tribute from Zahi, Retennu, and Asi (Cyprus). In the reign of Amenophis III. (1414–1379) Egyptian power seems to have been at its highest, and Phœnicia, with the rest of Syria, was entirely subject to it. The next reign, that of Amenophis IV. (or Akhenaten, 1379–66), is one of decay. The discovery of the Tel el-Amarna tablets has given us a rather fuller insight into the relation of Phœnicia to Egypt than we have had hitherto, for some of the letters contained in these tablets are from or to Egyptian governors and others in Phœnician cities. Thus we have mention of Abimilki of Tyre, Amunira of Beyrût, Khaib, commissioner of Simyra, Ribaddi of Gubla, Shutatna of Akko, Zimrida of Zidon, etc. Nearly all the letters tell the same story of attacks from without and rebellion within, and prove that whether Phœnicia now made a stand for independence or became a prey to other rising empires, it was at this time passing from Egyptian dominion. The Egyptians still made raids into Phœnician territory or marched through it (cf. the inscription of Ramses II. at the mouth of the river Lycos) to attack other enemies, and Phœnicians probably still paid tribute from time to time to Egypt. We have no details of the history of the land at this time. We know, however, that it never formed one united kingdom. Its history is the history of its cities. Of these, Arvad seems to have enjoyed a pre-eminence in the earliest times, and more certainly Sidon a little later. The whole people was sometimes known to foreigners as the Sidonians. The era of Tyre began about B.C. 1197 (according to Jos. Ant. VIII. iii. 1); but Arvad and Sidon were still independent cities in the 9th cent.: in the 8th Tyre seems to bear rule over Sidon, Akko, and other cities. Later, Diodorus Siculus (xvi. 41) mentions a united council of men of Arvad, Tyre, and Sidon at Tripolis (native name unknown). This development of the government of cities was not without foreign intervention. The Egyptians had scarcely ceased troubling them when they were brought face to face with danger from a new quarter. It is possible that as early as 1140 Nebuchadnezzar I. of Babylonia invaded their country (cf. Winckler, Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens, p. 95 and note 18). Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1100) also seems to have reached the Mediterranean coast near Arvad. In the 9th cent. Assurnaẓirpal raided the country, as did his successor, Shalmaneser II., who received tribute from Tyre and Sidon and Byblos (Gebal), as well as from Jehu king of Israel; and Mattanbaal king of Arvad fought with Ahab at the battle of Karkar (854). In the 8th cent. the cuneiform inscriptions record tribute received by Tiglath-pileser III. from Arvad, Tyre, and Gebal; and Menander tells of a siege of Tyre by Shalmaneser IV. which lasted for five years. In the following century Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon all sent their armies to Phœnicia, and the last named even to Idalion in Cyprus; and in the 6th cent. the new Babylonian empire continued the work of Assyria in the famous siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar. With the rise of the Persian empire came a change which greatly benefited the Phœnicians. Cyrus seems to have left them alone, and about this time they again supplied the Jews with materials for building their temple (Ezr 3[7]). Cambyses enrolled them in a satrapy with Cyprus, Syria, and Palestine, and thus received from them their share of tribute; but was friendly to them, and depended on them entirely for his navy (cf. Herod. iii. 19); nor did he attempt force against them even when they refused to give him ships wherewith to attack Carthage. The Phœnician fleet continued to do good service for the Persians, especially against the Greeks, until 351, when Sidon, under Tabnit, revolted; but Ochus soon brought Phœnicia back to obedience, and its cities continued to flourish under their native kings until after the battle of Issus they fell into the hands of Alexander the Great, Tyre only after suffering a long siege and a cruel punishment. After Alexander's death, Phœnicia fell with Syria to Laomedon, then in 320 to Ptolemy Lagi, and in 314 to Antigonus. In 287 it again passed to the Ptolemies, who held it until 198, when it became part of the Seleucid empire. During all this period Greek manners and customs and language were largely introduced into the country. Finally, after it had shared with Syria in the many vicissitudes of the Seleucid power, in 65 Rome took possession, and Phœnicia was included in the province of Syria under a proconsul or pro-prætor, though Tyre, Sidon, and Tripolis remained free cities with their own elected magistrates and council (cf. Ac 12[20f.]). In Mk 7[24-30] a woman of this country is called a Syro-phœnician; in Mt 15[21-28] the older name 'Canaanitish' is used. For this section, see, further, the Literature cited in the notes to 'Sources,' above.

(c) Greater Phœnicia.—A sketch of the history of Phœnicia would be incomplete without a notice of the many ports, especially in the Mediterranean, where its people settled, and from which came many of those articles of commerce which made them renowned. Some of these settlements can be traced back to the 15th cent. B.C. There may have been some before that time; but records fail us. In some of these places the Phœnicians seem to have had real colonies, in others merely 'factories,' where their traders received the wares of the neighbouring country to export them to their own land. Cyprus was very early settled by them, and although the Greeks afterwards took much of the island, the towns of Kition and Idalion flourished up to Roman times (see CYPRUS). The islands of the Ægean Sea (including Crete, Rhodos,

* W. Max Müller suggests that this name may be connected with the root כנע; 'to be beautiful,' כון 'to act well'; cf. צהר 'to shine' (Asien und Europa, p. 176). This name begins to go into the background in the 12th cent., and is almost forgotten in the Ptolemaic period. Kaft or Keft (in the inscription of Thothmes III. etc.) is frequently taken to indicate the Phœnician coast (cf. Sayce in article CANAAN), but Müller (p. 337 ff.) argues strongly for its representing Cilicia. Canaan is a geographical term denoting the low land, and seems to have been used by the Phœnicians themselves at one time to denote their land (see CANAAN). The name Φοινίκη given by the Greeks (it occurs in Odyss. iv. 83) has given rise to much discussion. It seems to have been used (like Ἑλλάς) for the land where Phœnicians dwelt, whether at home or abroad; thus Euripides (Tro. 221) uses it for Carthage. The older derivations of the name Φοίνικες (Phœnicians) from φοῖνιξ, the bird ('phœnix'), or a 'palm,' are fanciful and secondary. Some derive the word from φοινός, 'brownish-red,' as denoting the colour of the skin (Pietschmann, Gesch. d. Phönizier, p. 13), a root which reappears in the Latin Pœnus ('Punic' of Carthaginians). Some (cf. CANAAN and Ed. Meyer, Gesch. d. Alterthums, §§ 180, 190, etc.) refer both these names back to the word 'Fenkhu,' which appears in the inscription of Thothmes III. at Karnak. To this Müller objects (p. 208 ff.), that this word was originally only an Egyptian term used in a general sense for the northern barbarians. Finally, Ed. Glaser (Punt und die südarabischen Reiche, 1899) has revived the view that the name is connected with the 'Punt' (or Powen-at=Poen-at) of the Egyptian inscriptions, a part of South Arabia and East Africa.

Kythəra, and many others) were occupied by them —as many scholars hold—even in pre-Homeric times (cf. Bérard, 'Les Phéniciens et les poèmes Homériques,' in Revue de l'histoire des Religions, xxxix. 173–228 and 419–460). The advance of the Greeks, and consequent expulsion of the Phœnicians from these islands, seems to have led to an increased interest in the settlements in the West Mediterranean, some of which, at least, had been founded long before. Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Malta, Gaulos, Tarshish, and Gades in Spain, various places in N. Africa, including the famous Carthage, were settled by them, and were in constant communication with the home country. Many of these settlements have been assigned by history and tradition to certain Phœnician cities, e.g. Utica and Carthage to Tyre, and Carthage itself seems to have established new trading ports on the opposite coast of the Mediterranean. (For settlements outside the Mediterranean, see paragraph in small type below).

iii. THE PEOPLE.—The origin of the Phœnician people is wrapped in mystery. According to their own traditions of the 5th cent. B.C., they dwelt formerly by the Erythræan Sea (Herod. vii. 89; cf. i. 1), i.e. the Indian Ocean, including the Persian Gulf. This tradition is repeated by other classical authors—Strabo, Justin, Pliny, et al. Justin enlarges the story by a statement that an earthquake was the cause of their movement, and that they dwelt then near the 'Assyrian lake' (XVIII. iii. 2); and Strabo (who in I. ii. 35 regards the story of the migration as untrustworthy) says (in XVI. iii. 4) that in the Persian Gulf are two islands—Turos and Arados—whose temples resemble those of the Phœnicians, and that the inhabitants of these islands say that the Phœnician islands are named after them, and their towns are settlements from themselves. Sayce (note to Herod. i. 1) suggests that the similarity of names gave rise to the whole legend, and points out that the names are really different, as according to Ptolemy and Pliny the real name of the island in the Persian Gulf was Tylos, while the Phœnician city Tyre was צר, and the Phœnician Arados was properly Arvad. Failing historical evidence, we are led to such testimony as we can get from language, anthropology, and religion. This is avowedly incomplete at the present time; but the material available shows the Phœnicians of the Syrian coast to have been a Semitic people, who took part in the great migration to the West which at different times sent also the Aramæans to Syria and the Hebrews and their kin to Palestine.

It has long been known that the activity of the Phœnicians was not confined to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean, and it has been suspected that the Phœnicians of the Syrian coast were perhaps only one branch of a race which had settlements in other parts of the Semitic world. A work entitled, Punt und die südarabischen Reiche, by Eduard Glaser, the famous traveller in South Arabia, appeared in the end of 1899, in which evidence has been gathered from the records of Egypt and the South Arabian inscriptions to show that these conjectures are supported by history. According to Glaser, the land of Punt, so often mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions, was a large part of the coasts of East Africa and South Arabia. Thence the Egyptians obtained incense, gold, etc. From this land were established several colonies, including Mashonaland and Socotra. But the remains in the former place are evidently Phœnician, various signs indicate the identity of the races inhabiting the land of Punt, and the name itself is identical with 'Phœnician.' Thus we must in future speak of two branches of the Phœnician people, a Northern on the coasts of Syria, and a Southern (of the same race, language, and origin as the Northern) which left the Erythræan Gulf at a very early period, and ceased from that time to influence the other members of the race. The confirmation or otherwise of this theory must depend on the further evidence of the Babylonian and S. Arabian inscriptions.

iv. ALPHABET AND LANGUAGE.—(a) The Phœnician alphabet is purely consonantal, and consists of 22 characters, written from right to left. Tradition says that this was the first alphabet invented—

> 'Phœnices primi, famæ si creditur, ausi
> Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.'—(Lucan).

It is, however, generally recognized that the invention consists in the taking over of signs used originally by other peoples to denote syllables, and the adaptation of these to denote simple sounds, together with the simplification of what were originally pictorial or hieroglyphic characters. Together with this we must recognize that some letters were not taken over directly, but were formed by slight modifications of those thus received (thus the sign for the rough aspirate h is formed from that of the simple h by the addition of a stroke to the left). Various opinions are held as to the original source. Until lately the favourite view has been that the Phœnicians borrowed their characters from the Egyptian. This was also held in ancient times, and is mentioned in Tacitus—'Primi per figuras animalium Ægyptii sensus mentis effingebant . . . et literarum semet inventores perhibent; inde Phœnicas, quia mari præpollebant, intulisse Græciæ gloriamque adeptos, tamquam repperierint quæ acceperant' (Ann. xi. 14). Supporters of this opinion are divided as to whether the Phœnician characters were derived directly from the hieroglyphs or from the hieratic writing. Much has been written of late to show that the Babylono-Assyrian cuneiform is the real source of the Phœnician alphabet. This opinion was also held in early times. Pliny says, 'Litteras semper arbitror Assyriis fuisse, sed alii apud Ægyptios a Mercurio, ut Gellius, alii apud Syros repertas volunt' (Nat. Hist. vii. § 37). The widespread use of the cuneiform characters about the time to which is assigned the invention of the Phœnician alphabet, is used to support this hypothesis. A third view held by some corresponds in some degree with the last mentioned by Pliny, and derives the Phœnician characters from the Cypriote, which are connected with the so-called Hittite characters. This opinion is altogether too undeveloped at present to be judged properly. Nor is it easy to decide as to the Egyptian and Assyrian theories. The selection of the characters to which the Phœnician are referred seems arbitrary, and a succession of intermediate forms is wanting. Either view seems to be historically possible, neither proved. The Phœnician alphabet, like most others, seems to have only incompletely represented the sounds of the language. Two words beginning in Phœnician with the same letter are represented in Greek by different letters, צור = Τυρος, צדן = Σιδών. These characters are identical with those found on the Siloam inscription in Judæa and the Moabite Stone, and on early Jewish coins, and may thus be called Canaanitish (in the large sense) as well as Phœnician. The early Greek alphabet was also derived from the Phœnician (cf. Herod. v. 58), though soon altered in many ways to suit the needs of the Greek language.

(b) The language of Phœnicia is pure Semitic, and belongs to the same branch of that family as the Hebrew, the Moabitish, and the Semitic glosses in the Tel el-Amarna letters, forming with these (and probably other dialects of which we have no remains) the so-called Canaanitish group. The materials for an exact comparison with Hebrew are wanting. The inscriptions (with the single exception of CIS i. 5, see above under 'Sources') are later than the 6th cent., and mostly of the 4th and later, when the language had probably suffered a certain amount of decay. The Punic passages in Plautus are of the end of the 3rd cent., and can be used only with care (cf. Nöldeke, Die semitischen Sprachen, p. 25 f.), and the vowel letters in the inscriptions are rare. The consonants are the same as in Hebrew, but many words were probably pronounced with different vowel sounds from those used in the same words in Hebrew. The wau conversive with the imperfect, so familiar in Hebrew, is wanting in the Phœnician, which, on the other hand, seems to have formed a kind of pluperfect with kān (CIS 93). Words, too, that became rare or poetical in Hebrew were in common use in Phœnician. The later language shows the same weakening and confusion of gutturals that marks late Hebrew.

LITERATURE.—On the Phœnician alphabet see de Rougé, Memoires sur l'origine égyptienne de l'alphabet phénicien, 1874; Deecke, "Ursprung d. altsemitischen Alphabets aus d. neu-assyrischen Keilschrift,' in ZDMG xxxi. 102 ff.; and cf. Zimmern, ib. i. 667 ff.; Isaac Taylor's, The Alphabet[2], where the Egyptian origin is accepted; Ball, 'Origin of the Phœnician Alphabet,' in PSBA, 1893, 392-408; Berger, L'écriture dans l'antiquité. Conder, in The Bible and the East, p. 74 ff., supports the Cypriote origin.

The inscriptions are collected in the French Corpus; the words in them are collected in Bloch's Phœnicisches Glossar (Berlin, 1891); and esp. by Lidzbarski, Handbuch d. nordsemitischen Epigraphik (Weimar, 1898). The words in Plautus are discussed by Gildemeister in Ritschl's edition of Plautus, vol. ii. fasc. 5 (Leipzig, 1884). A fuller discussion of these by Prof. D. S Margoliouth will appear in a forthcoming number of the Classical Review. The only grammar of Phœnician is Schroder's Phœnizische Grammatik (Halle, 1869). Cf., further, article on LANGUAGE OF OT.

v. CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT.—The Phœnicians never appear in history as one united people under one government. Their political history resolves itself into the history of their chief cities. Naturally a quiet and unwarlike people (Jg 18[7]), the country folk were probably content with the simpler forms of local or patriarchal government usual among Eastern peoples, depending for help in time of need upon the city that was nearest to them or which they had originally left as settlers. In the cities the government was more conventional. Kings of Sidon, Tyre, Gebal, Kition, and Idalion are mentioned in the OT, in foreign records, and on the Phœnician inscriptions. From Menander's list of the kings of Tyre we can see that the monarchic power remained in the same family, except when revolutions broke the order of succession. As to the constitution of the court circle, we can only gather from our knowledge of Carthage, and of the Semitic states bordering on Phœnicia, that there existed an aristocracy which probably owed its existence in early times to prominent position in the tribes. In some of the cities a body of ten chiefs (Justin, xvii. 6. 1) seems to have been prominent in international business. This seems to have been part of a larger council of a hundred men. Of the organization of the traders, the most important part of the population, we know nothing. A tradition in Justin (xviii. 3) seems to indicate the presence of a large slave population. Among the different cities it was inevitable that one or another should gain some pre-eminence over the others. This is historically proved by the fact that at one time Sidon gave its name to the Phœnician people as a whole, while in OT times Tyre evidently had some kind of supremacy. For the Persian period Diodorus Siculus (xvi. 41) mentions a federal government with headquarters at Tripolis, where Arvad, Sidon, and Tyre held a common council. Even when under the sway of foreign powers, the chief Phœnician cities seem to have always maintained a large amount of self-government in internal affairs; and under the Romans we know that Sidon, Tyre, and Tripolis retained the rank of 'free cities,' with the right to appoint their own councils and magistrates.

vi. CIVILIZATION AND COMMERCE.—The people were originally, in all probability, largely agricultural. The inscription of Thothmes III. mentions among the spoil of Phœnicia, 'good bread and various bread, corn in grain, flour . . . and all good fruits of the land.' But though the agricultural class doubtless existed throughout its history, it soon yielded in importance to those of the manufacturers, merchants, and seamen, who received raw material from various parts of the known world, and sent it forth again in new and more useful or more beautiful forms, or contented themselves with simply acting as intermediaries with profit to themselves. Their navigation, originally taken up for business purposes, became later a great source of influence and probably of wealth to them, when they provided a navy for their Persian rulers. Phœnicia was essentially mercantile, and was warlike only when commercial life was threatened. Situated on the only part of the Syrian coast that had any pretence to natural harbours, and hemmed in by lofty mountains on the north and east, its people naturally turned to the sea. And so the sea soon carried their ships; its shells gave them their valuable dyes, and its sand the material for their glass. The meeting of the land trade-routes from Asia and Africa, and of the sea-routes from all parts of the Mediterranean, made alike the history and the civilization of Phœnicia. The land-routes existed for natural reasons; the sea-routes were due to the skill and enterprise of the sailors who pushed their way from island to island, and cape to cape, until they reached the southern capes of Spain, and passed through the Straits of Gibraltar. Yet the people do not seem to have been very original or inventive, and their chief merit seems to have been rather the power of adapting and fitting for commercial purposes the arts they learned from others. They had, too, the advantage of being able to collect in one place the products of many lands, and thus of producing an effect on the imagination of peoples which gave them a glory not all their own. Glass was one of the manufactured articles for which they gained much credit, and tradition came to ascribe its invention to them (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 65); but it had been made 'from time immemorial' in Egypt, and the art of making it was probably taken by the Phœnicians from that country. The dyed wares of Phœnicia were renowned throughout the ancient world, and the abundance of the murex on their coasts (see COLOURS in vol. i. p. 457) gave full opportunity for the production of the most brilliant colours then known; but the art of dyeing probably came from Babylonia. Their weaving and embroidery were alike famous and sought after; but we are still ignorant as to how much progress in these arts was due to native workers. Gold, silver, iron, tin, and lead were imported by them long before the days of Ezekiel, and were wrought into forms of beauty that were known to the Homeric poems (Il. xxiii. 740 ff.; Odyss. iv. 618); but their artistic forms show undoubted marks of large foreign influence. Amber, it is now known, was dug in Phœnicia itself, but was also probably received by the ordinary trade-routes from the Baltic, and objects made of it have been found in the ruins of Mycenæ.

The artistic side of Phœnician life (with a rather large commercial appearance in it) is well represented in the various objects which have been dug up or discovered in Phœnicia itself, but more extensively in Cyprus and Carthage and a few more of the old Phœnician colonies. The pottery discovered belongs mostly to the Græco-Roman times, and most of its excellences seem to be due to foreign influence. Earlier specimens, supposed to be Phœnician, are both of the painted and incised varieties, but are not at all remarkable. The metal-work is more interesting, and the statuettes of bronze are curious if not particularly beautiful. The bronze bowls of Cyprus and the celebrated cup (discovered at Præneste) of silver, overlaid with gold, with figures in low-relief, alike bear witness to the influence of Egyptian and Assyrian art. The same applies to the seals and cylinders, which do not usually show a very fine finish, and are generally of serpentine, sometimes of glass, etc. The chief feature of this sculpture was the application of colour to give emphasis to certain parts of the figure. Their architecture is only partially known to us from very imperfect remains. A marked feature in their building is the employment of the natural solid rock, as far as possible. This is the case with the old walls of Sidon, much of the funeral architecture, and the famous monolith house of Amrith. There seems to have been no vault in Phœnician architecture, the roof being terraced, as in Syria at the present day. The columns, cornices, and other decorations are almost entirely foreign, largely Egyptian. The tombs were in caves, and sarcophagi were used, and sometimes massive monuments like the so-called 'Hiram's tomb' towered above the burying-place. The architecture of their temples was probably Egyptian. That in all these arts the Phœnicians were reputed to be skilful workmen we know from the OT account of the relations between Solomon and Hiram of Tyre. A namesake of the Phœnician king made for the temple at Jerusalem the two great pillars of bronze, the molten sea, and other objects of beauty and utility (1 K 7 ff.). To reconstruct these from the descriptions given has been a desire of many writers on ancient art, but there is and must be much uncertainty as to the details of the work. See art. PILLAR.

The only metal found in Phœnicia itself was iron, but the abundance of minerals in some of their colonies soon made the Phœnicians expert miners. Cyprus contained large quantities of copper, and the island gave its name to this metal. The Sardinian settlements were apparently due to the search after copper and lead. The mines of Thasos were known to Herodotus (vi. 47), and the Spanish colonies were perfect storehouses of gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, and lead.

The attention given to navigation naturally gave rise to a large industry in the art of shipbuilding, and it is possible to trace on the Assyrian sculptures and Phœnician vases and coins the development from the rude and small boats first used to the large and well-fitted vessels used in later times, and so warmly eulogized by Xenophon in the Œconomica (§ 8). The art of navigation, too, as distinct from the usual hugging of the shore and sailing in the daytime only, seems to have been developed if not invented by these people, to whom the Polar star was known. 'The ships of the sea, with their mariners,' occupy the first place in Ezekiel's description of the pride of Tyre (ch. 27).

From this description by Ezekiel we can easily understand that the private life of the Phœnician traders was one of great luxury. Many of the articles of commerce, in which they traded, found their way into the homes of the people. Little is known of their private life, but there are indications that behind the outward show of wealth and civilization lay a selfish and even cruel spirit. The traffic in slaves was no unimportant part of their commerce, and for the sake of it they would forget 'the covenant of brethren' (Am $1^{9.\ 10}$). Commerce was the life and soul of the people, and the faults as well as the virtues of a purely commercial people marked the Phœnician race (cf. Is 23, etc.).

LITERATURE.—The remains of Phœnician industry and art may best be studied in Renan, Mission de Phénicie; Perrot et Chipiez, Histoire de l'art dans l'antiquité, tom. iii. 'Phénicie-Cypre'; L. P. di Cesnola, Cyprus, its Cities, Tombs, and Temples; A. P. di Cesnola, Salaminia; Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, die Bibel und Homer; Davis, Carthage and her Remains. For fragments of the Phœnician calendar, cf. Conder in PEFSt, 1889, p. 22 f.

vii. RELIGION.—The religion of the Phœnicians was polytheistic, nor so far as we can go back do we find any traces of its ever having been monotheistic. In the Tel el-Amarna tablets the Phœnician names contain the names of several of the gods; in the OT, too, the ba'alim (plur.) are mentioned. The origins of the gods are unknown. The statements of Philo Byblios in this matter are useless, for everything is made to serve his own euhemerism. The view that Ba'al was the name of an originally one and only god—and that the sun-god—has been shown to be more than doubtful (see art. BAAL). Even the later identification by the Greeks of certain Phœnician gods with their own tells us nothing of their origin and previous history. As Ed. Meyer says (Gesch. d. Alt. § 192, note), 'It should never be forgotten that of the Phœnician religion we know very little (recht wenig), of the Phœnician mythology proper, nothing at all.' It is a striking fact that one goddess 'Tanith,' is mentioned about 2000 times in Carthaginian inscriptions, and we know nothing either as to the meaning of the name or the nature of her being. Without attempting to explain the nature of each individual god, it seems clear, however, that some at least took their origin in the worship of the powers of nature (cf. the 'Ba'al of heavens,' the worship of Eshmun and Adonis, the feasts of the seasons of the year, the veneration of objects of nature, etc. [see below]). In this respect they fall in line with other Semitic peoples. Another determining feature in their worship seems to have been their social organization. The existence of various tribes among the Phœnicians has often been asserted, and is in itself very probable, but there is no evidence for it. On the other hand, the city has played a part, larger than in the history of any country, except perhaps the history of Italy in the Middle Ages. That each city had a god of its own is evident. Sometimes he was simply called the Ba'al of that city (see BAAL), sometimes he had a name of his own (as Melḳarth, the Ba'al of Tyre). Beyond the actuating power of these two factors—reverence for the powers of nature, and the bond of city life—it is difficult, if not impossible, to go in the present state of our knowledge of the early gods of Phœnicia. A striking feature in the names of the gods is the presence of so many appellatives in the names of the best-known (thus Ba'al, 'possessor'; 'Adon, 'lord'; Milk, 'king,' etc.). Another characteristic is the recognition of female as well as male deities. By the side of Ba'al is Ba'alat (as early as the Tel el-Amarna tablets 'Ba'alat ša Gubla'), with Milk is Milkat, with El is Elat (see CIS 243, 244); but it does not follow that because the masculine and feminine forms of the same words are used, that there is necessarily any special relation between the god and goddess represented by them. A closer relation between two gods seems to be indicated by the compounding of two divine names, as in Milk-'ashtart, Ba'almelḳart, Ẓadmelḳarth, Ẓadtanith, etc.; but whether this has any political or doctrinal significance is uncertain.

In later times Phœnician cities, like other peoples of the ancient world, introduced foreign gods into their temples. Egypt especially furnished its share, and Babylonian deities are not wanting; while in regard to the other nations around them (other Canaanites, Aramæans, etc.), it is often difficult to say whether one has borrowed from the others, or all have received them from a common stock. In Greek times the identification of their own gods with Greek deities did much to change the nature and worship of both.

The relation of the individual (we have no evidence of the tribal relation prominent in Arabia, and undoubtedly present among the early Israelites, cf. TRIBE) to the god is expressed by the various words expressing dependence on or relation to, prefixed to names of gods to form names of persons, e.g. עבד- 'servant of' (which occurs with the name of nearly every Phœnician god known); אש- 'man of'; בר- 'branch, member of' (see Bloch, Phœn. Gloss. p. 19, note); אח- (for אחי) 'brother of'; גר- 'client of'; and once or twice אב- and אבי- 'father, or my father is' . . . Women's names are also formed by prefixing the following and similar words to the divine names בת- 'daughter of'; אחת- and חת- 'sister of'; אמת- 'handmaid of'; ארשת- 'bride of.'

(a) The deities.—Altogether about 50 names of gods are known from the Phœn. inscriptions (see Lidzbarski, 152 ff.). Of many of these we know nothing but the name. Among the most important are the following (in the order of the Phœn. alphabet):—

אדני (Gr. Ἄδωνις, cf. Heb. אֲדֹנָי), originally an appellative. A god in Byblos, then in Cyprus, where he was also joined with Eshmun. Origen and Jerome identify him with Tammuz (Ezk 8[14]), who was really a Babylonian god. In some places he is joined with Osiris. For the probable meaning of the Adonis feast, see Baudissin, Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, ii. 188, note.

אל (cf. Heb. אֵל) occurs in several proper names, but it is still doubtful whether it stands for a particular god. Philo of Byblos says that he was the chief god of Byblos, but had neither temple nor cultus. The feminine form אלת occurs on two Carthaginian inscriptions as the name of a goddess with priests of her own.

אשכן (called by the Greeks Ἀσκλήπιος) is not mentioned in the OT, but was worshipped in Sidon, Berytos, Carthage, Cyprus, etc.; and his name occurs frequently in proper names, and compounded with Melḳarth (cf. Ed. Meyer in Roscher's Lexikon d. Griechischen u. Römischen Mythologie, i. 1385 f.).

בעל (Gr. Βάαλ, Βῆλος, Βήλ, and in proper names Βάλ) was worshipped also by the Israelites, Philistines, and probably by Moabites. He appears in Palmyrene inscriptions as בול and בל. He was probably also indigenous in Arabia (Nöldeke in ZDMG xl. 174), and is evidently connected with the Babylonian Bel. See BAAL. The feminine form בעלת (Gr. Βααλτίς, Βῆλτις) occurs in the Tel el-Amarna tablets as Ba'alat ša Gubla. It is as goddess of the same place that she is mentioned four times in CIS 1. It seems also to be present in the OT place-names בַּעֲלָה, בַּעֲלַת קְאָר, and בַּעֲלוֹת.

גד appears in Phœnician inscriptions only in proper names, but occurs as a god in Is 65[11], in the מגדל גד of Jos 15[37], and in Ezr 2[12], also in Aramaic (ZDMG xlii. 474), in Arabia (Wellhausen, Reste d. Arab. Heidentums[2], 146), and probably in Palmyrene, but is unknown to the Babylonians. He was a god of Fortune (see art. GAD); but the city-god Τύχη of Greek inscriptions and coins from Syria, with whom he has been generally identified, is regarded by Baudissin (Herzog-Hauck, vi. 334 f.) as referring more probably to Atergatis.

מלך, originally an appellative,—cf. Molech and Milcom of the Ammonites (see MOLECH),—is mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna tablets in the names Abi-milki, Ili-milki, 'Abd-milki, etc., and in many names in the Phœnician inscriptions. A goddess מלכת is also found in Carthage, Hadrumet, and Sardinia.

מלקרת (=מלך-קרת 'city-king') is not mentioned in the OT, but was the Ba'al of Tyre, and was identified by the Greeks with Ἡρακλῆς (so in CIS 122, c. 180 B.C.). His temple, according to a tradition in Herodotus (ii. 44), was founded about B.C. 2740. His name is also found in Cyprus, Malta, and Carthage, and in such proper names as Hamilḳar, and is preserved in the Greek Μελικέρτης. In compound names of deities he occurs with Eshmun, Ẓad, and Resheph (see Ed. Meyer in Roscher's Lexikon, ii. 2650 ff.).

סכן occurs in the proper names גרסכן, עבדסכן, and סכניתן, which last is also the name Σαγχουνιάθων of Philo's fictitious authority.

ענת (in the Greek part of CIS 95 represented by Ἀθηνά) is met with in the OT in the place-names Beth-anoth (Jos 15[59]), Beth-anath (Jos 19[38], Jg 1[33]), and Anathoth (Jer 1, etc.). As a goddess of war she was known and honoured by the Egyptians in the 17th and 18th dynasties, having, according to Meyer (ZDMG xxxi. 718 f.), been taken over from the Hittites. A connexion with the Babylonian Anatu is not proved.

עשתרת (Gr. Ἀσταρτη), identified by the Greeks with Ἀφροδιτη. See ASHTORETH.

צר seems to be connected with the Heb. ציד 'to hunt, fish,' but occurs only in names of men and of compound deities.

רשף occurs in proper names of Cyprus, and meets us in Egypt as Rashpu, and is ascribed by Meyer, like Anath (see above), to the Hittites. It seems, however, more natural to connect the name with the Hebrew word for 'flame,' and to look upon the deity as a god of storms or lightning. This seems, too, to be confirmed by the combination רשף חץ in CIS 10 (cf. Driver, Deut. 68, with references).

תנת was the great goddess of Carthage; but though her name occurs some 2000 times in inscriptions, we are ignorant of her nature and origin. Except in two or three inscriptions she is always entitled פן בעל 'face of Ba'al. A compound deity צרתנת occurs in some inscriptions.

As has been noticed in the case of 'Anat and Resheph, it is possible that some of the gods already mentioned were taken from other peoples. In the later period this borrowing certainly took place, and in the inscriptions we find the Babylonian Nergal, the Egyptian Isis, Osiris, Absit (e.g. Bastu, cf. Bubastis, Ezk 30[17]), Horus, and Ptah. In some cases a Phœnician god was joined with a foreign one, as in Melekosir (so Jeremias), but the first part of the name may be only appellative.

(b) Sacred objects and cultus.—As in other Semitic religions of Western Asia, the most prominent objects of nature had an idea of sanctity attached to them. Whether as themselves containing spirits, who had power over men, or simply as the greatest gifts of the gods, they were regarded with feelings of awe. High places (במות) were chosen for their temples and altars as being especially near the deity; and it was on Carmel (which was known to be sacred in the time of Tacitus, cf. Hist. ii. 78) that the priests of Ba'al offered with Elijah (1 K 18). In Greek and Roman writers there are many memories of the earlier sanctity of various Phœnician mountains, from Mt. Casius to Carmel. Waters, too, were regarded with veneration, and some were particularly associated with certain gods, and even named after them (as the Adonis). Springs and rivers, two sources of life in the East, were regarded with peculiar reverence. Trees, too, we find sacred, especially to certain goddesses. The cypress, myrtle, and palm were closely associated with Astarte. This specialization is, however, probably only a development from an earlier form of nature-worship.

The ordinary worship of the Phœnician might be offered in any place in the open air, but was most natural on high places, with trees, and often with a sacred stream. Among these surroundings was built an altar with an ashera beside it, and on it the sacrifice was offered. But there is mention in history of temples (e.g. the temple of Melḳarth at Tyre); and one would naturally expect that those who did so much for the temple of Jerusalem should have had great sanctuaries of their own. Yet it is very doubtful whether the temple ever played a very important part in the worship of Phœnicia, or was ever much more than a prominent adornment of a city. Sacrifices were usual, and human life was offered in the fire and human blood on the altars, but apparently only on important occasions. Various animals, both tame and wild, were offered, and products of the field as well as flesh. Sacred prostitution was also a form of offering common to many acts of Phœnician worship. Vows were made in time of difficulty or danger, and votive offerings (statuettes, tablets, etc.) were common. Feasts, too, were often associated with religious rites. Priests and priestesses officiated, and the king himself was sometimes (if not always) a priest.

PHŒNIX (Φοινιξ, AV Phenice) was a good harbour on the south coast of Crete. When the cornship from Alexandria, bound for either Puteoli or the Portus Augustus beside Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber,* on which St. Paul was sailing from Myra towards Italy, had been detained so long on the voyage that it was considered too late in the season to risk the passage across the open sea from Crete to the southern coast of Italy, it was resolved to winter in Crete. When the resolution was come to, the ship was lying in Fair Havens, near the middle of the south coast. The question then arose, where should the ship lie up? The centurion, who evidently had the supreme authority,† called a council to advise him on this question; and the opinion of both captain and sailing-master was that they should seek an opportunity and make for the harbour of Phœnix. Paul, whose opinion was also asked (as, though a prisoner, he was treated with much consideration, being a Roman whose appeal to the emperor had been allowed by the procurator governing Palestine, and being also an experienced and practised traveller), strongly urged that they should stay where they were. There must have been good reasons on both sides. The experienced sailors had some ground for their opinion: presumably Phœnix was a better and safer harbour, and quite probably also it was recognized as being the proper place to winter in, if one of the many ships engaged in that trade had to spend the stormy season on that part of their long voyage (as must have been often the case). On the other hand, Paul dreaded the voyage to Phœnix, which therefore must have been some distance away. Winds from the north strike with terrific force on the sea a little south from Crete (though the waters immediately on the coast are protected by the lofty mountains). The danger, then, would be greatest in crossing the great opening of the gulf of Messaria, which begins a few miles west of Fair Havens. It is obvious, therefore, that Phœnix is to be looked for somewhere on the other, or western, side of that gulf.

The centurion, as was right and almost obligatory in his situation,* took the advice of the experts; and, when the opportunity of a mild south wind was given, they set sail; but in attempting to run across the gulf of Messaria, they were caught by a tremendous north-easterly gale, which swooped down on them from Mount Ida, and narrowly escaped after a terrible voyage of many days across the open sea.

Phœnix is described by Strabo (p. 475) as being a settlement (κατοικία, denoting a large flourishing village,† originally a settlement of colonists or κάτοικοι) on an isthmus. The passage is very obscure, owing to a lacuna; but apparently what Strabo describes as the isthmus was a narrow part of the island of Crete, between the northern and the southern sea, with a small town, Amphimalla, on the northern coast, and Phœnix on the southern. Apparently he considered Phœnix as a settlement in the territory of Lampa or Lappa, a Cretan city of importance, striking coins (Φοίνικα τὸν Λαμπέων). Now the situation of Lappa is practically certain; it was situated in the inner country, where Crete is narrow for a space, before it broadens out again to its western end, at a site called Pólis. On the southern coast of this narrower part of Crete, Phœnix must be sought. Nearly due south from Lappa there is a village, Loutró, with a harbour, described as the safest harbour on the south coast of Crete. Captain Sprat, an experienced surveyor and sailor, was fully convinced, after an exploration of the south coast, that Loutró must be Phœnix, 'because it is the only harbour west of Fair Havens in which a vessel of any size‡ could find any shelter during the winter months.' James Smith, who defends this view by very convincing arguments, quotes several even stronger assertions of the superiority of Loutró to all other harbours on the south coast. There is some evidence that the tradition of the ancient name remains among the Greeks of the place (Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, ed. 3, p. 250 ff., App. I. and II.; also p. 86 ff.).

Ptolemy (iii. 17. 3) describes both a harbour Phœnikous and a town near the south coast called Phœnix. His frequent vagueness and want of accuracy make him an unreliable authority; but he places the town and harbour evidently in this part of Crete (see further, below).

Phœnice (i.e. Phœnix) is mentioned as a bishopric in the earlier Notitiæ, viii. and ix.;§ and Hierocles gives it in his list of Cretan cities. All three authorities speak of it as beside a place Aradena (or Ariadne, Not. ix.): the phrase Φοίνιξ ἤτοι Ἀραδένα denotes that two distinct places were united as a single bishopric. Now Aradena still retains its ancient name as Aradhena, a place

* At that period more probably the former.

† That this was so, and that the centurion had authority even over the captain, results from the character of the imperial service (the ship belonged, of course, to one of the imperial corn fleets), in which the military service ranked higher than the naval, and yet was not strictly divided from it. But the centurion exercised his authority with the penalty of severe punishment before him, if he mismanaged; and he therefore would necessarily ask advice on the point of where to winter, and in purely nautical matters would leave the captain and the sailing-master free in their own departments. See Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 324 f.

* See the preceding note.

† See Buresch, Aus Lydien, p. 21.

‡ The ship which is concerned in the question was large, being able to accommodate 268 of a crew and passengers, and a cargo of corn from Alexandria for Rome.

§ In Not. vii., which is the oldest known, there is a lacuna of about 200 names, among which were the Cretan bishoprics.

which is not much more than a mile from Loutró. Again, Stephanus Byz. mentions Aradena (Ἀραδήν) as a city of Crete which is also called Anopolis; and about two miles north of Loutró there is a village on high ground with ruins which is called still Anapolis. This is probably to be identified with the Phœnix which Ptolemy distinguishes from the harbour, while Aradhena and Loutró together constitute his harbour Phœnikous, and all three were united in a single bishopric.

Again, Hierocles (whose order in enumeration is commonly a very good guide) mentions the island of CAUDA or Clauda (he uses the form Κλαῦδος) next to Phœnix. Now that island is only a few miles due south of Loutró.

Finally, an inscription placed here in the reign of Trajan shows that an imperial ship was spending so long a time at this point of its course between Alexandria and Italy that there was time to erect some considerable work, whose nature is not specified. There can hardly be any doubt that the ship was lying up for the winter, and the imperial freedman who was in authority on the ship employed the crew at some useful work on shore. The sailing-master, gubernator (compare κυβερνήτης, Ac 27[11]), and the ship's sign, parasemum (compare παράσημον, Ac 28[11]), are both mentioned. See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck, 261.

Thus we see that Loutró was beside a harbour where at least occasionally the large ships of that Egyptian corn service wintered.

The identification of Loutró as the harbour called Phœnix in Ac 27[12] seems beyond dispute, if these accounts of travellers and explorers rest on a sufficiently minute examination of the coast. But the identification is encumbered by one serious difficulty. The harbour of Phœnix is described in Acts as looking towards the south-west and the north-west, i.e. apparently as opening towards the west, with a mouth just so wide that the entrance extends up towards north-west and down towards south-west. But the harbour of Loutró opens towards the east, looking between north-east and south-east.

In this difficulty there seem to be only three alternatives open. 1. The harbour of Loutró is formed by a very narrow isthmus connecting a broader peninsula with the mainland; and there is a harbour on each side of the isthmus. As the isthmus runs out south from the mainland, one of these harbours looks east, viz. Loutró, while the other looks west. Bishop Wordsworth has suggested that the western harbour may be the ancient Phœnix, and has pointed out that on the Admiralty chart the name Phinika is given to it. Obviously, most of the arguments for identifying Loutró as Phœnix would apply equally well to this western harbour, which is separated from the other only by a narrow isthmus, and is almost equally near Aradhena and Anapolis. The only difficulty lies in the very positive assertions that Loutró is the only well-sheltered harbour; and certainly the chart represents the western harbour as more widely open. Still it is distinctly desirable that the western harbour should be more closely and critically examined. Sprat, indeed, can hardly have failed to do so, and his weighty authority is almost conclusive (though not quite); but the rest of the evidence depends much on the statements of residents in Loutró; and every traveller knows how prone the Greeks are to emphasize too strongly the arguments which support the identification of their own town with an ancient place of fame; their very love and respect for antiquities lead them to exaggerate the claims of their home.

The conclusion must be that Wordsworth's suggestion is not absolutely disproved, though the evidence accessible at present is against it. Among other things one desiderates careful examination as to whether the coast-line has been modified during eighteen centuries, and whether there are any traces of the western harbour having been used in ancient times.

2. James Smith suggests that the words of Ac 27[12] βλέποντα κατὰ Λίβα καὶ κατὰ Χῶρον, do not mean, as is commonly thought, 'looking towards south-west and north-west,' but 'looking in the direction in which the south-west and north-west winds blow' (i.e. towards north-east and south-east). His rendering is distinctly against the analogy of Greek literary expression; but, considering how little is known of Greek technical sailor language, one cannot feel quite certain that the rendering is absolutely impossible.

3. It has been pointed out* that Luke did not actually visit Phœnix (for the ship never went there), but merely speaks on report: his authority was the argument used by the captain and the sailing-master of the vessel in the council which the centurion called. Naturally these arguments were reported to him by Paul; and, even if Luke were wrong, his mistake would prove, not want of observation of a place which he had seen, but misapprehension of the description of a place strange to him, after that description has passed through an intermediate channel. If (as was often the case) the expression of sailors differed from that of literary Greek and of the ordinary landsman, an error might have thus been produced without any one being conscious of it.

The case, therefore, must be pronounced undecided until Sprat's statement (weighty as it is) is confirmed by new and careful examination; but the balance of evidence is strong that Loutró is Phœnix; and in that case the third alternative is perhaps least improbable, though the second is not proved to be impossible. PHRYGIA.—

I. Geographical and Historical.
II. Pauline Geography.
III. Phrygia in Acts 2[10].
IV. Christianity in Phrygia.
V. The Jews in Phrygia.

Phrygia (Φρυγία) was the name of a very large country in Asia Minor. On the view which will be here set forth, the noun Phrygia never occurs in the Bible, but only the term 'the Phrygian region' (Ac 16[6] 18[23]);† and in 2 Mac 5[22] the ethnic 'Phrygian' is applied to Philip, who was left as governor of Jerusalem by king Antiochus Epiphanes about B.C. 170. In addition to this, a journey right across Phrygia is implied tacitly in Ac 16[7-9], and another is briefly described in Ac 19[1] (according to the view to be here explained). But in spite of the very small appearance made by the Phrygian name in the Bible, there are such difficult questions connected with the passages where it occurs that a somewhat long discussion is needed. Moreover, Phrygia had unusual importance in early Christian history, and the monuments of Christianity before the time of Constantine that remain in the country are of unique number, interest, and importance. It can

* Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 326.

† Many scholars regard Φρυγίαν as a noun, not an adjective, in both these passages; others take it as an adjective in 16[6], and a noun in 18[23]. These opinions will be very fully treated in the sequel.

be truly said that the first Christian city was a city of Phrygia.

It will be convenient to classify the following remarks under headings.

I. GEOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL.—The vast country of Phrygia presents so great a variety in natural character that it cannot be described except at too great length. The level of the cities varies from the frontier town Karoura in the coast-valley of the Mæander, 500 ft. above sea-level, to the ancient city, among the monuments of the early kings beside the tomb of Midas, about 4000 ft. Great mountains, plains, and lakes are found in it. The two chief cities of Phrygia in the time of Paul were Laodicea and Apamea (Strabo, p. 576).

Phrygia means the land of the Phryges; and there is a general agreement that (as Herodotus, vii. 73, says) the Phryges were a tribe, or union of tribes, from Macedonia or Western Thrace, who crossed the Hellespont into Asia Minor, and gradually spread their conquests first over the Troad, and then farther east and south over the plateau. In the eastern direction they penetrated at their extremest range of power through the Sangarius valley and up to the banks of the Halys. On the south-east they reached ICONIUM, which was the last Phrygian city on that side. On the south they were stopped by the Pisidian mountains, the northern ridges of the Taurus range, into which they seem never to have penetrated. On the west the boundaries vary most; but on all sides they vary to an extraordinary degree. Hence, in trying to define what any ancient author means by the name 'Phrygia,' we must begin by inquiring what period is referred to, and what was the usage of the name in that period.

That the country of the Phrygians at an early period was bounded on the north-west only by the waters of the Ægean and the Hellespont is beyond doubt. They were the masters of the sea, according to Diodorus (vii. 11), for 25 years about B.C. 900. Troy is frequently called Phrygian, and there was a large, vaguely defined region along the Hellespont and the Sea of Marmora, called Hellespontine Phrygia. The country beside Mount Sipylos, north of Smyrna, the realm of Tantalos and Pelops, is often called Phrygia by the poets, who reproduce ancient semi-historical myths; and this shows that considerable part of western Lydia once bore the name of Phrygia.

At an early time the irruption of Thracian tribes, such as Thynoi, Bithynoi, Mysoi, across the Bosporus drove a wedge through the country of Phrygia, and separated Hellespontine Phrygia from the inner country, which was henceforth termed Great (Μεγάλη, Magna) Phrygia. The Phrygian element and name died out in Lydia also at an early period. The Troad ceased to be called Phrygia; and though the name of Hellespontine Phrygia * lingered on for several centuries, the land lost the Phrygian character,† and after the time of Alexander the Great it seems to have no longer possessed any claim to be called a distinct and separate country. Strabo still uses the name in A.D. 19. The north-eastern regions of Phrygia Magna were transformed into GALATIA during the 3rd cent., first through gradual drifting of the Gauls into that district as the one where there was least resistance to contend with, and finally, about B.C. 232, by general agreement of the surrounding rulers, and especially Attalus I., king of Pergamum, who penned them into this place and acknowledged their right to it, but set limits to their wide-ranging forays. About B.C. 200 a new name, Phrygia Epictetus, i.e. Acquired Phrygia, came into existence. It was applied to a region in the north which seems to have been acquired by Attalus I. from Bithynia. According to Strabo (p. 576) it contained six cities at least, Azanoi, Nakolia, Kotiaion, Midaion, Dorylaion, Kadoi. Another name for a special district was Paroreios Phrygia,* the great valley in the east between Sultan-Dagh and Emir-Dagh (whose ancient names are unknown), with the cities Ipsos or Julia, Philomelion, Thymbrion or Hadrianopolis, Tyriaion, and many small towns and villages.

A third district was Pisidic Phrygia, or Phrygia towards Pisidia, or Phrygia the Pisidian.† The city of Antioch towards Pisidia is the only one assigned to this district by Strabo; but Ptolemy, and probably Polybius, extend it more widely to include Apollonia and other cities in the valleys underneath the northern flanks of Taurus. Strabo clearly says that Paroreios and Pisidian Phrygia were only parts of Great Phrygia, whereas he distinguishes Epictetus as a separate and added country.

Under the Romans, the whole country of Cibyra and most of the valley of the Lysis were reckoned to Phrygia, though previously they had been counted either to Pisidia or to Kabalis or to Milyas. It would also appear that the lower part of the Lycus valley was divided at an earlier time between Lydia (viz. Hierapolis and Hydrela) and Caria (viz. Laodicea and Trapezopolis and Attoudda);‡ but in the Roman period all these cities came to be classed to Phrygia. On the other hand, Iconium was then classed to Lycaonia (except in the estimation of its inhabitants, see ICONIUM and LYCAONIA), as were also Laodicea Katakekaumene and even perhaps Tyriaion.

In the Roman time Phrygia was divided between two provinces, Asia and Galatia, with thorough Roman indifference to national frontiers in mapping out their province—an indifference which resulted in the final failure of those provincial divisions to attain permanence. These two parts were called Phrygia Asiana and Phrygia Galatica: for the former name, see Galen, π. τροφ. δυν. iv. p. 312 (Kuhn, vi. p. 515); for the latter, see a notice in a Byzantine Menologion (taken from a good and ancient source) quoted in Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 28, p. 563.

That part of Phrygia was included in the province Galatia, though often ignored, is no longer denied by any scholar. A number of inscriptions, enumerating the parts of the province Galatia, mention among them Phrygia; e.g. CIL iii. 6818, mentions the parts as Galatia, Pisidia, Phrygia, Lycaonia, Isauria, Paphlagonia, Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniacus; compare CIL iii. 6819; Fränkel, Inschr. Pergam. No. 451 (the lists vary at different periods as districts were added to or taken from the province). See also GALATIA, vol. ii. p. 90 f.

Moreover, several cities which Strabo and Ptolemy assign to Phrygia, e.g. Apollonia and Antioch, are shown by their coins and by other means to belong to the province Galatia, and Ptolemy gives the region which he calls Pisidian Phrygia as a part of the province Galatia.

Galatic Phrygia, or the Phrygian region of the province Galatia, was not a very large country. It was a strip of territory extending in considerable length along the front of the Pisidian mountains; and it included the cities of Iconium (in the native

* Also called Little Phrygia in distinction from Great Phrygia (Strabo, p. 571).

† The Phrygian character was probably bound up with the use of the Phrygian language. Iconium called itself Phrygian, because the language was used there (see Ramsay, Historical Commentary on Galatians, p. 216).

* It is often wrongly said that Paroreios denoted the country west and south from Sultan-Dagh, with the city of Pisidian Antioch. That was Pisidic Phrygia (see following note).

† Pisidic Phrygia, Polybius, xxii. 5 14; Phrygia πρὸς Πισιδίᾳ, Strabo, pp. 557, 566, 5797; Phrygia Πισιδία, Ptolemy, v. v. 4.

usage), Antioch the Colonia, Apollonia, and, as Ptolemy says, several others. Asian Phrygia was immensely larger, including all Paroreios and Epictetus and far the larger part of Great Phrygia. In process of time the Pisidian connexion became stronger, and the name Pisidian Phrygia was gradually disused. Antioch ceased to be considered a city of Phrygia and was called 'of Pisidia.' Some of the epigraphic lists of the regions making up the province Galatia omit Phrygia and mention only Pisidia. At last a distinct Roman province Pisidia was constituted about A.D. 295, with the metropolis Antioch and a secondary metropolis Iconium. But in the time of St. Paul, and long after, the view was dominant among the people that Antioch and Iconium were cities of the Phrygian region.*

A distinction between High Phrygia and Low Phrygia can be traced in the Roman time from Strabo, A.D. 20, onwards. Low Phrygia was a name that included Hierapolis (Philostratus, Imagines, i. 12) and Lake Anava (Strabo, i. p. 49) and the Sangarios (Steph. Byz. s.v.), i.e. it included those districts that were less elevated above sea-level, while High Phrygia (ἡ ἄνω Φρυγία) was the elevated region of central Phrygia lying between the Sangarios on the north-east and the great road passing close to Hierapolis in the Lycus valley and along the edge of Lake Anava. Aristides speaks of a certain city (probably Akmonia, possibly Synnada) as in High Phrygia. The pair of terms rarely occur in literature; but they clearly were in current local use.

We have seen how Phrygia steadily diminished, losing parts on the west, north-west, north-east, south-east, and south. About A.D. 295 or soon afterwards, when the great province Asia was broken up, two new provinces were formed,† Phrygia Prima and Secunda, called also Great and Small,‡ or Pacatiana and Salutaris: the last pair of names came into use in the latter part of the 4th cent., and soon established themselves in almost universal usage. The name Salutaris is explained by the Byzantine writers as caused by the fact that St. Paul had preached the gospel of salvation there. This is a curious statement: it implies that St. Paul had preached much more in Phrygia Secunda than in Phrygia Prima (which was the western half under the primacy of Laodicea). Now that may be either a belief founded on old authority, or a mere groundless fabrication of the Byzantine time, to explain a curious name. In the former case it would afford valuable evidence bearing on the history of St. Paul, for there was good authority underlying the really old tradition in Asia Minor. In the latter case it would be absolutely valueless. Unfortunately, the latter alternative is pretty certainly true. The name is Latin (Salutaris) transformed into a Greek word; but if it had rested on a genuine popular tradition or belief, it would have been Greek, for Greek was the language of the country, and very few can have known Latin in Phrygia. The name Salutaris has probably nothing to do with St. Paul or with religion.

The name Phrygia henceforth was restricted within the limits of those two provinces. The district of Cibyra, on the south-west, was given over to Caria, Apamea and Metropolis to Pisidia, and (between 386 and 395) Amorion, Orkistos, and other north-eastern cities to Galatia. In the 8th cent. part of Paroreios was transferred to Galatia, and placed under Amorion as metropolis: it is, however, very doubtful whether this transference affected more than the ecclesiastical organization, for the civil division into provinces (though always retained in the ecclesiastical system) disappeared politically in the 8th cent., and was replaced by the military system of Themes. In the later Byzantine authors much confusion and ignorance is shown in regard to the divisions of Phrygia. Constantine Porphyrogenitus, in his treatise de Thematibus, defines the extent of Salutaris in a thoroughly erroneous way. Cinnamus (p. 198) speaks of Laodicea ad Lycum as on the border of Little Phrygia. Ducas gives the name Great Phrygia to part of the region of Hellespontus (from Assos to the Hellespont), calling it also Low Phrygia: he does not speak of Little Phrygia or of High Phrygia, but apparently he must have treated those names as equivalent, and including both Pacatiana and Salutaris (as Cinnamus evidently does), which he sums up as 'all Phrygia' (see pp. 13, 72). Cedrenus (ii. p. 69), and Nicetas Chon. (p. 68) speak of High Phrygia as evidently including both Pacatiana and Salutaris. In those writers the names are prompted rather by inaccurate antiquarian memory than by real survival of the names in popular usage (see Ramsay, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, pp. 150–153).

II. PHRYGIA IN PAULINE GEOGRAPHY.—This long enumeration of vicissitudes and changes shows how slow one must be in making assertions as to the meaning of the name Phrygia in any ancient writer, and how carefully the situation and the context must be studied. Accordingly, when in a writer of the 1st cent. we find the statement that a traveller crossed Phrygia, we must not assume forthwith that a journey across Phrygia Asiana is meant. The term Phrygia is employed freely in inscriptions of that period, found in the country outside of it, in the sense of Phrygia Galatica; and a writer who follows as a rule local expression may have used this term Phrygia in the same way as local inscriptions do. In such a case we must examine the context to see which division of Phrygia is to be understood. Now in Ac 16[6] Paul is stated to have traversed the region of Phrygia.* What part of Phrygia did he traverse? The situation makes this clear. Paul in his journey had reached Lystra.† He now went on through Phrygia. It is beyond doubt that the part of Phrygia through which he must go immediately on leaving Lystra was Galatic Phrygia, which began only a very few miles north of Lystra. Moreover, Paul had started on this journey with the deliberate intention of visiting two cities of Galatic Phrygia, Iconium and Antioch; and as we now see, geography makes it clear that he could not possibly proceed onwards from Lystra without going through Iconium and through part of Galatic Phrygia.‡

* In Antioch the memory of its Phrygian character remained as late as the 3rd cent. (see evidence in Ramsay, Histor. Comment. on Galatians, §§ 19, 20); but outsiders called it 'of Pisidia' in the 2nd cent. Similarly in Iconium.

† Malalas says that Constantine divided Phrygia into two provinces, implying that in 295 only one province, Phrygia, was constituted. If so, Constantine's action is older than A.D. 325, as is shown in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pt. i. p. 81; Malalas, in fact, mentions Constantine's act before the Council of Nicæa (A.D. 325), xiii. p. 323.

‡ Small Phrygia (Μικρὰ Φρυγία) occurs in a few 4th cent. authorities; the name Great Phrygia in this new sense does not occur (our authorities say 'Phrygia' and 'Small Phrygia'), but seems necessarily to follow from the other term.

* It is immaterial to the geogr. import whether Φρυγίαν in that passage is to be taken as a noun or (what we think right) as an adjective connected with the following χώραν.

† Some say Iconium; but we cannot consider that Ac 16[2] implies that Paul has reached Iconium, for he is still in Lystra in 16[3]. Ac 16[1] and 16[6] give the successive stages of travel. This, too, hardly touches the geogr. import.

‡ This is even clearer on the North-Galatian than on the South-Galatian theory. If Paul were going from Lystra to North Galatia, he must proceed first to Iconium in Galatic Phrygia; and if he were in Iconium, he must go on through part of that country. It may, on that theory, be maintained that Paul went on through Asian Phrygia afterwards; but it must be admitted that he first went through Galatic Phrygia.

Moreover, if a writer of that period desired to be thoroughly clear, he ought to add some expression or epithet to show which part of Phrygia he meant. But this is exactly what Luke does in Ac 16⁶. He adds the adjective 'Galatic' to show that he means 'Galatic Phrygia.' It is unfortunate that both AV and RV confuse the expression, and render the Greek adjective by the noun 'Galatia.' Luke never speaks of 'Galatia'; because, like most Greeks, he disliked calling the province by that name, and preferred the expression 'Galatic province or region' (as used in CIG 3991).

If Luke had used the noun Phrygia in this place, he would have simply appended the adjective and called the country traversed by Paul 'Galatic Phrygia,' the term quoted above. But he desired to be minutely and pragmatically accurate; and (as is sometimes the case in ancient writers*) in his desire to exclude all possibility of mistake he employed a more cumbrous expression, which becomes obscure to us through our ignorance of the nomenclature of that little known region. A custom existed of designating the various districts included in the vast province GALATIA† as χῶραι or regions; e.g. the Isaurican region (Strabo, p. 568 f.), the Antiochian region (at this time a kingdom governed by Antiochus, but afterwards incorporated, see Ptolemy, v. 6. 17). Luke follows this custom: he thinks of 'the Phrygian region,' and adds the adjective 'Galatic,' calling it 'the region (which is at once) Phrygian and Galatic,'‡ i.e. the country which ethnologically and according to native Greek expression is Phrygian, while politically and according to Roman provincial classification it is Galatic (τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν). Lightfoot was the first to see and to state clearly the right and necessary construction of this expression, and subsequent discussion has failed to shake his decisive argument; but, while he correctly translated it, he failed (owing to the obscurity in which central Asia Minor was then enveloped) to see the right geographical application.

The interpretation of Ac 16⁶ affects that of 18²³; and on that account Luke expresses his meaning more briefly in the second passage. In that passage, as Dr. Hort says (Lectures on Colossians and Ephesians, p. 82), 'he followed his old course (i.e. as in ch. 16) through southern Asia Minor, and this time was allowed to follow it right on to Ephesus,' instead of being stopped and turned away north, as in 16⁶. He passed now through 'the region of Galatia and Phrygia,' as it is rendered in RV (τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν). These words are applied to a more extended journey than those of 16⁶, for in 18²³ the journey through Derbe and Lystra is included, whereas 16⁶ begins from Lystra, and includes only the subsequent journey. The difference of order of the words is important: in 16⁶ two epithets are attached to one noun which follows them, whereas in 18²³ an epithet with its noun is connected by καί with a following epithet (or noun),§ and the second epithet (with the preceding noun repeated in thought) indicates a second region (this order in enumerating a list is common in Greek).‖ Two interpretations of the words have been suggested—

1. Φρυγίαν is to be interpreted as a noun, and indicates the country Phrygia, both Asian and Galatic; Luke may be supposed to use Φρυγία χώρα in 16⁶ to indicate Phrygia as a region of the Galatic province, and Φρυγία the noun in 18²³ to indicate the country Phrygia as a single conception independent of Roman provincial divisions. Then τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν would indicate 'the Galatic region' in the sense of the province like Γαλατικὴ ἐπαρχεια in the Iconian inscription of A.D. 54–55, CIG 3991. Luke would, on this theory, say that Paul traversed the Galatic province and Phrygia (the country). There is a certain simplicity in this view which recommends it; yet for many reasons we are obliged to reject it. The following arrangement seems conclusive. St. Paul, as he traversed the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, stablished all the disciples: there were disciples in both the region of Galatia and in Phrygia, so that throughout both regions he passed from Church to Church. Now we know positively that he had as yet no Churches in any part of Phrygia except Galatic Phrygia. Moreover, the remarkable reading of the Bezan text Ac 19¹ shows clearly that its originator (whether Luke himself, as Prof. Blass and his supporters hold, or a 2nd cent. reviser, as seems more probable) considered Paul to have arrived at the borders of Asia in 18²³, and then, after completing his survey of his Churches, to have begun to return to Jerusalem, when the Spirit bade him turn back again into Asia (i.e. the province Asia), the higher parts of which he traversed, and so, finally, came to Ephesus.

We must therefore adopt the following interpretation:—

2. Φρυγίαν is an adjective, being the briefer description of the same region which in 16⁶ is called with pragmatical minuteness τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν. Luke would on this theory say, 'Paul traversed the Galatic region and the Phrygian.' Now, in truth, Paul did traverse two regions of the vast Galatian province, one Lycaonia containing the cities Derbe and Lystra, the other Phrygia with the cities Iconium and Antioch.* The one real difficulty is this: could Roman Lycaonia be called simply 'the Galatic region'? The phrase can be explained and defended only on the supposition that the speaker conceives himself standing or travelling in Lycaonia: Lycaonia consisted of two parts, Roman or Galatic and non-Roman or Antiochian (under king Antiochus): Ptolemy tells us that the latter was called Ἀντιοχιανὴ (χώρα), and the corresponding term for the other part necessarily would be Γαλατικὴ χώρα: the inhabitants of Lycaonia would describe the two divisions of his country by those terms. This explanation may seem rather complicated, but the complexity is due to the real complexity of the divisions at the time. As we see, it is the expression of one who feels himself standing in the country, i.e. it must be regarded as the expression used by St. Paul the actual traveller, and caught from his mouth by the listener Luke.

The system of dividing Phrygia into High and Low is probably referred to in Ac 19¹, though the name of the country is not actually mentioned. The journey described in 18²³, as we have just seen, carried St. Paul over ground which he had previously traversed and cities where there were already disciples; but there still remained a long stretch of country between him and his goal in Ephesus, viz. the whole breadth of the large province Asia. The journey is resumed in 19¹, where St. Paul is said to have traversed the higher parts (τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη). The term ἄνω is often used in Greek to indicate simply the inner country as distinguished from the coast;* but this distinction seems not in harmony with Luke's narrative: it is of no consequence to him to distinguish coast and interior: moreover, most of the previous part of the journey was over the high ground of the interior. Here we want some expression suitable specially to describe the part of Asia which he traversed. The word ἀνωτερικός is a rare one, and seems chosen in order to suggest a contrast with certain lower parts;† in other words, the meaning is that St. Paul avoided the route through Lower Phrygia, and traversed Higher Phrygia (according to the distinction mentioned above, § I.). This distinction was important: Luke had a definite purpose in defining the part of Phrygia which St. Paul traversed. He makes it clear that the apostle did not follow the longer and easier trade-route by Apamea, Lake Anava, Colossæ, and Laodicea (which led through Lower Phrygia, see above, p. 864), but took the other more direct road (less suitable for wheeled traffic, but better for walking travellers) across High Phrygia, keeping very near a straight line from Metropolis to Ephesus.‡ That was a point of some importance, for Paul mentions that he had never seen the Churches of Colossæ or Laodicea, which therefore must have been founded by some of his coadjutors (perhaps Timothy).

III. PHRYGIA IN ACTS 2[10].—Phrygia is also mentioned in Ac 2[10] in the list of places whence came the Jews and proselytes who were present in Jerusalem at the Feast of Pentecost shortly after the Crucifixion—'dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judæa§ and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt,' etc. This remarkable list is an insoluble puzzle. It is made on no discoverable principle, either as regards the order of enumeration or as regards the districts mentioned and omitted. The only certain fact about it is that it is quite different in style from the original work of the author of Acts, and must have been derived by him from the earlier authority, or authorities, to whom he owed the narrative of the events described in ch. 2. Some districts where Jews were numerous, and which are certain to have had representatives at Jerusalem, such as Cilicia, are omitted. The names, as a rule, are those of countries, not of Roman provinces; yet Asia is mentioned; this name must denote either the Roman province or a much larger region (see LYDIA); in the former case it would include Phrygia Asiana, in the latter case it would include all Phrygia, both Asiana and Galatica, together with Pamphylia.‖

The most probable view is that Asia in this passage means the province (a Roman province being named in this one case, because the name had already established itself in popular Greek nomenclature); and Phrygia is named in addition, partly because it was inhabited by such large numbers of Jews (see below, § V.), partly because Phrygia Galatica, which contained very many Jews, was not included in the province Asia. Similarly, the Lugdunensian Christians wrote to τοῖς ἐπ' Ἀσίας καὶ Φρυγίας ἀδελφοῖς, for they desired to include in their address the important Churches of Iconium, Antioch, and probably several in Galatic Phrygia of later foundation (which were not in Asia). On this address, probably, Tertullian models his expression (adv. Prax. 1) 'pacem ecclesiis Asiæ et Phrygiæ inferentem.' There can be no doubt that the Churches of Phrygia Galatica were as important in the 2nd cent. Christianity, as its Jews were in the Jewish world.

IV. CHRISTIANITY IN PHRYGIA.—Christianity was introduced into Phrygia Galatica by Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey (Ac 13. 14). Paul revisited, confirmed, and strengthened them (Ac 16[1-6] 18[23]). Considering how much space the author of Acts assigns to the account of the formation of these Churches (along with the two Lycaonian Churches), and considering how often Paul visited and consolidated them, we must see that they were regarded as being highly important in the early Church.

Phrygia Asiana was traversed at least twice by St. Paul. On his second journey, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, he went from Pisidian Antioch northwards through the country to near the Bithynian frontier (probably to about Dorylaion, over against Mysia), and then westwards into Mysia and the Troad.* Paul was on that journey forbidden to preach in [the province] Asia, so that he cannot have founded any Churches in Asian Phrygia (though, perhaps, we need not interpret the prohibition so strictly as to suppose that he was bound to keep silence absolutely about the gospel on the journey to the Troad: probably the command only implied that he was not to make Asia his sphere of work). On the third journey St. Paul traversed Phrygia Asiana from east to west on a line between Antioch and Ephesus (see above). He probably preached on the journey; but there is no sign of any success; and he was evidently eager to go to Ephesus, and make it the centre for the whole province. Thus in all probability the earliest Churches in Phrygia Asiana were those of the Lycus valley, Colossæ, Laodicea, Hierapolis, founded through the work of his assistants and subordinates (probably Timothy in particular), while he was in Ephesus.

According to tradition of somewhat uncertain value, the Lycus valley was afterwards the scene of missionary work by St. John the apostle and by St. Philip (probably the apostle, though several authorities, especially the later, say he was the deacon). Archippus of Colossæ, the 'fellow-soldier' of St. Paul (Philem [2]), was said to have been the first bishop of Laodicea (probably a recollection of his 'ministry, διακονία, in the Lord,' Col 4[17]), and to have been martyred at Chonæ (i.e. the later Byzantine representative of Colossæ); and Nymphas or Nympha Laodicensis is coupled as an apostle with Eubulus of Rome in the Greek Menæa, and commemorated on 28th February: cf. Col 4[15]. Heros is said to have been appointed bishop of Hierapolis by St. Philip, Epaphras of Colossæ by St. Paul. These traditions, hardly trustworthy in themselves, are at least evidence that the Lycus valley was the scene of steady and progressive work in the second half of the 1st century. That work was certainly not confined to the valley, but spread up, doubtless, east and north into Phrygia, and perhaps south towards Cibyra, so that LAODICEA must be taken as the centre and representative of a number of young

* ἄνω is used always in that sense, not ἀνωτερικός.

† ἀνωτερικός (except in passages dependent on Ac 19[1]) is used only by medical writers, Hippocrates and Galen (if we may depend on Steph. Thesaurus on this matter). Hobart (Medical Language of St. Luke, p. 148) does not fail to observe the confirmation which this word gives to his views.

§ The name Judæa is suspected by Blass, who would substitute on Jerome's authority Syria. It is, of course, not in harmony with the context; but, in a list which is as a whole incomprehensible, it is vain to carp at one incomprehensible detail.

‖ Pontus and Cappadocia may be regarded as the external boundaries of 'Asia,' taking that term in the sense described in a very difficult passage, Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 28), where it is said that 'Asia,' if its two parts are taken together, extended from the Ægean and Egyptian and Pamphylian Seas to Paphlagonia and Pontus: on the meaning, see Studia Biblica, iv. p. 45.

* The North-Galatian theory would lengthen the westward journey across Phrygia Asiana, and shorten the northward journey by diverting the route from that country into Galatia.

Churches (as well as those in Colossæ and Hierapolis; see above, p. 831[a]). Papias and Apollinaris, the great bishops of Hierapolis, Sagaris the bishop and martyr of Laodicea, are evidence of the importance of the Lycus valley in Christian history during the 2nd century.

If Laodicea was such a centre of Christian influence, so also we may be sure were Pisidian Antioch and Iconium. A trace of this work may be observed in the tradition that Bartholomew was the apostle of the Lycaones. It has been pointed out* that this must mean, not the people of Lycaonia, whose apostles were Paul and Barnabas, but the tribe of the Lycaones in central Phrygia, west and north-west of Synnada. But far more important and trustworthy evidence is furnished by the Christian inscriptions of Phrygia, which are collected for the central and south-western districts in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pt. ii. chs. xii. xvii.† The earliest is the famous epitaph of Avircius Marcellus, presbyter or bishop‡ of the less famous Hieropolis or Hierapolis in the Glaukos valley about A.D. 192. This document mentions St. Paul in such a way as to suggest that he was regarded with special respect in that district, probably owing to its having been first evangelized by his immediate followers and ministers.

The inscriptions fall into three local groups, differing widely in character. One has its chief centre in Eumenea and Apamea, and probably resulted from the influence of the Lycus valley Churches; one is strong in the extreme south-east of Phrygia (and in the adjoining northern part of Lycaonia), and evidently sprang from the influence of Iconium and Antioch; the third is seen in the north of Phrygia in the valley of the Tembris or Tembrogius, and seems connected with the Christianity of the Troad (2 Co 2^{12}),§ spreading up through Mysia and the province Bithynia. All three therefore seem traceable to a Pauline source. The inscriptions of the third group are more akin to the Montanist type, and those of the first to the Orthodox type,‖ while those of the second are mostly indifferent, but contain occasional examples like both other classes. The inscriptions of the first two groups throw considerable light on the Christians of the 3rd cent. Already during the 2nd cent., in the Montanist controversy, Phrygia stands out rather as a country where Christians are contending with Christians, than one where missionaries are trying to convert pagans; and the inscriptions of the 3rd cent. set before us Eumenea as a city which was mainly Christian in the period 250–300, in fact as the first Christian city (one may say with great confidence); and, further, they show probably that the prosperity of Eumenea died about the beginning of the 4th cent. Now Eusebius and Lactantius mentioned that a city of Phrygia, whose population was wholly Christian, was destroyed by fire in the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 301–312; and, though there are some slight discrepancies in details between their statements and probably some exaggeration in the sweeping conclusion, yet the general truth cannot reasonably be doubted; and the coincidence with Eumenian history is so striking that the statements may with the highest probability be applied to it. Apamea, its neighbour and fellow in Christian history, also seems to have sunk in importance to an extraordinary degree about the same time. On the very remarkable type of Christianity developed in those cities, see the full discussion in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, ch. xii.

Christianity did not spread uniformly over Phrygia. The three local groups of inscriptions are separated by a large district, where the new religion seems not to have grown so strong until the time of Constantine.* The Phrygian martyrs who are known by name almost all belong to the period before A.D. 184 (see Neumann's list in der rom. Staat und die allgemeine Kirche, p. 283). When Christianity was so strong, the Roman theoretical principle, that Christians should be treated as outlaws, was difficult to carry out; for a formal accusation by an overt prosecutor was ordinarily required, and it would be difficult to find private persons ready to incur the hatred of a united and energetic body like the Christians. But in Diocletian's persecution the government hunted down the Christians, and employed soldiers and officials for that special purpose; and in such a time the cities where Christians were most numerous would suffer most. Even in Diocletian's time individual Phrygian martyrs were little remembered, but only the general facts that whole communities and one entire city were destroyed.

Considering at how early a date Christianity was diffused over large parts of Phrygia, it may seem strange that the ecclesiastical system was so backward there during the 4th cent., except in Galatic Phrygia, where the list of bishoprics can be traced almost complete during that century.† The reason lies in two noteworthy facts. In the first place, Phrygia was the country where above all others, heresy was strongest; but the ecclesiastical lists are of the Orthodox Church. Thus, for example, Kotiaion was a great seat of Christianity in the 3rd cent., and so was the country of the Praipenisseis. Yet neither can be traced in the lists earlier than the 5th cent. The reason is, undoubtedly, that the Orthodox Church had little hold there. We know of either bishops or presbyters at Otrous and Hierapolis in the 2nd cent.; but in the ecclesiastical lists those two cities appear only in the 5th cent. In the second place, Phrygia was regarded by the orthodox writers as rude and uneducated,‡ because the organization and equipment of the Orthodox Church were in a backward state there. Christianity was so strong in certain parts of Phrygia that the persecution of Diocletian raged there on a vast scale, and almost annihilated people and civilization and organization.

V. THE JEWS IN PHRYGIA.—The position and history of the Jews in Phrygia is another large subject, which throws much light on the narrative of Acts and on the rapid spread of Christianity in the country. The Jews were much favoured by the Seleucid kings, as trustworthy colonists in the many cities which they founded to maintain their empire in Asia Minor, especially along the routes leading from their capital at Syrian Antioch through Cilicia and Lycaonia into Southern Phrygia§ and Lydia.

§ Perhaps also with Ac 16^{8}, according to a tradition that can be traced in the interior of Mysia during the 4th or 5th cent. (see Acta S. Philetæri, 19th May; and Expositor, Oct. 1888, p. 264). This tradition perhaps led to the Bezan text in Ac 16^{7} διελθόντες for παρελθόντες; and, if so, the tradition must be as old as the 2nd cent. (implying that the statement that Mysia was 'neglected,' or 'passed by,' was regarded at that early date as incorrect in the quarters where the Bezan text originated).

† Galatic Phrygia is part of Pisidia in the lists. Those Pisidian bishoprics which can first be traced in the 5th cent. or later were in the mountainous and backward districts.

§ Northern Phrygia and Galatia, which were little or not at all under Seleucid power, shared very little in these settle-

Seleucus Nikator (B.C. 301–280) granted them the highest class of rights, equal to those of Macedonian and Greek settlers, in all his colonies; and his successors maintained the privileges of the Jews. Various privileges were conceded to their religious scruples: the entire body of regulations guaranteeing their rights and privileges seems to have remained permanently in force in the cities, and is appealed to as 'the law of the Jews' in an inscription of Apamea as late as the 3rd cent. after Christ.* By one single act Antiochus the Great ordered 2000 Jewish families to be brought from Babylonia and settled in the strong places of Lydia and Phrygia about B.C. 200. When such a course of action lasted for fully a century, it is plain what large numbers of Jews must have been settled in Phrygia, Lycaonia, etc.

These considerations explain how Flaccus, the Roman governor of Asia in B.C. 62, could seize 100 pounds weight of gold at Apamea, and 20 at Laodicea, being contributions from the Jews of Phrygia on the point of being sent up to Jerusalem. These large sums, of course, represented the contributions of great districts, and not simply of the two cities. They are calculated by M. Th. Reinach as together equivalent to 100,000 drachmæ, being the contributions of 50,000 people paying two drachmæ annually.†

According to Dr. Neubauer (Géographie du Talmud, p. 315), these Jews had to a considerable extent lost connexion with their country and forgotten their language; the baths and wines of Phrygia had separated the Ten Tribes from their brethren, as the Talmud expresses it; they were readily converted to Christianity; and the Talmud alludes to the numerous converts. These opinions have been strongly confirmed by epigraphic discovery. The Phrygian Jews were strongly affected by their surroundings, and were ready to comply, at least outwardly, with many pagan customs, and especially with the forms of the imperial religion, regarded as the test of loyalty to the Roman empire. They probably were often inclined to magic and forbidden arts (see THYATIRA and Ac 19[13]). Their frequent tendency to amalgamate Jewish and pagan ideas in an eclectic philosophical system is illustrated at Colossæ (see the Epistle). A Jewess married to a Greek and having an uncircumcised son is mentioned at Lystra (Ac 16[2. 3]). At the same time there can be no doubt that the Phrygian Jews as a body preserved much of the old Jewish character, and presented in society a much higher and purer moral tone than the pagans; and it was this character that gave them great influence and attracted numerous proselytes. On the whole their existence was not hostile, but favourable, to Christianity. Luke emphasizes every instance of their opposition, but he shows clearly that there was another side to the question: the Jews of Pisidian Antioch were opposed to Paul's placing the Gentiles on an equality with themselves (Ac 13[45]), but not so much to his doctrines: a great multitude of Jews at Iconium believed. The Jewish and the Christian inscriptions melt into one another in Phrygia, so that it is often difficult to draw a line of distinction. The Phrygian Christians were strongly inclined to Judaism. Every heresy in Phrygia tended to become Judaistic. Novatianism, which seems to have been quite free from any Judaizing character in the West, became strongly tinged with it in Phrygia. The Phrygians regarded the 14th day of Nisan as the great religious day, and seem to have called the festival Azyma, the Unleavened. There is every appearance that the reconciliation between Christians and Jews, which was one great aim of St. Paul's work, was attained far more thoroughly in Phrygia than elsewhere.

Early Phrygian Judaic Christianity thus presents a very remarkable character, which stands in the closest relation with the Pauline Epistles. Its development was arrested by the terrible persecution of Diocletian, which seems to have raged with special fury in that most thoroughly Christianized of countries. As Eumenea was the most thoroughly Christian city, so Apamea was the most strongly Jewish; and they (so far as we can judge) were the greatest sufferers (certainly very severe sufferers) under Diocletian.

PHYGELUS (Φύγελλος, WH Φύγελος).—Mentioned in 2 Ti 1[15] along with HERMOGENES (wh. see) as among those in Asia who turned away from St. Paul during his last imprisonment in Rome. The phrase 'all they which are in Asia,' proconsular Asia that is, must be qualified in some way, known doubtless to Timothy, and may perhaps be best taken to mean, 'All whose help I asked' (cf. 2 Ti 4[16]). We cannot tell what Phygelus refused to do, nor can we affirm with certainty that apostasy or declension from the faith is implied. Possibly he was asked to go to Rome to use some influence he had on the apostle's behalf, and refused to admit that St. Paul had any such claims on him. The forcible language used makes it probable, however, that Phygelus was guilty of something worse than merely neglecting to visit the apostle in his imprisonment.

PHYLACTERIES, FRONTLETS.—Phylactery—so first in the Genevan Bible, 1557, in earlier versions filateris (Wyclif) and philateries (Tindale, etc.)—comes to us through the Vulgate from the Greek φυλακτήριον. In the Greek of the 1st cent. A.D. this word signified an amulet or charm, which possessed the property of protecting (φυλάσσειν) * the wearer against evil spirits and similar malign influences. Among favourite charms were slips of parchment, written over with a magical spell and placed in a case which was hung round the neck, hence also called περίαπτον, περίαμμα, synonyms of φυλακτήριον.

In His great anti-Pharisaic discourse (Mt 23[1ff.]), our Lord charges the scribes and Pharisees with ostentation in the discharge of their religious and social duties, 'for they make broad their phylacteries (πλατύνουσι γὰρ τὰ φυλακτήρια αὐτῶν), and enlarge the borders of their garments (for which see FRINGES in vol. ii. 68 ff.), and love the chief places at feasts,' etc. (Mt 23[5f.] RV). Now there has never been any doubt that the author of the first Gospel here uses φυλακτήρια, which is not found elsewhere in the NT, as the equivalent of the contemporary Hebrew word תְּפִלִּין, tĕphillîn (plur. of תְּפִלָּה 'a prayer'), the name then, and by the Jews still, given to two small cases of leather, to be described in the sequel, which were worn by the more ardent legalists of the time, one upon the forehead and the other upon the left arm. This practice, very considerably curtailed, however, is still regarded as one of the most sacred of religious duties by orthodox Jews of the present day (cf. opening paragraph of art. FRINGES).

In this article it is proposed to investigate the origin, history, and significance of the phylacteries, ments. The Jews of North Galatia were probably all late immigrants from Phrygia, etc.

* Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pt. ii. No. 399 bis; see also ch. xv. on 'The Jews in Phrygia.'

† Textes Relatifs au Judaisme, p. 240. He thinks they must represent several years' contribution; but as the two cities stand for all Asian Phrygia and great part of Lydia, it seems not at all impossible that they are the contribution of one year. Adramyttium and Pergamum are the only other two places where Flaccus is said to have seized Jewish money.

* The perverted derivation still met with in some quarters from φυλάσσειν (τὸν νόμον), as if φυλακτήρια=observatoria, is now entirely abandoned by scholars.

and for this purpose, on the principle of proceeding from the more familiar to the less, we shall examine—

i. The practice of modern orthodox Judaism;
ii. The alleged Scripture warrant for this practice;
iii. The date of the introduction of the phylacteries;
iv. The manner and extent of the practice in NT times.

i. THE PRACTICE OF MODERN ORTHODOX JUDAISM.—Every male Israelite above the age of thirteen years is required to 'lay (לְהַנִּיחַ, Mishna, Shebu. iii. 8, 11, etc.) the tĕphillîn'—to use the technical expression—at daily morning prayer. To this extent the use of the phylacteries has been curtailed since NT times (see § iv. below). The tĕphillîn or phylacteries are two in number, known since the earliest times as the head-phylactery (תְּפִלָּה שֶׁל רֹאשׁ) and the hand-phylactery (ת"ש שֶׁל יָד), and consist of two cubical leather boxes or cases, varying in size from ½ to 1½ in. in the side. The material is the prepared skin of a clean animal which has been thoroughly soaked in pure water. A cube-shaped wooden block (קְמוֹט [τύπος] Mishna, Kel. vi. 7) is employed to give the desired shape and size. To form the head-phylactery, three deep incisions (קְצִיעוֹת) are made in the block, and the moist parchment spread over it and inserted into the incisions. When the material has dried and hardened the block is removed, and a leather case of four compartments, technically 'houses' (בָּתִּים), is the result. Before this, however, two shins (שׁ) have been impressed on the soft leather, one with the ordinary three prongs on the outer wall of the báyith, which, when the phylactery is complete, will be to the right of the wearer, and another with four prongs on the outer wall to the left. This fourfold case is now fitted with a leather brim, and into each 'house' is inserted a slip of specially prepared parchment (קֶלַף Shabb. viii. 3), having written on it, in a special caligraphy, one of the Scripture passages to be cited presently, and each bound round with a few white hairs of a calf or cow. A firm base is supplied by a square piece of thick leather, connected by a flap with the brim, and sewed to the latter by means of twelve stitches (representing the twelve tribes) of clean gut. The four passages of Scripture above mentioned are those which the Jews have always regarded as constituting their warrant for the use of the phylacteries (see ii. below), viz. Ex 13^{1-10} 13^{11-16}, Dt 6^{4-9} 11^{13-21}. They are inserted in the four compartments in the order represented by the diagram—

The hand-phylactery is shaped on a similar block without incisions, and consists of a single compartment (בַּיִת báyith) with plain walls, fitted with brim, base, and flap as before. The same four passages are written in four parallel columns on a single piece of parchment, and inserted in the báyith. Both phylacteries, coloured a deep black, are kept in position by leather straps (רְצוּעוֹת Yad. iii. 3), which are passed through the flaps. Both straps are of considerable length, and blackened on the upper side. The head-phylactery is fitted to the wearer's head by having its strap tied at the back of the head into a knot (קֶשֶׁר), of the shape of a daleth (ד). One end of the other strap, after being passed through the flap of its phylactery, is formed into a noose by means of a knot of the shape of a yod (י). The shin of the head-phylactery together with these knots thus make up the letters of the sacred name Shaddai (שַׁדַּי 'Almighty'), to which a mystical significance is attached.

The phylacteries, as has been said, are now worn daily at morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festival days, which, being themselves 'signs,' render the phylacteries unnecessary on those days. After assuming the ṭallîth (see FRINGES), the worshipper proceeds 'to lay the tĕphillîn.' The hand-phylactery is laid first. Its position is the inner side of the left arm, which must be bare, just above the elbow, so that, when the arm is bent the phylactery may rest 'upon the heart' (as commanded Dt 11^{8}). The long strap, which passes through the noose, is drawn tight, and wound three times round the arm above the elbow, the worshipper pronouncing the following benediction in Hebrew: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us by Thy commandments, and hast commanded us to lay the tĕphillîn.' The strap is thereafter wound four times, then three times, round the arm below the elbow, in such a manner as to form a four-pronged and a three-pronged shin respectively. At this point the head-phylactery is placed in position, so that the case lies in the middle of the forehead just touching the hair, the two ends of the strap hanging down over the shoulders in front, the following benediction being meanwhile repeated: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us by Thy commandments, and hast given us command concerning the precept of the tĕphillîn.'* To this is added, when the adjustment is completed: 'Blessed be His name, whose glorious kingdom is for ever and ever.' Finally, the remainder of the strap of the hand-phylactery is wound three times round the middle finger, and the following is said: 'And I will betroth thee unto Me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercy: I will even betroth thee unto Me in faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord' (Hos 2^{19}). Prayers over, the phylacteries are taken off in the reverse order, the head-phylactery first, then the hand-phylactery. We cannot here attempt to give even a summary of the exceedingly numerous and minute precepts which have been elaborated and codified by the Jewish authorities regarding the preparation of the materials, the manner of writing, the preservation and inspection, etc., of the tĕphillîn (see authorities named in the bibliography at end of article).

ii. THE ALLEGED SCRIPTURAL AUTHORITY FOR THE PHYLACTERIES.—The command to 'lay the tĕphillîn' is contained, the Jews maintain, in four passages of the Pentateuch, viz.: Ex $13^{9, 16}$, Dt 6^{8} 11^{18}. It is of the utmost importance for our investigation to obtain an accurate and unprejudiced exposition of these cardinal passages, which we proceed to examine in their order.

(a) The bulk of Ex 13 is made up of injunctions regarding the perpetual observance of the Feast of Unleavened Cakes or Maẓẓoth (vv.$^{3-10}$), and of the Dedication of the Firstborn (vv.$^{11-16}$). The former, we read, 'shall be for a sign (אוֹת 'ôth) unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial (זִכָּרוֹן zikkārôn) between thine eyes, that the law of J" may be in thy mouth: for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt' (v.^{9}). Similarly with regard to the dedication of the firstborn, 'it shall be for a sign ('ôth, EV 'token') upon thine hand, and for frontlets (טוֹטָפֹת ṭôṭāphôth) between thine eyes,' etc. (v.[16]). Now these two verses are so similar in their phraseology that no sane expositor would hesitate to declare them to be, in the writer's intention, completely identical. The feast of Mazzoth and the dedication of the firstborn shall alike serve as perpetual reminders to the Hebrews of the Egyptian deliverance, and of J"'s resulting claim upon them.

* On the slight variation in the form of these and similar benedictions see Friedlander, The Jewish Religion, 1891, note, p. 329 f.; to this excellent work the student is referred for an exposition of the 'sign' of tĕphillîn from the orthodox Jewish standpoint. The renderings given above are from Singer's edition of The Authorized Daily Prayer-Book, 1892, p. 16.

(b) In Dt 6[6ff.] we read: 'And these words, which I command thee this day (the exact reference of 'these words' will be considered presently), shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach (שָׁנַן)* them diligently unto thy children. . . . And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates.' In the second passage from Dt (11[18-20]) this injunction is repeated with only slight verbal changes (cf. 11[18a] 'ye shall lay these words upon your heart and upon your soul,' with 6[8a]). We have now before us the cardinal passages on which has been based the ancient Jewish custom of the phylacteries. Do they, we must now ask, or do they not command and sanction this custom? The answer is by no means so easy as may at first sight appear, for it is not an affair of exegesis alone, but involves questions of criticism and lexicology.

Thus we note that the language of the passage Ex 13[3-16] presents a strong Deuteronomic colouring, which has prevented our foremost critics† from assigning it exclusively to J, with which source it has also undoubted affinities. Only two alternatives are possible (cf. Wellh. Comp. d. Hexat.[3] 74). Either we have here a section composed in whole or in part by an editor of the Deuteronomic school (so Kautzsch, Cornill, Bacon), or we have one of several examples of the literary activity of the writer (R^{JE}) who united J and E into a single work, and who must have belonged to 'the circles whence Deuteronomy issued' (Kuenen, Hexat. § 9 n. 4, § 13 n. 29).‡ In either case the important result follows, that we have to deal not with two enactments, separated by a couple of centuries, the earlier of which may possibly be understood in a figurative and the later in a literal sense, but with enactments of approximately the same age and reflecting the same religious standpoint.

With regard, further, to the Deuteronomic passages (Dt 6[6-9] 11[18-21]), various critical difficulties suggest themselves. Whence this unwonted and almost verbatim repetition in the course of the same address? Must we hold that in some of the early copies of Dt the verses repeated stood in ch. 6, in others with some variations in ch. 11, and that our present text has inserted a harmonized version of them in both places (so Steuernagel in Nowack's Handkommentar, 1898, p. 40)? Or shall we, with the latest commentator (Bertholet in Marti's Kurzer Hand-Commentar, 1899, p. 36), regard 11[18-21] as an insertion which interrupts the connexion between v.[17] and v.[22]? The strong adversative with which v.[22] opens in the original (כִּי אִם = 'but,' not as EV 'for') certainly follows awkwardly on vv.[18-21], which so far makes for the latter view. The present writer, however, doubts whether either passage is in its original place. Dt 6[2], for example, which is parallel to 11[21], looks as if originally intended to form the continuation of vv.[6-9]; this would give the following correspondences: $6^{6.8}=11^{18}$, $6^{7}=11^{19}$, $6^{9}=11^{20}$, $6^{2}=11^{21}$. Assuming that both passages are genuine, we should thus have an impressive call to the continued observance of the provisions of the Deuteronomic code placed both at the beginning and the close of the hortatory introduction in chs. 6–11. In any case the characteristic Deuteronomic phrase, 'these words which I command thee this day' (6[6]), must have here, as it has everywhere else in chs. 5–11, a prospective reference to all the provisions of the following code, and not merely to the two preceding verses, as the commentators suppose. The two pairs of passages, then, we have seen, are alike in tone and intention, and that intention is to impress upon those addressed the duty of perpetual observance, in the one case (in Dt) of the whole Torah, in the other (in Ex) of two particular ordinances thereof. The whole and its parts should be continually in their thoughts and on their lips, and should form a never-failing subject for the instruction of their youth.

When we proceed to a closer examination of the special verses, Ex 13[9. 16], Dt 6[8] 11[18], it is very evident, if our contention as to their authors' motive is correct, that the language of these verses is figurative throughout, as, indeed, is usually admitted for Exodus, but denied, or at least questioned, for Deuteronomy. But all figures of speech in Hebrew, as in other tongues, are borrowed from the common objects and processes of nature, or from the familiar facts of human life. So it must be in the case before us. Thus, as regards the 'sign' upon the hand, we have only to recall the widespread practice, among all primitive races, of tattooing or branding various parts of the body with the name or symbol of the deity to whom one wishes to dedicate one's self, and whose protection it is desired to secure (see CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH in vol. i. 538[b]). Such, doubtless, is the underlying idea of the mark (אוֹת)* of Cain, by which he was placed under the special protection of J" (see esp. Stade's brilliant essay, 'Das Kainzeichen,' in ZATW, 1894, p. 250 ff. In this essay Stade has further shown [p. 310 ff.] that זִכָּרוֹן of Ex 13[9] is a synonym of אוֹת in this sense).† The forehead,—for such is the meaning of 'between the eyes' in all our passages,—even more than the hands and wrists, was specially adapted for the reception of these religious tokens, and is so used by the most widely scattered savage and semi-savage races at the present day. But even in the canonical and extra-canonical literature of the Hebrews we find undoubted references to this practice. Thus we have the young man who bore on his forehead some mark or token that he belonged to the prophets of J" (1 K 20[41]; see Stade, loc. cit. 314 f.; and Kittel, Handkom. in loc.), Ezekiel's cross (תָּו 9[4. 6]) on the foreheads of the faithful (cf. Rev 7[3] 14[1]), the 'token of destruction' (σημεῖον τῆς ἀπωλείας) on the forehead of the wicked (Ps-Sol 15[10], cf. v.[8]), while 'the mark of the beast on hand or forehead' (Rev 13[16] 14[9] etc.) is familiar to all. These instances more than suffice to give us a glimpse of the circle of ideas which supplied the metaphors of the passages we are considering. The ordinances of the Torah were to serve the same purpose as these στίγματα of the ancient cults; they were to be outward and visible tokens of the Hebrews' allegiance to J" their God, and of J"'s special propriety in them.

In three of the cardinal passages, however (Ex 13[16], Dt 6[8] 11[18]), for the zikkārôn of Ex 13[9] there is

* שָׁנַן, only here in OT, appears to mean 'to prick with a sharp-pointed instrument,' hence probably = tattoo (see below).

† Except Dillmann; but see his latest editor's view in Dillmann-Ryssel, Exodus, pp. 111, 141.

‡ For a conspectus of modern critical opinion regarding Ex 13[3-16] see Holzinger, Einleit. in d. Hexat. 455 f., and the 'Tabellen' accompanying that work.

* These marks were called στίγματα by the Greeks (see Stade, ut sup., and Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 266 ff.); cf. LXX Lv 19[27t] γράμματα στικτά.

† Cf. Nu 16[38. 40] (Heb. 17[3. 5]), where אוֹת and זִכָּרוֹן are used interchangeably.

substituted a word of uncertain signification, מוֹטָפֹת ṭôṭāphôth, EV 'frontlets.'

The singular of this word appears as מוֹטָפֶת in post-biblical Hebrew, and the מוטפת of the MT should in all probability be so pointed.* In form it resembles פּוֹכֶבֶת for כְּבָכָב, by reduplication from a root which must be either מטף or מוף (see König, Lehrgeb. II. i. § 60, 6*a*). The latter form is generally preferred on the strength of the Arab. ṭâfa, 'to encircle,' but the sense 'fillet, head-band' (so Ges. Thes., Dillm., Driver, etc.) suits neither the descriptive expression 'between thine eyes' nor the circle of ideas from which, we are convinced, the figure in the text is borrowed. The rendering tĕphillîn of the Targums is merely a reflexion of the interpretation which had long been current among the Jews (see below). The root מטף is therefore to be preferred, but its significance can only be conjectured. Several modern scholars favour a conjecture, first proposed by Knobel, viz. 'to strike,' then 'to make an incision,' so that ṭôṭāphôth would thus also denote στίγματα (Klein, 'Die Totaphoth nach Bibel und Tradition,' in Jahrb. f. protest. Theologie, vii. (1881) p. 673; Siegfried-Stade, Lex. s.v.; Nowack, Heb. Arch. i. 134). This conjecture, it may here be added, has the support of the Peshiṭta in Dt 6^8 11^{18}, where ṭôṭāphôth is rendered by rûshmâ, 'a mark,'† which is also used to render Ezekiel's mark and the mark of the beast in Revelation.

In the absence, however, of all trace of the above signification in the extant literature, it is more probable that we have in מטף a root akin to נטף 'to drop,' and actually found in this sense in the Talmudic מְטַפְטֵף 'to drip or drop' (used of wine, oil, blood, etc.); cf. the series הטם, הום, נהם, and Arab. hamhama, Ges.-Kautzsch, Heb. Grammar, § 30*k*.

מוטפת is thus akin to נְטִיפוֹת '[ear-]drops' (Jg 8^{26}, Is 3^{19}), as is further confirmed by the rendering of the Samaritan Targum מטין, which must be the Aram. מְטָא 'a drop' (of blood, etc.; see Levy, s.v.). It prob. denoted a 'drop,' bead, or jewel worn as an amulet,‡ i.e. as a true φυλακτήριον. In the Mishna, Shabb. vi. 1, 5, ṭôṭĕpheth clearly signifies a jewel worn by Jewish women, attached to their headdress.§ The Deuteronomic authors, then, do not shrink from the use of another bold metaphor to express the thought that the commands of J″ shall be as constantly present to the thoughts of His people, and as highly prized as the most precious of jewels by their superstitious contemporaries.

The results of our investigations may now be summed up. The passages in Ex and Dt on which the institution of the phylacteries is based cannot be kept apart in such a way that the expressions of Ex are to be taken figuratively but those of Dt literally. The figurative interpretation of both passages, further, is confirmed by such additional considerations as the following: (a) numerous other expressions in the contexts are plainly figures of speech; such are the references to the words of J″ being in the mouth (Ex 13^9, cf. Schoettgen's remarks, Horæ Heb. et Talmud., 194 f.) and in the heart (Dt 6^6), to the duty of impressing (שִׁנַּן 'to prick with a sharp instrument') them upon the children (6^7), and of laying them upon the heart and the soul (11^{18}, but see above, § i., for an attempt to do this literally); (b) similar expressions elsewhere have never been taken otherwise than figuratively, e.g. Dt 30^{14}, Pr 3^3 ('bind them [kindness and truth] upon thy neck, write them upon the tablet of thine heart'), 1^9 6^{21} 7^3, Jer 17^1 31^{33} etc.; (c) there is the impossibility of carrying out the injunctions in the literal sense when these refer to the whole Deuteronomic code, as we saw to be the case even in Dt 6^8,—a consideration, it may be added, which effectually disposes of the strictly literal interpretation of 6^{10} (=11^{20}).

iii. THE RISE OF THE LITERAL INTERPRETATION OF EX 13^{16} ETC., AND THE DATE OF THE INTRODUCTION OF THE PHYLACTERIES.—We have now to inquire at what period of Jewish history the literal interpretation of the four passages in question took its rise. A strong presumption against a date in the Exile, or even early in the post-exilic period, is furnished by the fact that the phylacteries are unknown to the Samaritan community (see Klein, loc. cit. 686 f.; Hamburger, Realencycl. d. Judenthums, ii. 1065). The Aramaic form of the name tĕphillîn points unmistakably in the same direction. An evident terminus a quo, however, is supplied by the figurative passages from Proverbs just cited. These are admittedly echoes of the Deuteronomic teaching (see Driver, LOT[6] 396), and it is incredible that a Jewish writer would have so expressed himself, if the literal interpretation of Dt 6^8 etc. already held the field. Now the passages in question are all contained in the later section of the book (Pr 1–9), which, if the earlier section (10 ff.) date from the late Persian period, can hardly be earlier than B.C. 300.* Even half a century later, c. 250 B.C.,—the provisional date generally accepted for the beginnings of the Alexandrian translation (LXX),—the figurative interpretation was still accepted, at least in Egypt. This we see from the LXX rendering of the crucial מוטפת (καὶ ἀφάψεις αὐτὰ εἰς σημεῖον ἐπὶ τῆς χειρός σου, καὶ ἔσται ἀσάλευτον πρὸ ὀφθαλμῶν σου, Dt 6^8) as something 'immovably fixed' (ἀσάλευτον;† cf. Ac 27^{41}, He 12^{28}) before one's eyes,‖ the unchanging subject of one's thoughts.

The terminus ad quem is suggested by the famous letter of the pseudo-Aristeas, who represents himself as having been instructed by Eleazar, the then high priest at Jerusalem, in the institutions of Moses. The latter, says Eleazar, in addition to 'the token of remembrance on our garments (see FRINGES) and the texts (τὰ λόγια) on doors and gates, commanded us expressly to bind the sign on the hands also' (καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν χειρῶν τὸ σημεῖον περιῆφθαι—Hody, 'Aristeæ Historia,' in De Bibliorum Textibus, p. xviii; Kautzsch, Pseudepigraphen, 'Der Brief d. Aristeas,' v.[159]), an unmistakable reference to the hand-phylactery, but to that only.‡ Unfortunately the date of Aristeas is still sub judice. For various reasons we decline to accept the early date, c. 200 B.C., advocated by Schürer (HJP II. iii. 310), and incline to a date early in the 1st cent. B.C. (cf. Wendland in Kautzsch, op. cit.). We thus obtain a period of one hundred and fifty years (B.C. 250–100), to which the introduction of the phylacteries may confidently be ascribed. Now it is more than a coincidence that this is the period which witnessed the growth of that more strict and literal observance of the requirements of the Torah, which is associated with the rise to power and influence of the sect of the HASIDÆANS (wh. see) and of their successors, the Pharisees. The latter, we know, acquired great influence under John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135–105),

* It should be noted that the Hebrew text has twice מוטפת and once מטפת, never, as in the Samaritan Pentateuch, מטפות, with express plural termination.

† Which favours the singular pointing, as suggested above.

‡ It is well known that the practice of wearing jewellery in the ears, nose, etc., had its origin in the desire to guard the orifices of the body against the entrance of evil spirits (cf. W. R. Smith, RS[1] 433 f.). As rings could not be inserted in the eyelids as through the ear-lobes and nostrils, the same end was secured by hanging a jewel 'between the eyes.'

§ Cf. the explanation of the Jerus. Gemara in Levy, s.v., 'something worn in the place of the tĕphillîn,' i.e. on the forehead.

* Toy in the International Critical Comm. says c. 250 B.C. ('Proverbs,' Introd. xxx); so, too, Wildeboer in Marti's Handcomm.

† For this term and the variant σάλευτον (of which Philo gives an ingenious explanation, Opp. ii. 358), as also for the renderings of the later Greek versions, see Field, Origenis Hexapla, at Ex 13^{16} and Dt 6^8.

‡ Have we here an indication that the head-phylactery was of later introduction than the hand-phylactery? The female diviners of Ezekiel's day were in the habit of binding amulets (כְּסָתוֹת, EV 'pillows,' but understood in the former sense by Ephraem Syrus, and the anonymous 'Hebrew' who rendered the word by φυλακτήρια, see ap. Field's Hexapla, in loc.) on their wrists, a practice which Hitzig regarded as the precursor of the phylacteries (see the comm. on Ezk $13^{18ff.}$, and art. KERCHIEF). The late W. R. Smith seems to have shared this view (Jour. of Philology, xiii. 286).

imposing upon the people their views regarding sacrifice, prayer, and worship generally (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 3), and it may well be that among the observances which the Pharisees then introduced (see ib. XIII. xvi. 2), and which were successively abrogated by Hyrcanus and reintroduced by Alexandra (B.C. 78), the practice of 'laying the tĕphillîn' had a place. Our conclusion, then, is that the introduction of the phylacteries may with certainty be assigned to the period between B.C. 250 and 100, and conjecturally to the generation embraced by the reigns of Simon the Hasmonæan and his son John Hyrcanus, viz. B.C. 140–105.

iv. THE PHYLACTERIES IN THE EARLY CENTURIES A.D.—By the NT writers, as by Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 3) and by their contemporaries generally, the phylacteries, like the use of the Shĕma' (שְׁמַע) in the daily prayers (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 77, 84 f.),—for both practices doubtless had their rise in the same period and in the same circles,—were regarded as dating from the days of Moses. The practice was, of course, regarded as having scriptural authority, but even the details of the construction of the phylacteries were ascribed to a special revelation to Moses (technically הֲלָכָה לְמֹשֶׁה מִסִּינַי, for which see Hamburger, Realencycl. 2nd Suppl. p. 162 ff.). The following details, gleaned from the Mishna,—which may be taken as authoritative for the century ending A.D. 135, although in its present form of somewhat later date,—may be given as illustrating the practice of orthodox Jewish circles in NT times, and as showing, when compared with the details already given in § i., how little change has been introduced since the 1st cent. A.D. In the Mishna, then, we find the same terms applied to the phylacteries as at the present day, tĕphillā shel rō'sh and t. shel yādh (for the latter also, more correctly, תְּ שֶׁל זְרוֹעַ tĕphillā of the arm,'—Mikw. x. 3, 4). The material was the same (Kel. xxiii. 1); the shape square, not round (Megil. iv. 8). The head-phylactery, sometimes spoken of as the phylactery par excellence (Kel. xviii. 8, etc.), was already divided into four compartments (Kel. ib.), but not more (Sanhed. xi. 3), each with its parchment slip (Shabb. viii. 3; cf. Justin Martyr, the first Christian writer outside the NT to refer to the phylacteries by name, Dial. c. Tryphone, 46, ed. Otto[1], ii. 148, φυλακτήριον ἐν ὑμέσι λεπτοτάτοις γεγραμμένων χαρακτήρων τινῶν) containing in all probability the same passages as in modern times. Thus the third of the passages in question (Dt 6[4-9]) is expressly described as 'the smallest section (קְרֻשָּׁה קְטַנָּה) in the tĕphillîn, which is, Hear, O Israel' (Sanhed. viii. 3).* The writing had to be in the square Hebrew character (אַשּׁוּרִית, lit. Assyrian, i.e. Syrian or Aramæan). Women, slaves, and minors (קְטַנִּים) were exempt from the obligation of wearing the phylacteries (Berakoth, iii. 3), also all males in the presence of their dead (ib. iii. 1), and on Sabbaths and festivals, the latter as greater 'signs' rendering superfluous the observance of the lesser sign of the phylacteries. When not in use the phylacteries were kept in a case (תִּיק, θήκη, Shabb. vi. 2). From various indications it may be inferred that they were worn during the whole day, the justification for which was found in a mistaken interpretation of Ex 13[10]. There the Hebrews are enjoined to keep the feast of Unleavened Cakes חַג הַמַּצּוֹת, i.e. not from day to day, every day, but—as the phrase elsewhere signifies and as the context requires—from year to year (so correctly Onkelos; also Aquila ἀπὸ χρόνου εἰς χρόνον). The Jews, however, referring the command to the phylacteries (v.[9]), interpret the words as enjoining their use 'from day to day.' This interpretation is most clearly expressed in the Targum (pseudo-)Jonathan to Ex 13[9f.]. After the direction that the hand-phylactery shall lie on the upper part of the left arm, and the head-phylactery in the middle of the upper part of the forehead, we read: 'Thou shalt observe this commandment of the phylacteries in the appointed time, on working days but not on Sabbaths and feast days, and in the day time not in the night time' (ap. Walton's Polyglot, vol. iv.). The later limitation of their use to the time of the daily prayers was no doubt due to the same causes as brought about a similar curtailment in the wearing of the zîzîth (see FRINGES in vol. ii. 69[a]).

It is difficult to say with certainty to what extent this habitual wearing of the phylacteries prevailed among the Jewish people as a whole. That it was the invariable practice of the Pharisees and of the scribes, who belonged almost exclusively to that sect, we may take for granted. On the other hand, the balance of probability is against its adoption by the Sadducees, who may possibly be referred to in the Mishna sentence (Sanhed. xi. 3) as saying, 'there is no such thing as tĕphillîn (אֵין תְּפִלִּין).' Certainly the Karaite Jews, who claim to be the religious successors of the Sadducees, maintain the figurative interpretation of the injunctions in Ex and Dt (Hamburger, op. cit. ii. 1204; Klein, loc. cit. 688). The great mass of the people also,—ὁ ὄχλος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον (Jn 7[49]),—engrossed in the hard routine of daily toil, paid no heed to this enactment of the scribes (with Jn 7[49] cf. Talm. Bab. Berakoth, 47*b*: 'Who is an 'am-ha'areẓ? R. Jehoshua says: Every one who does not lay the tĕphillîn' [כל שאינו מניח ת"]). Hence we may infer that neither our Lord nor His disciples followed, in this respect, the lead of the Pharisees (cf. Jn 7[15]). In His denunciation of the latter (πλατύνουσι γὰρ τὰ φυλακτήρια αὐτῶν, Mt 23[5]) our Lord is generally understood to refer to the ostentatious breadth of the straps (רצועות Yad. iii. 3, etc.) by which the phylacteries were firmly secured on head and arm, as is expressly stated by the earliest Syriac translators (see loc. cit. in the codices of Lewis [Sinaiticus] and Cureton: 'for they make broad the straps of their tĕphillîn [ערקא דתפליהון].' It is probable, however, that this increase in the width of the straps was accompanied by a corresponding increase in the size of the phylacteries proper, and that both are included in the denunciation.

In addition to the Talmud (Mishna and Gemara), we have in the Targums ample evidence of the Jewish belief in the antiquity of the phylacteries, resulting in several cases in amusing anachronisms. Thus Saul's bracelet or armlet (2 S 1[10]) is converted into 'the phylactery* (מוֹתָקָא) which was upon his arm.' The turbans (פְּאֵר) of Ezekiel and his fellow-exiles are changed to phylacteries (Targ. Ezk 24[17, 23]), while Mordecai is represented as recognizable as a Jew by his phylacteries (Targ. Est 8[15]).

While we believe that the introduction of the phylacteries was not due to a superstitious belief in their magical virtues as 'appurtenances to make prayer more powerful' (so W. R. Smith, Jour. of Phil. xiii. 286, and others), but, as we have shown above, to a mistaken obedience to the letter on the part of over-zealous students of the Torah, it cannot be denied that by the rank and file of the people—from whom, no doubt, the name φυλακτήρια proceeded—and even by some of the more educated, the phylacteries were regarded as possessing magical properties. This appears from the repeated mention, in the Mishna, of the tĕphillîn alongside of the ḳĕmîa' (קְמִיעַ), which was an amulet also

* Jerome (Comment. in Matth. ad 23[5]) was evidently mistaken in thinking that the orthodox phylacteries contained the Decalogue. He seems to have confused them with similar φυλακτήρια used exclusively as amulets (see below).

* This is a preferable rendering to 'bracelet,' which is based on the precarious etymology referred to above (§ ii.).

written on parchment by a professional exorcist (see Shabb. vi. 2), and worn on the person, from the rendering of Ca 8^{3} in the Targum,* and from various references in the Midrash and Gemara (for which see Klein, 679 f.; Hamburger, art. 'Tephillin').

On the other hand, the Talmud abounds in extravagant eulogy of the religious value of the phylacteries.† In the Middle Ages, from the 8th, and especially from the 10th cent. (Hamburger), they were less esteemed; and, in some parts at least, the practice almost became extinct (see Rodkinssohn, תפלה למשה, Ursprung u. Entwickelung d. Phylacterien-Ritus, 1883 (Hebrew), to be used with caution, cf. REJ vi. 288). The fact that several Jewish scholars of note, beginning with Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam, 1080–c. 1150), in their commentaries maintained the figurative interpretation of the cardinal passages, no doubt contributed to the growing disuse of the phylacteries. A return to the earlier practice, however, was gradually effected, and their use is now universal among the orthodox Jews, both of the Polish and Spanish rites. At the age of thirteen years and a day the Jewish boy attains his religious majority, becomes responsible for his actions, and a 'Bar-Miẓvah' (בר מצוה, for the history and significance of which see Löw, Die Lebensalter in d. jüd. Literatur, 210 ff.). Among the duties and privileges of the Bar-Miẓvah not the least important is that of 'laying' the tĕphillîn.

LITERATURE.—The commentaries, esp. Dillmann-Ryssel, Exodus, etc.; Dillmann, Driver on Deuteronomy; Kalisch, Exodus (special dissertation, pp. 223–227). The numerous minute Rabbinical prescriptions will be found in the authoritative works of Maimonides (Yad Ha-ḥazaka Hilkoth Tephillin) and Joseph Caro (Shulḥān 'Aruk). Extensive excerpts from Maimonides in Ugolinus, Thes. Antiquitatum Sacrarum, xxi., containing treatise 'de Phylacteriis Hebræorum.' Of the older discussions the most valuable are those by Buxtorf, Synagoga Judaica, pp. 170–185; Spencer, de Legibus Hebræorum, etc., Cambridge, 1727, lib. iv. capp. 1–7 ('de natura et origine Phylacteriorum'); Bodenschatz, Kirchliche Verfassung der heutigen Juden, iv. 14–19 (with illustrations). Lightfoot, Schoettgen, and similar works on Mt 23^{5}. M. Margoliouth, The Fundamental Principles of Mod. Judaism, pp. 1–49. Of the articles in Bible Dictionaries perhaps the most important are those by Delitzsch in Riehm's Handwörterbuch, etc. (art. 'Denkzettel'), by Ginsburg in Kitto-Alexander's Biblical Cyclopædia (art. 'Phylactery'), both illustrated, and by Hamburger, Realencyclopædie d. Bibel u. Talmud, vol. ii. (art. 'Tephillin'). The only critical investigation of the subject hitherto has been by Klein, 'Die Totaphoth nach Bibel u. Tradition,' in the Jahrbücher für protest. Theologie, 1881, pp. 666–689 (useful collection of material, but critically and exegetically weak). The varying usage of the Middle Ages is given by Rodkinssohn, תפלה למשה, Ursprung u. Entwickelung des Phylacterien-Ritus bei den Juden (in Hebrew), 1883 [not seen]. A short exposition of modern Jewish teaching in Friedlander, The Jewish Religion, 331–338.

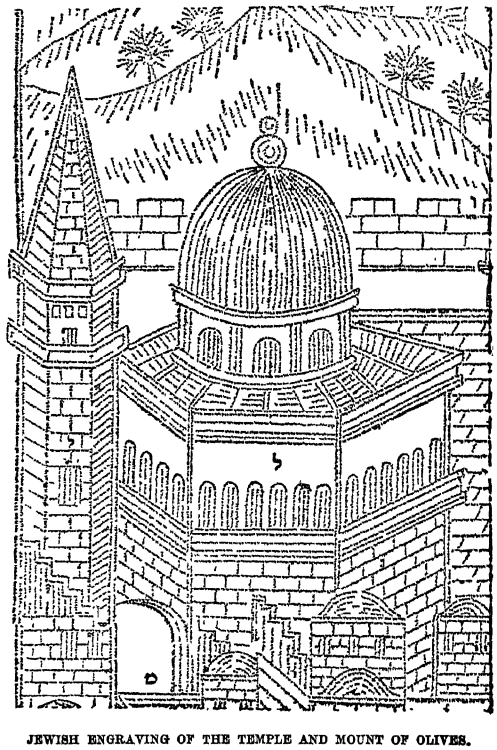
PHYLARCH (τὸν φυλάρχην, 2 Mac 8^{32}).—There can be but little doubt that this word is not a proper name (as in AV; cf. RVm), but a military title. In Athens the 'phylarchs' had command of the cavalry; and here either a cavalry officer or a commander of auxiliary forces seems to be intended. Zöckler still supports the proper name.



PHYSICIAN.—See MEDICINE, p. 321.

PI-BESETH (פִּי־בֶסֶת, Βούβαστος).—Ezk 30^{17}, a city in Lower Egypt, the hieroglyphic Per-Bastet, 'House of Bastet,' in Copt. Pubasti, Buasti, etc. The city was named Bast; the goddess who dwelt in it was hence called Bastet, 'the Bastite,' and thence again was formed the sacred name of the city, viz. Per-Bastet, lit. 'the house of the Bastite.' The sacred name was that adopted by the Greeks and Romans; the modern name of the site, Tell Basṭeh, 'the hill of Basteh,' may be derived from the original form.

Bubastis was probably a wealthy and important city from the earliest times. Its mounds are very extensive, and its temple, recently excavated by Naville for the Egyp. Expl. Fund, contained monuments of every period from the 4th Dynasty down to Roman times. It is now entirely deserted, but lies close to the large town of Zagazig, which owes its importance to the railway. Bubastis was capital of the 18th nome of Lower Egypt, the boundaries of which are very uncertain. In history it does not appear until the time of the 22nd Dynasty, founded by Shishak about B.C. 1000, and known as the Bubastite Dynasty, under which Bubastis was the second city of Egypt, Thebes still remaining the first. When that dynasty expired, and Egypt was divided, Bubastis was still the capital of a royal family, which was afterwards considered to be the legitimate 23rd Dynasty. The city was visited by Herodotus, who greatly admired the situation and beauty of its granite temple, and has recorded the existence of a popular and somewhat licentious annual festival held in honour of the goddess Bastet (Hdt. ii. 59 f.). The goddess was figured with the head of a lioness, or later almost invariably of a cat. She was held to be a mild form of Sekhemt, the goddess of destruction. Cats were sacred to her. Her son was named Mahes, 'fierce-eyed lion'; but Nefer-Atum was commonly worshipped as the third member of the Bubastite triad. Mummied cats, sometimes in bronze cases, were very abundant, the cat cemetery having extended over many acres; but antiquity dealers have now plundered what the damp atmosphere of the Delta had spared.

passages RV has 'figured stones' (cf. Lv 26^{1}). These may have been stones erected for worship

* It is maintained by some, however, that the power of protecting from evil spirits here affirmed is confined to the mĕzūzā.

† It is unfair, however, to use for polemical purposes such purely academic statements as Berakoth, 6*a*, that the Almighty Himself 'lays the tĕphillîn'! (a curious inference from the following passages: Is 62^{8}, Dt 33^{2}, Ps 29^{11}).

or with a hand or other amulet sign marked upon them for the preservation of fields and vineyards from evil influences. For 'pictures of silver' in Pr 25[11] RV gives 'baskets (m. filigree work) of silver.' See Lagarde, Anmerk. z. Gr. Uebersetz. d. Proverb. 80. 2. שְׂכִיָּה. For עַל כָּל־שְׂכִיּוֹת הַחֶמְדָּה of MT the LXX has ἐπὶ πᾶσαν θέαν πλοίων κάλλους, AV 'upon all pleasant pictures,' RV 'upon all pleasant imagery' (m. 'watch-towers'). Siegfried-Stade propose to read סְפִינוֹת (cf. Jon 1[5]), 'ships,' for שְׂכִיּוֹת.

Figures were represented either by an image completely separated from its surrounding material, or by a surface in partial relief, or by a line of stain or etching (מַחֲקֶה) on the surface.

At the present day, when a pious Syrian Jew wishes to have a picture of the temple and the Mount of Olives in his house, he falls upon the device of having a line engraving made up of Scripture quotations, thus avoiding the formal infringement of the second commandment. See engraving on previous page. G. M. MACKIE.

PIECE.—1. A measure: 1 Es 8[20] 'an hundred pieces of wine' (Gr. μετρητής, RV 'firkin,' as the same word is translated in Jn 2[6] AV and RV). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. 2. An instrument of war; 1 Mac 6[51] 'pieces to cast darts and slings' (Gr. σκορπίδιον, dim. of σκορπίος, a scorpion). In this sense the word is scarcely obsolete. Shaks. I Henry VI. I. iv. 15, has—

'A piece of ordnance 'gainst it I have placed.'

In Selden's day the word was beginning to be replaced by gun. He says (Table Talk, p. 65), 'Sometimes we put a new signification to an old word, as when we call a piece a Gun.'

PIETY.—In Lat. pietas signified duteous regard (1) to the gods, (2) to one's parents [cf. the familiar 'pius Aeneas' of Vergil, Aen. i. 220, etc.] and inferiors, (3) to one's country; and the Eng. word 'piety' retained all these meanings. We use it now of devotion to God only, although we can prefix an adj. and speak of 'filial piety.' We cannot say with Milton, Samson Agon. 993—

'The public marks of honour and reward
Conferred upon me for the piety
Which to my country I was judged to have shown.'

In AV the only occurrence is 1 Ti 5[4] 'If any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to show piety at home,' where εὐσεβεῖν is rendered 'to show piety,' and the tr. is retained in RV. An example of the meaning 'devotion to God' is found in the Preface to AV, 'Piety towards God was the weapon, and the onely weapon that both preserved Constantines person, and avenged him of his enemies.' J. HASTINGS.

PI-HAHIROTH (פִּי הַחִירוֹת).—When the Israelites turned back from ETHAM, 'in the edge of the wilderness,' they encamped 'before (לִפְנֵי Ex 14[2]) or beside (עַל v.[9]) Pi-hahiroth, between MIGDOL and the sea, before BAAL-ZEPHON.' The name occurs again in the itinerary of Nu 33[7. 8]. In v.[8] RV has 'from before Hahiroth,' instead of 'from before Pi-hahiroth,' following in this the MT מִפְּנֵי, חַח, which, however, may be a copyist's error for מִפְּנֵי פִּי חַח or מִפְּנֵי חַח. All the passages in which Pi-hahiroth is mentioned belong to P. Unfortunately, the above definition of its position is insufficient to fix its site, for Migdol and Baal-zephon, like most of the places named at the initial stages of the Exodus, are themselves unknown. Even RAAMSES has not been identified, although we know the site of PITHOM. See, further, art. EXODUS in vol. i. p. 803.

The etymology and the meaning of the name Pi-hahiroth are likewise uncertain, although attempts have been made to explain it from the side both of Egyptian and of Hebrew. The LXX, which finds a proper name in Nu 33[7] (B ἐπὶ στόμα Ἐπιρώθ, AF . . . Εἰρώθ)[§] (BA ἀπέναντι Εἰρώθ), treats פִּי הַחִירוֹת in Ex 14[2. 9] as an appellative, ἀπέναντι τῆς ἐπαύλεως. The 'farmstead' of this last rendering reminds Sayce (EHH 181) of the ahu or 'estate' of Pharaoh in the district of Thukut, on which, according to a letter dating from the 8th year of Merenptah, the Edomite herdsmen were allowed to settle. Naville has proposed to make Pi-hahiroth = Pi-Qerhet, 'the house of the goddess Qerhet,' the name of a sanctuary in or near Pithom, but to this there are philological objections. The Pesh., Targ., and Sa'adya take פִּי as the construct of פֶּה 'mouth,' while חִירוֹת, according to the first, means 'trenches or canals,' according to the other two, 'mountains or rocks.' For modern conjectures see Dillm.-Ryssel on Ex 14[2], which, along with Sayce (HCM 252 ff.) and Driver (in Hogarth's Authority and Archæology, 57, 61), may be consulted on the question of the site. J. A. SELBIE.

PILATE.—Pontius Pilatus (Πόντιος Πειλᾶτος) was the fifth* Roman procurator of Judæa. After the deposition (A.D. 6) of Archelaus, his territory, which included Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa,† was erected into an imperial province in charge of an officer of the equestrian order with the title of procurator. In the Gospels, Pilate is called simply governor (ἡγεμών); but Josephus specifically calls the ruler procurator (ἐπίτροπος; Ant. XX. vi. 2, BJ II. viii. 1, ix. 2, etc.),‡ as also does Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44). His official residence was in the palace of Herod in Cæsarea (cf. Ac 23[35]); but at the time of the feasts he usually went up to Jerus., probably occupying there also the palace of Herod.§ The military force under him consisted of about three thousand men at Cæsarea, besides small garrisons scattered throughout the country, and a cohort (500 men?) stationed in Jerusalem.‖ His judicial authority was supreme, except in the cases of Roman citizens, where appeal lay to the emperor, while his chief duty concerned the financial administration and the collection of taxes for the imperial treasury. The Judæan procurators thus exercised much higher authority than officers of the same name in most Roman provinces, where they presided merely over the finances. Similar administrative functions, however, were entrusted to the eparchs of Egypt and the procurators of Noricum, Rætia, and a few other exceptional peoples.¶

But while Judæa was thus directly governed by Rome, a large measure of local self-government was allowed, especially to urban communities. In Jerus. the Sanhedrin was the supreme court of the nation, and as many judicial functions as possible were retained by it. Death sentences, however, required the governor's confirmation, and were executed by him (cf. Jos. Ant. XX. ix. 1, BJ II. viii. 1). The tolerant Roman rule showed much respect for the customs and prejudices of the Jewish people. It aimed at as large liberty as was consistent with order and tribute. Most of the difficulties in Judæa arose from the religious zeal and intractable disposition of the Jews themselves. On the other hand, their liberties were liable at any moment to be overruled, if necessity seemed to require it; and the procurators were generally men who grievously abused their authority. The nation itself also was divided, and in an almost constant state of tumult. The recollection of these facts is necessary in order to appreciate the position of Pilate when Christ was brought before his bar.

* Some count him the sixth procurator, reckoning as the first Sabinus who took charge during the absence of Archelaus (Jos. Ant. XVII. ix. 3, x. 1); but Sabinus, as procurator in Syria under Varus, merely acted to secure Cæsar's interests after the death of Herod, and while the cause of Archelaus was yet in doubt.

† Except the towns of Gaza, Gadara, and Hippos (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 39).

‡ Jos. also calls the governor ἔπαρχος (Ant. XIX. ix. 2, etc.), προστησόμενος (Ant. XX. vii. 1), ἐπιμελητής (Ant. XVIII. iv. 2), as well as ἡγεμών (Ant. XXVIII. iii. 1).

Of Pilate's origin we know nothing,* though it has been inferred, from his nomen Pontius, that he belonged to an ancient Samnite family whose name frequently appears in Roman history.† His cognomen has, however, been derived from pileatus, —one who wore the pileus, the cap of manumitted slaves,—and the inference has been drawn that he was a freedman, or descended from one. But his appointment as procurator makes this improbable, since such officers were uniformly of equestrian rank.‡ Hence others derived Pilatus from pilum, a javelin. His prænomen is unknown, nor does his name appear in history apart from his residence in Judæa. He was preceded in office by Coponius (A.D. 6–9?), Marcus Ambivius (A.D. 9–12?), Annius Rufus (A.D. 12–15?), and Valerius Gratus (A.D. 15–26), and was appointed (Eus. HE i. 9) in the twelfth year of Tiberius (A.D. 26), and continued in office ten years (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 2).§ The unusual length of time during which he and Gratus held office was, in accordance with the policy of Tiberius, based on the opinion that governors who had already enriched themselves, would be better for the people than new ones whose avarice was yet unsatisfied (Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 5). Tacitus (Ann. i. 80, iv. 6) also notices the long governorships under Tiberius. Pilate came therefore to Judæa contemporaneously with the appearance of John the Baptist, and his rule covered the period of Jesus' ministry and of the first establishment of Christianity in Judæa.

Pilate's administration was marked by events which show both the difficulties of his task and the small effort which he made to understand the Jews or accommodate himself to their prejudices. The first disturbance (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 1, BJ II. ix. 2, 3) probably occurred soon after his entrance on office. To satisfy the Jews, the Romans had directed their soldiers not to carry to Jerus. upon their standards the usual image of the emperor; but Pilate sent the army to Jerus. to winter, and directed that the standards, with the images upon them, should be taken by night into the sacred city. This seemed to the Jews a direct violation of their religious laws. Forthwith multitudes hastened to Cæsarea to implore the governor to remove the images. For five days he refused to heed them, and on the sixth he admitted them to his presence, but suddenly ordered his soldiers to surround them, and threatened them with instant death if they persisted in their request. To his astonishment the Jews threw themselves on the ground, and declared that they would rather die than endure the violation of their laws. Pilate, of course, had not intended so great a massacre, and was forced to direct the removal of the images. Another disturbance arose from Pilate's use of the money contributed to the temple treasury, to build aqueducts to Jerusalem. It has been suggested that his real object was to provide water for an army besieging the city (cf. Muller, Pont. Pil. p. 16). At any rate the project aroused violent opposition, and when Pilate came to Jerus. the people clamoured against his design. On this occasion, however, he silenced the tumult by introducing disguised soldiers into the crowd, who, at a signal, drew their clubs and scattered the multitude (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 2). The incident, referred to in Lk 13^{1}, of the 'Galilæans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices,' is not mentioned by other authorities. Doubtless Pilate ordered them to be slain in the outer court of the temple, perhaps on account of some riot, while they were celebrating one of the feasts. This appeared to some an unusual judgment of Providence upon these men; and the incident illustrates the disturbed state of the country, the frequent severity of Pilate's measures, and the odium in which the governor was held. The sedition in which Barabbas took part (Mk 15^{7}, Lk 23^{19}) is another example of the turbulent state of the community; while still another incident, characteristic of Pilate's rule, is described by Philo (ad Gaium, 38). Philo makes Agrippa relate to Caligula that Pilate once hung gilt shields in the palace of Herod in Jerus., on each of which was inscribed the name of the donor and of him in whose honour the shield was dedicated. But even this aroused the fury of the Jews. Their chief men, including four sons of Herod, besought him to remove the objects of offence; and, when he refused, they wrote to Tiberius, who ordered the procurator to take the shields to Cæsarea. Philo makes Agrippa describe Pilate as 'inflexible, merciless, and obstinate.' He says that the Jews' threat to communicate with Tiberius 'exasperated Pilate in the greatest possible degree, as he feared lest they might go on an embassy to the emperor, and might impeach him with respect to other particulars of his government — his corruptions, his acts of insolence, his rapine, and his habit of insulting people, his cruelty, and his continual murders of people untried and uncondemned, and his never-ending, gratuitous, and most grievous inhumanity.' This is doubtless a one-sided representation. In the Gospels Pilate manifests a strong desire to do justice, and he was not more arbitrary or cruel than many other Roman officials. But he also appears in the Gospels, as in Philo, passionate and fierce, uniting obstinacy with weakness, seeking his ends by unworthy devices, and restrained in his desire to do justice by dread both of his turbulent subjects and of the effect of an appeal from them to the emperor. All accounts agree in testifying to the hearty dislike which existed between him and the Jews.

Pilate's share in the trial of Jesus is related briefly in Mt and Mk, but somewhat more fully in Lk; while Jn records further details which explain and confirm the Synoptic accounts. The governor evidently had some previous knowledge of Jesus, as his wife also probably had (Mt 27^{19}). The Lord's ministry indeed had been mainly in Galilee, so that probably He had only within a short period before his arrest come under Pilate's notice. But it is incredible, in view of the interest lately aroused by Jesus in Judæa, and the necessary watchfulness of the government, that His presence had not been reported to the procurator; and at the trial it is expressly stated that Pilate 'knew that for envy

* The Germanic legends mention several towns as the birthplace of Pilate. One of the most widespread locates his birth in Mayence, as the illegitimate child of a king (variously styled Cyrus, Tyrus, and Atus), who sent him, because of a murder, to Rome, whence, because of another murder, he was sent to Pontus, from which place he derived his name. There he served the emperor by conquering the wild tribes of that region; whereupon Herod made him his co-regent, and was in turn overcome by him. See G. A. Müller, Pont. Pil. p. 48 ff.

‡ The case of Felix, who was a freedman, is remarked upon by Tacitus as if quite unusual.

§ He must have been removed early in A.D. 36, since Vitellius, after sending Pilate to Rome, attended a passover in Jerus. (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3), and shortly after began the expedition against Aretas, king of the Nabatæans, which, however, was prevented (Ant. XVIII. vi. 4) by the news of Tiberius' death (early in A.D. 37). Pilate's appointment therefore is to be dated A.D. 26, since Josephus states that he ruled ten years they had delivered him unto him' (Mt 27[18]). But when, early in the morning, the representatives of the Sanhedrin, which had already condemned Jesus to death for blasphemy, brought Him to Pilate for permission to have Him put to death, and refused to enter the governor's residence lest they should be defiled (Jn 18[28]), Pilate went out * to them and demanded what charge they brought against the prisoner. They seem to have expected him to confirm their sentence without inquiry, a fact which illustrates the large authority conceded by the Romans to the native court. But Pilate refused to act without reasons. When they suddenly cried, 'If this man were not an evil-doer, we should not have delivered him up unto thee' (Jn 18[30]), he contemptuously remarked, 'Take him yourselves, and judge him according to your law,' thus forcing them to admit that they could not secure their purpose except through him. His position fully warranted this haughty expression of authority; but he was probably actuated in this instance by the desire to do justice, or at least to prevent the injustice which they intended (Mt 27[18]). The Jews therefore, being forced to present charges, and knowing the uselessness of bringing the charge of blasphemy, made three accusations, viz. perverting the nation, forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, and claiming to be Christ, a king (Lk 23[2]). The latter two, and perhaps the first, were matters with which the civil authority would naturally deal. Pilate therefore asked Jesus, 'Art thou the king of the Jews?' Jesus replied in the affirmative, but to the accusing cries of the Jews He was silent. The governor was impressed by His demeanour, though acknowledging so grave a charge, as that of no ordinary prisoner. So he led Jesus within the palace, and privately examined Him (Jn 18[33-38]).† In this interview the disposition and character of Pilate specially appear. Jesus freely answered his questions, and explained the entirely unworldly nature of His kingdom. He dealt with the Roman throughout as with one not actuated by malice, but placed in circumstances where he could escape guilt only by courageously obeying the truth (cf. also Jn 19[11]). For this, however, Pilate was not prepared. His ejaculation, 'What is truth?' (Jn 18[38]) was the utterance of a worldly mind, entirely sceptical of the worth of real religious and moral principles. But he was convinced that Jesus was politically harmless, and ought not to be sacrificed to Jewish malice and fanaticism. So he resolved to save Him. Yet he was afraid peremptorily to release Him: a fear which is perfectly intelligible in view of the evident determination of the chief priests, the serious charges they had presented, the large tolerance always shown to Jewish prejudices, as well as of the suspicious character of Tiberius and the excellent grounds of complaint which the Jews already had against the governor. Therefore Pilate began the series of feeble devices, which the Synoptists record, to secure the release of Jesus by a popular verdict, or at least to free himself from participation in His death. He first brought Him forth, and declared that he found no fault in Him (Jn 18[38]). But this unexpected announcement evoked from the priests and bystanders the cry, 'He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Judæa, and beginning from Galilee even unto this place' (Lk 23[5]). Hearing that Jesus was from Galilee, and impressed by the fury of their desire, Pilate thought to rid himself of the case by transferring it to Herod Antipas, who was then in Jerusalem. He was the more willing to do this because the relations between him and Herod had been strained, and he desired to show his friendliness. But Herod, perhaps out of compliment to Pilate, refused to accept jurisdiction, only indicating by his mockery of Jesus his contempt for the prisoner's claims (Lk 23[7ff.]). Pilate thus found himself compelled to adjudicate. He again declared his conviction of the prisoner's innocence, and appealed to Herod's refusal to pass sentence in confirmation of his own judgment. He proposed therefore to please the Jews by chastising Jesus, but his own conscience by releasing Him (Lk 23[14ff.]). It was a weak compromise, and certain to satisfy no one. Meanwhile the multitude, doubtless increased by new arrivals, some of whom hardly understood the purpose of the assemblage, began to clamour (Mk 15[8]) that Pilate should, according to his custom at the feast,* set free some notable prisoner. Knowing the popularity of Jesus, Pilate hoped through this custom to prevent the purpose of the chief priests, and asked if he should release Jesus. But he was foiled by the priests persuading the people to demand the release of a certain Barabbas, who was probably popular as a leader of sedition against the government (Mt 27[20]). It was apparently at this point that Pilate, having taken his seat on the chair of judgment (see GABBATHA),† received the message from his wife,‡ which doubtless added a superstitious feeling to the force of his conviction that Jesus ought to be released (Mt 27[19]). But he had already yielded his true ground and could not recover it. When again he asked whom they would choose for release, they unitedly cried 'Barabbas.' When he next inquired what they wanted him to do with Jesus, the cry arose, at the instigation of the priests, 'Crucify him.' Shocked by their fierceness, the governor protested against so extreme a penalty. 'Why? What evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him. I will chastise and release him' (Lk 23[22]). But they clamoured for crucifixion. Pilate appears to have been simply overborne by their fierceness and the threatening aspect of affairs. His fault was moral weakness. Yet the peculiar character of his government and the known tolerance of Rome toward Jewish prejudices make it quite intelligible that unwillingness to anger the Sanhedrin should outweigh with such a man the feeble sense of duty. His handwashing (Mt 27[24], cf. Dt 21[6-8] though the act was a natural symbol) was but the weak device of a superficial mind, as he sought to

* Being only a procurator, Pilate had no quæstor, and therefore conducted the trial himself.

† This narrative of John's is absolutely necessary to explain the Synoptic account of Pilate's conduct.

* The origin of this custom is unknown. Schürer (HJP I. ii. 60) states that it 'was grounded on a special authorization of the emperor, for the right of remitting a sentence was not otherwise given to the governors.' He cites Hirschfeld, Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad. 1889, p. 439; and Merkel, Abhandl. aus d. Gebiete des. röm. Rechts, 1 Heft, 1881. Friedlieb (Archaol. 110) thinks it was done at every feast, but St. John (1889) limits it to the passover. Some suppose it was a Jewish custom retained by the Romans, and Pilate's language in Jn ('Ye have a custom,' etc.) seems to confirm this view. Others think it was of Roman origin, and connect it with Livy's statement (v.[13]) that, at the feast of the gods called Lectisternium, prisoners were freed.

† The βῆμα (Mt 27[19]), which had been put on 'a place called the Pavement, but, in the Hebrew, Gabbatha' (Jn 19[13]). Those who identify Pilate's residence with the fortress Antonia suppose this place to have been the elevated, paved ground between the fortress and the temple (see PRÆTORIUM). Those who identify Pilate's residence with Herod's palace suppose the βῆμα to have been placed on a mosaic floor (λιθόστρωτον, 'spread with stones'), which was called in Aram. Gabbatha (גַּבְּתָא 'elevation') from the elevated position which it, with perhaps the βῆμα upon it, occupied. Cæsar (Suet. Jul. 46) is said to have carried a portable pavement on which to place his judgment-seat; and St. John's mention of the pavement with the βῆμα seems to imply that it had some connexion with the delivery of a judicial sentence, and gave formality to Pilate's final decision. See GABBATHA.

‡ Originally magistrates were not allowed to take their wives to the provinces, but the rule had ceased to be observed, as is shown by the failure of an effort to enforce it mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. iii. 33, 34).

calm his conscience by throwing the guilt of the transaction upon others.

But, though Pilate yielded to their request, and delivered Jesus to his soldiers to be scourged preparatory to crucifixion, St. John's narrative (19^{1-16}) shows that the governor's conscience was not yet silenced. Once again he sought to satisfy the Jews by the spectacle of Jesus bleeding and mocked, declaring that even yet he had discovered in the prisoner, though under torture, no cause of death. When they still cried 'Crucify him,' Pilate became sullen and angry. In bitter satire, and as though about to dismiss the whole case, he bade them do the foul deed themselves. Then first they brought forward a religious charge, apparently feeling that now they needed only to work on the governor's sentiments and make him realize how serious the case appeared to them. 'We have a law, and according to our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.' But the words roused afresh Pilate's superstition. Again, and now with evident anxiety and fear (Jn 19^{8}), he privately examined Jesus, this time concerning His origin. The silence of Jesus to these inquiries further wrought on Pilate's mind, and, though he tried to induce Jesus to speak by boasting of his own power, he again made an effort to release Him. But the Jews, now fully realizing that they must conquer the impression which Jesus had made on Pilate by bringing to bear a stronger motive, taunted the governor with infidelity to the emperor in favouring a pretended king; and this appeal to Pilate's political ambitions proved decisive. He resolved to silence his convictions. Resuming his seat on the Bema, he satirically and sullenly presented Jesus to them as their king. Thereupon he had at least the grim satisfaction of hearing his turbulent subjects vigorously forswear their political freedom and profess their allegiance to the emperor (Jn 19^{15}). Then he finally delivered Jesus to crucifixion; but it was quite in keeping with Pilate's character and with the violence which he had done to his own convictions, that he obstinately refused to change the title on the cross, its very offensiveness to the Jews being a merit in his eyes (Jn 19^{22}).

Thus Pilate appears a typical specimen of a worldly man. The good in him was unsupported by moral principle, and overborne by personal and political considerations. Compelled to take the leading part in a transaction where high moral qualities were supremely demanded, he proved himself to be without them, and made a great crime possible by his feebleness of character. This is quite consistent with his bravado and recklessness on other occasions. Christ's judgment upon Pilate (Jn 19^{11}) is also the verdict of history.

Pilate's rule was brought to its close by an ill-judged attempt to suppress a harmless movement in Samaria (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 1). A certain impostor summoned the Samaritans to Mount Gerizim by promising to show them the sacred vessels which Moses was alleged to have hidden there. They came armed, and collected in a village called Tirabatha. But Pilate fell upon them, and caused many, both then and subsequently, to be slain. Thereupon the Samaritans appealed for redress to Vitellius, the legate in Syria, pleading that no political sedition had been intended. Vitellius ordered Pilate to repair to Rome to answer the complaints against him; but before the procurator reached the capital, Tiberius had died. Thereafter Pilate disappears from authentic history. Traditions, however, concerning him existed in the Church, and finally took the shape of fantastic legends. Eusebius (HE ii. 7 and Chron.) relates, on the authority of certain unnamed earlier writers, that Pilate fell into such misfortunes under Caligula that he committed suicide; and later authorities repeat the statement. The Apocr. literature elaborated the story (see Tischendorf, Evang. Apoc., Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. viii.). According to one version ('Παράδοσις Πιλάτου'), Tiberius summoned Pilate to Rome to answer the charge of crucifying Christ. When, at the examination before the Senate, Tiberius uttered Christ's name, the statues of the gods fell to the ground; whereupon Tiberius ordered war to be made against the Jews, and Pilate to be beheaded. The latter, however, with his wife, died a penitent, and was assured by a voice from heaven of his forgiveness. According to another and probably later account (Mors Pilati), Pilate appeared before Tiberius in the Saviour's tunic, which protected him from the emperor's fury. When he was stripped of it, Tiberius condemned him to death, but Pilate killed himself. His body was cast into the Tiber, but the evil spirits so disturbed the waters that the Romans carried the body to Vienne and sank it in the Rhone.* Thence, for the same reason, it was removed to the territory of Losania (Lausanne), but was finally sunk in a pit surrounded by mountains. Thus the legend connected itself with the mountain opposite Lucerne (supposed to have been named originally Pileatus, because surmounted often by a hat-shaped cloud, but corrupted by connexion with the legend into Pilatus; see Ruskin, Mod. Painters, v. 128; Müller, Pont. Pil. pp. 52, 53) where the body of Pilate is said to lie in a lake on the mountain, and at times emerge and go through the motion of washing the hands. The legend exists in various forms, however (see Müller, ib.), and attached itself to several localities. In one of the later accounts Pilate is said to have been executed by Nero (see Schürer, HJP I. ii. 88 n.). The 'tendency' of the earlier legends was to represent the Roman Government in its treatment of Pilate as vindicating the Christians and Christ; while the disposition to represent Pilate as becoming himself a Christian† explains, perhaps, the belief of the Coptic Church that he died a saint and martyr.‡

Pilate's wife is said to have been named Claudia Procula or Procla. Christian tradition made her a proselyte to Judaism (Gosp. of Nic. 2). That she became a Christian is also a very old tradition (Orig. Hom. on Mt. 35). In the Gr. Church she became a saint, honoured on Oct. 27th. Some have even identified her with the Claudia of 2 Ti 4^{21}. Her dream may be assumed to indicate that she had heard of Jesus and His beneficent life and deeds.

That Pilate made a report to Tiberius concerning Jesus is affirmed by Justin (1 Ap. 35) and Tertullian (Ap. 21), as well as by later writers (e.g. Eus. HE ii. 2), and Apocr. literature. Some report from the governor to the emperor is probable; but it is doubtful if the early Fathers rested their appeal to it on any certain knowledge of its existence, or of its preservation in the archives. Certainly the extant Acta Pilati are spurious. Eusebius relates (HE ix. 5) that in the great persecution under Maximin, Acts of Pilate derogatory to Christ were forged and circulated by the pagans; but none of these have survived.

PILATE, ACTS OF.—See last paragraph of preceding art. and NICODEMUS (GOSPEL OF).

PILDASH (פִּלְדָּשׁ, Φαλδάς).—One of the sons of Nahor, Gn 22²² (J). The personal name פלדשו has been read in the Nabatæan inscriptions (ZDMG xiv. 440). The proposal of Knobel to connect Pildash with the Πιπάλθας of Procopius (de Ædificiis, ii. 4) is rejected by Dillmann.

PILHA (פִּלְהָא, B Φαδαείς, A Φαλαεί).—One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10²⁴.

PILL.—See PEEL.

PILLAR.—1. מַצֵּבָה, Arab. nuṣub or nuṣb, plur. anṣâb, from the Semitic root נצב, meaning 'to set upright.' 2. גֵּצֶר, from the same root, employed in Gn 19²⁶ to describe the pillar of salt into which Lot's wife was transformed. 3. עמוד, rendered in Greek by στήλη (also employed by LXX in Gn 19²⁶). This Hebrew word occurs in Jer 27¹⁹ in the sense of 'column,' which is probably its only signification, whereas מַצֵּבָה means any upright stone. More frequently עמוד is rendered by the Greek στύλος (Ex 13²¹, Jg 20⁴⁰, Job 27¹¹), or by the word κίων, Jg 16²⁵·²⁶. 4. חַמָּן (used in plur.), pillar dedicated to sun-worship. Cf. the Carthaginian בעל חמן, Baethgen, Beiträge zur sem. Rel. p. 25 ff. (cf. חַמָּה 'sunglow' = sun in Job 30²⁸). On ן־ see Gesen.²⁶ § 85 n. The plur. occurs in Ezk 6⁴·⁶, Is 17⁸ 27⁹, Lv 26³⁰, 2 Ch 14⁴·⁷. It may have been a later equivalent of מַצֵּבָה (so Kittel). LXX did not understand the term, variously rendering by ξύλινα χειροποίητα, τεμένη, βδελύγματα, and εἴδωλα.

The term מַצֵּבָה is nearly always used in association with religious cultus,* and signifies the upright stone which, in the pre-exilian and pre-Deuteronomic worship of Israel, was the never failing accompaniment of the Heb. sanctuary or bāmāh. It consisted of rough unhewn stone, and was the symbol of the Divine presence or numen, which was considered in some sense to reside in or be attached to it (see Jos 24²⁶·²⁷). Upon it the blood of the sacrificed victim or the oil of the vegetable offering was poured or smeared (cf. Gn 28¹⁸).

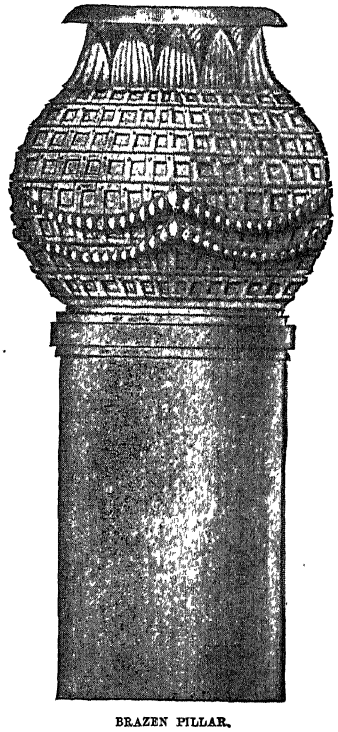
There is clear evidence that in the primitive sanctuary of the early Semites the upright stone served as altar and Divine symbol in one; but in the later and more developed form of the cultus both among Semites and other races, the altar and stone-symbol came to be separated the one from the other. This probably arose from the fact that it was found convenient to have a separate place for the reception and slaughter of the victim, and to this another motive came to be superadded in connexion with the larger and more important sanctuaries, viz. the need of having an erection which should be conspicuous to a large concourse of beholders who witnessed in silence the solemn act of slaughter. The further need to provide for the reception and disposal of the blood gave rise to special arrangements in this particular apparatus of worship. That the distinction between altar and stone-symbol arose very early in the history of primitive Israel is clearly revealed by the facts of language, since it is quite evident that מִזְבֵּחַ 'altar' or place of slaughter, belongs to early as well as late Hebrew. These views are established by archæological evidence. Primitive dolmens have been discovered provided with hollows formed for drink-offerings, and intended to serve as altars. Stones were also used by the ancient Palestinian inhabitants for the worship of ancestral manes as well as to mark the place of burial. See Nowack in Heb. Archäol. i. p. 92, who cites from the researches of Noetling and Schumacher in ZDPV ix. 268, and Zeitsch. für Ethnol. xix. 37 ff.; and Conder, Heth and Moab, pp. 238, 266 ff. The Rev. James Sibree has informed the present writer that many similar stones have been found in Madagascar.

Much obscurity hangs over the origin of the unhewn stone representation of deity. It has been generally held that that origin is to be found in the primitive fetish worship of which many illustrations have been collected by Prof. Tylor* and other writers from Africa, India, and ancient Hellas. Theophrastus (4th cent. B.C.) describes the superstitious Greek as passing the anointed stones in the street, taking out his oil-phial and pouring its contents on them, and then, after falling on his knees to worship, going on his way (Char. xvi.). Survivals of stone-worship were to be found even in quite recent times among the remote mountain peasants of Norway (Tylor, ib. p. 167). Accordingly the employment of the stone-symbol among the primitive Semites may be regarded as part of a well-nigh universal tradition of antiquity. In ancient Arabic polytheism we find the stone nuṣb or the group of anṣâb. The blood of the sacrificial victim was smeared upon the stone. The idea involved in this act was evidently, as Robertson Smith suggests, that of bringing 'the offering into direct contact with the deity, and in like manner the practice of stroking the sacred stone (e.g. that of the Kaaba) with the hand is identical

* The exception Is 6¹³ is far from certain. The last clause of the verse is omitted in LXX BA* though supplied in Luc. text and by a later hand in A. The preceding relative clause, with its ἅγ. λεγ. שלכת and the unique use of מצבת, appears to the present writer to have been mutilated at some early date.

* Primitive Culture, vol. ii. p. 161 ff. It is by no means easy to define the meaning of 'fetish.' Usually it is explained as meaning the material thing, as a stone, which is made the object of worship. Others deny this, treating the fetish as a magical 'medium whereby one is placed in closer connexion with the deity, and in which divine powers reside.' See Chantepie de la Saussaye, *Lehrbuch der Religionsgesch.*² i. p. 14. This writer remarks with much truth that it is not any or every object of sense-perception to which the term can be applied, 'but only the individual, one might say, accidental object which attracts the attention of the savage.' There is no essential distinction between the fetish and the idol. The distinction is merely one of external form. The former is a rude natural object accidentally found, the latter is carved or painted by human hands. In both cases the spirit, which is the object of worship and whose help is sought, is supposed to be in some way incorporate in the material. Siebeck, Lehrbuch der Religionsphilosophie, p. 64, contrasts this view with the more advanced conception which regards the idol as the symbol and not the seat of deity. It may here be remarked, in order to prevent misunderstanding, that the expression 'stone-symbol' is not used in this exclusive sense in this article. The stone among the early Semites not only represented but incorporated the numen of the deity. See Robertson Smith, *RS*¹ p. 204 ff.

with the practice of touching or stroking the garments or beard of a man in acts of supplication before him.'



The stone might represent a male or female deity, but it must not be inferred that the plurality of stones represented always a plurality of deities. Probably it represented as a rule a single object of worship, just as the twelve stones erected by Joshua at Gilgal (Jos 4^{20}), and the same number by Moses (on the occasion of the covenant sacrifice at Sinai, Ex 24^4), for the twelve tribes of Israel, represented the one God, Jehovah. According to Wellhausen (Reste arab. Heid.^{2} p. 102) it was customary in oaths to swear 'by the anṣâb which stand around such and such a god.' In an interesting passage in which Herodotus describes the mode in which the ancient Arabs ratify a solemn covenant (iii. 8), he speaks of seven stones on which the sacrificial blood was smeared in honour of Dionysus and the heavenly (goddess), probably meaning the sun and moon (so Abicht). In the interesting narrative of Nilus quoted by Robertson Smith (RS^{2} p. 338), the camel chosen as a victim is bound upon a rude altar of stones piled together. Probably this may be regarded as the most primitive type of Arabian or Semitic sacrifice.

The sacred stone (or stones) was not conveyed by the nomadic clan from place to place in its wanderings, like an ark or some movable simulacrum, but remained stationary, since the stone may be considered to have focussed the presence and personal power of the deity that owned and occupied the Temenos, Ḳodesh (or Ḥaram), as the hallowed spot was named by Greek or Semite respectively. Such a spot was frequently one of special fertility accompanied by a sacred spring and tree. Frequently the maṣṣēbā consisted of a large natural upright rock of irregular shape. The two pillars of Heracles (the Greek equivalent of Baal) consisted probably of enormous cliff-like rocks situated by the Straits of Gibraltar. Numerous examples of such natural blocks of stone in situ are given in RS^{2} p. 110 (see especially the footnote). Among these is the notable stone-symbol of the goddess al Lât (see Kinship and Marriage, p. 292 ff.). Doughty gives a description of his visit to eṭ-Ṭâif, where he saw this and two other sacred stones (Arabia Deserta, ii. p. 515 ff.). The interesting fact that goddesses were also worshipped under these stone-symbols clearly proves that Movers is wrong in ascribing to them a phallic origin and character.* They can only be explained as one of the many forms of fetishism out of which polytheistic cultus grew.

Any stone of this character would mark a Bêth-el. Hence such stones came to be called by the Greeks βαίτυλοι or βαιτύλια.† In Is 57^6 we have an interesting reference to the wide prevalence of this worship of sacred stones, on which drink-offerings were poured and to which meal-offerings were offered. In the wādis, the winter-torrents made these boulders smooth and round. See Cheyne's note, ad loc., in SBOT.

It was not at every spot that such sacred pillars were erected. There must be a special manifestation of the Divine presence in order to render the worship valid, because the place had thus become invested with special sanctity. Not simply fertile oases with trees and flowing spring coming from the depths of the soil, but also special events, as battles, signal deliverances and visions, were tokens of God's presence. Thus after the battle of Michmash, Saul ordered a great stone to be rolled (1 S 14^{33}) which served as an altar (v.^{35}); Bethel, according to JE, became a consecrated spot through the vision of Jacob, who in consequence set up the stone pillar and poured oil upon it (Gn 28^{18}).

These passages sufficiently illustrate the primitive character of the pre-exilian Hebrew maṣṣēbā which formed the indispensable accompaniment of every sanctuary (Hos 3^4). The early pre-exilian code of legislation preserved in Ex 20^{25} sought to keep intact the stone's primitive condition. It was to remain unhewn and no iron instrument was to desecrate it, either because the stone itself was sacrosanct like the sacred enclosure in which it stood, or perhaps, as Nowack suggests (Heb. Archäol. ii. p. 17), because the profaning hand of man drove the numen out of the stone. If we are to believe the statement of the Mishna tract Middoth (iii. 1), the altar of burnt-offering in Herod's temple was formed of unhewn stones. Throughout the earlier portion of OT narrative we constantly meet with allusions to the stone pillars of the local sanctuaries, e.g. Shechem (Jos 24^{26}), Ramoth-gilead (Gn 31^{45}), Gilgal (Jos 4^8), Mizpeh (1 S 7^{12}), Gibeon (2 S 20^8), En-rogel (1 K 1^9). Sometimes the stone gave the name to the spot, as Eben-'ezer (1 S 7^{12}, cf. 4^1). Here again, as in the case of 1 S 14^{33} (already mentioned), the erection of the stone at a particular spot follows the manifestation of Divine power in His people's signal victory. That the rough stone (maṣṣēbā), as the symbol of Jehovah, differed in no respect from that which was erected to represent Baal, is quite certain. Baal worship and Jehovah worship at the local bāmôth were inextricably blended in the pre-Deuteronomic period, as the oracles of Hosea clearly testify (Hos 2^{18} the genuineness of which Wellhausen and Nowack unnecessarily surrender). The maṣṣēbôth of Baal were destroyed in Samaria by the reforming zeal of Jehu (2 K $10^{26.\ 27}$).

Whether there is any reference to the stone-symbol in the designation of Jehovah by the name 'rock' in many poetical passages in the OT (Ps

* Comp. RS^{2}, p. 456 ff. (additional Note D).

† On these bêtyls as wonder-working stones endowed with magic powers, see Pietschmann, Gesch. der Phönizier, p. 206, and François Lenormant, Revue de l'histoire des religions, iii. 81–53.

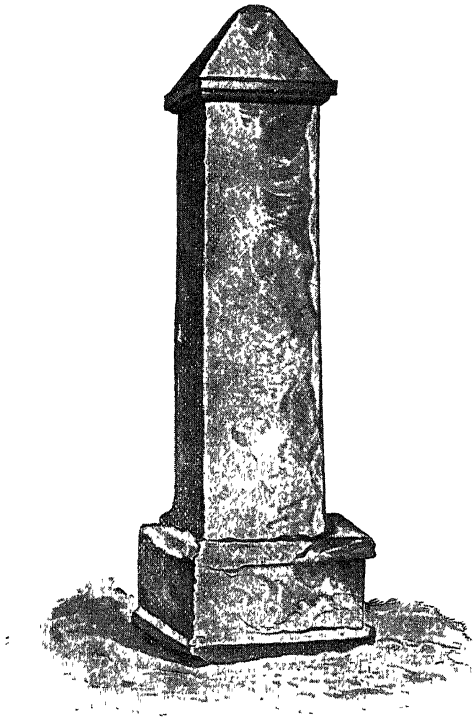
18[32], 1 S 2[2], Dt 32[4ff.], Is 30[29]), it is not easy to determine. The name for rock here is צוּר, which also enters into proper names which have their parallels in Assyrian (Schrader, COT ii. p. 326). The balance of evidence is on the whole against this attractive supposition. In the first place, the occurrence of such names in Hebrew is late (Buchanan Gray observes that they occur only in P and never in JE or Judges*). In the second place, צוּר is not the term associated with the sacred symbol by the Hebrews, but אֶבֶן; but אֶבֶן is never employed in personal proper names. Probably, therefore, we should regard the use of צוּר in the personal names and in the poetical passages as figurative only, Jehovah being regarded as a safe and strong place of refuge (Ps 27[5] 61[3]), or as affording shadow from oppressive heat, cf. Is 32[2]. See, further, art. ROCK.



In Phœnician cultus we frequently notice the presence of twin pillars. Thus we find twin pillars erected in Solomon's temple† by Hiram the Tyrian artificer (1 K 7[15-21]). Similar twin pillars are exhibited on coins which portray the temple at Paphos, and also they represented the deity Melḳarth at Tyre. The latter are specially described by Herodotus (ii. 44), who paid a personal visit of inspection to this famous Tyrian shrine of Hercules (Melḳarth). According to Herodotus, this temple was sumptuously wrought and furnished. One of the pillars was of refined gold, and the other of emerald (or more probably, as Abicht suggests, of green glass), the latter emitting a bright light at night-time, perhaps for the mariners at sea. To the same category belong the bronze pillars of the temple of Hercules at Gades (גָּדֵר), another Phœnician settlement, described by Strabo.

Respecting Phœnician stones, sometimes called נְצִיב, see Pietschmann's Gesch. der Phönizier, pp. 204–213. Among the varied forms of these Phœnician stelæ, some of which were worked into a square shape tapering at the top (see illustration below), special mention should be made of the votive stelæ, erected by individuals as the result of a vow to the deity in order to secure some desired object. Many of them have no inscription. Others bear a legend which would nearly always be somewhat of the following character: 'To the Rabbat, the Tanit-P'nê-Ba'al and the Adon, the Baal-Ḥammon, as N.N. son of N.N. has vowed, since they have heard his voice; may they bless him.' It is possible that this may have been the real character of the memorial stone erected by Absalom (2 S 18[18], 'Now Absalom in his life time had reared up for himself the maṣṣébeth which is in the king's dale; for he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance; and he called the maṣṣébeth after his own name, and it is called Absalom's monument (יָד) unto this day'). It may have been rather a votive stone than merely memorial, erected in anticipation of his attempt to seize the throne. There is no necessity, with Löhr, to suppose that this maṣṣēbā was originally the mark of an old Canaanite sanctuary, and that its significance as a Divine symbol has been transformed into something else by the writer; see Smend, Alttest. Religionsgesch.[2] p. 132 and footnote.

The erection of the maṣṣēbā as a stone-symbol was forbidden in the Deuteronomic code (Dt 16[22], 'Neither shalt thou set thee up a maṣṣēbā, which the LORD thy God hateth'), which belongs to about the year B.C. 621 in Josiah's reign. Hereafter it became illegitimate. The reference to the pillar to Jehovah at the border of Egypt in Is 19[19], 'there shall be a maṣṣēbā at the border [of Egypt] to the LORD,' must be regarded as pre-exilian and pre-Deuteronomic, though it is probable that the chapter in which it occurs has been affected by later influences. See art. ALTAR.

PILLAR, PLAIN OF THE.—In Jg 9[6] we read that the men of Shechem and all the house of Millo made Abimelech king 'by the plain (AV; RV 'oak,' RVm 'terebinth') of the pillar that was in Shechem' (עִם־אֵלוֹן מַצָּב אֲשֶׁר בִּשְׁכֶם; LXX B πρὸς τῇ βαλάνῳ τῇ εὐρετῇ τῆς στάσεως τῆς ἐν Συκίμοις [A om. τῇ εὐρετῇ and the second τῆς]; Aq. ἐπὶ πεδίου στηλώματος; Vulg. juxta quercum quæ stabat in Sichem). The correct rendering is undoubtedly 'the terebinth of the pillar' (see OAK No. 3 and PLAIN No. 2), although it is doubtful whether this can be obtained from the MT מַצָּב. The latter word is held by some (e.g. Studer) to be a noun synonymous with מַצֵּבָה; but even so the absence of the

† On the difficulties of the text of 1 K 7[15-22] dealing with the two pillars in the portico of Solomon's temple, Jachin and Boaz, see Klostermann, Kittel (cf. Jer 52[21-23]), and Benzinger, ad loc. The last is especially useful on the archæological details and religious significance. See also the figured representations in his Commentary, p. 44, and in his Heb. Archäol. pp. 245, 249 f. article has to be accounted for. It is possible that, inserting the article, and punctuating differently, we should read הַמַּצֵּבָה (cf. 1 S 13[23] 14[12], 2 S 23[14]); but, upon the whole, the best course appears to be to emend, with Moore (followed by Budde), to הַמַּצֵּבָה 'the maṣṣēbā terebinth.' Abimelech, as Moore appositely points out, was thus acclaimed at the sanctuary of Shechem, as Saul was at that of Gilgal (1 S 11[15]). The name was in all probability purposely obscured by the Massoretic reading and punctuation מָצֵּבָה. The maṣṣēbā mentioned in Jg 9[6] is perhaps the same as is called in Jos 24[26] 'a great stone' (אֶבֶן גְּדוֹלָה).

PILLOW.—1. כְּבִיר 1 S 19[13. 16] [only]. Michal, according to AV and RV, put a pillow of goats' hair at the head of the teraphim which she had laid in David's bed. The LXX (ἦπαρ) reads כבד as כָּבֵד (constr. of כֶּבֶד 'liver'); and this is adopted by Jos. (Ant. VI. xi. 4), who describes, somewhat fancifully, how the palpitation of the goat's liver under the bed-clothes conveyed to Saul's messengers the impression that David was gasping for breath. The root כבר, from which כְּבִיר is derived, probably means to 'intertwine or net,' so that כְּבִיר עִזִּים would signify something woven or netted from goats' hair. Hence one or other of the two renderings proposed in RVm ('quilt or network') should probably be adopted in preference to the text. A number of commentators (e.g. Sebastian Schmidt, Ewald, Keil) think the reference is to a mosquito-net (κωνωπεῖον) spread over the face of a person sleeping. But, as Driver points out, in Jth 10[21] 13[9], where this Greek term is used of the CANOPY (wh. see) of Holofernes' bed, the κωνωπεῖον is fixed upon the στύλοι or bedposts. In favour of the rendering 'quilt' we have the employment of a cognate Heb. term מַכְבֵּר in 2 K 8[15] for the coverlet which Hazael used to smother Benhadad. But it must be confessed that the description of Michal's action in 1 S 19[13] is not clear enough to determine the sense of כְּבִיר. The following term מְרַאֲשֹׁתָיו (AV 'for his bolster,' RV 'at the head thereof') does not define the position in which the כְּבִיר was placed with reference to the head, whether over, or under, or around it; it simply implies proximity (see, further, Driver, Löhr, and H. P. Smith, ad loc.). 2. It is this word מְרַאֲשׁוֹת which is rendered by AV 'pillow' in Gn 28[11. 18], but RV gives more correctly 'under his head' (LXX πρὸς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ). The other occurrences of the Heb. expression in the same sense are 1 S 26[7. 11. 16], in all of which AV has 'at his bolster,' RV 'at his head' (in v.[12] read מִמְּרַאֲשֹׁתָיו שָׁאוּל for מְרַאֲשֹׁתֵי שָׁאוּל; AV 'from Saul's bolster,' RV 'from Saul's head'; LXX ἀπὸ πρὸς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ); 1 K 19[6], where both AV and RV render מְרַאֲשֹׁתָיו by 'at his (Elijah's) head' (AVm 'bolster'; LXX πρὸς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ). 3. מַקְשׁוֹת (LXX προσκεφάλαια) Ezk 13[18] (AV, RV 'pillows'). The meaning appears to be 'fillets' or 'bands,' used as amulets or charms, for instance in the process of divination. See art. KERCHIEF, also PHYLACTERIES, p. 872[b], and cf. the Comm. of Davidson or Bertholet, ad loc. 4. προσκεφάλαιον. 'Pillow' is the correct tr. of this word in 1 Es 3[8], where we are told that the three pages of Darius each wrote his sentence, sealed it up, and put it under the king's pillow. The only other Biblical occurrence of this Gr. term (in addition to the LXX of Ezk 13[18. 20] above) is Mk 4[38], where we read that Jesus was in the stern asleep 'on a pillow' (so AV, but RV 'on the cushion,' Gr. ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον). The reference appears to be to the cushion used by rowers (Cratin. Hor. 18, Hermipp. Strat. v.); see the Comm. ad loc.

J. A. SELBIE.

PILTAI (פִּלְטַי, B om., A Φελητεί).—The head of the priestly house of Moadiah in the time of Joiakim, Neh 12[17]. It is possible that we should emend to פַּלְטִי, Palti; cf. Nu 13[9], 1 S 25[44], 2 S 23[26].

PIN.—Jg 4[21. 22] RV for AV 'nail.' The Heb. is יָתֵד (LXX πάσσαλος). In 5[26], by an unaccountable inconsistency, RV retains 'nail,' although the Heb. is the same, and relegates 'tent-pin' to the margin. On the other uses of the word יָתֵד see art. PADDLE. The tent-pins, to which the ropes of the tent were fastened (Is 33[20]), were not of metal but of wood, as among the Bedawîn at the present day (see Moore, ad loc.). For the question whether the description of Jael's action in 4[21. 22] is not due to a prosaic misunderstanding of 5[26] (Wellh. Comp. p. 222; W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] p. 132; Stade, GVI[2] i. p. 178 n.), see artt. JAEL and SISERA.

PINE TREE.—The tr[n] in AV of two Heb. expressions—1. עֵץ־שֶׁמֶן 'ēẓ-shemen (Neh 8[15]), RV 'wild olive.' We incline to the rendering 'fatwood trees' for this expression in this and the other passages in which it occurs. This would include all the resinous trees of Palestine and Syria, especially the pines. See OIL TREE.

2. תִּדְהָר tidhhār (Is 41[19] 60[13] RVm 'plane'). There is nothing in the etymology to indicate the tree intended. Dardâr in the Arab., which is used for both the elm and the ash, is cited by the Oxf. Heb. Lex.; but this is from a different root, dărdăr, not dăhăr, and really sheds no light on the question. Theodotion (Qmg) transliterated תדהר by θαδδάρ, while Symmachus rendered it πτελαίαν, i.e. πτελέαν, 'elm.' In the LXX there are five trees named where there are three in MT; possibly two of the names are doublets. The reading of RVm (and Cheyne) 'plane' does not seem to have any foundation. The same is true of Gesenius' rendering 'oak.' This he obtains from the radical signification of dahr (Arab.)='age' or 'duration'; but the Heb. [דָּהַר] dāhar, has not, so far as we know, any such meaning. Perhaps the best refuge for our ignorance would be a textual or marginal transliteration tidhhār, as suggested in the case of tĕ'ashshûr in the same passage (see BOX TREE), and 'algumnîm (see ALGUM).

G. E. POST.

PINNACLE (πτερύγιον, diminutive of πτέρυξ, 'wing'; so lit. 'little wing'; Vulg. pinnaculum and pinna respectively in Mt 4[5] and Lk 4[9], the only two places where the Gr. word occurs in NT).—That part of the temple enclosure (τὸ ἱερόν, not ὁ ναός) to which the devil took our Lord for the purpose of tempting Him.

πτερύγιον is used in the LXX to translate the following Heb. words:—1. כָּנָף kānāph, wing or border, as of a garment, Nu 15[38], 1 S 15[27] 24[4]. 2. סְנַפִּיר sĕnappîr, fin of a fish, Lv 11[9]. Aristotle in περὶ ψυχῆς, i. 5. 14, has the word in this sense. 3. קָצָה ḳāṣāh, Ex 28[26] (AV 'border,' RV 'edge' of breastplate).

In NT it stands for some part of the roof of the sanctuary or of the temple proper, perhaps the S.E. corner, from which the widest and most impressive view was obtained. The part meant was well known, as the use of the article τὸ (πτερύγιον) shows, but the word is used in this connexion only, and we have no means of definitely fixing its connotation. Opinions, which differ widely, may be arranged in two main classes.

(a) Those which make the pinnacle a part of the sanctuary or temple proper (ὁ ναός). Meyer (on Mt 4[5]) argues that the use of τοῦ ἱεροῦ, not τοῦ ναοῦ, shows that the temple proper cannot be meant; but he forgets in this criticism that ἱερόν is a general word which embraces the sanctuary and also the adjoining buildings; it therefore covers ναός, though it includes more. It has this more extensive meaning in Mt 12[6] 24[1], Mk 13[3], Lk 21[5] 22[52], though in some other passages it seems to denote the buildings around, to the exclusion of the temple proper, as in Mt 21[12. 14] 26[55], Mk 14[49], Lk 19[47] 21[37] 22[53] 24[53] etc. In Mt 4[5] and Lk 4[9] it may be used in the broad or in the narrow sense—the word itself proves nothing. The sense here must accordingly be ascertained from the context, or the probabilities of the case. Those who seek the pinnacle somewhere in the sanctuary differ as to its exact situation. (1) Luther, Beza, and Grotius place it on the parapet surrounding the roof; such a fence had by law (Dt 22[8]) to be placed on the roof of all buildings, to prevent accident by falling. (2) The ridge or the highest point of the roof, say Fritzsche and Winer. (3) According to Paulus, it is the gable or pediment of the roof, and it gets its name from its shape ⋀. (4) Krebs, Keim, and generally the older expositors identify the so-called pinnacle with the roof. (5) Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Mt 4[5]) holds that the summit of the אוּלָם ('ulām) or porch, which extended on both sides of the sanctuary on the east, is what we are to understand. This porch was, he says, like a wing of the temple, and the top of it was like its wing.

(b) Others hold that a part of some out-building is what is meant. Here again, as before, there are differences as to the details. (1) Wetstein and Michaelis think that Solomon's porch on the east of the temple (see Jos. Ant. XXI. ix. 7) is what is meant. (2) The Στοὰ βασιλική on the south side of the temple area (see Jos. Ant. XV. xi. 9) is what B.-Crusius, Arnoldi, and Meyer take the word to stand for. From this portico, according to the account of Josephus (see above), the view below is a deep and giddy one. This is the opinion to which Lightfoot is most inclined next to his own.

When, however, we remember that the sanctuary was on the highest of a series of terraces, so that its roof would command valleys and mountains around Jerus., and even beyond Jordan, it is much more natural and impressive to make the sanctuary roof the scene of this temptation. Meyer objects that, on account of its being covered with pointed spikes, put there to keep the birds away, Christ could not have been placed there; but the priests are known to have ascended to this roof (Middoth, ch. 4; Tannith, Talm. Bab. fol. 29). T. W. DAVIES.

PINON (פִּינֹן).—An Edomite 'duke,' Gn 36[41] (A Φινές, D Φεινών, E Φινών)=1 Ch 1[52] (B Φεινών, A Φινών). It is the same name which appears in Nu 33[42] as Punon (פּוּנֹן), one of the stations of the Israelites. See PUNON.

PIPE, in the sense of a tube, occurs in AV and RV of Zec 4[2] (מוֹצָקוֹת), and in AV (RV has 'spouts') of v.[12] (צַנְתְּרוֹת) in connexion with the golden candlestick which the prophet saw in a vision, and which had a bowl at the top filled with oil for supplying its seven lamps by means of pipes leading to them. For 'pipe' in the sense of a musical instrument see MUSIC. J. WORTABET.

PIRAM (פִּרְאָם 'wild ass'?).—The king of Jarmuth who joined other four kings against Gibeon, but was defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon and afterwards put to death at Makkedah along with his allies (Jos 10[3ff.]). According to Hommel (Anc. Heb. Trad. 223 n.), Pir'am is identical with Pir'u, the name of an Arabian king in the time of Sargon. Sayce (EHH 225 n.) compares the Egyp. Pi-Romi.

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE (פִּרְעָתוֹנִי, ὁ Φαραθωνείτης, Luc. Ἐφρααθωνίτης), Jg 12[13. 15].—Abdon, a minor judge, was a Pirathonite, i.e. a native of Pirathon 'in the land of Ephraim, in the hill-country of the Amalekites,' a district either anciently held by the Amalekites, or seized by them on one of their invasions from the south. Benaiah, one of David's mighty men, belonged to the same town, 2 S 23[30], 1 Ch 11[31] ὁ Φαραθωνεί, 27[14] ὁ ἐκ Φαραθών. It is generally identified with Fer'ata, 6 miles S.W. of Samaria (a site also proposed for Ophrah); some prefer Fer'on, due W. of Samaria. Smith suggests that Pirathon was a fortress at the head of the Wady Far'ah, HGHL 355, cf. 350 f.; Moore is inclined to look for it in Benjamin, as Abdon is a Benjamite family in 1 Ch 8[23. 30] 9[36]. Pirathon was one of the places fortified by Bacchides, 1 Mac 9[50] καὶ τὴν Θαμνάθα Φαραθών. It appears that καὶ τήν has fallen out of the text before Φ. here. The other fortresses in this verse are all ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ, so that Φ. can hardly be the same as Pirathon above; unless the author made the mistake of introducing a Samaritan town into his list of Judæan forts. See also Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 3.

G. A. COOKE.

PISGAH.—This word (which always has the def. art. הַפִּסְגָּה) is not found by itself, but in the expressions רֹאשׁ הַפִּסְגָּה and אַשְׁדֹּת הַפִּסְגָּה. The first of these occurs in four passages, two of which refer to Moses (Dt 3[27] 34[1]). In art. NEBO (MOUNT) it is pointed out that 'the top (head) of Pisgah' and 'Mt. Nebo' are alternative designations (in D and P respectively) of the same spot, and the situation is described. The two other passages are Nu 21[20] 23[14]. In Nu 21[20] a station in the journeyings of the children of Israel is described as 'the top of Pisgah which looketh down upon the desert' (AV 'toward Jeshimon,' cf. RVm); and according to Nu 23[14] Balak brought Balaam, after sacrificing on the high places of Baal, or at Bamoth-baal (22[41]), 'into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah.'

The second expression is found Dt 3[17] 4[49], Jos 12[3] 13[20]. RV renders 'slopes of Pisgah,' with 'springs' in the margin; AV has 'Ashdoth-pisgah,' except in Dt 4[49], where it has 'the springs of Pisgah.' In Jos 10[40] 12[8] הָאַשְׁדֹּת occurs by itself, and is rendered RV 'slopes,' AV 'springs'; and אַשְׁד is the first word of Nu 21[15]—RV 'slope of the valleys,' AV 'stream of the brooks.' From these versions it will be seen that the unusual word from the root אשר has been variously interpreted. In Aramaic אשר means 'to pour' [it is the Targ. rendering of שפך in MT], and hence אַשֵׁד and אַשְׁדּוֹת are interpreted as places where water is poured down, i.e. the sloping sides of hills, or as pourings forth, i.e. streams or springs.

The AV, in treating it as a proper name, follows the LXX, which renders uniformly Ἀσηδώθ (Μηδώθ is a variant in B of Jos 12[8] and A of 13[20]). The hesitation of AV is like that of the Vulgate, which renders radices montis Phasga in Dt, and Asedoth in Joshua. The Onomasticon takes it as the name of a city in the tribe of Reuben, and adds 'adpellatur autem addito cognomento Asedoth Fasga, quod in lingua nostra resonat abscisum.' (Cf. Eus. [Lag. 206]: λέγεται δὲ Ἀσηδὼθ Φασγὼ ὅ ἐστι λαξευτή.) It also asserts (s.v. 'Abarim') that a district was still called Φασγώ, Fasga (Onom. Lag. ed. pp. 124, 125, 237). No trace of such a district has been found on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, but a very similar name is applied to a promontory on the western shore (Ras Feshkah); and in its neighbourhood is the Neby Musa of Moslem tradition.

The renderings of LXX for Pisgah call for some comment. In the second group (those containing 'Ashdôth-happisgāh) we find Φασγά or Φασχά three times, and τὴν λαξευτήν in Dt 4[49]. In the first group (those containing 'top of Pisgah') we find Φασγά once (Dt 34[1]), but Nu 21[20] τοῦ λελαξευμένου, and Nu 23[14], Dt 3[27] (both B) Λελαξευμένου.

The root פסג occurs only once in the Massoretic text of OT (Ps 48[14]) in Targ. Jerus. as a verb 'to divide' (MT נחה and the ἅπ. λεγ. בחר of Gn 15[10]), and מפגא denotes 'a portion.' The word λαξεύω (which is used of hewing and dressing stone) is the LXX rendering of the MT פסל in the command to hew the second tables of stone (Ex 34[1. 4], Dt 10). In the Onomasticon it is regarded as a translation of Pisgah, and the 'abscisum' of Jerome (see the passages given above) seems to indicate a mountain with precipitous sides. Pisgah as seen from the heights of the Moabite plateau would not suggest the idea of a mountain cut off from its fellows, but as seen from the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley its steep sides justify the epithet 'abscisum,' which may be taken as an interpretation of λαξευτήν and Pisgah. There is another alternative suggested by the similarity between פסל and מסגה, viz. that the LXX translation is due to a confusion of consonants. It may further be noted that the different renderings of the LXX are not found in different books, but that in both Numbers and Deut. Pisgah is translated in one place as a proper noun, and in others explained by the Greek verb λαξεύω.

PISHON (פִּישׁוֹן, Φεισών, Phison).—See EDEN. In Assyrian pisannu means 'water-channel.'

PISIDIA (Πισιδία) was a country in the southern part of Asia Minor, bounded by Lycia on the west, Phrygia on the north, and Pamphylia on the south, while on the east it passed in a vague, indefinite way into the land of the Isaurian or Tracheiotic tribes. Its greatest length, east to west, was about 120 miles, and its greatest breadth about 50. On the north and south Pisidia was originally well defined by its relation to the Taurus mountains: in this part Taurus is a broad tract of many lofty ridges intersected by valleys, some of large size along the course of considerable rivers or the margin of lakes, others mere glens among the hills. Where the mountains are merged definitely in the great plateau on the north, or sink to the level coast-land on the south, Pisidia ended. Several of those large valleys bore special names, such as Kabalis, Milyas the land of the Milyes or Milyai, the country of the Etenneis (more strictly Hetenneis, transformed in Greek into two separate names attached to two parts of the country, Etenneis and Katenneis), the country of the Orondeis, the country of the Homonades: sometimes those districts were called by their special names, but often they were summed up as parts of Pisidia.

In the course of Roman history the name Pisidia was changed from a strictly geographical to a political term. Pisidia was merely a part of the great province Galatia in the 1st cent. after Christ. In A.D. 74 the larger half of Pisidia was taken from the province Galatia and attached to the new double province of Lycia-Pamphylia. It was then reckoned part of Pamphylia; and that name now gradually came to be used as including many cities which previously were purely Pisidian; while the name Pisidia was more especially applied to the part of that country which was still in the province Galatia, and Pisidia steadily encroached on PHRYGIA until in practice the whole of Galatic Phrygia was called Pisidia. Antioch and Apollonia, originally cities of Phrygia, then came to be called cities of Pisidia. Still later, probably under Diocletian, the whole of southern Galatia was formed into a province Pisidia, to which were attached western Lycaonia and another slice of Phrygia with the cities of Apamea and Metropolis. Thus we find Iconium called a city of Pisidia in the 4th cent. by Ammianus Marcellinus. About 372 another new province Lycaonia was constituted out of parts of the provinces Isauria, Pisidia, and Galatia (eastern Lycaonia and Isauropolis from the first, western Lycaonia and parts of eastern Pisidia from the second, Glavama or Egdaumana from the third); and henceforth the name Pisidia was used to denote the diminished province with Antioch as capital.

In the time of St. Paul, Pisidia was still used in its old and strict sense to indicate the whole great group of mountain valleys in the Taurus, which politically formed part of the province Galatia. Paul traversed Pisidia on his way from Perga to Antioch (Ac 13[14]), and again on his return journey from Antioch to Perga (Ac 14[24]). On the former occasion Pisidia is not named, probably for the reason that Paul and Barnabas were going straight to Antioch and did not preach by the way. On the second occasion 'they passed through Pisidia and came to Pamphylia'; the two names are here used as political terms, one being a region of the province Galatia (see vol. ii. pp. 87, 90 f.), the other the small procuratorial province on the coast.

In Ac 13[14] the true text is 'Pisidian Antioch'* (not Antioch of Pisidia), that being a way of distinguishing it from the many other Antiochs, abbreviated from the fuller description 'a Phrygian city towards Pisidia': the region (of the province) of which Antioch was metropolis is mentioned Ac 13[49]: it was (Galatic) PHRYGIA.

If Paul preached in Pisidia, the brevity of the reference rather suggests that the work was unimportant and unsuccessful. He found there no 'door opened unto him' (2 Co 2[12]). A rude, little-educated, rustic population was not favourable to his teaching; and there is no reason to think that Pisidia was early Christianized. The only part where there are any pre-Constantinian Christian inscriptions, is that which lies closest to Apamea;† and the new religion is likely to have spread there from that great seat of early Christianity (see PHRYGIA).

Yet a Pauline tradition seems either to have remained alive from the first or to have grown up later in Pisidia. The modern name of the imposing but wholly desolate and unpopulated ruins of Adada is Kara Bavlo. The word Kara (literally 'black,' metaphorically in common usage 'terrible' or 'strong') is often applied to ancient sites. The name Bavlo is now applied to the modern town 5 or 6 miles south of Kara Bavlo, which has replaced it as the seat of government. Plainly the name was carried with the population from the old site to the new; and the old city was henceforward distinguished as Kara Bavlo. Now it is evident and certain that Bavlo is merely the modern pronunciation of the apostle's name Παῦλο'; and clearly this name was the popular local designation of Adada, derived from the patron saint. And it is highly probable that this local identification of Adada with the apostle's name is to be connected with the fact that Adada is the one important city in Pisidia on the direct road from Perga to Antioch; and that the name attests a local legend that St. Paul passed that way and taught in the city. A remarkable and very early ruined church stands near the road leading to the south about a mile or two from the city.

One other trace of Pisidia has been left on the NT. When St. Paul speaks of the 'perils of rivers' and 'perils of robbers' which he had been exposed to, no locality is likely to have been so prominent in his mind as Pisidia. It was still barely conquered when he traversed it. Augustus had found it necessary to plant in it several colonies, Cremna, Comama, Olbasa, Parlais, to keep down its unruly tribes. Its mountain fastnesses were the natural haunt and refuge of robbers; and the inscriptions bear testimony to this. Some examples are quoted in the Church in the Roman Empire before 170, p. 23 f.; see also Conybeare and Howson's scholarly work on St. Paul (though it indicates a different route across Pisidia).

LITERATURE.—As to Pisidian ethnology and language hardly anything is known; Ramsay, 'Inscriptions en Langue Pisidienne,' in Revue des Universités du Midi, 1895, p. 353, has published the only known monuments of the language; but they contain hardly anything more than proper names, revealing a few grammatical forms. The proper names, Grecized in form, which occur in Greek inscriptions, are of remarkable and peculiar character: many Greek inscriptions of Pisidian cities are given by Sterrett in his Wolfe Expedition and his Epigraphic Journey in Asia Minor; by Lanckoronski, Stadte Pamphyliens und Pisidiens (containing also splendid accounts and photographs of sites and monuments).

PISPAH (פִּסְפָּה, B Φασφαί, A Φασφά).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7[38].

PIT in OT represents twelve Heb., and in NT two Gr. words. 1, 2. From the root באר, only in Piel, 'make distinct or plain':—(a) בְּאֵר (possibly from idea of coming to light or appearing), commonly rendered 'well,' indicating a deep shaft containing water. It corresponds with Arab. bi'r. It is once used of the pits whence bitumen was taken, בְּאֵרֹת חֵמָר (Gn 14[10]). The dark, cold depths, from which, if one fell in, escape would be so difficult, doubtless suggested the figures 'pit of destruction' (Ps 55[23]), 'pit' (Ps 69[15]), 'narrow pit' (Pr 23[27]). (b) בּוֹר the usual word for 'cistern,' which should take the place of 'pit' (RVm) in Lv 11[36], 1 S 13[6], 2 K 10[14]. When empty, the bōr was frequently used as a place of confinement (Gn 37[22ff.], Zec 9[11]). It is rendered 'dungeon' in Gn 40[15ff.], Is 24[22] RVm, La 3[53. 55]; so also Jer 38[6] (RVm 'pit'), which may explain the figure in Ps 40[2]. בֵּית הָאֲסוּרִים (Ex 12[29], Jer 37[16]) is a prison cell. Thus it comes to be used for the universal prison of the tomb (Pr 1[12], Ps 28[1] 30[3], Is 14[15] 38[18], Ezk 26[20] etc.). The pit in which Benaiah slew the lion (2 S 23[20], 1 Ch 11[22]) and the pit, prepared against the necessities of a dreaded siege, into which Ishmael cast his slaughtered victims (Jer 41[7. 9]), were probably large empty reservoirs. The hole out of which stones have been quarried (Is 51[1]) is often used as a cistern.

3. גֵּב (from גּוּב 'to dig') corresponds with the Arab. jubb, a deep well or cistern or ditch. The word occurs in 2 K 3[16], where the most likely sense is 'trenches' (RV), and in Jer 14[3], where 'pits' should surely be 'cisterns' (possibly also in same sense [so Klost.] in Jer 39[10] 52[16] ‖ 2 K 25[12]).

4. גֶּבֶא (from גָּבָא ? 'to gather together') a cistern, as in Is 30[14] RV; but in Ezk 47[11] probably a marsh or pool.

5. גּוּמָּץ (an Aram. loan-word) occurs only in Ec 10[8] 'He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it'; cf. the parallel in Pr 26[27], where the word used is שָׁחָה; root גמץ Syr. and Aram. = 'to dig.'

6. פַּחַת (from an unused root פָּחָת 'to excavate'), probably an excavation, or deep cleft with gloomy recesses in which one might hide (2 S 17[9]). It is rendered 'hole' in Jer 48[28], and doubtless because of its forbidding aspect it is associated with those things which inspire terror (Is 24[17], Jer 48[43], La 3[47] RV, etc.). Into some such opening the body of Absalom was thrown (2 S 18[17]).

7. שְׁאוֹל. In each of the three cases where AV renders 'pit' (Nu 16[30. 33], Job 17[16]) 'Sheol' is preferable (see art. HADES).

8. 9. 10. From the root שׁוּחַ 'to sink or subside':—(a) שׁוּחָה, in Jer 2[6] of the pits which enhanced the perils of the desert march; fig. in Pr 22[14] 23[27] (AV and RV 'ditch'), Jer 18[20. 22]. (b) שַׁחַת, the pit in which snares are set to take wild beasts, and so metaph. the cunning designs of a man's foes to compass his undoing (Ps 7[15] (ditch) 9[15] 35[7] 94[13], Pr 26[27], Ezk 19[4. 8]). It is also used as equivalent to the grave, which is destined to entrap all living (Job 33[18ff.], Ps 30[9] 55[23]). 'Pit' (RVm) should take the place of 'corruption' in Job 17[14], Ps 16[10] 49[9], and Jon 2[6] (RVm); of 'destruction' Ps 103[4], and of 'grave' Job 33[22]. In Job 9[31] it seems to indicate a receptacle of filth, while in Is 51[14] it clearly denotes a dungeon. (c) שִׁיחָה occurs thrice (Ps 57[6] 119[85], Jer 18[22]), fig. in each case, of the subtle and malevolent schemes of enemies.

11. 12. From the root שָׁחָה 'to bow down':—(a) שְׁחָתוֹת only once, fig. (Pr 28[10]). (b) שְׁחִיתוֹת (P's 107[20], La 4[20]). In the former case, instead of 'destructions,' we may read with Delitzsch (in loc.) 'pits,' referring to the sufferings into which they had sunk. In the latter it again refers to the successful designs of the enemy.

In the NT the terms used are—1. βόθυνος (=βόθρος, any hole or hollow in the ground, as, e.g., the trench in which a tree is planted), Mt 12[11]. In Mt 15[14], Lk 6[39], AV renders 'ditch'; RV uniformly 'pit.'

2. φρέαρ, an artificial well, cistern, reservoir, or, generally, pit. In Lk 14[5] (RV), where the empty well is doubtless intended, and Jn 4[11. 12] it is rendered 'well.' In Rev 9[1ff.] it is used figuratively of the pit of the abyss. Empty wells are often left uncovered and unguarded near the villages, and especially around deserted sites in Palestine, and form a serious danger to the traveller, particularly in the dark. See, further, the following article.

W. EWING.

PIT (metaphorical).—As might be expected, the metaphorical use of this word is most frequent in the poetical and prophetical books of the Bible, and in passages where an elevated style is natural. It stands in the EV (see the preceding article) for a number of Heb. words, and the utter lack of consistency in the translation is well exemplified in Pr 22, in the 14th verse of which 'pit' is the rendering of שׁוּחָה, whilst in 23[27] בְּאֵר is represented by 'pit,' and שׁוּחָה by 'ditch.' The shades of meaning may be classified as follows:—

1. In a solitary instance, Is 51[1], 'the hole of the pit (בּוֹר)' refers to Sarah, the ancestress of the nation, the quarry from which it was digged.

2. Very frequently the pit is a stratagem or device by which an enemy is injured. Ezk 19[4. 8] justifies the conclusion that the figure was suggested by the pits in which wild animals are captured. The Heb. words used in this sense are—בּוֹר, בְּאֵר, פַּחַת, שׁוּחָה, שַׁחַת, שְׁחוֹת, שִׁיחָה, שְׁחִיתָה. See Ps 9[15] 35[7] 119[85], Pr 22[14] 23[27] 28[10. 17] etc.

3. From this sense the transition is easy to that of the miserable condition or the ruin into which one falls—the roaring pit (בּוֹר שְׁאוֹן) of Ps 40[2], the watery pits (מְקֻמְּרוֹת) of Ps 140[10], the βόθρος of Sir 12[16], the βόθρος ᾅδου of Sir 21[10].

4. A wretched underground dungeon thoroughly deserves this name. It is found at Is 24[22] (בּוֹר), Zec 9[11] (בּוֹר), Wis 10[13] (λάκκος, here used, is the LXX rendering of בּוֹר, Joseph's dungeon, Gn 41[14]).

5. The grave is often entitled 'the pit.' Here, again, a variety of Heb. words are employed—בְּאֵר, בּוֹר, שְׁאוֹל, שַׁחַת, גֵּלִי שַׁחַת. Such passages as Ezk 32[23] call up the picture of a huge columbarium with graves in the sides. But here and elsewhere it is not easy to distinguish between this signification and the one mentioned under No. 6.

6. Hades, the realm of shades, situated beneath the earth, and tenanted by thin, unsubstantial ghosts, bears this name. At Is 14[15] the pit (בּוֹר) is obviously the same as 'hell,' i.e. Hades (שְׁאוֹל).

7. In the Apocalypse the abode of the devil and his angels is conceived of as a vast underground abyss, communicating with the surface of the earth by a great shaft, which is opened or closed from above by God's angels sent forth for the purpose. For this pit, or bottomless pit, φρέαρ, φρέαρ τῆς ἀβύσσου, ἡ ἄβυσσος, see Rev $9^{1.2.11}$ 11^{7} 17^{8} $20^{1.3}$, and cf. art. ABYSS.

PITCH (כֹּפֶר, זֶפֶת, πίσσα) may denote either mineral pitch (bitumen), or the vegetable pitch obtained from resinous trees. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xiv. 25, xvi. 23) reserves the word pix for the latter, while the former is called pissasphaltus. The words rendered 'pitch' in Scripture apparently refer to mineral pitch, an inflammable, viscous substance, composed of a mixture of hydro-carbons, and found now in a more liquid, now in a more solid state (see BITUMEN).

כֹּפֶר occurs in Gn 6^{14} as the name of the substance with which the ark was covered both within and without. The word has a variety of meanings elsewhere in OT, and its usage here is connected with the simple sense of the verb כָּפַר ('to cover'), which appears in the same verse as the cognate of the noun, and is tr^{d} 'to pitch.' LXX has ἀσφαλτώσεις τῇ ἀσφάλτῳ, and ἄσφαλτος is elsewhere the rendering of חֵמָר ('bitumen').

זֶפֶת in Ex 2^{3} is one of the substances with which the ark of bulrushes was daubed, the other being חֵמָר. It might seem from the Hebrew as if two distinct substances were referred to, but LXX combines both in the translation ἀσφαλτοπίσσα. The distinction between זֶפֶת and חֵמָר is probably that between the more liquid and the more solid varieties of bitumen.

In Is 34^{9} זֶפֶת (LXX πίσσα) occurs twice in the prediction of the desolation of Edom. 'The streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, . . . and the land thereof shall become burning pitch.' The mention of 'brimstone' in the same verse, and the fact that bitumen occurs along with sulphur near the Dead Sea, suggest that here also bitumen is meant.

In Apocr. πίσσα occurs thrice. Sir 13^{1} refers to the defilement caused by touching pitch. In Three ^{23} pitch is mentioned among the substances used in kindling Nebuchadrezzar's fiery furnace. Bel ^{27} describes how Daniel slew the dragon by putting into its mouth lumps of pitch, fat, and hair, that had been boiled together.

PITCHER (כַּד kad, LXX ὑδρία; in La 4^{2} נֵבֶל, LXX κεράμιον, as in NT).—A vessel for holding water (Gn $24^{14ff.}$), carried by girls on their shoulders (v.^{15}). These vessels were made of earthenware (Jg $7^{19.20}$), and sufficiently wide-mouthed to admit a torch (Jg $7^{16.19.20}$). It was in a kad that the widow of Zarephath kept her meal (1 K 17^{12}), although the word is translated 'barrel' in AV and RV; and the vessels of water (also called 'barrels') which Elijah caused to be poured over his sacrifice at Carmel were kaddîm. In the figurative description of death in Ec 12^{6} the pitcher is said to be broken at the fountain. The nēbel of Jeremiah was an earthen vessel in shape resembling a skin bottle, and probably had a narrower neck than the kad. As both vessels were made to be carried, they had usually a pair of handles. The pitcher borne by the man who led the apostles to the place where the Passover was to be prepared was a κεράμιον (Mk 14^{13}, Lk 22^{10}). The Samaritan woman's waterpot was a hydria of earthenware (Jn 4^{28}), smaller than the stone hydriæ of Cana (Jn 2^{6}), which do not seem to have been equally portable. In Is 5^{10} κεράμιον of LXX represents Heb. בַּת (EV 'bath'); in Jer 35^{5} it represents nēbel (RV 'pots,' AV 'bowls').

The Egyptian gad or gai (Copt. κελωλ) was an earthenware vessel resembling the kad, with side handles, and sufficiently wide-mouthed to serve as a receptacle for fruit or other solids (Papyrus Anastas. iv. 14), while commonly used for water or beer, as in the story of Anpu and Bata. Pitchers of this kind have been figured by Bliss (A Mound of Many Cities, pp. 118, 120), and by Petrie in his sketches of Palestinian pottery; see Tell el Hêsy, p. 40, pl. vii. figs. 123, 125, ix. fig. 190. See art. POTTERY.

The English word 'pitcher' is derived from the French. The vessel is called pichier in the Languedoc, and this has its root in the Latin picarium or bicarium, from which we also have got the word 'beaker.' The word does not occur in Middle English to the writer's knowledge, the water vessel being an euwere or ewer; see Boke of Curtasye, 641. It had, however, become common in Elizabethan English, as in the familiar Shakspearean phrase in Taming of Shrew, IV. iv. 52, and Richard III. II. iv. 37.

A. MACALISTER.

PITHOM (פִּתֹם; B Πιιθώ, A Πιιθώμ).—In Ex 1^{11} it is said that the Israelites built for the Pharaoh of the Oppression the cities of 'Pithom and RAAMSES,' to which the LXX adds, 'and On, which is Heliopolis.' They are called מִסְכְּנוֹת עָרֵי, usually rendered 'treasure (AV) or store (RV) cities,' but the exact signification of the term is doubtful, and the LXX makes it πόλεις ὀχυραί, 'strong or fortified cities' (see also 1 K 9^{19}, 2 Ch 8^{4}, where the same Heb. is tr., in the first passage π. τῶν σκηνωμάτων, and in the second π. ὀχυραί). The site of Pithom has been the subject of much controversy, which, however, has been finally set at rest by the excavations of Dr. Naville for the Egypt Exploration Fund in 1883.

Herodotus (ii. 158) describes the canal made by Necho to connect the Red Sea with the Nile as starting 'a little above Bubastis' (now Zagazig), and passing 'Patumos, a city in the Arabian nome' (Πάτουμον τὴν Ἀραβίην πόλιν). 'Arabia,' or the Arabian nome, was the 20th nome of Lower Egypt, called Sopd-Qemhes in Egyptian, whose capital was Qosem or Goshen, now Saft el-Henna. Patumos is evidently the Pa-Tum or Pi-Tum, 'the house of Tum'—the ancient sun-god of Heliopolis—of the Egyptian texts. At Dendera the city of Pi-Tum is described as in the land of Ro-Abt, 'the entrance to the East,' a name which Dr. Naville suggests may be the origin of the Greek 'Arabia,' when used to denote the 20th nome (see Mariette's Denderah, iv. 75. 12). The name Pi-Tum is first found in monuments of the age of the 19th dynasty; thus a letter dated in the 8th year of Meneptah II. the son and successor of Ramses II., and translated by Brugsch (History of Egypt, Eng. tr. 2nd ed. ii. p. 133), speaks of Edomite nomads being allowed to pass the Khetam or 'fortress of Meneptah in the land of Thuket' (Succoth), which protected the eastern frontier of Egypt, and to feed their flocks near 'the lakes (birkata) of Pi-Tum of Meneptah in the land of Thuket' (Select Papyri in the Hieratic character from the Collections in the British Museum, pl. cxxv.–vi.).

Chabas had already, in 1864, pointed out that the Pithom of the OT must correspond with an Egyptian Pi-Tum, and suggested that its site should be sought at Abu-Kêshêd or Tel el-Maskhûta in the Wady Tumilât, 17 kilometres south west of Ismailiya (Mélanges, p. 162), a suggestion which he afterwards withdrew in favour of Tmui el-Emdid, the ancient Thmuis. So far as the form of the name was concerned, however, the conclusion of Chabas was soon afterwards confirmed by the publication of various geographical texts by Brugsch, Dümichen, Mariette, and others, from which it appeared that the capital of the 8th nome of Lower Egypt, Nefer-Abt, had the civil name Thuket and the sacred name Pi-Tum. Tum, the setting sun, was worshipped there under the form of a serpent, and its chief temple was accordingly termed Pi-Qereḥt, 'the house of the snake.' According to Brugsch (Zeitschrift für Ægypt. Sprache, 1876, p. 127), the sacred lake or canal bore the name of 'Crocodile Lake' (Kharmu), the domain-land being Annu or On.

Brugsch first showed that Thuket is the biblical SUCCOTH, the Egyptian th being, as elsewhere, represented by the Hebrew ס, and the vocalization of the name having been assimilated to that of the word which means 'booths' in Hebrew (Zeitschr. für Ægypt. Sprache, 1875, p. 7). Succoth was the first stage of the Israelites in their flight from Egypt before they encamped at ETHAM, the Egyptian Khetam or 'fortress,' which commanded the approach to 'the wilderness' (Ex 12^{37} 13^{20}). Pithom, accordingly, must have been in or adjoining the land of Goshen.

When the Fresh-water Canal was made almost on the lines of the old canal of Seti I. and Necho, it passed through the Wady Tumilât, and skirted the ruins of Tel el-Maskhûta ('the mound of the Image'). Various monuments of the age of Ramses II. were discovered in the Tel, including the one from which it derived its name, and were removed to Ismailiya. Lepsius had already proposed to see in the Tel the site of the city of Raamses (Chronologie, p. 348); and Maspero, who published some of the inscriptions in 1877 (Revue archéologique, nouv. sér. xxxiv. p. 320), arrived at the same conclusion. But the study of the monuments at Ismailiya, all of which were dedicated to Tum by Ramses II., led Dr. Naville to suspect that the Tel really represented Pithom, and not Raamses, and accordingly he commenced excavations on the spot. The result was the discovery of a temple, as well as of storehouses, private habitations, the walls of the city, and various inscriptions. The city and temple proved to have been built by Ramses II. of the 19th dynasty, and to have lasted down to the Roman era. They proved also to be the Pi-Tum or Thuket of the hieroglyphic texts.

The discovery was important, as it not only settled the site of Pithom, and so threw light on the route of the Israelites, but it also showed that Ramses II., the builder of Pi-Tum, must have been the Pharaoh of the Oppression. Unless we deny the historical character of Ex 1^{11}, the date of the Exodus is definitely fixed.

Dr. Naville's discoveries further showed that Pithom changed its name in the Greek age. It became Heroopolis, which the Romans abbreviated into Ero, as is proved by inscriptions, which confirm the statement of Stephanus Byzantinus (s.v.) that the Heroonpolis of Strabo was also known as Hêrô. An explanation is thus afforded of the reading of the LXX in Gn 46^{28} 'he sent Judah before him unto Joseph to meet him at Heroonpolis in the land of Ramesses,' where, it is noticeable, the Coptic version substitutes 'Pithom the city' for Heroonpolis. D'Anville (Mémoires sur l'Égypte, p. 121 ff.) long ago suggested that Heroopolis was to be sought at Tel el-Maskhûta, and the suggestion was adopted by Quatremère, Champollion, and others. In the inscription of the obelisk of Hermapion, quoted by Ammianus Marcellinus (Champollion, Grammaire égyptienne, p. 361), 'the son of Tum' is translated 'son of Hêrôn' (or 'Hêrô'). Pi-Tum or Heroopolis was the capital of the 8th nome of Lower Egypt; consequently Herodotus was mistaken in placing Patumos in 'Arabia.' It adjoined the Arabian nome, but was not actually in it. The high priest of its temple had the title of Herti-sonti.

The city was in the form of a square, containing about 55,000 square yards. The temple of Tum occupied a small space in the south-western angle of the enclosure, and seems never to have been finished. To the north was a series of brick buildings, in which Dr. Naville sees storehouses in which the provisions were gathered 'necessary for armies about to cross the desert, or even for caravans and travellers which were on the road to Syria.' The chambers composing them had thick walls, and were without communication with one another, the access to them being from the top. The whole city was ruthlessly levelled when the Romans formed a camp on the site of it, and founded the later Heroopolis on the north-eastern edge of the camp immediately to the south of the present Fresh-water Canal.

PITHON (פִּיתוֹן).—One of the sons of Micah, the son of Merib-baal, 1 Ch 8^{35} (BA Φιθών) ‖ 9^{41} (פִּתֹן, B Φαιθών, A Φιθών).

PITIFUL.—Pity is the same word as piety, the Eng. having followed the Old Fr. in separating the one word pietas into piété 'piety,' and pitié pity. The adj. 'pitiful' was formed after the separation, and is simply 'full of pity.' But pity may be given or received, and 'pitiful' is used about 1611 in three ways: (1) showing pity, compassionate; (2) exciting or deserving * pity, miserable; (3) contemptible, despicable, the modern use of the word. Shaks. has all three—

(1) Rich. III. I. iii. 141—

'I would to God my heart were flint, like Edward's;
Or Edward's soft and pitiful, like mine.'

(2) Othello, I. iii. 161—

''Twas passing strange,
'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful.'

(3) Hamlet, III. ii. 49—'That's villainous; and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it.' In AV 'pitiful' is used only in the first sense, compassionate; La 4^{10} 'The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children' (יְדֵי נָשִׁים רַחֲמָנִיּוֹת, LXX γυναικῶν οἰκτειρμόνων); Sir 2^{11} 'The Lord is . . . very pitiful'; Ja 5^{11} 'The Lord is very pitiful' (πολύσπλαγχνος, RV 'full of pity'); 1 P 3^{8} 'Be pitiful' (εὔσπλαγχνοι, RV 'tenderhearted').

The subst. 'pitifulness' occurs in Job 16 heading in the sense of misery.

J. HASTINGS.

PITY.—See COMPASSION. In Ezk 24^{21} 'that which your soul pitieth (marg. 'pity of your soul') is equivalent to 'object of affection' (cf. v.^{25}). There is a play upon words in the Heb. (maḥmad 'ênêkhem umaḥmal naphshĕkhem).

PLACE OF TOLL.—See TOLL (PLACE OF).

PLAGUE (i.e. πληγή 'blow,' 'stroke').—A general term for a penalty inflicted by God. It is often used as a synonym of 'pestilence,' but is usually more comprehensive and used of other punishments as well as diseases. It is employed to indicate the last of the Egyptian plagues (Ex 11^{1}), and is here the tr. of נֶגַע nega', literally 'a stroke.' In Lv 13 and 14 this word occurs 59 times as descriptive of leprosy, as also in Dt 24^{8}. It is used (in the verbal form) of Divine chastisement in general in Ps $73^{5.14}$, as a synonym of 'pestilence' in 1 K $8^{37\text{-}38}$ and Ps 91^{10}, and it denotes the punishment inflicted on Pharaoh in the matter of Sarah in Gn 12^{17}.

The word נֶגַע is six times translated 'plague.'

* Cf. Fuller, Holy Warre, 4, 'We leave them in a state most pitifull, and little pitied.'

It is used in Jos 22[17] of the plague of Baal-peor; in Nu 16[46-47] [Heb. 17[11-12]] of that following the rebellion of Korah. Elsewhere its meaning is more general, as in Ex 12[13] 30[12], Nu 8[19]. The verb נגף (AV 'plague') in Ps 89[23] is tr[d] by RV 'smite.'

In Nu 11[33] the judgment at Kibroth-hattaavah is called מַכָּה makkāh, a word usually translated 'wound,' 'smiting,' 'chastisement,' etc. In Dt 28[61] it is employed for any disease inflicted as a penalty, as in Lv 26[21], Dt 28[59] 29[22]. In 1 S 4[8] it refers to the plagues of Egypt, and in Jer 49[17] 50[13] is used of the plagues to be inflicted on Babylon and Edom, over which the enemies of these countries are to hiss in derision and astonishment.

In 22 other passages 'plague' is the rendering of מַגֵּפָה maggēphāh, used of the Egyptian plagues in Ex 9[14]; of the disease that slew the spies, Nu 14[37]; or that which slew the rebels who followed Korah, Nu 16[48. 49-50] [Heb. 17[13. 14. 15]]; of Baal-peor, Nu 25[8. 9. 18] 26[1] 31[16], Ps 106[29-30]; of the infliction on the Philistines, 1 S 6[4]; and of that which followed David's census, 2 S 24[21-25], 1 Ch 21[17-22]. It is also prophetically employed of the punishment of those that neglect the ceremonial law, Lv 14[12. 15. 18].

'Plague' in Hos 13[14] is deber, usually tr. 'pestilence.' In 1 Co 15[55] κέντρον, 'sting,' appears to be the rendering of דֶּבֶר; the LXX in Hosea uses κέντρον as the translation of קֹטֶב, and δίκη as that of deber.

In NT the issue of blood is called a 'plague' in Mk 5[29-34], where the Greek term is μάστιξ, literally a 'scourge.' This word is used of other diseases in general in Mk 3[10], Lk 7[21]. In RV the word πληγή is 12 times rendered 'plague' (AV wants it in 9[18]). See, further, MEDICINE, p. 324.

A. MACALISTER.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT.—The judgments inflicted upon the Egyptians by God on account of their oppression of the Israelites and refusal to release them. They are detailed in Ex 7[8]–12[31], and given in epitome in Ps 78[42-51] 105[27-36]. In the longer narrative ten successive plagues are enumerated: (1) the turning the river into blood, (2) frogs, (3) lice, (4) flies, (5) murrain, (6) boils, (7) hail, (8) locusts, (9) darkness, (10) the slaying of the first-born. In Ps 78 the list consists of 1, 3, 2, 8, 7, 5, 10; that in Ps 105 includes 9, 1, 2, 4, 3, 7, 8, 10. Philo gives them in the following order: 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 4, 5, 10, but that is to suit an obviously artificial classification (Vit. Mos. i. 17). The Jewish teachers use as a mnemonic the words רצך עדש כאחב, the initials of the plagues in the order given in the text.

Egyptian history is silent concerning these as well as the other incidents of the Exodus; but that is not surprising. There were, however, evidently several ancient versions of the story, which have been collated and combined by those to whom we owe the text in its present form. It is probable that the groundwork of the narrative (J) was a document giving an account of seven plagues, viz. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10. The infliction of each of these is preceded by an interview of Moses with Pharaoh at which its onset is threatened; and the sign is brought to pass by Jahweh directly (see art. MOSES, p. 439[b]). With this is combined another version (E), whose record embraced four, possibly six plagues, viz. 1 (Ex 7[15b. 17b. 20b]), 7 (8[22-23]), 8 (10[12-14]), 9 (10[20-23]); there are also traces of its influence in the account of 10, and perhaps in that of 3. Moses in these is the thaumaturgist, and works by stretching forth his hand or his rod (see art. MOSES, p. 441[a]). The third component document (P) couples Aaron with Moses; and, in general, attributes the carrying out of the miracle to him and his rod. The accounts of six plagues 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 10 seem to be taken in whole or in part from this (see art. MOSES, p. 443[a]). It will be seen from this analysis that 3 and 6 are peculiar to P, 4 to J, and 9 to E. 1, and possibly 10 are found in all three, 2 and 5 in P and J, and 7 and 8 in J and E. This list suggests the possibility that the list set forth in the Massoretic text may contain reduplicated narratives.

The district affected by the plagues is called in Ps 78[12. 43] 'the Field of Zoan' (שְׂדֵה־צֹעַן). This may be either a limitation to the eastern part of Lower Egypt, or, more probably, a poetical synecdoche. J and P in several places refer the influence of these visitations to all the land of Egypt, meaning probably Lower Egypt. In 4, 5, 7, 9, 10 the immunity of the land of Goshen is specially mentioned. The interval between the first plague and the Exodus is not stated. The actual duration of the 1st and 9th plagues is given, but not of the others. It has been supposed that the first was connected with the early stages of the Nile overflow, possibly the end of June, and that the others occurred at intervals between that time and the following Passover, which was the definite terminus in point of time. The presumption in the narrative is that of a fairly regular and quick succession of stroke upon stroke.

The plagues have been variously classified. Philo divides them into four groups: 1st, those in which God asserts His power over the grosser elements, earth and water, intrusting the bringing of the plagues to Aaron (=1, 2, 3); 2nd, plagues of air and fire inflicted by Moses (=7, 8, 9); 3rd, one plague hurtful to mankind inflicted by both together (=5); 4th, those inflicted directly by the hand of God (=4, 6, 10). The first three were admonitory, characterized by uncleanness and discomfort; those following were more or less destructive to property and injurious to man, leading up to the overwhelming catastrophe of 10.

The story of the plagues is preceded by the account of a series of signs which Moses was instructed to perform: these were twofold: (1) two were for the purpose of attesting the reality of his Divine mission to his own countrymen; (2) the other was for the purpose of influencing Pharaoh. With the former pair, the conversion of his own rod into a serpent, and the leprous hand, we are not at present concerned. The last, the conversion of Aaron's rod into a serpent, is a part of the same group of signs as the plagues. This sign Moses caused to be performed in the presence of the advisers of Pharaoh, who are called חֲכָמִים ḥăkāmîm 'learned men,' מְכַשְּׁפִים mĕkashshĕphîm or 'sorcerers,' and חַרְטֻמִּים ḥarṭummîm or 'sacred scribes.' While the first two names are undoubtedly Semitic, the last may possibly be the name of an order of Egyptian priests, a derivative of the native name ḥrdot, but this is unlikely. In the Gr. these are called ἐπαοιδοί [in Dn 1[20] σοφισταί]; see, further, in vol. ii. p. 773[a] note . There is a tradition that two of these were chosen to confront the two wonder-working Israelites, namely, Jannes and Jambres (see vol. ii. p. 548). These last two names occur in very many forms both in Jewish and Gentile literature. When these variants are compared, the constant elements are Ane or Ani and Mre or Mri, which are two of the commonest names found on the monuments of the 19th and of the immediately succeeding dynasties. In Lieblein's list, Ani or some allied form of the name occurs 24 times, and Mri 23 times. The Gospel of Nicodemus calls them ἄνδρες θεράποντες. It is suggestive that Ambres was the name of an Egyptian medical book known to Numenius and Clement (see Horapollo, i. 38).

The first sign, that of changing a rod into a serpent, was the converse of the common magical trick of rendering snakes rigid like rods. The African Psyllæ, who had control over serpents either by natural power or artificially by the use of herbs (Ludolf, Hist. of Ethiopia, Gent's tr. ix. p. 49), are mentioned by many classical writers: Herodotus (iv. 173), Dio Cassius (li. 14), Lucan (Phars. ix. 890, 925), Ælian (de Nat. Anim. xvi. 27), Vergil (Æn. vii. 753), Solinus Polyhistor (Memor. xl.), Aulus Gellius (xvi. 2), Silius Italicus (i. 411, iii. 302, v. 354, viii. 498), Pliny (vii. 2), and several others. The same form of serpent-charming is still practised in Egypt and North Africa, and has been described by several travellers, for example, von Schubert (ii. 116), Trotter (p. 174), Antes (p. 15), etc. For other observations on the snake as symbol and wand, see Böttiger's Kleine Schriften, 1837, p. 112. The writer has seen both a snake and a crocodile thrown by hypnotism into the condition of rigidity in which they could be held as rods by the tip of the tail.

(1) The First Plague, the defilement of the river, was a severe blow to Egyptian prejudices. The river was a god to whom offerings were made (Stern, Zeitschr. Ægypt. Spr. 1873, 129) and adorations addressed (Maspero, Hymne au Nil, 1868). According to the narrative in J and E, the transformation was confined to the water of the river, killing its fish ($7^{17\text{-}18.\ 21.\ 24.\ 25}$), but P states that it extended to the canals, pools, ponds, and cisterns of wood and stone (v.[19]). It is noteworthy that vessels of earthenware are not mentioned, and perhaps this may be connected with the statements of Alpinus (Med. Æg. i. 16*b*), Norden (i. 52), Sonnini (i. 124), Troilo (472), and Volney (i. 20), that it is only in earthenware vessels that the discoloured waters of the Nile-flood become clear and can be kept clear. See also Galen, de Simpl. Med. Facult. i. 3, § 2. The former narrative (JE) says that the people dug beside the river for supplies, and although it says nothing of the kind of water in these wells, it does not say that it was blood; the latter (P) declares that the water in these also was changed into blood, and Philo paraphrases this by comparing these wells to blood-vessels, from which the blood was flowing, as in a hæmorrhage. Volney says that the water found by digging wells is brackish and unfit for use (i. 16). Such a change was plainly miraculous, and this is also shown by its definite duration of seven days and its sudden disappearance.

In the normal condition of the river, as its waters rise in the third week of June, they become discoloured. This has often been described by travellers. Abd-al-latīf says that the water becomes green from the fragments of vegetable matter suspended in it, and remains discoloured until August (de Sacy's tr., p. 333), and Makrizi refers to this alteration in colour and to the offensive exhalations from the water at a later stage (quoted by de Sacy, p. 345). Vansleb adds that in process of time the water changes in colour from green to a dull ochreous red (1677, p. 53). Many other travellers confirm this observation. See Maillet, p. 57; Tourtechot, 14; Hartmann, 128; Pococke, i. 199; Savary, 1786, ii. 179. The last author speaks of the unwholesomeness of the waters in this stage, and this is confirmed by Pruner (p. 21). These changes in colour are probably due to the wasting down of some great accumulation of vegetable matter high up in the river, like the Sudd or great Nile dam described by Sir S. Baker (Lake Albert Nyanza, ii. p. 329). Ehrenberg attributes the red coloration to a minute organism, Sphæroplea annulina Agardh, which multiplies in the water after the inundation, and he has described a large number of cases of red discoloration of water in Poggendorf's Annals for 1830, p. 477. This reddening of ponds by minute organisms is not uncommon. Swammerdam tells us that he saw a pool in the Bois de Vincennes made crimson by minute crustaceans. Schuyl describes the same at Leyden, and Hjaerne at Dalecarlia (Bybel der Natuure, 1737, pp. 89, 90). The present writer has seen a similar discoloration in a pool in the Phœnix Park, Dublin, on account of enormous quantities of a species of Peridinium. The example in 2 K 3^{23} may be quoted here. It has recently been shown that in many of these coloured animals the pigment is contained in parasitic bacteria.

Changes in the water of the Nile were not unknown in the legendary history of Egypt. Manetho states that in the days of Nephercheres (about B.C. 4000) the Nile for eleven days flowed with honey. Eusebius mentions the same change as occurring in the reign of a nameless king 200 years earlier.

The plague must have been a serious calamity to the whole population, not only on account of the lack of water, but also because of the killing of the fish, as these formed an important element in the diet of the Egyptian. There is a little obscurity in the description, arising probably from the different standpoints of the original authors of the narratives. In v.[17] Moses was instructed to say to Pharaoh that he would cause the plague by smiting with his rod on the waters (E), while in v.[19] (P) Aaron is instructed to bring the plague by stretching forth his rod.

The plague lasted seven days and was apparently then suddenly removed. It was imitated by the magicians, which seems to imply that not all the water of the land was transformed. As to the time of year of its occurrence, if the phenomenon had any relation to the natural discoloration, it probably took place about the height of the flood in the month of Epiphi (beginning June 25), or, if Ehrenberg's hypothesis be adopted, probably in the month of Thoth, beginning about the 29th August.

(2) The Second Plague, that of the frogs (Ex 8^{1}, J, P), was preceded by an interview with Pharaoh, at which Moses announced the visitation. This was at once brought upon the land by the agency of Aaron stretching forth his hand. Frogs are in most years plentiful in the Nile, and the ponds and canals connected with it, but do not usually wander far from the water; but now they suddenly swarmed on the land, invading the houses, even the bed-chambers, ovens, and kneading-troughs. In Ps 78^{45} they are said to have destroyed the Egyptians, hence some Rabbinical authorities suppose these were other than ordinary frogs, but the word used, ẓĕphardēa' (LXX βάτραχος), is the name of the ordinary amphibian. It was noticed by some Hebrew writers that while the word is used in the plural in general, it is singular in v.[6], literally, 'and the frog ascended,' hence Akiba says in Semoth Rabbah that there was but one frog, so rapidly prolific that it filled the whole land. The word is obviously used as a collective, as it occasionally is in Arabic. The magicians imitated the miracle, but, as more than one commentator remarks, when the land was full of frogs, who could tell those brought by the Israelites from those of their Egyptian imitators? The plague must have been one of great irritation, not only from the discomfort, but from the croaking noise which at times frogs utter continually. The Nile frogs make a sharp sound like two pieces of wood striking together (Hasselquist, pp. 68, 254, 304). The frog was not reckoned unclean by the Egyptians, nor was it specially venerated in Lower Egypt as far as is known. In the Egyptian language the figure of a frog was used as a numerical symbol for 100,000 with the phonetic value ḥfnu. In Upper Egypt there was an obscure goddess represented with a frog's head and named Ḥkt, but we know little of her, except that in the Middle Empire the superintendents of nomes in Upper Egypt are called her priests, especially about the 12th dynasty. Horapollo says that the frog was the symbol of Ptah because it is the representative of man in embryo (Hierogl. i. 25), but there is no native confirmation of this. A frog-headed figure, called 'Ka, the father of waters,' is figured by Wilkinson and thought by him to be a form of Ptah (iii. 15). In Papyrus Ebers lii. a frog boiled in oil is recommended as an external application for swelling of the abdomen.

Several species of frog inhabit the Nile, the commonest being Rana esculenta, R. Nilotica, and R. Mosaica. They are called in Egyptian bĕnḥ and in Coptic . The sagacity of the Egyptian frog is said to exceed that of all others. See Ælian, Variæ Historiæ, i. 3.

Plagues of frogs were known in ancient times. Pliny (viii. 43), Orosius (iii. 23), Ælian (de Nat. Anim. ii. 36), Diodorus (iii. 29) give instances of these. Athenæus quotes from Heraclides Limbus an account of an invasion of frogs in Pæonia and Dardania, which drove out the inhabitants; and Justinus, in his epitome of Trogus Pompeius (xv. 2), speaks of a similar occurrence in Thracia Abderitis. Showers of frogs are often referred to by the old writers. Ælian tells us that he experienced on his way to Dicæarchia a fall of rain mixed with tadpoles and mud (Hist. Anim. ii. 56). Several such occurrences are referred to in Beyerlinck's Theatrum, under the head of Pluviæ extraordinariæ. See also Valentinus Albertus, de Pluvia Prodigiosa. Similar occurrences are reported in recent times, one in London, in the Mirror for 4th Aug. 1838. Several others are collected in Andrews' Book of Oddities, 1892, and some well-authenticated Scottish instances are given in the Glasgow Herald for 19th July 1894 and several succeeding issues. A plague of toads in the upper Nile Valley is reported by Haggard (Under Crescent and Star, 1895, p. 279). For Egyptian frogs see Seetzen (Reisen durch Syrien, etc., 1854, iii. pp. 245, 350, 364, 490, 501); see also Cameron, Across Africa, i. 267.

At Moses' entreaty the frogs were removed, and their dead bodies were gathered in heaps which made the land to stink, and probably gave rise to plagues. Appius tells us that when the people of Antareia had offended Apollo, he sent, among other plagues, an immense host of frogs, which, when they decomposed, poisoned the waters and caused a pestilence which drove them from their homes (de rebus Illyricis, 4). See also Ælian, de Nat. Anim. xvii. 41.

(3) (4) The Third and Fourth Plagues consisted of insect pests, the former of כִּנִּים kinnîm, or כִּנָּם kinnām, tr. lice AV and RV, 'sand flies or fleas' RVm; the latter of עָרֹב 'ārôbh, tr. flies AV and RV. The account of the Third Plague is derived from P (Ex 8^{16-19}), that of the Fourth from J (v.$^{21-31}$). The kinnah was probably a stinging fly, mosquito or gnat, such as was, and still is, common in Egypt (Herodotus, ii. 95). A cognate word is applied in Peah to a grain-fly. This plague was sent without any warning to Pharaoh, and was brought about by Aaron smiting the dust with his rod, as God commanded him. The insects attacked man and beast (v.^{17}), devouring them (Ps 78^{45}). The interpretation in AV and RV, 'lice,' is an ancient one, as it is found in Jos. Ant. II. xiv. 3, and in many other Jewish writings. LXX renders the Heb. words by σκνῖφες, σκνῖπες, or κνῖπες, the name given to small insects found in figs and other fruits (Theophrastus, Hist. Plant, ii. 9, iv. 17), and the Vulgate calls them ciniphes. Κνῖπες and ψῆνες are mentioned by Aristophanes as fig-parasites (Aves, 590). Philo (Vita Mosis, i. 17) says that they were small insects which not only pierced the skin, but set up intolerable itching and penetrated the eyes and nose. Origen describes them as little flying insects (Hom. in Ex. iv. 6). That they were not lice in the ordinary sense of the word is shown by their attacking beasts as well as men, for none of the three species of human pediculi will live and multiply freely on animals. It has been argued in favour of the ordinary interpretation that they came out of the dust, but while lice are not generated naturally in dust, the eggs of some species of the common small stinging flies are found in dried pools. Most travellers in Egypt speak of these gnats as one of the most troublesome of pests (see Troilo, 774; Prosper Alpinus, Hist. Nat. Ægypti, i. 4. 3; Wittman, ii. 135; Scholz, 93; Lepsius, 93; Russegger, iii. 13; Lane, i. 4, and others). Such flies are always worst after the recession of the inundation in October (Hartmann, i. 250), the larvæ living in pools and the perfect insects emerging as these dry up.

The magicians were unable to cope with these insects or to produce them, as they themselves were attacked by them, so they called them the 'finger of God.' In Egyptian dd ntru = the phrase in the text, is found in several papyri (see Papyrus 438 Boulaq), and is used of anything sent by the divinity. The magicians meant thereby that the plague was sent by their own gods, not by Moses.

The account of the plague is imperfect, as there is no mention of Pharaoh's entreaty for its removal, or of Moses' intervention for this purpose; but in the case of the Fourth Plague, that of the 'ārôbh or 'swarms' ($8^{20ff.}$, P), these lacunæ are supplied. There Moses is recorded to have threatened the infliction, and the LORD is said to have brought up the swarms, and at Pharaoh's entreaty they were afterwards removed. The nature of these pests is not mentioned, nor is there any reference to the magicians. These insects are called by LXX and Symmachus κυνόμυια, 'dog-flies,' interpreted by Jerome in the last paragraph of his epistle to Sunnia and Fretela 'omne genus muscarum,' as if it were κοινόμυια. Aquila in Ps 78 calls them πάμμικτος, 'a mixed multitude,' a word used of crowds of men by Æschylus, Persæ, 53, 'a motley host.' Josephus (Ant. II. xiv. 3), Jerus. Targums, Sa'adya, and other Hebrew authorities call them different kinds of pestilent animals, but, as Knobel remarks, some particular creature must be meant.

Flies of many kinds abound in Egypt and are common pests, as testified by Sonnini (ii. 320), Carne (i. 77), Rüppell (73), etc. Such swarms are often brought up by the south wind, filling the houses and appearing in clouds. Comparison of the descriptions of these two plagues given in the passage renders it probable that 3 and 4 are both accounts of the one plague given by different writers. Ps 105 groups them together, while Ps 78 makes no mention of the kinnîm. With this plague began the sundering of the land of Goshen from the rest of Egypt.

(5) (6) In like manner there is a probable connexion between the Fifth Plague (Ex $9^{1ff.}$, J), the murrain, and the Sixth (9^{8}, P), the boils. Neither of these is explicitly mentioned in Ps 78 or 106, unless they are the 'evil angels' mentioned between the hail and the tenth plague in the former; and, considering the connexion between disease and demonology in the Jewish mind, this is probable. Plague 5 was heralded by an announcement to Pharaoh, while there was no such for 6. The Fifth was sent directly from the hand of the LORD, while Moses and Aaron are the instruments in the Sixth. It is also explicitly stated that 6 was upon beast as well as man (v.^{10}). All these considerations strengthen the probability that these are respectively the Jahwistic and Priestly records of the one plague.

The nature of the murrain is not given; it was דֶּבֶר כָּבֵד מְאֹד 'a very grievous pestilence' (see PESTILENCE and PLAGUE, pp. 755, 865), but the word deber is too general to give a definite idea of its species. Leyrer has conjectured that it might be anthrax or milzbrand (Herzog, RE, viii. p. 251). It was a disease affecting flocks, herds, camels, horses, and asses, evidently very fatal (though v.[26] shows that 'all' is not literally intended). Severe cattle plagues have been recorded in Egypt by many writers. Pruner says that splenic fever, anthrax, and rinderpest occasionally prevail, and speaks of an epidemic of the last in March 1842, which lasted nine months, and was very destructive, but it did not affect camels or horses. Camels are not very liable to epizootic diseases, but suffer sometimes from tuberculosis, and often from itch (102 ff.). They were, however, at the time of Moses not plentiful in Egypt, if they were found there at all (see Chabas, Études sur l'Antiquité Historique, 1873, p. 398 ff.; and Dillm. on Gn 12[16]). Lepsius mentions the same outbreak of cattle-plague in 1842, which had been fatal to 40,000 oxen (p. 14); and it is also graphically described by Mrs. Poole (The Englishwoman in Egypt, i. 59, 114; ii. 32).

We have no mention of the removal of this plague, which probably worked itself out; but immediately succeeding it, if not a part of the same infliction, was the outbreak of the שְׁחִין shĕḥin or 'boils' on mankind and beast. This came without warning, Moses and Aaron being instructed to sprinkle handfuls of the ashes of a furnace towards heaven. Although probably for the most part derived from P, there are signs of the influence of E in v.[8]. This plague affected all classes, but we do not read that it was very fatal. Its nature has been discussed already in MEDICINE, p. 324, and references to similar diseases in Egypt will be found in Niebuhr (Descr. d'Arabie, i. 133). Little blister-like swellings on the skin are described by Döbel (Wanderungen, ii. 184); a more severe form is recorded by Berggren (Reisen in Æg. ii. 121). Similar diseases are described by Vansleb (Voyage en Egypte, 1677, p. 58), Volney (Travels, Eng. tr. i. 248), Wittman (who notices the pestilential effects produced by the putrid carcases of camels, horses, etc., around the Ottoman camp, leading to malignant fever, etc., and whose 'Medical Journal' is most valuable), Travels with the Turkish Army, 1803; Russegger (i. 247); Seetzen (Reisen, iii. 204, 209, 377), etc. In view of the recently discovered capacity of mosquitos and gnats to carry contagion, it is striking to note that disease of man and beast so quickly followed the swarms of flies. Josephus puts the distemper of animals as a supplement to the plagues of the swarms.

(7) (8) Egypt was essentially an agricultural country, as we can gather from the monuments, especially from the tomb-pictures; therefore the two plagues which followed affected the material prosperity of the country in its most vital point. The Plague of the hail was foretold to Pharaoh by Moses at his next interview (9[18], J), and by the warning he gave the Egyptians the opportunity of saving their cattle. On the day following, Moses, by God's command, stretched forth his hand to heaven (v.[22], E), and the storm of lightning and hail burst over the land, beating down the crops, breaking the trees, and killing the cattle left by the murrain (v.[25]). Visitations of this kind, though not unexampled, are exceedingly rare in Egypt (see HAIL, vol. ii. p. 282). Pruner saw hail showers only three times in twelve years, and these were slight, while he knew of only one fatal case of lightning stroke in that time (p. 36). Sonnini describes a thunderstorm accompanied by snow (hail?) in January (ii. 133), Niebuhr in December (i. 497), as also Thevenot (i. 344). Wittman says that on 20th November 1801 'we had a tremendous storm of rain, thunder, and lightning, which began at two o'clock and continued near two hours' (p. 577). Another storm occurred in March. Lepsius relates that in December 1843 there was a sudden storm growing into a hurricane 'such as I had never seen in Europe,' and a hail which made the day dark as night (p. 26). Monconys also describes a lightning storm in January (p. 180); Pococke notes lightning and rain in the Fayyum in February (p. 92). Seetzen experienced it also in March (iii. 98); Vansleb heard thunder only twice in Egypt, in January and May 1673 (p. 39).

The destruction of the cattle was due to their being in the field in spite of the warning. Niebuhr says that the herds are put out in the field from January to April (i. 142), and Hartmann that they are generally kept in their stalls from May to the end of November (i. 232). See also Diodorus Siculus, i. 36). The date of this plague is fixed by v.[31. 32] (E), which say that it happened when the barley was in the ear and the flax in bud ('bolled,' AV), but the wheat and spelt were not yet in ear, or sufficiently forward to be destroyed. Flax is sown usually in mid-November or December, rarely as late as in January (Russegger, i. 231), and flowers in February (v. Schubert, ii. 137; Forskål, Flora, p. xliii) or March (Russegger); it is usually pulled in April (Seetzen, iii. 241), according to Wilkinson about 110 days after sowing. Knobel quotes Sicard for its flowering as early as December, but this must have been exceptional. Denon found the barley in flower in December (p. 143). Sonnini says that the barley is nearly a month earlier than the wheat (ii. p. 20), and Brown, that the wheat is beginning to bud at the end of January (ii. p. 138). Wheat, spelt, and barley are generally sown in November. The barley harvest is early in March, sometimes 90 days after sowing. In Olivier's journey to the Pyramids in April, he found the barley already cut, the flax mostly pulled, but the wheat was ripening (iii. 125). Von Schubert (ii. 175) and Forskål confirm these observations, and state that the barley is ripe by the end of February or beginning of March, while the wheat is not ripe until April (Flora, p. xliii). The spelt (AV 'rye') ripens at the same time as the wheat (Forskål, p. xxvi). The deduction from these data is that the plague took place probably about the middle of January. Confirmatory observations as to the ripening of crops in Egypt will be found in Radziwill (Hierosolymita Peregrinatio, Brunsberg, 1601, 159), Nordmeyer (Comment. Calendar Ægypt., Göttingen, 1792, 23–29), Shaw (ii. 171).

The Eighth Plague, that of locusts (Ex 10[4-6. 12-15], J, E) followed while yet the devastation of the last plagues was fresh in the memories of the people, who said to Pharaoh, 'Knowest thou not that Egypt is destroyed?' (v.[7]). Pharaoh was warned of its imminence, but Moses and Aaron were driven from his presence (v.[11]). The plague followed the stretching forth of Moses' hand (v.[12]) or rod (v.[13]) over the land, and the locusts were brought from the Arabian side by an east wind. The coming of locusts from the East has been mentioned by Shaw, as it was in olden time by Agatharchides (Mare Rubrum, ch. v.) and Diodorus (iii. 29). Strabo likewise speaks of the locust-eaters of the Galla country, to whom the west wind drives the great clouds of these insects on which they live, and the unwholesome nature of that food (xvi. p. 772).

The species of locust was the אַרְבֶּה 'arbeh, or common migratory locust (see above, p. 130[a]).

The peculiarity of the plague was their coming in such immense numbers, for Egypt is by no means so liable to devastation by locusts as Syria; and they swept clean all the remnants of vegetation that the hail had left, including the wheat and the spelt. The ground was darkened, that is, concealed by the multitude of the locusts. Burckhardt has described such a locust-plague in the Ḥaurân (Syria, p. 381). Lepsius also, in March 1843, while engaged in opening a sarcophagus in a mummy pit, was suddenly overshadowed by a cloud of locusts from the south-west, which darkened the heavens (p. 45). Denon saw in May an immense mass of locusts flying from east to west a little over the ground (p. 286). Volney's description of the locust-plague in Syria is well known (i. 305).

At Pharaoh's entreaty Moses prayed for their removal, which was accomplished by a strong wind from the Mediterranean, which swept them into the Red Sea, for, destructive as they are, they are the sport of the winds so much that 'tossed like a locust' is a proverbial expression (Ps 109^{23}).

For other references to locusts in Egypt see Tischendorf's Reise im Orient, i. 252; Shaw, 165; Hasselquist, 254; Niebuhr, 168; Forskål, 81.

(9) The Plague of darkness was sent without warning, and was brought on by Moses stretching forth his hand (10^{21-23}, E). For three days the land was covered with a palpable cloud which shut out all light from sun, moon, and stars. This condition is described in the words וְיָמֵשׁ חֹשֶׁךְ 'that one may feel (the) darkness' (LXX ψηλαφητὸν σκότος). Of this plague there is a graphic account in Wis 17.

It has been supposed that the author of J did not know of this plague, from the words 'only this once' in v.[17], but it may have been immediately after the locusts, as if a part of the same visitation. The condition of darkness referred to is strikingly like that brought about by the severer form of the electrical wind ḥamsin. This is a S. or S.W. wind that is so named because it is liable to blow during the 25 days before and the 25 days after the vernal equinox (ḥamsin=50). It is often not so much a storm or violent wind as an oppressive hot blast charged with so much sand and fine dust that the air is darkened. It causes a blackness equal to the worst of London fogs, while the air is so hot and full of dust that respiration is impeded. There are excellent accounts of these storms of darkness in Prosper Alpinus, Medic. Ægypt. i. 7; Savary, ii. 229; Niebuhr, i. 468; Legh, 48; v. Schubert, ii. 409; Ruppell, 270; Sonnini, ii. 166; Pruner, 35; Wittman, ii. 54; Volney, i. 47; Pococke, i. 306. Denon says that it sometimes travels as a narrow stream, so that one part of the land is light while the rest is dark (p. 286). In such a way the Land of Goshen was left unclouded while the rest of Egypt was dark. As the first plague showed God's power over the river, so did this over the light of the sun, who as Ra was one of Egypt's chief deities. At Pharaoh's request this plague was also removed. Three days is not an uncommon duration for the ḥamsin.

(10) The Death of the Firstborn.—In his last interview with Pharaoh, Moses was dismissed from his presence with the threat of death if he again appeared on behalf of Israel, whereupon he announced God's last judgment (11^{4}). The plague followed at midnight on that day. God claimed all the firstborn of humanity as His own, and ordained that in Israel they were to be redeemed by sacrifice (13^{13}). In this plague the unredeemed firstborn of Egypt were sacrificed in one great slaughter. It affected all classes from Pharaoh on the throne to the maid at the mill (11^{5}, J), to the captive in the prison (12^{29}, J, P) as well as the domestic cattle. By this final catastrophe the obstinacy of Pharaoh was overcome, and, as Moses had foretold, the Egyptians not only freed Israel, but commanded their exodus.

There are many traditional and historical records of sudden outbreaks of plague. See Syncellus (i. 101–103), Diodorus (40), Thucydides (ii. 48), Procopius (ii. 22), etc. Modern outbreaks in the month of April, or a little after the vernal equinox, are reported by Bruce (iii. 715), Sonnini (i. 277), Tobler (Lustreise, i. 137), Legh (113). It is worthy of note that many authorities say that the plague often is worst at the time of the ḥamsin wind (Prosper Alpin. i. 7; Thevenot, i. 375; v. Schubert, ii. 138; Lane, i. 3; and Pruner, p. 419). The coexistence of cattle disease with the plague is mentioned by Döbel (Wanderungen, ii. 205).

The account of this plague bears internal evidence that it is compiled from materials from all three sources.

This catastrophe has been regarded by some as a sudden outbreak of pestis siderans, but according to the narrative it cannot have been a natural plague, but on account of the peculiarities in its course and incidence it was evidently a direct interposition, and one the memory of which was meant to have a lasting effect on the conduct of Israel ($13^{14.15}$).

In reviewing the narratives of these Divine judgments, we have seen not only that there are reasons to believe that they consisted of eight episodes, 1, 2, 3 (4), 5 (6), 7, 8, 9, 10, but that there is a certain thread of connexion running through the series. If the first took place towards the end of the period of high Nile in August, it is probable that the second occurred in September, which is still the month when frogs are most abundant. The insect plagues may conjecturally be supposed to follow in October or November, and the disease plagues in December. The notes of time of the hail-plague give us surer ground to refer it to January. The locusts and the darkness intervened between this and the 14th of Abib (the date of the Exodus).

In some of the series, and possibly in all, it is to be noted that the Divine power used the ordinary seasonal phenomena in a miraculously intensified form as the instrument of judgment. If the narrative of J, which confines the blood-change to the Nile, be taken as the oldest account, it is possible that it may have been due to some special detachment of a dam of vegetable matter like the Sudd above referred to. This, with the organisms which must exist in myriads in it, might well have caused the discoloration and fœtor of the waters. Such a mass of organic matter with its concomitant animal life would be the condition under which frogs would multiply rapidly, and may have been the antecedent used to bring about the condition of the Second Plague. The decomposing masses of frogs could not fail to have been the best possible breeding grounds of very many kinds of insects, a veritable 'motley multitude' fulfilling the name of the Fourth Plague. The results of recent bacteriological observations show how great a factor in the spread of disease these insects are, and so 5 and 6 would follow as the sequences of 3 and 4. The Seventh inaugurates a new series, and is followed by the two other plagues, depending on atmospheric conditions. The onset of the east wind brought the locusts, and the shift to the west removed them, while the dropping of the wind to the south-west brought up the dreaded ḥamsin, carrying the plague in its train.

In the Apocalyptic visions of the trumpets and vials (Rev 8 ff.) much of the imagery is taken from the story of the Plagues in Egypt.

A. MACALISTER.

PLAIN.—This word (as a subst.) stands in AV, in some cases inaccurately, for several very different terms in the Heb., which it has been the aim of RV, though with only partial success, to express and distinguish correctly. The following are the words which are tr^d 'plain' in AV:—

1. אָבֵל 'meadow' in Jg 11[33] ('the plain of the vineyards,' RV 'Abel-cheramim').

2. אֵלוֹן 'oak' (in accordance with an old Jewish interpretation), in 'plain(s) of Moreh,' Gn 12[6], Dt 11[30], and 'of Mamre,' Gn 13[18] 14[13] 18[1], RV in each case 'oak(s),' marg. 'terebinth(s)'; also in Jg 4[11] 9[6. 37], 1 S 10[3] (RV as before). See MOREH.

3. בִּקְעָה (from בָּקַע 'to cleave'), a broad plain between hills ('a surrounding of hills seems necessary to the name Biḳ'ah, as if land laid open in the midst of hills,' HGHL 655, where mention is also made of a small upland plain, surrounded by mountains, on the E. of Jordan, called the Beḳ'a, or [dimin.] the Bukei'a; see also Stanley, SP, App. § 5). In AV biḳ'āh is rendered 'plain' in Gn 11[2], Neh 6[2] ('the plain of Ono'), Ezk 3[22. 23], Am 1[5] (RV 'valley'), Dn 3[1] (Aram. בִּקְעָא,—'the plain of Dura'). Elsewhere in AV and RV 'valley,' by which, however, must then be understood not a ravine (גַּיְא), but a broad vale. The Biḳ'āhs mentioned by name in the OT are those of Jericho, Dt 34[3] ('the Kikkār [see below], (even) the plain of Jericho'); of Mizpeh, Jos 11[8] (prob. the Merj 'Ayūn, N.W. of Dan, between the Litāni and the Ḥasbāni); of Lebanon, Jos 11[17] 12[7] (probably the broad flat plain between Lebanon and Hermon, even now called in Arabic by a nearly corresponding word, el-Beḳā'a); of Megiddo, 2 Ch 35[22], Zec 12[11] (the plain of Esdraelon, girt by hills on all sides; see HGHL 385 f.); of Ono, Neh 6[2] (7 m. S.E. of Joppa); of Aven, Am 1[5] (the broad plain between Lebanon and Hermon; see AVEN); and of Dura, Dn 3[1] (near Babylon). Biḳ'āhs without names are referred to in Gn 11[2], Ezk 3[22. 23] 8[4] 37[1. 2] (in the vision of the dry bones: prob. the same as the biḳ'āh of 3[22] etc.); the word occurs also, without reference to specific localities, in Dt 8[7] 11[11], Ps 104[8], Is 40[4] (see RVm), 41[18] 63[14] (all). The retention of the two renderings 'plain' and 'valley' in RV is to be regretted; but it is no doubt due, at least in part, to the fact that there is no exactly corresponding English term. 'Plain' is, on the whole, preferable to 'valley.'

4. כִּכָּר (properly a round, e.g. of metal, i.e. a 'talent,' or of bread, i.e. a loaf or round cake), used specifically of the 'round,' or as we should probably say, the 'oval,' of Jordan, the (approximately) oval or oblong basin into which the depression (el-Ghôr) through which the Jordan flows expands, as it approaches the N. end of the Dead Sea: it must also, if the 'cities of the kikkār' are rightly placed at the S. end of the Dead Sea, have included the Dead Sea itself.* The expressions used are 'the kikkār of Jordan,' Gn 13[10. 11], 1 K 7[46] (=2 Ch 4[17]), and 'the kikkār' alone, Gn 13[12] 19[17. 25. 28. 29], Dt 34[3] (cited above), 2 S 18[23]. The word occurs also, perhaps in the same sense, in Neh 3[22]; but probably in a more general sense in 12[28] (see Comm.: AV 'the plain country'). In RV always 'Plain' (usually with a capital P). Cf. SP 284, 287, 488; HGHL 505 f. No doubt this is the region meant by ἡ περίχωρος τοῦ Ἰορδάνου in Mt 3[5]; for LXX renders כִּכַּר by ἡ περίχωρος in Gn and 2 Ch (ἡ π. τοῦ Ἰορδάνου in Gn 13[10. 11]), and by τὰ περίχωρα in Dt.

5. מִישׁוֹר a smooth and level tract of country (from יָשַׁר 'to be level'): the general meaning of the word appears well from Ps 26[12] 27[11] ('a path of evenness'), 143[10] (RVm), also from 1 K 20[23. 25] (where it is opposed to the 'hills'), Is 40[4] RVm ('level'; ‖ בִּקְעָה), Zec 4[7]. With the art., this word is used specifically of the elevated plateau, or table-land, of Reuben or Moab, E. of the Dead Sea, Dt 3[10] 4[43], Jos 13[9. 16. 17. 21] 20[8], Jer 48[8. 21] (in the prophecy on Moab), 2 Ch 26[10]. AV and RV in all these passages render 'plain,' except Dt 4[43], Jer 48[21] 'plain country,' and 2 Ch 26[10] AV 'plains.' RV has sometimes the marg. 'Or, table land.'

6. עֲרָבָה steppe (in poetry, Is 35[1. 6] 40[3], Jer 17[6] al.), with the art., as a proper name, הָעֲרָבָה, the 'Ărābāh, the name given to the gravelly, sandy, and generally unfertile floor of the valley through which the Jordan runs, and which extends southwards to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah (see ARABAH; and HGHL 483 f.), now called el-Ghôr (the Hollow, or Depression), in AV nearly always 'the plain,' in RV 'the Arábah,' Dt 1[1. 7] 2[8] (here of the same valley, S. of the Dead Sea, now el-'Arăbah), 3[17. 17]+ 4[49. 49] 11[30] (AV 'the champaign'), Jos 3[16] 8[14] (see Dillm.) 11[2. 16] 12[1. 3. 3. 8] 18[18. 18] (AV 'Arabah,' RV 'the Arabah'), 1 S 23[24], 2 S 2[29] 4[7] 15[28], 2 K 14[25] 25[4] (=Jer 39[4]=52[7]), Ezk 47[8] (AV 'the desert'), Am 6[14] (AV 'the wilderness'), Zec 14[10], RV (fig. of a level; MT, however, as Baer shows, points both here and in Is 33[9] without the art., i.e. 'like a steppe'); see also Is 33[9] RVm.

The same word, in the plural, occurs also in the two expressions, 'the plains—better steppes, or desert parts—of Moab,' Nu 22[1] 26[3. 63] 31[12] 33[48. 49. 50] 35[1] 36[13], Dt 34[1] (see Driver), v.[8], Jos 13[32], and 'of Jericho,' Jos 4[13] 5[10], 2 K 25[5] (Jer 39[5] 52[8]), of the parts of the same depression, on the opposite sides of the Jordan, in the latitude of Jericho. In the case of the plur., RV retains the rendering 'plains': in 2 S 15[28] 17[16] ('plains of the wilderness'), however, it follows the Kethibh (עַרְבוֹת for עֲרָבוֹת), and renders 'fords' (with marg. 'plains'). There may not be a precise English equivalent; but 'plains,' it should be remembered, does not at all express the distinctive idea of the Hebrew word (bare, desolate, and unfertile soil; cf. HGHL 483, 485).

7. הַשְּׁפֵלָה (from שָׁפֵל to be low), the lowland, the technical designation of the low hills and flat valley land stretching down towards the Mediterranean Sea in the W. and S.W. of Judah. This term is in AV rendered 'plain' only in Jer 17[26], Ob 19, Zec 7[7]; 'low plains' in 1 Ch 27[28], 2 Ch 9[27]; 'vale' in Dt 1[7], Jos 10[40], 1 K 10[27], 2 Ch 1[15], Jer

* Cf. under LOT, pp. 150, 151.

† Here, as also 4[49b], Jos 3[16] 12[3b], 2 K 14[25], the 'Sea of th Arabah,' i.e. the Dead Sea; cf. Ezk 47[8], Am 6[14].

33^{13}; 'valley(s)' in Jos 9^{1} $11^{2.\ 16.\ 16}$ 12^{8} 15^{33}, Jg 1^{9}, Jer 32^{44}; 'low country' in 2 Ch 26^{10} 28^{18}: in RV it is rendered uniformly 'lowland.' The reference in all these passages is the same, except in Jos $11^{2.\ 16b}$, where the context shows that a locality further to the N. must be intended, probably a group of similar low hills, between Carmel and the high central range of Samaria (HGHL 49 and 203 n.). The LXX represents השפלה mostly by ἡ πεδινή (cf. 1 Mac 3^{40}), but by ἡ Σεφηλα in Jer 32^{44}, 33^{13}, Ob ^{19}, 2 Ch 26^{10}, which also occurs in 1 Mac 12^{38} (AV 'Sephela,' RV 'the plain country').

The region commonly known as 'the Shephēlāh' must have been a fairly definite one: in Jos 15^{33-44} it forms a distinct district of Judah (side by side with the 'Negeb,' v.$^{21ff.}$, the 'hill country,' v.$^{48ff.}$, and the 'wilderness,' v.$^{61f.}$), and 39 (40) Judahite cities contained in it are enumerated, those at present identified being (beginning at the N.) Gimzo (a little S.E. of Lydda), Aijalon, Gedērah, Eshtaol, Ẓor'ah, Beth-shemesh, 'En-gannim, Ẓanoaḥ, Jarmuth, Socoh, 'Adullam, Marēshah, 'Eglon and Lachish (W.S.W. of Marēshah), and Beth-tappuaḥ (a little W. of Ḥebron): Adida (included in it in 1 Mac 12^{38}) is a little N. of Gimzo (Ḥaditheh); Emmaus (ib. 3^{40}) is very near Aijalon; and Timnah (2 Ch 28^{18}) is close to 'En-gannim. All these cities are between the high central range of Judah on the E. and the Philistine plain on the W. The W. limit of the 'Shephēlāh' has, however, been disputed. It has generally (e.g. by Dillm. on Jos 15^{33}) been held to include the Philistine plain, and the Phil. cities are certainly enumerated after those of Judah in Jos 15^{45-47}; on the other hand, Ob ^{19}, Zec 7^{7}, and 2 Ch 28^{18} imply that it was outside the Phil. territory. Hence G. A. Smith insists strongly that though the term may sometimes have been used more widely, it was limited more properly to the intermediate region indicated above, consisting of a mass of 'low hills,' varied often by stretches of 'flat valley land,' which, as viewed from the Phil. plain and the sea, appear 'buttressing the central range all the way along,' but which are separated from it in fact by a well-defined series of valleys, running from Aijalon to near Beer-sheba' (HGHL 49, 211 ff.; cf. Buhl's criticism, Geogr. 104, with Smith's reply, Expositor, Dec. 1896, pp. 404–406). This 'maze' of hills 'curves round the Phil. plain from Jaffa to Gaza like an amphitheatre': it is pierced by five important valleys running up from the plain into the heart of Judah: viz. (1) the road from Joppa and Lydda, through the hollow Vale (עֵמֶק) of Aijalon, and then up through the hills, past the two Beth-ḥorons, to Gibe'on and Michmash; (2) the Wādy eṣ-Ṣurār, or valley (נַחַל) of Soreḳ, up past Beth-shemesh and Ḳiriath-je'arim, to Jerusalem (the course taken by the modern railway from Jaffa); (3) the Wādy eṣ-Sunṭ, leading up from Tell eṣ-Ṣāfi, through the Vale (עֵמֶק) of Elah, past Socoh, and then either up the Wādy el-Jindy to Bethlehem, or (turning S.) along the Wādy eṣ-Ṣur, past 'Adullam, to Ḳe'ilah; (4) the Wādy el-Afranj leading up from Ashdod, past Eleutheropolis, to Beth-tappuaḥ and Ḥebron; and (5) the Wādy el-Ḥesy, starting a little N. of Gaza, passing Lachish, and leading up to a point 6 miles S.W. of Ḥebron. The historical and strategical importance of these valleys is well drawn out in HGHL 209–236: the first, especially, is a route along which have passed many times the hosts of both invading and defeated foes.

8. τόπος πεδινός, Lk 6^{17}; RV 'a level place.'

Of the words rendered 'plain,' even in RV (Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6), each, it will now be seen, has a definite and distinctive meaning of its own: the environs of Jericho are indeed described (from different points of view) as a kikkār, a biḳ'āh, and 'ărābōth; but the mishōr, for instance, could never have been called a biḳ'āh, nor could a biḳ'āh, speaking generally, have been called an 'ărābāh; and the 'plain' (mishōr) inhabited by the Moabites (Jer 48^{8}) was geographically quite distinct from the 'plains' ('ărābōth) of Moab. The only term which really corresponds completely to our 'plain' is mishōr.

S. R. Driver.

PLAIN.—The only unfamiliar occurrence of the adj. is in Gn 25^{27} 'Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents.' As RVm ('or quiet or harmless, Heb. perfect') shows, the Heb. (תָּם) is the epithet so frequently applied to Job and tr^{d} 'perfect' (Job 1^{1-8} 2^{3} 8^{20} $9^{20.\ 21}$; cf. 9^{22}, Ps 37^{37} 64^{4}). The idea expressed by the word is completeness or flawlessness. 'In the present context,' says Dillmann, 'it can neither mean morally blameless nor ἄπλαστος, ἁπλοῦς, simplex, simple, unsophisticated; for Jacob, in what follows, appears always, on the contrary, as sly and cunning.' He compares the German fromm (pious), and considers the meaning to be ἥμερος, 'quiet' or 'peaceful,' in antithesis to 'wild.' The tr. 'plain' is from the Geneva Bible, which has the marg. alternative 'simple and innocent.' 'Simple' is Tindale's word, and the marg. note in Matthew's Bible reads, 'He is simple that is without craft and decept and contynueth in belevyng and executynge of godes wyll.'

PLAY.—The verb to play had a wider use formerly than now. Tindale has: Ex 1^{10} 'Come on, let us playe wisely with them, lest they multiply'; Ex 5^{5} 'Beholde, there is much people in the londe, and ye make them playe and let their worke stonde'; Ex 10^{2} 'the pagiantes which I have played in Egipte, and the miracles which I have done amonge them.' And in AV to 'play' is used in the sense of to 'sport,' not only of 'boys and girls' (Zec 8^{5}) or a 'sucking child' (Is 11^{8}), but of men and women in worship. Thus Ex 32^{6} 'The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play' (לְצַחֵק,* quoted in 1 Co 10^{8} παίζειν); 1 S 18^{7} 'The women answered one another as they played' (מְשַׂחֲקוֹת,† RV 'in their play'); 2 S 6^{5} 'And David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir wood [or, better, 'with all their might, even with songs,' reading, with parallel passage in 1 Ch, בְּכָל־עֹז וּבְשִׁירִים instead of בְּכָל־עֵצֵי בְרוֹשִׁים], even on harps,' etc. (the playing here is not playing on the instruments as AV, but sporting and dancing to the accompaniment of the music on the instruments, as shown in 1 Ch 13^{8}; RV 'with all manner of instruments'). See Games.

The phrase 'play the man' occurs in 2 S 10^{12} 'Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people' (חֲזַק וְנִתְחַזַּק, LXX ἀνδρίζου καὶ κραταιωθῶμεν), a phrase which comes from the Douay Bible, where, however, it is the tr. of the first

* This verb צחק in its Qal conjug. is the usual verb in Gn (where alone it is found) meaning to laugh (Gn 17^{17} 18^{12} $13.\ 15\ bis$ 21^{6}); in its Piel conjug. it occurs Gn 19^{14} 21^{9} (RVm 'play') $39^{14.\ 17}$ (followed by בְּ) where it is tr. 'mock'; 26^{8} 'sport'; and Jg 16^{25} 'make sport.'

† This, a later form of צחק, is the verb translated 'play' (in the sense of sport) throughout the rest of OT (except Is 11^{8} 'the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp,' שָׁעַשַׁע), 1 S 18^{7}, 2 S 2^{14} $6^{5.\ 21}$, 1 Ch 13^{8} 15^{29}, Job 40^{20} 41^{5} (here and in the following passage with בְּ='play with.' Followed by לְ, שחק means 'mock at,' e.g. Ps 37^{13} 59^{8}, Pr 31^{25}, Job 5^{22}. Margoliouth surely forgets this when [p. 17 of The Origin of the 'Original Hebrew' of Ecclesiasticus] he renders לְ שחק 'played with'). Ps 104^{26}, Zec 8^{5}.

Heb. word, 'Play the man, and let us fight for our people,' after Vulg. 'Esto vir fortis et pugnemus.' The phrase is not uncommon, especially in echoes of this passage, as Foxe, Martyrs, vii. 550, 'At the stake Latimer exhorted his fellow-sufferer, Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man'; Herbert, 'The Church Porch,' lxxvii.—

> 'In brief, acquit thee bravely, play the man:
> Look not on pleasures as they come, but go;
> Deferre not the least virtue: life's poore span
> Make not an ell by trifling in thy wo.'

PLEAD.—To plead in AV never means to pray or beseech, but always to argue for or against a cause. Thus Job 16[21] 'O that one might plead for a man with God,' and 19[5] 'If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me, and plead against me my reproach.' The verb most frequently tr. 'plead' is רִיב, which is also rendered 'contend,' 'strive with' or 'strive against,' etc. It is the verb used in Job 13[19] 'Who is he that will plead with me' (RV 'contend with me'); Is 1[17] 'Plead for the widow'; 3[13] 'The Lord standeth up to plead'; Jer 2[9] 'I will yet plead with you, saith the Lord'; 2[29] 'Wherefore will ye plead with me?'; Hos 2[2] 'Plead with your mother, plead.' Amer. RV usually prefers 'contend.'

The subst. 'pleading' has the same meaning in Job 13[6] 'Hearken to the pleadings of my lips' (רִבוֹת).

Plead is to be traced back to Lat. placitum, an opinion (fr. placere, to please); in Low Lat. a writ summoning a court of justice, in the form quia tale est nostrum placitum, 'for such is our pleasure.' Then placitum came to mean the court so convened, and also the pleading or business done at it. Placitum became plait in Fr., whence Eng. 'plea' and 'plead.' An older spelling of plead is 'pleate,' found in Ps 35[1], Pr. Bk. (in mod. editions printed 'plead'). J. HASTINGS.

PLEASURE as a verb is found in 2 Mac 2[27] 'for the pleasuring of many' (διὰ τὴν τῶν πολλῶν εὐχαριστίαν, AVm 'to deserve well of many,' RV 'for the sake of the gratitude of the many'); and 12[11] 'promising both to give him cattle, and to pleasure him otherwise' (ὠφελήσειν αὐτούς, RV 'to help his people'). The Rhemish translators speak (on Lk 16[9]) of 'the farmers whom the ill steward pleasured.' Cf. Shaks. Timon, III. ii. 63—'I count it one of my greatest afflictions that I cannot pleasure such an honourable gentleman.' J. HASTINGS.

PLEDGE.—1. חָבַל (once Ezk 18[7] חֶבְלָה) noun, חָבַל verb (LXX ἐνεχύρασμα, -μός, ἐνεχυράζω). The primary meaning of this root is 'to bind,' hence 'to hold one by a pledge.' The taking of a pledge for the repayment of a loan was sanctioned by the Law (Ex 22[26] [Book of the Covenant], cf. Dt 24[6. 10ff.], where, however, in v.[10ff.] the term for 'pledge' is עֲבֹט, see below); but it was enacted that when this pledge consisted of the large square outer garment or cloak called simlah or salmah, it must be returned before nightfall, since this garment often formed the only covering of the poor at night (cf. the reproaches uttered in Am 2[8], Job 22[6] 24[9], and see Ezk 18[6. 12. 16] 33[15]). In Pr 20[16] we read, 'Take his garment that is surety for a stranger, and hold him in pledge (AV and RVm 'take a pledge of him') that is surety for strangers' (m. 'a strange woman' [following Kerê], so AV, omitting 'that is surety'). The same saying recurs in 27[13], where both AV and RV have 'a strange woman.' The Heb. reads חָקְחִי־בִגְדוֹ כִּי־עָרַב זָר וּבְעַד נָכְרִיָּה (נָכְרִים)(לָ); LXX of 27[13] (20[16] is wanting) ἀφελοῦ τὸ ἱμάτιον αὐτοῦ, παρῆλθεν γάρ· ὑβριστὴς ὅστις τὰ ἀλλότρια λυμαίνεται. This appears to be a reflection on the folly (cf. Pr 22[27]) of becoming responsible for another man's debt (see Toy, ad loc., who would read, 'for a stranger or strangers' [masc. sing. or plur., not fem. sing.] in both passages). It was forbidden to 'take the mill or the upper millstone to pledge,' as this was tantamount to taking 'a man's life to pledge,' Dt 24[6] (see Driver's note). A similar provision is found in v.[17], which forbids taking the widow's garment (בגד) in pledge; cf. Job 24[3], where the taking of the widow's ox is condemned.

2. עבט occurs four times, Dt 24[10. 11. 12. 13] (LXX ἐνέχυρον). In vv.[10. 11] it is prescribed that when an Israelite lends to his neighbour on the security of a pledge, he is not to go into the house for the purpose of fetching his pledge, but the borrower is to have the right of selecting the article. Vv.[12. 13] contain the same provision as Ex 22[26f.] (see above). The primary sense of the root עבט (Qal 'borrow or pledge,' LXX δανείζομαι; Hiph. 'lend on pledge,' LXX δανείζω) is doubtful.

The word 'pledge' is also introduced by RV in Hab 2[6] as tr. of עֲבֹטִים in the phrase וּמַכְבִּיד עָלָיו עֲבֹטִים (LXX καὶ βαρύνων τὸν κλοιὸν αὐτοῦ στιβαρῶς): RV 'and that ladeth himself with pledges' (sc. which he has taken from the nations, and whose restitution is at last compelled [cf. Job 20[10. 15. 20]]). AV 'thick clay' and Vulg. lutum denseum are due to understanding עֲבֹטִים as two words, עָב (constr.) and טִיט 'clay,' cf. Ex 19[9] בָּעָב הֶעָנָן 'in a thick cloud.'

3. ערב, Qal and Hithp., 'to be surety,' 'to give a pledge,' 'to make a wager.' Thus in 2 K 18[23]= Is 36[8] the Rabshakeh says in his message to Hezekiah, 'Now, therefore, I pray thee, give pledges (AVm 'hostages') to my master the king of Assyria' (הִתְעָרַב, μίχθητε). The correct sense is undoubtedly that given in RVm 'make a wager,' by handing over a pledge to be forfeited in case of failure to furnish men to mount the 2000 horses offered by the Assyrian king. The noun עֵרָבָה is tr. 'pledge' in 1 S 17[18] 'Look how thy brethren fare and take their pledge' (אֶת־עֵרְבָתָם תִּקָּח, A ὅσα ἂν χρήζωσιν γνώσῃ, Luc. καὶ εἰσοίσεις μοι τὴν ἀγγελίαν αὐτῶν), i.e. 'bring back some token of their welfare' (Driver), which had probably been agreed upon beforehand. This yields an excellent sense, and there appears to be no sufficient reason (with many scholars, including H. P. Smith) to doubt the correctness of the MT. The cognate form עֲרַבּוֹן (LXX ἀρραβών, cf. the NT use of this word for the 'earnest' of the Spirit in 2 Co 1[22] 5[5], Eph 1[14]; see art. EARNEST) is used in Gn 38[17. 18. 20] of the pledge (consisting of his staff and signet ring) which Judah gave to Tamar as security for the fulfilment of his promise to send her a kid. J. A. SELBIE.

PLEIADES.—The three passages (Am 5[8], Job 9[9] 38[31]) which contain the proper noun כִּימָה (Kîmâ, Orion) also mention כְּסִיל (Kĕsîl, Orion) and the Eng. Versions have in each case taken the latter to be the Pleiades, their rendering, 'the seven stars,' in the first of these passages, obviously pointing to the asterism which they call Pleiades in the other two.* The Pleiades are a group of stars, seven larger and some smaller, in the constellation of the Bull, near the ecliptic, belonging to the northern hemisphere. To the ancients the rising and setting of this group announced respectively the beginning and end of the season of navigation. Hence their name is usually derived from the Greek πλέω, 'to sail,' though others would connect it with πλέος, 'full,' and understand the reference to be to their being apparently closely packed together. Josephus, in one of his rare references to astronomical phenomena, employs 'the setting of the Pleiades' to mark a date (Ant. XIII. viii. 2). The common Arabic name for these stars is el-negm, i.e. the star group par excellence, because they serve

* Lockyer, The Dawn of Astronomy, p. 134, remarks: 'The seven stars are held by many to mean the Pleiades, and not the Great Bear; but this, I think, is very improbable.' Yet Lockyer has admitted, p. 133, that the Pleiades are mentioned in Job 38[31], and there is no good reason why the original word should have diverse senses in the two passages.

the nomads and peasants as calendar and time-measurer, especially by their monthly conjunctions with the moon. It has been shown recently that in Egypt the rising of the Pleiades was watched for astronomical purposes 'even in pyramid times,' and that three Greek temples—the archaic temple to Minerva at Athens (B.C. 1530), the Hecatompedon (B.C. 1150), on whose site the Parthenon was subsequently built, and the temple of Minerva at Sunium (B.C. 845)—were orientated, the first two to the rising and the third to the setting of η Tauri in the Pleiades [see Lockyer, pp. 418, 419].

The verb kûm, from which Kîmā must be derived, is not found in biblical Hebrew. In Syriac the cognate verb is frequently employed in the sense of 'heaping up.' In Arabic kumat = 'a heap.' In Assyrian kimtu = 'a family.' The name Kîmā would thus seem peculiarly appropriate to the Pleiades. The ancient VSS of the Bible, though somewhat wavering, are on the whole in favour of the identification. The LXX at Job 9^9 has Ἄρκτουρον, at Job 38^{31} Πλειάδα, at Am 5^8 it follows a corrupt text. The Pesh. and the Targ. retain the Hebrew word. Aq., Symm., and Theod. all use Πλειάδα at Am 5^8. Jerome varies between Hyades (Job 9^9), Pleiades (Job 38^{31}), and Arcturus (Am 5^8). An attempt has been made by Hoffmann ('Versuche zu Amos,' ZATW, 1883) to prove that Kîmā is Sirius. The chief arguments are that Sirius, Orion, the Hyades, and the Pleiades—the order which, on this interpretation, is followed at Job $38^{31.32}$—are ranged in the sky in this order, almost in a straight line; and, moreover, that an accurate picture of natural phenomena is thus obtained. 'Dost thou keep bound the refreshing influences of Sirius, and dost thou let loose the outpourings of Orion?' The reference would then be to the rise and overflow of the Nile, which was heralded each year by the heliacal rising of Sirius on the day of the summer solstice. But this interpretation depends partly on the conjectural alteration of the word מֹשְׁכוֹת into מַסְכוֹת, which we have felt constrained to reject [see art. ORION], and partly on a mistaken derivation and explanation of מְעַדְנוֹת (LXX δεσμόν), which does not mean outpourings, but 'bands,' 'links,' 'knots.'

As might have been expected, this conspicuous group of stars arrested the attention and exercised the imagination of many peoples. The Australian saw in them a group of girls playing the corroboree. The North American Indian thought of them as dancers. There is some reason for believing that at one time in Egypt they were connected with Isis. The Greeks represented them as sisters flying before Orion: the maidens prayed for deliverance from the giant hunter, and were heard by the gods, who changed them into doves, and placed them amongst the stars. In this mythology their names are Electra, Maia, Taygete, Alcyone, Celæno, Sterope, and Merope. The Arabs pictured them as a group of riders mounted on camels; and Wetzstein (in App. to Delitzsch's Book of Job) points out that they named the star immediately in front of the cluster ḥadi, i.e. the singer who rides in front of a troop of camels and stimulates them to swift movement by his song. The Persians compare them to a cluster of jewels or a necklace. Their mention in the Bible has no mythological tinge. At Am 5^8, Job 9^9, the constellations are adduced as forming part of that wonderful complex of creation the existence of which bears testimony to the Maker's almightiness. At Job 38^{31} they are signs of the seasons, and the recurrence of these seasons year by year is altogether beyond the control of man. He cannot tie the bands which hold this group together—another proof of that impotence which should lead him willingly to submit to God.
